percentage points lower than the 2017 result (where 79% were confident). However, our 2019 survey cannot tell us whether public confidence is returning to levels seen in the past or the start of a more significant decline. A significant minority of people (18%) said that they were not confident the election was well-run. We asked these people to select reasons why they were not confident the election was well-run. The most common reasons related to concerns about campaigning or the media. Some people also selected concerns that related to the way the registration or voting process worked: 28% of those who were not confident the election was well-run said they thought that some people did not have the opportunity to vote or had the opportunity taken away 22% said they were not confident because the election was held at short notice 17% said they were not confident because they thought some people had difficulties registering to vote More than 7 out of 10 of all voters and non-voters (72%) said that they thought voting in general is safe from fraud and abuse. A very small proportion of people said they had direct or second-hand experience of electoral fraud at the election: 2% said that they knew someone who had committed electoral fraud. 1% said that they personally saw someone vote when they were not allowed to. Despite these low percentages, more than a third of people (38%) said they thought that some fraud had taken place at the election. This is consistent with evidence about allegations of electoral fraud at the election. Data from police forces shows that they recorded 156 cases of alleged electoral fraud relating to the election. Of these cases, just over half required no further action following initial inquiries by the police, and one sixth were locally resolved. One third of the reported cases remain under investigation. What next? What next? Take an in depth look at campaigning at this election Or, go back and read our overview 1. Our power to set and monitor performance standards for electoral services does not apply in Northern Ireland. We continue to be of the view that our performance standards framework should be extended to Northern Ireland and will further engage with the Chief Electoral Officer and the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) to progress this. ■

Matt Edmonds welcomed those present and apologies were noted. Minutes of the last meeting and matters arising The minutes of the last meeting held on 10 November 2021 were approved and there were no matters arising. Preparations for Scottish Council elections 2022 Legislation Maria McCann (MMcC) reported all SSIs relevant to the 5 May elections had been laid although two were still to come into force. James Kelly (JK) asked if consideration had been given to a Freepost mailer for candidates at Scottish Council elections. (MMcC) said there was no objection in principle since the funding for these elections was met by local government but would require legislation and though not time to get this done for the upcoming elections, it could be revisited for the future. Electoral Commission Guidance Martin McKeown (MMcK) said the Electoral Commission had published their candidate and agents guidance for the May polls. He had also written to all existing councillors in Scotland to highlight the publication of the guidance and to point them, in particular, to some of the key changes they needed to be aware of. A letter for prospective candidates to be used by Returning Officers had also been issued. Events for ROs/EROs and Police Scotland (MMcK) said arrangements for a joint event between the Electoral Commission and the Electoral Management Board for Scotland were being finalised. This would be held on 27 January and was an opportunity for Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers to discuss issues around the planning for the May polls. On 10 February, there would be a briefing for Police Scotland divisional Single Points of Contact (SPOCs). He introduced Superintendent Darren Faulds and Sergeant Gary Kelly, both of Police Scotland to the Panel. EMB Update Chris Highcock (CH) said the EMB had issued a range of directions to EROs and ROs which gave consistency in the key voter facing elements of the election, such as the dates poll cards would be distributed, use of same colour of ballot paper, official marks. SIENNA and the number of issues of postal votes. The directions had been circulated to the Panel. He said all counts would be under way by 9:30 am on Friday 6 May 2022, though boxes could be opened from 8:00 am onwards. There was a new approved scripts for the declaration so the same wording would be used by each Returning Officer. In regard to COVID, the same baseline measures as last year would be applied. There had been positive feedback from Public Health Scotland that (as far as they were aware) no case had been linked to any electoral event. Police Scotland Superintendent Darren Faulds (DF) said planning had commenced for the role Police Scotland would play in the forthcoming Scottish Council elections. The strategic intention was being developed; the approach would be fluid due to COVID and current threat assessment. Police Scotland would work with Returning Officers, the EMB and the Electoral Commission to ensure safe delivery of the event. Noting the recent death of an MP, he said security of candidates, count attendees, and supporters was paramount and though the threat was very low, there was potential for public disorder which would be monitored through local intelligence.

There would be a policing footprint on the day and candidate personal safety advice included in the candidate packs provided by Returning Officers to signpost what to look for and where to get more information. There was a request from Paul Moat that this information be distributed before nominations open. Scott Martin (SM) had previously been told he had to report potential electoral offences in person and asked, given the specialist nature of any likely offence, if direct telephone numbers could be provided to parties to enable faster reporting. (DF) explained they were tied by reporting guidelines from Crown Office, each case being assessed and prioritised but he would be happy to discuss further if (SM) wished. E-Counting Project James Newman (JN) said the system had been thoroughly tested and signed off by council colleagues and used at three recent by-elections. Reports indicated the system worked well and there were no issues. The next phase was around logistics, delivery and training. He said that wards would be counted in sequences with councils and Fujitsu was working on design and layout plans. There was a series of in person events planned for Aberdeen, Paisley and Edinburgh and there were online and e-learning materials too. Public awareness and partnership activity Catherine Heggie (CHe) outlined the two aims of the Electoral Commission's awareness campaign; encouraging people to register to vote ahead of the deadline, and ensuring that voters can cast their vote with confidence. The Commission's 'Got 5?' registration campaign would run across TV, radio, video on demand and other channels, and target under-registered groups. The Commission would be running 'Welcome to Your Vote' week with education partners to encourage schools and youth organisations to run political literacy sessions. New learning resources would be launched online and circulated as soon as possible. A voter information booklet (available in BSL, Easy read and various languages) would be sent to all households in the week beginning 28 March. There would be a video which explains voting using STV, which will be promoted through a paid digital advertising campaign. There would be a guide produced with RNIB Scotland and Sight Scotland to let blind and visually impaired voters know what to expect at the polling place. The Commission would also be running an awareness day on 10 March to encourage qualifying foreign citizens to register to vote. UK Elections Bill Hannah Standring (HS) confirmed that responsibility for this Bill had now been moved from Cabinet Office to the Department for Levelling Up. The Bill had completed its progress through the House of Commons (17 January) and had its First Reading in the house of Lords the following day. The Second Reading remained to be scheduled. The Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee of the Scottish Parliament had published its report on the Legislative Consent Memorandum (LCM) on the elections Bill which noted that the Scottish Government did not intend to lodge an LCM and the majority of the Committee considered that legislative consent should not be provided to the provisions in the Bill. Updates (not related to Scottish Council elections 2022 at item 4) Scottish Government Nothing further to add. Scotland Office/Cabinet Office (HS) said the Dissolution of Parliaments Bill was coming up to Committee Stage in the Lords next week. Boundaries Scotland As there was no representative in attendance, a written update would be requested and circulated around the members. Boundary Commission for Scotland Isabel Drummond-Murray was not present but the Chair suggested and it was agreed that she be approached to provide a written update to circulate. Royal Mail Rachel Winham (RW) said they were well into planning, having made contact with all local authorities, checking response envelopes for postal votes. They were aware of the ever changing COVID situation and staffing issues and the need to work closely with local authorities. They would attend the EMB meeting on 24 January and would meet with Pete Wildman, Chris Highcock and Jim Doig on a weekly basis. Election mail would be made a priority and closely scrutinised.

Electoral Management Board for Scotland The UK Elections Bill had been noted earlier and the Panel informed that the EMB/SAA in relation to subsequent implementation of its provisions was inputting advice to civil service colleagues as part of an expert panel. Jim Doig (JD) said the refresh exercise for postal votes had just started.

EROs would be sending out a Household Notification Letter (HNL) towards the end of January though a couple would not be taking part due to funding issues. The SAA had agreed to undertake a TV advert similar to last year. (SM) asked if data was available on the update-action arising in different areas and asked if there would be a quantifiable way to show the effect of the HNL. (SMA) said inline registration made it easier to track but with GDPR, people could opt out of being tracked. (JD) said HNL more for awareness to let people know who is registered at that house, if HNL incorrect, should generate hits. (JD) should be able to track through the digital service. EROs had just finished the annual canvass (published 1 December) so should be up to date and accurate and therefore did not anticipate a large number of changes. Postal vote refresh of all authorities had commenced across Scotland in the week beginning 10 January. The Electoral Commission (MMCK) advised that the Commission intended to publish the returns for parties that spent over £250K at the Scottish Parliament election in early February. At the same time the Commission will publish data (in excel format) collected from candidates via the spending returns submitted to Returning Officers. The Performance Standards for Returning Officers were currently under review with the intention of consulting on revised standards in the coming months. In regard to Policy Development Grants, an Order had been laid in the UK Parliament on 17 January. The Order added Alba Party to the list of parties entitled to share the Grant and would come into effect on 6 February.

Parliamentarians would have until 25 February to pray against the Order. They would know for certain by 25 February that they could rely on the Order to calculate this year's grants. Finally he reminded the panel that the Electoral Commission's deadline for registering a new party, amending an existing party name or adding/amending an existing emblem to be included on ballot papers for the elections taking place on 5 May 2022 was by 5pm on Friday 21 January 2022. (SMA) said that Bob Posner, the Commission's Chief Executive would retire at the end of March and his replacement, Shaun McNally, would be in post at the beginning of April. There would be future opportunities to meet him at the PPP and in other forums. (SMA) said that in the last year, the Commission had undertaken work around public attitudes to the modernisation of the electoral system. Findings had shown people wanted some developments to modernise but did not want to lose the feeling of it being special and important. The Commission now intended to canvass opinion amongst stakeholders exploring what modernisation of the electoral process could mean to them. The Commission would get in touch with parties to invite participation Dates of future meetings 2022 8 March* 16 May Pre-meeting 10:30am and meeting proper at 11am except for *8 March 2:30pm pre-meeting and 3pm meeting

Draft guidance for Returning Officers: Assistance with voting for persons with disabilities | Electoral Commission Search Draft guidance for Returning Officers: Assistance with voting for persons with disabilities You are in the Consultation on draft guidance for Returning Officers: Assistance with voting for persons with disabilities section Home Our consultations Consultation on draft guidance for Returning Officers: Assistance with voting for persons with disabilities On this page Summary How to use this guidance Ensuring that voting is accessible Understanding the barriers to voting for voters with disabilities Providing equipment at the polling station that enables or makes voting easier for voters with disabilities Making decisions about providing additional support and equipment for voters Ensuring those working to support the poll are aware of accessibility needs Raising awareness about the voting process and support available Communicating the voting process and support available Working with local networks and civil society organisations in your area Reviewing the election First published: 5 September 2022 Last updated: 5 September 2022 Summary Every person should be able to register and vote without facing barriers. This guidance provides information and advice on the actions you and your staff can take to help remove physical, psychological and information barriers at the polling station. It also aims to support you in identifying and providing equipment for polling stations which will help to make voting easier for voters with disabilities. It has been informed by feedback received from a range of civil society organisations who have shared the experiences of voting at polling stations of those they represent as well as highlighting practices and equipment that could help to improve their experience. How to use this guidance Throughout this guidance we use the word must to refer to a specific legal requirement and the word should for recommended practice. As Returning Officer (RO), you must have regard to the guidance on equipment to be provided in polling stations 1 as part of your wider duties to consider the needs of disabled voters at polling stations, make reasonable adjustments and provide equipment. Ensuring that voting is accessible Every voter should be able to vote independently and in secret. However, we know that those with a disability often report facing barriers including: not knowing about their voting rights not having the confidence to register or vote experiencing issues when they go to a polling station Having a disability means a person's physical or mental abilities are reduced in some way compared to most people. A person's disability can be as a result of a medical condition: for example, someone with arthritis in their hands may not be able to grip or carry things as well as some other people. But a disability does not have to be a diagnosed medical condition and can include physical and psychological impairments that can be both visible and invisible. For example, if a person is suffering from anxiety, they might have mental impairments - like difficulty concentrating - as well as physical impairments, such as extreme tiredness and difficulty sleeping. This guidance will help you to consider some of the known barriers to voting highlighted by those with disabilities, how you can ensure you and your staff are aware of them, and how you can identify what support and equipment to provide at polling stations to ensure that voting is as accessible as possible for everyone. There is a general framework of legal provisions which sit alongside specific provisions in electoral law to help to safeguard and improve the experience of voters with disabilities, which you will need to have regard to in identifying how to administer the voting process in your area. Equality Act 2010 In Great Britain, ROs have a duty under the Equality Act 2010 to anticipate the needs of people with disabilities and consider reasonable adjustments that may remove any substantial disadvantage. As RO, you are required to ensure that all people with disabilities, are not offered a lower standard of service than other voters. To do this, you need to consider the needs of voters with disabilities and anticipate the types of reasonable adjustments that could be needed by voters with different types of disability. Northern Ireland Act 1998 Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 requires all government bodies, which includes the Chief Electoral Officer to promote equality of opportunity for those with a disability and those without when carrying out its functions,. These duties apply in the construction of policies, policy implementation and the provision of services. Disability Discrimination Act 1995 In Northern Ireland, the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 requires that public authorities, which includes the Chief Electoral Officer, make reasonable adjustments to remove any substantial disadvantage for people with disabilities. Representation of the People Act 1983 There are specific provisions contained in the RPA 1983 providing a duty to support accessibility of voting. Section 199B of the RPA 1983 You are required, where you consider it appropriate to do so, to ensure election notices are translated or provided in alternative formats. You may produce them in: Braille 1 In languages other than (or, in Wales, and Welsh) 2 Using graphical representations 3 In audio format 4 Using any other means of making information accessible 5 Schedule A1 RPA 1983 You must consider the accessibility of potential polling station when considering designating or reviewing a polling place. 6 The relevant authority must seek representations from those who have a particular expertise in relation to access to premises or facilities for persons who have different forms of disability. 7 Our polling district review guidance contains more information about this duty. Elections Act 2022 The Elections Act 2022 introduced provisions to assist those with disabilities with voting at polling stations. The Act: creates a requirement for you to provide each polling station with such equipment as it is reasonable to provide for the purposes of enabling, or making it easier for, relevant persons to vote independently and in secret. Relevant persons are defined in the legislation as those who find it difficult or impossible to vote due to blindness, partial sight or another disability. requires you to have regard to the Commission's guidance on the equipment to provide at polling stations. 8 This guidance can be found in Providing equipment at the polling station that enables or makes voting easier for voters with disabilities extends the rules on who can act as a companion to include anyone who is over the age of 18. 9 These provisions apply to the following election types: UK Parliamentary elections Police and Crime Commissioner elections in England and Wales Local elections in England and Northern Ireland Mayoral elections in England GLA elections Assembly elections in Northern Ireland These requirements do not apply to elections to the Scottish Parliament or the Senedd, or to local elections in Scotland and Wales. However, the duties under the Equalities Act 2010 and the RPA 1983 which relate to ensuring voting is accessible to voters with disabilities do apply.

Understanding the barriers to voting for voters with disabilities People with disabilities face different types of barriers when they want to go to a polling station to vote. For example, some people do not have the confidence to go to the polling station, and some have physical obstacles to overcome in order to be able to vote. By identifying and understanding the physical, psychological and information barriers people may face, you will be better able to make arrangements to help people to vote. Some of the barriers and challenges faced include: Not understanding the voting process Written instructions not being available in plain or easy read format Not being aware that a companion can assist with voting Anxiety about: going to the polling station, especially if they've not been there before being able to get into the polling station knowing what will happen there knowing what the process for voting is the possibility of lots of people being there at the same time the possibility that there will be lots of noise feeling rushed to make decisions quickly queueing previously having had a negative experience in the polling station Not being able to access the building/polling station For example, if there are steps or the layout inside is unsuitable for wheelchairs to access Being unable to read or understand instructions given due to: Visual impairments or blindness Hearing impairment or hearing loss Dyslexia Learning disabilities Not being able to communicate effectively with polling station staff Being unable to use the pen or pencil provided Being unable to wait in a queue Providing equipment at the polling station that enables or makes voting easier for voters with disabilities This section outlines the equipment that should always be provided at polling stations to help address the known barriers and ensure that voting is as accessible as possible for voters with disabilities. It also highlights further additional equipment that may be appropriate to provide if you identify or are made aware of specific needs of voters with disabilities. To help voters understand the voting process and how to mark their ballot paper you must provide: A notice inside and outside the polling station providing instructions on how to vote at the election 1 A notice in each polling booth providing information on how to mark the ballot paper at the election 2 You must consider whether it is appropriate to make these notices more accessible for a wider range of voters 3 by providing them in alternative languages and formats, e.g. in Braille, in languages other than or Welsh, in pictorial formats 4 or in audible form. 5 At least one large sample copy of the ballot paper must be displayed inside the polling station, 6 ideally in a well-lit location where voters can easily see it before being issued with their ballot paper. Large print sample ballot papers displayed in the station will assist voters who are partially sighted and also voters who would like some time to look at the ballot paper before entering the booth. An enlarged hand-held copy of the ballot paper. This can be given to voters who are partially sighted to take into the polling booth for reference when marking their ballot paper. Equipment to support voters to participate You have a duty to provide each polling station with such equipment as it is reasonable to provide for the purposes of enabling, or making it easier for, relevant persons to vote independently and in secret. 7 We have a duty to give guidance in relation to your duty to provide this equipment 8 and you must have regard to this guidance. 9 Through our work with civil society organisations and charities we have identified a range of equipment that can help to overcome the known barriers faced by people with disabilities. Many of these items are readily available at limited cost and can have a real and positive impact on the experience of voters in the polling station. The following equipment should, as a minimum, be provided in all polling stations to support voters with disabilities: Chair/seating – this provides a place to rest for voters who cannot stand for long periods and a seat for voters who would like to take some time to think before entering the polling booth Magnifiers – these increase the size of the text on a document providing support for voters who are visually impaired to vote independently Tactile voting device –this provides support for voters who are visually impaired to mark their vote on the ballot paper in the correct place. Polling booth at wheelchair level –helps to ensure that voters who use a wheelchair are able access a lower writing surface to ensure they can cast their vote in secret in a booth that is accessible Staff name badges – these help voters more easily identify that a person is a member of staff in the polling station and is someone they can approach for assistance Pencil grip – these can help voters with dexterity impairments to more easily hold and use a pencil independently Ramps (for buildings with steps) – these support access to a polling station for voters who use a wheelchair or have difficulty using steps Temporary alerters or doorbells for any doors that are required to remain shut during the day (for example, fire doors) – these provide a way for voters to let polling station staff know that they need assistance to open the door so they can access the polling station Appropriate lighting – some polling station venues have good lighting but others may need additional lighting at the desk; to ensure that voters can clearly see the faces of staff, and in the polling booths; to support voters with visual impairments to be able to read and complete the ballot paper. Reserved parking spaces reserved for voters with disabilities (where parking is available at the venue) – this ensures that disabled voters can park as close as possible to the polling station You are not limited to providing only the equipment shown in the list above, and indeed should not reduce or remove any equipment that you have provided to support disabled voters at polling stations in your area at previous polls. There are other types of equipment that could support voters to participate, which could also be provided in polling stations. Examples of additional provision you could make include the following: Hearing induction loop – these provide support to voters with hearing loss to communicate in the polling station. Some buildings have an induction loop installed as standard, in which case you should make use of it, and where this is not one available then a portable hearing loop could be used. Audio devices – audio devices are pieces of equipment that reproduce, record or process sound. An audio device can be used together with the tactile voting device enabling blind and partially sighted voters to listen to candidate lists and then mark their ballot paper independently. Information available in easy read format – Easy read refers to the presentation of text in an accessible, easy to understand format. It is often useful for people with learning disabilities, and may also be beneficial for people with other conditions affecting how they process information. Making decisions about providing additional support and equipment for voters As RO you may receive requests for additional support or equipment to be provided, beyond that which you are already planning to put in place. For example, you may be informed by a voter with a particular type of disability that they remain at a substantial disadvantage (i.e. a disadvantage that is more than minor or trivial) despite your adjustments, as they have specialist or additional needs. In such instances, you should consider the request and decide if it is reasonable to provide additional support and/or equipment to remove the substantial disadvantage the voter has identified and brought to your attention. Each request should be considered on its merits and with a view to continuing to support the right of every voter to be able to cast their vote. When making your decision, there are a range of factors you should take into account, including: Will providing the additional support or equipment that has been requested enable or make voting easier for voters with a range of disabilities? How easy or practical is it to provide the additional support or supply the equipment requested? For example: Is the equipment readily available for purchase? Are the cost implications reasonable? Are there any more cost-effective or readily available alternatives? Is the equipment single-use or can it be used for future polls? Is the requested equipment portable and able to be transferred to another polling station if required (for example, due to a last minute polling station change)? Are there any training implications to consider in order for staff to provide the required support or to support the use of the equipment? You are not required to record or grant a request from every individual voter with a disability who contacts you, but you should keep a clear audit trail of your decision making process. Retention of information when contacted by a voter with disabilities for additional support or equipment Where you are contacted by a voter with a disability asking for additional support or equipment, you may receive sensitive special category data about that individual and their specific needs. You will be considered the data controller for this sensitive data and it is your responsibility to ensure that you manage it in line with data protection requirements, and ensure that the individual is aware of how their data will be managed. You should take advice from your Data Protection Officer about what to do with the data once processed and whether you need to update any privacy notices relating to the processing. More information on managing special category data can be found in our guidance on data protection. Ensuring those working to support the poll are aware of accessibility needs To help ensure that all voters are provided with equal access to voting and receive a high quality of customer care it is important that all of those who work to deliver the election or provide information to voters are aware of the needs of those with disabilities. You should provide accessibility awareness training for all staff who interact with voters, including staff who support electoral services, to help improve their understanding of the needs of those with disabilities and the importance of clear communication. Working with external partners, we have developed resources that could help your staff to understand barriers to voting and experiences of voters with disabilities at the polling station including: RNIB video which shares the experiences of voting in the polling station for those with sight loss Mencap videos which share the experiences of Charlotte and Harry of voting in a polling station with a learning disability You can take advice from your Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) officer or HR department on other accessibility awareness training that you could access. Staff should also be made aware of the resources we have available on our website and YouTube channel to assist votes with particular disabilities to help with understanding about voting and what to expect at the polling station. For more information and updates about our resources we create you can subscribe to Roll Call our voter registration newsletter and your guide to supporting voter registration and participation. In addition to all of this you could think about sourcing or developing evergreen resources that are not election specific and so can be used year round over multiple years in partnership with civil society organisations that advocate for and support their stakeholders on issues surrounding the accessibility of voting. Training for polling station staff to support accessibility It is also vital that your training for polling station staff addresses the importance of being aware of accessibility needs of voters at the polling station and what steps they should take to support them. Our resources for training polling station staff include accessibility awareness information throughout them. The actions and behaviours that polling station staff demonstrate are key to making voters' experience in the polling station a positive one. Simple things like offering assistance and listening to voters' questions can make a real difference. In addition to general awareness raising of accessibility needs, it is important that your training for polling station staff covers: the barriers faced by voters with disabilities at the polling station and how polling station staff can help reduce them awareness that not all disabilities are visible the importance of considering the needs of the person, not a specific disability awareness that some voters may have more than one disability – for example, a visual impairment and dementia the importance of clear communication about the voting process the importance of clearly communicating that assistance is available if required awareness of the equipment provided at the polling station to enable and make easier voting in the polling station for voters with disabilities, and how to use it awareness that a companion assisting a voter can be anyone over the age of 18 In our core guidance for Returning Officers for each type of election , we link to resources for training polling station staff which contain information on accessibility which you should highlight when briefing polling station staff. Raising awareness about the voting process and support available This section of the guidance covers the actions you can take to raise awareness of the voting process and the support that is available for voters. It is important that you have a clear communications strategy to help tackle the barriers some voters face, as well as to ensure voters are aware of the support available to enable them to vote confidently. This is equally important for by-elections or unscheduled polls, which may take place at short notice, as for scheduled elections. You should update your public awareness strategy by identifying how and when you will: Identify and communicate with relevant partners and disability organisations to explore opportunities to work together to raise awareness Promote and communicate information to voters with disabilities about the process of voting at a polling station and the support and equipment available Ask for feedback on the support and equipment provided – for example, by proactively inviting comment via your website or social media Communicating the voting process and support available There are a range of ways that you can provide and promote information about the voting process and support available to voters. This can help to overcome some of the known barriers for voters with disabilities and can make a real difference to helping them participate with confidence. You may hold contact details for residents who are disabled. Having access to these details provides you with an opportunity to communicate directly with residents with disabilities about accessibility at polling stations. Providing information on the location of polling stations Feedback from organisations representing people with disabilities is that some voters find it difficult to access information on polling station locations. We provide, in partnership with Democracy Club, a postcode look-up tool on our website . To increase the visibility of this information, you should promote the postcode search tool as widely as possible. You could embed the tool on your own website, using the widget we've made available, or add a link to our website. You could also share the link with existing internal networks or external organisations you are working with and encourage them to share it with their stakeholders. Additionally, you could include the link on the notice of situation of polling stations. Should you need any further information or support in using the search tool, please visit Democracy Club's website . Providing advance information on voting at the polling station To help overcome concerns and anxiety about what voting at the polling station will be like, you could provide a dedicated page on your website that contains accessible content to help voters who want to know more about voting at the polling station. This could include: information about the assistance and support available in the polling station including: That a companion is able to assist a voter That a Presiding Officer is able to help a voter The types of equipment that will be available at the polling stations information about what to expect when voting at the polling station including: Links to videos about voting in BSL Easy guides to voting videos by Mencap When the station is likely to be busy and when it is likely to be quiet Availability of quiet space Including additional information on poll cards and making the information accessible Although the content that must be included on poll cards is prescribed in legislation, you may also add further information that you think is appropriate. 1 The only exception to this is for Northern Ireland local elections where the poll card is prescribed exactly and makes no allowance for any other information to be included. 2 Other changes to the process as a result of the Election Act will introduce additional information that needs to be communicated to voters in advance of the poll. This will mean for relevant elections the poll card will need to become a letter to enable the relevant information to be included. This change of format of the poll card will provide a good opportunity for you to include additional information to voters about their polling station and the accessibility of the voting process . You could include a link to an accessible web page or provide a QR code on the poll card letter that takes the voter directly to a web page that provides information about the voting process or the equipment that will be available. As some voters find the information provided on the poll card inaccessible, you should also think about how you can make the information contained on the poll card more accessible by additionally publishing it in an alternative way. For example, you could put the poll card information on your website in an accessible format, compatible with screen readers. You could also make easy-read or large print versions available on request, and publicise this via the poll card itself and on your website. If you hold email addresses for voters, you could also email them the information - ensuring it is emailed in an accessible format. Sending these additional communications could also provide an opportunity to raise awareness about what will happen on polling day, what to expect in the polling station and the equipment that will be available. Providing accessible sample ballot papers Some voters may find it useful to look at the ballot paper in advance of going to the polling station to help them to prepare for the process of voting. You could provide sample ballot papers on your website to support this, and ensure that any you do provide are accessible to electors who use screen readers. Providing information to political parties, candidates and agents about accessible voting at polling stations You should include information in the briefings you provide for candidates and agents about the support and equipment available at polling stations. Candidates and agents may know individual voters who require support or specific equipment and can help ensure that they are aware of the support that is available for them and how they can access it. Working with local networks and civil society organisations in your area You may have existing relationships with networks of disability groups and civil society organisations. If you do not have these relationships, you may need to work with others who do, for example: Social care providers Equalities officers Communications teams Housing officers Partnership/Community Engagement officers County Voluntary Councils/People First Groups (Wales) Establishing relationships with disability groups and civil society organisations that are active in your local area can be beneficial as they can advise you on specific steps you can take to improve the accessibility of voting at polling stations in certain locations. They can also provide advice on the types and methods of communication you should use to promote the equipment and support available at polling stations as well as information on elections more generally. These local organisations may also have access to specialist equipment which may benefit voters locally with particular disabilities and needs which you could borrow or hire. Reviewing the election After each election you should evaluate the equipment and support provided in polling stations and how you communicated with voters on their needs and what they could expect. You should invite feedback from voters and accessibility groups on their experience of voting in polling stations, about what worked well and what didn't, to help inform what you do to support voters with disabilities at future polls. We have a statutory duty to report at UK Parliamentary elections, Parliamentary by-elections, PCC elections, PCC by-election and NI Assembly elections. We will ask for feedback on the steps you have taken to assist voters with disabilities by providing equipment in the polling station to inform our reports. Mechanisms you could use to gather feedback include: Providing an easy read survey at the polling station about the voting experience Inviting voters and partnership organisations to attend focus groups to discuss their experiences of voting in the polling station Inviting polling station staff to discuss their experience working in a polling station where specific equipment was provided, how they dealt with any difficult situations on the day, and their feedback on the training they received Reviewing any feedback provided in reports returned by Presiding Officers and polling station inspectors Monitoring the use of the equipment you provide in polling stations by asking polling station staff to keep a record in the polling station log book or via post poll surveys or feedback. To ensure you get a wide range of external feedback you should consider providing a range of options. A good way of finding out the most appropriate approach to reaching specific groups of voters would be to ask the partnership organisations you work with what would work best for the voters they support.

Minutes of the previous Board Meeting (EC 35/21) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 21 April 2021 be approved with minor amends to item 11.

May 2021 elections reporting (Oral) The Board received a presentation to consider the initial perspectives on how the elections were delivered in relation to the objectives for well-run elections during the Covid-19 pandemic. These conclusions would be tested against the evidence base the Commission is currently developing, with an update on the emerging conclusions and a discussion on any recommendations to be included in our reporting scheduled for the July Board meeting. The Board also received feedback from Head of Electoral Commission, Wales and Head of Electoral Commission, Scotland on the planning process, campaigning, voters and administration in those areas. The Board noted updates from Commissioner for Wales and Commissioner for Scotland, reporting overall satisfaction and well organised polling stations. The Board noted the presentation and looked forward to receiving a report on the emerging evidence base and recommendations at the July Board. Resolved: That the Board noted the presentation and welcomed planned discussions to explore solutions to address challenges of supplier capacity in the electoral administration, as well as learning from experience to promote best practice to drive standards upwards. Corporate Plan 2022/23 – 2026/27: strategic direction ((EC 36/21) The Board received a report providing the Board with an opportunity to review the proposed strategic direction for the Corporate Plan 2022/23 – 2026/27. It was noted that the general strategic direction for the plan was endorsed by the Board in October 2020, but with the passage of time and events it was opportune to ensure it remained appropriate. The Board asked questions and made suggestions on the drafting of the Plan. They encouraged greater consideration of what the electoral system might look like in the future and the Commission's role in bringing that about. The Board asked that the Commission's work in public education and research be considered broadly. Working in closer partnership with stakeholders and reaching out to under-represented groups was encouraged. There was consideration of future trends in addressing climate change objectives and the rise in carbon neutral election tools. The Board discussed ensuring the Corporate Plan was accessible and recognised the different situation in each of the nations of the UK. Resolved: That the strategic direction for the development of the Corporate Plan 2022/23 – 2026/27 take into account how the electoral system needs to adapt to future challenges. Performance report quarter four 2020/21 (EC 37/21) The Board received a report providing performance information for the quarter to end of March, as well as information for the year end. For quarter four, all the goals were rated green overall but, as indicated within the goals and other sections of the report, some indicators, operational plan actions, projects and risks beneath these were not green. That Board noted that, in several indicators in Goals 2 and 4, the indicator was red in part due to the target being set at 100% where this could not reasonably be expected. The relevant Directors reported that review of the performance indicators for 2021/22 had identified this and more feasible, but still stretching, targets were being set. The Board asked for more narrative information to bring out why deadlines had been missed and the importance of meeting Audit and Risk Committee deadlines. Resolved: The Board noted performance for the fourth quarter and for the year as a whole (subject to finalisation as part of the annual report and accounts). Review of the annual report and accounts 2020/21 (EC 38/21) The Board received a draft of the Commission's Annual Report and Accounts 2020/21 following inputs provided at the April Board meeting on the performance review and key messages. The Board noted that the current draft had received further input from the Chair, Executive Team, Heads and other relevant staff. The Board discussed and provided input on scope and presentation along with getting the detail and balance right. The Board noted that feedback would be incorporated to finalise the content and then brought back to the June Board following a review at the Audit and Risk Committee meeting also scheduled in June. Resolved: That the final report be brought back to the June Board meeting. Update from Committee Chairs Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo) (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chair of Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo) of the meeting held on 30 March 2021. The Board noted strategic and policy decision updates on activity following receipt of the bullying and harassment report and, progress with actions arising from the pay benchmarking exercise. The Board also noted information and standing item updates on progress with the people strategy report, post Covid-19 ways of working, Race at Work Charter Taskforce and other Equality, Diversity and Inclusion activity, as well as exit payment updates and the Committee's annual report to the Commission Board and effectiveness review. Resolved: That the Board noted the updates on operations and matters arising. Audit and Risk Committee (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chair of Audit and Risk Committee of the meeting held on 18 May 2021. The Board noted strategic and policy decision updates from the National Audit Office, internal audit reports on Covid-19 lessons learnt, quality assurance and procurement, an annual review of the anti-bribery, anti-fraud and whistleblowing policies. The Board also noted information and standing items on audit recommendations, annual reviews of information risk management, accounting policies and committee terms of reference. The Board noted that should Board members wish to attend a future Audit and Risk Committee meeting as observers, to contact the Audit and Risk Chair or Board Secretary. Resolved: That the Board noted the updates. Commission Board action tracker (EC 39/21) The Board received the Commission Board action tracker noting deadlines and ownership to be included. Resolved: That the Commission Board action tracker be noted. Forward plan of Board business (EC 40/21) Commissioners discussed items of business for future meetings. These would be reflected in the Forward plan of Board business at the June meeting. Resolved: That the Forward plan of Board business be noted. At this point the Board concluded their business and this was followed by an informal briefing session on: UK Government Electoral Integrity Bill The Board received a presentation on the provisions expected to be contained in the Electoral Integrity Bill, led by Director, Communications, Policy and Research. The Board discussed a number of the provisions covered in the presentation, to support the Commission's preparatory work for the Bill's introduction and providing advice to parliamentarians.

Annual Report and Accounts 2020/21 You are in the Our plans and priorities section Home Our plans and priorities In this section Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal one Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal two Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal three Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal four Looking ahead to 2020/21 and using our resources to support the delivery of our goals Overview This section provides an overview of the Electoral Commission, our purpose, our performance during the last year and the key risks to achieving our goals. We have included summary financial information within the performance report. This is consistent with the financial statements, where more detail is available. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) established the Electoral Commission. We are independent of government and political parties and directly accountable to the UK, Scottish and Welsh Parliaments. We have prepared our 2020/21 Annual Report and Accounts in accordance with an accounts direction, set out on page 120, issued by HM Treasury under paragraph 17 (2) of Schedule 1 PPERA. We have prepared the powers and sanctions report on page 44 in accordance with paragraph 15 Schedule 19(b) and paragraph 27 Schedule 19(c) PPERA. Foreword As for many other organisations and public bodies, the Commission's 2020/21 year was dominated by mitigating the impact Covid-19 pandemic. Our over-arching priority was to ensure we responded effectively and efficiently to this challenge, continuing the delivery of the Commission's statutory functions and supporting the increased needs of our stakeholders. The polls scheduled for May 2020 were postponed for a year, a decision the Commission supported, to allow local authorities to focus on front line public services and to mitigate risks to voters and campaigners. This meant, however, that the polls scheduled for May 2021, covering the whole of Great Britain, would be one of the most complex sets of polls in recent years. The Commission quickly refocused its efforts and over the course of the year provided extensive guidance, support and leadership to the electoral community. We worked closely with electoral administrators, the UK's governments, public health authorities, parties and campaigners. We supporting detailed planning and preparations for a Covid-safe democratic process, including the development of new legislation, and undertook extensive communications activity with the public to ensure that all eligible voters who wished to participate in the elections had the information they needed to do so. Our aim was to support well-run elections in which voters were able to participate in the polls safely and confidently, and campaigners and parties were able to put their case to the electorate. The polls took place outside this reporting period, and to the credit of everyone involved were delivered efficiently and effectively. We will be reporting on the undertaking of the polls in due course, so that important lessons can be captured and learnt, not least about delivering elections during a pandemic. Looking beyond preparations for these challenging elections, we also continued to press ahead on delivering against our corporate plan and to improve the core services for which we are responsible. For the electoral administrator community, this year also saw the implementation of improved rules for the electoral registration canvass in Great Britain, on which we provided guidance, support and challenge, alongside preparations for a canvass of electors in Northern Ireland. Alongside fulfilling our statutory regulatory responsibilities – including providing transparency through the publication of political financial data, maintaining the register of political parties, and enforcing the political finance rules – we continued to develop and extend the way we support parties and campaigners to comply. We also continued to respond to the impact of digital campaigning, working with campaigners and governments on intended changes to the regime, and with providers of digital advertising to encourage greater transparency. During the year we worked closely and constructively with the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Senedd (as well as the Speaker's Committee of the UK Parliament) to lay the foundations for new direct accountability to them from April 2021. Our focus is on building strong, transparent and cooperative relationships to ensure that we deliver priorities for each legislature, continuing to share good practice. We also as one of our core functions provided detailed, evidence-based advice to officials and parliamentarians on the development and passage of new legislation. Our work to support voter confidence also continued. Alongside our ongoing voter registration campaign activity, we launched a new campaign to increase voter understanding of the rules already in place to regulate digital campaigning, and a first suite of education and learning materials to increase political literacy. During 2020, the Commission adapted how it operated in the wider context of the pandemic and worked diligently to deliver its responsibilities and duties, with impartiality, integrity and independence. We invested in our staff, technology, the working environment and working practices and systems to ensure that we continue to deliver value for money for the voter and evolve our services in line with changing expectations, putting quality centre stage and placing a renewed focus on equality, diversity and inclusion. At a time when public finances are under severe pressure, we delivered the work programme, and accommodated additional pressures such as supporting a remote workforce, within our approved annual budget. Looking forward to the 2021/22 year, it will be a year of continued focus on providing support to our key stakeholders, as well as managing other developments and change. The Commission will continue to work constructively with all concerned – governments, parliaments, parties and campaigners, electoral administrators and other interested groups – to maintain confidence and trust in elections, including making preparations for the delivery of those scheduled for May 2022. We welcome a new Chair and two Commissioners, providing refreshed strength in our strategic direction and governance. And our service to the UK electorate will continue to be underpinned by providing value for money; maintaining the organisation as well-run, with engaged, skilled staff and the technology required to support effective ways of working. We thank Sir John Holmes who has completed his four-year term of office as Chair, leading the Commission through an exceptionally busy period of electoral events. The Commission's statutory responsibilities place it in a unique position in the sector. In some areas the Commission's role is to directly deliver functions. In other areas we provide oversight, guidance, support and – where required – enforcement. On some matters we have a role in convening or informing debate. Each aspect of our role makes a significant contribution to well-run elections and to achieving tangible improvements to the system for voters, campaigners and administrators. Our role The Electoral Commission is the independent body which oversees elections and regulates political finance in the United Kingdom. . Our vision and goals Our vision is to be a world-class public sector organisation – innovative, delivering great value and getting right what matters most to voters and legislators. In 2020/21 we worked towards achieving four goals: To enable the continued delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible To ensure an increasingly trusted and transparent system of regulation in political finance, overseeing compliance, promoting understanding amongst those regulated and proactively pursuing breaches To be an independent and respected centre of expertise, using knowledge and insight to further the transparency, fairness and efficiency of our democratic system, and help adapt it to the modern, digital age To provide value for money, making best use of our resources and expertise to deliver services that are attuned to what matters most to voters. This goal underpins and supports all of our work We will continue to focus on delivering these goals in 2021/22. Our role across the UK We deliver for voters across all parts of the UK, with Electoral Commission offices in Belfast, Cardiff, Edinburgh and London. We work closely with the UK and devolved governments and, from April 2021, have new accountabilities to the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd. Our 2020/21 year at a glance April – June 2020 We set up a Crisis Management Team to coordinate our response, and expanded our videoconferencing facilities to ensure we could all communicate with each other and with stakeholders. We launched a new online tool for the public to see and analyse candidate spending returns from the 2019 UK general election We responded to the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee (PACAC) enquiry on the Fixed Term Parliament Act The Lords Committee on Democracy and Digital Technologies published its report, advocating many of the Commission's long-standing policy proposals. Internally we launched the Commission's People Strategy. The Commission gave evidence to the Committee on Standards in Public Life, after it launched a new review into electoral regulation. July – September 2020 We carried out a survey to check on the wellbeing of our staff Our campaign targeted at newly enfranchised voters, with a series of adverts across social media, radio and print. We completed our first research into public attitudes to voting in the context of Covid 19, to inform preparations for the 2021 elections We became advisors to the Wales Elections Planning Group established by the First Minister to establish a consensus on legislation needed to ensure elections are well-run in the light of the Covid-19 pandemic We carried out an internal review to learn lessons from our response to the initial stages of the pandemic We published updated core guidance for electoral administrators and candidates and agents to support them with preparing for and delivering the May 2021 elections October – December 2020 We published our Welsh language standards annual monitoring report We submitted the first financial Estimate to the Llywydd's Committee and the Scottish Parliament, as part of establishing our new accountabilities to devolved parliaments We published the first part of supplementary guidance to support electoral administrators with managing the COVID-specific impacts on the polls We launched a new set of resources for young people in Scotland and Wales to educate young people in Wales about their vote and the democratic process. Worked with the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments and parliaments on their respective legislation to prepare for holding elections during the pandemic. We submitted written evidence to the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Select Committee of the House of Commons and gave oral evidence given to the new Llywydd Committee of the Senedd After a four-year term of office as Chair, Sir John Holmes left the Commission. John Pullinger CB began his term of office in May 2021 January – March 2021 We organised pre-election seminar for Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers in Scotland with the Electoral Management Board for Scotland We launched a public consultation on a draft Disability Action Plan in line with statutory equality duties in Northern Ireland We formed our Race at Work Charter task force to extend our work to improve diversity and equality Work started to update our London offices to improve our ways of working We marked 'Welcome to your Vote' awareness week in Scotland and Wales by hosting virtual events and sharing resources for engage newly enfranchised voters We co-organised the annual Electoral Fraud Reduction and Prevention National Seminar in collaboration with the National Police Chiefs' Council We published a report on public attitudes towards the transparency of political party and campaigner finance in Northern Ireland. We agreed a Statement of Financial Principles across Scotland, Wales and Westminster setting out the new financial relationship between us and the three legislatures; Senedd Cymru, Scottish Parliament and UK Parliament. 2019 Last updated: 29 July 2022 About the referendum On 23 June 2016 a referendum was held across the United Kingdom and Gibraltar about whether the UK should remain a member of the European Union or leave the European Union. This report looks specifically at the administration of the referendum, including the experience of voters and campaigners, the management and delivery of the poll, the regulation of campaigners at the referendum and the provision of information for voters. We will publish further reports relating to the referendum, including a report on the analysis of campaigners' spending and donations at the referendum and a report detailing the costs of the administration of the referendum in full, in 2017.

Separate reports evaluating our public awareness campaign at the EU referendum, summarising our public opinion research following the referendum, and analysing feedback on the role of the Chief Counting Officer and the Commission supporting Counting Officers and campaigners at the referendum have also been published on our website at the same time as this report. Our role The Electoral Commission has specific responsibilities for the administration and regulation of referendums held under the framework of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA). The June 2016 referendum on the UK's membership of the European Union was conducted under the PPERA framework, and the Commission was therefore responsible for: commenting on the intelligibility of the referendum question proposed by the UK Government registering organisations or individuals who wanted to campaign in the referendum (known as 'permitted participants') monitoring spending on referendum campaigning, in line with the referendum spending limits imposed by PPERA considering appointing organisations as the lead campaigners or 'designated organisations' for each referendum outcome ensuring that designated organisations (if appointed) had access to certain assistance reporting on referendum campaign spending reporting on the administration of the referendum The Chair of the Commission was the Chief Counting Officer (CCO). She was responsible for the conduct of the referendum and for ensuring the accuracy of the overall result. Her duties included certifying and declaring the total number of ballots counted and the total number of votes cast in favour of each answer to the question in the referendum. The Electoral Commission's key objectives for referendums are that: They should be well run and produce results that are accepted; and There should be integrity and transparency of campaign funding and expenditure. Registration and turnout and the result of the referendum A total of 46,500,001 people were registered to vote in the referendum and 33,577,342 votes were cast, representing a turnout of 72.2%. Except for the Scottish Independence Referendum in September 2014, this was the highest turnout since the 1992 UK Parliamentary general election (UKPGE). The outcome of the referendum was: 16,141,241 people (48.1% of all voters) voted to remain a member of the European Union 17,410,742 people (51.9% of all voters) voted to leave the European Union There were 25,359 rejected ballot papers. More than 8.5 million postal votes were issued for the referendum. This represents 18.4% of the UK electorate, the highest proportion since the introduction of postal voting on demand in Great Britain in 2001. Almost 26.3 million votes were cast in person at polling stations. As in previous years, turnout was higher among postal voters than in- person voters: 87.6% compared to 69.2%. Postal votes made up 21.7% of the total votes cast, slightly more than at the 2015 UKPGE when they made up 20.5%. The experience of voters and campaigners Evidence from our public opinion research with voters shows that they had a positive view of the EU referendum process, with 77% being very or fairly confident that the referendum was well run. People were also satisfied with the process of registering to vote (87% said they were generally satisfied). People remain highly satisfied with the procedures for voting in the referendum, whether in person at a polling station (97%) or by post (99%). People also said that they had enough information to participate in the referendum, with 85% saying that it was very or fairly easy to access information about how to cast their vote, with a similar proportion (82%) saying the same in relation to what the referendum was for. The majority felt that they had enough information to make an informed decision on how to vote in it (62% agreed, compared with 28% who disagreed). Despite this, we received more than 1,000 complaints from the public about the content of campaign material. Our public opinion research asked whether respondents thought that the conduct of the referendum campaigns was fair and balanced. Just over half of respondents (52%) disagreed with this statement with 34% disagreeing strongly. By comparison 34% agreed with the statement that the conduct of the campaigns was fair and balanced – only 12% agreed strongly. The main reasons given for thinking that the conduct of the campaign was not fair and balanced were because they believed it was one-sided/unbalanced/biased/partial (31%) and the information was inaccurate and misleading (31%). People were less likely to agree that the spending and funding of political parties, candidates and other campaigning organisations is open and transparent – 44% either disagreed or tended to disagree. On the other hand, people were more likely to agree that the authorities would take appropriate actions if political parties or campaigners are caught breaking the rules (61% agreed, compared with 23% who disagreed). However, it should be noted that this survey was conducted shortly after the referendum and therefore before reports of referendum campaigners' spending are due to be submitted and published by the Commission. Legislation for the referendum A number of changes and improvements were made to the regulatory controls for the EU referendum. These were included in the specific referendum legislation and associated Regulations rather than an updated version of the standard PPERA rules. To provide additional clarity the UK Government should establish a clear standard legal framework for the conduct and regulation of future referendums. This should include making necessary amendments to PPERA now, together with a generic Order for the conduct of referendums. These measures would remove ambiguity over the detailed rules for the conduct of referendums each time one of these polls is called. We reiterate our support for the Law Commissions' recommendations that primary legislation governing electoral registers, entitlement to absent voting, core polling rules and electoral offences should be expressed to extend to national referendums where appropriate, and that secondary legislation should set out the detailed conduct rules governing national referendums (mirroring that governing elections, save for necessary modifications). Management and delivery of the referendum The European Union Referendum Act 2015 provided that the CCO could appoint a Regional Counting Officer for each of the eleven electoral regions in Great Britain used for European Parliamentary elections, comprising nine regions in England and Scotland and Wales. Gibraltar was included in the South West electoral region.

The Act provided that Northern Ireland was a single voting area for which the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland was the Counting Officer. This regional management structure was used to manage the EU referendum in the 382 counting areas. In order to provide greater clarity and ensure better alignment with arrangements in the rest of the UK, we recommend that Northern Ireland should be designated as an electoral region for future UK-wide referendums. It is expected that the outcome of the referendum will mean that the UK will no longer hold elections to the European Parliament, and that this regional structure will therefore no longer have a statutory basis. Given that the structure in place for this referendum worked so effectively to deliver a significant national poll, there would be a risk introduced to the delivery of any future national referendum, potentially with a shorter time period in which to prepare for it, if this structure or something similar (potentially non-statutory) were not to be retained. We are satisfied that the Chair of the Electoral Commission was the most appropriate person to act as the Chief Counting Officer for this referendum. This will be reviewed by the Commission before each UK-wide referendum to be held under PPERA in future. We commissioned two academics to carry out a separate, independent evaluation of the role of the CCO and the Electoral Commission and their approach to the management of the poll, which has been published on our website. Feedback from RCOs and COs was very positive about the role of the CCO and the Electoral Commission in the management and delivery of the referendum. For referendums which take place only in Scotland or Wales, we recognise that the Chair of the Electoral Commission may not be the most appropriate person to act as the Chief Counting Officer. For example, the Convener of the Electoral Management Board for Scotland was the Chief Counting Officer for the 2014 Scottish independence referendum. For referendums which take place only in Northern Ireland, PPERA specifies that the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland would be the Chief Counting Officer. There were a number of administrative issues which affected a proportionately small number of voters at the EU referendum. The technical problems experienced by the Government's voter registration website from 10.15pm on Tuesday 7 June were not resolved until around the time of the deadline for registering to vote in the referendum at midnight. This led to the decision to extend the deadline for registration until midnight on Thursday 9 June. The Government should publish the independent assessment of what happened as quickly as possible to ensure that the website is able to cope with stress caused by significantly high traffic in advance of future polls. Additionally, introducing the ability for electors to check online whether they are correctly registered before submitting their application would assist the situation by reducing the number of duplicate applications. The current electoral timetable, with the voter registration deadline set as it is, continues to present particular challenges in terms of ensuring the timely delivery and return of overseas postal votes, which of course will vary between countries. The UK Government's proposed Votes for Life Bill (which will scrap the current 15 year time limit on the voting rights of British citizens living overseas for UK parliamentary elections) is likely to increase the pressure on the postal voting timetable, which is already more compressed compared to a referendum. It highlights the need for the UK Government to work with the Commission and others to identify changes to improve access to the voting process for overseas electors. Any changes requiring legislation should be included in the Votes for Life Bill to ensure a coordinated approach. Other issues related to the receipt of poll cards and postal votes by ineligible electors; and concerns about the use of pencils to mark ballot papers. Regulating campaigners at the referendum s at the EU referendum were subject to the PPERA regulatory framework which places limitations on spending by campaigners and provides transparency about sources of funding. Some of the PPERA controls were expanded and updated through the EU Referendum Act. We advised the UK Government and Parliament on developing some of these improvements. As for previous PPERA referendums, these changes were included in the specific referendum legislation and associated Regulations rather than updating the standard PPERA rules. We recommend that the changes should be incorporated into PPERA where appropriate, so that they apply for all future referendums. This referendum saw the highest number of registered campaigners compared to previous referendums held in the UK, including established organisations and political parties, as well as newly-established campaigners. Before and during the referendum period, we identified and monitored campaigns, and provided outreach, advice and training to ensure campaigners knew how to comply with the rules. We made particular efforts to work closely with campaigners to prevent noncompliance, including proactively regulating potential breaches of the rules in 'real time' during the referendum campaign. We also published details of campaigners' donations to allow scrutiny by voters and the media right up to the poll, and will be publishing the campaigners' spending returns in due course. In this report, we have considered the immediate regulatory issues arising from the referendum and feedback received from campaigners. We will issue a further report in spring 2017 focusing on the spending and donation returns that campaigners are required to submit to us before the statutory deadlines in September and December 2016. That report will also include information on the use of our investigatory and sanctioning powers at the referendum. The Commission has a statutory responsibility to appoint lead campaigners for each side of a UK-wide referendum, if suitable applicants are forthcoming. The designation process for the EU referendum was unprecedented in terms of there being high profile, well-funded, competent applicants competing for the same outcome. It was therefore the first time that the statutory test of 'representing to the great extent' was put to the test with competing applications. In this report, we particularly note the current lack of clear and meaningful controls on the activities of governments and other publicly funded bodies (not least the lack of any sanctions for breaches). These deficiencies have the potential to undermine voters' trust in the integrity of referendum controls and, in the most serious cases, undermine confidence in referendum results. We therefore recommend that the legal restrictions known as section 125 should be re-visited and that the enforcement of the s125 restrictions should be clarified. There should be greater consistency between the expectations placed on public bodies and those set out for campaigners during a referendum period.

Recommendations for future referendum legislation

Recommendation 1: The UK Government should establish a clear standard legal framework for the conduct and regulation of future referendums. We recommend that important changes which have been applied to the legal framework for recent referendums (including in particular the role of Regional Counting Officers, the requirement for referendum campaigners to report donations during the pre-poll period and rules for campaigners working together) should be incorporated in PPERA to ensure that they will apply for all future referendums. The UK Government should introduce legislation to make these amendments to PPERA now, rather than waiting until legislation is required for another future referendum. We also recommend that the UK Government should use the powers provided to the Secretary of State in Section 129 of PPERA to make an Order providing the detailed conduct rules for the administration of any future referendum poll. The UK Government should introduce this legislation now, rather than waiting until legislation is required for another future referendum. We reiterate our support for the Law Commissions' recommendations that primary legislation governing electoral registers, entitlement to absent voting, core polling rules and electoral offences should be expressed to extend to national referendums where appropriate, and that secondary legislation should set out the detailed conduct rules governing national referendums (mirroring that governing elections, save for necessary modifications).

Recommendation 2: Referendum legislation should be clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with. The UK Government should manage the development and approval of legislation for future referendums (including any secondary legislation containing detailed rules for the administration of the referendum poll and regulatory controls) so that it is clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners or electoral administrators. This means that: Legislation for the regulation of referendum campaigners should be clear at least six months before the start of the regulated referendum period. Legislation relating to the conduct of a referendum poll should be clear at least six months before polling day. Recommendation 3: Referendums should not normally be held on the same day as other significant or scheduled polls. We have previously recommended that any proposals to hold a referendum poll on the same day as the poll for other electoral events should be considered on a case-by-case basis. While this remains our view, we believe that the starting assumption for Governments and legislatures should be that referendums are not normally held on the same day as other significant or scheduled polls. In particular, referendums on significant constitutional questions, where political parties and other campaigners are likely to be working more closely together, should never be held on the same day as other scheduled polls. UK legislatures scrutinising proposals to hold any future referendum on the same day as other significant or scheduled polls should ensure they are satisfied that voters and campaigners will be able to participate fully in both the referendum and the other polls, and that electoral administrators can deliver both sets of polls. Recommendations for providing information for voters at future referendums

Recommendation 4: Any Government considering providing funding directly to EROs for public awareness ahead of a future referendum or scheduled polls should consult EROs and the Electoral Commission in sufficient time to ensure that effective plans for local and national activities can be developed and implemented. Where any Government plans to give grants to EROs for public awareness work to encourage electoral registration ahead of future polls, it should publish its proposals and consult EROs and the Electoral Commission on its proposals at least six months in advance of polling day. Not only does this allow reasonable time to plan advertising and to organise the logistics of amending and supplying advertising material to take place, but it means that better value-for-money can be achieved when local authorities book advertising space. Booking advertising space at short notice not only results in a cost premium, but means that availability – particularly with regards to outdoor advertising – can be extremely limited. Short or non-existent lead times can result in advertising which is both more expensive and less effective.

Recommendation 5: Governments should make use of all available owned channels to promote voter registration ahead of any major poll. Ahead of the EU referendum, the UK Government mobilised its departments and associated organisations to make use of each and every available communications channel, platform, media space and real estate to drive voter registration ahead of the deadline. This provided the campaign with unprecedented visual coverage across the country and reached millions of people for no capital expenditure. Now that it is clear what can be achieved, this should become standard practice for any Government ahead of each scheduled electoral event.

Recommendations for the management and delivery of future referendums and other polls

Recommendation 6: Northern Ireland should be designated as an electoral region for future UK-wide referendums, with the Chief Electoral Officer appointed as a Regional Counting Officer For future UK-wide referendums, Northern Ireland should be designated as a referendum region with the Chief Electoral Officer appointed as Regional Counting Officer responsible for coordinating the delivery of the poll in line with the other eleven electoral regions in the UK. Voting areas within Northern Ireland should be specified in referendum legislation, in the same way as for other electoral regions elsewhere in the UK. The UK Government should ensure that legislation for any future UK-wide referendum (including legislation amending PPERA, as recommended above in Recommendation 1 of this report) designates Northern Ireland as an electoral region with the Chief Electoral Officer appointed as a Regional Counting Officer. Recommendation 7: The capacity of the UK Government's online voter registration website should be tested to ensure it can cope with significant volumes of applications close to the deadline ahead of future scheduled polls The UK Government should publish, as quickly as possible, the results of the independent review and investigation into what caused the online voter registration website to fail close to the registration deadline, and outline what measures have been put in place since to ensure that the website is able to cope with significantly high volumes of traffic. The review, and the Government's plans for ensuring that the website does not fail in similar circumstances, should be published no later than 4 November 2016, six months before the next set of scheduled polls in May 2017.

Recommendation 8: Electors should be able to check online whether they are correctly registered to vote Providing a way for electors to check their registration status at the beginning of the online registration application process would reduce the action required by voters to keep their register entry up to date, and would also reduce the impact on EROs of processing duplicate applications. The UK Government should develop an online service to allow people to check whether they are already correctly registered to vote before they complete a new application to register. Any such service would need to carefully manage and protect voters' personal information.

Recommendation 9: Access to the voting process should be improved for overseas electors We will continue to work with the UK Government and Returning Officers or Counting Officers to identify practical steps which could be taken to improve access to the voting process for overseas electors at the next scheduled poll where they are entitled to vote, including: Ensuring that all Returning Officers or Counting Officers include the correct postage on postal ballot packs for overseas electors, so that they can be delivered to voters and returned as quickly as possible before polling day, including increasing the funding provided by the UK Government to Returning Officers or Counting Officers for this purpose to allow them to use the Royal Mail International Business Response Service. Explaining the practical implications of different voting methods (such as postal voting or appointing a proxy) for overseas electors, particularly if they are making an application during the last month before polling day, including on the www.gov.uk/register-to-vote website. We will work with the UK Government and Returning Officers to develop workable and effective proposals, which could be included in the proposed Votes for Life Bill if legislation is required, to make it easier for overseas electors to cast their votes in time to be counted at elections. We will also continue our work with the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board to consider how technology might be introduced into a wider range of election activity. Recommendations for the regulation of campaigners at future referendums Recommendation 10: Those eligible to register as a referendum campaigner should be the same as those eligible to register as non-party campaigners at elections We recommend that the list of individuals and bodies eligible to register as a referendum campaigner is extended to mirror the list of eligible non-party campaigners under PPERA. Recommendation 11: The responsible person should be required to sign the application to register as a referendum campaigner, and be barred from being the responsible person for any other registered referendum campaigner at the same time We recommend that the person named as the responsible person should be required to sign the application for registration as a referendum campaigner and that the same person should not be able to be the responsible person for more than one registered referendum campaigner. Recommendation 12: The Commission should be able to reject applications to register certain referendum campaign group names from unincorporated associations We recommend that the Commission should be able to reject an application for registration as a referendum campaigner from an unincorporated association whose name, in the Commission's view, is: obscene or offensive or which, if published, would be likely to amount to the commission of an offence; or the same or similar to that of an already registered referendum campaigner, registered political party or recognised third party. Recommendation 13: Unincorporated associations should be required to provide details of their membership as part of their application to register as a referendum campaigner We recommend that the registration requirements for unincorporated associations that register as a referendum campaigner should mirror the registration requirements for unincorporated associations that register as a recognised third party at elections. Recommendation 14: Designation of lead campaigners should take place before the start of the referendum period; alternatively the referendum period should be extended We recommend that, where the legislative timetable allows, the designation of lead campaigners should take place shortly before, rather than during the first six weeks of, the referendum period and that the deadline for applications should be set at 12pm (noon) on the closing day of the application period. However, if circumstances mean that the legislative timetable is such that predesignation is not possible, then our 2011 recommendation to extend the length of the referendum period to at least 16 weeks should be adopted. This would go some way to giving designated lead campaign groups more time to plan and use the benefits available. Recommendation 15: The UK Government should consult on options for redrafting section 125 PPERA to clarify the nature, scope and enforcement of the restrictions Section 125 of PPERA should be significantly redrafted to clarify the nature and scope of the restriction on activities by Governments and other publicly funded bodies during the referendum period. It should be clear which activities are restricted, and whether there are any specific exemptions; it should be clear when the restrictions apply; and it should be clear who is responsible for enforcing the restrictions, and what the penalties would be for any breach of the restrictions. The UK Government should consult on options for redrafting section 125 of PPERA, with a view to introducing amending legislation as soon as practicable, sufficiently ahead of any specific legislation for a future referendum. actions of the meeting and matters arising (ECPPP 02/06/2015) The minutes from 02/06/2015 were agreed with no clarifications sought or noted. There were no other matters arising from the minutes. DB highlighted the action point that the Commission needs to continue to look into improving logo and party descriptions. European Union

Referendum AR informed the PPP that the Electoral Commission had given its statutory advice to Parliament on the proposed EU referendum question. AR said that following its question assessment process, the Commission has recommended that the question that was currently in the European Union Referendum Bill 2015-16 should be amended to: 'Should the United Kingdom remain a member of the European Union or leave the European Union?' with responses being 'Remain a member of the European Union' /

'Leave the European Union'. ML noted that Bill does not include the regulated period dates and asked what the Commission's view of this was. TH responded that the Bill as it currently stands would apply the standard 10-week referendum period as specified in PPERA, but that the Bill also includes powers for the Government to change the length of the period by regulations. After the Scottish independence referendum the Commission recommended that, at future referendums, either the designation of lead campaigners could take place before the 10-week referendum period, or the referendum period could be extended to 16 weeks including the designation process. The Commission would be issuing a briefing before Report and Third reading stages of the Bill in the House of Commons. May 2015 polls – Post-election report There were no comments from the PPP regarding the recommendations made by the Commission in its May 2015 polls post-election report. TH stressed that the Commission was currently focused on getting the UK and Scottish governments to ensure regulations for the 2016 polls are in place in good time. Common Data Standard for Electoral Registers AS started by saying that the principle of receiving electoral registration details in a standard format is the long-established view of the political parties and that members of the PPP have jointly developed a standardised 'Political Party

Electoral Register format' spreadsheet. AS said that they were meeting with Cabinet Office officials later to discuss their proposal for a common data standard for electoral registers. DB added that the proposal was drafted taking into account the views of smaller political parties and independents. TH said that in principal this was a proposal that the Commission could support and that it would be important to involve the electoral management software providers in discussions. AR added that it's important that the expert panel of electoral administrators are also involved.

Action: Commission to confirm a 'point person' that will feedback on the PPP proposal. Individual Electoral Registration (IER) Progress AR explained that the Government has made an Order that will bring forward the end to the transition to IER to December 2015. ML asked if there had been any anecdotal reports from local authorities regarding how their annual canvass activities were getting new people added to the registers. TH said that anecdotal feedback from a recent working group meeting with a very small number of electoral administrators suggested that return levels were not as high as they would have expected at this stage in the canvass, but that this was not yet a significant concern. Commission Update Report ML asked why the Commission had decided to do a review of its Enforcement Policy now. LE confirmed that it had been five years since the Commission received new enforcement powers and that now seemed a sensible time to conduct a review. The PPP wanted confirmation that a user-testing session of PEF Online would focus on users experiences of using the 'back-end' of the website. SM asked for more details of the PEF Online redevelopment and said that the existing system for submission of reports was not fit for the purpose. SM said that the Commission did not recognise this when it considered issues under its enforcement policy. AR confirmed that a previous email received by members of the PPP related to providing feedback on the Electoral Commission's main website.

Action: LE to confirm dates for when PEF Online user-testing will take place and suggest that the person organising the user-testing talks to PPP members in advance to ensure the session focuses on the right issues. On staffing, AR confirmed that the Commission's new Chief Executive will be starting in the second week of October. LE said that the Commission's introductory guidance on campaigning at May 2016 would be published in early October with the full guidance suite published in December. AS and ML commented that there generally seems to be less consultation by the Commission with political parties about work that affects them. AS added that the consultation about guidance appeared to only be about issues the Commission was interested in, rather than what might be of concern to parties. The panel felt it would be helpful to see an organisational chart for Party and Election Finance (PEF). Action: LE to provide PEF organisational chart. Meeting dates for 2016 The PPP confirmed that they were happy with proposed meeting dates for 2016. Electoral Commission updates TH informed the PPP that the Commission has launched a consultation on its approach to EU referendum directions and the timing of the count. Action: KA to send the consultations to the PPP. TH also informed the PPP that the Commission had submitted evidence to Lord Hodgson's Third Party Campaigning Review and provided hard copies at the meeting, and that the Commission will submit evidence to Sir Eric Pickles review of electoral fraud in the UK. Performance analysis 2021/22: Goal one You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 On this page Key achievements Performance measures Our activities during the year First published: 1 August 2022 Last updated: 1 August 2022 Goal one To enable the continued delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible. This goal captures our role in overseeing the delivery of elections across all parts of the UK and focuses on three areas: delivering well-run electoral events, maximising and modernising electoral registration, and tackling electoral fraud. Key achievements To help deliver well-run electoral events we: provided advice to Returning Officers, electoral administrators, candidates and agents to support the effective delivery of the May 2021 elections across Great Britain reported on the administration of the May 2021 elections in England, Scotland and Wales were consulted by the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments on draft legislation ahead of the May 2022 elections published guidance and resources, and provided support to electoral administrators, candidates and agents, in preparation for the scheduled elections across the UK in May 2022 deployed – both directly and through local authorities and other partner organisations – an extensive range of new voter information materials relating to Covid-safe elections, to support voter confidence worked with the National Police Chiefs Council, Crown Prosecution Service and College of Policing to provide new guidance for candidates and campaigners on recognising and reporting intimidation worked with organisations supporting people with a disability to raise awareness of how to take part in elections and what support they can expect to receive launched a new system for processing applications for accreditation for electoral observers To help maximise and modernise electoral registration, we: ran mass-media voter registration campaigns across Great Britain, to raise awareness of the need to register and to provide information on how to participate supported Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) in Great Britain with delivery of the annual canvass, including through the provision of guidance and advice worked closely with the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland to support the electoral registration canvass reported on the 2021 electoral registration canvass in Northern Ireland, recommending reforms to modernise the registration process To help tackle electoral fraud, we: worked with the police and local authorities to support the development of integrity plans to help prevent electoral fraud published updated data on alleged cases of electoral fraud reported during 2021, and new data on a small number of cases reported during 2022 worked with partners to run a campaign to raise awareness of electoral fraud, ahead of the May 2021 elections delivered, with the National Police Chiefs Council, our annual conference for police elections Single Points of Contact as an online event worked with the City of London Police Economic Crime Academy to host and contribute content to four training courses for police officers Performance measures Measure Performance We publish 100% of guidance products relating to electoral registration on time with no substantive errors 100 % Achieved We provide accurate advice to Returning Officers (ROs) and EROs within three working days of receipt of the request. (Target 100%) 99.5 % Achieved Additions to electoral registers during our public awareness campaigns meet or exceed our targets (Target 640,000. Achieved 660,000) 104 % Achieved Our activities during the year Delivering well-run electoral events The complex set of elections in May 2021 taking place in Great Britain were well-run, with high levels of public confidence in and satisfaction with the administration of the polls. We supported electoral administrators to deliver the elections with comprehensive written guidance and through our advice service. We also undertook campaigns and provided resources to help ensure voters understood how to participate with confidence, particularly taking account of the public health context. Our voter registration campaign activity supported the delivery of over 600,000 additions to electoral registers, through the use of mass advertising, partnership work and media coverage generation. We supported the 2021 electoral registration canvass in Northern Ireland, the first since 2013 and which resulted in the largest ever register in NI. This included running a campaign to raise awareness of the canvass and encourage people to respond. We also supported the annual canvass in Great Britain, providing guidance and using our performance standards to support and challenge the work of Electoral Registration Officers. We have undertaken preparations to support the May 2022 elections taking place across the UK. We have published guidance and resources for those running the polls and standing for election, working closely with a range of stakeholders from across the electoral community. We were consulted on draft legislation from the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments, and reflected the changes in our guidance and messaging. You are in the Our research section Home Our research Currently reading: of 4 - Show page contents On this page Summary Impact on voters Impact on administration Background Summary The pilots were well run by Returning Officers. There were no notable issues on the advance voting days or on Thursday 5 May and voters were satisfied with their experience of voting. However, the results indicate that the opportunity to vote in-person ahead of polling day does not, on its own, boost turnout significantly. This is not unexpected; we know that people's motivation to vote or not to vote is driven by several factors and is not solely linked to convenience or choice of method. While the turnout of early voters was low, the option was welcomed by those that used it and it does offer an additional choice for voters. We cannot judge, from the evidence of the pilots, what impact advance voting, if introduced, would have on turnout over time. The experience of the pilots provides some useful information on how advance voting could work in practice. For example, the use of electronic registers was successful, allowing the register for any area within the local authority to be accessed via a single device.

However, the small number of pilots and the selection of locations in which they were tested means there is still work to do to develop any future policy and to understand how it could be implemented. Proposed changes to voting processes should be designed to deliver a likely benefit to voters, maintain the security and integrity of the system, and be realistically deliverable by electoral administrators. Our evaluation has identified several specific areas that need to be addressed if a further roll out of advance voting is considered:

- Location and number of venues – The selection of venues would be crucial to any implementation of advance voting and has the potential to cause concern to voters and candidates. Any plans for further use of advance voting should carefully consider how to select the right number of venues to offer a consistent and useful option to voters while being realistically deliverable by Returning Officers. Returning Officers should also have some flexibility to reflect the circumstances of their areas. For example, larger geographical authorities or areas with less accessible transport links are likely to need more sites. Increasing the number of venues would require an assessment of how they would be staffed. For example, it is clear from the Bridgend pilot that the requirement to staff around 20 advance voting locations over several days was extremely challenging.
- Number and choice of advance voting days – there is no clear evidence from the pilots of different days being more popular with voters (the low number of votes cast makes it difficult to draw a clear conclusion). There is, however, some evidence that the choice of days can have an impact on the administration of the poll, depending on how they interact with the existing preparations for a Thursday polling day. The challenges presented are not at all insurmountable but may require additional electoral administrator staff capacity to address them, depending on the days chosen.

Costs – Given the low turnout among early voters, it is important that any future changes are informed by an assessment of the costs and benefits of wider implementation, including the use of electronic registers to support advance voting, which was the largest area of additional costs in the pilots. This should include an assessment of any development costs that would not be needed again and whether economies of scale could be realised. The costs of the pilots cannot in themselves be taken as a clear indication of the likely costs of any future roll out of advance voting.

Resilient electoral services – we know that many elections teams already face increasing challenges in delivering well run polls within existing core staffing and budgets. It is therefore important that existing capacity is considered if any roll out is planned. There is the potential for specific policy decisions (more days, more venues) and the circumstances of polls (combination, greater turnout) to put more or less pressure on elections' teams. Raising public awareness – any wider roll out should be supported by additional, more coordinated and centrally-funded public awareness activity. This would underpin ongoing local awareness raising activities (such as were undertaken at these pilots). Time to plan for changes – changes concerning the running of elections should be agreed and in place six months before the poll to allow for adequate implementation by electoral administrators and so voters can be informed about what they need to do. Planning for any future roll out of advance voting should ensure that at least that minimum period is available.

Impact on voters Few voters chose to vote early A small number of voters chose to cast their vote at the advance voting polling stations. The three pilots with a single advance centre had similar results, with 0.2 – 0.3% of registered polling station voters casting a vote on the advance days. In Bridgend, where a number of usual polling stations were open, the proportion was slightly higher at 1.5%. The level of turnout is broadly in line with the previous tests of advance voting carried out in the early 2000s. In the final set of pilots in 2007, the proportions ranged from 0.5 – 7.0%. These earlier results are not directly comparable as the specific approaches being piloted varied. For example, of the five pilots in 2007 only one had two days of advance voting; the other four had between four and nine days. Most also had more than one voting centre and several were not piloting advance voting for the first time. It is difficult to draw conclusions from the small number of pilots in May 2022. The data could suggest that a larger number of polling stations are more likely to attract voters than single, central venues. However, other factors could be driving the difference, including the local elections themselves and how competitive voters perceived them to be. We can also draw no conclusion on any impact from the days chosen for voting. Caerphilly and Torfaen's advance voting days were on Saturday and Sunday and they saw similar results to Blaenau Gwent where voting was on Tuesday and Wednesday. Area Number of advance voters Advance turnout Election day turnout
Blaenau Gwent 68 0.2% 24.5% Bridgend 1,374 1.5% 27.5% Caerphilly 187 0.2% 28.9% Torfaen 162 0.3% 23.8% Overall, the results indicate that the opportunity to vote in-person ahead of polling day does not, on its own, boost turnout significantly. This is not unexpected as we know that people's motivation to vote is driven by a range of factors, not solely linked to convenience or choice of method. We surveyed a sample of those who chose to vote early across the four pilot areas immediately after they had voted: 75% told us that they would have voted at the elections even if there was no advance voting option. 97% of these early voters said that they always or sometimes vote at local elections – suggesting that early voters were the already engaged, regular voters at local elections. When we asked a representative sample of eligible electors in the pilot areas about whether the ability to vote over multiple days would affect their likelihood to vote: across the four areas between 27 and 37% said that it would make them more likely but around two-thirds said it would make no difference or that they were not sure. In order to test whether any changes in turnout in the pilot areas were linked to the advance voting option, we identified four control areas – local authorities with standard local elections and similar demographics and past turnout to the pilot areas (see Background section for full details). All of the pilot and control areas recorded a drop in turnout between 2017 and 2022 strongly suggesting that these differences are unrelated to the piloting activity and reinforce the point that the method of casting votes is far from the sole driver associated with turnout. Overall turnout in Wales was down compared to the last local elections in 2017 – from 42% to 39%. Area 2022 Change from 2017

Blaenau Gwent	32.5%	-7.5%	Neath Port Talbot	38.3%	-4.0%	Bridgend	36.2%	-3.7%	Rhondda
Cynon Taff	35.5%	-4.4%	Caerphilly	32.9%	-3.4%	Flintshire	35.7%	-2.8%	Torfaen	31.3%
-6.2%	Wrexham	36.7%	-3.3%	Wales	39%	-3%	The low levels of advance turnout in the pilots should also be considered against the take up of electoral changes in the past. In 2001, at the first UK general election after postal voting on demand was introduced, 3.9% of the electorate were issued with a postal vote. This was a small increase on the 2.1% from 1997 when the rules were different. However, by 2019, 17.2% of the electorate were issued with a postal vote and it is now an important route by which a large proportion of the electorate choose to vote. We cannot judge, from the evidence of the pilots, what impact on turnout advance voting, if introduced, would have over time. Some pupils were able to vote at school The Bridgend pilot also saw a polling station opened for one day (Tuesday 3 May) in a local school. This was only for pupils at that school, who were registered to vote, to cast an early vote.

Advance turnout was higher at the school than the pilot average. Fourteen of the 76 pupils who were registered and eligible chose to cast a vote at the school polling station – 18% compared to the 1.5% of eligible polling station voters who voted early. As with the wider population, those who chose to vote early were satisfied with the experience. We asked pupils, who did not vote at all at the elections, why they had chosen not to. One third said it was because they did not know enough about how to vote and a fifth said they were not registered. Others also cited a lack of information about the election as a whole and about the specific candidates. More awareness of the pilots may not have led to higher advance turnout Returning Officers faced two significant challenges in raising awareness of the opportunity to vote in-person before polling day: a low level of engagement with the local elections; and the need to target campaigns and not mislead people in neighbouring authorities (or in Bridgend's case, in the non-piloting wards). Details of the practical challenges of the latter are set out below and would be much less of an issue in the event of a wider roll out. However, at polls which attract less public interest it will be an inherent challenge to effectively raise awareness of changes to the method of voting. We carried out representative surveys of the eligible voting population across the pilot and control areas. One survey was carried out in February/March 2022, to provide baseline data, with a second completed after polling day on 5 May. In this research we asked if people thought they would be able to vote in person over multiple days (Yes/No/Don't know). There were changes in claimed awareness between our initial survey and our survey after polling day but the pattern is not clear cut. The proportion of people who said you could not vote in person over multiple days increased in both the pilot and control authorities. The increases were smaller in the pilot areas suggesting some effect from the public awareness campaigns. Torfaen was the only pilot area where the proportion who correctly thought voting over multiple days was an option increased between February/March and May. All pilot areas had a higher level of awareness of the option to vote early than the Wales average (shown on the chart as a blue line – 14%). All of the control areas had lower than average levels of awareness. Figure 1 Public awareness of the advance voting pilot Separately we asked those in the pilot areas if they were aware that they could vote in person before the usual polling day on 5 May. Claimed awareness ranged from 22 – 30% with the rest either saying they were not aware or were not sure. We also asked people who said they voted on Thursday 5 May why they chose not to vote early. Nearly half (46%) said it was because they did not know they could (30% said they preferred to vote on the 'usual day'). The 46% of polling day voters who said they did not vote early because they did not know they could is a good indication of the low levels of awareness of the pilot. However, it is a less strong predictor of alternative behaviour – we should not assume that all or many of that 46% would have voted early if they were aware of the pilot. This is supported by evidence from the 2007 pilots. In that case awareness was higher: half of survey respondents across the piloting areas said they were aware of the advance voting option. But levels of turnout were very similar (with the exception of one area) to the 2022 pilots. It is important to maximise the public's awareness of changes such as these, but it is also unlikely that greater levels of awareness in this case would have resulted in very significant jumps in either advance turnout or overall turnout. People had a range of reasons for choosing to vote early. In interviews outside the advance voting centres, we asked early voters to select, from a list of options, the main reason they had chosen to vote early: 45% said it was because they were going to be busy on Thursday 5 May, 14% said it was 'more convenient' and 10% said it was because they lived near to an advance opening polling station. In our separate online survey, those that claimed to have voted early were asked to pick the reason that best explained why. The table below shows the results for the combined pilot areas. Reasons for choosing to vote in advance I was interested to see how it worked 18% I was busy on Thursday 5th May / it was more convenient to vote on a different day 19% I live near the early voting centre 18% I was passing and saw the signs 27% Other 17% The level of voting was consistent throughout the advance voting days. Notable patterns in when people chose to vote would tell us about how any wider roll out of advance voting could work most effectively. However, the hour-by-hour analysis shows a largely even distribution of votes across the different opening hours of the pilots. There are no significant patterns except for consistently lower levels in the last hour of opening across all four pilots. There are no real differences between the weekend and weekday pilots.

Figure 2 Cumulative distribution of votes Early voters were positive about their experiences The majority of these voters had a positive experience when voting and welcomed the opportunity presented by the pilots. Nearly all (99%) of those we interviewed outside polling stations said they were satisfied with the experience of voting early. When asked to say why they were satisfied, the main reasons selected were that it was quick to vote (76%), easy to vote (64%) and convenient to vote (45%). Around three-quarters (77%) said they would be very likely to vote early again if there was an opportunity to do so and a further 15% said they would be quite likely. There was limited wider impact on public attitudes but perceptions were positive We also looked at the potential wider impact on public attitudes through our surveys in the pilot and control areas. Overall, given the small numbers of people who chose to vote in-person and early, there is limited scope for notable impacts on public opinion. However, this also means that the absence of a change in attitude does not mean that the option to vote early would not have an impact if more people were aware of it and/or used it. Positively, in all areas satisfaction with the process of voting increased between the initial survey and the follow up, but with no significant difference between pilot and control areas. Satisfaction was also high with 92 – 93% of voters saying they were satisfied with the process. We asked if people thought the option to vote in-person on multiple days would make voting more or less convenient . The results show a small difference between the pilot and control areas, with a larger proportion of respondents in the pilot areas saying it would make it more convenient. The pilot areas also all show an increase in perceived convenience between the two surveys (only one of the control areas show an increase). These differences are all small and we should be cautious in drawing conclusions. In order to assess any impact on public perceptions of the security of the poll we asked people whether they thought the ability to vote across multiple days would make voting more or less secure. There were no significant differences between the pilot areas and control areas in our surveys. People were most likely to say they thought it would make no real difference (54% across Wales said this in our post-election survey and a further 10% said they did not know). Overall, when asked if voting at a polling station was safe from fraud and abuse the vast majority in both the pilot and control areas said that it was. The results were in line with the overall finding for Wales where 85% of people said it was safe (10% said don't know and 5% said it was unsafe).

The pilots were well run and there were no significant administrative issues on the advance voting days. The successful running was the result of effective preparation and planning by the Returning Officers and their teams. There are, however, lessons to be drawn from their experiences. Early confirmation of the scope of any change is important. The legislation allowing for the pilots was in place by March 2022. Returning Officers told us that, although there was no impact on the eventual running of the pilots, they would have preferred the details to be confirmed earlier. This would have avoided the need to carry out some preparations at risk. The practical impact in this case was offset by good communications between the pilot authorities and Welsh Government officials. This meant that there were no surprises in the legislation and that planning could continue before it was in place. However, this would be less manageable if the change applied to all local authorities across Wales.

Changes concerning the running of elections should be agreed and in place six months before the poll to allow for adequate implementation by electoral administrators. Planning for any future roll out of advance voting should ensure that at least that minimum period is available. The local public awareness campaigns used a wide range of channels to reach potential voters. Some of the challenges in engaging the public in this type of change are set out above, and campaigns run by the pilot authorities should be considered against those limitations.

Returning Officers and their teams told us that they used a range of approaches to inform people about the pilots, specifically:

- Social media – mainly Twitter, Facebook and Instagram posts
- Local radio adverts
- Household notification letters – these are letters sent out in February to confirm the registration details for each property in an area
- Local news articles and press releases
- There were also other methods including council websites, billboards, post campaigns and 'Promo' or 'Ad Vans', which could be positioned in higher profile spots in the area.

All of the pilots began their campaign in February in order to allow enough time to carry out a wide range of activities before the advance polling days. Information about the pilot was also featured on the poll cards in each area as required by the pilot legislation. In our public opinion survey after the election we asked everyone who said they were aware of the pilot where they had seen information about it. The most common sources were 'Council website' (29%), 'social media' (21%), 'leaflet/flyer from the council' (16%) and 'news website' (15%). When we asked people who had chosen to vote early where they found out about the pilot, the main answer was the poll card (38%). A fifth of voters (19%) were made aware by a leaflet or newsletter from the local authority and 15% said they found out from their friends and family. We also asked people how easy it was to find information about different aspects of the election. The perceived ease of finding information on the advance voting option (41%) was lower than other aspects such as information on parties/candidates (59%) and information on what the election was about (64%). The evidence suggests that some channels were more effective than others at reaching people. However, we cannot draw conclusions as the overall level of awareness was low and engagement with the pilots was primarily from more regular voters. If this change is rolled out nationally it is likely that all of the channels used in the pilots would be important to spread awareness with different sections of the public. However, they should be supported by larger, national activity. A national campaign can use higher impact measures (such as TV), with consistent messaging across all local authorities and greater reach among the population as a whole. This would help to increase the likelihood of cut-through for the campaign messages beyond existing, regular voters. The use of electronic registers was important to the smooth running of the pilots. The pilots each worked with the supplier Modern Democracy, using their system which provides electronic registers in the polling station on tablet devices. This allows for people to be marked as having voted and for registers for any area within the local authority to be accessed via a single device. In the three pilots with a single advance voting centre, this avoided the need for large paper based copies of the full local authority register to be held in each centre and for individual voters to be quickly found on the register when they came to collect a ballot paper. This also allowed Returning Officers to efficiently manage one of the integrity challenges that comes with multiple polling days – the risk of double voting (an elector attempting to vote more than once). We are not aware of any issues with double voting in the pilots. Returning Officers and their teams felt that the pilot could potentially have been delivered without the IT elements. This was particularly the case for Bridgend where advance voting was happening in usual, individual polling stations. However, taking forward advance voting in one or more centralised locations per area without using electronic registers could put more pressure on Returning Officers and increase the risk of problems arising. The single-centre pilots reported that in the absence of the electronic registers it would have been a less good process for voters – and potentially very difficult for them to manage with higher turnout. It would have introduced challenges for administrators associated with the paper-heavy processes. This would have been a particular issue where advance voting is happening immediately before polling day as there would not be enough time to manage aspects of a fully paper-based process. For example, marked register data from advance voting centres would need to be transferred to the paper registers held in each ‘normal’ polling station. There is also the potential for other benefits to be realised from the use of electronic registers alongside supporting advanced voting including accuracy of records. The hardware and software solution used in the pilots was a success – there were no significant problems on any of the polling days and more minor issues were quickly resolved. However, there are some lessons to be drawn from the pilots: Time for development and set up : the pilots were arranged to tight timescales and this included the work needed to develop the electronic registers system for the circumstances of the pilot. Additional time in this case would have made the process more comfortable but also potentially allowed for a smoother ‘back-end’ process for administrators through better integration with their existing electoral management software (EMS) systems. The tight timings lead to a functional, but not optimal, solution to linking the two systems. There were also some issues in managing two different piloting requirements between the single-centre approach and that taken in Bridgend. The requirements were not the same and more time to understand the differences would have helped to avoid some of the issues that needed to be dealt with during set up. Training and support : for a pilot, bespoke training is often put in place that may not be sustainable or needed in the event of a wider roll out. In this case many administrators felt that more training than necessary was provided for polling staff. Many polling station staff have existing full or part-time jobs. Asking them to attend training during work hours could therefore be unworkable for some. Some pilots also felt that there was an overly cautious approach to other set up work, such as operational testing. While they acknowledged it was much better to have too much than too little, they clearly felt that it could be scaled back in the event of a roll out. The selection of venues was based on several considerations. For the three pilots using a single location, which was not usually a polling station, there were several factors considered when choosing the venue:

- Location: Returning Officers wanted venues which were central to the area, not just geographically but also in terms of transport links. A reasonable level of usual footfall was also recognised as a benefit, as was a venue which was already recognisable to people or where people may need to go to for a reason other than voting. Easy parking was also sought for those travelling from further afield.
- : the venues needed to be fully accessible
- Security: the Returning Officer needed to be confident in either being able to store ballot boxes securely within the venue itself (the council offices in Torfaen and Caerphilly) or to be able to transport them safely and securely to another site between each polling day (Blaenau Gwent moved the boxes from the Learning Zone to the nearby council offices).
- Space: each centre needed to have sufficient space to set up a number of polling station desks and to manage the flow of voters effectively. The space required varied by the size of local authority (and therefore the likely number of voters) but also by the approach taken by Returning Officers. For example, Torfaen and Blaenau Gwent opted to use two desks in their centre while Caerphilly used six desks. The number and location of venues used in each area should be carefully considered. The factors above make choosing suitable venues more challenging than selecting locations for standard polling stations as they limit the Returning Officers' choices. In the pilots it was relatively easy to find a single venue in an area, but it could become more challenging to find a greater number. There is no evidence from these pilots that the use of a single location in the local authority area significantly deterred voters who lived further away or had less easy access to the advance voting centre. However, this may be because of the low overall numbers of votes being cast early. In Blaenau Gwent, for example, the number of early votes across the different wards varied from one to eight. This is not enough variation to show a pattern. The advance voting option also mostly attracted engaged, regular voters whose tolerance for making longer or more complicated journeys will be greater than the average. In addition, the pilot local authorities are relatively small, geographically, compared to many areas in Wales. If advance voting was being rolled out widely there would need to be consideration of how many venues were needed in each area and their locations, taking account of overall size and transport connections. This should also take account of anticipated turnout as a single venue can cope with low levels of well-distributed turnout but may struggle with much higher turnout including concentrations at specific times of day. No complaints or negative feedback were received by Returning Officers about the locations of the centres in the pilots. We also received no comments on this aspect in our survey of candidates. However, there is potential for any future choice of venue to cause concerns among political parties and candidates. In any roll out, Returning Officers would need to ensure that they engage with local parties and candidates about the location(s). This process could be modelled on the existing approach to reviewing polling districts and polling places where the Returning Officers is required to follow a transparent process which involves proactively seeking views, publishing representations received and being clear on how decisions were reached. Access to usual polling stations was also a challenge in Bridgend. Bridgend aimed to use their regular polling stations in the low turnout wards selected for the pilot. However, in several cases this was not straightforward as access was needed for three days rather than the usual one. Schools in particular, which often need to close during polling, were reluctant to shut for three days. The two school locations which usually house polling stations could not be used at these elections and temporary portable buildings were put in place instead. This added work for the elections team as these venues then need to be set up to ensure they are accessible, etc. If the approach taken in Bridgend was to be used more widely and particularly if it was used across an entire local authority then there could be challenges in finding polling stations. The days of the week chosen for advance voting could have an impact on ease of administration. The two approaches, of voting at the weekend before the poll and on the weekdays immediately ahead of polling day, were delivered without any significant issues. However, some of the administrators involved said that advance voting on the Tuesday and Wednesday before a Thursday election brought some additional pressures. Firstly, it largely removes contingency time for dealing with issues arising on the advance voting days ahead of a Thursday polling day. As above, in the event of issues with the electronic marking of registers, it would have been difficult to fall back to the full paper process for the Thursday. Secondly, polling on the Tuesday and Wednesday has more overlap with some of the usual activities that administrators need to complete ahead of a Thursday election. This puts additional pressure on core elections teams which are already under strain and are often relatively small, with limited capacity to absorb new demands on their time. The teams in the pilots managed this issue well but that was partly achieved by notable overtime for core staff. This was particularly the case for the Bridgend pilot where managing the opening of over 20 polling stations across three days required significant extra work. In considering the use of advance voting in the future it would be crucial to ensure that core elections teams have the capacity and resilience to manage the additional requirements. Where teams are already under strain, any new demands on their time creates a risk to the running of the election. This should also take account of wider factors that could have an impact, such as more complicated polls. Additional polling staff and some further training was needed. Many more staff were required in Bridgend where more sites for advance voting were available. In the single advance voting centres the numbers required were largely determined by the overall approach to managing the flow of voters, e.g. Blaenau Gwent and Torfaen used two polling station desks and Caerphilly used six. This meant that overall numbers varied from six additional staff in Blaenau Gwent and Torfaen to 14 in Caerphilly and over 100 in Bridgend. The single-centre pilots reported no issues with finding appropriate staff. They also felt that the number of staff was sufficient to manage the work on the advance voting days. It was unsurprisingly more of a challenge for Bridgend. While they recruited enough staff for the advance stations it was not easy to do so, and they were sceptical that it would be possible to find sufficient staff if all of their polling stations had been open for three days. Many polling station staff have jobs, including in local government. They need to be released from those existing roles and the more days that are required, the more difficult that can be. Bridgend used two shifts to manage the staff workload with each covering a morning or afternoon on the advance voting days (one shift then also worked the full Thursday polling day). Their approach also took account of some detailed logistical challenges, for example the same workers would close a station on the Tuesday evening as opened the same station on the Wednesday.

morning (and the same for the Wednesday to Thursday transition). This aimed to minimise any issues around access to sites and/or equipment. Across all the pilots, as the job was very similar to a standard election, the approach to training was also close to that normally employed for polling staff. Some further training (separate from the IT training mentioned above) was made available to staff in the advance voting centres to address the specific pilot challenges (such as managing marked registers across the days, and the sealing of ballot boxes). In all cases the pilots told us that this was a manageable additional requirement. There were no issues with the integrity of the poll in pilot areas. There are several potential integrity challenges presented by managing voting over multiple days. These include, as set out above, ensuring ballot box security overnight and managing the risk of double voting risk. Returning Officers and their teams managed these risks well, working alongside local and force SPOCs. No concerns in relation to the integrity of the polls in the pilot areas have been raised with the Returning Officers, the police or by political parties and candidates.

Cost

The table below sets out the costs of the pilot scheme, broken down into the main categories of spend, as provided to Welsh Government by the pilot authorities. The data represents the costs they have incurred directly (such as in relation to some of the IT provision) or have provided to local authorities to fund aspects of the pilot. As with any pilot it is difficult to draw clear conclusions from these figures about the eventual cost of any wider roll out. This is for several reasons: Local authorities have taken varying approaches to how they have recorded costs (e.g. whether core team staff costs are included, which pieces of equipment are being charged for) Pilots will attract development costs that may not apply in the same way or at all for a roll out; The local authority areas involved are not representative of all areas; Some future costs may be missing from the pilot (e.g. national public awareness campaigns); There may be economies of scale to be realised nationally, despite the increase in costs that would follow from taking forward the policy in more areas.

Type of spend	Cost
Staffing	£54,046
Equipment	£25,297
Building hire, transport and storage	£13,600
Communications	£56,970
EMS	£268,000
Electronic registers*	£1,093,890
TOTAL	£1,511,803

* This includes the costs incurred directly by local authorities for ongoing use of software licences plus the additional cost borne directly by Welsh Government for pilot-specific activities. For the reasons set out above, the costs of the pilots cannot be taken as a clear indication of the likely costs of any future roll out of advance voting. However, particularly given the low turnout among early voters, it is important that any future changes are informed by an assessment of the costs and benefits of wider implementation, including the use of electronic registers to support advance voting, which was the largest area of additional costs in the pilots.

Background Pilot scheme

The Welsh Government established a framework for electoral modernisation in Wales in July 2021. These pilots were one of the first initiatives under that framework. Welsh Government worked with volunteer local authorities to shape the pilots and agree the specific approach each area would take. The legislation required for the pilots was published in March 2022.

Our evaluation

The law says that we have to publish an independent evaluation of the pilot scheme within three months of the election, and there are specific questions that we have to consider: Whether the turnout of voters was higher than it would have been if the scheme had not applied Whether voters found the procedures provided for their assistance by the scheme easy to use Whether the procedures provided for by the scheme led to any increase in personation or other electoral offences or in any other malpractice in connection with elections Whether those procedures led to any increase in expenditure, or to any savings, by the authority We collected information from different sources to make sure that our evaluation of the scheme is thorough and robust. This included: Representative surveys asking people in each local area what they thought of the scheme – one carried out in February/March 2022 as a baseline measure and a second carried out after polling day in May 2022 ‘Exit interviews’ with early voters after they had cast their vote Data on turnout at the elections including the number of early voters and when they cast their vote Views and evidence from Returning Officers and electoral administrators who ran the pilots Information about how much it cost to run the pilot scheme Control areas In order to help assess whether any changes in things like turnout or public opinion can be linked to the pilots rather than other factors we identified a set of control areas. These are local authorities with similar demographics (age and ethnicity profile, unemployment, etc.) and similar levels of previous turnout but where no pilots are taking place.

This allows us to judge whether changes are only seen in the pilot areas or in both pilot and control. The table below shows the pilots and their matching control area.

Opens in new window Request a PDF Previous evidence Between 2000 and 2007 there were a number of pilot schemes which provided opportunities for people to vote in person at advance voting facilities before polling day. The final round of pilots took place at the May 2007 local government elections in England. Five local authorities held pilot schemes providing advance voting facilities on various days before polling day, 3 May 2007. Our evaluation of all these previous pilot schemes found that use of advance voting facilities has been limited and mainly confined to those already predisposed to vote. Our evaluation of the 2007 pilots highlighted a number of findings which remain relevant for any consideration of advance voting and support our findings from the 2022 pilots in Wales. However, these pilots were not directly comparable to the more recent ones as the specific approaches varied. For example, only one pilot had two days of advance voting, the other four had between four and nine days. Most pilots also had more than one voting centre and several were not piloting for the first time. Turnout There was a limited impact on turnout. The percentage of voters casting ballots at advance voting centres ranged from 0.5% - 7%. In our surveys 74% of early voters said they would have voted anyway. There was no significant correlation between turnout levels and the different opening times of the voting centres. There was also no pattern in terms of a preferred day for advance voting: in two of the five pilots Wednesday was the most popular day. In the other three it was Monday, Thursday and Friday. Voter experience Feedback from local stakeholders and public opinion research conducted for the Commission in the pilot scheme areas suggests that electors generally welcomed the increased convenience of advance voting. Those who voted early found the process easy to use. Management and cost The processes used to run the advance voting pilots were similar to those used at standard polls and presented limited additional challenge for Returning Officers.

The costs of the pilots varied depending on the nature of the specific pilot. For example, more voting centres and/or more voting days would attract a higher cost.

Security There were no allegations of personation or other electoral offences reported in relation to the pilots. Risks such as double voting and the storage of ballots were identified and well managed. Page history First published: 12 July 2022

Results and turnout at the 2015 UK general election | Electoral Commission Search Results and turnout at the 2015 UK general election You are in the UK general elections section Home UK general elections First published: 11 July 2019 Last updated: 6 August 2019 Download You can download the: full dataset as an XLS results as an XLS full dataset as a CSV (zip file) results as a CSV (zip file) You can also download our full report , written by Colin Rallings and Michael Thrasher (Elections Centre, Plymouth University, Drake Circus, Plymouth, PL4 8AA). Summary The UK electorate at the 2015 general election was almost 46.4 million –the largest ever. The registers contained three-quarters of a million more names than in 2010 –an increase of 1.7%. More than a million people registered to vote in the period between the compilation of the ONS parliamentary electorate statistics based on the registers at 1st December 2014 and the general election in May. Nearly 30.7 million valid votes were cast, making the overall turnout across the UK 66.2%. This is one million more votes than in 2010, but only a 1.1 percentage point higher turnout. The ‘ballot box’ turnout which includes votes rejected at the count was 30.8 million or 66.4% of the registered electorate. Turnout rose in each country, but jumped particularly sharply in Scotland from 63.9% in 2010 to 71.1%. The number of ballot papers rejected at the count continues to be but a small fraction of the total cast (0.33%), though was a little greater than in either 2010 or 2005. There is evidence of the rejection rate being somewhat higher where voters are faced with an additional election, especially in cases where it operates under a different electoral system (e.g. in those areas with a coincident mayoral election). Almost 7.6 million postal votes were issued -16.4% of the entire electorate. This represented an increase of 1.1 percentage points and more than half a million more voters than in 2010. 85.8% of those with a postal ballot returned it. By way of contrast, only 63.2% of those electors required to vote ‘in person’ did so. The number of postal votes at the count was one in five of the total. In the North East region of England more than a third of all votes were cast by post. The proportion of postal votes rejected or otherwise not included in the count was 3.3%. It was less than in 2010 in every country of the UK. In about half the cases postal votes were rejected because a signature or date of birth (or both) were mismatched; in another quarter because the elector omitted to enclose either the ballot paper or the postal vote statement (or both). Almost 150,000 electors (0.3% of the total) appointed proxies. This was a small increase compared with 2010, concentrated especially in Scotland and Northern Ireland. The number of emergency proxy votes increased from fewer than 1,000 in 2010 to nearly 9,000 following a relaxation of the rules regarding eligibility. About three fifths of one percent of electors with a postal vote were granted a waiver to use their date of birth as their sole identifier. This is in line with levels seen at the 2014 European Parliament contests. Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal four | Electoral Commission Search Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal four You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2020/21 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2020/21 First published: 16 September 2021 Last updated: 21 October 2021 Goal four To provide value for money, making best use of our resources and expertise to deliver services that are attuned to what matters most to voters. This goal provides a focus to activities that support the organisation and ensure we have the appropriate skilled people, resources, technology, systems and governance. The aim is to deliver services that are efficient, effective and economical. Key achievements To support our organisation, we: implemented our new accountability arrangements with the Scottish Parliament and Senedd which come into effect 1 April 2021. reviewed and refreshed how we deliver legal services supported staff with the challenges of home working through the pandemic, while continuing to support our stakeholders and deliver on the organisation's priorities implemented our new People Strategy to support the best use of our resources commenced an internal consultation on our new Equality Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) strategy and approach set up a Race at Work Taskforce commissioned an external report on bullying and harassment in response to staff survey feedback and appointed a champion to lead our response implemented new IT systems including, a new e-procurement system, new unified communication systems (including telephone, upgraded video conferencing, instant messaging and a new planning performance system) renovated our working environment to support our new flexible ways of working set up a Quality Assurance initiative to help us continuously improve our processes Performance measures Measure Performance Learn practical lessons from current home and remote working practices and design future accommodation accordingly Ongoing 1 Deliver our Ways of Working project to deliver digitally enabled business change to reflect the expectations on a modern employer and ensure the core ICT offering can support those changes. Completed Stakeholder and staff satisfaction with IT tools Ongoing 2 Work with the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Senedd to implement our new accountability arrangements, including a new funding formula and business plans for Scotland and Wales Completed Implement our new People Strategy Ongoing Maintain high staff engagement scores in the annual staff survey and ensure indicators such as staff turnover are at appropriate levels Staff engagement score: 72% (Civil Service average: 62%) Staff turnover: 9.23% Identify options, costs and benefits of e-procurement and implement a new system accordingly Completed Monitor significant variances on all budgets and, where appropriate, reduce these variances over the five years of our Corporate Plan Completed Deliver a project to examine how well we manage customer enquiries across the whole range of the Commission's work Ongoing Supporting the organisation In common with all organisations, the Covid-19 pandemic has transformed the way we work and presented major challenges, including almost total home-working through the reporting year. Our aim throughout has been to support staff wellbeing while remaining focused on our important role to deliver for voters and to support our electoral stakeholders. We carried out an internal review of our initial response over the summer, followed by an internal audit at the end of the year. Both found that we had handled the situation well and had learnt lessons, in particular about formalising our structures for decision making in a crisis. We have invested significant effort in supporting and developing our people. Our People Strategy includes actions to facilitate a culture where employees are able to perform their roles more effectively. We started this work by reviewing our performance management and development processes. We invested more in learning and development and ensured staff were aware of the range of options for development that are possible. We also continue with the roll out of our leadership and management development programme for all managers. We continued supporting staff groups that we set up to address particular areas, such as the staff engagement group, to ensure our employees have input into corporate policies and programmes. We also have groups dedicated to supporting staff with bullying and harassment, to supporting those with mental health issues and to promoting dignity and respect at work. We maintain strong links with our trade union, the Public and Commercial Services Union. We have made significant progress on equality, diversity and inclusion. We have set up a Race at Work Taskforce to ensure that the voices of our black, Asian and minority ethnic staff are heard and provide a force for change. We have prepared and will be consulting on a new Equality, Diversity and Inclusion strategy. We are reviewing and enhancing our Equality Impact Assessment process. We have continued to transform the way we work through significant investments in our digital infrastructure, to improve its resilience and support flexible working practices. The roll-out of new laptops to all staff will enable more efficient working practices and is nearly complete. We have also introduced a new unified communications system. This year has seen significant investment in our offices to ensure that we are ready for new and more flexible working practices post-pandemic. This has been completed on schedule despite the constraints of the pandemic. We have also made significant improvements to our business delivery systems. We have implemented a new project management framework and set up a Quality Assurance initiative to help us ensure continuous improvement. We have also set up a new performance management and tracking system to enhance our reporting mechanisms. We have also continued working with the National Cyber Security Centre to improve how we monitor our networks and platforms. We report to the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd for our policy work on devolved issues, from 1 April 2021 we will be formally accountable to them in the same way as we are to the UK Parliament and have agreed a Statement of Funding Principles. In addition to revised accountabilities, this will change the way funding is received £17.2m of budget will be from Consolidated Fund Administered by HM Treasury, £2.6m from Scottish Parliament Corporate Body and £1.8m from Welsh Consolidated Fund for 2021/22 Impact of Covid-19 The postponement of the elections saw our activity adapted on how it operated, this created opportunities to review working practices. We carried out a review of our response to the pandemic. This found that we had balanced the needs of supporting staff with continuing to deliver the organisation's priorities, and that the Commission had acted swiftly and effectively. A further audit was carried out by our internal auditors in early 2021 which confirmed these findings. We have made a number of changes to enhance further our response, notably in setting up a formal Gold/Silver command structure to support decision-making. The additional costs to the Commission to support staff whilst working at home totalled £85k. This could be broken down in to three areas: home working allowance to all staff members (£67k) courier services (£8k) – enable essential equipment from the offices to home addresses the purchase of additional equipment to enable people to work at home successfully (£10k). The additional costs have been absorbed due to underspends caused by the pandemic within the event budget across the Commission. Impact of EU exit There are no further European Parliamentary Elections due to be held in the UK, with the related elections legislation repealed. As a result of the European Union (Withdrawal) Act 2018, changes were introduced to the rules for parties, candidates, non-party campaigners and regulated donees accepting donations and loans, and to the registration of non-party campaigners. These changes came into force on 31 December and required the guidance team to update all of its guidance and resources in GB and NI. This amounted to approximately 70 guidance resources. There were no additional financial costs to complete this work.

You are in the Our research section Home Our research On this page Our role in referendum questions Guidelines for assessing referendum questions Checklist Our approach to referendum questions Questions or feedback First published: 28 June 2019 Last updated: 4 September 2020 Overview of our role in referendum questions For referendums in the UK, we look at the way the proposed referendum question is worded to make sure it is easy for voters to understand. As part of our assessment, we carry out research with the public. Our role in referendum questions By law, we must comment on the intelligibility of UK, national and regional referendum questions, and some local government referendum questions. This is a requirement of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. In this context, we mean referendums where voters are asked to vote on a proposal that government has put forward. At this type of referendum, voters are given a ballot paper that contains the question or questions and at least two possible responses to choose from. How many responses voters can vote for depends on the voting system used at that referendum. We have developed these guidelines to: help us assess how intelligible a proposed question is help people draft intelligible referendum questions In this context, 'question' includes the question, the responses, and any statement that comes immediately before the question. Guidelines for assessing referendum questions A referendum question should present the options clearly, simply and neutrally. It should be: easy to understand to the point unambiguous It should avoid: encouraging voters to consider one response more favourably than another misleading voters Checklist We will use the following checklist to help us assess how intelligible a question is. Is the question written in plain language? That is, language that: uses short sentences (around 15 to 20 words) is simple, direct and concise uses familiar words, and avoid jargon or technical terms that would not be easily understood by most people Is the question written in neutral language, avoiding words that suggest a judgement or opinion, either explicitly or implicitly? Is the information contained in the question factual, describing the question and the options clearly and accurately? Does the question avoid assuming anything about voters' views? Our approach to referendum questions Assessing the intelligibility of referendum questions Questions or feedback If you have any questions or feedback about these guidelines, you can contact us.

Policy Development Grants Each year, we have £2 million from UK Parliament to allocate to political parties as a Policy Development Grant. The grant gives political parties the funds to develop policies to include in their election manifestos. The grant is only available to parties with at least two sitting members of the House of Commons, who have taken the oath of allegiance. We distribute the first £1 million of the grant equally between the eligible parties. We then use a formula to calculate how much of the remaining £1 million parties. The formula is based on the: proportion of the registered electorate where the party contests elections (England, Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland) share of the vote the party received in each part of the UK These are the electorate figures we used in this year's calculations: Part of the UK Electorate England 38,834,540 Wales 2,310,148 Scotland 4,012,887 Northern Ireland 1,371,934 When we have calculated how much each party can apply for, we invite them to submit their application. The application needs to include the policy development activities the party is planning for the year ahead. Parties will often include all of their policy development activities, even if the total cost is more than the amount they can apply for. If we approve the application, we give up to 75% of the grant in advance. At the end of the year, each party must submit an independent audit report confirming that the funds were spent on policy development. We then will either pay the party the full amount of the grant, or we will recover the grant we paid in advance if the party didn't spend it on policy development activities. If we recover any grants, it goes back to the government's consolidated fund. Other public funds Political parties can also receive funding from parliamentary bodies. This includes: Short Money, which the House of Commons pays to opposition parties Cranborne Money, which the House of Lords pays to the opposition and second largest opposition party in the House of Lords Financial Assistance, which the Scottish Parliament pays to opposition parties in the Scottish Parliament Financial Assistance, which the Northern Ireland Assembly pays to opposition parties in the Northern Ireland Assembly When we publish information We include information about the public funding political parties have received when we publish the donations four times a year. We also comment on public funding in our annual report . Letter: Coronavirus and its impact on the May polls | Electoral Commission Search Letter: Coronavirus and its impact on the May polls You are in the Key correspondence section Home Key correspondence First published: 12 March 2020 Last updated: 12 March 2020 Summary of the letter Date: 12 March 2020 To: Chloe Smith MP, Minister for the Constitution and Devolution CC Rt Hon Michael Gove MP, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister for the Cabinet Office Address: Cabinet Office, 70 Whitehall, London, SW1A 2AS From: Bob Posner, Chief Executive Format: Sent by email Full letter Dear Minister, In light of the current and emerging situation around Covid-19 in the UK, I wanted to write to set out the Commission's concerns about the real risks to the successful delivery of the scheduled 7 May 2020 elections. We have been in close contact with a range of key stakeholders across the electoral community – including the Association of s, Solace, the Greater London Returning Officer, the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, and of course your officials – to assess the risks, and to identify and take forward appropriate mitigations to enable the delivery of the elections. While this work is continuing, it has already become clear that the risks are so significant as to raise serious concerns about the polls continuing to their current timetable. Although polling day is not until 7 May, preparations for the elections are already well underway and indeed publication of notice of election – which marks the start of the formal timetable – will take place later this month. This means that a decision now needs to be taken, by Government and as appropriate by Parliament, whether to proceed with the scheduled 7 May polls. So voters can cast their ballot, polling station venues need to be secured, set up, staffed and accessed; we already know that local authorities have concerns about their ability to ensure this, particularly at the same time as continuing to manage other key services in the current circumstances. It is also vital that voters are able to hear the positions of candidates, parties and campaigners before they cast their vote; however, many forms of campaigning may not be possible, leaving insufficient space for the arguments to be heard. We also anticipate that as a result of the direct and indirect impacts of Covid-19, there will be significant numbers of registered electors who in practice will not have opportunity to vote, or feel inclined to vote. While increased access to post and proxy voting may provide a partial solution for some electors, it would create further and additional pressures and risks in other parts of the system. Clearly any decisions to delay elections which are due is significant and would not normally be desirable; however, we are in unprecedented times. The risks to delivery that have been identified are such that we cannot be confident that voters will be able to participate in the polls safely and confidently, nor that campaigners and parties will be able to put their case to the electorate. We therefore call on the Government to take steps to provide early clarity to all those with an interest in the electoral process; and on the available information and position we recommend the Government now delay the 7 May polls until the autumn. In this context we are also mindful that the Chief Executives of local authorities and their staff across the country are necessarily focussed on the ongoing management of the impacts Covid-19 is having on their localities. Similar impacts could also be expected to affect the effective delivery of by-elections during the intervening period, and we would hope that this could also be addressed at the same time by providing that these could also be deferred. Looking further ahead, there may also be a potential impact on annual canvass activity across the UK, and this is something that it will be important for Government to return to with us in due course. The Commission stands ready to provide further advice and take or co-ordinate necessary actions, as may be of assistance to the Government in this matter. Goal one Performance analysis 2019/20: Goal two Performance analysis 2019/20: Goal three Performance analysis 2019/20: Goal four Looking ahead to 2020/21 and using our resources to support the delivery of our goals Overview This section provides an overview of the Electoral Commission, our purpose, our performance during the last year and the key risks to achieving our goals. We have included summary financial information within the performance report. This is consistent with the financial statements, where more detail is available. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) established the Electoral Commission. We are independent of government and political parties and directly accountable to the UK Parliament through a committee chaired by the Speaker of the House of Commons. We also report to the Scottish Parliament for functions related to its parliamentary and local government elections. Once the commencement provisions are enacted, we will also report to the Senedd for its parliamentary and local government elections. We have prepared our 2019-20 Annual Report and Accounts in accordance with an accounts direction, set out on page 108 issued by HM Treasury under paragraph 17(2) of Schedule 1 PPERA. We have prepared the powers and sanctions report on page 38 in accordance with paragraph 15 Schedule 19(b) and paragraph 27 Schedule 19(c) PPERA. Foreword Foreword For The Electoral Commission, 2019-20 has been a year characterised by a busy and shifting electoral timetable. In May, after supporting the delivery of local government elections in England and Northern Ireland, we responded quickly to the UK Government's decision to hold the European Parliamentary elections. In October, we mobilised to support an unscheduled UK Parliamentary general election on 12 December. In early 2020, in response to the Covid-19 pandemic, we advised on and supported the UK Government postponing the May polls, recognising the impacts on voters, campaigners, and local authorities. Ahead of the 2019 polls, we provided support to all those taking part. We ran public awareness campaigns to ensure that everyone who was eligible could register and cast their vote; one in four people saw our general election campaign and electoral administrators added more than 1.2 million people to the registers. During November and December, we fielded nearly 9,000 enquiries from the public, while almost 1.3 million users visited our website; giving people the information they needed to vote with confidence. We supported a record number of non-party campaigners to participate in the elections, and published information on over £113 million of donations accepted by political parties in the UK in 2019, ensuring the public could see where parties got their funding. We worked closely with the National Police Chiefs' Council, the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) and the College of Policing to produce guidance to help candidates run respectful campaigns and protect themselves from abuse. The electoral community rose to the challenge and, despite the uncertainty and tight timescales of the year's events, delivered well-run polls. Our public opinion research found that the majority of respondents had confidence in the way these polls ran (69% for the general election), though levels of confidence were lower than at previous such polls, and strains in the system are increasingly evident. As with all elections, we supported the work of electoral administrators - 99% of those who responded to our post-poll survey said they found our guidance and resources useful. In addition to the busy electoral timetable, we supported electoral administrators in two areas to hold recall petitions, each resulting in a subsequent by-election. We reported on the administration of these petitions and shared recommendations for future improvements with the UK Government. We also supported preparations for important changes to the annual canvass in Great Britain, which will streamline the annual audit of electoral registers. We have developed guidance on the new process, so administrators understand their responsibilities, and created user-friendly forms for the public. We have worked closely with the Association of s, Scottish Assessors Association, Solace and officials from the UK's governments to ensure we all embed the changes successfully. We maintained the registers of political parties and campaigners, and oversaw the laws on political finance, publishing financial returns, administering policy development grants, providing guidance and advice, and taking regulatory actions. We have a strong track- record of success in the courts, but look to learn too from all outcomes. We also enabled or supported related bodies in their regulatory work, such as the police, CPS, Information Commissioner, Ofcom, Independent Parliamentary Standards Authority, and the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. We also engaged with the main social media companies to encourage their role in transparency in political campaigning. We have continued to strengthen our relationships with, and fulfil our accountabilities to, the Scottish, Welsh and UK parliaments. This has included evaluating the voter ID pilots conducted in England; helping prepare for franchise changes in Wales and Scotland; and supporting significant electoral reform bills in the Scottish and Welsh parliaments. We worked with the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland on plans to deliver the full-scale canvass it is required to run every 10 years, which will now take place in 2021. We are seeing alignment between our recommendations and the initiatives and priorities of the UK's governments, such as the UK Government's commitments on defending democracy and the Scottish Parliament inclusion of many of our recommendations in its new referendums legislation. We will continue to encourage all governments to implement our recommendations, including reforms of the rules for digital campaigning and on electoral law more broadly, founded on the excellent recommendations made by the Law Commissions' final report on the subject. In 2019, we published major research into the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers, as well as feasibility studies on options for modernising electoral registration, demonstrating the potential benefits of future reform in this area. We are also committed to making reforms of our own. In the last year, we continued reviewing all party descriptions included on the register, to help voters clearly identify candidates on the ballot paper. Working with the main political parties, we have made good progress on a new online tool that will make it easier for parties and campaigners to register with us and report financial information. In a system where most comply with the political finance rules, our preference is to help increase compliance rather than to take enforcement action afterwards. This new tool will play a role in helping those we regulate to achieve that. To underpin our work, we have improved our human resources, planning and digital technology functions. We have implemented new online planning, governance and procurement systems. We have also invested in staff engagement and development, resulting in staff turnover falling by 19 percentage points. As we look ahead to the coming year, a key concern remains the risks presented by archaic and complex electoral law. Combined with continued pressure on local authority resources and capacity, and an outdated registration system, it is increasing the strain on electoral administrators and failing to keep pace with technological advances. We stand ready to work with governments and other stakeholders to address these challenges. We look forward to continuing to work with the UK's governments to ensure their existing reform plans can be taken forward effectively. We are working closely with all governments on the implications of the Covid-19 pandemic for elections and electoral processes, and talking to others, to see what lessons we can learn and what further changes might usefully be introduced for the future. Our role The Electoral Commission is the independent body which oversees election and regulates political finance in the United Kingdom. Our vision and goals Our vision is to be a world-class public sector organisation - innovative, delivering great value and getting right what matters most to voters and legislators. In 2019/20 we worked towards achieving four goals: To enable the continued delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the need of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible. To ensure increasingly trusted and transparent systems of regulation in political finance, overseeing compliance, promoting understanding amongst those regulated and proactively pursuing breaches. To be an independent and respected centre of expertise, using knowledge and insight to further the transparency, fairness and efficiency of our democratic system, and help adapt it to the modern, digital age. To provide value for money, making best use of our resources and expertise to deliver services that are attuned to what matters most to voters. This goal underpins and supports all of our work. Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal one | Electoral Commission Search

Performance analysis 2020/21: Goal one You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2020/21 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2020/21 First published: 15 September 2021 Last updated: 21 October 2021 Goal 1 To enable the continued delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible. This goal captures our role in overseeing the delivery of elections across all parts of the UK and focuses on three areas: delivering well-run electoral events, maximising and modernising electoral registration, and tackling electoral fraud. Goal 1 To help deliver well-run electoral events we: published guidance and resources, and provided support to electoral administrators, candidates and agents for the scheduled elections in May 2021, including those postponed from May 2020; this included a range of supplementary guidance for administrators and candidates and agents to support the delivery of the polls in the context of the pandemic worked with stakeholders from across the electoral community to identify and publish a shared set of high-level objectives for delivering successful elections in the developing public health environment published a range of resources for local authorities to use to help share messages about the safe running of the polls and the voting options available worked with the National Police Chiefs Council, Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) and the College of Policing to provide new guidance for candidates and campaigners on recognising and reporting intimidation worked with organisations supporting people with a disability to raise awareness of how to take part in elections and what support they can expect to receive launched a new system for processing applications for accreditation for electoral observers To help maximise and modernise electoral registration, we: supported Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) in Great Britain with delivery of the first annual canvass using the reformed process; including through the provision of guidance and advice, and the publication of supplementary guidance to support EROs with managing the canvass in the context of the pandemic published a response to our consultation on performance standards for EROs, and used the updated framework to inform our support and challenge work with EROs throughout the canvass worked closely with the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland on preparations for the electoral registration canvass, now expected to take place in 2021 To help tackle electoral fraud, we: worked with the police and local authorities to provide training and review integrity plans to help prevent electoral fraud published updated data on alleged cases of electoral fraud reported during 2019, and new data on a small number of cases reported during 2020 worked with partners to prepare a campaign to raise awareness of electoral fraud, ahead of the May 2021 elections delivered, with the National Police Chiefs Council, our annual conference for police elections Single Points of Contact as an online event worked with the City of London Police Economic Crime Academy to host and contribute content to four training courses for police officers Performance measures Measure Performance We publish 100% of guidance products relating to electoral registration on time with no substantive errors 96.7% Achieved 1 We provide accurate advice to Returning Officers (ROs) and EROs within three working days of receipt of the request. (Target 100%) 99.4% Achieved 2 Additions to electoral registers during our public awareness campaigns meet or exceed our targets (Target 0% - no campaign was held) 0% Achieved 3 Our activities during the year Delivering well-run electoral events Owing to the pandemic and the consequent decisions taken by the UK's governments, there were no electoral events in 2020/21 apart from local government by-elections in Scotland. The Commission therefore quickly focused in 2020/21 on supporting the electoral community to prepare for the elections scheduled – and rescheduled – for May 2021. To support administrators with preparing for and delivering polls in the context of Covid-19, we produced a suite of supplementary guidance and resources that reflected the specific requirements of managing the 2021 polls in a Covid-19 secure way. The supplementary guidance documents were designed to be read in conjunction with our suite of core guidance for Returning Officers and were developed in close consultation with the electoral community and public health bodies across Great Britain. We developed an extensive range of new voter information materials, to support public understanding of how to participate with confidence in the forthcoming elections in the changed context. These included resources focused on informing people about the voting options available to them, and encouraging forward planning, and resources communicating the safety measures that would be in place in polling stations. While used directly by the Commission, their primary purpose was to support local authorities and other stakeholders to provide accurate and timely information to their communities. Maximising and modernising electoral registration 2020 saw the first annual canvass in Great Britain run under a new reformed process allowing EROs to use national and local-level data to identify addresses where there is likely to have been a change in the people who are eligible to register to vote. This allows EROs to focus their resources in areas of greatest need. We see these reforms as an important step towards improving our electoral registration system and we intend to report on the running of the canvass, using data collected from EROs, in summer 2021. Our work to support the introduction of these reforms included providing extensive guidance and advice to help electoral administrators understand their new responsibilities, designing and delivering new voter registration forms, and ensuring our new performance standards for EROs are aligned with the new process. We also developed additional guidance to address the specific challenges of running a canvass in the context of the pandemic. Our scrutiny of proposals from the Northern Ireland Office and our continual dialogue with the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland on a full canvass of electors – originally planned for 2020 but now scheduled to take place in 2021 – have helped to ensure that preparations for the canvass have progressed well. Alongside the work undertaken by the Chief Electoral Officer, we will be running a new multimedia public awareness campaign across Northern Ireland to encourage the electorate to register during the canvass period. We have also committed to reporting on the conduct of the canvass, and plan to publish this in advance of the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election. Tackling electoral fraud We provided guidance and advice to support EROs, ROs and the police to deal with electoral fraud. For the fourth year in a row, we also worked with the City of London Police Economic Crime Academy to host and contribute content to four training courses for police officers. We jointly organised the 16th Annual National SPOC (single point of contact) seminar which took place virtually for the first time, working with our partners at the National Police Chiefs' Council. We also supported SPOC seminars in Scotland and Wales, and provided dedicated election briefings for new SPOCs. Throughout the year, police forces across the UK sent us data about allegations of electoral fraud that they received and investigated. Every year we report on the number, type, and outcome of these allegations, to understand what has happened and how cases are resolved. We provided updates on outcomes from cases reported in 2019, including from the UKPGE, and also published data on the small number cases reported during 2020. report navigation links Previous Next Annual Report and Accounts 2020/21 Performance analysis: Goal two 1. 326 of 337 guidance products were published on time; for those not published as planned, these reflected conscious decisions to re-

Briefing: Our evaluation of voter ID pilots You are in the section Home On this page Briefing summary Read our briefing in full About the Electoral Commission First published: 1 May 2019 Last updated: 17 October 2019 Summary of the briefing Date: May 2019 For: MPs Full briefing This briefing has been prepared ahead of the pilot schemes trialling identification requirements for voters at polling stations, which are taking place in ten local authority areas at the May 2019 local elections.

Background As in 2018, the pilot schemes have been set up by the UK Government under Section 10 of the Representation of the People Act 2000. The RPA requires the Electoral Commission to evaluate and report on any pilot scheme. 2018 pilot scheme evaluation The key findings from our previous evaluation were: Overall, the voter identification requirements trialled in May 2018 worked well and the pilots provided useful initial evidence about how a voter identification requirement in Great Britain might work in practice. But they also highlighted areas where further work is needed to provide evidence which can address concerns and answer questions about the impact of identification requirements on voters. We recommended that the UK Government should encourage a wider range of local councils to run pilot schemes in May 2019 and that these should include a mix of rural and large urban areas, and areas with different demographic profiles. Our approach to evaluation We intend to collect and analyse a wide range of data and information. Public opinion surveys These will be our main route for assessing whether the ID requirement deterred or prevented people from voting on 2 May. The surveys will also provide measures of the extent to which the application of an ID requirement affected public attitudes to fraud and confidence in the system. We will be able to compare survey results for the pilot areas before and after the elections as well as between the pilots and other areas running polls without an ID requirement. Data from polling stations Data on the different ID used and the numbers unable to vote will be recorded directly by polling station staff on 2 May and collated and analysed by the Commission. feedback We have written to over 170 organisations and groups representing people who have additional accessibility requirements, and who could therefore be disproportionately affected by the pilot, asking for views and evidence. Data from police forces This will include data on any fraud allegations and cases in the pilot areas. it is of course not possible to know what would have occurred at these elections in the absence of the pilots and comparisons with reported levels of fraud at previous polls or in other areas is difficult due to differing circumstances across years. Review of ID security We will make an assessment of the different levels of assurance provided by the different types of ID trialled. Turnout and postal voting data We will look at previous comparable election turnout in the pilot areas to explore any differences relative to 2019. We will also collect detailed data on postal voting to assess any effect as a result of the pilots. Levels of turnout fluctuate year-on-year as a result of a range of factors, even between the same types of elections. Polling station staff survey All polling station staff in the pilot areas will be surveyed to gather information on their experience of administering the pilot. Interviews with Returning Officers and electoral administrators We will interview the key staff involved in the pilots soon after polling day to gather their views on the delivery of the pilot and any issues they encountered. Feedback from candidates We will provide a route for any candidate in the pilot areas to give us their views on the pilot scheme. Observers Commission staff will observe at polling stations in each pilot area. The Commission also accredits observers at UK elections and we will be highlighting to each of them how they should provide any feedback on the pilots. We

2019 report: Accuracy and completeness of the 2018 electoral registers in Great Britain | Electoral Commission Search 2019 report: Accuracy and completeness of the 2018 electoral registers in Great Britain You are in the Accuracy and completeness of electoral registers section Home Our research Accuracy and completeness of electoral registers In this section National estimates of accuracy and completeness Completeness in Great Britain Accuracy in Great Britain Addressing the challenges of accuracy and completeness Background to this study Summary We run accuracy and completeness studies to measure the quality of the electoral registers, and assess how this changes in response to legislative developments and administrative and population changes. The results for Great Britain in December 2018 show that: Parliamentary registers were 85% complete and 89% accurate Local government registers were 83% complete and 89% accurate The findings lead to two main estimates: between 8.3 and 9.4 million people in Great Britain who were eligible to be on the local government registers were not correctly registered there were between 4.7 and 5.6 million inaccurate entries on the local government registers This is our first study since the 2015 assessment of the registers, following the transition to Individual Electoral Registration (IER). Since 2015 the levels of completeness have stayed at around the same level, with a not statistically significant decline of around 1 percentage point on the local government registers, while the accuracy has fallen by two percentage points. Age and mobility Our research confirms that age and mobility continue to be the strongest variables associated with lower levels of completeness. Plans to reform the annual canvass starting in 2020 are an important first step, enabling Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) to focus resources on households that have changed composition. Modernising electoral registration However, there is more that could and should be done to modernise registration processes in Great Britain to provide the best opportunity for ensuring that as many people as possible are correctly registered. Earlier this year we published the findings from a series of feasibility studies exploring how reforms , including automatic or more automated registration, could be delivered. The studies found that these changes are feasible from a technical and operational perspective and could be implemented without radically altering the structure of the electoral registration system in the UK. What we mean by accuracy and completeness The quality of the electoral registers is measured in two main ways: their accuracy and their completeness. By accuracy we mean that 'there are no false entries on the electoral registers'. It is the measure of the percentage of entries on the registers which relate to verified and eligible voters who are resident at that address. Inaccurate register entries may relate to entries which have become redundant (for example, due to home movement), which are ineligible and have been included unintentionally, or which are fraudulent. By completeness, we mean that 'every person who is entitled to have an entry on an electoral register is registered'. It refers to the percentage of eligible people who are registered at their current address. The proportion of eligible people who are not included on the register at their current address constitutes the rate of under-registration. Methodology Methodology The accuracy and completeness estimates presented in this report are based on a house-to-house survey of 5,079 addresses in Great Britain across 127 local authority areas. The majority of information was gathered from face-to-face interviews of 4,968 households, conducted by trained interviewers with the aim of gathering information from residents which could then be checked against the details held on the electoral registers. A small number of postal questionnaires were issued in order to attempt to reach those addresses where a face-to-face interview was not achieved; of these

111 were returned. The fieldwork and data analysis from the study was carried out by Ipsos MORI. This method is consistent with the approaches used for our 2014 and 2015 assessments of the registers. This approach has been validated through a separate study ('Electoral registration in 2011') using data from the 2011 Census. The results from that study were compared to those generated from previous house-to-house studies and found a high level of consistency between the results and methods. Therefore, we are confident in the estimates produced using the house-to-house survey approach. We also compare some specific findings to our study of the 2015 registers in order to provide a sense of how the quality of the registers has changed with time. Any estimate of accuracy and completeness represents a 'snapshot' at a particular moment in the lifecycle of the registers. We have generally taken this snapshot in the period immediately following the compilation and publication of the annual registers when, historically, the completeness of the registers was its highest. Our previous studies on the topic suggest that the completeness of the registers can decline by as much as up to one percentage point a month from the completion of the canvass. We would expect this effect to be less pronounced since the introduction of year-round registration and the introduction of online registration. In line with previous studies, the findings presented in this report are for the registers published in England, Wales and Scotland on 1 December 2018. We also present national estimates alongside the estimates for the whole of Great Britain. Quantifying accuracy and completeness Using the percentage figures produced from this research, it is possible to estimate the number of people who are not correctly registered, or who have inaccuracies in their register entries. However, it is important to be aware that these can only be estimates for several reasons. Firstly, both the accuracy and completeness estimates are subject, like any survey findings, to confidence intervals (+/- 1.1% and +/- 1.0% respectively). This is because the results are from a surveyed sample of the overall population. The confidence intervals denote the range around any survey statistic where the true population value is likely to lie. Secondly, related to completeness, it is not possible to determine with certainty the size of the population eligible to register to vote in Great Britain. Eligibility is determined by age and nationality. Mid-year estimate data from the Office for National Statistics, based on the 2011 census, offers the most accurate estimate of the size of the population. However, while annual estimates are made available which include data on age, they do not include information on nationality. Any attempts to calculate the absolute number of people not correctly registered at their current address is therefore based on an estimate of completeness and an estimate of the total eligible population. It can, therefore, only be an approximation and should be treated as such. The findings from this accuracy and completeness study lead to an estimate of between 8.3 and 9.4 million people in Great Britain eligible to be on the local government registers who were not correctly registered in December 2018. Our 2015 assessment estimated between 7.8 – 8.3 million. Although completeness has remained stable, over time the estimated number of incorrectly registered people in Great Britain appears to have increased. This is mostly because the population has grown by close to two per cent between 2015 and 2018. It is also partly because of slightly wider confidence intervals for the 2018 estimates due to a smaller sample size. A further point to note is that the range presented above does not mean that there should be an additional 8.3 – 9.4 million entries on the registers in total. Those not correctly registered may still be included on the registers but for instance at a previous address (an inaccurate entry). The estimates also allow for the total number of inaccurate entries on the December 2018 registers to be approximated. In Great Britain it is likely that between 4.7 and 5.6 million entries on the local government registers are inaccurate. Our 2015 assessment estimated between 4.0 and 4.5 million. This estimate suggests the number of inaccurate entries has increased although, as with completeness, factors such as population growth and different confidence intervals play a role. There are currently fewer inaccurate entries than in 2014, which was the last study carried out before the introduction of individual electoral registration (IER). You are in the Our research section Home Our research Currently reading: of 3 - Show page contents On this page Background Key findings Conclusions Summary This report looks at how the canvass was run, what the register of electors looks like at the end of the canvass, and what lessons can be learned for the future. Across the summer and autumn of 2021, a full canvass of electors took place in Northern Ireland. A canvass must take place at least once every 10 years. During the canvass period, every eligible elector is required to apply to register to vote – even if they are already registered. The last canvass before this one was in 2013; the next is scheduled for 2030, and then in every tenth year following that. The canvass started on 1 July 2021 and ran until the revised electoral register was published by the Chief Electoral Officer on 1 December 2021. It contained a total of 1,368,091 entries, representing approximately 93% of the eligible electorate. It is a significant achievement that the electoral register is the largest ever recorded in Northern Ireland, with over 1.36 million people registered to vote. However the canvass in its current format is not an efficient tool for helping to maintain an accurate and complete electoral register - both for the Chief Electoral Officer and for electors. As such we recommend that the Government should reform the canvass and wider electoral registration process in Northern Ireland.

Background Across the summer and autumn of 2021, a full canvass of electors took place in Northern Ireland. A canvass must take place at least once every 10 years. During the canvass period, every eligible elector is required to apply to register to vote – even if they are already registered. The last canvass before this one was in 2013; the next is scheduled for 2030, and then in every tenth year following that. Across the summer and autumn of 2021, a full canvass of electors took place in Northern Ireland. The canvass was originally scheduled for 2020, but was delayed owing to the coronavirus (Covid-19) pandemic. In 2006, the annual canvass in Northern Ireland was replaced with a process of continuous electoral registration. Under this system, registered electors only have to re-register if their personal details change – such as a change of name or address. Provisions were also included which required that a canvass must take place at least once every 10 years. During the canvass period, every eligible elector is required to apply to register to vote – even if they are already registered. The last canvass before this one was in 2013; the next is scheduled for 2030, and then in every tenth year following that. The Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland can also make a recommendation to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland that a canvass should take place sooner than the ten year threshold. The Chief Electoral Officer, supported by the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland (EONI), is responsible for managing the canvass. As part of the canvass, the EONI contacted every household, encouraging all eligible electors to respond to canvass by registering to vote.

Context Accuracy and completeness In 2018 we carried out an analysis of the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers in Northern Ireland . That research showed that over one in four eligible voters in Northern Ireland were not correctly registered at their current address. The parliamentary register was 74% complete and 80% accurate The local government register was 73% complete and 80% accurate We highlighted in that report that the scheduled canvass would be a timely opportunity to improve the quality of the registers. Online electoral registration This was the first canvass carried out since the introduction of the online electoral registration system in Northern Ireland in 2018. Online registration provides an additional channel for people to respond to the canvass and is a much easier and quicker process. However, paper applications continued to be available for anyone wishing to apply to register to vote this way. Retaining names on the electoral register The law allows the Chief Electoral Officer, in certain circumstances where there has been no response to the canvass or the response was incomplete, to retain entries on the electoral register. If the Chief Electoral Officer is satisfied that available data accurately places the person at the correct address, then their entry can be retained for a period of up to two years. Since the last canvass, the EONI has expanded its use of and the range of data sets for data matching. The EONI have access to a range of databases from agencies including the Business Services Organisation, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. This data is also used by the Chief Electoral Officer to verify information provided in applications to register to vote.

High Street Voucher Scheme

The 'High Street Scheme' was delivered by the Department for the Economy, as part of a series of Covid-19 recovery schemes. The scheme offered people in Northern Ireland a 'Spend Local' £100 prepaid MasterCard to spend in local businesses. The scheme was not connected to the canvass or registering to vote, but some Northern Ireland Executive Ministers linked eligibility for the scheme to being registered to vote. While being on the electoral register was not part of the eligibility criteria, the electoral register was one of a number of data sets used to check applications.

Delivering the canvass

The canvass of electors in Northern Ireland started on 1 July 2021 and ran until the revised electoral register was published by the Chief Electoral Officer on 1 December 2021. The EONI, led by the Chief Electoral Officer, is responsible for managing the canvass. The Electoral Commission supported the canvass by running a voter registration campaign. Ahead of the canvass opening, the EONI sent an information leaflet to all households in Northern Ireland, to raise awareness of the coming canvass. After the canvass opened on 1 July, the EONI contacted all households through another information leaflet encouraging people to register to vote online at the gov.uk/registertovote website . A number of mailshots continued through to September 2021 to raise awareness of the need to register during the canvass. Alongside this, in July, pre-populated registration forms were sent to Northern Ireland Housing Executive tenants and electors aged over 75, to support paper-based registrations. The EONI also set up registration support services in a number of local council areas to assist both online and paper applications. This included digital kiosks placed in council facilities and registration clinics where EONI staff were available to answer queries and assist in completing applications. For those people who did not respond to the household leaflets, the EONI sent personally addressed letters to all individuals from September. At the same time, canvassers visited households to encourage registration applications from non-responders and these visits continued throughout October. A further personally addressed letter was sent at the end of October to all remaining non-responders that EONI had identified as potential removals from the electoral register. Alongside this, the EONI worked with the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations & Assessment, the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority and a range of education and voluntary sector organisations to encourage registration among traditionally under-registered groups.

Electoral Commission

In parallel to EONI's activities, we ran a multimedia voter registration campaign from 1 July to 23 October 2021 to support the canvass. Our campaign reminded everyone that the register was being updated and that they shouldn't ignore the canvass - even if they had been registered before. Our advertising ran on TV, billboards, video on demand (catch-up TV), radio, websites, press and social media. The digital aspects of our campaign were delivered in four bursts, with the campaign reviewed and optimised using live data on response rates provided by the EONI. We also worked with a range of partners to target those groups we know are less likely to be registered and those who face additional barriers to registering. Key findings On 1 December 2021 the revised electoral register contained a total of 1,368,091 entries, representing approximately 93% of the eligible electorate. The constituency with the highest estimated registration rate was Foyle at 96.5% and the lowest was Belfast South at 76.4%. Levels of registration generally increase with age with under 20s having the lowest estimated levels of registration at only 57%, compared with 88% and over for all other age ranges. The new electoral register On 1 December 2021 the revised electoral register was published by the Chief Electoral Officer. It contained a total of 1,368,091 entries, representing approximately 93% of the eligible electorate. This calculation is made using the available estimate for the population aged 17 and over although it cannot account for other eligibility criteria, such as nationality. The calculation also assumes that, at the conclusion of the canvass, the register had a very high level of accuracy (nearly everyone on the register was registered at their correct, current address). This approach, used for the purposes of assessing levels of registration in this report, is therefore not a precise estimate of register completeness but it serves as a rough proxy for levels of registration in Northern Ireland at the conclusion of the canvass. At the conclusion of the canvass, 162,067 registered electors had not responded to any of the contacts from the Chief Electoral Officer. Non-response varied across constituencies with the lowest level (9.8%) in Lagan Valley and the highest (16.2%) in Belfast South. Of the total non-responders, 48,553 (30% of non-responders) were removed from the Northern Ireland register. These were entries where no response was received and no match could be found for the individuals in the other government administrative data sets available to the Chief Electoral Officer. The remaining 113,514 non-responding electors could be matched using available data sets and have been retained on the register, with further follow up contacts from the Electoral Office to try to encourage response before the end of the two-year period they can be retained for. Responding to the canvass The number of applications made to register to vote during the canvass varied substantially over time. As would be expected, variation in applications correlated with key events and activity that took place during the canvass. This included EONI communications to households, and announcements surrounding the 'Spend Local' £100 prepaid MasterCard. Applications also correlate with our advertising campaign which delivered significant reach across Northern Ireland, with the average adult having more than 12 opportunities to see or hear it. Figure 1: Number of applications to register to vote, 1 July 2021 to 13 October 2021 As figure 1 shows, there were over 215,000 online applications to register to vote during the first seven days of the canvass. During this time, EONI sent an information leaflet to all households encouraging them to register online, and the Electoral Commission's advertising campaign ran across TV, radio and online channels. Following this initial period of activity, online application figures declined, stabilising for the next three weeks at mostly below 10,000 daily applications. On 29 July there was a spike in applications, with over 51,000 applications made in one day, the largest daily figure for the canvass to that point. This rise in applications occurred on the same day the Economy Minister announced that the 'Spend Local' £100 prepaid MasterCard voucher scheme would launch in September and that applications would be checked against the electoral register. Over the next two weeks, almost half a million online applications to register to vote were made, more than the total number of online applications for the first four weeks of the canvass. The sustained rise in applications from 29 July to 12 August correlates with significant media commentary surrounding the scheme, EONI contacting households for a third time with an information leaflet and the Electoral Commission's advertising campaign running on TV, online and outdoor channels. From the end of August targeted mailshots and door-to-door canvassing of non-responders to the canvass resulted in a steady stream of applications to register with just over 225,000 applications made throughout September. Who is on the new electoral register Variations in registration The constituency with the highest estimated registration rate was Foyle at 96.5% and the lowest was Belfast South at 76.4%. For local authority areas, the highest registration rate was Derry and Strabane (97.1%) and the lowest Belfast (86.7%). Figure 2: Percentage registration rate per constituency (17+) masks some more significant variation at ward level. By ward, the percentage of the electorate estimated to be registered varies from approximately 31.1% in the Botanic ward in Belfast South to 108.4% in the Ballycolman ward in the West Tyrone constituency. There are 46 wards where the estimated registration rate is over 100% and this highlights the limitations of this method of calculating registration rates.

The population figures provided by the 2011 census are estimates and may over- or understate the true population from area to area. However, while the specific percentage registered figure should be treated with caution, the figures are useful in illustrating the overall range. Age profile Data held on electors' dates of birth allow for an analysis of the age profile of the registered electorate. As figure 3 shows, consistent with previous research, levels of registration generally increase with age. As with other analysis in this report, the use of estimated population figures means that some percentages are greater than 100%. Therefore the percentages should be treated with caution and are most useful for illustrating a trend, not establishing specific levels of registration. Figure 3: Percentage registration rate by age Table: Percentage registration rate by age Table: Percentage registration rate by age

Age Percentage 90+ 90% 85 to 89 98% 80 to 84 98% 75 to 79 102% 70 to 74 98% 65 to 69 101% 60 to 64 101% 55 to 59 96% 50 to 54 93% 45 to 49 91% 40 to 44 96% 35 to 39 94% 30 to 34 89% 25 to 29 88% 20 to 24 88% 17 to 19 57% Key findings - part 3 While the trend is similar to previous findings it is worth noting that the estimated levels of registration are higher for many age bands than those seen after the 2013 canvass. For example, in 2013 the estimated registration rate only rose above 80% at age 30 and above. Similarly, registration levels of 90%+ were seen among the 50+ age groups in 2013 compared to 35+ in 2021. However, the estimated level of registration for the under 20s was higher in 2013 (64%) than we see in 2021 (57%). Retained and removed electors The number of retained electors, as a proportion of the 1 December electorate, also varied across constituencies. The largest proportions were retained in the Belfast West and Foyle constituencies with 11% and 10.8% retained. The smallest proportions were in Lagan Valley and East Antrim with 6.2% and 6.5% retained respectively. At ward level, there were two wards where 20% of the December 2021 register were retained – Botanic ward in Belfast South and Ballysaggart in Fermanagh and South Tyrone. There was also variation in the proportions removed from the register with the largest proportion removed in Belfast South (6.2% of the July 2021 register) and the smallest in Mid Ulster (2.6%). In five wards (three in Belfast South) more than 10% of the July 2021 register was removed when the December 2021 register was published. This likely reflects the higher population movement in these areas. The overall split between retained and removed non-responders was 70% to 30% but this was different for EU citizens where the split was 60% retained and 40% removed. The difference could likely be the result of less data being held on EU citizens some of whom may be only temporarily resident in Northern Ireland.

Conclusions It is a significant achievement that the electoral register is the largest ever recorded in Northern Ireland, with over 1.36 million people registered to vote. However the canvass in its current format is not an efficient tool for helping to maintain an accurate and complete electoral register - both for the Chief Electoral Officer and for electors. As such we recommend that the Government should reform the canvass and wider electoral registration process in Northern Ireland. Lessons from the canvass It is a significant achievement that the electoral register is the largest ever recorded in Northern Ireland, with over 1.36 million people registered to vote. While it may be assumed that levels of register accuracy and completeness will have improved, we are not currently able to outline the exact impact the canvass has had. We will carry out a full analysis of the registers at the end of this year and report on our findings in 2023. It is not possible to isolate the impact of specific public communications tactics on the response to the canvass. While EONI's communications with households and the Electoral Commission's advertising campaign will both have encouraged many people to register to vote, the 'Spend Local' scheme may have had the most significant impact. What is clear, however, is that the canvass in its current format is not an efficient tool for helping to maintain an accurate and complete electoral register - both for the Chief Electoral Officer and for electors. The Chief Electoral Officer has advised us that the total cost of the canvass was approximately £3.23m. The majority of these costs were driven by the fact that EONI was required to contact and receive a response from all eligible electors, even if they were registered before the canvass and their details had not changed. As we outlined in our assessment of the 2018 electoral registers, it seems likely that the current registration system continues to struggle with population movement in the period between each canvass. This is evident from the fact that many of the wards with the lowest registration rates are in areas with the most mobile populations, such as the Botanic ward in Belfast South, with an estimated registration rate of only 31.1%. The findings also show that age remains a significant factor in rates of registration, with under 20s having the lowest estimated levels of registration at only 57%. These trends are seen across much of our research across the UK, including our recent assessment of the 2018 electoral registers in Northern Ireland. As such we continue to recommend that there should be fundamental changes to modernise the registration system in Northern Ireland. There are a number of ways this may be achieved, including: making better use of data for more targeted canvass activity integrating electoral registration into other public service transactions automatic or automated registration Making better use of data for more targeted canvass activity The Chief Electoral Officer already has access to a number of good quality databases from agencies including the Business Services Organisation, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. Access to this data currently allows the Chief Electoral Officer to verify information provided in applications to register to vote, as well as to identify people whose personal details may have changed or who are not on the electoral register. The Chief Electoral Officer has advised us that by comparing data from the BSO and DWP against the electoral register, a name and address match could be made with 85% of electors already on the register before the canvass commenced. This is largely consistent with results from the reformed data matching process that has been used for the annual canvass in Great Britain since 2020. For example, from July to September 2021, 75% of properties received a match where the Electoral Registration Officer (ERO) was satisfied that there are no changes needed and had no reason to believe that there are any additional electors to be added. In Great Britain, in such circumstances, contact is made with the residents of the matched household inviting them to provide information about any changes to the people who are resident at that address. If there are no changes then no response is required. This allows EROs to target their canvass activity towards properties where the data suggests there may be a change to the information the EROs currently holds. If the data suggests there has been a change, a response is required and the EROs must make a minimum of three attempts to obtain a response. While there are some differences in legislative and administrative processes for electoral registration in Northern Ireland the data held by EONI could potentially be used in a similar way to that in Great Britain. For example, allowing the Chief Electoral Officer to carry out a pre-canvass match between the electoral register and the available datasets would be a simple but effective way to reform and improve the process. This would also enable more targeted canvass activity that could allow resources to be better used to reach under-registered groups. It could also transform the canvass process by ensuring eligible electors can be retained on the register without increasing the risk of inaccuracy. In doing so this would remove the requirement to re-register for the majority of electors who remain eligible and whose personal details have not changed. This would contribute to a more cost-effective canvass that delivers improved value for money. We therefore recommend that the Government should reform the canvass process in Northern Ireland. The use of data already plays a key role in the provision of services across the public and private sectors, to the benefit of the public and in the delivery of efficiencies. There is opportunity to explore – with the support of the Chief Electoral Officer, the Commission, data providers and the wider electoral community – how making better use of the existing data already available to help manage the register could improve the delivery of canvass.

Integrating electoral registration into other public service transactions would make it easier for individuals to keep their registration details up to date and accurate when they change their name or address. It would help to address the challenge the current system has in dealing with population movement, as it would provide opportunities for those who have recently moved to complete an electoral registration application simultaneously as part of, or alongside, accessing other public services. Our findings from a series of feasibility studies , published in 2019, explored how electoral registration reforms could be delivered in practice. We examined the extent to which electoral registration applications could be made simultaneously as part of or alongside accessing other public services – for example, by allowing a person to apply to register to vote when making a driving licence or passport application. We found that this would increase the number of channels available to citizens and improve the accessibility of the process. Our studies highlighted for example that in Canada, most government forms feature an optional checkbox for eligible voters to share information with Elections Canada, while in the USA voter registration is integrated with driving licence application, renewal, and change of address processes. Automatic or automated registration Alongside this we continue to recommend that the UK Government explores options for introducing automatic or automated registration. Automatic registration would see individuals added to the electoral register, or have their details updated, based on trusted data and without them being required to take any active steps. A system of automated registration would see reliable data providing the basis of an individual's electoral registration application, but would still require individuals to take some steps to complete the process. More automated and automatic forms of registration could be used to address the challenges of encouraging registration amongst those less likely to be correctly registered, such as the under 20s, the group identified in this report as the least likely to be registered. For example, EONI could be enabled to use available data from schools and colleges, alongside data from the Department for Work and Pensions, to automatically register young people when they are given their National Insurance number. Our feasibility studies concluded that both automated and automatic registration could be implemented in technical terms, without radically altering the structure of the current electoral registration system. You are in the section Home Introduction Everyone should be able to register and vote without facing barriers. They should be able to vote on their own and in secret. While there have been significant improvements, we know there is still more to be done to improve the voting experience for disabled people. Their voting rights are not always communicated in an accessible way, some do not have the support they need when registering to vote or voting and others face barriers when they go to a polling station or vote by post. Changes we want to see We're calling on the UK's governments, political parties and those who run elections to make voting more accessible for all. The UK's governments must: make changes to election forms so that they're easier to understand give disabled people more ways to vote Political parties must: make sure their information is easy to read and understand make sure they send their information in good time so everyone can read it publish accessible versions of manifestos at the same time as other versions People running elections must: make registering to vote and voting more accessible make helplines more accessible. It's not always clear what people need to do next support anyone who needs help to vote What's available now We make sure that everyone can register to vote and that they have a good experience of voting. We provide accessible information on registering to vote and voting, and easy read guides. We provide guidance for returning officers to use to make their polling stations accessible. about what's available now for those with access needs The Elections Act 2022 made changes to what help is available to people voting in a polling station. These changes will apply to UK parliamentary general elections, Northern Ireland Assembly and local elections, Police and Crime Commissioner elections in England and Wales, and local elections in England. about the changes in the UK Elections Act . Under the Elections Act 2022, we will have a duty to provide guidance to Returning Officers (ROs) on the requirement to provide reasonable equipment to assist disabled voters in polling stations. View our guidance Report on accessibility of elections In 2017, we published a report about the experiences of disabled people at the 2017 general election. This was in response to the UK government's call for evidence on how disabled people experience registering to vote and voting. Comment on an application You are in the section Home First published: 3 June 2019 Last updated: 9 March 2020 Overview of commenting on an application You can comment on a particular name, description or emblem as part of our assessment process. You must say whether the name, description or emblem does or does not meet the criteria for registration and the reasons why. When you make your comment, you need to consider the criteria for registration. If you do not refer to one or more of them in your comment, we will not consider it. Criteria for registering a party name, descriptions or emblems We cannot register a name, description or emblem which: is likely to mislead voters is the same as another registered name, description or emblem which is on the same register is the same as a name, description or emblem from a de-registered party which was on the same register and is protected voters might confuse with another party name, description or emblem that is already registered or protected is likely to contradict or hinder voting instructions or guidance given for voting is obscene or offensive contains certain prohibited words is or contains an acronym or abbreviation that is not well known or widely used and not spelt out links in any way to online material or refers to online content contains a reference to a person's name unless it is a person directly associated with your party has an emblem that contains text which cannot be read at the size emblems appear on ballot papers (2cm square) is longer than six words is not in Roman script (i.e. Latin alphabet) is likely to amount to an offence if published What we mean by mislead voters Mislead voters We look at whether a name, description or emblem might cause a voter to either vote in a way they did not intend (for example, for a party other than their preferred party) or to mark their ballot paper in a way which was not their intention. We will reject a name, description or emblem if we believe a voter might make a mistake on their ballot paper which would invalidate their vote, for example voting for too many candidates. What we mean by confuse Confuse We look at whether the name, description or emblem is visually the same, (for example the words 'stationary' or 'stationery', similar images of boats or design elements) or contextually the same (for example 'Party of the Oak' and 'The Oak Party'). What we mean by offensive Offensive We assess all applications on a case by case basis, but we are likely to reject a name, description or emblem on grounds of offensiveness if, in our opinion, it: contains offensive language or terminology links something generally accepted to be offensive with a particular group of people We take into account that parties must be able to express their political views and a voter must use a ballot paper in order to exercise their right to vote. We also consider the context and circumstances in which a name, description or emblem can be used. What we mean by prohibited words Prohibited words Applies to words in singular, plural and in other languages. 1. Her Majesty, His Majesty, King, Queen, Prince, Princess, Duke, Duchess, Royal, Royalty These words cannot be used on their own. You can use these in conjunction with the name of a place, institution or local government area. For example, you can use 'Royal Tunbridge Wells' but not 'Royal Forever Party'. 2. Britain, British, England, , National, Scotland, Scots, Scottish, United Kingdom, Wales, Welsh, Gibraltar, Gibraltarian, Combined region These words cannot be used on their own. You can use these with another word or expression other than the name or description of a party already registered in the relevant part of the UK. For example you cannot register 'One Big Party' if there was an already registered 'One Big Party'. 3. Independent, Official, Unofficial These words cannot be used on their own. You can use these if the word is used with another word or expression but not: an existing registered name or description or only with the word

'Party' (for example 'The Independent Party') or another of these words in this group. 4. Ratepayers, Residents, Tenants These words cannot be used on their own. You can use these in conjunction with the name of a local government or geographical area. For example, you can use 'Residents of York Party' but not 'Residents Action Group'. Welcome and introductions Scott Martin (SXM) welcomed those present and introductions were made. Sue Bruce (SB) informed the panel that Roseanna Cunningham and Chris Ruane had joined the Electoral Commission as the Nominated Commissioner for the Scottish National Party and Nominated Commissioner for the Labour Party, respectively. Sal Naseem had also been appointed as an adviser to the board. Matters arising (SXM) requested a minor correction be made to the previous minutes and for the survey of Returning Officers on e-counting at the May 2022 elections mentioned by James Newman at the last meeting to be circulated to the panel. Action: 1. EC correct minute 2. SG to circulate survey of Returning Officers on e-counting The minutes of 16 May 2022 were approved. Agenda Item 7. was moved up the agenda as Isabel Drummond-Murray had to leave early. Scottish Boundary Commissions update Isabel Drummond-Murray (I-DM) said the first of three consultations on the Westminster boundaries had begun (ending on 5 December 2022) and encouraged participation. I-DM indicated that the Second Review of the constituencies and regions of the Scottish Parliament commenced on 1 September 2022 using election data from that date. The Commission expected to publish its provisional proposals for consultation in spring 2023. They aimed to submit a report to Scottish Ministers by 1 May 2025. If subsequently approved by the Scottish Parliament, the new boundaries would be effective at the next Scottish Parliament election, expected in May 2026. Report on the Scottish council elections 2022 Sarah Mackie (SM) gave an overview of the findings of the report which had been circulated to the panel on 21 September 2022. She said that, in general, the elections had been well run with high levels of voter satisfaction but said there was work to take forward regarding spoiled ballot figures, candidate abuse, staffing and accessibility. Others contributed to the discussion highlighting areas where the administration of the elections had been well delivered and areas where opportunities for improvement existed. SXM said the recording of rejection of ballot papers required a more developed approach, more suited to STV and should be reviewed. He suggested that where someone marks multiple 'X's on the ballot paper for the same party candidates, a solution could be a fraction of the person's vote should be attributed to each of the candidates they had indicated a preference for. Elections Act implementation Code of Practice for campaigners - SM said the Electoral Commission was currently reviewing and updating the code of conduct for campaigners for reserved elections to ensure it reflected the new offences in the Elections Act 2022 which included prohibiting campaigners from handling postal votes and safeguarding the secrecy of postal voting. Some minimal changes were planned to the code for devolved elections in Scotland and Wales so that the reserved and devolved versions were as similar as possible. She asked that parties nominate someone from the team with whom they can liaise during this review process. It was expected to formally consult the Panel on a revised code early next year and to have the updated code ready in the autumn of 2023. Digital Imprint Guidance - SM encouraged responses to a consultation on digital imprint guidance which had commenced on 31 October and due to close on 19 December. The Code for non-party campaigners would also be reviewed and consulted on at the same time. Feedback from a round table event would be available at the end of November. Changes to notional spending for reserved elections would come into force from 23 November when all new parties would be obliged to provide a statement of existing assets and liabilities. Party Finance and Regulation (PFR) would be updated accordingly, and a new form issued. Public Awareness - Catherine Heggie (CHe) said the Electoral Commission would soon be publishing guidance for Electoral Registration Officers on processing Voter Authority Certificates and was working on guidance for Returning Officers and candidates. The Electoral Commission would be launching a public awareness campaign in England in January ahead of the May 2023 local elections, which would be rolled out in Scotland ahead of the next UK Parliament general election. The campaign would target voters who already had ID through a mass advertising campaign. The Commission would also be working with charities and other partners to raise awareness amongst groups who needed additional support to prepare for the change. Scotland Office/DLUHC update Consultation on the draft Strategy and Policy Statement - Hannah Standring (HS) said the Consultation on the draft Strategy and Policy statement would close on 5 December 2022 and hoped all would look at it. Jeanne Delebarre (JD) said the Consultation on the draft Strategy and Policy statement had been shared with the UK Parliament and following the consultation, the draft Statement would be subject to the approval of the UK Parliament. She said the statement would not contain provisions relating to the Commissions functions which were within competence of the Scottish Parliament or Senedd Cymru. The Act required the Secretary of State to consider the views of the Electoral Commission, the Speakers Committee on the Electoral Commission (Speaker's Committee) and the Levelling Up, Housing and Communities Committee via a statutory consultation before submitting the draft Statement for the approval of the UK Parliament. The DLHUC Select Committee and Electoral Commission had been asked to provide their views by 5 December 2022. Scottish Government update Maria McCann (MMcC) thanked everyone for their feedback on the electoral reform topics shared by the Minister at a previous meeting and said the pre-consultation was going well. They had hoped to launch the consultation by the time of this meeting, however, that had proved not to be the case but would launch the consultation before Christmas. She said the role of the group was fundamental and hoped that a focused discussion could be held at the next meeting. The consultation period would be at least 14 weeks. Royal Mail update Rachel Winham (RW) indicated to the Panel that Royal Mail in relation to by-elections was working with local authorities, Returning Officers and

Electoral Registration Officers to manage their way around recent and forthcoming strike action, and to date, had been successful. Electoral Management update Chris Highcock (CHi) said the EMB review of the 5 May 2022 elections had found that less experienced parties and candidates had difficulty in completing the home address form. The EMB would work with the Electoral Commission and parties to increase understanding of how nomination forms should be completed, as well as when and how they should be submitted. They would, working with the Electoral Commission, look at how to reduce rejected ballot rates through public awareness. Also, they intended to review how to maintain a resilient and robust pool of staff who worked on the election. CHi was asked and agreed to share the EMBs review of the elections document. Pete Wildman (PW) said the annual canvass was progressing smoothly and new registers would be published by 1 December. The EROs would review their handling of the canvass post 1 December. SXM requested that any learning points be shared. The Voter Authentication Certificate, relevant to reserved elections in Scotland, would launch in January 2023, and EROs would work with DLHUC colleagues to ensure the system was live and workable. Scottish Government and UK Government rules around absent voters would likely diverge in Scotland and consideration needed to be given on how to handle that in the interests of the voter. Electoral Commission update CHe updated the Panel on plans for the Welcome to your Vote Week 2023, which would take place from 30 January to 5 February. The Commission would be providing resources and working with education partners to encourage schools to sign up to get involved and organise democratic education lessons and events. CHe encouraged panel members to raise awareness of the campaign. Louise Edwards (LE) said the process to revamp the now 10-12-year-old Political Finance online system had not gone as planned and the Commission was no longer satisfied this was value for money. The new approach adopted an off the shelf product, it would be easier, quicker and more compatible with what the parties use. In the meantime, investment in the current system would increase capacity and give parties and candidates a better experience until the new system was built. SXM noted that parties' input on the development of the system had been captured. LE to consider how best to share that with parties. Sue Bruce (SB) said the Audit Committee of the Electoral Commission was working with the team and the key emphasis was sustaining the current system until the new one was available. Dates of future meetings Andy O'Neill (AON) suggested the panel meet for two meetings in 2023; one late February/early March and one in October but these could be moved/expanded upon to suit events. AOCB AON informed the Panel that Kelsey Gillies had been appointed to take up the post of Senior Officer, Regulation and Campaigns, Scotland from next week and would be engaging with the parties thereafter.

Wales (devolved) annual report 2021/22 You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 On this page Overview Key achievements Performance analysis Looking ahead Governance First published: 1 August 2022 Last updated: 1 August 2022 Overview Overview This section provides an overview of our work on devolved matters in Wales, our purpose, our performance during the last year and the key risks to achieving our goals. We have included summary financial information within the performance report. This is consistent with the financial statements, where more detail is available. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) established the Electoral Commission. We are independent of government and political parties and directly accountable to the UK, Scottish and Welsh parliaments. Amendments made to the Government of Wales Act 2006 by the Wales Act 2017 transferred responsibility for devolved Welsh elections and referendums from the UK Parliament to the Senedd. The Senedd Elections Wales Act 2020 set out the funding and accountability arrangements of the Electoral Commission's devolved activities in Wales. Key achievements In May 2021 we supported the successful delivery of the Senedd and Police and Crime Commissioner elections, working with the Wales Electoral Coordination Board to provide advice and guidance for those running and contesting the polls. We ran a mass-media voter registration campaign, and provided other voter information – including political literacy materials through schools – to support voter participation and confidence We provided expert advice and an evaluation plan on the Welsh government's plans for pilots at the May 2022 elections. We responded to a Welsh Government request for our views on the UK Government's Elections Bill and Legislative Consent Memorandum, and contributed to the work of the Special Purpose Committee on Senedd Reform. We appeared before the Llywydd's Committee to give evidence as part of its scrutiny of the 2022/23 financial estimate and accompanying 5-year corporate plan. Performance analysis Measure Performance Work with the Scottish Parliament and Senedd to implement our new accountability arrangements, including a new funding formula and business plans for Scotland and Wales Completed We comment on 100% of relevant legislation and policy proposals 100% Achieved Further specific performance measures for Wales are being developed and will become operational in 2022-23. Looking ahead While elections in Wales are well run and our survey work shows high levels of public satisfaction in the processes in place for voters to register and cast their votes, challenges still remain. To support more newly enfranchised voters across Wales to become involved in Welsh democracy, we will extend the reach and impact of our education programme ahead of the Welsh local government elections in 2022 and Senedd election in 2026. We want to build on the work already achieved by engaging further with partner organisations across Wales to educate young people about the democratic process and to prepare educators to teach political literacy with confidence. We will support parties and campaigners to comply with the law, while continuing to ensure political finance is transparent. We will support Returning Officers and electoral administrators to help them meet the challenges they face in delivering well-run electoral services and adapt to the increasingly diverse approach to the way elections are delivered, brought about by devolution and the changing needs of voters. We will work closely with the Senedd and Welsh Government as they introduce new primary legislation to bring into effect plans for both Senedd and electoral reforms. We will, through our work with the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, seek to ensure that the views of Returning Officers and s are taken into account in the development of this new legislation. Underpinning our five-year plan is the requirement to provide value for money and maintain a well-run organisation. The plan incorporates a renewed focus on equality, diversity and inclusion, and is designed to encourage staff engagement, development of skills and use of the technology required to support effective ways of working and continuous learning and improvement. We look forward to working constructively with the Welsh Government, Senedd, other UK governments and parliaments, parties and campaigners, electoral administrators and other interested groups to maintain voter confidence in our electoral system. Commitment to EDI As noted above we have taken significant steps to refresh our approach to Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI), including producing and consulting on a new EDI Strategy. As a key part of this work, we are committed to the principle that in its conduct of public business and provision of resources and services, the Welsh and languages should be treated on a basis of equality. During 2021/22, we undertook important work with regard to the Welsh language. This has led to further improvement in the service we provide to partners in Wales in the language of their choice and to ensuring that the Welsh Language Standards, set in July 2016, are not only met, but that we are innovative and ambitious in the services that we provide. Using resources During 2021/22 we utilised £1.65m of resources from the £1.75m available. This was predominately for staffing £1.15m (69.69%) and Campaigns £0.50m (27%); the remaining amounts represent the Senedd contribution to common activities and corporate overheads. The underspend is due to savings in design and print of guidance materials, digital transparency campaigns and depreciation. Governance Accountability to the Senedd While the Electoral Commission has regularly reported to both the Scottish and Welsh parliaments in relation to our role at devolved elections, formal accountability (through legislation) has previously only been to the UK Parliament, specifically to the Speaker's Committee of the House of Commons. From 1 April 2021 the Commission became formally accountable to, and received funding from, the Senedd in respect of its functions in relation to devolved Welsh elections and referendums. The Commission reports to the Llywydd's Committee which was established for this purpose and works to the "Statement of Funding Principles". In the autumn we submitted our first set of estimates to both the Scottish and Welsh parliaments enabling the UK Treasury to transfer the agreed level of funding to the Welsh Consolidated Fund and the Scottish Parliament. These processes will ensure all parliaments can be confident in scrutinising our work plans and accounts in the coming years. Funding and financial governance Commission expenditure on devolved matters is payable out of the Welsh Consolidated Fund, following the Senedd and Elections (Wales) Act 2020. However Section 129 of the Government of Wales Act 2006 lists the bodies to which payments can be made from the Welsh Consolidated Fund. It does not include the Electoral Commission. Therefore, the Welsh Government has agreed to undertake the administrative function for drawing down funding and paying it to the Commission on behalf of the Senedd. As part of preparing the Governance Statement and Accounts for the Welsh Government and the Fund, the Permanent Secretary will formally write to the Electoral Commission Accounting Officer to seek a general assurance in respect of the systems of internal control. This is to ensure the propriety and regularity of funding provided from the Welsh Government budget and payable from the Fund.

Codes of Practice on spending by candidates and political parties at elections to the Scottish Parliament: a consultation You are in the Our consultations section

Home Our consultations On this page How to respond Introduction What this consultation is for Explaining the Codes of Practice Download the Codes The consultation First published: 15 April 2020 Last updated: 28 July 2020 How to respond This consultation closed on 15 July 2020. We will consider the responses we received and publish our response soon. Introduction Elections legislation enables us to prepare Codes of Practice about election spending for political parties and candidates. We have previously drafted and consulted on Codes of Practice for elections that fall within the remit of UK Parliament and the Senedd in Wales. The Scottish Elections (Reform) Bill, currently going through the Scottish Parliament, will after Royal Assent extend our powers to make candidate Codes for devolved Scottish elections. A Code of Practice is a statutory document that provides detailed practical guidance on how to comply with legal obligations. Our aims in preparing the Codes are: to provide guidance for candidates, their agents and political parties about what items of spending count towards the spending limits and are to be reported to provide enhanced clarity to political parties and candidates about when spending (including notional spending) should be in a candidate return and when it should be in a party return to ensure that there is clarity and consistency in the reporting of spending, including digital campaigning by parties and candidates The Codes we are consulting on will apply to elections to the Scottish Parliament. These Codes set out what is and isn't included in the categories of spending for elections that are listed in the legislation. The Codes also allow us to give guidance on the cases and circumstances when spending will be regarded as for the purposes of a candidate's election. Once finalised, the Codes will be presented to Scottish Ministers for approval (with or without modification), before being laid before the Scottish Parliament for approval. When in force, political parties and candidates must have regard to the Codes, particularly when organising their campaigns and when completing their spending returns after an election. Following the Codes will provide parties and candidates with a statutory defence. We would welcome views on the draft Codes. We invite comment in particular from those who will need to have regard to the Codes once in force. What this consultation is for . Codes of practice for Scottish Parliament elections We have the power under Schedule 8, paragraph 3 Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act (PPERA) 2000, to prepare a Code for political parties on what does and does not fall in Part 1 of that Schedule. The Scottish Elections (Reform) Bill, currently going through the Scottish Parliament will, once law, provide the Commission with the power to draft a Code of Practice for candidates at devolved Scottish elections. To ensure that our aims in preparing the Codes are achieved, we are consulting with Scottish Government, political parties and other stakeholders from across the electoral community. Once the consultation process is completed and we have made any necessary changes to the Codes, they will be presented to Scottish Ministers for approval, and then will be laid before the Scottish Parliament. The Codes we are currently consulting on are for elections to the Scottish Parliament and will not apply to other elections. Other Codes of Practice and consultations We have previously prepared Codes of Practice for political parties and candidates for UK Parliamentary elections and other elections that fall under the remit of UK Parliament. We have also consulted on Codes for elections under the remit of the Senedd in Wales. These Scottish Codes have been drafted taking account of the consultation responses and feedback we received from Governments, political parties and other stakeholders, in our previous consultations. Our aim is to ensure that the Codes are applied consistently, so far as possible, in elections across GB and Northern Ireland.

Explaining the Codes of Practice

How election spending works

Spending by parties and candidates in the lead up to elections is regulated. The law places separate limits on how much candidates and parties can spend on campaigning. There are also controls on who can incur and pay for spending to make sure election spending is within the legal limits.

Candidates at an election to the Scottish Parliament can stand as a candidate in a constituency, or as a candidate on a regional list, or they can do both if the constituency is located within the region where they are standing. Candidates that stand in a constituency and on a regional list are known as 'dual candidates'. Campaign spending promoting the regional list candidates counts towards the party campaign spending limit and must be reported in the party return. Spending promoting the constituency candidate counts toward the separate candidate limit. There may be some instances where campaign material promotes both the regional list candidates and a constituency candidate. In these instances, campaign spending may need to be split between the candidate return and the party return. Sometimes candidates make use of items their supporters (such as their party or a non-party campaigner) have transferred or made available to them at less than market value. The law requires an amount to be treated as spending by the candidate. This is called 'notional spending'. A candidate's notional spending must be included in their spending return. A similar rule applies to parties. A party's notional spending must be reported in the party return. Parties and candidates are required to report spending within certain categories. These categories are set out in the legislation. Some of the categories for parties and candidates are the same and some are different. For example both sets of rules include categories called 'advertising' and 'unsolicited material'. However, the rules for political parties have additional separate categories for 'party political broadcasts' and 'manifestos'.

The Codes set out what should be included in each category of spending, as well as listing what isn't included. The Codes are designed to give illustrative examples rather than an exhaustive list. In particular, the Codes seek to address:

- the circumstances when something should be in a candidate return and when something should be reported by a political party
- how to account for spending that promotes dual candidates (a candidate standing in both a constituency and in an electoral region)

Why we are making the Codes

In writing these Codes we have drawn on our experience of regulating elections and reviewing spending returns. We learnt a lot from the feedback we received on the UK and Welsh Codes. We asked parties about their experiences and incorporated their views. We want to gather more feedback through this consultation. The aim of the Codes is to ensure that the rules are as clear and comprehensive as possible. This should make it easier for candidates and parties to comply with the law. This will improve transparency, fairness, and consistency, and therefore improve public and campaigner confidence.

For example:

- The Codes will promote consistency in reporting, so everyone knows what to expect in a spending return of a candidate or party.
- Parties and candidates should find it easier to comply with the law and this should make it easier for people to compare returns and spending, and check that the rules are being followed.

In turn, this will increase transparency of election spending. Given the commentary around spending on digital campaigning at elections, the Codes are one way we are able to be clear where money spent on digital campaigning at elections should be reported. Since these are statutory Codes, having been approved by the Scottish Parliament, they will create an enforceable framework of how election spending law will be applied. This strengthens the regulatory framework of spending at elections. Download the Codes The consultation We are seeking your views on whether we have achieved our stated aims. Please answer the questions in your consultation response. You are welcome to send us any comments you may have outside of the questions we have asked. The language in the Codes The Codes are a piece of statutory guidance. They will be laid before the Scottish Parliament. This means we need to use formal language. However we also want the Codes to be easy to read and understand. Deciding where to account for an item of spending Candidate spending and party spending The political party and candidate Codes are intended to give clear guidance as to what should be in a candidate spending return and what should be in a party spending return. The candidate Code explains when something is candidate spending. You can find this section on pages 9 to 12 of the candidate Code under the heading, "When will expenses be regarded as incurred for the purposes of a candidate's election?" This will help the candidate and their agent know what counts as candidate spending. It will also help parties with knowing what is not candidate spending, and needs to be reported as party spending. This will include any spending by the party to promote regional party list candidates. In elections to the Scottish Parliament, some campaign materials will encourage voters both to vote for a constituency candidate, and to vote for a political party in the regional elections using their second vote. Therefore, while some campaign activity can be regarded as used wholly for the purposes of the candidate's election in a constituency, in other circumstances the costs of campaign material will need to be split between the candidate and the party. The Codes will provide guidance on when to apportion costs between the two spending returns. Under our powers to draft Codes of Practice, we are limited in what we are able to include in the Codes about splitting spending between the candidate and party return. So we will provide further guidance on how to split spending alongside the Codes. The candidate Code also explains how to account for spending which promotes dual candidates (where a candidate stands both in a constituency, and on a regional party list). Examples in the Codes The draft Codes currently include specific examples for illustration purposes. These can be found set out in the boxes on pages 10 to 12 of the candidate Code and pages 9 to 10 of the party Code. Investigations On this page The decision to investigate What our investigation found

In February 2017 the Commission became aware of reports suggesting that services had been provided to Leave.EU by the US data analytics firm Cambridge Analytica and the US campaign strategist firm Goddard Gunster. Leave.EU did not report spending on either. Any services provided at no cost would have constituted a donation from an impermissible source. An investigation was opened in April 2017. The scope of that investigation was extended as further evidence came to light. It examined: whether Leave.EU exceeded its statutory spending limit for referendum campaigning. As a registered campaigner that was not a political party and was not the designated lead for one of the referendum outcomes, it had a limit of £700,000 the accuracy of pre-poll transaction reporting of regulated transactions (loans) totalling £6m given to Leave.EU in relation to the referendum the completeness of Leave.EU's referendum campaign spending return, looking at the same transactions, the spending, and the inclusion of supporting invoices and receipts for payments over £200 Update – 11 October 2019 Leave.EU appealed against the sanctions set out in the following report. Judgments were given on the appeal by the Central London County Court: firstly on liability for the offences, on 21 March 2019, and secondly on the size of the penalties, on 8 April 2019. The Court substantively refused the appeal and confirmed all offences, but allowed parts of the appeal. It upheld three of the penalties imposed, totalling £50,000, but reduced one of the penalties from £20,000 to £16,000. Leave.EU was therefore fined £66,000 in total. It has subsequently paid these fines.

Summary of findings We made the following findings: as a non-designated campaigner, the referendum spending limit imposed by section 118(1) and Schedule 14(1)(2)(c) PPERA on Leave.EU was £700,000. Leave.EU reported spending of £693,094, which is £6,906 under the spending limit. Leave.EU failed to include a minimum of £77,380 in its spending return, which meant that it exceeded its spending limit more than 10%. We are satisfied that the actual figure was in fact greater, given the failure to report an appropriate proportion of the cost of services provided by Goddard Gunster. The responsible person for Leave.EU authorised those expenses to be incurred by or behalf of Leave.EU. We are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that she knew or ought reasonably to have known that the expenses would be incurred in excess of the spending limit on 28 April 2016 in its pre-poll transaction reports, Leave.EU reported the receipt of three regulated transactions from Mr Arron Banks totalling £6m. These were the only reported sources of funding for Leave.EU's referendum campaign. Leave.EU did not report these transactions correctly. The dates the transactions were entered into, the repayment date, the interest rate and the provider of the transactions were all incorrectly reported. These transactions were also incorrectly reported in Leave.EU's referendum spending return. While the repayment date and interest rates were correct in that return, the date the transactions were entered into and the provider were not. Variations to the transactions were also not correctly reported. Leave.EU paid for services from the US campaign strategy firm Goddard Gunster that should have been reported in its spending return but were not. Those services from Goddard Gunster were paid for before the regulated period started on 15 April 2016, but Leave.EU made use of them during the regulated period. Accordingly, a proportion of the cost of services from Goddard Gunster should have been included in Leave.EU's spending return. The Commission cannot, on the available evidence, quantify the exact proportion of this spending which should have been declared Leave.EU failed to include spending of £77,380 in its referendum spending return, being fees paid to the company Better for the Country Limited as its campaign organiser Leave.EU failed to provide the required invoice or receipt for 97 payments of over £200, totalling £80,224 Based on the evidence we have seen, we are satisfied that Leave.EU did not receive donations or paid-for services from Cambridge Analytica that should have been reported in its spending return.

Public statements from both Cambridge Analytica and Leave.EU (including its directors Mr Arron Banks and Mr Andy Wigmore) from 2016-17 implied services were being provided; however, the evidence shows that the relationship did not develop beyond initial scoping work and no contract was agreed between them. Finally, we found that it was more probable than not that Leave.EU's spending return under-stated the apportioned value of 15 payments totalling £129,720. However, the lack of clear records held by Leave.EU on how these activities were used over time meant that we could not determine beyond reasonable doubt whether the reported value was right or wrong. No offence was found in respect of these payments. The decision to investigate In February 2017 we saw media reports suggesting that services had been provided to Leave.EU by the US data analytics firm Cambridge Analytica and the US campaign strategist firm Goddard Gunster. We also received a complaint from Mr Stephen Kinnock MP on the same subject. Leave.EU's spending return did not include spending on either. Any services provided at no cost would have constituted a donation from an impermissible source. The reports and complaint drew attention to various public statements made by Leave.EU's director Mr Arron Banks, and its communications director Mr Andrew Wigmore. These included the following: A Leave.EU press release of November 2015 stating that it had hired Cambridge Analytica and Goddard Gunster A 23 December 2015 Politico.com article and a series of tweets in which Mr Banks spoke positively of the capabilities of Cambridge Analytica and stated that it had been providing services to Leave.EU A statement in February 2016 by the SCL Group, the Cambridge Analytica parent company, which said that Cambridge Analytica teamed with Leave.EU to "supercharge" Leave.EU's social media campaign leading up to the EU referendum A tweet by Mr Banks on 7 February 2016 which said "...Our campaign is being run by Gerry Gunster..." A Leave.EU press release issued on 28 June 2016 regarding Mr Banks' book The Bad Boys of Brexit which said Leave.EU was intending to "...do a big drumroll for Goddard Gunster, highlighting the accuracy of the polling, their messaging, understanding the voters..." and which went on to say: "The Leave.EU team thanks Goddard Gunster Public Affairs for its crucial strategic role of the Leave.EU campaign." According to Arron Banks, Leave.EU co-chairman, Goddard Gunster contributed significantly on a number of fronts: "They made our social media effort a massive success; providing a platform far bigger than the ones built up by either the Remain campaign or the official Vote Leave group... The end result," according to Banks, "was not just a fantastic tool for direct outreach, bypassing the broadcast and print media entirely, but an extremely useful database that Goddard Gunster was able to mine, allowing it to conduct in-depth demographic polling and recommend precision target-messaging An interview of Mr Gunster in the Washingtonian , reported on 29 June 2016, in which he stated Goddard Gunster embedded staff in the Leave.EU office in London: "My role with Leave.EU was to provide strategic advice on the mechanics of running a referendum campaign. I brought them the methodology and the science behind how best to win, based on my experience of running many ballot measure campaigns here in the U.S." A report in the Financial Times on 5 March 2017 in which Mr Wigmore stated that Leave.EU used artificial intelligence analysis, which was "...then executed by... Goddard Gunster." Various tweets by Mr Banks and Mr Wigmore both before and after the EU referendum referencing Cambridge Analytica, including Mr Banks stating that “We have made no secret of working with Cambridge” on 3 March 2017, and Mr Wigmore telling the Guardian that Cambridge Analytica taught Leave.EU to gather data from social media. We asked Leave.EU about these statements. It told us that it had been in a tendering process with Cambridge Analytica and did not engage its services when the Go Movement Limited was not designated as lead Leave campaigner. Leave.EU said it received no services or advice from Cambridge Analytica either paid or unpaid. It went on to say that Goddard Gunster did provide services, including giving advice to Mr Banks, but that advice was given and paid for prior to the referendum regulated period starting on 15 April 2016. We also raised these matters with Cambridge Analytica, which said that its relationship with Leave.EU was limited to a business development relationship for the purpose of securing a potential contract with Leave.EU in the event Go Movement Limited was designated as a lead campaigner in the referendum. Cambridge Analytica stated that it met with Leave.EU on several occasions to discuss the services it could provide, but that no work was done and no value provided to Leave.EU either paid or unpaid. Having assessed the matter in line with its Enforcement Policy, we concluded that we had reasonable grounds to suspect that Leave.EU’s referendum spending return was incorrect. In April 2017 we opened an investigation. Further information What we investigated The scope of the investigation extended as evidence came to light. The following matters were examined: whether the Leave.EU pre-poll regulated transaction reports and post poll campaign EU referendum spending return correctly reported regulated transactions it entered into prior to the EU referendum (the transactions issues) whether the Leave.EU referendum spending return was incomplete in respect of donations from or spending on services provided by Cambridge Analytica (the Cambridge Analytica issues) and Goddard Gunster (the Goddard Gunster issues) whether the same return was incomplete in respect of spending on services provided by Better for the Country Limited (the Better for the Country issues) whether the same return was otherwise incomplete in respect of all campaign payments and associated invoices or receipts (the further omitted invoices and payments issues) whether Leave.EU exceeded the spending limit of £700,000 for a non-designated, non-party registered campaigner set out in Schedule 14, paragraph 1, of PPERA (the spending limit issue) The potential offences under investigation were: failure, without reasonable excuse, to accurately declare regulated transactions in the pre-poll reports, which is an offence under paragraph 5(9)(b) of Schedule 2 of EURA failure, without reasonable excuse, to include a statement of relevant donations received in respect of the referendum, which is an offence under section 122(4)(b) of PPERA failure, without reasonable excuse, to declare spending or notional spending incurred, which is an offence under section 122(4)(b) of PPERA failure, without reasonable excuse, to provide the required supporting documentation for payments in excess of £200, which is an offence under section 122(4)(c) of PPERA incurring spending in excess of the spending limit set out in Schedule 14 of PPERA where the responsible person knew or ought to have known that the spending would exceed that limit, which is an offence under section 118(2)(c)(i) and (ii) of PPERA The relevant legal framework is set out at the end of this report. The investigation in detail Leave.EU and associated individuals In April 2017 we asked Leave.EU, Mr Banks and Mr Wigmore for information about the matters under investigation, and invited Mr Banks and Mr Wigmore to interview. Mr Banks provided some high level responses but declined an interview. Mr Wigmore did not respond. We issued statutory Investigation Notices under Schedule 19B paragraph 3 of PPERA to Leave.EU and Mr Banks, requiring them to disclose relevant material. Both Leave.EU and Mr Banks provided a significant amount of material in response. When analysing the material, we saw that Leave.EU and Mr Banks had only partially responded. Complete disclosure was made via a joint response in December 2017. In November 2017 we opened a separate investigation into the company Better for the Country Limited (company number 09609018), Mr Banks and associated entities. This investigation is ongoing. The material provided by Leave.EU and Mr Banks in that investigation raised further concerns about the completeness and accuracy of Leave.EU's referendum spending return, and its regulated transaction pre-poll reports. We told Leave.EU that the scope of the investigation had been expanded, and asked for relevant information. Leave.EU responded in February 2018. Engagement with other organisations During the investigation we contacted Cambridge Analytica and Goddard Gunster. Cambridge Analytica gave us substantial material in response to its questions. Goddard Gunster provided us with some of the information it asked for but said that it thought our request for documents was unreasonable. It also said that a confidentiality agreement was in place between it and Leave.EU so it couldn't provide anything further. We did not agree with these points, but continued the investigation using evidence it got from other sources. Engagement with other individuals We reviewed material put into the public domain by others including those who gave evidence to the Digital Culture, Media and Sport Select Committee inquiry into fake news. During the investigation we were approached by Dr Emma Briant of Essex University, who had interviewed Mr Wigmore (Leave.EU), Brittany Kaiser (Cambridge Analytica), Mr Gunster (Goddard Gunster) and Mr Nigel Oaks (SCL Group), as part of her academic research into data analytics. We reviewed details from these interviews, but did not consider that they provided evidence of the offences under investigation.

Determinations on offences In April 2018 we were satisfied that we had sufficient evidence to make initial determinations on the offences under investigation. In line with the requirements of Schedule 19C of PPERA, we issued a statutory notice to Leave.EU setting out its initial determinations and proposing penalties. The notice invited Leave.EU to make representations within the statutory 28 day period. On 1 May 2018, Leave.EU delivered its representations in respect of the proposed penalties to us. These were considered carefully before a final determination on offences and penalties was taken. We issued our final determinations to Leave.EU on 8 May 2018.

What our investigation found The transactions issues On 28 April 2016, as part of its required pre-poll transaction reporting, Leave.EU reported receiving three regulated transactions (loans) from Mr Banks, totalling £6m. These were the only reported sources of funding for Leave.EU's referendum campaign. We found that Leave.EU failed without reasonable excuse to report these transactions correctly. The dates the transactions were entered into, the repayment date, the interest rate and the provider of the transactions were all incorrectly reported. We also found that without reasonable excuse these transactions were also incorrectly reported in Leave.EU's referendum spending return. While the repayment date and interest rates were correct in that return, the date the transactions were entered into and the provider were not. Variations to the transactions were also not correctly reported. We therefore determined that the responsible person for Leave.EU committed an offence under paragraph 5(9)(b) of Schedule 2 of EURA in respect of the pre-poll transaction report. Further, these facts form part of an offence under section 122(4)(b) in respect of the referendum campaign spending return for Leave.EU.

Evidence and analysis On 28 April 2016, Leave.EU reported entering into three regulated transactions in its pre-poll regulated transaction return. Regulated transactions reported Start date Value Nature Lender Interest Date repayable 15 March 2016

£1,000,000 Loan Mr Arron Banks 0% 31/12/2017 31 March 2016 £3,000,000 Loan Mr Arron Banks 0% 31/12/2017 21 April 2016 £2,000,000 Loan Mr Arron Banks 0% 31/12/2017 As part of our investigation in respect of BFTCL and others, we obtained the loan documentation. This made it clear the reported information was inaccurate. The transaction of £3,000,000 was according to the written agreement actually entered into on 4 September 2015. The transaction of £2,000,000 was according to its written agreement entered into on 10 March 2016. The interest rate for all three transactions was, according to the agreements, 4% above bank base rate and not 0%, and the repayment dates for all three transactions was 31 December 2016 and not 2017. The evidence also included variation agreements of the terms of the transactions, in that on 17 May 2016 the repayment dates were all amended to 31 December 2017, and the interest rate for all was amended to zero. Leave.EU stated that the discrepancy in terms of the variations arose because the changes to the terms of the transactions had been agreed in principle orally before the time the pre-poll report was prepared and delivered. It provided evidence of written instructions to its solicitor to prepare variation agreements that it said constituted the formal documentation even though agreements had not been signed at the time of reporting. The legal requirement is, however, to report them accurately at the time of reporting. The transaction agreements included a clause requiring any variations to be in writing and signed. The variations in fact took place almost three weeks after the pre-poll regulated transaction report was delivered. Further, the Commission found that the funds were not provided in lump sums but appeared to be a credit facility Leave.EU could draw down as and when required. Leave.EU states that it reported the dates the transactions were entered into as the dates on which it first drew down funds. Consequently, we were satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the transactions were not reported correctly. Further, we were satisfied that the funds reported were transferred from Rock Services Limited (company number 05960676 - a company controlled by Mr Arron Banks) to BFTCL (also controlled by Mr Banks) for use on expenditure by Leave.EU. Mr Banks was the controller of both companies, but according to Leave.EU, Rock Services Limited provided the funds on behalf of Mr Banks, acting as a proxy or third party. The reporting requirement was for both the company and Mr Banks to be identified as the provider. We were therefore satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was incorrect to report Mr Banks as the sole provider. The Cambridge Analytica issues The Cambridge Analytica issue We investigated whether Leave.EU had received services from Cambridge Analytica that: fell within the definition of referendum campaign activity should have been reported either as a donation in kind (if provided free or at less than commercial rate) or referendum spending Based on analysis of the evidence obtained during the investigation, we are satisfied that Leave.EU did not receive donations or paid-for services from Cambridge Analytica that should have been reported in its spending return. Public statements from both Cambridge Analytica and Leave.EU (including its directors Mr Banks and Mr Wigmore) from 2016-17 implied services were being provided. However, the evidence shows that the relationship did not develop beyond initial scoping work and no contract was agreed between them. Information about the activities of Cambridge Analytica continues to be disclosed. We will keep under review whether that provides evidence of involvement by Cambridge Analytica in Leave.EU's EU referendum campaign. Evidence Evidence and analysis We examined explanations and evidence provided by Cambridge Analytica, Leave.EU and Mr Banks of their working relationship in late 2015/early 2016. This included copies of correspondence, proposals for services, proposed contracts, draft speeches, presentations and other documents. We were evidence of the following interactions between Leave.EU and Cambridge Analytica: 23 October 2015 – a meeting to introduce Mr Banks to Cambridge Analytica and give an overview of its services 18 November 2015 – a press launch for Leave.EU at which a Cambridge Analytica representative agreed to sit on a panel 20 November 2015 – a meeting between Cambridge Analytica and Leave.EU's social media team 4 December 2015 – a meeting between Cambridge Analytica and Ms Bilney, the responsible person for Leave.EU 6 January 2016 – Cambridge Analytica provided Leave.EU with a proposal document setting out at a high level the nature of the work it could do for the Leave.EU campaign 8 January 2016 – a meeting between Cambridge Analytica and Leave.EU at which Cambridge Analytica presented an overview of example data analysis, a proposed plan and costings. This data was drawn from a separate entity and the analysed dataset and resulting report was not provided to Leave.EU or Mr Banks 26 February 2016 – an internal SCL Group email confirmed that no contract will be agreed with Leave.EU We saw no evidence that Cambridge Analytica had any input into Leave.EU's referendum campaign. Instead, we saw evidence that the relationship between Cambridge Analytica and Leave.EU amounted to no more than preliminary engagement of a series of meetings and presentations. These were done as a pitching exercise by Cambridge Analytica prior to April 2016 with the expectation that services would be provided to the Go Movement Limited, supported by Leave.EU, should it be designated as the lead 'leave' campaigner. Meetings were held between Cambridge Analytica and Leave.EU to discuss Cambridge Analytica's capabilities and the signing of a potential contract. However, there is no evidence a contract was entered into. Cambridge Analytica told us that the meetings and presentations it undertook were typical of non-chargeable initial work in order to assess available data and scope an analysis proposal. It explained its media statements, such as the claim by its CEO Alexander Nix on 11 February 2016 that it had helped to 'supercharge' the Leave.EU social media campaign, by saying that at this point there had still been an intention to work with Leave.EU. It said that it received repeated verbal assurances by Mr Banks and Mr Wigmore that Cambridge Analytica would be contracted, and that the statement quoted as from Mr Nix was written by "an over-zealous PR/marketing consultant". The evidence we saw showed that Cambridge Analytica attempted several times to secure a contract with no apparent confirmation provided by Mr Banks or Leave.EU. Internal correspondence from Cambridge Analytica indicates that it was concerned that Leave.EU was using the reputation of Cambridge Analytica to bolster its own credibility and was exaggerating its relationship with Cambridge Analytica. It suggested to Leave.EU further public statements toning down the extent of the working relationship in light of the lack of any contract. The Goddard Gunster issues The Goddard Gunster issues We investigated whether Leave.EU had received services from Goddard Gunster that fell within the definition of referendum campaign activity should have been reported either as a donation in kind (if provided free or at less than commercial rate), notional spending or referendum spending We are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Leave.EU did pay for services from Goddard Gunster that should have been reported in its spending return. Further, we are satisfied that the responsible person for Leave.EU failed, without reasonable excuse, to include these payments in Leave.EU's referendum spending return. Further, these facts form part of an offence under section 122(4)(b) in respect of the referendum campaign spending return for Leave.EU. Those services from Goddard Gunster were paid for in advance of the regulated period commencing on 15 April 2016, but a proportion of the benefit from them was made use of by Leave.EU during the regulated period. Accordingly, a proportion of the cost of services from Goddard Gunster should have been included in

Leave.EU's spending return. We cannot, on the available evidence, quantify the exact proportion of spending in relation to the services provided by Goddard Gunster which should have been declared, but have found that it was incorrect not to declare any of this spending as referendum expenses. Evidence Evidence and analysis On 22 September 2015 Goddard Gunster signed a contract to work for Leave.EU (under the name it was formally known as at the time, TheKnow.EU). Under this contract, Leave.EU agreed to pay £20,000 at the signing of the agreement and then £20,000 at the first of each month for the duration of the agreement. Leave.EU also agreed to reimburse any expenses incurred by Goddard Gunster. We reviewed invoices, provided by Leave.EU, that showed the company BFTCL paid Goddard Gunster, on behalf of Leave.EU and Go Movement Limited, a total of £190,000 in monthly retainer fees alone between 21 September 2015 and 1 April 2016 for 'Strategic referendum advice and counsel' and input into an application for designation as lead campaigner for the 'leave' outcome. Over and above this, and also on behalf of Leave.EU, BFTCL paid Goddard Gunster approximately £56,000 in expenses prior to the regulated period. During the investigation Leave.EU provided a number of explanations as to why it did not report any of this spending on Goddard Gunster: Leave.EU said that the advice from Goddard Gunster was largely or completely provided to Leave.EU and Mr Banks in relation to the campaign strategy of the Go Movement Ltd, and on the assumption it would be designated a lead campaigner. Therefore, the advice was largely redundant once the Go Movement Ltd was not designated and it was not used by Leave.EU during the referendum period. Leave.EU and Mr Banks described the services provided by Goddard Gunster as being high level advice which was all provided prior to the referendum period. Mr Banks, for example, said that Goddard Gunster provided: "...high level ad hoc consultancy advice from around September 2015, paid for on a retainer basis. The retainer was brought to an end once the designation decision was made and before the restricted period came into effect. The advice received was not campaign related advice, so could in no way be counted as such in the spending return." Leave.EU stated that much of the advice was provided directly to Mr Banks in a variety of capacities, and so was not necessarily all related to his capacity as a senior figure in Leave.EU and BFTCL. We accept that, on the basis of the evidence it has seen, the advice from Goddard Gunster was paid for and largely provided prior to the referendum period. However, section 117(5) of PPERA states: Where— (a) at any time before the beginning of any referendum period, any expenses within section 111(2) are incurred by or on behalf of an individual or body in respect of any property, services or facilities, but (b) the property, services or facilities is or are made use of by or on behalf of the individual or body during the referendum period in circumstances such that, had any expenses been incurred in respect of that use during that period, they would by virtue of section 111(2) have constituted referendum expenses incurred by or on behalf of the individual or body during that period, the appropriate proportion of the expenses mentioned in paragraph (a) shall be treated for the purposes of this section as referendum expenses incurred by or on behalf of the individual or body during that period. In other words, if campaigners incur expenditure prior to the regulated period and benefits obtained from that spending are made use of during the regulated period, the spending must be treated as if it was incurred during the regulated period and must therefore be reported. We considered a significant volume of material obtained from Leave.EU relating to the support provided by Goddard Gunster to Leave.EU. The evidence included emails from Mr Gunster to various Leave.EU senior officers and showed a close working relationship between Goddard Gunster, Leave.EU and Arron Banks prior to the designation decision with regular contact between the parties. Leave.EU said that Goddard Gunster's advice was relevant to a 'ground' campaign (i.e. door to door persuasion) and not to a social media campaign, which is what Leave.EU undertook following the unsuccessful Go Movement designation application. Leave.EU suggested, therefore, that any advice provided would have been rendered irrelevant following the decision to focus on a social media campaign following the designation. The advice provided by Goddard Gunster was at times general, but at other times detailed and specific. It included advice on planning a campaign, targeting of messages, identification of the most persuadable voter demographics, and comment and analysis of material provided to Goddard Gunster (including polling data). The documents included campaign plans tailored to a Go Movement Ltd/Leave.EU campaign, presumably to be conducted in the event that the Go Movement Limited was designated as a lead campaigner. Leave.EU described these documents as "...irrelevant for the purposes of the referendum."

However, we noted that they included phases marked 'complete'. We saw evidence that Goddard Gunster analysed polling data, which Leave.EU provided to him, and used it to identify key target demographics and key messages which would resonate with voters. For example, Goddard Gunster provided 'initial thoughts' for a 'systematic and phased campaign based on the research findings.' These include key 'strategic imperatives', a phased campaign plan, including 'voter identification and recruitment of likely 'leave' voters, 'Phase II: Persuasion' to 'Feed persuasion messaging' to 'soft leave and soft remain.' And 'Phase III: Final Push/GOTV'. It included messaging advice about tactics to ensure messages had the best chance of resonating with voters, provided detailed analysis of target demographics in terms of age, political views, employment and geographical location. We noted evidence demonstrating that Goddard Gunster's advice was under active consideration within Leave.EU days before the start of the regulated period. For example, internal correspondence from Leave.EU showed that on 12 April 2016 (three days before the regulated period started on 15 April 2016) senior Leave.EU individuals, including Mr Banks, Mr Wigmore and the responsible person Ms Bilney, discussed a potential campaign messaging strategy. A different senior Leave.EU official concluded that it was what Leave.EU "...should be doing under the phase coined by Gerry [Gunster] of 'persuading the persuadable'". Leave.EU then asked for Mr Gunster's advice on the proposed social media strategy. On 13 April 2016 Goddard Gunster was continuing to advise Leave.EU on campaign messaging and targeting, with specific reference to social media. On 15 April 2016, when the regulated period started, Goddard Gunster provided Leave.EU with some critique on a Vote Leave campaign advert and noting why he did not feel it was effective. Leave.EU stated that Goddard Gunster's advice "...was not new and did not change our strategy which was already in place and underway. We had developed our own capability and methodology by then and did not need or benefit from this information." However, even advice confirming that the messages being used were the most effective ones was of benefit to Leave.EU during the referendum campaign. Additionally, Leave.EU stated that Mr Gunster's advice had not been discussed or shared within Leave.EU and that the email of 13 April 2016 was the first time the social media team would have received it. This was despite the fact that it was clear from email evidence that these individuals were already familiar with at least part of Mr Gunster's advice from earlier emails. Further, we were satisfied that the advice resulted in practical steps being taken by Leave.EU. In a letter to us, Mr Banks explained how a call centre was established on the basis of advice from Goddard Gunster, which then continued to advise the project, when he stated: "In various discussions prior to the [regulated] period we discussed the use of polling and the effectiveness and accuracy of polling. GG encouraged/advised me in general terms to make use of polling, which we then did. A call centre was established to call people and ask questions, GG would have periodically input their thoughts at a high level into the type of polling we were doing and questions that could be asked." Leave.EU's final point was that advice from Goddard Gunster was provided to Mr Banks personally and not to Leave.EU. The evidence, however, does not support this. Goddard Gunster was being paid by BTFC on behalf of Leave.EU, and was under contract to Leave.EU. Mr Banks was the Chair of Leave.EU. Much of the advice provided is directly relevant to a referendum campaigner. We asked Leave.EU and Mr Banks about the various public statements made by them indicating that Goddard Gunster worked on Leave.EU's referendum campaign. Leave.EU told us that the statements made prior to designation related to intended services which Goddard Gunster would have provided to the Go Movement Limited in the event of it being designated as lead campaigner. Further, it said that some of the more specific public statements concerning services from Goddard Gunster, including those in its own press releases, were inaccurate. It stated that, contrary to its press releases after the referendum, Goddard Gunster had no influence on its strategy, did not 'mine' any database or influence social media and did not assist in polling. Leave.EU explained that its public statements after the referendum were to: "vouch for their expertise generally since we were grateful for the experience they brought to bear on the pre-designation decision activities and were keen to work with them further. However the release was prepared by our London team who had no real knowledge of what GG had in fact done for us and [the responsible person for Leave.EU] had no involvement in or input into it. In [her] opinion, the release went too far in terms of GG's actual input." Mr Banks explained his previous public statements concerning Goddard Gunster as either concerning services he expected to be provided in the event of the Go Movement Limited being designated, or as simply being incorrect. Mr Banks and Leave.EU sought to distance themselves from the public statements made after the referendum and explained that the press release thanking Goddard Gunster was drafted by a team without knowledge of Mr Gunster's involvement. We noted, however, that on 27 June 2016 it was Mr Banks who emailed the relevant member of staff to explain to him what he would like the Leave.EU post referendum press release to contain: "We need a press release today thanking Goddard Gunster for their role in winning the referendum, the accuracy of their polling – calling the result exactly right 52/48. & explaining the social media strategy, understanding the voter profile and the massive social media campaign..." We are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the services provided by Goddard Gunster were relevant to Leave.EU's referendum campaign, and were made use of during it. This advice was provided to the Leave.EU director, Mr Banks, directly and to senior Leave.EU staff. When the Go Movement Limited designation application failed, it was Leave.EU which undertook the active campaign, and that campaign benefited from the advice from Goddard Gunster. Leave.EU paid a total of approximately £246,000 for this strategic advice. The legal obligation to quantify and report the value of spending with Goddard Gunster which benefitted Leave.EU's referendum campaign rested with the responsible person. This however did not happen. It is not possible on the basis of the evidence we have seen for us to make this assessment. The Better for the Country issues The Better for the Country issues We are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Leave.EU, without reasonable excuse, failed to include spending of £77,380 in its referendum spending return, comprising fees paid to BFTCL as its campaign organiser. These facts form part of an offence under section 122(4)(b) in respect of the referendum campaign spending return for Leave.EU. Evidence Evidence and analysis

Leave.EU effectively outsourced its referendum campaign to BFTCL, which incurred and paid for all staff and non-staff campaign expenditure in the name of Leave.EU, and then recharged Leave.EU. There were a number of personnel in common between Leave.EU and BFTCL. Mr Banks was a director of both, and the responsible person for Leave.EU was also a director of BFTCL. We obtained from Leave.EU the contract between Leave.EU and BFTCL. Under 'Terms of engagement', BFTCL's role was described as 'Campaign Management Services Provider'. The contract set out the services provided to Leave.EU by BFTCL on a contractor capacity, which included campaign advisory services, regulatory advisory services, media advisory services (such as public relations, branding and positioning and market research), administration and finance. More generally, the contracted services included the provision of campaign management services, including the payment of campaign spending incurred on Leave.EU's behalf. Under 'commission' within the contract, BFTCL charged Leave.EU a 'cost per seat' (which we calculated at 59% of salary) fee for each member of staff working on behalf of Leave.EU, in addition to the staff salaries. BFTCL also charged Leave.EU a management fee equal to 5% of the net campaign expenses incurred on its behalf. Under this arrangement, BFTCL would contract third party supply for campaign-related services and pay the supplier's invoice, but Leave.EU would be charged by BFTCL (and therefore incur) an amount equal to the invoice value plus an additional 5% of the invoice value to BFTCL. Leave.EU did not report the cost/value of those fees paid to BFTCL. During the investigation Leave.EU did not provide an explanation for why the 5% management fee on non-staff spending by BFTCL was not reported, other than to indicate that it did not believe it fell within the definition of campaign expenses.

In respect of the management fee on staff spending, Leave.EU's responsible person told us that Leave.EU believed that the management fees were exempt from reporting under paragraph 2 of Schedule 13 of PPERA. In its representations on our initial determinations, Leave.EU called the payments to BFTCL "internal" costs as the two were "connected companies". It said that the management fees were based on items where a mark-up was included and thus the spend would be double reported. It also argued that VAT on these costs was not reportable as it was reclaimed. Paragraph 1 of Schedule 13 sets out the types of expenditure which are reportable. Paragraph 2 sets out exclusions to the spending detailed in paragraph 1, and states that: Nothing in paragraph 1 shall be taken as extending to (a) any expenses in respect of any property, services or facilities so far as those expenses fall to be met out of public funds (b) any expenses incurred in respect of the remuneration or allowances payable to any member of the staff (whether permanent or otherwise) of the campaign organiser; or (c) any expenses incurred in respect of an individual by way of travelling expenses (by any means of transport) or in providing for his accommodation or other personal needs to the extent that the expenses are paid by the individual from his own resources and are not reimbursed to him. "Campaign organiser" is defined at section 111(4) PPERA as the individual or body by whom or on whose behalf [referendum] expenses are incurred. 4.50 By virtue of sub-paragraph (b) staffing costs of the campaign organiser are not reportable. However, by virtue of the structure created in which 24 Leave.EU was the campaign organiser, but did not directly employ the staff of BFTCL, the staffing costs of BFTCL, and the associated management fees, were not exempt. On VAT elements of management fees, we are satisfied that the campaign spending requirements of PPERA require such to be included, irrespective of any ability to recover repayment of VAT under tax law provisions. The mark-up element of management fees reflected spending by Leave.EU on a separate organisation providing campaign organisation services and should be included as reported campaign spending. Getting the reporting requirements wrong is not a reasonable excuse, nor does honest but wrong assessment comprise a reasonable excuse. As a result of failing to include the management fees paid to BFCTL, Leave.EU's spending was under-reported. We have calculated the under-report as follows: Leave.EU reported total spending of £693,094. This included staffing costs of £79,121. The non-staff spending was therefore £613,973. The 5% management fee for this spending is £30,699. The correct figure for non-staff spending was therefore £644,672. The staffing costs of £79,121 were subject to a 59% management fee. The fee was therefore £46,681. The correct figure for staff spending was therefore £125,802. We are therefore satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Leave.EU should have reported non-staff spending of £644,672 and staff spending of £125,802. The further omitted invoices

The law requires a referendum spending return to be a complete statement of all payments made and for each payment of over £200 to be accompanied by an invoice or receipt. Further, where a payment is made before the referendum period started but the benefit of it is made use of during the referendum period then it too must be included in the return. We found beyond reasonable doubt that the responsible person of Leave.EU failed, without reasonable excuse, to provide the required invoice or receipt for 97 payments of over £200, cumulatively totalling £80,224. The responsible person of Leave.EU therefore committed an offence under section 122(4)(c) of PPERA. We also found that it was more probable than not that Leave.EU's spending return under-stated the apportioned value of 15 payments totalling £129,720. However, the lack of clear records held by Leave.EU in respect of the apportioned value meant that we could not determine beyond reasonable doubt whether the reported value was right or wrong.

Missing invoices and receipts

From our inspection of Leave.EU's referendum spending return, we identified 94 payments totalling £78,804 where invoices or receipts were required but not provided. The payments related to staff costs charged by BFCTL. There is no exemption from the invoice or receipt requirement for reportable staff costs. The remaining three payments that were not supported by invoices were paid to Facebook. Leave.EU told us that Facebook does not provide invoices for the services it provided, and that it included a PayPal transaction report instead. We are aware, however, of other campaigners and parties who have obtained services from Facebook and delivered invoices or receipts to support the payments. We are therefore satisfied that it is possible to obtain an invoice or receipt from Facebook (or any other company), particularly where it is clear that providing such an invoice or receipt with a spending return is a legal requirement under section 120(3)(a) PPERA.

Apportionment of invoices

We obtained, as part of this investigation, invoices for payments made by BFCTL on behalf of Leave.EU which were in addition to the invoices and receipts which Leave.EU included in its referendum spending return. We noted that Leave.EU had incurred debts to BFCTL of over £8m before the referendum period began on 15 April 2016. Leave.EU told us that it had included all reportable spending in its return, and that the majority of the spending covered by these invoices occurred before the referendum period. We identified 54 invoices, with a value of £176,793, which appeared to relate to reportable campaign spending. In some cases spending was apportioned partly into the regulated period according to a formula. The formula involved dividing the value of the spending by the number of days between the day the invoice was raised and the date of the referendum. The value was then apportioned according to the number of those days which fell without and within the regulated period. For example an invoice for £1,000 raised on 15 March 2016, 100 days before the referendum and 34 days before the referendum period began would be apportioned as £10 per day and therefore £340 before the regulated period and £660 during the regulated period. This approach takes no account of when material was actually used. In a number of cases we noted that Leave.EU did not have adequate records to establish this and therefore to support the apportionment. The apportionment was therefore effectively an estimate, and not a particularly reliable one. For example, it may be reasonable to assume that leaflets were not distributed continuously before and during the regulated period but were in fact mainly distributed closer to the date of the referendum. As a result, 15 invoices in particular, with a value of £129,720, were apportioned with £49,329 reported. Due to the lack of records neither Leave.EU or the Commission is able to verify that the apportionment was accurate. We have not therefore been able to find to the required standard that an offence under section 122(4)(b) has been committed in respect of this spending but consider it more probable than not that there was further under-reporting.

As a non-designated campaigner, the referendum spending limit imposed by section 118(1) and Schedule 14(1)(2)(c) of PPERA on Leave.EU was £700,000. Leave.EU reported spending of £693,094, which is £6,906 under the spending limit. We found beyond reasonable doubt that Leave.EU failed to include a minimum of £77,380 in its spending return, which meant that Leave.EU exceeded its spending limit by more than 10%. We are satisfied that the actual figure was in fact greater, given the failure to report an appropriate proportion of the cost of services provided by Goddard Gunster. The responsible person for Leave.EU authorised those expenses to be incurred by or on behalf of Leave.EU. We are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that she knew, or ought reasonably to have known, that the expenses would be incurred in excess of the spending limit. We therefore determined that both Leave.EU and the responsible person committed offences under section 118(2)(c) of PPERA.

Evidence Evidence and analysis

The responsible person for Leave.EU failed without reasonable excuse to report spending on referendum campaign activity in the following areas:

- Services provided by Goddard Gunster Management fees charged by BFTCL During the investigation, Leave.EU explained that spending totalling £14,816 was, in retrospect, included in error. We have accepted this and decided that it is not proportionate to take enforcement action in respect of it. Leave.EU defended its governance compliance structure and processes and highlighted the experience of its responsible person. It stated that it took an honest and reasonable approach to the assessment, apportionment and declaration of expenditure, and complied with the guidance issued by us. Leave.EU also said that it had included further non-reportable spending in its return, demonstrating a prudent approach. If correct, it would be a serious issue and potentially an offence that the spending return in fact contained a number of payments that should not have been reported. PPERA requires a complete and accurate return of the regulated spending, no more or less. The inclusion of additional spending results in a loss of both transparency and the ability to properly scrutinise complete and accurate spending, in compliance or not with the rules.

However, on the evidence before us it was not evident that there are additional elements of non-reportable spending in the Leave.EU campaign spending return. We are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Leave.EU made payments of campaign spending that it failed to report, and that this had the consequence of spending in excess of its permitted spending limit. The responsible person of Leave.EU was also a director of both Leave.EU and BFTCL. In addition, she was responsible for authorising payments for both companies. She was therefore aware, or should reasonably have been aware, of all spending incurred on behalf of Leave.EU by BFTCL. We are satisfied that she was aware of the contractual arrangement between the two companies, as well as the contract between Leave.EU and Goddard Gunster. Further, she was one of those included in many of the emails received from Goddard Gunster. The spending return declaration Under section 123(2)(a) and (b)(i) of PPERA, referendum campaign spending returns must be accompanied by a declaration to us made by the responsible person of the campaigner. The responsible person is required to state that they have examined the return and, to the best of his or her knowledge and belief, it is complete and correct as required by law. It is an offence for the treasurer to knowingly or recklessly make a false declaration. Civil sanctions do not attach to this offence; it can only be pursued via a criminal prosecution. We are satisfied that we have reasonable grounds to suspect that the responsible person for Leave.EU either knowingly or recklessly signed a false declaration accompanying the Leave.EU referendum spending return. In line with its Enforcement Policy, we have referred this matter to the Metropolitan Police Service. Offences committed We have determined that the following offences were committed by Ms Elizabeth Bilney, the responsible person of Leave.EU: An offence under Schedule 2 paragraph 5(9)(b) EURA in that she failed, without reasonable excuse, to submit a pre-poll regulated transaction report that was complete and accurate An offence under section 122(4)(b) PPERA in that she failed, without reasonable excuse, to deliver a referendum campaign spending return that was complete and accurate in respect of the transactions and payments reported A further offence under section 122(4)(b) PPERA in that she failed, without reasonable excuse, to deliver a referendum campaign spending return that was complete in respect of the required invoices or receipts for all payments over £200 An offence under section 118(2)(c)(i) PPERA in that she incurred spending on referendum activity that exceeded the statutory limit, and that she knew or ought to have known that the spending when incurred was in excess of that limit. 5.2 In addition, Leave.EU committed an offence under section 118(2)(c)(ii) in respect of the same spending that exceeded the statutory limit We have imposed the following penalties on Leave.EU: In respect of the offence under Schedule 2 paragraph 5(9)(b) of EURA – a penalty of £10,000 In respect of the offence under section 122(4)(b) of PPERA relating to the completeness of the spending return – a penalty of £20,000 In respect of the offence under section 122(4)(b) of PPERA relating to the failure to include invoices or receipts – a penalty of £20,000 In respect of the offence under section 118(2)(c)(i) and (ii) of PPERA – a penalty of £20,000 The total value of the penalties imposed on Leave.EU is £70,000. The level of the penalties has been constrained by the cap on our fines. Legal framework Legal framework Relevant extracts from the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) Requirement to prepare and submit a complete and accurate referendum campaign expenditure return Section 120 of PPERA requires that where any referendum expenses are incurred by or on behalf of the permitted participant during any referendum period, and that period ends, the responsible person shall make a return under this section in respect of referendum expenses incurred on or behalf of the permitted participant during that period. Section 120(2) of PPERA specifies that the return must contain: (a) a statement of all payments made in respect of referendum expenses incurred by or on behalf of the permitted participant during the referendum period in question; [...] (d) in a case where the permitted participant either is not a registered party or is a minor party, a statement of relevant donations received in respect of the referendum which complies with the requirements of paragraphs 10 and 11 of Schedule 15 Section 120(3) of PPERA states that a return must be accompanied by: all invoices or receipts relating to the payments mentioned in subsection (2)(a); and (b) in the case of any referendum expenses treated as incurred by virtue of Section 112 of PPERA, any declaration falling to be made with respect to those expenses in accordance with Section 112(6) [...] (d) ...a statement of regulated transactions entered into in respect of the referendum which complies with the requirements of paragraphs 16 to 20 of Schedule 15A of PPERA Section 122(1) of PPERA states that where any return falls to be prepared under Section 120 in respect of referendum expenses incurred by or on behalf of a permitted participant, and an auditor's report on it falls to be prepared under section 121(1), the responsible person shall deliver the return to the Commission, together with a copy of the auditor's report, within six months of the end of the relevant referendum period. Section 122(4) of PPERA states that the responsible person commits an offence, if without reasonable excuse, they: (a) fail to comply with the requirements of sub-paragraph (1) or (2) in relation to a return under Section 120; (b) deliver a return which does not comply with the requirements of Section 120(2) or (3); or (c) fail to comply with the requirements of sub-paragraph (3) in relation to a return under that subsection Special restrictions on referendum expenses Section 118 of PPERA states that Schedule 14 of PPERA has effect for imposing, in connection with a referendum, limits on referendum expenses incurred by or on behalf of permitted participants. Under Paragraph 1(2)(c) of Schedule 14 of PPERA, the limit on referendum expenses incurred by or on behalf of a non-party undesignated regulated campaigner was £700,000. Section 118(2)(c) of PPERA states that the responsible person is guilty of an offence if they authorised expenses to be incurred in excess of that limit by, or on behalf of, the registered campaigner and knew or ought reasonably to have known that the expenses would be incurred in excess of that limit. Pre-poll regulated transaction returns Paragraph 5 of Schedule 2 of EURA states that the report for a pre-poll period must record, in relation to each regulated transaction having a value exceeding £7,500 which is entered into by the permitted participant during the period: (a) the nature of the transaction (that is to say whether it is a loan, a credit facility or an arrangement by which any form of security is given) (b) the value of the transaction (determined in accordance with paragraph 3 of the Schedule treated as inserted by paragraph 1 above ("Schedule 15A of PPERA")) or, in the case of a credit facility or security to which no limit is specified, a statement to that effect (c) the date when the transaction was entered into by the permitted participant (d) the same information about the transaction as would be required by paragraph 18(3) and (4) of Schedule 15A to be recorded in the statement referred to in paragraph 15 of that Schedule, (i.e. paragraph 6 of Schedule 6A) (e) the information about each qualifying person who is a party to the transaction which is, in connection with recordable transactions entered into by registered parties, required to be recorded in weekly transaction reports by paragraph 3 of Schedule 6A to PPERA (reading references in that paragraph to an authorised participant as references to a qualifying person who is a party to the transaction), and (f) in relation to a transaction to which a person who is not a qualifying person is a party, the information referred to in paragraph 17 of Schedule 15A of PPERA. Under paragraph 5(9)(b) of Schedule 2 of EURA the responsible person commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, that person delivers a report to the Electoral Commission that does not comply with the requirements of sub-paragraph (3). Leave.EU background Leave.EU background Leave.EU Group Ltd ("Leave.EU" – company number 09763501) was a registered campaigner in the 2016 referendum on the United Kingdom's membership of the European Union ("the EU referendum"). Leave.EU registered as a campaigner on 15 February 2016. Leave.EU was listed as an affiliate in the application of the Go

Movement Limited, also a registered campaigner, for designation as lead campaigner for the 'leave' outcome in the EU referendum. Lead campaigners had a spending limit of £7m for campaign activity. On 13 April 2016 the Commission designated Vote Leave Limited as the lead for the leave outcome. The EU referendum took place on 23 June 2016. Under PPERA the responsible person for Leave.EU, Ms Elizabeth Bilney, had to deliver to us pre-poll transaction and donation returns in the weeks running up to the referendum poll, and a return of all campaign spending incurred by or on behalf of Leave.EU during the EU referendum regulated campaign period of 15 April to 23 June 2016. As Leave.EU incurred campaign spending in excess of £250,000, the deadline for the return's delivery was 23 December 2016. Ms Bilney delivered the return in advance of this deadline. 1.7 Leave.EU reported spending of £693,094. Its spending limit was £700,000. “Brexit, Dark Money and the DUP” You are in the Key correspondence section Home Key correspondence On this page Letter summary Read our letter in full First published: 2 August 2018 Last updated: 16 July 2019 Summary of the letter Date: 2 August 2018 To: Mr Jim Fitzpatrick Address: BBC Northern Ireland, BBC TVCA, 1st Floor Broadcasting House, Ormeau Avenue, Belfast, BT2 8HQ From: Louise Edwards, Director of Regulation Format: Sent by post Full letter Dear Mr Fitzpatrick BBC NI Spotlight

“Brexit, Dark Money and the DUP” Thank you for your letter of 17 July 2018, following your programme “Brexit, Dark Money and the DUP”. We have looked at the allegations you made that were about UK electoral law, specifically the 2016 EU referendum. These were broadly about whether particular campaigners in that referendum incurred joint spending but did not declare it. As our Enforcement Policy explains, we may open an investigation where we have reasonable grounds to suspect an offence within our remit has been committed. This threshold is applied to every case we assess, and has been applied in this case. I set out below the conclusions of our assessment.

First, please note that under section 71 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, I cannot disclose any information about donations that may or may not have been made to the DUP during 2016. We continue to urge the UK Government to bring forward legislation that will enable us to publish the information we hold on donations and loans dating back to January 2014. Transparency is an essential component to increasing public confidence in the democratic process. Our view is that information on how political parties, candidates and other campaigners raise and spend money should be open to timely public scrutiny.

Joint spending rules The ‘working together’ or ‘joint spending’ rules for the EU Referendum were set out in the European Union Referendum Act 2015. They were known as the ‘common plan’ rules in that Act. Under these rules, campaign groups can work together to achieve a particular outcome, but their spending – when combined – must not exceed their individual spending limit. Where a lead campaigner is working together with other campaign groups, all the spending will count towards the lead campaigner’s total.

Under the rules, set out by parliament, the following does not count as joint working, as they are permitted and do not dictate how money is spent:

- Donations from an individual or group to multiple campaigners.
- A single supplier working for multiple campaigners.
- Individuals volunteering for multiple campaigners.

When looking at joint spending we are not necessarily looking for a written plan, although we advise campaigners to have something in writing if they are working together. But we are looking for evidence of: joint or coordinated spending; control or influence over spending by another campaigner; or discussions or consultation about campaign activity that affects spending decisions.

You may be interested to read a recent blog we posted on this subject: When does working together break the rules? You may also be aware that we recently concluded an investigation into Vote Leave where we concluded that its spending return for the EU referendum was incomplete in a number of ways. This included a failure to declare joint spending with the unregistered campaigner BeLeave. You can find the investigation report here.

Outcome of our assessment We reviewed the information you provided. You explained that there was “no significant evidence” beyond that which was aired in the programme. We also reviewed the programme, and considered whether there were other sources we could locate to evidence the allegations made in it. We also looked at whether we could infer from what we had, a reasonable suspicion of undeclared common plan expenses. Our conclusion is that we do not have grounds to open an investigation into the allegations about breaches of electoral law in the BBC NI Spotlight Programme “Brexit, Dark Money and the DUP”. As noted above, I am limited by section 71 PPERA as to what I can say here. In general terms it is clear a number of campaign groups had links through personnel or suppliers. This is not unexpected. We have not seen evidence beyond this to give a reasonable suspicion of actual spending to further a coordinated or common plan between any of the individuals or entities named. As such, this does not meet the threshold for an investigation to be opened. Should evidence of any breaches of the rules for the EU Referendum come to light, we would of course look again. Response to consultation feedback on the Codes of Practice on spending by candidates and political parties at Senedd elections | Electoral Commission Search

Response to consultation feedback on the Codes of Practice on spending by candidates and political parties at Senedd elections You are in the Our consultations section Home Our consultations On this page Introduction At which elections do the Codes apply? What are Codes of Practice? Key themes from previous consultations Key themes from this consultation Conclusion The codes First published: 15 January 2021 Last updated: 30 March 2021 Introduction Introduction Between October 2019 and January 2020 we carried out a consultation on two Codes of Practice on election spending: spending by candidates and spending by political parties at Senedd elections. We welcomed views from a wide range of stakeholders and recognise how important it is that the Codes are supported by those who use them. We used the feedback to amend the draft Codes to provide additional clarity where possible. In some cases where respondents asked for additional clarity on the principles contained in the Codes, we felt that it would be more appropriate to provide additional details in the supporting guidance rather than in the Codes themselves. At which elections do the Codes apply? These Codes apply at Senedd elections. Separate Codes have also been drafted for elections that fall within the remit of UK Parliament, such as UK Parliamentary elections, and Codes have also been drafted for Scottish Parliament elections. What are Codes of Practice? The National Assembly for Wales (Representation of the People) Order 2007, as amended by the Senedd Cymru (Representation of the People) (Amendment) Order 2020, and the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act 2000, allow the Electoral Commission to draft Codes of Practice on candidate and party spending. The legislation specifies how much candidates and parties are allowed to spend at Senedd elections and states that campaign spending must be reported against specific categories. We asked the Minister for Housing and Local Government to lay the Codes of Practice before the Senedd. When in force the Codes will constitute legal documents. The Codes give clarity to candidates, agents and parties about what items count towards spending, whether they should be reported in a candidate or party return and which category of spend they should be reported under. They also set out how to report spending on digital campaigning. Electoral law is in need of reform to make it clear and easy to understand. In the absence of reform, the Codes allow us to provide clarity and consistency in reporting election spending. Key themes from previous consultations Between October and December 2018 we carried out a consultation on the draft Codes for UK Parliamentary general elections. The key themes in the feedback focused on: Language and structure of the codes Transparency for spending on digital campaigning Splitting spending between party and candidate Treatment of overhead Treatment of costs of items used at several elections Treatment of material featuring a prominent party member Treatment of legal costs Interaction of the codes with other guidance we issue Key themes from this consultation The consultation on the Senedd Codes built on the feedback from the UK Parliamentary Codes. Senedd elections are conducted using the Additional Member System. Voters receive two ballot papers and can cast two votes, one to elect their constituency candidate and one to vote for a political party. Due to the nature of these elections, some campaign materials not only encourage voters to vote for a constituency candidate, but also encourage voters to vote for a political party in the regional elections using their second vote. As a result, campaign spending may need to be split between the relevant candidate and party spending returns. The principles included in the Codes are: where campaign materials identify the constituency candidate or the constituency itself, but do not

promote the electoral region where the constituency sits, the full costs are to be included in the candidate's spending return where campaign materials are encouraging voters to participate in both elections, the costs should be split between the candidate spending return and the party spending return We received four types of responses on these principles: where possible, there should be consistency across the Codes for different elections to avoid confusion for participants the principle should be expanded to include other types of activity where targeting of material occurs in a constituency asking for more clarification on how the split works in practice and how spending is split across multiple candidates and elections where voters receive a simple reminder that there are two elections, the costs should not be apportioned as this creates administrative difficulties and the costs are likely to balance out between candidate and party returns Based on the feedback received we have added additional examples to the Codes to provide greater clarity on how costs should be split between candidate and party spending returns. It is not possible to include all possible campaigning scenarios in the Codes. We will therefore also provide additional guidance on campaign spending and reporting with a wider range of scenarios and examples than those included in the Codes. Conclusion We are grateful for all the feedback we received. The feedback supported our aim of producing Codes of Practice for Senedd elections to improve consistency and transparency in reporting of party and candidate spending. In response to the feedback, we amended the Codes and included additional examples to provide greater clarity for some scenarios. The Codes have now been submitted to the Minister, and we have asked for them to be laid in the Senedd, with a view to them being in force for the May 2021 elections. Appendix 4 of the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners: Guidance on claiming fees and travel and subsistence | Electoral Commission Search

Appendix 4 of the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners: Guidance on claiming fees and travel and subsistence You are in the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners section Home Commissioners Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners On this page Introduction How to claim fees Claiming expenses First published: 19 December 2022 Last updated: 17 June 2023 1 Introduction 1.1 Fees and expenses for Commissioners are published on the Commission's website every quarter. The information is collated to show clearly the purpose for which expenditure was incurred, in chronological order for each event for which expenses were incurred.

Please see the website (About Us/How we are run/Commissioners) for an example: <http://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/data/assets/pdf/0003/100596/Commissioners-Q1-10-11.pdf>

1.2 It will help us if you complete your fee and travel and subsistence claims with that in mind. Succinct but informative claim forms also avoid the need for us to check with either Commissioners or other staff regarding missing or incomplete details of any claim.

1.3 There are upper limits for expenditure for expenses, but you are asked at all times to make every effort to book travel, accommodation, and utilise subsistence as economically as possible. You may not be reimbursed if you incur costs above the limits in the guidelines, and will be expected to pay any difference. We will make every effort to help you with early booking, or finding comparative costs, wherever possible.

Travel Framework

1.4 The Commission has set up a travel framework whereby service providers make provision for online bookings on accommodation, air and rail tickets and car hire. Should you wish to use the travel framework directly, Finance and staff will provide some assistance in setting up your account with the service provider, and Commission staff can help you manage your bookings.

1.5 For more detail on all aspects of travel and subsistence policy, for example travelling by car, and taxi use, please refer to the policy itself (included in your induction pack and available on the Commission's intranet site) or ask the Secretary to the Commission Board.

2 How to claim fees

Overview

2.1 Fees are paid to the Electoral Commissioners on the basis of a daily rate. The daily rate for the Commissioners is fixed by resolution of the House of Commons.

2.2 The relevant resolution of the House of Commons provides that an Electoral Commissioner shall be paid at a rate equivalent to Band 4 of judicial salaries, currently £410 per day, and £205 per half day as the applicable rate for financial year 2022/2023.

2.3 The fees for the Electoral Commissioners are paid direct into their bank accounts from the Consolidated Fund, and payment is made by Liberata, upon receipt of a certified fee form.

Calculation of fees

2.4 Please keep a record of work undertaken for the Commission (or events attended in your capacity as a Commissioner) and provide a short description of your activities, including location, and times, on your fee claim form. Please refer to the published expenses on the website for examples. A reminder of what to include is at paragraph 2.8 below.

2.5 Time spent on preparation and reading may also be claimed. As a general rule of thumb, preparation for any meeting is expected to take about half a day. There may be circumstances where preparation time may take up to a full day: the agenda may contain many in-depth matters or there may be preparatory discussions with other Commissioners. In such cases, briefly indicate on the form what those circumstances are. Where you have units of time of less than either a whole or a half day, give start and finish times and we will aggregate those into the nearest whole and half days (a whole day being about 7.5 hours and a half day 3.5-4 hours).

2.6 In-person attendance at events such as Commission Board meetings and all day training courses and events will usually count as one day, whether or not the total time spent on that day is less than, or exceeds, 7 hours. Where meetings are attended virtually, the fee will be based on the length of the meeting which is usually a half day. Fee claim forms 2.7 Please complete the Commissioner's fee claim form (see example of completed form at Appendix B) for each calendar month and submit the form (via email or post) to the Senior Governance Adviser. If an activity crosses a month, please split the activity accordingly across two fee claim forms.

Forms must be signed by the claimant. 2.8 Claims should be completed and sent to the Senior Governance Adviser as soon as possible after the end of the calendar month, and in any event no later than the date notified to you by Secretariat.

Payment by Paymaster will normally be made on the last day of the following month, provided the forms have been received by the Secretariat by the cut-off date.

Treasury require signed copies in order to make payment. The following information should be included in your fee claim form for each entry:

- Day worked (i.e. the date for which you're making the entry)
- Start and finish times
- Nature of activity (meeting, preparation, teleconference, briefing)
- Location

Topic/title of meeting

- Person meeting
- If claiming for preparation (reading) please state for which meeting or event Travelling time 2.9 You may claim fees for time spent travelling to the Commission's offices. Claims made for time spent travelling should be recorded as 'travel' and include start and finish times, i.e. when you left home and when you arrived at the meeting venue or hotel accommodation the evening before the meeting. However, where travel is on the same day as the meeting, a limit of one day's claim will apply to in-person Board meetings (however long, or short, the day). In other words, a day's claim is the limit one can make, regardless of the length of the meeting and travel time on the day. Dinners

2.10 Since some Commissioners usually travel to London the evening before a Commission Board meeting, there is an opportunity to get together that evening over dinner. 2.11 When a dinner is effectively a working dinner, involving substantive discussion of Commission business, the time spent may count towards overall preparation time for the next day's Board meeting. A day's claim is the limit one can make for preparation time but you should not also claim subsistence. In other words, your fee claim may include preparation time spent discussing business over dinner but you are expected to pay for your own meal. 2.12 On infrequent occasions the Commission may hold a dinner to which members of staff as well as Commissioners are invited, for example to mark someone's departure from the Commission. The Commission will meet the costs of the food at these dinners, but any alcohol must be paid for separately by those attending. On these occasions, Commissioners who attend the dinner should not submit a fee claim for the evening. 3 Claiming expenses 3.1 The Commission will either pay direct, or reimburse you for, the reasonable actual costs of travel, accommodation, meals and certain other expenses incurred while travelling on Commission business, within the limits set out in the travel and subsistence policy. Expense Claims 3.2 You must claim only for the actual cost of expenses incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the performance of your duties on Commission business. The only exceptions are where you claim the flat rate Incidental Costs Allowance for miscellaneous overnight expenses. 3.3 Commissioners are required to submit an expense claim form (example of completed form at Appendix C) via post or scanned and emailed to the Secretary to the Commission Board for each calendar month for which expenses are claimed as soon as possible after the end of the calendar month, and in any event no later than the date notified to you by Secretariat. All expenses forms should be signed and include the following:

name, address, bank details and National Insurance number • Date of travel and mode of travel (including mileage) • Where you travelled from and to • Type of expenditure (dinner, drinks) 3.4 In addition to that, please ensure that you include all receipts or invoices needed to support your claim, and remember to sign the form. Lost/No Receipt 3.5 If you are unable to obtain a receipt, such as from a car park machine, for travel on Commission business, or have lost your receipt, you must submit your claim as normal and note the reason for absence of the receipt on the claim itself or separately by email (written confirmation is needed for audit purposes). 3.6 If you are using a personal Oyster card, you should register it for online use with TfL, and download a Journey History Report, which covers journeys made in the preceding 8 weeks, to support your claim. Authorisation of Claims 3.7 Commissioners' claims are certified by the Board Secretary (General Counsel). These claims are reviewed periodically by the Chair. 3.8 Details of all expenses paid to Commissioners, Executive Team and the Heads of the Commission's offices in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are published online every quarter. 3.9 The Electoral Commission may not reimburse the expenses you claim unless your claim is supported by the necessary evidence and the person responsible for authorising the payment has confirmed their approval of the claim. 3.10 It is your responsibility to get and keep receipts for any expenditure, and to keep a record of any car mileage you subsequently claim for. Travel and tax liability 3.11 The HMRC designation of the Commission's London office as your usual place of work means that ordinarily you would not be able to claim for costs of travel to London, or an overnight stay, without it being a taxable benefit. However, the Commission has advised HMRC that it has agreed to assume the tax liability. A written statement to that effect can be provided for use with your own accounts if required. 3.12 You are expected to book the most economical travel available. Where the purchase of a Railcard would lead to overall savings for the Electoral Commission, you may claim the cost of the Railcard. 3.13 If you have a Railcard of any description, you are expected to use it to benefit from any reductions in the costs of any travel booked by you, or on your behalf, on Commission business. 3.14 The costs of first class travel will not be reimbursed unless it was the most economical or only possible means of travel on that occasion. In that case you will be asked briefly to set out the circumstances. You may upgrade to first class travel at your own expense. 3.15 For those of you with access to a train sleeper service, there are occasions on which that service appears more expensive than the equivalent flight or day-time rail fare, but is more economical when the saving on an overnight hotel stay is taken into account. 3.16 Meetings of the Audit Committee are usually on the day before Commission Board meetings, to save on travel costs for those Commissioners who are on both bodies. Likewise, Commission staff may seek to arrange meetings with Commissioners around Board meetings to make best use of Commissioner attendance. 3.17 Use of taxis is discouraged. If circumstances have made it necessary or unavoidable for example, no alternative public transport, the time of travel ruled out an alternative, the cost of public transport is comparable - please give the reason and, if sharing with another Commissioner, indicate that in addition to the other usual information (from, to, when). (Please refer to the Commission's Travel and Subsistence policy for further detail on taxi use.) 3.18 If you use your car to claim mileage we will need to receive a copy of your car insurance which includes business use. Objective: Fair and effective electoral law | Electoral Commission Search

Objective: Fair and effective electoral law You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 On this page What we are working to achieve Work done to achieve this aim Performance indicators Ongoing and future work First published: 4 July 2023 Last updated: 27 September 2023 What we are working to achieve Our electoral system is underpinned by a legal framework which establishes how elections are delivered. It sets out who is allowed to vote and the various ways they can cast their vote. It sets out who can stand for elections, who can campaign and how much they can spend, and it sets out how electoral administrators should deliver elections, including counting and declaring the results. Given its cross-cutting impact, we want to work with parliamentarians and governments to improve electoral law so that it is fit for purpose, reduces complexity, inefficiencies and risk, and enables innovation. We are working with others to reform electoral law by: supporting effective consideration and implementation of legislation in the UK's parliaments engaging with governments' current electoral law reform agendas, while continuing to make the case for further reform continuing to provide expert advice on the practicability and impact of any changes which could be made to improve the electoral system. Work done to achieve this aim Following the May 2022 polls, we published reports on elections in England, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales, reflecting data and evidence gathered on voting, campaigning and delivering the elections. These included recommendations for improving the system further. As the Elections Bill passed through the UK Parliament, we briefed members of the House of Commons and Lords to support their consideration of the measures. We responded promptly with accurate and impartial information to correspondence from elected officials. We continue to advocate for policy change in key areas – including modernising electoral law and protecting politics from foreign interference – in our engagement with stakeholders, parliamentarians and the media.

Performance indicators Indicator Target 2022-23 Timely publication of election / referendum reports 100% 100% Timely responses to policy proposals and legislative consultations 100% 100% Responses to elected stakeholder (MP, MSP, MLA & MS) correspondence within 10 working days 100% 97.83% PACAC Report, October 2022 It has been twenty years since the Electoral Commission was established and we believe it still plays a fundamental role in overseeing free and fair elections and referendums and regulating political finance, and should continue to do so. However, its ability to effectively fulfil its statutory functions is directly impacted by the unnecessary complexity of the law governing this area. There is a consensus that the law is in urgent need of rationalisation and simplification. PACAC Report, October 2022 Ongoing and future work The Commission will share its expertise and evidence with the UK Government as they develop statutory instruments to provide the detail of how the remaining measures in the Elections Act will work. We maintain the view that government should ensure legislation is clear at least six months before any new changes are due to be implemented, so that Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and electoral administrators have enough time to prepare. We will continue to recommend reforms to UK electoral law and stand ready to support governments and parliaments in considering how best this could be taken forward. The Commission will continue to advocate for modernising electoral law, which needs to be simplified to help electoral administrators provide the level of services that voters deserve, and to enable governments and legislatures to deliver their policy priorities. February 2023 Overview Local, mayoral and Police and Crime Commissioner elections that were due to take place in May 2020 were postponed until May 2021, in response to the developing Covid-19 pandemic. Very few polls took place in 2020, which meant that the number of allegations reported to police forces for investigation was particularly low. Because this was not a normal year for elections in the UK, this data cannot be meaningfully compared with data for previous or future years.
Elections in 2020 Local by-elections took place across Great Britain between January and March 2020. After March, the only elections held – which took place under coronavirus restrictions – were eight Scottish Council by-elections in the autumn of 2020. 15 cases of alleged electoral fraud were investigated by the police. Of these, 10 resulted in no further action and 5 were locally resolved by police. Allegations petition is a legal challenge to the result and/or the delivery of an election. One petition was made about the administration of the 23 January 2020 local by-election in the London Borough of Brent. It was claimed that the ballot papers had not been counted correctly and the wrong candidate had been elected. The petition was unsuccessful. Related content 2019 electoral fraud data about electoral fraud in Unincorporated associations An unincorporated association is an association of individuals who have come together to carry out a shared purpose. An unincorporated association has an identifiable membership which is bound together by identifiable rules or an agreement between the members. These rules set out how the unincorporated association is to be run and managed. Reporting gifts received Once registered with the us, unincorporated associations must tell us about reportable gifts that they have received in the calendar years before, of and following their registration. A gift includes anything given or transferred to any officer, member, trustee or agent of an unincorporated association in that person's capacity within the association.

Reportable gifts include: a single gift of more than £7,500 two or more gifts given by the same person in the same calendar year which total more than £7,500. You only count individual gifts worth more than £500 toward this total any additional gift given by source that you have already reported as having given a gift in that calendar year, if it has a value of more than £1,500 The register on this page only includes donations received and accepted by unincorporated associations which are not

Intimation of Electoral Reform Consultation George Adam MSP (GA) said the Scottish Government was planning a consultation on electoral reform in the autumn of this year and sought the views of the panel on matters to be included. He was looking for ways to put the voter first, to improve accessibility and to remove barriers to voting. He wished to see the public have co-design of the process and to ensure as many people as possible engaged. The panel discussed a paper which highlighted areas where Scottish Government were planning to consult. Feedback on the Scottish council elections General reflections - Andy O'Neill (AON) reminded the panel of the Electoral Commission's statutory duty to report on the elections and said all views and comments were helpful. The Commission was presently surveying candidates, the public, Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers and Police SPOCs (Single Point of Contact) in addition to gathering information for its report via various means prior to a likely publication of the report in mid-September. Views received today would form part of the ingathering of information process. Chris Highcock (CH) said the election had been organisationally challenging due to the pandemic aftermath and the unpredictability of restrictions and staff availability, but the overall impression was that the elections were well delivered and there had been a good standard of participation. Returning Officer/Electoral Management Board roles / recommendations / guidance (CH) said the suite of directions given had become fairly standard over the last 10 years and provided consistency in voter facing elements, such as key dates for postal vote issue. He said the role of the EMB had become more fixed in the electoral landscape with EROs and electoral staff in touch for advice and guidance. Electoral Registration Pete Wildman (PW) remarked the elections had been one of the most smoothly run which he had been involved in. An agreed consistent date on second interim issue of postal ballots greatly helped. The Household Notification Letter sent out in February had resulted in a spike of postal vote applications shortly after, in his view, likely reducing the number of later applications. Postal vote rejection letters would be sent out by 27 May. Electoral administration / Nominations / Candidate briefings etc (CH) said it was essential that candidates and agents understood what was asked for and some forms required clarity of design, such as the home address form. He could only speak for City of Edinburgh Council but said the larger parties had allowed electronic submission first. (AON) said all councils offered early electronic submission and an overwhelming majority of candidates found this helpful and had taken it up. Paul Moat (PM) asked if the home address form could be reviewed so that it was less confusing but echoed the view expressed by others that electronic pre-checks of candidate's nominations forms had been invaluable and hoped they would continue. Postal voting (CH) was still looking through statistics but said the volume was not quite as high as last year's election. The postal voting figure was now not far off one quarter of the electorate. Rejection rates were slightly lower than in 2017 (SXM) felt there should be an emergency proxy provision for anyone who found their postal ballot had not arrived in time, given that a postal vote pack could be cancelled. (CH) said they were in the hands of the Royal Mail and with one million pieces of mail going out some of loss of mail will be experienced, but if people did not complain until after the election, there was nothing they could do. If people had got in touch earlier, a replacement pack could be sent out. Polling day issues (AON) said the Electoral Commission had observers at several of the council areas both on polling day and at the counts. Localised issues were dealt with but there was nothing which grew to any great problem. Sue Bruce (SB) agreed and said she had seen a trouble-free Election Day with a steady trickle of voters and Presiding Officers had dealt with all issues in their stride. She felt this was testament to the preparation put in and resulted in a well-run effective election. Verification and count (CH) said the count was the final element of what had gone before and could only work well if other steps were in place. The count solution had begun over two years earlier and had been a huge logistical operation to ensure all had equipment and training to deliver an electronic count. There had been challenges, technically and administratively, but had been delivered with results that all can have confidence in. James Newman (JN) echoed this and said a detailed survey of Returning Officers would be made so that lessons could be learned for the next e-counting project. Integrity issues Following liaison with SPOCs, (AON) said there seemed to have been fewer allegations and the biggest cause of complaint had been a lack of imprints on printed campaign materials. (CH) said using a single printer for the whole of Scotland meant poll cards and postal votes had arrived on doorsteps at the same time across Scotland. Early intervention had ensured a sufficient supply of paper had been purchased well ahead of need. Campaigning issues and campaign material (SXM) raised a number of issues regarding campaign expenditure guidance and the Electoral Commission's view with regard to what constituted candidate expenditure. (AON) indicated that the Electoral Commission would be happy to discuss the issue with (SXM). Public awareness (AON) said the rejection rate of votes had fallen slightly and the instance of multiple 'X's was slightly down although this could, as (SXM) suggested, be attributed to the fact fewer wards had more than one candidate and (SXM) felt there should be a review of how the STV rules work. He thought an argument could be made that you can reflect someone's intention by giving a fraction of a vote. In the case of three crosses, 0.333 recurring could be given to each of the candidates. He also raised the issue of alphabetic bias and possible alternatives. Scottish Government update Maria McCann (MMcC) had issued a written update to the panel and had nothing further to add but was happy to respond to any questions. Scotland Office / Cabinet Office update Hannah Standring (HS) indicated that a short written update had been submitted to the Panel, advised all that the Elections Bill was now an Act and offered to respond to any questions on the update. Scottish Boundary Commission update Isabel Drummond-Murray (ID-M) updated the Panel that Boundary Scotland was preparing for a Scottish Parliament review in the autumn. Royal Mail update Rachel Winham would provide a written update when she returned from annual leave. EMB Update on electoral registration and electoral administration (PW) said that EROs were now booking slots in July and August for the annual canvass and working with the Department for Levelling Up, Housing and Communities on the implementation of voter ID for UK Parliament elections. (CH) said the EMB was looking at the consequences of the Elections Act and would participate in discussions regarding the implementation of the Acts provisions. Electoral Commission update (AON) asked parties to remind candidates that the spending returns were due on 10 June and advice surgery time slots were available for booking. Shaun McNally, the Commission's new Chief Executive, had now been in post since the last meeting and hoped to attend a future meeting of the SP PPP. Dates of future meetings (SXM) said the parties had discussed and would prefer a hybrid meeting going forward. (AON) said he would investigate how to provide that but if it was not possible, it would remain in a virtual format. He would suggest dates and circulate for approval.

Performance analysis 2019/20: Goal one You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 On this page Key achievements Performance measures First published: 30 June 2020 Last updated: 26 August 2020 Goal one To enable the continued delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible. This goal captures our role in overseeing the delivery of elections across all parts of the UK and focuses on three areas: delivering well-run electoral events, maximising and modernising electoral registration, and tackling electoral fraud. Key achievements To help deliver well-run electoral events, we : supported the elections in May 2019: local government, local Mayoral and combined authority Mayoral elections across parts of England, Northern Ireland local government elections, and European Parliamentary elections supported the UK Parliamentary general election in December 2019 worked with organisations supporting people with a disability to raise awareness of how to take part in elections and what support they can expect to receive worked with the National Police Chiefs Council, CPS and the College of Policing to provide new guidance for candidates and campaigners on recognising and reporting intimidation prepared for the scheduled, but then postponed, May 2020 elections: Mayor of London and London Assembly elections, local government elections, local Mayoral and combined authority Mayoral elections in parts of England, and Police and Crime Commissioner elections across England and Wales published guidance and resources, and provided support to electoral administrators, candidates and agents for the scheduled elections in May 2020 To help maximise and modernise electoral registration, we: supported the implementation of a reformed annual canvass in Great Britain, making better use of local and national data, including advising on proposals and producing new guidance for Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) and forms for the public carried out a consultation on new performance standards for EROs advised on proposals from the Northern Ireland Office and the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland to run their electoral registration canvass, now expected to take place in 2021 To help tackle electoral fraud, we: worked with the police and local authorities to provide training and review integrity plans to help prevent electoral fraud published data on alleged cases of electoral fraud reported during 2019 worked with partners to run campaigns to raise awareness of electoral fraud, timed with elections in May and December 2019 Performance measures Measure Performance We publish 100% of guidance products relating to electoral registration on time with no substantive errors 100% Achieved We provide accurate advice to Returning Officers (ROs) and EROs within three working days of receipt of the request. (Target 100%) 99.7% Achieved (Within tolerance) Additions to electoral registers during our public awareness campaigns meet or exceed our targets (specific targets agreed ahead of each poll) 100% Achieved We review 100% of integrity plans from local authorities identified to be at a higher risk of fraud 100% Achieved We publish 100% of our reports to planned deadlines 60% 1 Achieved We comment on 100% of relevant legislation and policy proposals 100% Achieved Delivering well-run electoral events Since 2017, we have developed and continuously reviewed contingency plans so we would be ready to support elections called at short notice. We saw the benefits of this in 2019, when we worked quickly to support two UK-wide polls. Despite the tight timescales and pressures on those involved in running elections, our research shows voters thought all polls were well-run. We delivered public awareness campaigns ahead of each poll and provided guidance to electoral administrators, parties, candidates and campaigners, to help them fulfil their roles. In addition, we published financial information to help the public understand where parties got their money from and how they spent it. Two recall petitions took place in 2019, which we supported by providing guidance to those campaigning and by observing the administration of the process. We then reported on how the petitions were run, identifying practical ways to improve these in the future. Maximising and modernising electoral registration We have done a lot of work to support annual canvass reforms in Great Britain. The new process will give EROs access to robust national-level data about the resident population, to identify addresses where there is likely to have been a change in the people who are eligible to register to vote. This will allow EROs to focus their resources in areas of greatest need. Our support for these reforms included commenting on proposals; providing advice on the legislation; writing guidance to help electoral administrators understand their new responsibilities; and producing new forms for the public. These forms include versions for Wales, Scotland and England to reflect different franchises for elections in each country. Our input helped to ensure the proposals would make it easier for electoral administrators to run the canvass and for the public to respond to it. We see these reforms as an important step towards improving our electoral registration system and look forward to seeing outcomes from their first implementation in 2020. Our scrutiny of proposals from the Northern Ireland Office and Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland to run a canvass of electors – originally planned for 2020 but now scheduled to take place in 2021 – ensured plans would be workable and help to improve registration levels in Northern Ireland. This work is important as our most recent research found that one in four eligible electors in Northern Ireland were not registered correctly at their current address. Tackling electoral fraud We provided guidance and advice to support EROs, ROs and the police to deal with electoral fraud. In 2019, for the third year in a row, we worked with the City of London Police Economic Fraud Academy to host and contribute content to three training courses for police. We also jointly hosted the 15th Annual National SPOC (Single Point Of Contact) seminar in Birmingham with the National Police Chiefs' Council, supported SPOC seminars in Scotland and Wales, and provided dedicated election briefings for new SPOCs. Throughout the year, police forces across the UK sent us data about allegations of electoral fraud that they received and investigated. Every year we report on the number, type, and outcome of these allegations, to understand what has happened and how cases are resolved. For the early May and December polls in 2019, we worked in partnership with Crimestoppers and Cabinet Office to run our 'your vote is yours alone' campaign. This aims to help voters understand what constitutes electoral fraud and how to raise concerns. Our campaign contributed to more than 10,000 visits to the Crimestoppers website, where people could find out more information and report any concerns. Crimestoppers passed on 30 pieces of actionable information to the police. Report navigation links

Previous Next Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 Performance analysis: Goal two 1. We published five reports, two of them a month late. This was because data collection and analysis for the European Parliamentary elections report took longer than expected, particularly to ensure we had data on EU citizens who could not vote. This had a knock-on impact on the recall petition report. ■ Back to content at footnote 1 Related content Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 Read our annual report and accounts for 2019/20, including key figures about the year at a glance. Commissioners Our commissioners represent Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, and four are put forward by the political parties in the House of Commons. They are known as 'nominated commissioners'. The process for selecting the nominated commissioners is different, but all commissioners are equal. Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland Three of our commissioners have responsibility for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. They make sure these areas are represented, especially when the law or processes are different. Political parties Nominated commissioners Three of our commissioners were put forward by the Leaders of the three largest nominating parties, and the fourth is appointed from candidates put forward by the other parties. Nominating parties are registered parties with two or more Members of the House of Commons. Submitting and recommending the candidates The Speaker gives the relevant party leaders the opportunity to submit the names and CVs of three candidates. They also have to submit evidence of the suitability for each candidate.

An independent panel reviews the information from the party leader, and interviews the candidates. The panel writes a report for the Speaker's Committee, which evaluates the candidates. The Speaker's Committee then makes recommendations based on this report. Once the Speaker's Committee makes the recommendations, the Speaker holds a statutory consultation with the relevant parties on the names of successful candidates. After the consultation, the Speaker's Committee reports its recommendation to the House of Commons, including the responses received in the statutory consultation. The Speaker will ask the Leader of the House to table a motion for an humble Address to appoint the recommended candidates. Appointing the commissioners If the House agrees the motion, the Queen appoints our commissioners by Royal Warrant. Related content Our Commissioners Electoral Commission Board Find out

Report: Campaign spending at the 2014 European Parliamentary elections | Electoral Commission Search Report: Campaign spending at the 2014 European Parliamentary elections You are in the European Parliamentary elections section Home European Parliamentary elections On this page About this report About these elections Download our full report First published: 10 July 2019 Last updated: 6 August 2019 About this report This report provides an overview of the campaign spending and donations rules at the 2014 European Parliamentary election. It also provides links to more information about how much was spent at the election and donations given for the purpose of meeting campaign spending at these elections.

About these elections At the 2014 European Parliamentary elections, political parties, candidates and non-party campaigners spent a total of just over £10.8 million. There were 31 political parties contesting 70 seats across Great Britain and 10 contesting three seats in Northern Ireland. Three political parties, No2EU, Britain First and Communities United Party did not meet the statutory deadline for providing a return. These failures to meet the deadline are being considered in line with the Electoral Commission's enforcement policy which is available on our website.

Political parties spent a total of £8,440,434 in England, £955,815 in Scotland, £499,971 in Wales and £296,651 in Northern Ireland. There were no individual candidates contesting these elections in Great Britain. Candidates in Northern Ireland spent a total of £391,466. As of 15 December 2014, five non-party campaigners who were registered with the Commission submitted spending returns after the election. All of these non-party campaigners submitted their spending returns on time. These non-party campaigners spent a total of £187,173 in England, £16,460 in Scotland, £11,177 in Wales and £3,224 in Northern Ireland. They received a total of £127,400 in reportable donations. Our regulatory work at these polls in the six months before polling day (22 November 2013 and 22 May 2014) included:

- Registering 47 new political parties, of which six went on to contest the European elections
- Publishing and updating written guidance for candidates and agents, political parties and non-party campaigners
- Delivering training sessions for candidates, political parties and their staff on the rules at these polls
- Providing advice in response to over 1,400 enquiries from political parties, candidates and non-party campaigners
- Undertaking campaign and campaigner monitoring to ensure the rules were being followed; and taking regulatory action where necessary

Declaration of interests All the nominated Commissioners had stood for election, and been nominated as Commissioners by political parties that had contested recent elections and also registered as campaigners in the EU Referendum. AC was a member of the Board of the Arts Council of Northern Ireland (which received money from the EU Peace 3 Programme, and the Corners programme for individual artists). A Trustee of the Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust, a recipient of EU funding, she had now returned to that role at the conclusion of the Referendum. AC declared her sister was Head of BBC News in Northern Ireland. DH in 2008 drafted and put forward in parliament an amendment to the then European Union (Amendment) Bill, proposing an EU referendum in the terms 'Should the United Kingdom remain in the European Union?' DH had stood for election on a manifesto supporting an in-out referendum on the European Union. DH was a council member of Justice, an organisation which had in the past received EU funding. DH reported that the European Parliament subsidised a regular annual visit by his Public Policy students to Brussels. DH declared that he had been awarded a research grant of over €40,000 from the European Parliament. DH declared that he had been at university with Jon Lansman, but had no current contact with him. JRH was a member of the pro-Europe Conservative Europe Group, the parliamentary group Conservative European Mainstream, and of the all-party parliamentary group on Reform, Decentralisation and Devolution Group, chaired by Lord Foulkes. JEH reported that he was Chair of the Advisory Board, Cargo Logic Air (British Air Cargo Company established in 2015 by the Russian owner of the Volga Dnepr Group) (remunerated).
Minutes Minutes of 24 January 2018 Approved. Minutes of 21 February 2018 Approved. To note Agenda items were not discussed in the order on the agenda, to allow ECS to be present for items EC 20/18 and EC 13/18. The late addition to the agenda (EC 20/18) was taken first and noted below. Regulatory matter for decision RP, as final decision maker in the investigation, left the room. All present were reminded of the need for complete confidentiality, the law on actual and perceived bias, conflict of interest and the Commissioner Code of Conduct. A regulatory matter was considered, discussed and agreed. During discussion a number of points were touched on, including:
Consideration of previous decisions on regulatory matters, and the importance of

consistency in our approach. The development of our prosecution policy, which, if agreed by the Board, would provide a route for prosecutions in appropriate cases to be brought by the Commission rather than requiring a police referral. Agreed: That: The Board having satisfied itself that the circumstances outlined in the paper met the threshold for referral, the matter be referred to the police for investigation; It be noted that the referral would figure in our press release on the wider investigation, and Commissioners would be notified separately of the press release and statement; RP returned to the room. Proposal to provide indicative funding information to the Scottish Parliament and National Assembly for Wales AON introduced the paper, asking the Board to agree that the figures presented in the paper should form the basis of our advice to the Scottish Parliament (SP) and National Assembly for Wales (NAW) regarding our future accountability to these bodies. Commissioners welcomed the comprehensive work undertaken to date. A question was asked on whether we would change how we managed our budget in future. CB explained that the current approach - event funding which predominately covers electoral events, and core funding which covers permanent resources - worked well and could be easier to manage with the new accountability structure. We could go back to the Speakers' Committee with a Supplementary Estimate if we encountered unplanned events. Questions were asked on whether the proposed request for resources would sit centrally and if further requests would come to this Board. CB responded that requests for additional funding would come back to Board for information, though as the organisation's accounting officer, the request would be under her name. AON advised that for elections taking place in Scotland, funding would come partly from Westminster and partly from Holyrood, according to the electoral event it was required for. The Board agreed to the principles identified in the paper which underpinned the financial modelling and the draft advice to the SP/NAW contained in the report, with an amendment to the wording in section 2.1 by deleting all of the first bullet point after its first sentence. Meeting conclusion With ECS leaving the meeting at this point, the Board was no longer quorate. The Board meeting concluded. There then followed informal discussion on the following agenda items by those Board members remaining present with staff. No decisions were taken. May elections update AI updated on the upcoming elections and highlighted the ongoing work to ensure the delivery of well-run elections through the risk-based approach to profiling local authorities. The Commission had met with those authorities that were rated "red" and "amber", and had this time also had a conversation with all authorities who were rated "green". This support and challenge of Returning Officers and their staff would continue through the electoral period but, as yet, nothing significant had been picked up. PT updated on the ID and postal pilot evaluation preparations. Extensive data collection was being conducted, and we would be gathering feedback from candidates and polling staff during and after the election. The statutory deadline for completing and publishing the evaluation was 4 August 2018, three months after the poll. It would be a challenge to draw conclusions across the different areas due to the variations in form of the different pilots. It was asked whether local authorities had been given any autonomy over the process. PT replied that the Cabinet Office were leading on the pilots, but that local authorities had been given latitude to propose what they wanted to test and the ID to be used. It was noted that evidence from the pilots might not be able to provide information on whether the pilots had had an impact on disenfranchisement. In response to a question on how the Commission intended to address this risk, PT explained that we would incorporate questions in our public opinion surveys to try to get a sense of any potential impact. In response to a question on the form of the postal vote pilots, PT said that follow-ups either through a phone call or a visit would be carried out after completed postal votes had been received back by the Returning Officer, with a focus on asking voters if they had directly completed their ballots. During the discussion, it was suggested that neighbouring local authorities could be impacted by the pilots, with potential confusion amongst the electorate. Further discussions touched on the likelihood of campaigners against the pilots being present on polling day. CB advised that Commission staff had been working with local authorities to ensure awareness of this risk. Some of them had been in contact with police regarding any potential disruption. In response to a question on whether polling staff were receiving additional training for these polls, AI replied that they would, and that it was the responsibility of the local authority to provide this. PT added that he had seen the training plans that had been established by the local authorities. CB advised that we would be monitoring social media in the run up to the elections and confirmed we would highlight anything significant to local authorities. RP updated on the political finance and regulation work in respect of the May polls, noting that there had been 42 approved applications for new political parties. CW highlighted the organisation's campaign activity and public enquiries work leading up to both the registration deadline and polling day. Campaign beermats were shared with the Board. They would be distributed to pubs located in student areas as a route to engage this group – recognised as currently under-registered – in the voter registration drive. The fraud campaign had been formally launched with CrimeStoppers. Noted. Accuracy and Completeness Study PT introduced the paper, summarising the background behind the accuracy and completeness study. In response to a question on how the study would be conducted, PT advised that a clustered, quasi-random sample would be used and a house to house survey. PT advised that the overall sample size would consist of around 5,000 addresses, which equated to approximately 9,500 people. Asked whether the issue of double registration would be included in the study. PT advised questions on this topic could be included in the survey (although this might need to be in place of others) but highlighted that data emerging from these questions would be attitudinal, rather than factual. A range of questions were asked around whether we could join together with other studies. PT advised that, although possible, it would take the specific focus away from accuracy and completeness of the register. PT said he would review the research landscape to understand whether compatible studies were being undertaken, with which we could collaborate. A question was asked regarding whether it was more appropriate to undertake the study following the local government elections in May, as opposed to a study in December 2018. PT explained that, at the moment, December was the preferred choice so as to provide a baseline for assessing the impact of any changes to the annual canvass. CB added that there had been delays to proposed changes in the canvass which meant that a May study now felt a bit premature. However, in the long term, a case could be made to consider moving future studies to May. It was noted that the next study would be undertaken in December 2018, and then consideration given to moving to a May timeframe in the future.

Business Plan 2018-19: Principles for Performance Measures KR presented a series of slides setting out the principles for performance measurement that would form the basis of measures included in the Business Plan 2018-19. KR highlighted the performance measures already contained in the Corporate Plan, and noted these would provide a framework for additional measures in the Business Plan. The issues of understanding what drove impact, and measuring impact, were discussed by the Board. CB highlighted that some work had been undertaken on this issue already, with the division of impact indicators (looking at activity with impacts our work but outside our direct control) and performance measures (activity which was within our control). It was noted that it would be beneficial to review and incorporate the policy recommendation tracker in this work on performance measures, to provide a clearer overview of our impact as an organisation. KR thanked Commissioners for their input and advised that further comments from the Board would be welcome outside of the meeting. It was noted that the first draft of performance measures supporting the Business Plan 2018-19 would be reviewed at the June Board meeting (27 June 2018) and that the policy recommendation tracker should be included on a future Board agenda.

Chief Executive's Update for March As noted in the Update, CB welcomed the involvement of Chloe Smith (Minister for the Constitution) in the launch of the anonymous voting changes and the work on electoral fraud. CB advised that the recent publication of UKPGE spending returns for larger parties had gone well, despite a slightly later than planned publication date. Focus was now on the local elections in May. AI updated on electoral registration work, highlighting our ongoing work with Cabinet Office on reforms to the annual canvass, and progress with our modernisation project, looking for example at using data in a more effective way. The Commission had produced guidance, in collaboration with the Information Commissioner's Office, Association of s (AEA) and Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE), on the impact of the General Data Protection Regulation which had been well received. AI advised that we were working on responses to two open consultations – the National Assembly for Wales consultation on electoral reform, where responses were due by early April, and the Scottish Government's consultation on electoral reform, where the response was due by 29 March. RP updated the Board on the first publication of political party donations in Northern Ireland on 12 March. RP also advised that, when reviewing the spending returns of parties with spending over £250K relating to the 2017 UKPGE, the team had identified a number of reporting issues with the majority of these returns. These were now subject to investigation. The Commission had been hosting training sessions for police on electoral fraud over the last six months. These had now concluded and had been well received by attendees, with a request for further sessions which we were reviewing. RP said that work was underway to produce a report on digital campaigning that was likely to be published in mid-May. In response to a question around digital campaigning, RP advised that we were working with the relevant authorities as part of our inquiries. LF updated on two legal matters. The judicial review brought by the Democrats had been dismissed. The claimant had now gone to the Court of Appeal to ask for leave of appeal. Judgement had been reserved in relation to the judicial review claim lodged by the Good Law Project. We would continue to monitor both cases. KR updated the Board on the NAO's interim audit update which had been presented at the Audit Committee on 20th March, advising that the interim audit had gone well. Preparations were underway for the year-end audit, which was due to take place in May. Quarter 3 Finance and Performance Report KT introduced the Quarter 3 report, noting that all Key Performance Measures had been achieved in the last quarter, aside from one relating to party registrations. This measure had not been achieved due to the volume of registration applications received. KT highlighted the Q3 financial position, with CB noting the Supplementary Estimate was approved by Speaker's Committee in January 2018. In response to a question on the finance summary and our income, KT undertook to rework the summary table to reflect income in a clearer manner. CB advised that she, Kieran Rix and John Holmes would be appearing before the Speaker's Committee on 27 March to seek approval for the Corporate Plan 2018-19 to 23-24 and the 18-19 Main Estimate. Noted. Annual Review of Corporate Governance Agreed: That the Corporate Governance Framework be approved, subject to the changes highlighted in the document. Forward Plan of Board business 2018-19 Noted. Decision-tracker for February The Chair discussed the action on the issue of shortage of EMS suppliers arising from the 18 January 2017 Board meeting. Noted. Chair's and Chief Executive's meetings, and meetings in devolved legislatures Noted. Commissioner wash-up

Public attitudes towards voting in England in the context of COVID-19 | Electoral Commission Search Public attitudes towards voting in England in the context of COVID-19 You are in the Public attitudes towards voting in the context of COVID-19 section Home Our research Public attitudes towards voting in the context of COVID-19 On this page Introduction Key findings Polling station voting Postal Voting Other findings First published: 20 January 2021 Last updated: 19 March 2021 Introduction In February 2021, we asked a representative sample of eligible voters in England about their attitudes towards voting during the pandemic. The questions covered attitudes towards postal voting and other options for the safe running of the election in 2021. This is a repeat of the work carried out in December 2020. This page provides a summary of findings from the latest of these studies, makes comparison with December. Key findings The key findings are consistent between December and February with voting in a polling place remaining the preferred option amongst a majority of voters although the results indicate a likely increase in the proportion of voters opting to use a postal vote at the May 2021 elections compared to previous polls. Polling station voting The majority said they would feel safe voting at the polling station. This was consistent between December (71%) and February (73%). When they are informed about the Covid safety measures, based on Electoral Commission guidance, there is an increase in the proportion who see in-person voting as safe (82%). Of those who would not feel safe, around 4 in 5 (82%) said there were no additional provisions that would make them feel safe voting at a polling station. 61% of BAME respondents in Great Britain said voting in person was safe compared to 75% of White respondents. Once told about the Electoral Commission guidance around safety measures 73% of BAME respondents feel safe voting in person compared with 84% of white respondents. Postal voting There was no change between December and February in the proportion of people who said they would vote by post (42%). 22% of people who normally vote in person said they intend to vote by post (23% in December). While this should not be taken as a reliable indicator of the number of people who will actually vote by mail this does indicate that there could be a significant uplift in the number of postal votes compared with previous polls. Other findings There has been an increase in the proportion of people who say that they would vote if an election was to take place now. Rising from 79% in December up to 88% in February. When presented with options on how the May elections could be conducted the most popular choice was to hold the poll largely as usual (40%). The second most popular choice was for the polling stations to be open more than one day (31%). 13% preferred an all postal vote and 8% wanted the election postponed for a short period. The only finding that was not consistent between December and February was the number of people thinking that it should be postponed doubled, albeit only from 4% to 8%. Just under a third (33%) of those people who intend to vote in person said that if their household had to isolate due to Covid-19 then they would not know someone able to vote for them. Just over half (53%) said they would. Background notes Background notes All figures, unless otherwise stated, are from work done for the Commission by YouGov Plc. For the February fieldwork, total sample size was 1894 adults. Fieldwork was undertaken between 29th January and 20th February 2021. The survey was carried out online. The figures have been weighted and are representative of all adults in England (aged 18+). For the December fieldwork, total sample size was 1,461 adults. Fieldwork was undertaken between 7th and 8th December 2020. The survey was carried out online. The figures have been weighted and are representative of all adults in England (aged 18+). Report on the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election | Electoral Commission Search Report on the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election

You are in the Northern Ireland Assembly elections section Home Northern Ireland Assembly elections Currently reading: of 4 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the election Campaigning at the election Delivering the election Supporting evidence Summary This report looks at how the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election was run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held this year in England , Scotland and Wales . On 5 May 2022, the Northern Ireland Assembly election was held. A total of 1,373,731 people were registered to vote, up from 1,254,709 at the last Assembly election on 2 March 2017. Overall our research shows that most people were confident that the election was well-run, and satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting remains high. However, the low levels of awareness of the Digital Registration Number (DRN) indicate that it may have been a barrier to some voters. As such we recommend that the UK Government reviews the operation of the DRN within the postal and proxy voting process to ensure it does not prevent people from accessing their vote. s were able to engage with voters using a variety of methods, with most people finding it easy to get information about the elections. However, a majority of candidates reported experiencing threats, abuse or intimidation. This behaviour has no place in our political system and it's important that all candidates and campaigners are able to freely participate in the democratic process. We will work with the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, despite challenging circumstances relating to capacity, resilience and the late confirmation of the approach by the UK Government regarding provisions for Covid. There were, however, some concerns raised relating to the efficiency of the count. We recommend that the Chief Electoral Officer builds on previous improvements to the first stages of the count process by examining where efficiencies can be made in relation to the latter stages of the count.

Voting at the election The experience of voters at the 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election Most people were confident that the 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election was well-run, and satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting remains high. Nine in 10 (93%) of polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person in light of Covid, and most voters were able to vote using their preferred method (91%). Nearly all voters found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. The low levels of awareness surrounding the Digital Registration Number may have been a barrier to some people accessing their vote.

Summary On 5 May 2022, the Northern Ireland Assembly election was held. A total of 1,373,731 people were registered to vote, up from 1,254,709 at the last Assembly election on 2 March 2017. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run. After each election we ask members of the public who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections, which helps us understand if views have changed since the last comparable election. Satisfaction with the registration and voting process remains high. People had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting. Our research shows that: 84% of people across Northern Ireland were satisfied with the process of registering to vote - this is consistent with the levels of satisfaction reported by people after the 2017 Assembly election. 95% of people across Northern Ireland were satisfied with the process of voting - this is broadly consistent with the 2019 UK

Parliamentary general election (97%) and is an increase from the 2017 Assembly election (87%) A majority of voters found polling stations safe in relation to Covid Unlike in the rest of the UK, there was no emergency proxy vote provision for people with Covid in Northern Ireland. This meant that, if someone became unwell as a result of Covid shortly before polling day, their only option to vote was to do so in person at a polling station. Despite the absence of such a provision, a majority of voters reported finding polling stations safe. 93% of voters found polling stations very or fairly safe in relation to Covid, although 4% of voters found them fairly or very unsafe. Most people were confident that the election was well-run When asked, 82% of people said they were confident that the election was well-run, while 8% were not confident. This is broadly consistent with the 2019 UK Parliamentary general election (83%) and is a slight decrease from the 2017 Assembly election (86%). Confidence that the election was well run was lower amongst those limited a lot by a disability/health condition, with 75% of such people saying they were confident the election was well-run and 12% not confident. Views about the safety of voting and whether electoral fraud is a problem were also consistent with the most recent comparable elections, with 84% of people saying they thought voting was safe from fraud and abuse. However, perceptions of electoral fraud remain high, with 20% of people surveyed saying they thought it was a problem. The main reason given by people who thought fraud had taken place was that they thought there was voter fraud happening by post, but they hadn't seen anything specific. Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) provide data to the Commission on alleged cases of electoral fraud. They have confirmed they received one report of suspected personation on polling day. Following an investigation no further action was taken as there was no evidence of an offence. Turnout at these elections was consistent with previous comparable elections Overall turnout at the election was 63.6%, a decrease of around one percentage point from the last Assembly election in 2017 (64.8%). However, given the increase in the number of people registered to vote for this election, the total number of ballot papers was higher (873,787 up from 812,783 in 2017). People who told us that they didn't vote were mostly likely to say this was because they did not have time. The most common reasons given were: Lack of time / too busy / I was busy at work (13%) You just can't trust politicians to keep their promises / voter's wishes ignored / politicians do not care / only in politics for their own benefit (9%) There was no point in voting because it was obvious who would win / my vote wouldn't have made a difference to the outcome / my vote doesn't count (8%) I didn't like the candidates / parties / they didn't represent my views (8%) I'm just not interested in politics / fed up with politics (7%) Medical/health reasons not related to Covid (7%) I was away on 5 May / voting day (7%) Methods of voting In Northern Ireland, people can apply to vote in one of three ways; in person, by post or by proxy (asking someone they trust to vote on their behalf). When applying for an absent vote, people must provide a valid reason why they cannot attend their polling station on polling day. This is different to the rest of the UK, where postal and proxy voting is available on demand. Voters who register to vote online (which has been available in Northern Ireland since 2018) are required to provide a Digital Registration Number (DRN) when applying to vote by post or proxy. The DRN is intended to be a digital replacement for the wet ink signature that is required on paper registration forms. It is supplied to voters when they register online, or can be requested from the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland. The DRN is not a requirement elsewhere in the UK. Methods of voting Most people could vote using their preferred method While most people report being able to vote using their preferred method of voting (91%), 6% of people say they were not able to vote using their preferred method. Voting by their preferred method was lower for people limited a lot by a disability or health issue, with 83% of those who voted in person saying it was their preferred method. There are low levels of awareness surrounding the Digital Registration Number. Alongside our large-scale voter registration campaign ‘Got 5?’ we ran a targeted online campaign to raise awareness of the Digital Registration Number (DRN). This campaign targeted those groups we knew were more likely to need a postal or proxy vote. The campaign directed voters to the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland’s website where they could request their DRN. This campaign was supported by both partnership and public relations activity. The Electoral Office for Northern Ireland received 8,161 requests for a DRN in the run up to the election. Despite efforts to raise awareness of the DRN, awareness levels remain low: 64% of people said they didn’t know you are given a DRN when you apply to register to vote online 5% of people said they lacked confidence in the election because they could not find or were confused by the DRN. In total there were 21,039 postal and proxy vote applications approved for the 2022 Assembly election, with 6,031 applications rejected. The main reason for rejection was that no DRN was provided (3,636). At the last Assembly election in 2017 there was no online registration and therefore no DRN. The total number of postal and proxy vote applications approved was significantly higher (29,590) and the rejection rate lower (2,345). Recommendation 1 Recommendation 1 The low levels of awareness and the large number of rejected postal and proxy applications due to a missing DRN indicate that it may have been a barrier to some voters, despite public awareness activity. We therefore recommend that the UK Government reviews the operation of the DRN within the postal and proxy voting process to ensure it does not prevent people from accessing their vote. Most people were confident they knew how to vote without making a mistake. Nearly all voters (98%) said that they found it easy to fill in their ballot paper, but some votes continue to be rejected and not included in the count. 11,074 ballot papers were rejected at the count, as the voter had not followed the instructions for marking it. This represents 1.3% of all votes cast. This was a slight increase compared to the 2017 Assembly election when 9,450 ballot papers were rejected, representing 1.2% of all votes cast. Campaigning at the election The experience of campaigning at the 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election s were able to engage with voters using a variety of methods, although concerns about Covid impacted campaigners. A majority of candidates responding to our survey said they experienced threats, abuse and/or intimidation. In most cases this related to the theft or damage of campaign materials, online and verbal abuse. It is important that candidates and campaigners are able to freely participate in our democratic processes, and we plan to meet with the wider electoral community to understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Most people found it easy to get information, but younger age groups feel less well informed about candidates. Transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online remains important for voters. Parties and candidates reported higher campaign spending than at any Assembly election since 2003, but overall spending by campaigners did not reach the limits that were set in law. Summary A total of 239 candidates stood for election to the Northern Ireland Assembly (compared with 228 in 2017), 87 of which were female candidates, representing 36.4% of all candidates. 17 political parties and 24 independent candidates contested the election. s were able to engage with voters using a variety of methods, although concerns about Covid impacted campaigners At the 2022 Assembly election, campaigners provided information in a variety of different

investigate or prosecute incidents of abuse, we are well placed with our expertise across elections to bring together those who have a role to play in addressing this issue. Recommendation 2 Recommendation 2 Urgent action is needed to tackle and prevent abuse and intimidation of candidates and campaigners at elections. Candidates and campaigners should be able to participate freely in the democratic process, ensuring that voters can hear from a range of voices during elections. We will work with the wider electoral community to tackle this cross-cutting issue and will invite PSNI, representatives from a range of political parties and the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland to a roundtable event on candidate abuse. The event will provide the opportunity to understand the recent experiences of candidates at the 2022 Assembly election and to explore what action can be taken to ensure candidates and campaigners can freely participate in our democratic processes. Most people found it easy to get information but younger age groups feel less well informed about candidates. Most voters found it easy to find information, but there is still a sizable proportion, particularly among younger age groups, who did not feel they had enough information about candidates. Our research after the election found that: 84% of people said they found it easy to find information on what the election was about a similar proportion (86%) felt that they found it easy to find information on the candidates and parties running for election 71% of people agreed that they had enough information on candidates to make an informed choice, although 12% disagreed 88% of people aged 65 and over said they had enough information on candidates to make an informed decision, compared to only 53% of 18-34 year olds. Transparency about who is responsible for election campaign material is important to build trust. Ahead of the 2022 Assembly election, imprint requirements on printed election material were brought into line with the law elsewhere in the UK. The change required all printed party and non-party campaign material to include an imprint. We welcome this change as it helps voters understand which parties and campaigners target them with printed election materials. However digital campaigning accounts for an increasingly large proportion of election spending and our research after the election confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections, with: 62% of people agreeing that it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online almost half (49%) saying they would trust digital campaigning material more if they knew who produced it 30% saying that they cannot find out who has produced the political information that they see online The UK Government has introduced legislation that will require most campaigners to include information to identify who has promoted and/or published their online campaign material in future. This new digital imprint requirement will help voters understand who is targeting them online with information at elections and referendums in future. These changes are expected to come into force from the end of 2023. We will monitor any impact of the new digital imprint requirement on people's level of confidence in political information online.

Candidates were able to access support to understand and comply with election law. The Commission focussed on providing candidates and parties with proactive support to understand and comply with political finance law, both before and after the election. Alongside our written guidance we delivered a range of pre-election seminars for candidates and parties on the spending and donation rules. Post-election, we delivered seminars for candidates and agents on completing their spending and donation returns and ran advice surgeries for parties where they could book an appointment to speak to us about specific issues. Our approach has been informed and led by the evidence and feedback we received in our most recent survey of the average of around 35% of what they were permitted to spend, but there was considerable variation between candidates: one candidate spent 98% of their permitted limit, while several (13) reported no regulated campaign spending at all. Three quarters of candidates (178 out of 239) spent less than half of the permitted amount, and only five candidates spent more than 80% of the amount they were allowed to spend. Parties reported they spent most money on advertising, while candidates spent the most on unsolicited material to voters. Parties reported that they spent a total of £251,312.02 on advertising during the campaign for the May 2022 Assembly election. This represented nearly half of all campaign spending reported by parties in 2022.

s spent more at this Assembly election than at recent elections, but did not reach permitted spending limits There are limits on how much campaigners can spend in the period during an election campaign. For parties and non-party campaigners, this 'regulated period' started on 5 January 2022 and ended on polling day. For candidates, the period started the day after they became a candidate. The earliest date a person could become a candidate was the date the Assembly was dissolved (28 March 2022). s have to declare what they spent, and we publish this information.

s reported more campaign spending than at recent Assembly elections There are limits on how much can be spent on campaigning during an election. These differ depending on if the spending is done at a party, non-party campaigner, or candidate level. At a party level, reported campaign spending totalled £515,434.29 during the regulated period for the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election. This total amount was more than at any Assembly election since 2003. Six parties reported no regulated campaign spending. The amount of spending reported by individual parties varied significantly, ranging from £125 to £178,199. For candidates, the total amount of campaign spending reported was £1,069,656.07. The average amount spent per candidate was £4,475.54. This was much higher than the average amounts spent per candidate at the Assembly elections in 2016 (£3,689) or 2017 (£2,852).

This was similar to most previous Assembly elections when advertising was also the largest single category of spending. In 2011, parties reported spending slightly more on campaign broadcasts than on advertising. Category Amount of spending reported (by parties) Advertising £251,312.02 Unsolicited material to electors £67,090.41 Market research/canvassing £62,028.00 Campaign broadcasts £51,239.19 Media £26,866.54 Rallies and other events £16,706.44 Transport £16,470.46 Manifesto or Referendum material £12,495.60 Overheads and general administration £11,225.63 Category 2 Amount of spending reported (by candidates) Advertising £449,433.08 Unsolicited material to electors £575,847.95 Transport £13,824.99 Public meetings £9,132.77 Agent and other staff costs £6,727.36 Accommodation and administration £12,501.10 Other authorised spending £23,848.15 Personal expenses £12,326.33 To compare, candidates spent the most on unsolicited material to voters. Candidates spent around 42% (£449,433.08) of their total spend on advertising and around 54% (£575,847.95) of their total spend on unsolicited materials sent to voters. This compares to 2017, where 59% of candidate spending was unsolicited materials to voters, and 39% on advertising.

The 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election was well run. The late confirmation of the approach relating to provisions for Covid impacted on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for the poll. Attracting and retaining experienced staff and the booking of venues continue to pose significant challenges for the Chief Electoral Officer. The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, although candidates raised some concerns relating to the efficiency of the count.

Delivering the election summary

The Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland is the registration officer and returning officer for all elections in Northern Ireland. The Chief Electoral Officer's duties include managing electoral registration, nominations, absent voting, polling stations and the counting of votes. Our evidence shows that these elections were well-run, and voters and campaigners reported high levels of confidence. However, underlying issues relating to capacity and resilience remain, with Covid further impacting the ability to attract and retain experienced staff. Early clarity on legislation is essential to support effective planning.

Late confirmation of the approach relating to provisions for Covid impacted on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for the poll. Unlike in the rest of the UK there was no emergency proxy vote provision for people with Covid in Northern Ireland. This meant that if someone became unwell as a result of Covid shortly before polling day, their only option was to vote in person at a polling station. The Electoral Commission and the Chief Electoral Officer sought clarity from the UK Government on what provisions would be in place to support voters to participate safely in the context of the Covid pandemic. The UK Government did not provide clarity until March 2022 that no legislative provisions would be introduced. This late decision impacted on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for the poll, and our ability to deliver clear information to voters on what to expect when voting on polling day.

Despite these challenges, and informed by the learnings and guidance we provided from the elections delivered in Great Britain in 2021, the Chief Electoral Officer put in place a range of public health measures for the safety of voters at polling stations. This included hand sanitisers, protective screens, ventilation and advice to wear a face covering. The Chief Electoral Officer needs early clarity to be able to deliver the changes introduced by the Elections Act Changes introduced by the Elections Act will present new challenges for the Chief Electoral Officer and the wider electoral community. It is important that the UK Government works with the electoral community in Northern Ireland and across the UK as a whole to ensure there is sufficient clarity on how the Elections Act is going to be implemented. Recommendation 3

Recommendation 3 The UK Government should provide early clarity on decisions that would impact on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for elections. All legislation relating to electoral events should be in place at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with to ensure appropriate time for planning. Capacity and resilience remains a significant challenge to the delivery of elections Concerns about resilience and capacity in relation to the delivery of elections remain, with Covid making it even more difficult to attract and retain experienced staff and book venues for polling stations. These issues are exacerbated by the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We continue to support the Law Commissions' review of electoral law which would simplify and improve electoral law across the UK, supporting the effective delivery of elections. Recruiting and retaining staff to work at the elections remained a problem The Chief Electoral Officer highlighted problems around recruiting and retaining experienced polling station and count staff, with a high number of recruits dropping out ahead of polling day. This issue is being seen across the UK, and has been exacerbated by the Covid pandemic. We will continue to work with the Chief Electoral Officer and the wider electoral community to develop and deliver proposals that will support more resilient electoral management.

Specifically, we have formed a sub-group of the UK Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board (ECAB) to discuss and identify solutions to the capacity and resilience challenges experienced by Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers across the UK. An immediate focus for this sub-group will be addressing the challenges around the recruitment of polling station staff. Challenges booking polling station venues Booking venues for polling stations is another aspect of managing the elections that has been highlighted as a continuing challenge. In part this appears to be an impact of Covid, with schools particularly reluctant to be used as polling stations. The ability for those running the polls to be able to access suitable venues is key to ensuring the smooth delivery of elections. The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, although candidates raised some concerns relating to the efficiency of the count The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, with a majority of voters (82%) and a majority of the candidates responding to our survey (78%) reporting they were confident the election was well run. The counting of votes was undertaken at three venues across Northern Ireland: Titanic Exhibition Centre in Belfast, Ulster University in Jordanstown, and Meadowbank Sports Arena in Magherafelt. Candidates raised concerns relating to the efficiency of the count Only 46% of respondents who attended the count reported that they were satisfied with how efficiently the count processes were run. Improvements introduced to the verification and primary sort in 2016 and 2017 supported the first stage of the count to move efficiently.

Verification of the used ballot papers began at 8am on Friday 5 May and by that afternoon a number of candidates had been deemed elected. However, unlike in 2017, the count was not completed on the same day, and it took until the early hours of Sunday 8 May for the last constituency to be declared. Historically election counts in Northern Ireland have taken two days to complete, with 2017 the first time a second day was not needed, in part due to how the votes transferred in the latter stages. At this year's election, there were many more stages of the count where only a small number of votes were able to be transferred at each stage, with more stages then needed before candidates had enough votes to get above the quota and be deemed elected.³ These challenges were exacerbated by the issue of retaining experienced count staff due to Covid. While the way the votes fell in an STV election and the dropout rates of experienced count staff contributed to the time-consuming nature of the count, we believe there remains the potential for improvements to be made to the latter stages of the count. Recommendation 4 Recommendation 4 The Chief Electoral Officer should build on previous improvements to the first stages of the count process by examining where efficiencies can be made to the latter stages of the count. This should include looking at what role technology could play. Concerns raised by candidates on access and facilities at the count A number of free text comments were also provided in our survey of candidates that related specifically to access and facilities at the count. The most common concerns raised related to traffic management, admissions to the count and the lack of facilities in some venues. While the issues highlighted will not have significantly impacted the time taken to complete the count, they will have added to the frustrations of some candidates. The Chief Electoral Officer's survey of count staff has identified similar concerns and as part of a process of continual improvement is committed to reviewing these. Supporting evidence Northern Ireland Assembly election May 2022 Public opinion research tables 2022 Northern Ireland Electoral data 1. The spending limit is calculated by adding together a base amount and a variable top up that takes into account the number of registered electors in the constituency contested. The spending limit is £8,700 plus 6% of the number of eligible voters (in borough constituencies) or 9% (in county constituencies). The four Belfast constituencies are borough constituencies. The other constituencies in Northern Ireland are county constituencies. Candidates standing in the same constituency that publish joint election material or use the same election agent are considered joint candidates and have lower spending limits as they are sharing some costs. If they are one of two joint candidates their limit is reduced by 25% and if they are one of three or more joint candidates their limit is reduced by 33%. ■ Back to content at footnote 1 2. The spending categories that candidates use are different to those for parties, however both include 'Advertising' and 'Unsolicited material to electors' as categories. ■ Back to content at footnote 2 3. In STV elections, voters rank candidates in order of preference. Any candidate who obtains enough first preference votes to reach the minimum required to be elected (known as the quota), is deemed elected. If a voter's first-choice candidate does not get elected, or if they are elected with more votes than the next candidate, their vote can be transferred to help elect their second choice and so on. If no candidate has reached the quota at the end of a stage, the candidate with the lowest numbers of votes is excluded and their votes transferred. ■ Back to content at footnote 3 Page history First

He requested three key actions for the panel: for them to make candidate data available to Democracy Club, to tell candidates about it and to inform the Democracy Club about the needs of political parties and candidates. DB raised concerns about whether this would be considered election spending. BP explained that it possibly would, but queried whether there would necessarily be a tangible cost and said that providing information is important. SM suggested that if the same opportunity was available to all candidates then it does not favour any candidate, in line with Electoral Commission hustings advice. DB raised concerns about the handling of data in light of GDPR. SR clarified that Democracy Club uses public open data and that candidates are invited to provide their own data. AW advised Democracy Club to seek advice from the Information Commissioner's Office. PB asked whether Democracy Club had contacted Electoral Registration Officers directly for this information. SR responded that they had but had seen varied success rates. DB and AW asked about the moderation and accuracy of crowdsourced data. SR explained the cross checking process. AW thanked Democracy Club for their presentation. Minutes of the last meeting and actions arising (ECPPP 05/06/2018) GD pointed out an error in the previous meeting minutes. CW responded that they would be corrected. NV requested that the minutes be circulated earlier. CW suggested that the minutes be circulated to the chair and panel at the same time. This was agreed. AW asked when a meeting would be set up to review the progress of the new PFR online system. BP responded that Carol Sweetenham would arrange the meeting and it was agreed that it should be on the same day as the planned guidance meeting for the convenience of those not based in London. Digital Campaigning report BP gave an update to the group on the Commission's recently published digital campaigning report. He explained that the Commission was now waiting to see how the government responds, and noted that the Cabinet Office are currently consulting on the possibility of requiring imprints on digital campaigning material. BP encouraged panel members to respond to the consultation. AW requested further information about revised spending categories. BP stated that the codes of practice provide further definition but legislative change would be required for anything further. AW responded that Labour is not opposed to transparency of finances, but noted that the guidance needs to work. DB asked BP what would take place if legislation is not changed. BP responded that the codes of practice will help. SM suggested the requirements for digital materials could be different from printed ones, noting that on printed materials this could be a P.O. Box, which is unlikely to be suitable for digital campaign materials. The panel discussed whether having correct WHOIS data for a website domain should be sufficient when the purpose of the imprint is traceability. AW added that the medium should fit the channel so on digital materials it could be a website. CW responded that questions of what form an imprint might take were covered in the Cabinet Office consultation. AW asked whether the Commission had been in contact with social media platforms in light of the report. BP explained that the Commission continued to be in dialogue with social media companies, but noted that he was unsure how far they would be voluntarily willing to go. Electoral Observers consultation CW drew the panel's attention to the Commission's consultation on electoral observers and encouraged them to respond. SM raised a concern that some elements of the revised scheme seemed to apply equally to international observers and to UK residents, which he argued was not appropriate. He added that electoral observation should not be used by parties as a method of getting more supporters into the count. He gave the example of the need for strict political impartiality during leisure time, which is appropriate for international observers but not for national observers who have a vote in the election. Codes of practice on election spending BP referred to an update given at a previous meeting on the codes of practice and stated that the panel's feedback had been incorporated, but the themes were the same. He added that the drafts should now read better and offer more clarity, and that the Commission would appreciate consultation responses from panel members. AW asked whether the drafting takes into account the recent Supreme Court ruling. BP confirmed that it did. GD stated that translation costs should be exempt from spending rules. SM added that creation of easy read manifestos should also be exempt to encourage parties to create them. Other panel members added that braille versions and a person to sign for a deaf candidate should be exempted also. BP responded that in principle the Commission supported this. DB asked whether there was any possibility of raising the candidate spending limit. AW added that the distinction between the long and short campaign could be removed. BP noted that these may be points panel members want to raise in their consultation responses to the draft codes. Following the consultation the Commission currently plan to submit the Codes, and highlight any key submissions received to the Cabinet Office minister. They can take forward changes in the law. AW confirmed that panel members would respond to the consultation. PFR Online and Modern Guidance projects BP updated the panel that the projects are moving forward. He added that they were challenging but that it is important that they happen. DB asked whether a date had been decided for the new PFR online system. BP responded that the Commission has set a presently realistic goal for it to be working by the end of next summer. PB suggested that it would be optimal for the new system to be working for Quarter 1. The panel agreed. Any other business AW stated that the panel is collectively concerned about the Commission's firmer regulatory and enforcement approach. He stated that for example it appears that the Commission has changed its approach on regulation of late reporting. He added that it was important the panel was consulted in advance of any internal policy changes. BP agreed that the Commission has become more firm in its regulatory approach, and indicated this is likely to continue. He added that there is a view that more could be done by parties to invest in internal governance to assist themselves and panel members to enable regulatory compliance. The panel responded that the parties are voluntary organisations often reliant on volunteers to complete financial reporting, and that action by the Commission can be off-putting to volunteers. BP and SM discussed an instance where a compliance warning had been issued incorrectly by the Commission. BP assured that this was an isolated case and was not in line with usual practice. BP stated that the rules had been in place a long time and he believed the Commission's approach is proportionate. However, he stated that he did not underestimate the challenge parties face. You are in the Northern Ireland Assembly elections section Home Northern Ireland Assembly elections Currently reading: of 4 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the election Campaigning at the election Delivering the election Supporting evidence Summary This report looks at how the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election was run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held this year in England , Scotland and Wales . On 5 May 2022, the Northern Ireland Assembly election was held. A total of 1,373,731 people were registered to vote, up from 1,254,709 at the last Assembly election on 2 March 2017. Overall our research shows that most people were confident that the election was well-run, and satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting remains high. However, the low levels of awareness of the Digital Registration Number (DRN) indicate that it may have been a barrier to some voters. As such we recommend that the UK Government reviews the operation of the DRN within the postal and proxy voting process to ensure it does not prevent people from accessing their vote. s were able to engage with voters using a variety of methods, with most people finding it easy to get information about the elections. However, a majority of candidates reported experiencing threats, abuse or intimidation. This behaviour has no place in our political system and it's important that all candidates and campaigners are able to freely participate in the democratic process. We will work with the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, despite challenging circumstances relating to capacity, resilience and the late confirmation of the approach by the UK Government regarding provisions for Covid. There were, however, some concerns raised relating to the efficiency of the count. We recommend that the Chief Electoral Officer builds on previous improvements to the first stages of the count process by examining where efficiencies can be made in relation to the latter stages of the count. Voting at the election The experience of voters at the 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election Most people were confident that the 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election was well-run, and satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting remains high. Nine in 10 (93%) of polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person in light of Covid, and most voters were able to vote using their preferred method (91%). Nearly all voters found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. The low levels of awareness surrounding the Digital Registration Number may have been a barrier to some people accessing their vote. Summary On 5 May 2022, the Northern Ireland Assembly election was held. A total of 1,373,731 people were registered to vote, up from 1,254,709 at the last Assembly election on 2 March 2017. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run After each election we ask members of the public who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections, which helps us understand if views have changed since the last comparable election. Satisfaction with the registration and voting process remains high People had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting. Our research shows that: 84% of people across Northern Ireland were satisfied with the process of registering to vote - this is consistent with the levels of satisfaction reported by people after the 2017 Assembly election 95% of people across Northern Ireland were satisfied with the process of voting - this is broadly consistent with the 2019 UK

Parliamentary general election (97%) and is an increase from the 2017 Assembly election (87%) A majority of voters found polling stations safe in relation to Covid Unlike in the rest of the UK, there was no emergency proxy vote provision for people with Covid in Northern Ireland. This meant that, if someone became unwell as a result of Covid shortly before polling day, their only option to vote was to do so in person at a polling station. Despite the absence of such a provision, a majority of voters reported finding polling stations safe. 93% of voters found polling stations very or fairly safe in relation to Covid, although 4% of voters found them fairly or very unsafe. Most people were confident that the election was well-run When asked, 82% of people said they were confident that the election was well-run, while 8% were not confident. This is broadly consistent with the 2019 UK Parliamentary general election (83%) and is a slight decrease from the 2017 Assembly election (86%). Confidence that the election was well run was lower amongst those limited a lot by a disability/health condition, with 75% of such people saying they were confident the election was well-run and 12% not confident. Views about the safety of voting and whether electoral fraud is a problem were also consistent with the most recent comparable elections, with 84% of people saying they thought voting was safe from fraud and abuse. However, perceptions of electoral fraud remain high, with 20% of people surveyed saying they thought it was a problem. The main reason given by people who thought fraud had taken place was that they thought there was voter fraud happening by post, but they hadn't seen anything specific. Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) provide data to the Commission on alleged cases of electoral fraud. They have confirmed they received one report of suspected personation on polling day. Following an investigation no further action was taken as there was no evidence of an offence. Turnout at these elections was consistent with previous comparable elections Overall turnout at the election was 63.6%, a decrease of around one percentage point from the last Assembly election in 2017 (64.8%). However, given the increase in the number of people registered to vote for this election, the total number of ballot papers was higher (873,787 up from 812,783 in 2017). People who told us that they didn't vote were mostly likely to say this was because they did not have time. The most common reasons given were: Lack of time / too busy / I was busy at work (13%) You just can't trust politicians to keep their promises / voter's wishes ignored / politicians do not care / only in politics for their own benefit (9%) There was no point in voting because it was obvious who would win / my vote wouldn't have made a difference to the outcome / my vote doesn't count (8%) I didn't like the candidates / parties / they didn't represent my views (8%) I'm just not interested in politics / fed up with politics (7%) Medical/health reasons not related to Covid (7%) I was away on 5 May / voting day (7%) Methods of voting In Northern Ireland, people can apply to vote in one of three ways; in person, by post or by proxy (asking someone they trust to vote on their behalf). When applying for an absent vote, people must provide a valid reason why they cannot attend their polling station on polling day. This is different to the rest of the UK, where postal and proxy voting is available on demand. Voters who register to vote online (which has been available in Northern Ireland since 2018) are required to provide a Digital Registration Number (DRN) when applying to vote by post or proxy. The DRN is intended to be a digital replacement for the wet ink signature that is required on paper registration forms. It is supplied to voters when they register online, or can be requested from the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland. The DRN is not a requirement elsewhere in the UK. Methods of voting Most people could vote using their preferred method While most people report being able to vote using their preferred method of voting (91%), 6% of people say they were not able to vote using their preferred method. Voting by their preferred method was lower for people limited a lot by a disability or health issue, with 83% of those who voted in person saying it was their preferred method. There are low levels of awareness surrounding the Digital Registration Number. Alongside our large-scale voter registration campaign ‘Got 5?’ we ran a targeted online campaign to raise awareness of the Digital Registration Number (DRN). This campaign targeted those groups we knew were more likely to need a postal or proxy vote. The campaign directed voters to the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland’s website where they could request their DRN. This campaign was supported by both partnership and public relations activity. The Electoral Office for Northern Ireland received 8,161 requests for a DRN in the run up to the election. Despite efforts to raise awareness of the DRN, awareness levels remain low: 64% of people said they didn’t know you are given a DRN when you apply to register to vote online 5% of people said they lacked confidence in the election because they could not find or were confused by the DRN. In total there were 21,039 postal and proxy vote applications approved for the 2022 Assembly election, with 6,031 applications rejected. The main reason for rejection was that no DRN was provided (3,636). At the last Assembly election in 2017 there was no online registration and therefore no DRN. The total number of postal and proxy vote applications approved was significantly higher (29,590) and the rejection rate lower (2,345). Recommendation 1 Recommendation 1 The low levels of awareness and the large number of rejected postal and proxy applications due to a missing DRN indicate that it may have been a barrier to some voters, despite public awareness activity. We therefore recommend that the UK Government reviews the operation of the DRN within the postal and proxy voting process to ensure it does not prevent people from accessing their vote. Most people were confident they knew how to vote without making a mistake. Nearly all voters (98%) said that they found it easy to fill in their ballot paper, but some votes continue to be rejected and not included in the count. 11,074 ballot papers were rejected at the count, as the voter had not followed the instructions for marking it. This represents 1.3% of all votes cast. This was a slight increase compared to the 2017 Assembly election when 9,450 ballot papers were rejected, representing 1.2% of all votes cast. Campaigning at the election The experience of campaigning at the 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election s were able to engage with voters using a variety of methods, although concerns about Covid impacted campaigners. A majority of candidates responding to our survey said they experienced threats, abuse and/or intimidation. In most cases this related to the theft or damage of campaign materials, online and verbal abuse. It is important that candidates and campaigners are able to freely participate in our democratic processes, and we plan to meet with the wider electoral community to understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Most people found it easy to get information, but younger age groups feel less well informed about candidates. Transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online remains important for voters. Parties and candidates reported higher campaign spending than at any Assembly election since 2003, but overall spending by campaigners did not reach the limits that were set in law. Summary A total of 239 candidates stood for election to the Northern Ireland Assembly (compared with 228 in 2017), 87 of which were female candidates, representing 36.4% of all candidates. 17 political parties and 24 independent candidates contested the election. s were able to engage with voters using a variety of methods, although concerns about Covid impacted campaigners At the 2022 Assembly election, campaigners provided information in a variety of different

investigate or prosecute incidents of abuse, we are well placed with our expertise across elections to bring together those who have a role to play in addressing this issue. Recommendation 2 Recommendation 2 Urgent action is needed to tackle and prevent abuse and intimidation of candidates and campaigners at elections. Candidates and campaigners should be able to participate freely in the democratic process, ensuring that voters can hear from a range of voices during elections. We will work with the wider electoral community to tackle this cross-cutting issue and will invite PSNI, representatives from a range of political parties and the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland to a roundtable event on candidate abuse. The event will provide the opportunity to understand the recent experiences of candidates at the 2022 Assembly election and to explore what action can be taken to ensure candidates and campaigners can freely participate in our democratic processes. Most people found it easy to get information but younger age groups feel less well informed about candidates. Most voters found it easy to find information, but there is still a sizable proportion, particularly among younger age groups, who did not feel they had enough information about candidates. Our research after the election found that: 84% of people said they found it easy to find information on what the election was about a similar proportion (86%) felt that they found it easy to find information on the candidates and parties running for election 71% of people agreed that they had enough information on candidates to make an informed choice, although 12% disagreed 88% of people aged 65 and over said they had enough information on candidates to make an informed decision, compared to only 53% of 18-34 year olds. Transparency about who is responsible for election campaign material is important to build trust. Ahead of the 2022 Assembly election, imprint requirements on printed election material were brought into line with the law elsewhere in the UK. The change required all printed party and non-party campaign material to include an imprint. We welcome this change as it helps voters understand which parties and campaigners target them with printed election materials. However digital campaigning accounts for an increasingly large proportion of election spending and our research after the election confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections, with: 62% of people agreeing that it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online almost half (49%) saying they would trust digital campaigning material more if they knew who produced it 30% saying that they cannot find out who has produced the political information that they see online The UK Government has introduced legislation that will require most campaigners to include information to identify who has promoted and/or published their online campaign material in future. This new digital imprint requirement will help voters understand who is targeting them online with information at elections and referendums in future. These changes are expected to come into force from the end of 2023. We will monitor any impact of the new digital imprint requirement on people's level of confidence in political information online.

Candidates were able to access support to understand and comply with election law. The Commission focussed on providing candidates and parties with proactive support to understand and comply with political finance law, both before and after the election. Alongside our written guidance we delivered a range of pre-election seminars for candidates and parties on the spending and donation rules. Post-election, we delivered seminars for candidates and agents on completing their spending and donation returns and ran advice surgeries for parties where they could book an appointment to speak to us about specific issues. Our approach has been informed and led by the evidence and feedback we received in our most recent survey of the average of around 35% of what they were permitted to spend, but there was considerable variation between candidates: one candidate spent 98% of their permitted limit, while several (13) reported no regulated campaign spending at all. Three quarters of candidates (178 out of 239) spent less than half of the permitted amount, and only five candidates spent more than 80% of the amount they were allowed to spend. Parties reported they spent most money on advertising, while candidates spent the most on unsolicited material to voters. Parties reported that they spent a total of £251,312.02 on advertising during the campaign for the May 2022 Assembly election. This represented nearly half of all campaign spending reported by parties in 2022.

s spent more at this Assembly election than at recent elections, but did not reach permitted spending limits There are limits on how much campaigners can spend in the period during an election campaign. For parties and non-party campaigners, this 'regulated period' started on 5 January 2022 and ended on polling day. For candidates, the period started the day after they became a candidate. The earliest date a person could become a candidate was the date the Assembly was dissolved (28 March 2022). s have to declare what they spent, and we publish this information.

This was similar to most previous Assembly elections when advertising was also the largest single category of spending. In 2011, parties reported spending slightly more on campaign broadcasts than on advertising. Category Amount of spending reported (by parties) Advertising £251,312.02 Unsolicited material to electors £67,090.41 Market research/canvassing £62,028.00 Campaign broadcasts £51,239.19 Media £26,866.54 Rallies and other events £16,706.44 Transport £16,470.46 Manifesto or Referendum material £12,495.60 Overheads and general administration £11,225.63 Category 2 Amount of spending reported (by candidates) Advertising £449,433.08 Unsolicited material to electors £575,847.95 Transport £13,824.99 Public meetings £9,132.77 Agent and other staff costs £6,727.36 Accommodation and administration £12,501.10 Other authorised spending £23,848.15 Personal expenses £12,326.33 To compare, candidates spent the most on unsolicited material to voters. Candidates spent around 42% (£449,433.08) of their total spend on advertising and around 54% (£575,847.95) of their total spend on unsolicited materials sent to voters. This compares to 2017, where 59% of candidate spending was unsolicited materials to voters, and 39% on advertising.

The 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election was well run. The late confirmation of the approach relating to provisions for Covid impacted on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for the poll. Attracting and retaining experienced staff and the booking of venues continue to pose significant challenges for the Chief Electoral Officer. The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, although candidates raised some concerns relating to the efficiency of the count.

The Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland is the registration officer and returning officer for all elections in Northern Ireland. The Chief Electoral Officer's duties include managing electoral registration, nominations, absent voting, polling stations and the counting of votes. Our evidence shows that these elections were well-run, and voters and campaigners reported high levels of confidence. However, underlying issues relating to capacity and resilience remain, with Covid further impacting the ability to attract and retain experienced staff. Early clarity on legislation is essential to support effective planning.

Late confirmation of the approach relating to provisions for Covid impacted on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for the poll. Unlike in the rest of the UK there was no emergency proxy vote provision for people with Covid in Northern Ireland. This meant that if someone became unwell as a result of Covid shortly before polling day, their only option was to vote in person at a polling station. The Electoral Commission and the Chief Electoral Officer sought clarity from the UK Government on what provisions would be in place to support voters to participate safely in the context of the Covid pandemic. The UK Government did not provide clarity until March 2022 that no legislative provisions would be introduced. This late decision impacted on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for the poll, and our ability to deliver clear information to voters on what to expect when voting on polling day.

Despite these challenges, and informed by the learnings and guidance we provided from the elections delivered in Great Britain in 2021, the Chief Electoral Officer put in place a range of public health measures for the safety of voters at polling stations. This included hand sanitisers, protective screens, ventilation and advice to wear a face covering. The Chief Electoral Officer needs early clarity to be able to deliver the changes introduced by the Elections Act Changes introduced by the Elections Act will present new challenges for the Chief Electoral Officer and the wider electoral community. It is important that the UK Government works with the electoral community in Northern Ireland and across the UK as a whole to ensure there is sufficient clarity on how the Elections Act is going to be implemented. Recommendation 3

Recommendation 3 The UK Government should provide early clarity on decisions that would impact on the Chief Electoral Officer's ability to plan for elections. All legislation relating to electoral events should be in place at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with to ensure appropriate time for planning. Capacity and resilience remains a significant challenge to the delivery of elections Concerns about resilience and capacity in relation to the delivery of elections remain, with Covid making it even more difficult to attract and retain experienced staff and book venues for polling stations. These issues are exacerbated by the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We continue to support the Law Commissions' review of electoral law which would simplify and improve electoral law across the UK, supporting the effective delivery of elections. Recruiting and retaining staff to work at the elections remained a problem The Chief Electoral Officer highlighted problems around recruiting and retaining experienced polling station and count staff, with a high number of recruits dropping out ahead of polling day. This issue is being seen across the UK, and has been exacerbated by the Covid pandemic. We will continue to work with the Chief Electoral Officer and the wider electoral community to develop and deliver proposals that will support more resilient electoral management.

Specifically, we have formed a sub-group of the UK Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board (ECAB) to discuss and identify solutions to the capacity and resilience challenges experienced by Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers across the UK. An immediate focus for this sub-group will be addressing the challenges around the recruitment of polling station staff. Challenges booking polling station venues Booking venues for polling stations is another aspect of managing the elections that has been highlighted as a continuing challenge. In part this appears to be an impact of Covid, with schools particularly reluctant to be used as polling stations. The ability for those running the polls to be able to access suitable venues is key to ensuring the smooth delivery of elections. The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, although candidates raised some concerns relating to the efficiency of the count The administration of polling day and the count generally went well, with a majority of voters (82%) and a majority of the candidates responding to our survey (78%) reporting they were confident the election was well run. The counting of votes was undertaken at three venues across Northern Ireland: Titanic Exhibition Centre in Belfast, Ulster University in Jordanstown, and Meadowbank Sports Arena in Magherafelt. Candidates raised concerns relating to the efficiency of the count Only 46% of respondents who attended the count reported that they were satisfied with how efficiently the count processes were run. Improvements introduced to the verification and primary sort in 2016 and 2017 supported the first stage of the count to move efficiently.

Verification of the used ballot papers began at 8am on Friday 5 May and by that

afternoon a number of candidates had been deemed elected. However, unlike in 2017, the count was not completed on the same day, and it took until the early hours of Sunday 8 May for the last constituency to be declared. Historically election counts in Northern Ireland have taken two days to complete, with 2017 the first time a second day was not needed, in part due to how the votes transferred in the latter stages. At this year's election, there were many more stages of the count where only a small number of votes were able to be transferred at each stage, with more stages then needed before candidates had enough votes to get above the quota and be deemed elected.³ These challenges were exacerbated by the issue of retaining experienced count staff due to Covid. While the way the votes fell in an STV election and the dropout rates of experienced count staff contributed to the time-consuming nature of the count, we believe there remains the potential for improvements to be made to the latter stages of the count. Recommendation 4 Recommendation 4 The Chief Electoral Officer should build on previous improvements to the first stages of the count process by examining where efficiencies can be made to the latter stages of the count. This should include looking at what role technology could play. Concerns raised by candidates on access and facilities at the count A number of free text comments were also provided in our survey of candidates that related specifically to access and facilities at the count. The most common concerns raised related to traffic management, admissions to the count and the lack of facilities in some venues. While the issues highlighted will not have significantly impacted the time taken to complete the count, they will have added to the frustrations of some candidates. The Chief Electoral Officer's survey of count staff has identified similar concerns and as part of a process of continual improvement is committed to reviewing these. Supporting evidence Northern Ireland Assembly election May 2022 Public opinion research tables 2022 Northern Ireland Electoral data 1. The spending limit is calculated by adding together a base amount and a variable top up that takes into account the number of registered electors in the constituency contested. The spending limit is £8,700 plus 6% of the number of eligible voters (in borough constituencies) or 9% (in county constituencies). The four Belfast constituencies are borough constituencies. The other constituencies in Northern Ireland are county constituencies. Candidates standing in the same constituency that publish joint election material or use the same election agent are considered joint candidates and have lower spending limits as they are sharing some costs. If they are one of two joint candidates their limit is reduced by 25% and if they are one of three or more joint candidates their limit is reduced by 33%. ■ Back to content at footnote 1 2. The spending categories that candidates use are different to those for parties, however both include 'Advertising' and 'Unsolicited material to electors' as categories. ■ Back to content at footnote 2 3. In STV elections, voters rank candidates in order of preference. Any candidate who obtains enough first preference votes to reach the minimum required to be elected (known as the quota), is deemed elected. If a voter's first-choice candidate does not get elected, or if they are elected with more votes than the next candidate, their vote can be transferred to help elect their second choice and so on. If no candidate has reached the quota at the end of a stage, the candidate with the lowest numbers of votes is excluded and their votes transferred. ■ Back to content at footnote 3 Page history First

Feasibility studies: scope and approach You are in the Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies section Home A modern electoral register

Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies First published: 19 July 2019 Last updated: 8 June 2021 Feasibility studies: scope and approach We conducted feasibility studies to explore the technical, operational and resource requirements necessary to deliver a number of electoral registration reforms, including: better use of public data by Electoral Registration Officers (EROs); direct or automatic enrolment processes; integrating electoral registration into other public service transactions; and the better identification and management of duplicate registration applications.

Summary

We began the feasibility studies by identifying reliable information already collected by government departments and agencies, which could potentially be used to support each of the electoral registration reforms. We also conducted research on existing public sector data infrastructures to explore the extent to which they could be used or developed further to support reform. We discussed the proposed reforms with key stakeholders to better understand their requirements and gain insight into the challenges they face in managing electoral registration, particularly in relation to making use of data. We developed and tested a number of implementation scenarios for each of the proposed reforms. We also undertook desk research on other countries' experiences of electoral registration reform to further inform the feasibility studies and our understanding of whether models from overseas could be applied or adapted to the UK.

Purpose and scope of the feasibility studies

The purpose of the feasibility studies was to identify the technical, operational and resource requirements necessary to deliver the following electoral registration reforms in the UK:

- Purpose and scope of the feasibility studies
- Better use of public data
- EROs can currently access data held locally by local authorities and others to help identify potential electors and manage their electoral registers. We wanted to explore the potential benefits of enabling access to national level public data, to identify people who have changed address and updated their details with other public services, for example when they have applied for a driving licence or passport.
- Direct or automatic enrolment processes
- We examined options for increasing the level of automation within the electoral registration system: automated registration, where reliable data would serve as the basis of an individual's electoral registration application, but citizens would still be required to take some steps to complete the process; and automatic registration, where citizens would be added to the electoral register, or their address updated, without them being required to take any active steps.
- Integrating electoral registration into other public service transactions
- We examined the extent to which electoral registration applications could be made simultaneously as part of or alongside accessing other public services.
- Better identification and management of duplicate registration applications
- We also considered a number of potential ways in which duplicate applications might be better identified and managed within the system. We wanted to understand the extent to which reforms could reduce the administrative impact of processing duplicate applications and help voters check whether they were already registered to vote.
- How we conducted the feasibility studies
- Mapping public sector data sources and infrastructures
- We sought to identify reliable information (principally the core information about voting eligibility) already collected by government departments and agencies (referred to in this report as Data Source Organisations or DSOs), which could potentially be used to support each of the electoral registration reforms. We made contact with the Driver and

Vehicle Licensing Agency, HM Revenue and Customs, HM Passport Office, Department of Work and Pensions, Department for Education and the Education and Skills Funding Agency to discuss the databases they hold and to explore opportunities to share public data with EROs. We also wanted to find out about the public sector data infrastructures that could be utilised or developed further to support reform. We were particularly interested in the extent to which the IER Digital Service, EMS systems and any planned upgrading of infrastructures could help deliver any or all of the reforms. We discussed these points with officials from a number of UK Government departments, including Cabinet Office officials working on the UK Government's Modernising Electoral Registration Programme, and representatives of EMS suppliers.

Wider stakeholder consultation It was also important to discuss the proposed reforms with other key stakeholders to better understand their requirements and gain insight into the challenges they face in managing electoral registration, particularly in relation to making use of data. We therefore had discussions with the following organisations and groups: Association of s Elections, Referendums and Registration Working Group Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board Electoral Office for Northern Ireland Scottish Assessors Association Society of Local Authority Chief Executives Wales Electoral Coordination Board Wales Electoral Practitioners' Working Group We particularly wanted to explore with stakeholders their views on how they saw the reforms working in practice and the specific features and capabilities that would be needed. One clear area of interest concerned the structural implications of any reform; in particular, whether a more joined-up system could be integrated into the current, largely decentralised system of electoral registration (at least in Great Britain), or whether a greater degree of centralisation would be required. A further area of discussion focused on the functional requirements of the reforms, i.e. what would key stakeholders expect any new electoral registration process to do? Examples might be for the system to enable EROs to receive up-to-date information from other public bodies about citizens potentially eligible to register; for it to be compatible with existing EMS systems; or for it to be simple to use and therefore require minimal training to operate. Developing implementation scenarios For each of the reforms being considered we developed a number of implementation scenarios as a precursor to testing their feasibility. In order to do this, we applied a feasibility framework called TELOS to each of the implementation scenarios. TELOS is an acronym for the five main areas to be taken into account in a feasibility study: Technical feasibility : what technology would be necessary to implement the electoral registration reform? What additional hardware and software would be required in developing workable solutions? Economic feasibility : what would the estimated cost of implementing and maintaining the reform be? How would the cost compare to the estimated benefits gained from the reform? Legal feasibility : could the reform be delivered under existing legislative provisions or would there need to be changes to legislation? Operational feasibility : what operational changes would need to be put in place to support the reform? How would the reform work across the electoral community? Would additional resources be required? Would the reform be managed centrally or locally? Scheduling feasibility : what would the timeframe be for implementing each of the reforms for governments, DSOs, suppliers and local authorities? What level of coordination would be required? We also undertook a gap analysis in order to identify in broad terms the work necessary to bridge the gap between the current electoral registration system and the scenarios explored by the feasibility studies. Electoral registration framework We also assessed each implementation scenario against our framework for developing priorities for electoral registration, which states that the registration system should:

- Maintain or improve current levels of accuracy and completeness
- Make it as easy as possible for electors to ensure their own registration record is accurate and complete, particularly ahead of elections and referendums
- Deliver improved public confidence in, understanding of and satisfaction with the system of registering to vote
- Make better use of resources across the public sector and be more cost-effective
- Be centred on using trusted data and information
- Recognise that registration is year-round and not only focused in the autumn or in the immediate lead-up to an electoral event
- Support innovation and ensure best practices are implemented
- Enable performance to be demonstrated in a consistent and accurate way, with a focus on outcomes rather than outputs
- Be sufficiently flexible to recognise the different challenges faced in different parts of the UK

International comparisons

A range of new and established democracies around the world have already made significant changes to their systems, reflecting rapidly changing demographic and digital communication trends. Several countries have, for example, implemented more datadriven and flexible electoral registration approaches, including more direct or automatic enrolment procedures.

We therefore undertook desk research on other countries' experiences of electoral registration reform to further inform the feasibility studies and our understanding of whether models from overseas could be applied or adapted to the UK.

Conducting elections under coronavirus restrictions | Electoral Commission Search
Conducting elections under coronavirus restrictions You are in the Our research section Home Our research On this page Summary Lessons from our observations Background First published: 8 January 2021 Last updated: 8 January 2021 Overview This report summarises key lessons learned from our observations of the Scottish Council by-elections held in the autumn of 2020 under coronavirus restrictions. Summary Eight council by-elections were held in Scotland between 1 October and 26 November 2020, against the backdrop of the coronavirus pandemic and associated restrictions. These by-elections have been the only electoral events held in the UK since the Coronavirus Act 2020 introduced provisions to postpone elections due to the pandemic. We observed the administration of the by-elections and have identified a number of lessons relevant to preparations for the May 2021 polls. We have used these lessons to inform the supplementary guidance and resources we have issued to administrators for the May 2021 polls. Our main findings are as follows: Elections can be conducted safely under coronavirus restrictions. Returning Officers must however take additional steps to ensure that public health advice around physical distancing, proper hand hygiene, and the use of face coverings is followed at key election events. It takes more time to plan and costs more to deliver. Returning Officers will need to ensure that their planning arrangements are robust and that they are adequately resourced to deliver the election. Venues and staffing are crucial. Returning Officers should consider whether the venues they plan to use for polling and other election proceedings, including the count, allow for physical distancing. Returning Officers must also consider whether they will need additional staff to assist with key aspects of the election in the coronavirus context. Early engagement with key stakeholders including political parties, candidates and agents, as well as suppliers, is important, especially where normal arrangements may need to be adapted in line with coronavirus restrictions and public health advice. Many voters are still choosing to vote in person. Returning Officers will nevertheless need to consider how they communicate the key messages that polling stations will be safe places to vote; that there are a range of voting options open to voters; and that those who would prefer to vote by post should apply early. Lessons from our observations Planning and preparation Elections can be conducted safely against the backdrop of coronavirus restrictions, but Returning Officers will need to risk assess key proceedings and put in place appropriate mitigations and additional measures to ensure that public health advice around physical distancing, proper hand hygiene and the use of face coverings is followed. The experience of Returning Officers from the by-elections was that planning and delivery was more complicated due to factors including: staff being largely home based which made co-ordinating activity more difficult the need to risk assess and adapt key proceedings and venues to ensure that physical distancing requirements could be met the need to reduce face to face contact and instead deliver video briefings for candidates and training for polling and count staff remotely the requirement for additional safety equipment and measures within polling places and count venues Returning Officers should not underestimate the scale and complexity of the May 2021 polls. They will have to review and adapt their approach to delivering key proceedings as necessary to reflect different ways of working as a result of the coronavirus restrictions. Risk assessing key aspects of delivery, including the choice of venues, takes time and resources. Returning Officers will need to give early consideration to securing suitable venues for key election processes, including nominations, polling and the count, and build in sufficient time to risk assess, prepare or adapt venues to meet physical distancing requirements. Several of the

Returning Officers we spoke to indicated that choosing and adapting polling place layouts and choosing a count venue was more challenging given physical distancing requirements and took up more time than usual. Returning Officers will also need to give adequate consideration to recruitment and training of staff. It is likely that additional staff will be needed for key processes. All the authorities that held by-elections utilised additional staff in polling stations to help direct voters, which worked well. Also, all carried out training using video conferencing equipment and online materials. Early engagement with key stakeholders, including staff, political parties, candidates and agents, is vital. Returning Officers are likely to need to adapt key proceedings, including the nominations process, to account for physical distancing requirements. It will be important to explain and seek understanding by stakeholders on any changes to key processes in the context of coronavirus. Returning Officers need to be satisfied that key suppliers have carried out their own risk assessments and have contingency arrangements in place to ensure that they are able to deliver their services in the run up the polls. Returning Officers need to ensure they have resources to deliver. Administrators in Scotland indicated that the costs associated with the by-elections were higher than would typically be the case due to the coronavirus related measures. Additional costs resulted from providing PPE to staff, screens in polling places and other venues, as well as the recruitment of additional staff. Polling To make polling safer, Returning Officers will need to take additional measures. In Scotland a range of measures were taken in polling places, including: two-metre floor markings to encourage physical distancing signage to encourage voters to observe physical distancing and to wear face coverings hand sanitiser for use by voters when entering and leaving polling places requiring staff to wear face coverings when dealing with voters single use pencils provided for use by voters one way systems in operation where possible to minimise contact screens in use at polling station desks for the protection of staff and voters periodic cleaning of polling booths throughout the hours of poll minimising the number of polling agents permitted in the polling station at any time additional staff used to greet voters and manage any queues, and to encourage voters to use the sanitisers on entering and leaving stations and to observe physical distancing While there was no significant evidence of queuing at any of the by-elections, there were instances where it did occur. The additional staff employed to direct and assist voters played a crucial part in keeping things moving. Nevertheless the approach by some authorities of only allowing a single voter or household into the polling station at any time, together with the additional hygiene measures in place, inevitably slowed voting down. Returning Officers will need to consider how they will manage the flow of voters through the polling stations in May 2021, taking into account the specific circumstances of those polls. Voters appeared willing to continue to turn out to vote in person. Feedback from polling station staff supported this, and this is also reflected in the findings of our own research in Scotland on public attitudes to voting in the context of coronavirus . Voters, candidates and agents generally observed the advice on wearing face coverings and followed instructions and requests in relation to physical distancing and hand sanitising. Voters were also patient where queues did occur. Returning Officers will nevertheless need to consider how they can engage with stakeholders to raise their awareness of the arrangements that will be in place at an early stage and to secure their cooperation in observing the safety measures. Most polling station staff that we spoke to indicated that they were not unduly concerned about working at the polls. Staff were reassured through engagement and training that the additional measures in place for the conduct of the poll were adequate for their own safety. To minimise face to face contact, briefings for candidates and agents, and training of polling station staff, were for the most part conducted remotely using video conferencing platforms. There was no evidence of any significant increase in postal voting for the by-elections compared with previous similar polls. In any case, Returning Officers will need to engage with local Electoral Registration Officers on how they will manage any increase in absent voting applications in the period leading up to the May 2021 polls, including the potential for any such increase to occur close to the absent voting deadline. The potential for increased applications for emergency proxies due to coronavirus should also be factored into plans. Verification and counting of votes The verification and counting of votes in Scottish council by-elections is largely done electronically using e-counting equipment. As a result, count layouts and processes are different to those that will be in place for the May 2021 polls, with the exception of London where e-counting will be in place for the London Mayor and GLA elections. In any case, Returning Officers will have to consider the suitability of venues for enabling processes to be carried out accurately and transparently while maintaining physical distancing. Physical distancing arrangements in place at the counts for the Scottish council by-elections generally worked well. Returning Officers do however need to ensure that the arrangements in place are such that candidates and agents are able to observe and scrutinise key processes and exercise their rights under the rules to challenge the Returning Officer's decisions e.g. around the adjudication of doubtful ballots. The ability of candidates and agents to fulfil their important role in scrutinising the verification and count processes should not be negatively impacted by the adjustments to the processes due to coronavirus restrictions. Returning Officers should engage with candidates, agents, and other stakeholders to explain key processes, particularly where these are going to be different from what stakeholders normally expect. If for example Returning Officers intend to restrict numbers of counting agents, as was the case for the by elections, then the rationale for this should be clearly explained to candidates and agents. Again the number of counting agents permitted should be the same for each candidate and sufficient to allow proper scrutiny of proceedings. Feedback from the by-elections was that candidates and agents were generally understanding of the need to impose restrictions to minimise face to face contact and allow for physical distancing. In general, only local media requested access to the by-election counts. This could be managed safely by council communications staff. However, some communications staff raised concerns about the May 2021 election counts and accommodating requests from a wider pool of media, including broadcast media, if the current physical distancing restrictions remain in place. This is likely to be a particular challenge for those overseeing counts which include candidates likely to attract interest from broadcast media, which requires earlier access to count venues and more space for equipment. Early engagement with local and broadcast media will be important to manage expectations around access to the count in the current circumstances. The flow of people in count venues needs careful consideration to ensure the continued physical distancing of all present. Most of the Returning Officers at the by-elections deployed extra staff at the count to remind attendees to observe the physical distancing requirements, and this will also be an important consideration for counts in May 2021. Background Between October and December 2020, eight council by-elections took place in Scotland. A number of other by-elections scheduled to take place in the period have been postponed until 2021. The by-elections took place in a range of island, rural and urban wards. Local authority Ward Turnout (%) Orkney Islands Council North Isles ward - 1 October 50.7

or postpone, by-elections, the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB) produced a risk assessment template to inform decision making. The EMB also produced supplementary guidance to assist Returning Officers with preparing for and delivering their polls safely. We worked with the EMB to support the development of that guidance. Feedback from those Returning Officers that held by-elections indicated that these resources were helpful. Related content Upcoming elections about upcoming

February 2018 Last updated: 3 October 2019 Summary of the briefing Date: February 2018 For: MPs Full briefing This briefing has been prepared for the 2nd reading of Glyn Davies MP's Bill on overseas electors on Friday 23 February 2018. The Bill makes provision to remove the existing 15 year time limit on British citizens who live abroad registering as overseas electors. This would apply to any British citizen overseas who was previously resident or registered to vote in the UK. It applies only to UK Parliamentary elections and makes no other changes to electors' eligibility to vote in different types of elections, or to British citizens living in the UK.

Overseas electors Until 2015, the number of overseas voters registered to vote had never risen above 35,000 At the 2017 UK General Election there was a record of 285,000 overseas electors registered to vote. There are no reliable estimates of how many British nationals living abroad would be eligible to register under the current 15 year rule or if the time limit is removed in future. There has been a significant increase following overseas voter registration campaigns in the run up to 2015 and 2017 General Elections, and interest in the 2016 referendum on the UK's membership of the EU The Electoral Commission's overseas voter day took place on 10 May 2016; this was supported by embassies and consulates around the world and was aimed at encouraging British citizens who were eligible to register as overseas voters so that they could vote in the EU referendum. The Electoral Commission ran a public awareness campaign for overseas voters from 17 March to 9 June 2016. Over 135,000 overseas voters registered in this period. The Electoral Commission If the Bill passes into law, we will provide guidance for Electoral Registration Officers, Returning Officers and campaigners to help them understand and comply with any changes to the rules for overseas voters. We also stand ready to reach an increased overseas voter audience through our public awareness campaigns which take place to drive voter registration in the lead-up to UK Parliamentary elections. Key considerations Changes to the eligibility of overseas voters will present practical difficulties for political parties and campaigners to determine the permissibility of donations, and for the Electoral Commission to take enforcement action where the rules have been breached. To mitigate foreign influence on politics and elections, parties and campaigners are only permitted to accept donations from British citizens overseas who are registered to vote. A 2010 Supreme Court judgement ruled that a donor's eligibility to be registered was a significant factor in deciding permissibility; we would welcome the UK Government and Parliament taking this opportunity to clarify that a person must be included in a UK electoral register at the point when a donation is made in order to be a permissible donor. The UK Government should consider new approaches to improving access to the voting process for overseas electors, for example by voting at embassies and consulates, or the ability to download and print postal ballot papers. Many overseas electors face significant practical difficulties in ensuring their votes count; some have found there is not enough time to receive, complete and return their postal vote before the close of poll, while others may not be able to appoint someone in the UK to act as their proxy. Increasing the number of British citizens overseas who are eligible to be registered to vote will add strain to already stretched resources of electoral administrators, in terms of volume and complexity of registration applications, requiring verification of identities and eligibility of applicants who have not lived in the UK for some time. Our report on the administration of the 2017 UK general election highlighted increasing challenges faced at a local level in delivering well-run elections. This places extra emphasis on the need for the voter registration processes to be enhanced further by enabling better verification of information from other government services. About the Electoral Commission : enabling the delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible regulating political finance – taking proactive steps to increase transparency, ensure compliance and pursue breaches using our expertise to make and advocate for changes to our democracy, aiming to improve fairness, transparency and efficiency The Commission was set up in 2000 and reports to the UK and Scottish Parliaments. Report: How the 2016 Northern Ireland Assembly election was run | Electoral Commission Search Report: How the 2016 Northern Ireland Assembly election was run You are in the Northern Ireland Assembly elections section Home Northern Ireland Assembly elections On this page About the election Registration and turnout The voter experience The administration of the poll Campaigning Recommendations: Online electoral registration Recommendations: Further improving the STV count Recommendations: Review of the electoral observer scheme Recommendations: Registration of party names and descriptions for use on ballot papers Recommendations: Transparency and accessibility of candidate spending Recommendations: Imprints Recommendations: Extending investigative and sanctioning powers Recommendations: Reporting use of social media Recommendations: Performance standards Recommendations: Donations and loans Download our full report First published: 28 June 2019 Last updated: 7 August 2019 About the election On 5 May 2016 there were a number of different polls held across the UK. This report looks specifically at the administration of the Northern Ireland Assembly election. Our overall assessment is that the May 2016 Northern Ireland Assembly election was well run. People were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and with the process of voting, whether they cast their vote in person at a polling station or by post. The count was conducted efficiently, with significant improvements in the planning compared to previous elections. Registration and turnout A total of 1,281,595 people were registered to vote in the Northern Ireland Assembly election on 5 May 2016. Overall turnout at the election was 54.9%, ranging from 64.6% in Fermanagh and South Tyrone to 49.6% in North Down. By comparison, turnout at the May 2011 Northern Ireland Assembly election was 55.7%. Turnout at the 2015 UK Parliamentary election in Northern Ireland was 58.5% and at the 2014 European Parliamentary election was 51.8%. A total of 703,744 ballot papers were cast, of which 14,126 were postal votes (2% of votes cast). Unlike the rest of the UK, where postal voting is available 'on demand', voters in Northern Ireland are required to provide a valid reason as to why they cannot attend their polling station on polling day. The voter experience Our public opinion research suggests that most voters believed the election was well-run and were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. 88% of respondents were satisfied with the procedure for registering to vote and 91% expressed satisfaction with the voting process. The administration of the poll Overall the Northern Ireland Assembly election was administered professionally and efficiently. The Chief Electoral Officer made significant improvements to the delivery of the count following concerns over the time taken to complete previous election counts in 2011 and 2014. Changes to the set-up of the count venues, to the management of the verification stage, and to the primary sort of ballot papers all contributed to a quicker and more efficient count. A new test of count staff and performance monitoring has ensured that more effective count staff are now in place at each count venue. Preparations for the count, including training of staff, was done thoroughly and resulted in a smooth, well-run process. Overall communications were very good with regular announcements provided to candidates, agents and the media. Each count venue had a dedicated information point and media liaison officer who provided handouts of the result of each stage of the count to those present. Effective use was also made of Twitter and EONI's website to provide real time results to the public. All of these are welcome developments which have done much to improve confidence and transparency in the count. Campaigning Our post-election survey of candidates suggests that the majority of candidates were satisfied with the administration of the elections and agreed that the rules on spending and donations were clear. We identified a number of accredited observers and applicants to be observers who potentially had political party affiliations, and upon further investigation we withdrew accreditation from 12 observers before the election. Unfortunately, at some count venues, we were made aware that a number of other accredited observers were clearly showing support for political parties and their candidates. The Commission is very concerned and disappointed that the observer scheme was abused at the Northern Ireland Assembly election. Accredited electoral observers who show support or bias for a political party or a candidate at a count seriously undermine the credibility and confidence of the electoral observation programme. In light of this we now intend to conduct a full review of how we accredit electoral observers in the UK, with any revisions to the process to be in place before the next scheduled elections in Northern Ireland in 2019. Recommendations: Online electoral registration Recommendation 1: Online electoral registration Both the Chief Electoral Officer and the Northern Ireland Office are committed to extending online electoral registration in Northern Ireland. The Chief Electoral Officer has put the necessary technical requirements in place within the Electoral Office to ensure the launch of the online digital portal for electoral registration in Northern Ireland. The Northern Ireland Office have also drafted legislation that will amend the law to allow for online registration in Northern Ireland and this should make its way through the UK Parliament during the autumn. The introduction of online registration in England, Scotland and Wales has been very successful and there were high levels of applications made online in advance of the elections in 2015 and 2016. We are therefore pleased that online registration will now be extended to Northern Ireland. For our part we will work with the Chief Electoral Officer to promote the online registration portal to the public in Northern Ireland and encourage people to use it to register to vote and/or to update their details on the electoral register. To assist in planning for this it would be helpful if the Northern Ireland Office announced a date for the introduction of online registration in Northern Ireland to assist in planning for such activity.

Recommendations: Further improving the STV count Recommendation 2: The Chief Electoral Officer should explore further the potential for further efficiencies in STV counts, including the use of the full mini count model Given that the next scheduled elections to use STV in Northern Ireland are not until 2019, there is sufficient time to build on the successful work undertaken so far. The Chief Electoral Officer, working with his senior staff, should conduct a further review of the count process and test the potential benefits the mini-count model could bring to STV election counts in Northern Ireland. Recommendations: Review of the electoral observer scheme Recommendation 3: The Commission will conduct a review of the electoral observer scheme The Commission's observer scheme has been running now for almost ten years. At the Northern Ireland Assembly we found some evidence that the scheme was being abused. In light of this we will now conduct a full review of how it operates across the UK. Any revisions to the process will be in place before the next scheduled elections in Northern Ireland in 2019. Recommendations: Registration of party names and descriptions for use on ballot papers Recommendation 4: Registration of party names and descriptions for use on ballot papers We continue to recommend that where a candidate represents a political party on a ballot paper, it should be clear to voters which party the candidate represents. The legal provisions for registration of party descriptions present risks of confusion for voters and restrict the participation of political parties. The UK Government should work with the Electoral Commission to reform the provisions on party descriptions.

Recommendations: Transparency and accessibility of candidate spending Recommendation 5: Transparency and accessibility of candidate spending To improve transparency and accessibility of candidate spending returns, we have previously recommended that Returning Officers across the UK should be required to publish spending returns online as well as through the existing methods of public inspection. We support the recommendation in the Law Commissions' review of Electoral Law which proposes a method for implementing this change through legislation. Recommendations: Imprints Recommendation 6: Section 143 of PPERA should be extended to Northern Ireland In the interests of transparency and to ensure consistency in the use of imprints on campaign literature across the UK, the UK Government should seek to apply Section 143 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendum Act 2000 to Northern Ireland before the next set of scheduled elections in 2019. Recommendations: Extending investigative and sanctioning powers Recommendation 7: Extending investigative and sanctioning powers We continue to recommend extending our investigative and sanctioning powers at major elections for offences relating to candidate spending and donations, including at Northern Ireland Assembly elections. It will be important for Governments and Parliaments across the UK to work together on introducing the Commission's new powers for different sets of elections. Recommendations: Reporting use of social media Recommendation 8: Reporting use of social media at future elections We will give further consideration to how campaigners should report spend on social media at future elections. As spend in this area grows, there is the potential for less transparency if expenditure on social media is not easily identifiable within the spending returns, because social media is not a specific reporting category. This will need to be considered as part of reviewing all of the expenditure reporting categories to ensure that they remain proportionate and relevant to future trends in campaigning. In case any of these changes would need to be implemented through legislation, we recommend that the UK Government and Parliament should consider the timing needed for implementing changes before the next major elections. Recommendations: Performance standards Recommendation 9: Extend the performance standards framework in Northern Ireland In light of the introduction of online registration the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland should introduce an Order to extend the performance standards framework to Northern Ireland.

Recommendations: Donations and loans Recommendation 10: The UK Government should introduce secondary legislation to allow for the publication of partial information on donations and loans to political parties and regulated donees in Northern Ireland The UK Government, through the NIO, should publish a timetable to ensure that the necessary secondary legislation is put in place to allow the Commission to publish partial information on donations and loans received by political parties. This should be done as soon as possible. The Commission will continue to be available to assist NIO to ensure the legislation is appropriate. Introduction Our budget varies from year to year depending on the cycle of elections.

Our event budget reflects the costs associated with each year's elections. This varies significantly year-to-year owing to the cycle of elections, and will change if unscheduled polls are added which need to be delivered effectively. This is presented as a separate budget line to allow for more effective control and scrutiny of our core budget. Spending on core budgets includes our work supporting voters, electoral administrators, parties and campaigners outside of the cycle of elections, as well as our corporate overheads. Our core budget will be no larger at the end of the period, after inflation, than it was at the beginning (using HM Treasury's preferred measure for public spending and inflation assumptions where available). While we would always seek to manage our costs within these budgets, increases to the rate of inflation or changes to our work programme to reflect changes outside our control represent the main risks to our spending plans. We remain committed to having continued presence in all parts of the UK, and as we take advantage of increasingly flexible ways of working we will keep our office needs under continuous review. Focus on accountability and funding Focus on accountability and funding As part of the devolution of powers relating to elections, the Scotland Act 2016 and Wales Act

2017 made provision for the Commission to become accountable to both those parliaments, as well as remaining accountable to the UK Parliament. The direct costs of delivering our functions for each parliament are funded by that parliament, with overheads (including depreciation but not capital budgets or provisions) shared according to population. Cost shares can vary due to changes in work programme or electoral cycle. In Scotland, the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body oversees our funding and corporate accountability, in line with its role regarding other Commissions. In Wales this role is undertaken by the Llywydd's Committee, and in the UK Parliament by the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission. Scrutiny and accountability on specific aspects of our work is generally undertaken by specific policy committees, such as the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs

Select Committee of the UK Parliament. Each year in the autumn we submit an estimate of income and expenditure to the committees, accompanied by our plans for the coming year (or five years when we submit a Corporate Plan). The committees then consider these according to the timetables in each parliament. The plans, budgets and other information that we submit to the committees are as required by each committee. We will continue to work with the committees, the parliamentary officials and other relevant partners to ensure effective accountability. Navigation 8. letter Dear Sir I committed to write to you following today's meeting of the GLA's Police and Crime Committee, with further detail about the implementation of Sir Eric Pickles' 2016 recommendations on electoral fraud and the registration of the new political party Aspire. The additional information required is set out below, in the wider context of detail about the decision and the party registration system as a whole. I trust the Committee will find this additional information helpful. Sir Eric Pickles' 2016 recommendations You asked for information about the proportion of Sir Eric Pickles' 2016 recommendations which have been implemented to date. While many of the recommendations will require legislation to be developed and introduced by the UK and other governments, our current understanding of the status of the 50 recommendations is: 7 recommendations (14%) could be delivered immediately through changes to Electoral Commission guidance or practice, which we implemented ahead of the May 2017 elections 3 recommendations (6%) are being tested through pilot schemes at the May 2018 local government elections, which are being overseen by the Cabinet Office, although we have also addressed one of these recommendations (on providing additional guidance on security and secrecy to postal voters) in our guidance to Returning Officers 8 recommendations (16%) would require secondary legislation to implement, and the Cabinet Office is considering how and when to take these forward 25 recommendations (50%) would require primary legislation to implement, and again the Cabinet Office will be considering how and when to take these forward subject to Parliamentary time 2 recommendations (4%) where the UK Government either rejected or did not need to take action to implement the recommendation 6 recommendations (12%) where the UK Government need to consider further what action it will take You will note that the total number of recommendations in the list above adds up to 51, because recommendation 23 (on providing additional guidance on security and secrecy to postal voters) has been addressed in our guidance but is also being tested in pilot schemes this year. Scrutiny of registration applications The Commission is the registrar for political parties in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Registration decisions are important statutory decisions taken by the Commission, and they are treated accordingly. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) sets out criteria that applicant parties must meet in order to be placed on the register of political parties. Where an application meets those tests, the Commission must register the party. All applications are subject to a detailed assessment against the statutory criteria, including an analysis of the applicant party's constitution, its financial scheme and applied-for party name and descriptions and/or emblems against the relevant tests. We also publish applied-for identity marks on our website for public comment. Where we receive comments, they are given careful consideration. The assessment will result in a recommendation to the Commission's internal Approvals Board. This Approvals Board ensures that the application and assessment is considered by a wide range of senior people within the Commission. It is chaired by the Director of Political Finance and Regulation & Legal Counsel, who takes the final decision. As registrar, the Commission has a duty under section 23 of PPERA to maintain the registers of political parties. This could mean that if in future we consider that any party's identity marks no longer meet the statutory tests, it will be removed. Further, should a party's circumstances change, such as the registered officers, this may give cause to the Commission to review the party's registration. Additionally, should it come to the Commission's attention that a party is not operating in accordance with its constitution or financial scheme this may also give rise to such a review.

Decision to register Aspire

Following its assessment of the application to register Aspire, the Commission determined that it met the statutory requirements set out in PPERA: its name and emblem were suitable to appear on the register; it had a constitution that set out its structure and organisation; and it had adopted a scheme detailing the party's arrangements for regulating its financial affairs for the purposes of PPERA.

Aspire's name One of the statutory tests for a party name relates to whether a voter is likely to be misled as to the effect of their vote if they see that name on the ballot paper. The existence of other organisations with the same or similar name to that proposed may be a relevant factor but an application is only rejected if the Commission forms the opinion that it is likely to result in a voter being misled as to the effect of their vote.

When assessing Aspire's application, we searched open-source material to establish whether there were other organisations named 'Aspire'. There were a number of organisations named Aspire that operated in the borough of Tower Hamlets and wider. In addition and for the record, I now understand we did receive comments from members of the public drawing our attention to some of these organisations. These comments were received in response to our publishing the proposed name, descriptions and emblems of Aspire. Each of the comments received was assessed carefully before the Commission took its decision on registration. Under the statutory functions and duties of the Commission as set out in PPERA, it is the Commission's opinion that determines whether a party's name meets the relevant criteria. We form this opinion after a robust process of assessment, opportunity for public comment, and review by a wide range of senior persons within the Commission. The decision is properly based on the reasonable judgement of the Commission, acting appropriately as a public body and in line with PPERA.

The word 'aspire' is a generic and widely used word. It is the Commission's opinion that the word 'aspire' is not likely to be so associated with one particular organisation as to result in a voter thinking that they are voting for a party that is connected to another organisation named 'Aspire' and hence being misled as to the effect of their vote. We are satisfied that is a reasonable and the proper conclusion to draw in accordance with the applicable legislation.

The Commission cannot register an emblem that in its opinion is likely to mislead a voter as to the effect of their vote if it appeared on a ballot paper. The emblem included in Aspire's application was the depiction of a house above the word Aspire and contrary to what was stated by some Committee members during the hearing this is not identical to that used by Tower Hamlets First at the point of deregistering. The emblems registered to Tower Hamlets First at the point of deregistration can be found in an Annex to this letter, along with the registered emblem of Aspire and the emblem proposed, although not considered, in the application to register Tower Hamlets Together. Whilst the emblems of Tower Hamlets First contain images of a house, they are different to the emblem registered by Aspire. The images of a house, the number of houses and the layout are different. In our opinion, on the basis of the images alone, a voter, including a voter whose first language is not , would recognise that the images are different. Further, the inclusion of a party name on an emblem is a material consideration and removes or significantly reduces the likelihood that a voter would be misled. We concluded that voters would not be misled by the proposed emblem. Aspire's constitution and financial scheme We also met with the proposed officers of the party before deciding on its registration, to seek information regarding the party's financial structure, procedures and controls, as well as the operation of its financial scheme and constitution. We corresponded extensively with the party's legal representatives and considered additional information provided by them in support of the party's application, including the party's written financial procedures and controls. We were content that the party was compliant with the necessary legal requirements in order to be registered. Decision to reject the application to register Tower Hamlets Together In February 2017 the Commission rejected an application to register a party called Tower Hamlets Together. The Commission came to the opinion that if the applied-for party name appeared on a ballot paper it would be likely to result in a voter being misled as to the effect of their vote. As usual, we published the proposed name, descriptions and emblem from Tower Hamlets Together for comment. Through these actions and our analysis of the registration application, we became aware of another organisation called Tower Hamlets Together, a partnership of local health and social care organisations in Tower Hamlets. According to the comments received from that organisation and others, this partnership was active and well-known locally. The applied-for party name was therefore identical to that of an active and well-known organisation, and that name was comprised of a specific phrase - three specific words in the same order. On this basis, the Commission formed the opinion that a voter would be likely to think they are voting for a party connected to or endorsed by Tower Hamlets Together, the local partnership. A party cannot be registered without a name, so rejection of the name meant that the party could not be registered. It was therefore not necessary for the Commission to determine whether the party's emblems or descriptions met the statutory criteria. The Commission's regulatory responsibilities Whilst two of the proposed registered officers named in the applications for Aspire and Tower Hamlets Together were the same, they were separate applications and the facts were different. They comprised different identity marks, different constitutions and different financial schemes. Now it is a registered political party, Aspire has a number of financial reporting obligations to meet. For example, it will be required to submit annual statements of accounts to the Commission. These will then be published on our website. Aspire will also be required to update the Commission on any changes to its registered officers, and again these will be published. Section 145 of PPERA places the Commission under a duty to 'monitor, and take all reasonable steps to secure, compliance with' the rules in PPERA relating to political funding and spending. We are proactive in fulfilling this duty and parties that fail to comply with their financial reporting obligations, or to maintain their registered details, are routinely investigated and fined. I want to assure you that the Commission will take appropriate and proportionate steps in fulfilling those duties in respect of Aspire, as we would with all registered parties. Performance analysis 2019/20: Goal four You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 On this page Key achievements Performance measures First published: 30 June 2020 Last updated: 17 September 2020 Goal four To provide value for money, making best use of our resources and expertise to deliver services that are attuned to what matters most to voters. This goal provides a focus to activities that support the organisation and ensure we have the appropriate skilled people and resources. The aim is to deliver services that are efficient, effective and economical. Key achievements To support our organisation, we: ran a programme of testing, upgrading and benchmarking against appropriate standards to protect our digital infrastructure against cyber threats developed our working practices to reflect the expectations on a modern employer and ensured our digital systems support these changes upgraded the information technology systems that support our regulatory and electoral administration functions continued working closely with the National Cyber Security Centre to improve how we monitor our networks and platforms launched a new website to meet users' needs more effectively and provide information in easy-to-use and more accessible ways implemented new online procurement, project management and governance systems to make our processes more efficient and transparent developed a new people strategy to support the best use of our resources enhanced our skills base through a comprehensive learning and development programme and investment in specialised technical resources worked with the Scottish and Welsh parliaments to develop an operational model that allows us to report and account to them provided guidance and tools to staff to help us improve our quality assurance processes Performance measures Measure Performance Learn practical lessons from current home and remote working practices and design future accommodation accordingly Ongoing 1 Identify options, costs and benefits of e-procurement and implement a new system accordingly Not achieved 2 Stakeholder and staff satisfaction with IT tools Ongoing 3 Maintain high staff engagement scores in the annual staff survey and ensure indicators such as staff turnover are at appropriate levels Staff engagement score: 72% (2018-19: 65%.Civil Service average: 62%) Staff turnover: 13.19% (2018-19: 31.97%) Monitor significant variances on all budgets and, where appropriate, reduce these variances over the five years of our Corporate Plan Not achieved 4 Supporting the organisation In this last year, we have continued to transform the way we work through significant investments in our digital infrastructure, to improve its resilience and support flexible working practices. We have also continued working with the National Cyber Security Centre to improve how we monitor our networks and platforms, which helped with our focus on cyber security during the 2019 polls. Our new website provides a better service to our stakeholders. As our main communication channel, it was important for us to improve functionality and accessibility, to communicate our work in better ways. We have introduced other new digital tools to help us run our organisation. This includes an online procurement system, to make it easier for suppliers to participate in our tenders, and a planning system that enables us to report on our progress against our corporate goals and monitor risk more efficiently. Our new governance system gives us a more effective way to communicate with the Commission Board to give clear oversight of our performance. Our new people strategy includes actions to facilitate a culture where employees are able to perform their roles more effectively. We started this work by reviewing our performance management and development processes. We have moved away from evaluating and ranking employee performance at set times in the year and changed to a continuous approach, managed through objectives. This addresses feedback from our 2018 staff survey and better fits with our culture. We focussed on initiatives to address staff turnover. This included changing our recruitment practices to presume all roles would be permanent, unless there is a strong case to justify a fixed-term contract. We also supported staff to re-locate to our other offices, where this fitted their circumstances and our business needs. We continued supporting staff groups that we set up to address particular areas, such as the staff engagement group, to ensure our employees have input into corporate policies and programmes. We also have groups dedicated to supporting staff with bullying, harassment and mental health issues and we have maintained strong links with our trade union, the Public and Commercial Services Union. We invested more in learning and development and ensured staff were aware of training opportunities. We also appointed a provider to deliver a leadership and management development programme for all managers, which will run throughout 2020. The Scottish and Welsh parliaments have been considering legislation that would ensure we are accountable to them for our work on devolved elections. We have always reported voluntarily to both parliaments for our policy work on devolved issues, but the new legislation will mean our formal accountability arrangements match those we have with the UK Parliament. 2021 Senedd Cymru candidate spending You are in the Campaign spending:

Candidates section Home Campaign spending: Candidates First published: 2 February 2022 Last updated: 27 October 2022 About the data At the May 2021 Senedd election, there were 311 constituency and independent regional candidates who had to submit a spending return, listing details of what they spent during the election campaign. The dataset includes the headline figures for the spending incurred and donations received by candidates at the 2021 Senedd election. We publish these figures to enhance transparency and to provide voters with information on donations to candidates' election campaigns and their spending and to ensure that this information can be seen together in one place. The full individual candidate returns are available for public scrutiny from the relevant Returning Officers for a period of two years after an election. The returns include the total the candidate spent, as well as a breakdown of how much they spent on things like advertising, transport and public meetings. They also include any donations the candidate received above £50 during the regulated period. The data taken from the spending returns reflects what candidates and their agents submitted to Returning Officers in Wales. We publish this information exactly as it appears on the candidate's return so that there is an accurate record of what was reported. Spending limits vary between constituencies. The vast majority of Returning Officers have sent us the returns submitted to them for inclusion in this dataset. Where information is missing, this may be because the Returning Officer didn't send them on to us, or because the candidate didn't submit their return to the Returning Officer. Under the law spending on promoting regional party list candidates counts as party spending, and was therefore reportable by the party in its election spending return. Information about candidate spending data for previous devolved elections is available online in the National Archive. 2021 Senedd Cymru candidate spending Download the data 2021 Senedd Cymru candidate spending Briefing summary Full briefing First published: 17 October 2019 Last updated: 17 October 2019 Summary Date: 17 October 2019 For: MPs Full briefing This briefing outlines the Electoral Commission's response to proposed legislation on electoral integrity which was included in the Queen's Speech. Voter identification The proposed legislation would introduce a requirement for voters at polling stations to show identification before they can be issued with a ballot paper. We undertook independent evaluation of the Government's voter ID pilots in 2018 and 2019 . These clarified the way in which a voter ID scheme could be delivered in Great Britain but did not point to definitive conclusions, particularly for higher turnout polls. We identified areas for further consideration, relating to security and accessibility.

We welcome the Government's commitment to for the provision of a free of charge, locally issued photo ID, as currently provided for electors in Northern Ireland. This would be available on application to voters without an approved form of photo ID. If legislation is approved by Parliament the Commission would expect to conduct public awareness campaigns in the lead-up to elections, to inform voters on what they need to do to comply with new identification rules. We will also provide guidance for Electoral Registration Officers and Returning Officers to help them deliver new voter identification requirements. We publish data on allegations of electoral offences annually and in 2014 published a report on electoral fraud. We also carry out annual survey work with voters, which regularly finds concerns about electoral fraud and the integrity of elections, including as a result of the lack of a requirement to show ID. Postal and proxy voting Proposal to introduce restrictions on campaigners handling postal votes – this would formalise the 'best practice' approach in our guidance and a voluntary code of conduct for campaigners. That would be beneficial as we do not see universal compliance by campaigners with current non-legally binding arrangements. Proposal to require people to re-apply to vote by post every three years – as we have previously recommended , would mean that voters are encouraged to regularly review and confirm that they still want to vote by post, or choose to vote in person at a polling station instead. This would help to ensure records are up-to-date and accurate. Proposal to limit the number of people for whom someone may act as a proxy voter to a maximum of two regardless of their relationship – as we have previously identified, this could disadvantage some people (including overseas voters) who have a genuine need to appoint a proxy. This should be considered in developing the legislation. The Government makes a welcome commitment of further support to people with disabilities. Extending the types of people who can act as a companion for disabled voters and improving the tools provided to support voters with visual impairments should help support people to cast their votes independently and in secret. We will work with the Government and groups representing people with sight loss and other disabilities to ensure that the proposed legislation delivers meaningful benefits. Other measures We strongly welcome the Government's commitment to implementing an imprint requirement for digital campaigning material; this is urgently needed to ensure transparency for voters about who is spending money online to influence them. We will work to ensure these proposals can improve transparency and public confidence. We also welcome the Government's intention to consult on measures to strengthen protection of our democracy from foreign interference. We continue to recommend our laws are updated to prevent foreign funding of elections and referendum campaigns. Other key priorities for the Electoral Commission While not included in the Queen's Speech, we continue to firmly recommend the UK Government introduce other legislative changes to make our elections more transparent and maintain trust and participation in our democratic processes. These include:

Simplifying and modernising electoral law We need comprehensive electoral law reform , including a new overarching UK Elections Act. The UK's Law Commissions have already provided a blueprint for electoral law reform that is widely supported by those who deliver, regulate and campaign at elections.

Strengthening digital campaign regulation Effective campaigning is an essential part of well-run elections, but we need transparency and safeguards to maintain trust and confidence. We have set out a package of recommendations to increase transparency about digital campaign spending, and to strengthen our investigation and enforcement tools.

accurate information out about voter registration, postal voting, voting itself and emergency measures due to Covid. Partner organisation Work done to achieve our aims

Working with the Electoral Management Board in Scotland to provide guidance and advice to electoral administrators in Scotland to support them in preparing for and delivering the polls. This included new resources created in partnership with disabled people for use in the training of polling station staff. Providing targeted support to political parties and candidates to ensure that they were able to understand and comply with the campaign rules. This included running candidate seminars at political party conferences and a candidate and agent webinar attended by over 180 people. Running a public awareness campaign for voters, reminding them of the key deadlines for registration and absent vote applications and providing information on how to complete the ballot paper using the single transferable vote.

There were 66,716 applications made to register to vote in Scotland during the course of our voter registration campaign. Working in partnership with civil society organisations, such as Enable and Simon Community Scotland, to help people from under-registered groups get ready to vote by sharing resources and running information events. Proving a public information service for voters, including a look-up tool to provide information about their allocated polling station and candidates standing in their ward. Publishing our statutory report on the Scottish council elections in September, including reporting on the steps Returning Officers took to support disabled people's access to the elections. Our report drew on robust research with voters, electoral administrators and candidates and found that the vast majority of voters were satisfied with the process of voting and almost all were able to use their preferred method of voting. We have invested in our advice, support and regulatory activity in Scotland and increased staff resource to focus on these areas.

Our work has included: Consulting administrators in Scotland on a new performance standards framework for Returning Officers, which has now been laid in the Scottish Parliament. Using our performance standards frameworks to support and challenge

Officers on their year round activities to maintain accurate and complete electoral registers. Identifying new opportunities to provide support to the regulated community to help them comply with the rules around campaign finance. We continue to provide expert advice to the Scottish Government and Parliament on policy development within the electoral framework: Giving evidence to the Standards, Procedures and

including highlighting areas where the system can be improved for voters, electoral administrators and campaigners. Providing a comprehensive response to the Scottish Government's consultation on electoral reform, drawing on our policy work and wide-ranging research with voters, electoral administrators and campaigners. Throughout the last year, we have continued to build on the success of our work to promote democratic education by providing learning resources for teachers and youth workers: Our previous education work has focused on supporting young people to get ready to vote in a particular election, but our Welcome to Your Vote Week campaign in January 2023 marked a shift towards the Commission highlighting the importance of embedding democratic education in schools year-round. Our campaign engaged over 150 schools and youth organisations across Scotland who signed up to run activity with the young people they work with on the theme of 'Our Democracy'. We also worked with the Scottish Youth Parliament and Girlguiding Scotland to support young volunteers to run workshops in their schools and local communities, and ran events in schools throughout the week for around 700 young people. We piloted a youth voice programme, bringing together a group of young people from across Scotland to provide feedback on our education resources and create new youth-friendly resources. Candidate at May 2022 elections I found the webinar very effective particularly about the rules governing imprints, candidate spend and donations. I have recommended it to my fellow candidates and agents and will be sharing the link to it with them. Candidate at May 2022 elections Ongoing and future work In the next year we will work to establish a long-term youth voice programme. We will work to further embed democratic education in schools and youth work settings by supporting youth workers, teachers of PSE (Personal and Social Education) and other subjects to use our resources through teacher networks and training. We will also explore how we can work with public sector and civil society organisations to support care experienced young people and BSL users to learn about their vote. We will lead a project, drawing in stakeholders from amongst those administering Scottish council elections and those who campaign in these elections, to identify strategies for improving voter understanding of the single transferable vote system, with the aim of lowering the level of rejected ballots at Scottish council elections. We will continue to provide expert advice to the Scottish Government and Parliament as the Government takes forward its commitment to legislate for further electoral reform. Through advice, training and briefing sessions, we will support parties and campaigners to comply with the law, while continuing to ensure political finance is transparent. We will work with the Electoral Management Board for Scotland to support Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers to help them meet the challenges they face in delivering well-run electoral services which continue to meet voters' needs. This will include identifying opportunities to strengthen the resilience of electoral administration teams and exploring options for modernising the voting process. We will work with Police Scotland, campaigners and electoral administrators to explore and address concerns raised by candidates about intimidation and abuse at elections. Commitment to EDI The Electoral Commission serves a diverse democracy in Scotland and we are committed to equality, diversity and inclusion. Our programme of partnership work in Scotland has continued to develop resources to support democratic inclusion for those who experience particular barriers to voting. This has included providing material in a variety of languages, including British Sign Language, and in a number of formats including Easy read, large print, audio and braille. We have also worked with partner organisations in Scotland to develop appropriate materials for Gypsy/Travellers, care experienced young people, domestic abuse survivors and people experiencing homelessness. In the year ahead we will be working closely with representatives from the electoral community through the EMB Improvement subgroup to explore how we can improve the accessibility of the electoral process for people who experience barriers to participating in elections. Resources During 2022/23 we utilised 99% of £2.06m of budget available. This was predominately staffing £1.5m (73%) with advertising and research £0.5m (24%); the remaining amounts represent the Scottish Parliament contribution to common activities and corporate overheads. Our segmental reporting on page 152 shows the breakdown between direct and indirect costs. Governance The Commission reports to the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body (SPCB) for accountability purposes. We continue to report to other committees for our work in different policy areas, most notably the Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee. In September 2022, we submitted our third estimate to the SPCB for the funding of our work in the year 2023/24. The process for developing the estimate followed the 'Statement of Funding Principles' which we agreed in early 2021 with both the Scottish and UK Parliaments along with the Senedd. This area of work focuses on innovation and strengthening our evidence base. Our expertise in policy, research and communications are core to enabling this work. Key achievements To contribute to innovation and strengthening our evidence base, we: reported on the 2019 UK Parliamentary general election and made recommendations to help improve future electoral events commissioned qualitative research with the public across the UK to explore attitudes to current voting processes and access to information about elections provided the Scottish and Welsh governments and parliaments with independent expert advice on legislative and policy changes arising from their respective electoral reform agendas supported the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments to develop and put in place legislation to help meet the challenges of delivering well-run elections in the context of public health restrictions published a set of modular citizen education resources for 14-18 year olds in Scotland and for the first time in Wales, ahead of Scottish Parliament and Welsh Senedd elections submitted a detailed response to the UK Government's technical consultation to inform the development of new transparency requirements ('imprints') for digital campaign material launched a public awareness campaign and supporting online information hub to increase digital literacy in relation to online campaigning – developing content in partnership with the Information Commissioner's Office, Ofcom, the UK Statistics Authority, and the Advertising Standards Authority monitored the delivery of electoral events around the world that were held in the context of Covid restrictions, to inform the development of practices in the UK published a series of research reports about attitudes towards voting ahead of the May 2021 polls published the findings of qualitative research into public attitudes to the transparency of political finance in Northern Ireland gave evidence to parliamentary committees to ensure our expert analysis about elections and regulation would inform their work. Performance measures Measure Performance We publish 100% of our reports to planned deadlines 100% Achieved We comment on 100% of relevant legislation and policy proposals 100% Achieved Work in support of the electoral law reform recommendations from the England and Wales, Scotland and the Northern Ireland Law Commissions Ongoing Our activities during the year Innovation and strengthening our evidence base We published our statutory report on the delivery of the December 2019 UK Parliamentary general election. We found that the election was generally well-run, but our analysis highlighted new evidence showing challenges for the future. Our report described how the UK's electoral administration structures are operating under significant strain, and highlighted that people have growing concerns about some aspects of election campaigning. The UK Government's response welcomed our report, noting that it helps "to ensure that our democracy remains world-leading by identifying current challenges and opportunities". We provided expert advice and support to the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments and parliaments, to help develop policy and legislation to support the delivery of elections in the context of developing public health restrictions. This included advice on 24 separate proposals for draft legislation during this year; our input helped to ensure these would be workable in practice. We provided expert advice to the UK and Scottish governments as they developed proposals for improving the transparency of digital campaign material. Our extensive experience of regulating the current requirement for campaigners to include an ‘imprint’, showing who is responsible for printing and promoting printed campaign material, helped the Scottish Government to put in place a new requirement for digital election campaign material for the first time in the UK. We also provided a comprehensive response to the UK Government’s technical consultation to inform its own plans for legislation which is expected to be introduced later this year. We gave evidence to parliamentary committees to ensure our expert analysis about elections and regulation would inform their work. In the UK Parliament, this included the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee, in response to its inquiry into the work of the Electoral Commission, as well as a joint session with the Local Government Association and the Association of s focussing on preparations for the May 2021 polls. We also worked with the Committee on Standards in Public Life in response to its review of electoral regulation. In the Senedd, we gave evidence to the Equality, Local Government and Communities Committee on the Local Government and Elections (Wales) Bill, and to the Assembly Electoral Reform Committee’s inquiry into electoral systems and boundaries, and the Constitutional and Legislative Affairs Committee on the Senedd and Elections (Wales) Bill. In the Scottish Parliament, we gave evidence to the Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee on the Scottish Elections (Franchise and Representation) Bill and the Scottish Elections (Reform) Bill. We also gave evidence to the Finance and Constitution Committee on the Referendums (Scotland) Bill. Acting on analytics and feedback from user testing, we continued to develop our website, both functionality and content. We continued to ensure compliance with website content accessibility guidelines (WCAG 2.1), converting content from PDF to HTML. 7. A modern and sustainable electoral system You are in the Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 section Home Our plans and priorities Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 On this page Harnessing data and technology to meet the needs of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators Understanding, calling for action and acting on the changing risks to the election system from the misuse of data and technology Continuing to build strong relationships and streamlining working practices with all bodies that are part of the electoral system Supporting governments and the wider electoral community to adopt a strategy and implementation plan which meets environmental standards required of our electoral system First published: 25 April 2022 Last updated: 25 April 2022 Summary We need to make sure our electoral system keeps pace with digital developments. We need to capitalise on the scope for greater compliance, transparency and the financial savings technology offers, while working to retain voter confidence in the electoral system. We also need to modernise the electoral system to ensure it is environmentally sustainable. We will work towards a modern and sustainable electoral system by: harnessing data and technology to meet the needs of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators understanding, calling for action and acting on the changing risks to the election system from the misuse of data and technology continuing to build strong relationships and streamlining working practices with all bodies that are part of the electoral system supporting governments and the wider electoral community to adopt a strategy and implementation plan which meets environmental standards required of our electoral system Harnessing data and technology to meet the needs of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators Data and technology present opportunities for democracy. Working with others, we will ensure we utilise data and technology to achieve efficiencies in the electoral system, to increase compliance with electoral law, and to provide accessible information to voters. We will undertake research to provide an evidence base for how data and technology can be harnessed. We will develop and implement plans to utilise data and technology to meet the needs of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators. We will work with others to implement new practices in the use of data and technology across the electoral system. Understanding, calling for action and acting on the changing risks to the election system from the misuse of data and technology Data and technology also present significant risks for democracy. We will work with others to explore and implement new practices in the use of data and technology across the electoral system, to improve the accessibility, security and efficiency of elections in each part of the UK. We will also undertake research to understand how data and technology threatens the integrity of elections, paying specific attention to voters' trust in the electoral system as a whole. Continuing to build strong relationships and streamlining working practices with all bodies that are part of the electoral system We work closely with other bodies that are part of the electoral system. We know that by working collaboratively we are better equipped to respond to the challenges the electoral system faces. We will continue to strengthen these relationships, including with a number of regulators and law enforcement bodies that play a role in enforcing electoral law. We will also continue to help voters understand who is responsible for specific areas of electoral law, and will work to ensure they know who to contact if they have concerns. We will continue to ensure we work with these other bodies in an efficient way, with the ultimate aim of increasing the impact we and they have in the delivery of an effective and trusted electoral system. Supporting governments and the wider electoral community to adopt a strategy and implementation plan which meets environmental standards required of our electoral system Over the life of this plan it will become increasingly important to understand and reduce the environmental impact of the electoral system, ensuring it meets the challenging environmental targets which are likely to be brought into law by the UK's governments. Responding to these targets will also increasingly challenge the local delivery of well-run elections and referendums. We will develop a strategy and implementation plan which seeks to reduce the environmental impact of our electoral system, to include innovative evidence-based solutions. We will work with governments and local authorities to identify actions to reduce environmental impact. And, we will keep under review potential solutions which may lead to increased sustainability. And it's important that voters hear from a wide and diverse variety of campaigners. So campaigners must be able to campaign without facing undue actual or perceived barriers, while we continue to ensure political finance is transparent. We will improve the transparency of political campaigning, and help parties and campaigners to comply with the law, by: ensuring campaigners can access support to understand the law in the way and at the time that works best for them ensuring political finance laws are enforced fairly, working with law enforcement and other regulators publishing complete and accurate political finance data providing insights to campaigners and parliaments on how campaigning methods directly affect voter confidence in elections Ensuring campaigners can access support to understand the law in the way and at the time that works best for them Electoral law is complicated, but understanding and applying it should not be a barrier to those who want to campaign. We will work to ensure that campaigners can get on with campaigning, and examine barriers – both real and perceived – which prevent people who want to campaign from doing so. We will use these insights to ensure our guidance and other support tools work well for all campaigners no matter their financial size or experience. We will also complete and consolidate the strategic shift in the way we approach regulation outlined in our last Interim Corporate plan, putting greater emphasis on tools to promote compliance. We will launch our new Political Finance Online database, continue to develop our proactive support for campaigners, transition to an intelligence-led approach to monitoring, and embed an effective regulatory insights and horizon-scanning process. We will also work with our partners to provide cybersecurity advice to parties and campaigners. We will work closely with the Welsh Government to update the statutory Codes of Practice on election spending prior to the 2026 Senedd election, if necessary. We will ensure they reflect any changes to the law that are made. We will also support the Welsh Government with considering other future changes to the law, such as the potential introduction of digital imprints. We will also continue to work with Senedd officials as they draft the new reporting rules and processes to enable the rules to be adopted and dual reporting brought to an end. The Standards and Business Committees in the Fifth Senedd agreed that dual reporting will be brought to an end in Wales and that elected members will only be required to report to the Senedd. Ensuring political finance laws are enforced fairly, working with law enforcement and other regulators Parties, other campaigners and voters want confidence that political finance laws are enforced proportionately, consistently, and impartially. We will continue to conduct investigations, and be transparent about the outcomes of all our work. We will ensure the way we respond to electoral fraud is as effective as it can be, and will provide support and advice to regulators and law enforcement. Publishing complete and accurate political finance data Compliance with the political finance reporting laws is already high. We will work to make compliance even higher, by introducing compliance tools that work for a range of campaigners, and through proportionate and impartial enforcement of the law. In Section 3, we noted our plans to make political finance data more accessible for voters. Our new Political Finance Online database will also be an important tool for campaigners, making reporting easier and faster. We will work to ensure consistent timely publication of financial data from parties, candidates and campaigners. Providing insights to campaigners and parliaments on how campaigning methods directly affect voter confidence in elections In Section 3, we noted our plans to help voters understand the rules on campaigning, with the aim of increasing confidence in elections. Another way we aim to increase voter confidence is by providing evidence-based insights to campaigners and parliaments to ensure they better understand the impact that different campaigning methods have on the way voters perceive elections and their results. We will also provide support and advice on new and developing campaigning methods. Navigation 3. Putting voters first in Wales Section 3 of our 2022/23 to 2026/27 corporate plan for Wales 5. Commissioners You are in the Commissioners section Home Commissioners First published: 30 May 2019 Last updated: 16 March 2023 What our Commissioners do Our Commissioners lead our strategy and set our priorities. We have ten Commissioners, each with different political backgrounds and experience. This ensures broad representation and balanced views. The Speaker's Committee is recruiting for a Commissioner to represent the smaller parties. about how our Commissioners are selected . The role of our commissioners Our Commissioners form part of the Commission Board, along with our executive team, and: set our overall strategic direction, and ensure we deliver our strategic goals set our regulatory priorities, and monitor our regulatory activity make regulatory or other statutory decisions, if required ensure we use public funds efficiently and effectively, and operate within our limits and to high standards of governance The appointment of our commissioners The Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, with membership drawn from MPs within the UK Parliament, oversees the recruitment of electoral commissioners. The candidates for these posts are then approved by the House of Commons and appointed by HM the Queen. The Speaker's Committee is also responsible for deciding any reappointment of members following a first term of service. Names and biographies of our commissioners John Pullinger CB Term: 1 May 2021 to 30 April 2025 John Pullinger is our Chair John is an experienced public servant who has held senior roles in a range of organisations in the UK and internationally. Until 2019, he was the UK's National Statistician and Chief Executive of the UK Statistics Authority, developing and delivering a strategy to enhance the trustworthiness, quality and value of official statistics to support political debate and decisions at UK, devolved administration and local levels. He also served as President of the Royal Statistical Society and Chair of the United Nations Statistical Commission. Since completing his term as National Statistician John has held a number of non-executive and advisory roles including Trustee of the Nuffield Foundation, President of the International Association for Official Statistics and Board member of the Global Partnership for Sustainable Development Data. Between 2004 and 2014 John was Librarian of the House of Commons where he was responsible for broadening the range of information and research services available to MPs, particularly backbench Members. He also led work to improve the connection between Parliament and its Committees and the public. As well as his work in the UK, he chaired an International Parliamentary Union conference on informing democracy and was involved in parliamentary strengthening projects in Iraq, Myanmar and elsewhere. Alex Attwood Term: 1 February 2021 to 31 January 2024 Alex Attwood was a Social Democratic and Labour Party Member of the Northern Ireland Assembly from 1998 until 2017. He also served as Minister for Social Development in the Northern Ireland Executive from February 2010 until May 2011, and as Minister of the Environment in the Northern Ireland Executive from May 2011 until July 2013. The selection process for Commissioners is conducted by the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission within the UK Parliament. The Commissioner representing smaller parties is a 'nominated commissioner', which means the appointment is made from candidates put forward by the smaller political parties. As the UK Parliament has approved the motion to appoint Alex Attwood, the proposed appointment will now be submitted for royal assent by Her Majesty the Queen. Dame Sue Bruce Term: 1 January 2017 to 31 December 2023 Dame Sue Bruce is our Commissioner with responsibility for Scotland. Sue Bruce is a non-executive director with SSE PLC; Chair of Royal Scottish National Orchestra (RSNO); and is a Deputy Lieutenant of the City of Edinburgh. She is also a member of the Audit Committee of the University of Strathclyde, and a former Chair of Young Scot. Sue Bruce served in Local Government for almost 40 years, finishing in 2015. Her most recent post was as Chief Executive of The City of Edinburgh Council having previously served as Chief Executive at Aberdeen City Council and Chief Executive at East Dunbartonshire Council. Amongst her noteworthy achievements was the turnaround of the Edinburgh Tram Project, the establishment of the Edinburgh Guarantee and prior to that, the performance improvement of Aberdeen City Council.

Sarah Chambers Term: 31 March 2018 to 30 March 2022 Term: 31 March 2022 to 30 March 2026 Sarah Chambers was formerly the Chief Executive of the mail industry regulator, Postal Services Commission, between 2004 and 2008. A former civil servant, Sarah has a wealth of experience in the regulatory and policy fields, having been a board and committee member of a number of public organisations, including the Competition and Markets Authority, Bar Standards Board and Judicial Appointments Commission. Sarah is currently Chair of the Legal Services Consumer Panel. Lord Gilbert of Panteg Term: 1 November 2018 to 31 October 2022 Term: 1 November 2022 to 31 October 2026 Stephen Gilbert is one of the four commissioners appointed under S.3 (a) of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. This section provides for four Commissioners to be appointed after having been put forward by a political party. Stephen Gilbert was put forward by the Leader of the Conservative Party. Lord Gilbert of Panteg (Stephen Gilbert) is a Conservative peer who entered the House of Lords in 2015. He chairs the House of Lords Communications Select Committee. He has held several senior positions in the Conservative party. These have included Head of Campaigning, Director of Campaign and Deputy Chief Executive as well as Political Secretary to the Prime Minister. Roseanna Cunningham Term: 1 October 2022 to 30 September 2026 Professor Dame Elan Closs Stephens CBE Term: 13 March 2017 to 12 March 2025 Professor Dame Elan Closs Stephens CBE is our Commissioner with responsibility for Wales. Elan Closs Stephens is Emeritus Professor of Communications and Creative Industries at Aberystwyth University. She has specialised in cultural and broadcasting regulatory policy, chairing the Stephens Review into the Welsh Arts Council and serving as Chair of the British Council in Wales, as a Governor of the British Film Institute and, for two terms, as Chair of S4C, the Welsh Fourth Channel. For the last six years until the end of the Charter, she has been the Wales Trustee on the BBC's governing body, the BBC Trust. She has been a Non Executive Director of the Permanent Secretary of Wales's senior Board and has chaired the Board's Audit and Risk Committee since 2008. She also chaired the Recovery Board for the Isle of Anglesey County Council. Elan is a first language Welsh speaker from the Nantlle Valley in North Wales and a graduate of Somerville College, Oxford. She was awarded a CBE in the Queen's Birthday Honours in 2001 for services to broadcasting and the Welsh language. She served as High Sheriff of the three counties of Pembrokeshire, Carmarthenshire and Ceredigion 2012-13. Rob Vincent CBE Term: 1 January 2016 to 31 December 2023 Rob Vincent served as Chief Executive of Kirklees Council from 2004 until 2010 and was a non-executive Director of DCLG from 2008-2010. Between 2010 and 2012 Mr Vincent led the intervention into Doncaster Council, at the request of the Secretary of State. Most recently he has acted as an adviser to the Department of Health on the transition of the public health function from the NHS to local government. Chris Ruane Term: 1 November 2022 to 31 October 2026 Dr Katy Radford Term: 1 September 2021 to 31 August 2025 Dr Katy Radford is a social anthropologist who currently serves on the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland and works at the Commission for Victims and Survivors. She recently completed terms as Vice Chair of the Arts Council for Northern Ireland, and as a Member of the Commission for Flags,

Identity, Culture, and Tradition convened by The Executive Office. From 2011–2020, Katy was Acting Director of the Institute for Conflict Research. Katy was awarded an MBE in 2011 for her contribution to community relations in Northern Ireland. at the May 2023 local elections in England: interim analysis | Electoral Commission Search at the May 2023 local elections in England: interim analysis You are in the Our research section Home Our research Currently reading: of 5 - Show page contents On this page Awareness of the voter ID requirement Impact of the voter ID requirement on polling day Views on the voter ID requirement Next steps Background background At local elections in England on 4 May, voters needed to show photo identification (ID) to vote in polling stations. These were the first elections in Great Britain where this requirement was in place. Elections took place in 230 areas in England and around 27 million people were eligible to vote. Our interim analysis provides information and evidence currently available about how the new voter ID requirement was implemented and how voters found taking part. We have looked at evidence from large-scale public opinion research carried out before and after the elections, and polling station data collected from the majority of local authorities that held polls this year. There are several areas where further analysis is necessary to establish a clearer and fuller picture and they are highlighted through the report. We will publish our report on the May 2023 elections in September and that will include this additional analysis. Our September report will also draw on a wider range of information sources, including feedback from candidates, Returning Officers, polling station staff, election observers, charities and civil society organisations, and the police. If you would like to find out more about the Electoral Commission's views on our interim research, you can read our press release . Summary Awareness of the need to bring ID to vote at a polling station was high Our research found that immediately before polling day, 87% of people in England (excluding London, where there were no elections) were aware that they needed to show photo ID to vote at a polling station. In the research we carried out immediately following the poll, this was 92% of people in areas with elections. Awareness varied across the population and was lowest among younger age groups (82% for 18 to 24-year-olds), Black and minority ethnic communities (82%) and those who said they never vote in local elections (84%). Awareness was significantly lower among people who said they did not have an accepted form of ID (74%) compared with those who did have ID (94%). While overall awareness levels were high, some groups of people were significantly less likely to know about the requirement. This means that some people may not have known that they needed to show ID until they arrived at the polling station. Those people who did not have any of the accepted forms of ID would not have been able to obtain ID (for example the Voter Authority Certificate) on polling day itself. Awareness and take-up of the Voter Authority Certificate was low Approximately 89,500 people applied for a Voter Authority Certificate before the deadline on 25 April. Around 25,000 certificates were used as a form of ID on 4 May. In May 2023, awareness of the Voter Authority Certificate was 57% both among the overall population and those who said they did not already have photo ID. The overall number of Voter Authority Certificates applied for and used was low compared with estimates of the number of voters who might not have any other accepted ID (250,000 to 300,000). At least 0.25% of people who tried to vote at a polling station in May 2023 were not able to because of the ID requirement Data collected in polling stations shows that at least 0.25% of people who tried to vote at a polling station were not issued with a ballot paper because of the ID requirement. At least 0.7% of people who tried to vote at a polling station were initially turned away but around two-thirds of those people (63%) returned later in the day and were able to vote. 0.25% of polling station voters at these elections is approximately 14,000 voters who were not issued with a ballot paper because they could not show an accepted form of

ID. However, this is an underestimate, partly as a result of data quality issues but also because some people will have been reminded of the ID requirement before they could be recorded in the data. Around 4% of all non-voters said they didn't vote because of the voter ID requirement. Some people who would have wanted to vote at a polling station may have decided not to try, because they realised they did not have accepted ID before attempting to vote. To understand the broader impact of the voter ID requirement, we carried out a representative public opinion survey across the areas with elections in May. Our survey asked people if they voted in the elections and, if not, why they had chosen not to do so. We found that 4% of people who said they did not vote in these elections gave an unprompted reason related to the ID rules – 3% said they did not have the necessary ID and 1% said they disagreed with the need to show ID. The proportion of non-voters giving an ID-related reason rose from 4% to 7% when survey respondents were selecting from a list of reasons. There is evidence that some people found it harder than others to show accepted voter ID, including disabled people and the unemployed. However, further data collection and analysis are needed to establish a clearer picture and we will include additional information in our full report in September. The UK Government and the wider electoral community should work to improve the collection of data at polling stations. We recommend that the UK Government should ensure that Returning Officers are able to collect and report monitoring data on the impact of voter ID at future elections, and work is also needed to improve the quality and reliability of data collected at polling stations in future. Levels of voter confidence and satisfaction were similar to previous elections. There were high levels of satisfaction with the process of voting, in line with previous comparable elections; 89% of polling station voters said they were very or fairly satisfied. Voters were significantly more likely than non-voters to say that voting is safe. 90% of all voters said voting in a polling station is safe compared to 79% of non-voters. These results are also similar to those recorded after previous comparable elections. Awareness of the voter ID requirement Background Parliament approved the legislation for the new voter ID requirement on 22 December 2022. We delivered a public awareness campaign about the requirement across England which ran from 9 January to polling day. Awareness of the need to bring ID to vote at a polling station was high. Our research found that immediately before polling day, 87% of people in England (excluding London, where there were no elections) were aware that they needed to show photo ID to vote at a polling station.¹ In the research we carried out immediately following the poll, this was 92% of people in areas with elections.² This was a significant increase on the 23% that were aware in December 2022, before the start of our public awareness campaign. In our post-election research, awareness was higher among older age groups with 98% of over-65s aware in May 2023 compared to 82% of 18 to 24-year-olds. There was also a difference between white respondents (93%) and those from Black and minority ethnic communities (82%). We will be looking at these results for specific ethnicities in more detail in our September report in order to explore any patterns. These differences in awareness had become more marked closer to the poll. This may be related to the variable level of turnout among different demographic groups, with some being more engaged with the polls and therefore more likely to be interested in or to recall communications about the election as it approaches. Our research found that overall awareness of the requirement was significantly lower among people who said they did not have an accepted form of ID (74%) compared with those who did have ID (94%). We also found that those people who said they always or sometimes vote at local elections had higher levels of awareness (94%) compared with those who do not tend to vote (84%). While overall awareness levels were high, some groups of people were significantly less likely to know about the requirement. This means that some people would not have known that they needed to show ID until they arrived at the polling station. Those people who did not have any of the accepted forms of ID would not have been able to obtain ID (for example the Voter Authority Certificate) on polling day itself. Awareness and take-up of the Voter Authority Certificate was low. Voters who did not have one of the accepted forms of ID could apply for free voter ID (called a Voter Authority Certificate) from 16 January until 5pm on 25 April.

Research that we carried out in early 2023 found that: 4% of the population in Great Britain either did not have any photo ID (3%) or did not have ID where they thought the photo would be recognisable (1%) 1% said they did not know whether they had any of the forms of photo ID we asked about. Based on these figures and expected levels of polling station turnout at local elections, we estimated that between 250,000 and 350,000 applications for a Voter Authority Certificate might be expected. The overall number of certificates applied for before the deadline on 25 April (around 89,500) was low compared with these estimates of the number of people who might not have any other accepted ID. In May 2023, awareness of the Voter Authority Certificate was relatively low among the overall population and those who said they did not already have photo ID (both at 57%). This means that just under half of people who did not have any other accepted ID did not know that they could have applied for a form of ID to enable them to vote on polling day. There is limited data available on the demographics of people applying for a Voter Authority Certificate. However, applicants were more likely to come from older age groups. Our public opinion research found that 84% of those that applied for a Voter Authority Certificate said the application process was easy. 3 Approximately 25,000 Voter Authority Certificates were used as a form of ID on 4 May. It is not clear why a significant number of people applied for a certificate but did not use it on polling day. We will continue to analyse the available evidence to identify any patterns that might help to explain this. Impact of the voter ID requirement on polling day Background Polling station staff at the ballot issuing desk collected data on the number of people that could not be issued with a ballot paper because they did not provide accepted ID. They also recorded if any of these people returned later, and whether they were then able to show accepted ID and vote. The figures in this report are based on data received from 226 of the 230 local authorities with elections in May. At least 0.25% of people who tried to vote at a polling station in May 2023 were not able to because of the ID requirement. The data provided to the Commission indicates that at least 0.7% of people who tried to vote at a polling station in May were initially not issued with a ballot paper because they did not have an accepted form of ID. Just under two-thirds (63%) of these people returned later in the day with an accepted form of ID and were able to vote. By the close of poll, 0.25% of people who tried to vote in person had not been issued with a ballot paper. The proportion of people who were not issued with a ballot paper varied across local authorities from 0.02% of those who tried to vote at a polling station through to 1.04%. We intend to publish detailed local authority data alongside our September report. We will also be looking at the patterns of higher and lower levels of people turned away across local authorities in order to identify any trends. 0.25% of polling station voters at these elections is approximately 14,000 voters who were not issued with a ballot paper because they could not show an accepted form of ID. Returning Officers were required to separate out data for polling stations with and without staff acting as greeters. Where that data could be provided it shows that polling stations with greeters recorded that a smaller proportion of people were initially turned away (0.55%) compared to those without greeters (0.8%). Overall, the data shows that 38% of polling stations had a greeter. Among those recorded as being turned away from a polling station, 68% had not brought any ID and 28% brought a type of ID that was not accepted. The remainder were refused a ballot paper where the photo on their ID was not recognisable, the polling station staff suspected the ID was forged or where the person had failed to answer the statutory questions which can be used to ask a voter to confirm their name and address. Any voter showing ID could ask to have their identity checked in a private area of the polling station. Approximately 2,250 voters were recorded as having asked to have this check done in private. Recommendation Recommendation: Polling station staff should continue to collect data on the impact of voter ID at future elections Analysing data from the first scheduled elections where this requirement has been in place can help to improve the experience of voters and polling station staff at future polls. There is no legal duty or explicit power for Returning Officers to report data for future elections until the next UK Parliamentary general election, which must be held by January 2025. It would be a significant missed opportunity to learn and identify further improvements if Returning Officers did not collect and report data at the scheduled May 2024 elections, which will cover all areas of England and Wales. The UK Government should ensure that Returning Officers are able to collect and report monitoring data on the impact of voter ID at future elections, including specifically at the scheduled May 2024 elections and at any UK Parliament by-elections held during 2023 and 2024. The data from polling stations underestimates the impact of the new rules on voters for two reasons. The data from polling stations underestimates the impact of the new rules on voters for two reasons. Firstly, not all people who wished to vote in person will have got to the ballot issuing desk and been recorded by staff before realising they did not have accepted ID. For example they may have been put off by polling station staff who greeted voters and gave them information about the requirement before they got to the ballot issuing desk. Secondly, some of the data returned to the Commission is incomplete or inaccurate. The most common issues we found are: data returns being completed incorrectly, for example polling stations with more people returning to vote than were initially turned away missing individual pieces of data, for example on the reason why a voter was turned away missing returns from polling stations, for example where some stations in a local authority did not submit a data return blank returns from polling stations where it is unclear if a blank is equivalent to zero. This was the first time data on photo ID needed to be captured. Issues with data quality and consistency were inevitable across some 20,000 polling stations and a larger number of staff. It is not possible to quantify the level of inaccuracy in the data but, overall, these types of errors would result in an underestimate of the impact of the ID requirement. Recommendation Recommendation: The electoral community should work to improve the collection of data at polling stations for future elections Accurate data recording and reporting is essential to ensure there is a clear and reliable picture of the impact of the policy. This is needed to support informed debate and help identify areas for improvement. However, initial feedback from Returning Officers, polling station staff and observers suggests that some polling station staff found it difficult to record this additional data. We will work with the UK Government, Returning Officers and electoral administrators to review the data collection forms and guidance for polling station staff so they are clear and user-friendly. We will also work with local authorities and their training providers to make sure the ballot paper issuing procedure and data recording processes are fully explained to polling station staff. This should include guidance for polling station staff on the appropriate role of greeters and tellers. Data about the impact of Around 4% of all non-voters said they didn't vote because of the voter ID requirement Some people who would have wanted to vote at a polling station may have decided not to try, because they realised they did not have accepted ID before attempting to vote. To understand the broader impact of the voter ID requirement, we carried out a representative public opinion survey across the areas with elections in May. Our survey asked people if they voted in the elections and, if not, why they had chosen not to do so. We found that 4% of the people who said they did not vote gave an unprompted reason that was related to the ID rules – 3% said they did not have the necessary ID and 1% said they disagreed with the need to show ID. Overall, the most common reasons given for not voting were a lack of time (15%) or a lack of interest (13%). We also asked all non-voters a further prompted question (where they were given a number of answers to choose from) to understand whether the ID requirements had played a role in their decision not to vote. In response, 7% of non-voters indicated that the ID requirement was the reason they did not vote. Of those who told us they voted in a polling station, 98% said they were able to vote the first time they went. 2% said they brought either no ID or the wrong type of ID the first time but later returned. There are challenges in using these estimates to give an accurate, absolute number of people who were unable or chose not to vote in May. Survey data is an estimate which can be subject to two separate errors. One is sampling error. This is limited by the robust, representative sample we have used particularly for the population as a whole but it can be more of an issue for sub-groups of the population (such as non-voters). The second issue is non-sampling error. This includes respondents not answering a question and/or not answering it accurately. We can see one of the impacts of this in the difference between the unprompted and prompted question responses, where respondents may be less likely to give an unprompted answer (even if it would be true) and more likely to give a prompted one (where choosing from a list can invite a response which may or may not be true). The public opinion survey findings are therefore most useful for giving us a more rounded view of the likely impact of the ID requirement than the data from polling stations provides alone. The figures support our assessment that the polling station data underestimated the impact. Data on overall levels of turnout in May is not yet available and will be included in our full election report in September. This full report will look at how turnout in 2023 compares to previous local elections so we can see if it is possible to attribute any impact to the ID requirement. There is evidence that some people found it harder to show accepted voter ID We know from our previous research that some people were less likely to have photo ID and would therefore have faced more of a barrier to voting than those with accepted ID. However, it was not possible to capture reliable demographic data on people who were not able to vote because of the ID requirement; electoral registers do not record any demographic information, and electoral law did not allow polling station staff to collect demographic information about individuals who were turned away. The small overall proportion of people who said they did not vote because of the ID requirement also means that it is difficult to say definitively, from our public opinion survey, if the ID rules were more likely to deter specific groups from voting than others. However, the public opinion research does suggest that disabled people and those who are unemployed were more likely than other groups to give a reason related to ID for not voting. As set out above, our research on levels of awareness of the ID requirement also showed variation across different groups. Where the relevant data is available, from a few local authorities, there is some correlation between the numbers turned away and specific socio-demographic factors, including ethnicity and unemployment. This evidence is also consistent with the findings from the 2018 and 2019 voter ID pilot schemes . We also know that other organisations, such as the accredited observer organisation Democracy Volunteers , highlighted concerns that there was a disproportionate impact for some groups of voters at the May 2023 elections. Further data collection and analysis are needed to be able to explore these and other concerns; we will include additional information in our full report in September. This will include consideration of information and data provided by charities and civil society organisations. The majority of people were able to use their preferred method of voting One potential impact of the new ID rules could have been that more people chose to vote by post instead of at a polling station. We do not know if that was the case, as data on levels of postal voting at these elections is not yet available. We will include an assessment of any change in our full election report in September. However, in our public opinion survey we did ask voters if they had voted using their preferred method. The vast majority (95%) said they had. Views on the voter ID requirement Background After each election we ask people who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections. This helps us understand if views have changed since the last comparable set of elections. Levels of voter confidence and satisfaction were similar to previous elections Our research with the public found that more than two thirds of people (68%) were confident that the May elections were well run. This is slightly higher than the level recorded after the last set of comparable elections in 2019 (64%) but slightly lower than the most recent elections in 2022 (73%). We asked respondents why they did or did not feel confident and it is clear that the ID requirement had positive and negative impacts: among those who said they were not confident, the most common reason selected (by 46%) was that “some people were unable to vote due to the ID requirement”. among those who said they were confident, 30% selected the reasons that the requirement to show ID had “reassured me about the safety of the voting system”. There were high levels of satisfaction with the process of voting, in line with previous comparable elections; 89% of polling station voters said they were very or fairly satisfied. Satisfaction with the process of voting varied across different demographic groups, with the highest seen among the oldest age groups. We cannot make any link between this variation and the new ID rules, however, because the patterns are in line with the results we have seen after previous polls. We also asked voters to rate the ease of participation in the poll on a scale from one to five. Nearly nine in ten polling station voters (88%) rated it as easy (four or five). Again, there is clear variation in the level of ease reported by different groups but no indication that this is different to previous polls. Voters thought the elections were safe and secure Our survey of the public asked everyone who said they had voted to rate the security of voting in the election on a scale from one to five. 84% of polling station voters rated it as secure (four or five). We also asked polling station voters how safe they felt polling station voting was from fraud – 94% said it was safe. Voters were significantly more likely than non-voters to say that voting is safe. 90% of all voters said voting in a polling station is safe compared to 79% of non-voters. These results are similar to those recorded after previous comparable elections and should not be directly linked to the introduction of the voter ID requirement. In our full report in September we will explore further the demographic differences we see in the data on public attitudes. No cases of personation in polling stations were reported to police Early data from 26 of the 37 police forces in England where elections took place in May 2023 shows that no allegations of polling station personation fraud were reported following polling day. Police forces identified one public order incident relating to the voter ID requirement that led to an arrest. This was where a person who could not show accepted ID was arrested after allegedly assaulting a member of polling station staff. We will provide updated data on allegations in our September report. Next steps As highlighted throughout this report, there are areas where we have more work to do in order to understand the impact of the new voter ID requirement, and which will be covered in our September election report. These include how the implementation of voter ID: may have differently affected people across society who wanted to vote and what actions can be taken ahead of the next set of elections to address these issues. This includes looking at varying levels of awareness of the ID requirement, patterns in the numbers of people being turned away from polling stations and demographic / socio-economic differences in the data we have collected through our public opinion research impacted on the administration of the polls. This will incorporate views from Returning Officers and their teams responsible for planning the elections, as well as the polling station staff responsible for managing the processes on 4 May changed how parties and candidates approached their campaigns for these elections Background Elections held on 4 May 2023 On 4 May, local elections took place in 230 councils in England, covering almost 5,000 individual wards. The areas holding elections included: 152 district councils (out of 164 in total) covering largely rural areas and cities or larger towns in areas that also have county councils 46 unitary authorities (out of 62 in total) covering cities or larger towns in areas without county councils 32 metropolitan district councils (out of 36) covering predominantly urban areas in Greater Manchester, Merseyside, South Yorkshire, Tyne and Wear, the West Midlands and West Yorkshire Local mayoral elections in Bedford, Leicester, Mansfield, and Middlesborough. Scheduled elections did not take place in several areas of England in May 2023, including both London and Birmingham. Timeline for in Great Britain The Elections Act 2022 introduced a new requirement for voters to show an accepted form of photo ID to vote in person at a polling station for certain types of elections in Great Britain. The requirement applies at local elections in England, Police and Crime Commissioner elections in England and Wales, UK Parliamentary by-elections and recall petitions. From October 2023, it will also apply to UK Parliamentary general elections. The Chair welcomed all to the meeting. It was noted that alternative Board document portals were to be considered to replace use of Objective Connect from the new financial year. Declarations of interest That the Board noted no new declarations received. Minutes of the previous Board meeting (EC 72/21) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 20 October 2021 be agreed. Commission Board action tracker (EC 73/21) Resolved: That the Board noted the progress against actions requested by the Board. Forward Plan of Board business 2021/22 and 2022/23 (EC 74/21) The Board noted that due to availability of some Commissioners for scheduled Board meetings in March and April 2022, and that the April 2022 Board meeting was scheduled a week before the Easter break and 3 weeks following the March meeting, it would be prudent to consider whether to cancel one of them and, possibly merge both March and April meetings. The Board discussed extending Board meetings when strategic deep dive topics were scheduled, in order to get the best out of the session. It was noted this could be considered closer to the time to build in flexibility. The Board noted further topics on fraud and intimidation and, continued reporting on elections and registrations to be scheduled. It was noted that a 'new look' Forward Plan would be produced, mapping the objectives of the Corporate Plan for each meeting. Resolved: That the Board reviewed and noted the Forward Plan of Board business for 2021/22 and 2022/23, scheduling further topics for the next few meetings. Elections Bill (Presentation) The Director, Regulation introduced a presentation, and was joined by the Head of Policy and the Policy Manager. The following areas were covered: Progress of the Bill Parliamentary activity on the Bill Our strategic priorities for the Bill Focus: Strategy and Policy Statement Our next steps The Board noted discussions to date, with the Minister of State, who has elections policy in her responsibilities, on the part of the Elections Bill on the government's proposed 'Strategy and Policy Statement' for the Commission and, discussions held at the Westminster Parliamentary Parties Panel. The Board further noted that the Chief Executive and the Commission Chair would be attending the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee next week, giving evidence, with a strong positive narrative, on the work of the Commission. The Board discussed areas of the Strategy and Policy Statement, and Digital imprints, as well as exploring options. Resolved: The Board noted the presentation and associated discussions. Performance report quarter two 2021/22 (EC 75/21) The Chief Executive introduced the report updating the Board on performance in quarter two of 2021/22. The Board noted that staff retention and recruitment in some areas of expertise was becoming an issue. This could be consistent with the wider jobs environment. The Board noted that one of the areas showing as red was the IT systems. This was an area of concern due to infrastructure issues going back a few years. The Board noted that the Audit and Risk Committee would be focussing on areas of risk management and will be taking forward work streams following their meeting this week. Resolved: That the Board noted the delivery of the work programme and determined that the budget is being managed effectively. Supplementary Estimate (EC 76/21) The Chief Executive and Director, Finance and Corporate Services introduced the report, referring to circumstances that were not foreseeable in setting the original budget and that cannot be met through in-year budget management. The Board noted that this was a more robust forecast than in previous years. Resolved: That the Board reviewed and agreed the supplementary estimate. Update from the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo) Chair (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chair of the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo) of their meeting held on the 23 November 2021. The Board noted that the Committee had received an update on the People Strategy, Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) activities, were joined by the EDI Lead and Head of Projects, added to their terms of reference, and received updates on ways of working and pay remit. The Board noted that this would be the last RemCo meeting for the Head of Human Resources, Jennifer Hartland, as she would be leaving the Commission next week. RemCo thanked Jennifer for her work and support to the Committee. Resolved: That the Board noted the work of the Committee. Update from the Audit and Risk Committee (ARC) Chair (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chair of Audit and Risk Committee (ARC) of their meeting held on the 29 November 2021. The Board noted that the Committee held an informal session on risk appetite on the 24 November, which will be brought to a future Board meeting for discussion as part of good governance and ethos of the Commission. The Board noted updates from their meeting on 29 November on internal audit reports, including the programme for 2022/23, the annual audit plan report 2021/22 including an increase in the annual fees, audit recommendations and meeting deadlines, noting one of the audits going forward is on IT and cyber security. The Board further noted the committee's terms of reference, annual risk framework, oral updates on ways of working and financial risks arising from devolved funding and, an update on the registers of interests, donations, gifts and hospitality. Resolved: That the Board noted the work of the Committee. Data on investigation timescales (EC 77/21) The Director, Regulation introduced the report providing the Board with data on investigation length, giving some wider context on the legal, evidential and other principles which apply to Commission investigations and affect their conduct and length. Resolved: That the Board noted the report. Annual review of risk (EC 78/21) The Director, Finance and Corporate Services introduced the report as part of the annual Board's risk assurance. The register is regularly reviewed by the Audit and Risk Committee. The Board noted that the report will be reformatted to align with the strategic risks mentioned in the Corporate Plan. Resolved: That the Board noted the report. Chief Executive's update (Oral) The Chief Executive provided an oral update on operations and matters arising since the last Board meeting. The Board noted that the Commission had a virus incident that got into our IT systems which was managed effectively without harm being caused, but highlighted the ongoing potential risk of losing data. The Board noted further updates on plans, Covid-19 and protocols, completion of staff survey and EC reputation. Further updates included the dissolution and calling of Parliament Bill Lords Second Reading. The Director, Regulation gave evidence for us to the Scottish Parliament Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee on aspects of the Elections Bill. There was a by-election for North Yorkshire Police, Fire and Crime Commissioner. The Wales Electoral Coordination Board met, and in Northern Ireland the first electoral register canvass since 2013 was near completion. The Board noted updates on the publication of Q3 donations, Electoral Lawyers Forum, Old Bexley and Sidcup by-election. The Commission Chair scheduled IFG interview, PACAC and Westminster PPP meeting, OPQs to be answered and North Shropshire by-election. The EDI strategy was out for consultation, Commissioner and Chief Executive recruitment. Resolved: That the Board noted the oral updates.

Minutes of the Commission Board meeting of 5 June 2019 (EC 38/19) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 5 June 2019 be agreed. Annual Review of Complaints 2018/19 (EC 39/19) The Board heard about the additional resource needed to address the high volume of complaints that had been received recently. At the time of the European Parliamentary Election, the Commission received a large number of complaints. The majority of these complaints were from European Union citizens resident in the UK who were unable to complete their registration in advance of the election and were thus unable to cast a vote. A significant number of these complainants used a standard template developed by a third party to lodge their complaint. The Board heard that experienced staff drafted a common response to these complaints. Where the standardised response did not answer all the issues raised in the original complaint, additional wording was added. Kieran Rix provided an overview of how responses to complaints were developed and the sign-off process that they went through before a response was issued. He advised the Board on work to develop an approach to addressing repeated, offensive, and vexatious complaints. There was ongoing work with other teams across the organisation to ensure a smoother working practice when responding to complaints in a timely manner. The Board acknowledged the hard work of the staff in ensuring that we responded to this large volume of complaints within our 20-day deadline. The Board were assured that complaints were not investigated by the person being complained about. The Board heard that there was contingency for either the Chair of the Board or the Independent Adviser to the Audit Committee to conduct a review of the complaint if it was about the Chief Executive. The complaints policy would be updated to ensure that this process was clear. Action: Include more detailed information on any complaints that were not responded to within the 20 working day deadline in future reports. Update complaints policy to clarify the role of the Board Chair or the Audit Committee Independent Adviser in, where appropriate, reviewing complaints about the Chief Executive. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Audit Committee annual report 2018/19 (EC 40/19 and 41/19) Sue Bruce, Chair of the Audit Committee, introduced the item and drew the attention of the Board to the key areas of work undertaken by the Committee. There was agreement that appointing an independent adviser rather than an independent chair had benefited the Committee. Some comments from the National Audit Office needed to be added to the final report, as well as the assurance report details. The Audit Committee agreed to add an additional audit meeting in the new financial year to ensure that the workload of the Committee remained balanced. There was a discussion about changing the remit of the Committee to an audit and risk committee, and extending its scope to include areas such as environmental performance. The Chief Executive noted that the number of days that the internal auditors spend auditing the Commission had been stable for a number of years, and suggested that this might need to increase to reflect the increased breadth of the Commission's work. Kieran Rix added that this might also involve a change so that the internal auditors provided more advisory work. Action : Kieran Rix to amend the report to incorporate the comments from the National Audit Office and the assurance report details. Resolved: That the paper be approved, subject to final changes being made by Kieran Rix working to the Chair to the Audit Committee, and approved by the Audit Committee by correspondence. Remuneration and Human Resources Committee annual report 2018/19 (EC 42/19) Rob Vincent, Chair of the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo), introduced the paper, and noted the high-quality support provided to the Committee by staff. He highlighted the key areas that the Committee had considered during the year, including staff turnover and the pay awards. In the coming year, the Committee would focus on equality and diversity, increase its involvement with the staff survey, and support better talent management. The Chief Executive restated that previous assumptions regarding recruitment had been reversed; all positions would be filled permanently unless there was a persuasive business case for a fixed-term contract. The turnover of permanent staff was higher than we would like, but only slightly outside the range of what was expected. The Board discussed the low level of sickness absence, which had dropped dramatically since the start of the year, as a relevant indicator of positive staff engagement and care. The Commission's levels of sickness absence were below the public and private sector averages. Kieran Rix provided a brief overview of the pay award for this year. The Chief Executive explained why the salary for some positions was market-based, and how, as the organisation grew, we had recruited new skills, which required reviewing the salary offered. This trend was likely to continue and was similar to the approach taken by other regulators. The Board discussed whether it should be made aware sooner and receive a note of, the cost of living award. The Chief Executive suggested that as part of the RemCo consideration, the Board could be informed. Action: The Director of Finance to consider the pay award report being brought to the attention of the Board as part of the RemCo consideration. Resolved: That the paper be agreed. Adoption of 2018/19 Annual Report and resources accounts (EC 43/19 and EC 44/19) The Chair introduced the item and the Chief Executive gave a brief overview of the document. Kieran Rix confirmed that the National Audit Office's draft opinion was unqualified, and that they had a few minor recommendations. He then explained the final stages necessary before sign-off, with the intention that the report be presented to Parliament on 18 July. The Board suggested improvements to the wording of the foreword, and some of the explanations around the performance measurements. The Board also discussed adding further information to the foreword to emphasise the further changes to electoral law that we would like to see made. The Board suggested emphasising that this had been a challenging year for the Commission, and adding more information in areas where the performance standard had changed during the year. Kieran Rix explained the accounts in greater detail, noting that they were consistent with the management accounts, and subject to a small number of minor amends. The accounts showed an 8.5% underspend. This underspend was overwhelmingly due to unused contingency funding for the European Parliamentary Election.

Action: That the Chief Executive and Chair reflect the comments made by Commissioners during the course of this item in the final version of the Annual Report to be laid in Parliament. Resolved: That the paper be agreed, subject to the amendments discussed and final agreement with the National Audit Office.

Voter identification pilots (2019) evaluation (EC 45/19)

The Chief Executive introduced the item and reminded the Board that we had a statutory duty to evaluate the voter identification (ID) pilot schemes that ran across ten local authorities on 2 May 2019. The data was still being analysed, so the final picture might still change. The Board heard that the 2019 pilots were better-designed schemes, and covered a greater range of constituencies. Phil Thompson provided more context on the findings of the research. He explained that the percentage of voters who were refused a ballot paper for not having suitable ID and did not subsequently return to cast a ballot, ranged between 0.03 – 0.7%. It was noted that this number, while small, could still affect the outcome of an election. The Board noted that the turnout at local elections was different to a United Kingdom Parliamentary General Election (UKPGE), and there was a risk that the proportion of people unable to provide sufficient ID would increase at a UKPGE. The pilots did not collect evidence of why people did not return after being turned away. This data would be difficult to collect and would require researchers to insert themselves into the process in a more active way. We also had no evidence to determine if there was an increase or decrease in personation in the pilot areas, as we had no strong evidence of the number of personations outside of the pilot areas to compare any data against. The research found high levels of reported awareness that the trials were taking place, which was similar to previous pilots, although there was a lower level of awareness among people from demographic groups that are typically less likely to vote. There was some evidence within these pilots of a potentially negative impact on turnout among some populations, but the findings were inconclusive. The Board discussed the evidence that indicated an increase in the number of people polled who felt that electoral fraud was a less serious problem than before the trial period. While there was no strong evidence of impact on reducing voter fraud, there was evidence of a shift in perception of the strength of the system. Part of our analysis was informed by findings from a security analyst who assessed the different types of voter identification used. This analysis found that bank cards did not offer any additional assurance over a poll card. However, the analysis did recommend that changes could be made to the poll card to strengthen its security. The trials also identified areas where polling station procedures could be strengthened to provide greater assurance, including changes to the ordering of the process of issuing ballot papers to electors. The security analyst confirmed that photo identification would provide the greatest assurance. About 7.5% of voters would not currently be able to provide any form of acceptable photo ID if this was a requirement. The Board discussed the merits of recommending issuing photo ID free of charge. The Board also asked if evidence from Northern Ireland, where photo ID had been required to vote for some time, would be used to inform the report to the government. Further evidence was required to determine whether the level of security offered by voter ID cards would be better than that offered by poll cards. The balance between security and accessibility is relevant in this regard. The Board noted that one potential draw-back of requiring polling cards is the time delay between when polling cards were issued and polling day, which could be as long as three weeks. The Board was interested in assessing the money spent on voter ID cards against addressing the other known vulnerabilities in the system. Sarah Chambers left the meeting at this point.

Action: That the Head of Research ensure that the final report to the Government include the key points raised in the discussion by the Board. That the Head of Research circulate the report to all Commissioners for comment. That the Chief Executive in consultation with the Chair have final say over the wording of the report.

Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Chief Executive's update (EC 46/19) The Chief Executive introduced the item, and began by noting the significant agenda in Scotland and Wales where there are positive signs that some of our policy recommendations would be reflected in legislation. He also provided an update on system upgrades that were being developed, including the website and the PFR (Political Finance Regulation) online system. Ailsa Irvine provided an update on the different pieces of legislation that were being taken forward by the Scottish Government and the Welsh Government. This included legislation relating to any future referendum in Scotland, as well as legislation extending the franchise. Dan Adamson provided an update on the monitoring of parties that had filed late returns, and those that had not yet filed returns. We are evaluating the monitoring of the European Parliamentary Election, particularly the advert libraries that social media companies created. The Board heard that we had, with the police, issued guidance for candidates on how to handle intimidation. The Board received an update on the various different litigation cases in which we were involved. Craig Westwood updated the Board on the high profile events happening in July, including appearing before the UK Parliament's Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee on their electoral law inquiry, as well as the All Parties Parliamentary Group on electoral campaigning transparency. The new Commission website was expected to launch in late July. Kieran Rix provided a brief update on the Bunhill Row lease negotiations, which had begun. Joan Walley asked if we would extract issues about environmental reporting during the lease negotiations. Kieran Rix confirmed that we would raise this in the negotiations.

Actions: That Kieran Rix will raise the issue of environmental reporting in the lease negotiations

Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Forward plan of Board business 2019/20 (EC 47/19) The Chair reminded Commissioners that the 17 July meeting would be in the afternoon, followed by a reception in the State Rooms, Speaker's House, House of Commons, to celebrate the 2019 Four Countries' Conference.

Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Action tracker (EC 48/19)

Action: The Executive Team to schedule all of the actions.

Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Chair and Chief Executive's meeting and meetings of note in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (EC 49/19)

Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Impact on electoral administration You are in the May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 24 July 2019 Last updated: 24 July 2019 Impact on electoral administration The Returning Officers and their staff who were responsible for the May 2018 elections successfully ran the pilot schemes in all of the five pilot areas: Polling station staff told us that they had no difficulty checking people's identification They were confident that they could do this again at a future election Across all areas, additional staffing and training were required for the pilot Impact on electoral administration These schemes were run at polls with a low turnout, with fewer people voting and showing identification in polling stations. As shown below there are clear lessons that can be learned for future polls where turnout is higher with more people voting in polling stations. Delivering the identification requirement has specific implications for the administration of the poll and these are set out in more detail in our individual reports on each pilot scheme. We have considered the administrative impact across four aspects of delivery of the polls below. Overall findings from the pilot schemes Staffing and training All of the areas increased their staffing in order to deliver the pilot. There were varying approaches to this, ranging from employing ten extra polling station inspectors in Swindon to using one third more polling station staff in Bromley. Clearly there were also additional costs associated with increased staffing. For example, across the pilots the additional staff and training costs ranged from very little to a third of the usual costs at local elections. However, in feedback after polling day the pilot areas told us that this increase in staffing would not be required to administer voter identification at future local elections. This is because additional pilot elements, such as the collection of data on polling day (required to inform the evaluation), would not need to take place. A few areas also did not think they would need additional staff at every polling day, even for a higher turnout poll such as a UK parliamentary general election. More and/or longer training sessions were also required to support staff in delivering the pilot. However, feedback from electoral administrators in the pilot areas indicated that, while this training required planning and preparation, it did not present a significant challenge for them in running the pilot. We also know that the training was delivered well. Our survey of polling stations staff found that, on average, 94% rated the training they received as good or excellent. Close to 100% of polling staff also told us they were confident about the process they had to follow in order to check voters' identification. Local identification The 2018 pilots offered a limited test of the process and cost of issuing local identification to electors. Three pilots (Bromley, Gosport and Woking) offered a form of local identification but only Woking needed to issue any. This is likely to be because Woking had a narrower identification requirement where electors were slightly more likely to need to use a local option. Woking issued 63 local elector cards and their feedback indicates that this process was manageable for them to deliver. However it did incur some additional costs associated with the production and delivery (where needed) of the cards. Gosport did raise a concern in their feedback about their ability to resource the local identification route if it had been significantly used. This was mainly because, as a small local authority, they would have limited flexibility in drawing on resources from other teams. The impact of IT Swindon and Watford both used IT in the polling stations to scan QR codes on electors' poll cards. In both pilots the systems worked well and there were no notable issues on polling day related to the

IT. Also, the systems provided Returning Officers with useful, live information on turnout at polling stations that they would not normally have access to. However, planning and setting up these IT systems required a significant amount of time and resource commitment from the electoral administration teams, the software suppliers and Cabinet Office. This commitment of time and resource stems largely from the level of security needed to run these systems, which hold significant personal data, as well as the level of assurance and resilience needed to ensure no problems arise on polling day. While much of the work was associated with the development of the software, and would not necessarily be needed in the future, there would still be a sizeable level of commitment needed from software suppliers to support any local authorities sites using these systems at future polls. There would also be ongoing costs which local authorities would need to meet in order to use these systems. These include software licensing, hardware (tablets/scanners) and additional staff training. Given the cost and time needed to support the use of these systems, the merits of including any IT- enabled pilots in future schemes needs to be weighed against the ability to scale up these systems across Great Britain. It is also not clear from these pilot schemes that additional IT in polling stations (for example to scan barcodes or QR codes) is absolutely necessary to support the use of the poll card as a form of identification. Polling day Feedback from Returning Officers and their staff indicate that delivering the identification requirement on 3 May did not present significant challenges. In response to our survey, 77% of polling station staff said they were very satisfied with how polling day went. This agrees with the feedback we received from Returning Officers which said that few issues had arisen on polling day and that they had received few or no negative responses from the public. These findings also agree with the observations made by Electoral Commission staff on polling day across the five areas. We saw few issues and largely observed processes working well. A high proportion of staff (69%) also agreed with the statement that asking voters to prove their identity had little or no impact on their work on polling day. This also suggests that the variation in identification requirements did not make the task in polling stations notably easier or more difficult. Staff in Swindon and Watford (using poll card scanning) were more likely to agree there was little impact but there was little difference across the other areas. The difference in the quantity of different acceptable identification types between Bromley/Gosport and Woking do not, for example, appear to have made a significant difference to staff. We also asked polling station staff if they would feel confident about replicating the requirement to show identification at a future poll and 97% said they would be confident in doing so. Beyond the pilots: the impact on administration at future elections The evidence we have gathered shows that the polls in the pilot areas on 3 May were well run and that the administrative challenges presented by the voter identification requirement were met by the Returning Officers and their staff. Looking beyond the pilots, there could be different administrative challenges which these pilots have not tested, including the need to process and deliver significant volumes of local electoral identification cards/letters. The impact and risks for people running the elections could be different at elections with higher turnout with more people voting and showing identification in polling stations, such as a general election. Turnout at the May 2018 elections, as is usually the case for local government elections, was relatively low, meaning that the pilots were run on a different scale than might be the case at a UK parliamentary general election. At these local elections between 20-30% of the electorate voted at a polling station whereas at a UK parliamentary election over 50% often vote at a polling station. For example, staff in some polling stations in Watford said that scanning the poll card caused delays and queues which could be longer with more people voting. In areas such as Woking, which had a more limited choice of identification, more local elector cards may need to be processed and issued putting pressure on local authority election teams. No applications were made in Bromley for the certificate of identity or in Gosport for the electoral identity letter, which means that the pilot did not test the resources required to process applications and issue certificates or letters. The Returning Officers and their staff in Bromley and Gosport told us that if the list of acceptable identification was reduced they would expect the number of applications for certificates and letters to increase. They had some concerns about the pressure this could put on an already stretched elections team. This was particularly true for Gosport which, as a smaller authority, has less flexibility in the size of the elections team and their ability to draw on resources from elsewhere in the council. One particular issue which the pilots in 2018 were ready to test was how to ensure privacy for voters who show photo identification but need to remove, for example, a head scarf to allow polling station staff to confirm their identity. However, several of the pilot areas do not have significant British Asian populations. In Woking, which does have a significant Asian or British Asian population, no-one requested to show their identification in private. In Watford, where some wards also have a significant British Asian population, the availability of poll cards as part of the identification requirement meant that people may have been less likely to need to use this facility. Ensuring voters have the privacy they need could be a more significant administrative challenge in some areas and that should be a consideration for future testing. Accuracy in Great Britain You are in the Accuracy and completeness of electoral registers section Home Our research Accuracy and completeness of electoral registers On this page Type of errors Demographic characteristics First published: 3 September 2019 Last updated: 26 September 2019 Key findings The local government registers in Great Britain were 89% accurate, and the parliamentary registers were 89% accurate.

In December 2018, 11% of entries had major errors and 9% of register entries had minor errors Type of errors Both the local government registers and parliamentary registers in Great Britain were 89% accurate. Type of errors In analysing the accuracy of the electoral registers, a number of different types of error can be identified. These errors are then categorised as either a 'major' or 'minor' error.

The major error category is comprised of the following: entries which refer to individuals that no longer live at address entries which may prevent an individual casting their vote at a polling station (for example, an incorrect name); those errors that would mean that someone could vote when they are not eligible to do so (for example, an incorrect date of birth for someone under 18). Minor errors are those which would not prevent someone from casting their vote. For example, an entry with a spelling error. In total, 11% of entries had a major error (up from 9% in 2015). The most common being that no corresponding name was collected through our survey at that address (10%). This refers to register entries for individuals who no longer live at the property. 9% of register entries had minor errors. The most common was for a middle name to be missing from the register which was the case for 6% of register entries. Here is a breakdown of the types of errors used to calculate the accuracy of the local government registers. Accuracy errors, Great Britain, 2015 and 2018 December 2015 December 2018 Major errors total 9.4% 11.2% Major errors-(a) 8.8% 10.4% No corresponding name taken at address Major errors-(b) 0.3% 0.7% First name and/or surname wrong on register 0.1% 0.4% First name and/or surname missing on register - 0.0% UK/Irish/Commonwealth marker present 0.2% 0.3% Major errors- (c) 0.3% 0.5% Name on survey corresponds to ineligible name on survey 0.1% 0.2% Attainers- DOB missing or wrong 0.1% 0.1% EU citizens marker missing 0.1% 0.2% Accurate with minor errors 10.4% 9.1% First name and/or surname on register misspelled 1.0% 1.2% First name/surname on register incomplete 0.5% 0.5% Middle name missing from register 7.8% 6.4% Middle name or initials misspelled or incomplete on register 0.1% 0.0% Middle name or initial wrong on register 0.1% 0.1% Person does not have a middle name but middle name on registers (respondents only) 0.2% 1.3% Surname is/assumed to be previous surname 0.5% 0.3% First/middle/surname in different order on register 0.1% 0.1% DOB earlier on register for attainer 0.0% 0.0% Demographic characteristics Demographic characteristics Examining the demographic nature of inaccuracy on the electoral registers is more challenging. It is not possible to record demographic details for register entries which are not matched to a resident during an interview.

Nor is it possible to take into account properties which are derelict or entirely vacant. In order to provide some guidance to the patterns of accuracy by different household characteristics, the analysis below takes into account household data where a resident was interviewed. However, this data still only presents a limited picture and so must be treated with caution. Tenure Accuracy by tenure follows a similar pattern to completeness, with owner-occupier households the most likely to have accurate register entries (95%). Households where the home is being bought on a mortgage (or through shared ownership), or rented from a social landlord have a similar level of accuracy (91-95%), while private rented households have a lower level of accuracy, at 81%. Social grade Social grade is also calculated at the household level, based on the occupation of the chief income earner. Here again, the pattern of accuracy is closely related with completeness with a slight gradient by social grade, with AB households the most accurate and DE households least. However, all are within five percentage points of each other. Accuracy of local government registers by social grade, 2018 Great Britain AB 94% C1 93% C2 93% DE 89% Length of time at address Accuracy follows the same pattern as completeness when looking at how long households have occupied their accommodation. Accuracy is similar for all households who have been at their present address for at least one year, at 93% or higher, but is much lower for households where the current resident has been living for less than a year (56%).

Standing for election in the United Kingdom: Report and recommendations | Electoral Commission Search Standing for election in the United Kingdom: Report and recommendations You are in the Our consultations section Home Our consultations On this page Qualifications and disqualifications Deposits and subscribers Candidate use of descriptions Candidate benefits Procedural issues Download our full report First published: 13 January 2015 Last updated: 13 January 2015 Overview The Electoral Commission is an independent body which reports directly to the UK Parliament. We regulate political party and election finance and set standards for well-run elections. We report to the relevant Governments on recommendations for change that we have identified. We have a strong interest in simplifying and updating the procedures used by candidates to stand for election in the UK. We last reviewed the rules around standing for election in 2003, after which a number of recommendations were taken forward by the UK Government. This report gives an updated view of these issues, including reporting on responses to a new consultation paper published in September 2013. The following aspects of standing for election were within the scope of the consultation document: Qualifications and disqualifications Deposits and subscribers Candidate benefits, including candidate mailings, broadcasts, access to the register, free use of rooms, descriptions and emblems Procedural issues, including the use of candidate photographs on ballot papers, delivering and objecting to nomination papers. We sought views from a range of people and organisations including elected representatives, political parties, electoral administrators and candidates who have stood for election. Around 100 responses were received from a range of individuals, organisations and groups. The responsibility and entitlements of those standing for election are set out in law, and they vary depending on the election. Many of these rules have been in place for many years, and questions have been raised about whether they are still appropriate. Some of these have been highlighted in the Commission's statutory reports on elections, including: the value of the subscribers system (also known as signatures or assenters); the size and variation in deposits; the rules on access to the electoral register; the clarity of qualification and disqualification criteria; and the prohibition on independent candidates using descriptions on the ballot paper. While the rules on standing for election are of most direct interest to potential candidates and political parties, they are also important for voters since they help determine the range of candidates available to them. The rules should also inspire confidence in elections amongst voters, candidates and parties. To assess the robustness of the laws and procedures relating to standing for election, we have used the following set of principles: Clear election law – the rules on standing for election should be clear, straightforward and unambiguous. Encourage participation – processes should be accessible and transparent to promote the widest participation. There should be no unnecessary barriers to standing for election. Fair and equal treatment – fair and equal treatment should be ensured between all candidates, save where differences are genuinely justified. Trust – rules should inspire confidence amongst voters. Consistency of approach – as far as possible the rules on standing for election should be consistently set so they are easy to understand and any differences between them should reflect conscious policy choices by the relevant legislature. Up to date – the rules on standing for election should reflect current technology and the expectations of candidates, agents, political parties, voters and those administering elections. We used these principles to assess the appropriateness of the current arrangements, drawing on the evidence submitted through the consultation. During the review we have been able to identify some areas where relatively straightforward changes to the law could be made. However, in some other areas the issues and law relating to standing for election are very complex. Our recommendations make clear where this is the case and it will be important for further work to be done by the relevant policy makers before any changes are made to the law.

Qualifications and disqualifications To stand for election in the UK, a person must be qualified and also not be disqualified. A core set of qualifications relating to age and nationality apply to all elections. Additional qualifications relating to demonstrating a local connection apply at local elections. Similarly, certain individuals are disqualified from standing for election, with different sets of criteria applying at different elections. In addition, some people are disqualified from standing in some elections because of a post that they hold.

Respondents to the consultation were of the view that qualification and disqualification criteria should be clearly set out. There was consensus that the rules could be simpler with greater consistency between elections. Specific queries were raised about particular aspects of the qualifications and disqualifications rules. We agree that the qualifications and disqualifications criteria require review, and that candidates would benefit from increased clarity in the rules. We do not think however that it would be appropriate or possible to have one set of criteria applying to all elections, since there are good reasons for qualifications and disqualifications to vary depending on the election. This is a complex area and it will be important for a range of issues to be taken into account before any changes to the law are proposed by the relevant policy makers. Consultation with representatives of local government, electoral administrators and Returning Officers on the detail of any changes will be particularly important.

Qualifications and disqualifications: Recommendations

We recommend that the relevant Governments should clarify and update the law relating to the qualifications for local government elections including those relating to being a local government elector for the area, occupying as owner or tenant, principal or only place of work being in the area, and residence in the area (or within three miles at parish or community elections). We recognise that the qualification about continuing to be a local government elector for the area of the authority is different from the other three qualifications, since it must be satisfied throughout the whole of a councillor's term of office. This qualification does not apply in Scotland or Northern Ireland. We also note that enforcing this qualification is not practical since there is no requirement for nomination papers to be held (and where they are held it is not normally beyond one year). We therefore recommend that the Government considers whether this qualification is still appropriate. We recommend that the law in England, Wales and Northern Ireland is changed to make a clear distinction between offices or employment which would prevent someone standing for election, and those which would prevent someone from holding office if elected. A suggested framework of questions is put forward in this report to help establish whether a particular postholder could stand, but it would be up to the relevant Governments to determine how these should apply when reviewing the law. This reduction in restrictions on potential candidates would enable wider choice for voters. We recommend that the law is changed so that voters, voting in person in polling stations (and where practical those voting by post), are informed that a candidate had either been disqualified or no longer wants to be considered for election but has not withdrawn their candidature within the time allowed. This will ensure that the voter can make a more informed choice. Deposits and subscribers Deposit and subscriber (also known as signatures or assenters) requirements are the two main barriers to standing for election. Under a deposit system, anyone who wants to stand for election must lodge a specified amount of money with the Returning Officer. The subscriber system requires anyone standing for election to gather the signatures of a set number of supporters, who must be registered electors. Deposit and subscriber requirements vary between elections. Political parties expressed mixed views about deposits. Larger parties were generally of the view that paying a deposit required a candidate to demonstrate proper intent, and that deposits deterred 'non-serious' candidates. On the other hand, smaller parties and independent candidates said that deposits could be unaffordable and therefore they restricted their ability to participate in elections. Similarly, some political parties said that the subscriber system should be retained because it helps validate the nomination process. Some electoral administrators expressed the view that the subscriber process was not particularly meaningful, and that it just added to the administrative process. Many respondents made the point that the variation in subscriber requirements between elections was not logical and was confusing for candidates. Without either deposit or subscriber requirements, there is a risk of large numbers of candidates (especially in high-profile elections) which could potentially lead to ballot papers that are unwieldy for voters, undermine the credibility of the election, and are difficult and costly to administer. The other side of this argument is that reducing these barriers could mean an increased range of candidates standing for election, which would mean greater choice for voters. In the case of deposits, it does not seem reasonable to have a barrier to standing for election that depends on someone's financial means. We do not think that the ability to pay a specified fee is a relevant or appropriate criterion for determining access to the ballot paper. We therefore recommend that deposit requirements are abolished. The argument for subscriber requirements seems to carry more weight, in that they act as a proxy for support from the electorate and are an indication that candidates are genuinely contesting the election. Having said this, in practice subscriber requirements may test administrative ability rather than support from the electorate. Given that we are recommending abolishing deposits, on balance we have concluded that subscriber requirements should be retained. There is however a need to review subscriber requirements to ensure that they are proportionate to the type of election and also where possible to increase consistency. In considering these recommendations, it will be important that Governments look at subscriber and deposit requirements together for each election. We also recognise that different arrangements and solutions may be appropriate in different parts of the UK.

We recommend removing the requirement to pay a deposit at all elections, as we do not consider that there should be a financial barrier to standing for election. We recommend that subscribers should be retained to maintain trust that elections are being contested by serious candidates and avoid ballot papers that are unwieldy for voters and difficult to administer. The number of subscribers should be reviewed for each election to ensure it is proportionate to the post for which the candidate is standing.

Candidate use of descriptions: Only registered political parties are permitted to use a description on the ballot paper (with the exception of parish and community council elections). Candidates that are not standing on behalf of a party are allowed to use the word 'Independent'. In the consultation, respondents expressed mixed views about whether independents should be allowed to use descriptions. Independents themselves felt strongly that they should be allowed to use descriptions, and that this would add clarity for the voter about what the candidate stood for. Larger parties said that descriptions should continue to be restricted to registered political parties, with some saying that allowing independents to use descriptions would undermine the system of party registration. During the European Parliamentary elections in May 2014, there were several issues with party descriptions that were felt to be offensive or could cause confusion with other parties. In the light of experience at the May 2014 elections and our previous recommendations on party descriptions, the Commission has reiterated the case for reforming the rules on party descriptions, including their use on ballot papers and the maintenance of the central register. We have discussed some of these issues with Government. Although it appears that the UK Government is prepared to consider addressing this issue in the medium term, there is no prospect of changes to the current legislation on party registration before the UK Parliamentary General Election. Given this wider context of the need to review the purpose and use of the central register of descriptions for parties, at this stage we are not making any recommendation about the use of descriptions by independents. We will be monitoring the use of descriptions on ballot papers at the 2015 elections and will report on the issue in our post-election report after the May 2015 polls.

Candidate benefits

Candidates who stand for election have significant benefits, which might include a free mailing of campaign material, the free use of rooms for meetings, and a copy of the electoral register. Candidates from registered parties also have the opportunity to use a description (as set out above) and party emblem on the ballot paper. Parties may also qualify for party election broadcasts. A number of political parties expressed strong support for retaining free candidate mailings as they were the main vehicle for communicating with the electorate. Concern was raised about free candidate mailings not being available for PCC elections. While there was some support for online candidate addresses, concerns were raised about not everyone having access to the internet. We are not recommending changing the right to a postal mailing to a right to display information online. Any move to online candidate communications should take account of internet use and the likelihood of the information being accessed online.

Candidate benefits: Recommendations

We recommend that the law should be changed to ensure that electors are sent printed information about candidates standing for election as PCCs in their police area. This should take the form of a booklet with addresses from each candidate sent by the relevant Police Authority Returning Officer to every household in the police authority area. This was done on a trial basis for the PCC by-election in West Midlands in August 2014. The Home Office will be evaluating the effectiveness of this trial. We recommend that the legislation around free candidate mailings be amended to allow candidates at combined elections to use a single election communication covering both elections if that is their choice, but only where there is a right to a free mailing in respect of the elections referred to in the mailing.

We believe that the criteria for party election broadcasts (PEBs) are working well. However, there is some uncertainty about whether the law allows independent candidates who can demonstrate sufficient support to qualify for a PEB, and in our view it does not. In the case of candidates standing for Mayor of London this may disadvantage independents compared to party candidates. (This is only currently relevant in London since it is the only area where in practice broadcast areas and electoral boundaries are sufficiently aligned to have made this a possibility.) We think it is important that this is addressed at the earliest legislative opportunity. We also appreciate the clear problems expressed by the broadcasters in making provision for separate PEBS in different regions, and believe that broadcasters should keep under review technological developments that may make such provision possible in the future.

Candidate benefits: Recommendations

enable independent candidates to have party election broadcasts where this is feasible (in practice this is only at London Mayoral elections at present). The criteria that regulators and broadcasters use to award broadcasts should, for those elections where this is relevant, identify what levels of past and current support an independent candidate would need to receive a broadcast. Broadcasters should keep under review technological developments that may make the provision of regional PEBs in England a more viable option in the future to ensure better access to voters by those that can demonstrate significant electoral support in a particular area.

Candidate benefits continued There was support for independent candidates having access to the electoral register at an earlier stage. Such access would enable independent candidates to campaign on a more equal basis with candidates from political parties. Candidate benefits: Recommendations We continue to recommend that the law is changed to allow all candidates to get earlier access to the register for electoral purposes. Candidate benefits continued There are strongly held views on both sides of the debate about whether independents should be allowed to use an emblem on the ballot paper. The case in favour is based on the argument that the current position is unfair as it provides an advantage to party candidates who are allowed emblems. On balance our view is that the use of emblems should remain a facility reserved for political parties, to help protect the identities of parties and preserve an incentive for registering a party. There was support for retaining free use of rooms for candidates, although awareness of this entitlement was low.

Candidate benefits: Recommendations We recommend that Returning Officers should ensure that the information they make available to potential candidates includes information on their entitlements, including what facilities are available and the likely cost of hiring them. Procedural issues This section covers a number of procedural issues around standing for election, including: alphabetical listing on ballot papers; photographs of candidates on ballot papers; submitting nomination documents; and objecting to and determining the validity of nominations. Alphabetical listing on ballot papers The law says that the names of candidates appearing on the ballot paper should be placed in alphabetical order by surname (or party name where parties stand for election). It has been suggested that this discriminates against candidates and parties with names starting with letters towards the end of the alphabet because they appear lower down the ballot paper. The views of political parties varied on this issue. The majority of parties did not see any need to move away from alphabetical listing, pointing out that any alternative could create problems for voters in finding names on the ballot paper. A small number of respondents said that there was clear evidence of an alphabetical effect. Our view is that there is some evidence that candidates with names nearer the start of the alphabet do better in elections. Switching away from alphabetical listing could however lead to voters having problems finding candidates on the ballot paper. There is no strong argument to justify any particular alternative ordering method, and there are likely to be practical problems associated with each option. However, this is something that should be considered further and we will do so as part of our future review of electoral modernisation. Positive abstention In the consultation we asked whether a positive abstention option (e.g. 'none of the above') should be included on ballot papers. Respondents were roughly equally split in their views.

Political parties were strongly opposed, but a more mixed range of views was given by elected representatives, candidates and electoral administrators. Our view is that while including a positive abstention option might increase participation, it could also undermine the electoral process (the purpose of which is to elect a candidate to elected office) by discouraging engagement with the candidates standing for election. We are therefore not recommending that positive abstention be included as an option on ballot papers. Photographs of candidates on ballot papers Some countries use colour photographs on ballot papers. We asked in the consultation whether there was a case for introducing these in the UK and whether this would be beneficial for voters. The majority of respondents were against having colour photographs on ballot papers. They said that there was no demand for them, that there were no clear arguments in favour, and that there would be practical problems producing the images. A small number of respondents were in favour of introducing photographs to help voters identify candidates. We are not recommending that photographs are used on ballot papers. Submitting nomination documents At all elections nomination papers and some other documents relating to the candidate can only be delivered to the Returning Officer in person. In the consultation we sought views on whether more flexible arrangements, including fax, email, online or mobile device app, should be introduced for the receipt of nomination papers. We also asked whether the delivery of nomination papers should be standardised for all elections. All the political parties who responded said that they supported the submission of nomination documents in different formats. There was agreement that whatever process was agreed it should be standardised for all elections. Electoral administrators were also in favour of modernisation but stressed the need for any change to the legislation to be precise about the new requirements. We support the modernisation of the process around submitting nomination papers and other related documents

Procedural issues:

Recommendations We recommend that the law is changed to allow nomination papers, consents to nomination, withdrawal notices, certificates of party authorisation and emblem requests to be submitted by post, email and fax for all elections in the UK, in addition to hand delivery. This would update this area of law, making standing for election more accessible. We recommend that consideration is given to allowing nominations to be submitted via an online system.

Procedural issues: Continued Objections to nominations and determining the validity of nominations At UK Parliamentary elections the following persons are able to attend the proceedings for the delivery of nomination papers and may inspect those papers and also raise objections to their validity: A candidate who is validly nominated, The election agent of a candidate who is validly nominated, or The proposer or seconder of a candidate who is validly nominated In the consultation we sought views on whether the objections procedures should be revised and replaced with a more consistent and transparent scheme and how such a scheme would work in practice. We also wanted to establish if the current timeframes set for objections were sufficient to meet the needs of candidates and electoral administrators alike. Most responses on this topic expressed support for simplifying the rules around objections to nominations. We agree that there is a need to simplify these provisions to make the process more easily understandable and transparent. We also support the argument that there should be a standard consistent objection system for all elections. This should include consideration of amending the law to allow for objections in elections where there is currently no objections procedure. In addition, we do not think it is appropriate that the right to inspect and object is reserved to a small group of persons associated with a validly nominated candidate. Many respondents were keen that Returning Officers should be able to decide that a nomination paper is invalid if a candidate is not qualified or is disqualified. Our view is that consideration should be given to changing the law so that objections can be made on the grounds that a candidate is either not qualified or disqualified, and that the Returning Officer be required to hold a nomination paper to be invalid where the Returning Officer finds that the candidate is not qualified or is disqualified. It appears to us to be an unsatisfactory situation that an obviously ineligible candidate should be allowed to stand for election and be able to serve out their full term of office unless someone was willing and able to challenge the eligibility of the elected person in the courts. While this case is strong, we accept that the principle that the Returning Officer has no role in determining whether a candidate is qualified or disqualified (except under the RPA 1981) is well established and any change to this would be a fundamental change to electoral law and the role of the Returning Officer. There would be a need to ensure that the change to the law produced a system that worked in practice and did not produce inconsistency in how it was applied by Returning Officers, and in particular that any changes could be implemented within the election timetable. Any proposals for change would therefore require careful consideration and consultation with the electoral community, especially with Returning Officers.

Procedural issues: Recommendations We recommend that the legislation should be amended to clarify and simplify the process of objecting to nominations for all elections in the UK. This includes ensuring that the system is easy to understand. This reform will help to increase the transparency of the standing for election process. We recommend that consideration is given to allowing objections to nominations on the grounds that a candidate is not qualified or is disqualified and, if satisfied that that is the case, requiring a Returning Officer to hold a nomination paper to be invalid. This would help to ensure the integrity of the process. Report on the May 2021 elections in England | Electoral Commission Search Report on the May 2021 elections in England You are in the Police and Crime Commissioner elections section Home Police and Crime Commissioner elections Currently reading: of 3 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the elections Campaigning at the elections Delivering the elections Introduction This report looks at how the May 2021 elections in England were run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. On 6 May Police and Crime Commissioners (PCCs) took place in England. Most local authorities had local government elections and some areas had Combined Authority Mayor and local mayoral elections. In London, people could vote for the Mayor of London and London Assembly members. Many of these polls had been postponed from 2020. This was one of the most complex sets of polls held in recent times, with the additional challenges presented by the coronavirus (Covid-19) pandemic. Even with these challenging circumstances people had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting, and were confident that they were well run. Turnout across the different elections in May 2021 was similar to comparable elections in previous years, suggesting that concerns about Covid-19 did not stop voters from taking part. Changes that were put in place by electoral administrators and the Government helped to support and reassure voters. People were confident that they could vote safely at the elections, and the overwhelming majority were able to vote using their preferred method. They adapted their activities in response to public health restrictions and were able to communicate with voters face-to-face, online and through printed material.

Transparency about who is responsible for producing campaign material online remains important for voters, and new digital imprint requirements will help voters understand who is paying to target them online at elections in the future. The experience of these polls has again highlighted concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in the UK, which are coupled with the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We will work in partnership with the electoral community, the Government and local authorities to develop and deliver proposals to support resilient electoral services for the future.

Most people were confident that the elections were well-run, even though they took place in unprecedented and challenging circumstances. People were highly satisfied with the process of registering to vote and casting their vote.

Changes that were put in place helped to support and reassure voters. People were confident that they could vote safely at the elections, and the overwhelming majority were able to vote using their preferred method. New rules allowed people who were required to isolate to appoint a proxy to vote on their behalf as late as 5pm on polling day. This positive change helped to provide a safeguard for anyone whose circumstances changed close to the polls, and should continue to be available if people are required to self-isolate as part of the public health response to Covid-19. There was a notable increase in the proportion of ballot papers that were rejected at the Mayor of London election because people had voted for too many candidates. Good ballot paper design is essential to help voters understand how to cast their votes without making errors. Possible alternative design options for ballot papers should be tested ahead of future Mayor of London elections.

This was one of the most complex sets of polls held in recent years, with the additional challenges presented by the Covid-19 pandemic. In March 2020, due to rising concern about the Covid-19 pandemic, the UK Government postponed the local elections that had been scheduled for May 2020, until May 2021. This meant that on 6 May 2021 there were: Police and Crime Commissioner (PCC) elections across England (except for London, Greater Manchester and West Yorkshire) Local government elections in most areas of England Combined Authority Mayor elections in some areas Local mayoral elections in some areas Mayor of London and London Assembly elections in London Some voters had multiple elections using different voting systems. In Bristol and Liverpool, for example, there were four different scheduled elections using two different voting systems. In both areas, local elections used the first past the post voting system, and PCC, Local Authority Mayoral and Combined Authority Mayoral elections used the supplementary vote system. A number of authorities also needed to hold by-elections and local referendums on the same day, adding to the complex picture for voters in those areas. During the summer and early autumn of 2020, the Electoral Commission worked with and consulted electoral administrators, political parties and governments across Great Britain to identify a shared set of high-level objectives for delivering successful elections in the current public health environment . These objectives were used to assess and test different options for supporting voters, campaigner and electoral administrators, and to identify and manage significant risks to successful delivery of the elections. We have also used them to inform our research, analysis and reporting on these polls. Returning Officers put in place new procedures in polling stations based on guidance from public health bodies and the Electoral Commission to comply with public health regulations and guidelines and to ensure that voters could be confident that they could vote safely. Voters who didn't want to vote in person at the polling station could also choose to cast their vote by post or appoint a proxy. To make sure everyone knew about the different voting options available to them and to reassure people that voting in person would be a safe experience, we – along with local authorities – took a lead role in communicating these messages before the elections. This covered a range of topics including how to find your polling station, options for casting your vote and how to get help at the polling station. Our voter registration campaign ran from 9 March until the application deadline on 19 April. Our ads directed people to the gov.uk/registertovote service and were promoted across TV, video on demand, radio, digital audio, out-of-home billboards, social media and digital display. In England, there were 852,830 applications to register during our campaign between 9 March and 19 April. A total of 18.3 million people were registered to vote in the local elections and 14.5 million in the county council elections in England. There were 32.1 million people registered for the PCC elections and 6.2 million for the Mayor of London elections. Voters continue to have positive views about how the election was run People had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting, even with the challenging circumstances of these polls taking place during the Covid-19 pandemic. Our research shows that: 87% of people across England 1 and 88% of people in London were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. This is consistent with levels of satisfaction reported by people after the most recent comparable elections held in 2016 94% of people across England and 92% in London were satisfied with the process of voting. This is an increase from 2016 when satisfaction ranged from 82% at PCC elections to 86% in London more experienced voters are more confident and satisfied with registering to vote and voting than first time voters Three-quarters of people said they were confident that the elections were well-run; however, at least one in 10 were not. Although this is similar to the 2016 PCC elections in England (73%), it is lower than the proportion of people in 2016 who were confident that the local elections (82%) and elections in London (85%) were well-run. When we asked people why they were not confident that the May 2021 elections were well run there were some differences between voters in England and London, with voters in London more likely to identify concerns about Covid-19 and dislike of the voting system used. Reasons given by voters in England who were not confident elections well-run Reasons given by voters in London who were not confident elections well-run Wasn't enough information about the candidates (29%) Do not think it was safe for people to vote at polling stations because of Covid-19 (27%) [Information] about the elections (19%) Wasn't enough information about the candidates (21%) Candidates didn't canvass/have contact with people (18%). Just over a quarter of people across England (28%) see electoral fraud as a problem, rising to 34% in London. This compares to the 26% of people across the UK who saw it as a problem after the 2019 UK general election. Voters continue to have positive views about how the election was run: breakdown The pandemic does not appear to have stopped people from turning out to vote Although the level of turnout at these elections was low, this is consistent with previous elections. In 2021 there was a slight increase in turnout for the local and county council elections compared to the last comparable polls. This suggests that Covid-19 restrictions or concerns did not stop people turning out to vote. Turnout at the PCC elections was also higher than in 2016. However, this is likely to be at least partly due to the combination of different types of elections in 2021. The postponement of some elections from the previous year, meant that more areas in England held local elections alongside their PCC elections compared with 2016. Local election turnout tends to be higher than standalone PCC election turnout. In London, turnout was lower than at the previous Mayoral and Assembly elections in 2016. However, we have no evidence that Covid-19 was a significant factor in that. Turnout in May 2021 compared to most recent comparable election County Council 2017 35.0% 2021 36.6% Local 2017 33.8% 2021 35.6% PCC (England only) 2017 26.0% 2021 33.0% London Mayoral 2017 46.1% 2021 42.9% People were most likely to tell us that they didn't vote because of a lack of information or lacking trust in politicians, rather than because of Covid-19. This further illustrates that the pandemic does not appear to have played a role in whether someone voted or not. England London There was not enough information/media coverage (10%) That they don't trust politicians (11%) Lack of information (10%) Lack of information (10%) That they don't trust politicians (10%) That voting takes too long (10%) That voting takes too long (9%) Forgetting/missing the deadline (8%) Illness (9%) 2 Illness (7%) You should be able to vote over a few days (6%). You should be able to vote over a few days (7%). People were confident that they could vote using their preferred method Although public health restrictions were in place at the time of the elections, people had a choice of how they cast their vote. They could choose to vote in person, by post or by proxy (asking someone to do so on their behalf). Most people who voted were able to use their preferred method: 93% of people who voted across England and 91% of those who voted in London said they were able to use their preferred method of voting first time voters and younger people aged 18 to 34 were less likely to say they were able to use their preferred method 6% of voters across England and 8% in London said that they were not able to vote using their preferred method. Among this group, around a quarter said this was due to reasons related to Covid-19 (such as being worried about going to the polling stations and having to self-isolate), rising to around a third amongst those who generally prefer to vote in polling stations. Voters in polling stations were confident that they were safe places to vote. Across England and London, a number of different measures were in place to make sure that voting and working at polling stations was as safe as possible during the pandemic. To support and advise on what changes should be made to voting in polling stations, we worked with public health experts across the UK to provide guidance for electoral administrators. We also produced resources for local authorities designed to help: reassure the public that voting in person would be a safe experience, highlight the other ways to vote, for those vulnerable or concerned encourage voters to start thinking about their preferred voting option early. Voters in polling stations were confident that they were safe places to vote: breakdown

Polling stations were set up and managed to minimise public health risks	How safe voters at polling stations felt with the safety provisions in place.
London	Very safe 56%
Across England	64% Fairly safe 39%
33% Fairly unsafe 3%	2% Very unsafe 1%
0.5% Don't know 1%	0.23% 77% of polling station voters said that they had enough information about safety measures to cast their vote safely across England, first time voters were slightly less likely to feel safe than people who had experience of voting before.

Half of voters across England who said they felt unsafe said there was nothing more that could have been done to make a difference. Almost all (99%) polling station voters said that they noticed at least one of the various safety provisions that had been put in place. People were most likely to notice Hand sanitiser provided on exit and entry Cleaning of pencils (where single use pencils were not used) Staff wearing face coverings Cleaning of booths A one-way system with floor markings Polling station staff also felt that polling stations were safe places to work (96% of staff responding to our survey agreed), and that the safety of voters was adequately provided for by the changes introduced (95%). The new safety measures meant that voting took longer for some people. The combination of polls, where voters had more than one ballot paper to complete, may have also contributed to this: just under four in 10 people who regularly vote in polling stations thought that voting took longer than usual as a result of Covid-19 safety provisions. Half thought that despite the measures, voting took them about the same amount of time as usual. Some voters had to queue outside their polling station before they went to vote. Electoral administrators and polling station staff told us that in most instances people were prepared to queue, and understood that it was because of the additional public safety measures that had been put in place: There were short queues at polling stations all day, staff were more concerned about this than the electors were. "The one in, one out policy in such a small cabin, coupled with three ballot papers all with different criteria which were too complicated for a lot of voters and had to be explained, meant that there were long queues all day. People who didn't want to go to a polling station had options for voting remotely. People who don't want to vote in person at the polling station can apply to cast their vote by post or appoint a proxy. If their situation changes close to an election due to work or disability, people can appoint an emergency proxy up to 5pm on polling day to vote on their behalf. The law was changed ahead of these elections so that anyone who had to self-isolate close to polling day because they had tested positive for Covid-19, or had been in close contact to someone who had tested positive, could also appoint a proxy. Remote voting information Most people knew what other options they had if they didn't want to vote in a polling station Most people found it easy to find information about how they could cast their vote either in person at a polling station or remotely by post or proxy. Our research showed that: three-quarters of people said that they found it easy to get information about the different methods of voting that they could choose from similar proportions of people who normally vote in polling stations said they found it easy to get information about different methods of voting (76% for elections across England and 80% for London) around a third of first time postal voters told us they chose to vote by post as they didn't want to go to the polling station because of Covid-19 related safety concerns, or because it was convenient a further 30% of first time postal voters across England and 27% in London said they were prompted by information from their local authority informing them they could register for a postal vote. A fifth across England said they saw similar advertising from us, rising to a quarter in London electoral administrators from over three-quarters of local authorities said that they did some form of campaign encouraging residents to apply to vote by post Most people who didn't want to vote in a polling station found it easy to apply to vote by post or appoint a proxy There was a small increase in the proportion of voters choosing to vote by post at these elections, compared with the most recent comparable polls. Percentage of electorate that chose to vote by post County Council 2017 16% 2021 19% Local 2016 17% 2021 21% PCC (England only) 2016 16% 2021 18% London Mayoral 2016 15% 2021 19% Our public opinion research found that there were many new postal voters at these polls with: just under a third of people who voted by post across England said that it was the first time they had voted by post nearly half of people who voted by post in London said they were first time postal voters Most people who voted by post for the first time found it easy to understand how to apply: almost all of these first time postal voters (92%) said they found it easy to understand what to do to complete and return their postal vote application People applying for a proxy also said they found it easy to understand what to do: nearly three-quarters of people who voted by proxy said it was the first time they had done so almost three-quarters of proxy voters across England said they found it easy to understand how to appoint a proxy, although a quarter said they found it difficult to understand what they had to do to complete the application People who needed to isolate because of Covid-19 could appoint a proxy to vote on their behalf The changes to the provision for emergency proxies meant that anyone who had tested positive for Covid-19 or had to self-isolate could still vote in these elections. Across all the elections more than 2,800 voters were able to appoint a proxy to vote on their behalf using these new rules. There was no increase in the overall level of proxy voting despite the new proxy provisions: for the local elections 0.01% of the electorate appointed an emergency proxy to vote on their behalf (including 2,313 voters at the PCC elections, 1,069 county council election voters, and 1,611 voters at other the local elections) for the London Mayoral election 0.02% of the electorate (1,160) people appointed an emergency proxy this was comparable to the percentage of electors (0.02%, or 8,518 people) in England who appointed an emergency proxy at the 2019 UK general election Administrators recognised the benefits of the changes to emergency proxy rules for voters. This change was not announced until late February 2021, and only came into effect six weeks before polling day on 24 March 2021. Some administrators found it difficult to update their plans to reflect the change in time to promote this option to voters. The extension of the emergency proxy provisions in relation to Covid and the updated application form were issued at a late stage which was problematic for planning. Most people who voted by post were confident they knew how to vote without making a mistake Almost everyone who voted by post said they knew how to complete and return their postal vote. Our research showed that: more than nine out of ten people said it was easy to complete and return their postal vote, compared to 6% across England and 8% in London saying it was difficult first-time voters, people who had voted by post for the first time and those aged 18-34 were more likely to say it was difficult to understand what was needed to complete and return their postal vote compared to other voters the most common reasons for saying it was difficult across England were not being clear which envelope to return the completed ballot(s) in (39%); not being clear what information to provide (30%); and receiving more ballot papers than expected (29%) Despite more people voting by post for the first time we did not see an increase in the number rejected compared to previous elections. Data from electoral administrators shows: 2% of returned postal votes were rejected at the County Council and London mayoral elections 3% of returned postal votes were rejected for the local and PCC elections The most common reasons for postal vote rejection were where personal identifiers (signature/date of birth) didn't not match, which was similar to the last time each of these elections took place. Rejected postal votes by election County Council 2017 2% 2021 2% Local 2016 4% 2021 3% PCC (England only) 2016 4% 2021 3% London Mayoral 2016 4% 2021 2% % of postal votes rejected because of mismatched personal identifiers County Council 2017 52% 2021 48% Local 2016 50% 2021 46% PCC (England only) 2016 47% 2021 44% London Mayoral 2016 66% 2021 63%

Recommendation 1 Recommendation 1: Retain an emergency proxy option for isolating voters Legislation introduced for these elections to allow emergency proxy votes for anyone who tested positive for Covid-19 or had to self-isolate helped to provide a safeguard for anyone whose circumstances changed close to the polls and ensure that they were not prevented from participating. Although the provision was not widely relied upon in practice, it was nevertheless an important safeguard to make sure that no one lost their ability to vote. We recommend that the Government should ensure this option continues to be available if people are required to self-isolate as part of the public health response to Covid-19. Voters in some areas found it harder to complete their ballot papers Around nine in 10 voters said that it was easy to fill in their ballot paper, but some people said that they found it difficult. People who told us it was difficult said it was due to: unclear instructions the ballot paper being complex/confusing confusion caused by voting in multiple elections too many candidates A quarter of people who had difficulties filling in their ballot paper in areas holding both local government and PCC elections said it was confusing that the elections used different voting systems. A third of people voting in London said that they found the two voting systems confusing. The percentage of rejected ballot papers at those elections using the supplementary vote (SV) electoral system in May 2021 was higher than at those elections using first past the post: 0.8% for the local government elections compared to 2.7% for the PCC and 4.3% for Mayor of London. This is consistent with the experience at previous polls. Voters in some areas found it harder to complete their ballot papers: breakdown Rejection rates for Mayor of London ballot papers were higher The number of rejected ballot papers for the Mayor of London election was notably higher than it had been at previous elections or at other elections held using SV in May 2021: in total, 4.3% of first preference votes were rejected, compared with 1.9% in 2016 most of these were rejected because voters had voted for too many candidates (over 87,000 ballot papers, representing 76.4% of all rejected first preference votes) at the PCC elections which also use SV in England in May 2021 the first preference rejection rate was 2.9 % The most significant difference for the May 2021 Mayor of London election was that a new ballot paper design was used, compared with previous London elections and other elections using the SV system. There was a record number of 20 candidates for the Mayor of London election. The arrangements for electronic counting meant they were required to be a certain size and format to be able to be scanned correctly. This meant that the length of the paper could not be extended to include all the candidates, so for the first time it was split to present candidates across two columns rather than one continuous list.

Recommendation 2: Ensure new ballot paper designs are tested before they need to be used by voters Good ballot paper design is essential to help voters understand how to cast their votes without making errors. User testing with the public can help to identify potential usability problems and improve the design of ballot papers. We recommend that the Greater London Returning Officer should test possible alternative design options for ballot papers for future Mayor of London elections, including two-column designs. We stand ready to provide technical support to this work, drawing on our extensive experience of user testing ballot papers and other voter-facing materials.

The experience of campaigning at the May 2021 elections Changing public health regulations and restrictions during spring 2021 caused uncertainty for campaigners, who had to adapt their plans as official guidance changed before and during the campaign period. Campaigners were able to communicate with voters face-to-face, online and through printed material, even though restrictions remained in place during the campaign. However, people in areas with PCC elections found it less easy to get information about the role of the elected office or the candidates or parties standing for election. Transparency about who is responsible for producing campaign material online remains important for voters, and new digital imprint requirements will help voters understand who is paying to target them online at elections in future. Changes to reduce the number of subscribers required for candidates to be nominated for these elections were well-received by many candidates and electoral administrators. The Government should review whether the range of current subscriber requirements are still proportionate for different elected offices.

There was a record 20 candidates for the Mayor of London election, and 249 candidates stood for election to the London Assembly. This was more than at the last elections in 2016, when there were 12 and 205 candidates respectively. A total of 145 candidates contested the PCC elections in England, less than in 2016 when there were 169 candidates. Campaigners communicated with voters about a complex range of elections held in May 2021, including polls that had been postponed from the previous year. They also adapted their activities in response to public health restrictions because of the pandemic. Some candidates and agents get support from local or regional groups of their political party. This year, these local political party associations supported campaigns across a bigger range of elections than usual. This added a further layer of complexity as associations helped manage a wider range of campaign messages, spending limits and rules than they would normally do in one campaign period. All of this meant it was not straightforward for campaigners to plan and deliver their activities at these elections. The changing public health context caused uncertainty for campaigners Some changes to legislation were made close to the start of the election period but most candidates considered they were well-informed about them The Government made several changes to the law to support those campaigning in the elections: In December 2020, legislation was changed to make inflation-based increases to local council candidate spending limits. The Government argued that the pandemic could mean more emphasis on postal and digital campaigning and that this added to the case for limits to be increased in March 2021, legislation was changed to reduce the number of signatures required to nominate candidates, in order to reduce the travel and contact involved in completing nomination forms Given the changing context of the pandemic, it was understandably more difficult for the Government to ensure changes to legislation were in place at least six months before campaigners or electoral administrators needed to comply with them. Most candidates who responded to our post-election survey said they felt well-informed about legislative changes before these elections. However, some changes were made very close to when they would affect campaigners, and this added to uncertainty and risk for candidates and electoral administrators. The changes to nominations were announced in mid-February and came into effect on 10 and 11 March, which was less than a month before the deadline for nominations. Some prospective candidates had already started using old nomination forms before the change to the rules, which meant their forms were out of date. After the changes took effect, some electoral administrators told us that they found it challenging to quickly update their plans and prepare nomination packs which reflected the new rules. The main issue on the nomination process was the lateness in the change of legislation, but the change was welcome and did speed up the processing." "The main challenge was the change to the number of people could nominate a candidate. This came incredibly late and meant that we couldn't produce the nomination papers as early as we normally would, it meant that we had to change our candidate and agent training fairly late in the day and the guidance came fairly late. The discussions on what legislative changes there should be came too late and hampered the running of the election. Official guidance on campaigning activities changed during the campaign period People across England were placed under new lockdown restrictions from early January 2021. This meant that campaigners had to adapt their plans for activities to reach voters. They had to comply with general public health restrictions, and the UK Government also published specific guidance on campaigning for elections in England at the end of February: The Government said its guidance meant that up to 8 March, door-to-door campaigning and leafleting by individual campaigners were not allowed under the lockdown regulations, and leafleting was only allowed to be carried out through existing commercial delivery services From 8 March, the Government changed the lockdown regulations to support door to door campaigning activity by people who were campaigning for a specific electoral outcome. This included anyone who had been asked by a candidate, party or campaign organiser to participate. Hustings and public meetings could only take place remotely From 29 March six people, or two households, were able to meet outside to plan or deliver campaign activities, but campaigners were told not to enter voters' homes In April, campaigning was also briefly suspended as a mark of respect following the death of HRH, Duke of Edinburgh. When we conducted in-depth interviews with candidates who stood in the PCC and London elections, the majority of participants said they did not feel well-informed about these changes. While many candidates noted that changes to the restrictions were reasonable and necessary, this added to the complexity and the frustration that they reported. I think it was very difficult to know what was a regulation and what was advice. I don't think they were at all clear. And it didn't help that we were getting, what I certainly perceived as, mixed messages from different parts of the government about what you could and couldn't do [...] In terms of delivering literature. Whether we could put leaflets out with volunteers or whether we had to use paid delivers or whether we couldn't do anything. That was an absolute mess trying to work out what we were meant to do and what we were not meant to do. Some candidates also expressed concerns about the role of the governing party in deciding what campaign activity should be allowed ahead of the elections, although others considered that the Government would need to have this role during a pandemic. Our guidance to candidates, parties, and non-party campaigners about the regulated period included advice on the spending and donation rules, as well as the reporting rules , following the postponement of the May 2020 elections due to the Covid-19 pandemic. Our guidance also reflected legislative changes made as a result of Covid-19. We also asked parties and candidates for their feedback to better understand their questions and concerns about how spending could be affected by the pandemic, and updated the support on our website in response to this. s were able to engage with voters while following public health regulations and guidance s used a range of digital, print and in-person campaigning to communicate with voters Despite the initial restrictions on in-person campaign activities in early 2021, voters continued to receive information about candidates and parties at the elections from a range of different sources, and in a variety of formats. The most common ways voters reported seeing information on parties and candidates are shown in the following table: England London on a leaflet or flyer, either from a candidate/political party (40%) or another source (23%). On a leaflet or flyer from a candidate/political party (33%) In newspapers (14%) The household booklet about the London Assembly and Mayor of London elections (25%) On their local council website (13%) Newspapers (24%), News websites (10%) Leaflets or flyers from another source (22%) Social media (10%) on a news website (19%) Word of mouth (10%) Younger age groups and first time voters were more likely than older age groups and repeat voters to have seen information about the elections on social media, and less likely to have seen information on a leaflet or flyer from a candidate/political party or another source. Candidates told us that digital campaigning was particularly important during early 2021, when in-person activities were less manageable and they were unsure how voters would react to door-knocking and face-to-face campaigning. PCC candidates were most likely to have said that they used digital campaigning, where the geographical size of police areas made it impractical to deliver leaflets to every voter. However, other candidates told us that relying on social media to campaign restricted opportunities to get their views across to voters. They felt that social media didn't have the same reach as leaflets and that the audience for posts was often limited to those who were already engaged with local politics or who were their supporters. Some candidates said they were not able to campaign effectively Candidates generally agreed that it was clear what campaigning was and was not allowed in line with public health restrictions, although some candidates did not think it was clear. We also saw differences between PCC and London candidates as to whether they felt able to get their views across to voters. Candidates standing in the London elections were more likely to agree that they could get their views across compared to PCC candidates, and the majority of those who responded to our survey said they were satisfied the booklet was an effective way to communicate with voters. In interviews, some PCC candidates said that: the PCC elections were not well publicised and they struggled to reach all voters in the police area, and this meant that some voters didn't know that the elections were happening there should be a London-style household candidate booklet delivered to all households, as well as the existing choosemypcc voter information website Our research with voters also found that people in areas with PCC elections were less likely than people in London to say that they found it easy to get information about the role of the elected office. Almost six in ten people (57%) said it was easy to get information on the role of a PCC, compared to almost eight in ten of people (77%) who said it was easy to get information on the role of Mayor of London. People in PCC areas were also the least likely to say they found it easy to get information on the candidates or parties standing. People in London were most likely to say this information was easy to find and that they had enough information to make an informed decision. How many people found it easy to get information and had enough information to make an informed decision Found it easy to find information on the role Found it easy to get information about parties / candidates Had enough information to make an informed decision PCC 57% 59% 49% London Mayor 77% 77% 62% London Assembly n/a 74% 62% Local govt. (excl. mayoral) n/a 72% 52% Local govt. (mayoral) n/a 73% 54% Transparency about who is responsible for producing campaign material online remains important for voters The Government has proposed legislation that would require most campaigners to include information to identify themselves as part of their online campaign material in future. This change has also been recommended in our policy reports and by parliamentary select committees. A new digital imprint requirement will help voters understand who is paying to target them online at elections and referendums in future. Our research after the election confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections with: seven in 10 people across England and in London (70% and 72% respectively) agree that it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online. This was consistent with our findings after the 2019 UK Parliamentary General Election six in 10 people across England and in London (62% and 60% respectively) said they would trust digital campaigning material more if they knew who produced it Younger voters appear to be more confident that they can scrutinise the trustworthiness of political information they find online with: six in 10 18-34 year olds across England and London (57% and 59% respectively) agreed that information available online about politics is trustworthy, compared with just under half of 35-54 year-olds (43% and 49%) and around a third of people aged over 55 (37% and 34%) The differences in trust across England and London were also reflected in people's confidence in finding the sources of political information online with: similar proportions of 18-34 year olds (60% and 58% respectively) agreed that they can find out who has produced the political information they see online, compared with 35-54 year-olds (44% and 54%) and people aged over 55 (33% and 29%) Processes for submitting nominations prioritised access and safety Changes to nomination processes to minimise public health risks were welcomed and candidates agreed the process was well-run While completed nomination forms were still required to be submitted by hand, electoral administrators made changes to their processes to minimise risks to candidates, agents and their staff: candidate and agent briefings were often held using video conferencing tools informal checking of nomination forms was more frequently offered using email arrangements for safe hand delivery of nomination forms ensuring social distancing measures were in place These new measures were generally welcomed and feedback we received from candidates was that the nomination processes were well-run. Both candidates and electoral administrators noted in their feedback that many of these practical measures should be retained for future elections, regardless of the public health situation. We devised a system where candidates emailed their nomination form to us for an informal check. This worked really well as they were only allowed to deliver them when they were correct, we will definitely be using this system going forward. However, some candidates thought that further improvements could still be made to make the process more accessible, such as by accepting nomination papers electronically, or by allowing electronic signatures to be used on nomination forms. Candidates and administrators had mixed views about changes to subscriber requirements To minimise travel and contact involved in completing nomination forms, the Government legislated to significantly reduce the number of subscribers required by candidates to stand in the elections. For example, candidates standing to be Mayor of London needed to collect 66 signatures from registered voters instead of 330, while PCC candidates needed to collect the equivalent of two signatures per local authority in the police area instead of 100 in total. Overall, candidates and their agents said that the reduction in the number of subscribers needed made it easier for them to stand as a candidate. Some candidates in London said they would not have been able to stand in the elections without the reduction:

Yes if I had been required to get 100 signatures it would have been a significant challenge under Covid. We faced some challenges with securing nomination signatures in the context of COVID, and whilst it helped to have to get fewer signatures this year it didn't mitigate the difficulties entirely. The process for checking and delivering nomination papers with London Elects was very efficient and well run. Some candidates did however express caution about the precedent the changes may set and keeping the reduced requirement for future elections, because they said that subscribers demonstrate that candidates have a certain level of support before standing: I think it should go back to having more people to be honest, there's a reason why you have a hundred when you've got 1.4 million in your electorate.

Electoral administrators told us that the reduction in subscribers helped them process nominations more efficiently, and they also recognised the benefits for campaigners. However, some expressed reservations about the possibility of retaining the new number of subscribers for future elections: The reduction in the number of subscribers certainly helped me in dealing with nominations and also the candidates who were only required to get a reduced number depending on the election. The nominations process was fine, and the reduction in the number of signatories for principal council elections helped us as well as candidates. That said, I would not favour it permanently as the requirement for ten signatures does in my view strike a balance in the sense of demonstrating a (minimal) level of support for candidature.

Recommendations

Recommendation 3: Review subscriber requirements for nominating candidates

The requirement to collect signatures from subscribers ensures that candidates have some level of local support, and is intended to deter frivolous candidates. The number of subscribers required should be proportionate to the degree of risk relating to different types of elections and elected offices. We recommend that the Government should review whether the range of current subscriber requirements are proportionate for different elected offices, taking into account evidence from this year's polls and conclusions from our Standing for Election review in 2015.

Regulators strengthened collaboration during the election period. For the May 2021 elections, we worked with regulator partners to run an online public awareness campaign and encourage voters to find more information from a new section of our website. The campaign aimed to encourage people to think more carefully about political campaign adverts they see online, and it provided information about which regulators or other organisations they could contact if they had concerns. Evaluation of the campaign showed that over 7.6 million people saw our adverts on websites and social media platforms. The number of people who clicked through to find more information from the adverts was encouraging, and provides a good foundation for further awareness-raising activity at future elections.

A group of representatives from 3 met regularly throughout the election period to share issues. This initiative built on a regulators' forum that we have co-ordinated since 2016. Regular discussions during the campaign period allowed the regulators to develop a greater understanding of their roles in helping to support public confidence in elections. We will continue to work with other regulators during election periods to strengthen this type of collaboration for future polls. Delivering the elections The experience of electoral administration at the May 2021 elections These polls were well-run, despite the complex range of elections taking place and the significant challenges presented by the pandemic. Returning Officers and electoral administrators faced considerable challenges securing polling station venues, and finding and training staff to work on polling day. Also, although many electoral administrators were satisfied with the support provided by their suppliers, some experienced significant problems. The particular circumstances that led to the development and introduction of legislative changes in February and March 2021 were unprecedented and unavoidable, but the timing of these changes close to the start of the election period created additional challenges and risks for the delivery of the elections. The experience of these polls has again highlighted concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in the UK, which are coupled with the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We will work in partnership with the electoral community, Government and local authorities to develop and deliver proposals to support resilient electoral services for future elections. Delivering the elections introduction Our evidence shows that the May 2021 polls were well-run. Voters and campaigners reported high levels of satisfaction and confidence, and there were only a small number of issues that had an impact on their experience in some areas. Our research shows: 94% of people across England and 92% in London were satisfied with the process of voting three-quarters of people said they were confident that the elections were well-run nine in 10 candidates were confident the elections were well run For Returning Officers and electoral administrators, however, these elections presented unique and difficult challenges, and their considerable effort and commitment enabled the polls to be delivered successfully. The capacity and resilience of electoral administration teams and suppliers are significant risks for future polls The challenging circumstances of these elections highlighted the limited capacity of some local electoral services teams Electoral administrators' ability to plan and deliver their work for these elections was impacted by Covid-19 restrictions in the months leading up to them: 95% said that the Covid-19 restrictions had made their job more difficult, with the same proportion saying that their workload increased because of the Covid-19 restrictions during the elections 63% said that they were concerned for their own health because of Covid-19 Some electoral administrators told us that they weren't able to rely on support from other parts of their local authorities in the way they would normally, and that they had seen a significant impact on the capacity and wellbeing of their teams: Project management was extremely difficult in these circumstances. The usual assistance from others in my council was limited due to them not being in the office or being under similar pressure in their area of the business. Our organisation just did not have the capacity to work in the way we usually do, and more work was left to a stretched elections team." "This election almost failed. Without the extended overtime hours worked by core staff it would have failed. The local authority did not have resources available during a pandemic. Every task took longer and we had to fight all the way to make it happen. Administrators also highlighted the difficulty they had finding suitable venues to use as polling stations. Covid-19 restrictions meant it was harder to contact people to make bookings, and in some venues there were issues with the facilities as they had been shut down for long periods in advance due to lockdowns. Confirming polling station bookings was very difficult as venues had been closed for a year. Many venues were unsure if opening for an election was legal under lockdown restrictions. Many venues were reluctant to allow us to use social distancing floor and wall signs." "We had to change 40 polling station venues due to Covid, and supply things like water to others – where the premises had been shut and only reopened for our purposes and water supplies were not back on." "We did have issue with polling stations as a result of COVID. We had a number of buildings closed, or staff running sites being furloughed, so unable to make contact to arrange. This resulted overall in 29 new stations being used this year. Complex combinations of polls increased the risk to the successful delivery of the polls in some areas. The elections that were postponed from May 2020 meant that there were complex combinations of polls taking place in some parts of England. In many areas of England PCC elections were held at the same time as elections to County, Borough or District Councils, and parish council elections were also held in some areas. Four different types of elections were held on the same day in Liverpool, Bristol, Cambridge and Hartlepool, including mayoral elections and a Parliamentary by-election. Electoral administrators told us that the scale and extent of combination increased the risks to the successful delivery of the elections: The complexity of the combination of the polls led to errors on ballot papers which would just not occur under usual election conditions. Although these were rectified and did not lead to any greater issues the combination of polls did mean that there was a greater risk of error." "The combination of city and county elections caused the biggest challenge, particularly in relation to postal vote openings and the verification process. We had to design new procedures and systems, which took significant time and while they worked, the human element in implementing them did cause some problems. We were able to resolve them, but it was very labour intensive. In some cases, in delivering the particular combination of polls in May 2021, errors arose which meant that voters didn't receive the service they should be able to expect. For example, one local authority 4 issued postal vote packs without the political party emblems that should have been shown alongside the candidate names on the ballot paper for the local election, an error which has led to them being assessed as not fully meeting the Commission's performance standards. While recognising the pressures faced by Returning Officers and their teams, errors like these directly impact on voters' experience and can affect people's confidence in well-run elections. Finding staff to work on polling day was a key challenge for Returning Officers and electoral administrators. Finding staff to work in polling stations was a challenge for most administrators, although support was provided by the Cabinet Office and other organisations to help address this issue. Many local authorities employed extra staff as 'Covid-19 marshals', to help support social distancing in any queues and to make sure people knew about the restrictions inside polling stations. This meant more staff were needed than usual and our research suggests that a quarter of polling station staff at the May polls had not worked in a polling station before. Additionally: 83% of administrators responding to our survey said that they had difficulties recruiting polling station staff over a quarter of gaps were filled by members of the civil service (29%), while other areas relied on staff from the council, students, the national citizen service and private companies. Staffing was the biggest issue – it was a nightmare. Many of our usual staff simply declined right from the start. This meant finding new staff and having to appoint a couple of POs who had never worked in a polling station before." "Staffing polling stations is always difficult and the older age profile of many of our staff meant that many were not prepared to work this year. Over a third of the staff we eventually used had not done polling duty previously, which was an uncomfortably high level. Reliance on key suppliers is a critical risk to the delivery of well-run elections. Electoral administrators continue to be dependent on a small marketplace of expert suppliers of electoral management software and specialist election print services. Administrators also faced new challenges identifying reliable suppliers for personal protective equipment. Although many electoral administrators were satisfied with the support provided by their suppliers, others told us that they experienced significant problems: Suppliers had changed their own production techniques because of Covid and there were some issues arising as a result of this. It was also clear that there was overall pressure on the system as a result of the number of complex combination polls across the country." "It was apparent that our print supplier, who had previously had an exemplary record in terms of customer service and accuracy, was under strain and we encountered some quite serious problems which was no doubt caused by the coincidence of the complexity of the polls and the pandemic. We are aware that there were some instances of delays to supplier delivery of materials, with local authorities not receiving the ballot papers they expected and needed on time, and some not being delivered until very close to polling day. As well as introducing additional risk by reducing the time available to deal with any issues with delivered material before the opening of polls, these delays meant that administrators needed to invest significant time and energy in managing these issues at a crucial time in the election timetable, inevitably taking their focus away from other parts of the process. The impact on electors was minimal in that polling stations ultimately had the ballot papers they needed in time on this occasion, but the timing of the despatch of postal vote packs to voters was affected in some areas.

Recommendation 4: Build resilience and capacity for electoral administration

We have repeatedly highlighted concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in the UK, which are coupled with the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We will work in partnership with the electoral community, the Government and local authorities to develop and deliver proposals to support resilient electoral services for the future. Through the Electoral Advisory and Coordination Board, which includes senior Returning Officers, electoral administration professional bodies and government officials, we will establish a programme of activity to gather evidence about the challenges facing electoral administration teams and identify solutions to address them.

Late confirmation of legislation and interventions made it harder for Returning Officers to plan in some areas. On 8 February 2021 the Minister for the Constitution confirmed the Government's formal position that these elections would go ahead in May. The Cabinet Office delivery plan for the elections was published in early February and included £31 million funding to support Returning Officers to secure venues and staffing and run Covid-19 secure elections. It also highlighted the Government's plans to legislate to extend the availability of proxy voting for people who were required to self-isolate and to simplify nomination requirements for candidates at the May polls. In addition to our usual core suite of guidance and resources to support administrators with the delivery of elections, we worked with public health bodies, the UK Government and the electoral community to develop and publish supplementary guidance to support the delivery of Covid-19 safe elections. The guidance was issued on a rolling basis from September 2020 and was informed by both the requirements of administrators and the latest expert advice from public health bodies. It was kept under review throughout the election period, and was updated to reflect the legislative changes to the nominations and proxy voting process as a result of Covid-19. Many electoral administrators said that they found that uncertainty about the elections made it difficult for them to plan effectively. Just under nine in 10 administrators (88%) who responded to our survey after the elections said that they felt the initial uncertainty about whether the elections would go ahead made it difficult for them to plan. Waiting for legislation to be laid/enacted and then for corresponding guidance/documentation delayed plans and procedures being put in place to deal with those changes. This caused additional stress and uncertainty and added to an already heavy workload. The particular circumstances that led to the development and introduction of changes to electoral law ahead of the May 2021 polls were unprecedented and unavoidable. However, the timing of these changes created additional challenges and risks for the delivery of the elections. It affected when Electoral Commission guidance and resources to support the delivery of the polls, such as amended nomination forms, could be provided, and when electoral administrators could implement them. Issues with the use of schools as polling stations. Communications about the use of schools as polling stations in England caused significant problems for some electoral administrators. Administrators also highlighted significant problems caused by a letter from the Department of Education to Returning Officers and Head Teachers across England on 11 February 2021, asking for schools not to be used as polling stations at the May polls where possible. As a result, some schools went on to change their agreements or withdraw their consent to the use of schools as polling stations. This was just at the point that election teams were finalising polling station locations and printing poll cards, leaving some Returning Officers under pressure to find available and suitable venues at short notice. Administrators told us that this took their focus away from other parts of the process, impacting on their preparations for the polls more generally and further challenging capacity and resilience. The timing and content of the Minister's letter in relation to the use of schools as polling stations was very unhelpful as our polling stations were already booked and we were already working on producing poll cards. We did manage to move away from two schools but this created a lot of extra work for the team who were already under pressure. It would be helpful for such matters to be decided and communicated earlier in future."

"The DFE letter to schools in February was extremely unhelpful and we need clarity and consistency from Government about the use of schools as every year it gets more difficult. It is also frustrating that the process for designating venues in accordance with legislation requiring statutory polling district reviews can be undermined and overruled by government interventions such as these. Election teams updated count processes to support social distancing while maintaining transparency. In providing their feedback on the elections, electoral administrators told us about the challenges they faced in setting up and managing counts: 46% of administrators responding to our survey said they had difficulties recruiting count staff for the May 2021 elections. 42% either strongly agreed or agreed that the Covid-19 restrictions made it difficult for candidates and agents to observe at the count. We had to move count venues due to our current venue being used as a Vaccination Centre – that came with challenges to ensure the new venue met all the requirements. We had to operate two count venues to enable social distancing which made the count organisation massively more complicated and added to our workloads. Having to use less count staff in order to facilitate social distancing made the count process take much longer than normal. Given the need to comply with regulations and guidelines about social distancing that were in place in May 2021, Returning Officers and electoral administrators needed to adapt their plans and processes to maintain transparency at count venues. Changes included introducing Perspex screens in front of count tables, agreeing with agents to limit the number of people attending the count, or providing video feeds of the count and adjudication processes for agents and observers to view away from the count tables. The adjudication of doubtful ballot papers was challenging due to the COVID restrictions. It was difficult to observe social distancing between the Returning Officer and agents whilst still allowing agents to see the ballot papers. Most candidates said they were confident that the elections were well run and content with the efficiency of the count and verification processes. However, some candidates were less satisfied with their ability to observe and scrutinise the count. We became aware of issues at three counts where errors were made which has led us to conclude that the Returning Officers 5 did not fully meet our performance standards: An error was discovered during the count for a directly-elected mayoral election. When counting second preference votes it was discovered that the votes of two candidates with the same surname and first initial had been reported the wrong way round at the end of the first count. This meant one candidate was recorded as having fewer votes than they had actually received and vice versa. The issue was identified prior to the result declaration, and it did not impact the final result. The second error was that the votes for two candidates in one ward were mixed up. This meant one candidate was recorded as receiving more votes than they had actually received and another less. The issue had no impact on the overall result. The third error also involved the mix up of results for two candidates, however in this case the error resulted in the incorrect candidate being declared as the winner. There has been a successful election petition in this case. While recognising the pressures faced by Returning Officers and their teams and the challenging circumstance of the combination of elections and changes to count arrangements due to Covid-19, it is important that voters, candidates and political parties can have confidence in the accuracy of election counting processes and results. Objectives for well-run elections in the current public health context | Electoral Commission Search Objectives for well-run elections in the current public health context You are in the Upcoming elections section Home Upcoming elections On this page Voters Candidates and campaigners Electoral administrators First published: 14 October 2020 Last updated: 17 February 2022 2021 elections Elections held in the coming months, including the important sets of polls scheduled for May 2021, are likely to be delivered against the backdrop of evolving public health restrictions. These will present complex new challenges for all involved in the electoral process.

Objectives

We have worked with and consulted electoral administrators, political parties and governments across Great Britain to identify a shared set of high-level objectives for delivering successful elections in the current public health environment. We encourage all those involved in supporting and delivering the elections to use these objectives: to assess and test policy options and implementation approaches to identify and manage significant risks to successful delivery of the elections to inform research, analysis and reporting on the polls.

Objectives for successful elections in the current public health context

should be able to participate in the polls safely and confidently, and Campaigners and parties should be able to put their case to the electorate.

Voter objectives

Voters There should be reasonable voting options available to all electors that minimise the risk of transmission of the virus to them, or transmission by them to others. This should ideally include realistic voting options for people whose circumstances change at short notice close to polling day (for example, because of local lockdown requirements, or isolation by people or households with symptoms). This should also ensure that voters who may be especially vulnerable to the virus have opportunities to vote in a way which reduces the risk to their health. Within and across areas holding the same type of election, voters should be entitled to access the same voting methods and information regardless of where they live. Voters with disabilities should still be able to access the level of support they need and are currently entitled to receive in order to be able to vote with confidence. Voters should have clear and comprehensive information in advance about the options available, to help them plan how to vote safely. Applying to vote remotely (by post or by appointing a proxy) should be simple and accessible for all electors. Voters should have clear, accessible and comprehensive information to help them understand how to vote using their chosen method, particularly for those who are voting using that method for the first time.

Candidates and campaigner objectives in detail

Candidates and campaigners should have clarity about how the elections will be run and regulated, sufficiently far in advance of polling day and any regulated campaign periods to be able to put in place appropriate plans. Those who wish to stand for election should have access to reasonable options for completing and submitting the necessary nomination papers that minimise the risk of transmission of the virus to or by them. It should be possible for campaigners to put their arguments and give information to voters during the period before polling day in ways that minimise the risk of transmission of the virus to or by them.

Candidates, agents and parties should have a widespread understanding and acceptance of any changes to the administrative process necessitated by the public health situation.

Electoral administrators EROs and ROs should have clarity about how the elections should be run, sufficiently far in advance of polling day to be able to put in place appropriate plans. Election processes should be practically manageable and deliverable by EROs, ROs, electoral administrators and their suppliers, and appropriately resourced – particularly for any new or changed processes introduced at relatively short notice. Any new or changed election processes should not reduce/undermine existing procedures for safeguarding electoral integrity, including where candidates, agents and others are entitled to observe election processes. It should be possible to put in place appropriate protections for electoral administration staff (including physical distancing measures or protective equipment, for example) in key public environments, particularly at polling stations, at postal vote opening sessions and count venues. Report: Regulation of campaigners at the independence referendum held on 18 September 2014 | Electoral Commission Search Report: Regulation of campaigners at the independence referendum held on 18 September 2014 You are in the Scottish Independence referendum section Home Scottish Independence referendum On this page About this report Funding the campaigns and campaign spending Casework and investigations Lessons for future referendums Recommendations Download our full report First published: 20 June 2019 Last updated: 6 August 2019 About this report On 18 September 2014, the people of Scotland voted in a referendum on whether Scotland should be an independent country (the independence referendum). In the months leading up to the day of poll, Scotland was energised by the debate and the voters engaged in the discussion around the referendum question. The question asked, to which voters were required to vote either yes or no, was: 'Should Scotland be an independent country?' This is the Electoral Commission's second report to the Scottish Parliament and fulfils our statutory duty to report to the Parliament, under the provisions of the Scottish Independence Referendum Act 2013 (SIRA), on the use of our investigatory powers and civil sanctions. This report also analyses the funding and spending of those people and organisations that registered to campaign at the independence referendum. Where appropriate, we make recommendations for the future based on the information campaigners were required to submit in their post-referendum returns. The recommendations are intended to inform the regulation of future referendums, not only in Scotland, but elsewhere in the UK. For further background and information on the wider context of the referendum on independence for Scotland, this report should be read in conjunction with our report published in December 2014 on the conduct of the referendum.

2 Funding the campaigns and campaign spending After the independence referendum, registered campaigners were required to submit a campaign spending return to us. The returns included details of the spending that the campaigners incurred campaigning at the referendum and all donations and loans they accepted over £7,500. 3 s were also required to provide a total figure of the donations and loans they received over £500 but below £7,500. Anything with a value of £500 or less was not counted as a donation or loan for the purposes of the referendum rules. In summary: 42 campaigners registered during that period, 21 indicating they supported the yes outcome to the question asked, 21 supporting the no side. Registered campaigners reported spending a total of £6,664,980 campaigning at the independence referendum and reported having received donations and loans totalling £7,318,545. Out of total reported spending of nearly £7 million, there was a difference of just over £400,000 in total campaign spending by registered campaigners on each of the two sides of the debate. In total, all those registered to campaign on each side of the debate reported spending over 70% of their total combined individual limits. Both designated lead campaigners reported spending almost exactly the same amounts campaigning at the independence referendum: Better Together reported spending £1,422,602; and Yes Scotland reported spending £1,420,800. Overall, political parties also reported spending relatively similar combined amounts in support of the two outcomes (around £1.3m), despite their different individual spending limits. Out of total reported donations of over £7 million, the donations to those that registered to campaign for the 'No' outcome amount to £4,327,677 and for the 'Yes' outcome to £2,990,868; 59% and 41% of total reported donations respectively. Both the UK and Scottish Governments also published information, including distributing public awareness booklets to all households in Scotland, in the lead up to the referendum. We commented on the activities of the governments and made recommendations for future referendums in our report published in December 2014

aim to regulate in a way that is effective, proportionate and fair, in line with the principles of good regulation. Wherever possible, we use advice and guidance proactively for campaigners in order to secure compliance. We will however take enforcement action where it is necessary and proportionate to do so. SIRA gave the Electoral Commission the role of monitoring and taking steps to ensure compliance with the referendum campaign rules. To enable us to undertake that role, we had access to investigatory and sanctioning powers. We applied our usual, established casework procedures for casework in Scotland at the independence referendum - where there was evidence or information substantiating a potential breach of SIRA, we considered whether it was in the public interest to investigate, taking into account the potential impact of the breach on confidence in the referendum rules, the cost of investigating relative to the impact of the breach, and any other relevant considerations. We consulted with the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) in each case to establish whether they would take responsibility for investigating possible criminal offences or if they declined jurisdiction preferring for the Commission to investigate and impose sanctions in connection with referendum offences. Our powers under SIRA enabled us to effectively investigate matters. We have been able to obtain voluntary cooperation in obtaining information. We imposed one discretionary requirement, a variable monetary penalty of £500, on the Communication Workers Union for spending more than the registration threshold of £10,000 before registering with us as a campaigner. No fixed monetary penalties, or stop notices were issued, and no enforcement undertakings were offered or accepted. The existence of our stop notice power however, and our ability to indicate it would be used if voluntary compliance could not be achieved, was an important tool for us. Lessons for future referendums SIRA contained a number of rules drawn from those that applied at the 2011 referendums on increased powers for the National Assembly for Wales and the UK-wide referendum on UK Parliamentary Voting Systems (UKPVS). These rules clarified aspects of the regulatory controls, reduced burdens on those that wished to campaign, and ensured that voters had access to information to enable them to make an informed decision when they vote. Overall, the regulatory controls that applied at the independence referendum worked well and improved on the rules from previous referendums. We made a number of recommendations intended to improve the regulation and reduce the burdens on those that wish to campaign at future referendums in our first report published in December 2014. There are, however, further lessons that can be learnt from the information campaigners were required to submit in their post-referendum returns to further refine the legal framework in relation to: regulating campaigners that work together regulating loans reporting low-level spending reporting pre-registration spending late claims and payments, and the ability of campaigners to check the permissibility of donations and loans.

Recommendations The recommendation list continues from those we made in our previous report published in December 2014. All the recommendations in this report are intended to apply at future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK. Recommendation 24: Regulating campaigners that work together The legislation for future referendums should include 'working together' provisions that enable campaigners to work together to promote a coordinated message to voters, but ensure there are appropriate and proportionate regulatory requirements to prevent evasion of the spending controls. The provisions should: be based on the working together rules that applied at the Scottish independence referendum in 2014, and require campaigners to set out information in their post-referendum return about the other campaigners they worked with and the total amounts they each spent. This is information that campaigners should each already be compiling to ensure compliance with the rules and for inclusion in their own return. If the legislation for a future referendum includes a framework which allows for designating a lead body on one side only, it will be important that relevant governments consider the implications for the rules on how campaigners can work together alongside the overall package of benefits available to a sole designated lead campaigner. Recommendation 25: Regulating loans For future referendums not held under the PPERA framework, relevant governments should ensure that appropriate controls on loans to referendum campaigners, including credit facilities and guarantees, apply. We also recommend that the UK Government should bring forward the relevant secondary legislation to introduce loan controls for referendum campaigners at all future referendums held under the PPERA framework, as soon as practicable. Recommendation 26: Reporting low-level spending The legislation for future referendums should ensure that registered campaigners that spend less than the relevant registration threshold should only be required to submit a declaration that they have not exceeded that threshold, rather than complete a full spending return. Recommendation 27: Reporting pre-registration spending The legislation for future referendums should ensure that those registered campaigners that are required to submit a full spending return should include itemised information for all regulated expenditure, including spending that is incurred before a campaigner registers with us. Recommendation 28: Late claims and payments The legislation for future referendums should include improved controls for when campaigner invoices must be received and paid. It should provide that: the requirement to receive all invoices within 30 days and pay them within 60 days of polling day should only apply to amounts over £200 the responsibility for granting permission to pay invoices outside these deadlines should rest with the Commission where leave to pay is granted, the Commission should also have the ability to sanction the late receipt or payment of the claim in order to encourage compliance, but the Commission-based process should not apply to disputed claims as it would not be appropriate for the Commission to become involved in disputes over commercial transactions. Recommendation 29: Checking the permissibility of donations and loans The legislation for future referendums should ensure that campaigners are easily able to comply with the requirement to only accept donations and loans from permissible sources. Transparent Independent Our purpose We work to promote public confidence in the electoral system and ensure its integrity. Our strategic objectives Our five strategic objectives for the period April 2022 to March 2027 are: 1. Accessible registration and voting Free and fair elections depend on all people who are eligible and want to vote being able to do so. We will work to ensure: increased levels of voter registration, especially amongst groups that currently have difficulty engaging in the process the removal of barriers, especially those that affect people who currently have difficulty trying to cast their vote We will achieve these outcomes by working collaboratively with policy makers and other partners to identify barriers to participation and propose solutions. We will directly support people who have difficulty engaging in the process, with tailored accessible information and learning resources, and targeted public awareness activity. We outline our plans to support accessible registration and voting in Section 3 of this Corporate Plan. 2.

Transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance Parties and other campaigners should be able to campaign without facing undue actual or perceived barriers, while we continue to ensure political finance is transparent. This will support voters to hear a range of campaign voices to help them take decisions when voting. We will work to ensure: increased levels of confidence shown by candidates, parties and other campaigners in their ability to understand, apply and comply with the law on campaigning and political finance high levels of compliance with registration, reporting and other political finance laws We will achieve these aims by maintaining the official registers for parties and campaigners, and ensuring political finance data is accessible, transparent and complete. We will provide guidance and support for all types of campaigners and make regulatory decisions which command the confidence of candidates, parties, campaigners, and voters. We outline our plans for transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance in Section 4 of this Corporate Plan. 3. Resilient local electoral services Local electoral services need to be able to respond to increasingly challenging economic, social and environmental pressures. We will support local authorities and electoral administrators to deliver effective, sustainable and resilient electoral services, ensuring that voters receive the service they should be able to expect. We will work to ensure: sustained and consistent high performance in the delivery of well-run elections increased levels of confidence shown by electoral administrators in the resilience of the electoral system We will achieve these aims by setting challenging standards for electoral administrators, and providing guidance and support to ensure they are met. We will work collaboratively with local authorities, national bodies, governments and parliaments to build resilience into the electoral system. We outline our plans to ensure resilient local electoral services in Section 5 of this Corporate Plan.

4. Fair and effective electoral law It is essential for the electoral system that the laws which underpin it are fair, effective and well understood. Electoral law must also keep pace with other developments in our society, harnessing technology and working on a continual process of modernisation. We will work to: support governments and parliaments to reform electoral law to make it less complex reduce the risks and inefficiencies associated with electoral law which impact our electoral system We will achieve this aim by continuing to research and understand how electoral law could be reformed to help voters, campaigners, electoral administrators, and other organisations. We will also continue to provide expert advice on the practicability and impact of any changes to improve the electoral system. We outline our plans to work towards fair and effective electoral law in Section 6 of this Corporate Plan.

5. A modern and sustainable electoral system The electoral system needs to be resilient to the challenges that lie in and beyond the period of this plan. It needs to modernise to maintain and improve value for money, transparency, trust and compliance. And, it needs to reduce its environmental impact to be sustainable. We will work to ensure: data and technology are harnessed to meet the needs of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators the changing risks to the election system from the misuse of data and technology are understood and acted upon strong relationships and streamlined working practices with all bodies that are part of the electoral system are developed governments and the wider electoral community are supported to adopt a strategy and implementation plan which reduces the environmental impact of our electoral system We will achieve these aims by working with others to explore and implement new ways to use data and technology across the electoral system. We will also continue to monitor, advise and act on the misuse of data and technology. We will develop a strategy and implementation plan which reduces the environmental impact of the electoral system, to include innovative evidence-based solutions. We outline our plans to work towards a modern and sustainable electoral system in Section 7 of this Corporate Plan. We also outline our plans to make our organisation carbon neutral, consistent with governments' targets, in Section 8.

Underpinning this work Three key factors will make a difference to how we achieve these strategic objectives:

1. We demonstrate independence and integrity To fulfil its duties, it is essential that an electoral commission remains independent from governments, and acts impartially and with integrity. We will continue to demonstrate how we fulfil this by: taking decisions on the evidence and being transparent about the reasons for them basing our policy positions and recommendations on analysis of evidence effectively communicating our work and views providing responsive services to those we support maintaining effective governance arrangements
2. We are a skilled organisation where diversity is valued We work hard to ensure our people feel part of a diverse, inclusive and supportive workplace. In the next five years we will: implement refreshed working practices to reflect wider changes in our work environment and culture attract, retain and develop the people we need maintain and improve high standards of management, with a focus on developing our people further embed equality, diversity and inclusion in all aspects of our work
3. We are a learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used efficiently We are committed to utilising technology, funding, time and resources to deliver maximum value. We will invest in our systems and in reducing our environmental impact. In the next five years we will: procure and implement value for money technology that improves service delivery as appropriate maintain a sound prudent financial strategy continue to develop techniques to learn from experience, seek continuous improvement and become more efficient and effective develop a corporate environmental strategy that meets policy and legislative requirements

Report of investigation into the Conservative and Unionist Party - recording and reporting of payments | Electoral Commission Search Report of investigation into the Conservative and Unionist Party - recording and reporting of payments You are in the Investigations section Home Investigations On this page Summary of report The investigation Our findings First published: 9 December 2021 Last updated: 9 December 2021 Summary of report Our investigation looked at whether any transactions relating to works at 11 Downing Street fell within the party finance regime regulated by the Commission and whether any such transactions were recorded and reported as required. The evidence showed that the Conservative Party received a donation of £67,801.72 from Huntswood Associates Limited in October 2020 – £52,801.72 of which was to cover the cost of three invoices relating to the refurbishment of Downing Street. £15,000 was reported as a donation in the party's Q4 2020 donation report; the remaining £52,801.72 was not. Our investigation concluded that the full amount of the £67,801.72 was a donation and should have been reported to the Commission. We also concluded that the reference to the payment made by the party for the refurbishment in the party's financial records was not accurately recorded. The investigation found that decisions relating to the handling and recording of these transactions reflected serious failings in the party's compliance systems. The registered treasurer had a responsibility to put in place systems appropriate to a party with a complex internal infrastructure and substantial sums of money coming into its accounts. However, in this instance, the payment was incorrectly described in internal records and the full value of the donation was not correctly identified and reported. Consequently, it was not included in our donation publication. The Commission considered other payments relating to the refurbishment works; they were not judged to be reportable donations, and so we found no offences in relation to those payments. For the offence of failing to accurately report the full value of the donation from Huntswood Associates, the Commission has imposed a penalty of £16,250. For contravening the requirement to keep proper accounting records, a penalty of £1,550 has been imposed. The investigation Opening of the investigation On 5 March 2021, the Conservative and Unionist Party ("the party") contacted the Commission seeking advice on an "urgent query relating to donations". This followed reports in the media about the funding arrangements for works at 11 Downing Street. The party did not initially provide detailed information. During March we sought and obtained further information from the party to establish the facts in order to provide advice. The information related to a specific amount, a payment of £52,801.72, made to the party on 19 October 2020. Throughout, the party said that this payment was not a donation to the party. It described it variously as a donation to the Prime Minister via the party; as a 'gift to the nation' rather than a donation to the party; as a ministerial matter; and as the repayment of a loan. On 29 March we informed the party that, based on the information it had provided to that point, we considered it had likely received a donation that had not been reported to us as required by law. The party then provided additional information to seek to support the position that the sum was the repayment of a loan and not a donation. However, the information provided was not in our view sufficient to support this position, and did not change our analysis of the evidence we had seen at that point. We reached the view on 28 April that there were reasonable grounds to suspect that an offence had been committed, on the basis that a donation had been accepted and not correctly reported. We also considered it in the public interest that we investigate the matter. We therefore opened an investigation. Scope of the investigation Under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA), regulated by the Commission, registered political parties must identify and report donations they receive above a certain financial threshold. Reports must be made on a quarterly basis and delivered to the Commission within 30 days of the quarter's end, for publication. Our investigation concerned whether the £52,801.72, or any other transactions relating to the works at 11 Downing Street, fell within the political finance regime regulated by the Commission and, if so, whether the party complied with the legal requirements of that regime. The sum of £52,801.72 was part of a total sum of £67,801.72 paid to the party on 19 October 2020 by Huntswood Associates Ltd, a company controlled by Lord Brownlow, who has made a number of donations to the party in the past. The party reported £15,000 as a donation in its report for the fourth quarter of 2020. The balance was not reported. We expanded the investigation, on the basis of the information obtained during it, to consider whether the party had correctly recorded other transactions as per the requirements of the political finance regime. The registered treasurer of a party, in this case Mr Alan Mabbett, is the person legally responsible for compliance with the donation reporting regime for registered parties. As the subject of our investigation, he is identified by name in this report. Other officials referenced in this report are not named, but roles and areas of responsibility have been explained where relevant to our findings. Huntswood Associates Limited is named as it is identifiable as the donor, and Lord Brownlow as the person with sole control of that company. About donations A donation to a party is defined in PPERA as a gift of money or other property with a value of over £500. When parties receive a donation, they must check that they can accept it, record it, and report it to us if the value is over £7,500. The investigation (continued)

Engagement with the party and others We served a legal notice on the party requiring it to provide evidence to the investigation. We also served notices on Cabinet Office and Lord Brownlow (as the sole person with significant control of Huntswood Associates), as we believed that both held further relevant evidence. The notices required recipients to provide all information held relating to the financial arrangements and transactions for the funding of the works at 11 Downing Street. The scope of the notices was wide to ensure that any transactions involving the party, directly or indirectly, were covered. The material provided was analysed to determine what was relevant to the investigation, and only relevant evidence is referenced in this report. We received over 2,400 pages of evidence in response to the notices by the deadline we set. This included financial records such as invoices, bank statements, credit card bills, and communications including letters, emails, meeting minutes and WhatsApp messages. We subsequently sought explanations from the party in relation to aspects of the evidence, including any possible reasonable excuse for the apparent failure to correctly report a donation. We offered the registered treasurer the opportunity to discuss matters in person, though this was not taken up. The party requested and was granted extensions to some deadlines. Outline of the transactions In order to establish whether or not an offence had been committed, we needed to establish whether the party had accepted any donations which had not been reported as required by law. We therefore examined the series of transactions which occurred in relation to the works in Downing Street. We understand that costs for works to the private residence at 11 Downing Street are met by the Cabinet Office up to a sum of £30,000 per annum. On the basis of the evidence we obtained, we established the following sequence of events took place. 21 January 2020: the supplier of the refurbishment work provided to a senior adviser at 10 Downing Street a detailed proposal for works to the residential areas of 11 Downing Street. February 2020: officials from the Cabinet Office and 10 Downing Street considered options for how these works could be funded, beyond or instead of the £30,000 annual public grant already available. The option settled on was for a trust to be set up using anonymous donations. 1 May 2020: Lord Brownlow was approached by a senior party official to lead the process of establishing a trust, subsequently known as the Downing Street Trust, and, once it was established, to be its Chair. Lord Brownlow agreed and met with Cabinet Office officials to begin the process. 11 and 12 June 2020: the senior party official, the senior adviser at 10 Downing Street, and Lord Brownlow spoke by telephone about work already being undertaken at 11 Downing Street and the bills arising from this. They agreed an arrangement that was then relayed to and agreed with Cabinet Office officials by email on 22 and 23 June 2020. The supplier would be told to send the outstanding invoices to Cabinet Office, which would pay them and be subsequently reimbursed by the party, on the basis that the party would then be refunded by the proposed trust once that was set up. 23 June 2020: the Prime Minister formally offered Lord Brownlow the role of Chair of the Downing Street Trust. 24 June 2020: the supplier sent Cabinet Office three invoices totalling £52,801.72. One of those invoices, for a deposit on items of furniture, indicated that a further invoice would follow for the balance. 29 June and 2 July 2020: Cabinet Office paid the three invoices on the basis of the arrangement that the party would then refund it. July 2020 onwards: a series of meetings and discussions took place involving Lord Brownlow and Cabinet Office officials, to progress work on the proposed trust. 20 July 2020: Cabinet Office invoiced the party for £52,801.72. 6 August 2020: the party made a payment of £52,801.72 to Cabinet Office. September 2020: Cabinet Office received a further invoice from the supplier for £12,967.20, for the balance referred to in the earlier invoice of 24 June. Cabinet Office forwarded this to Lord Brownlow, who then forwarded the invoice to the senior party official. There was then further correspondence between the senior party official, the senior advisor at No 10 Downing Street and Lord Brownlow regarding who would pay this invoice. 24 September 2020: at a meeting of the group working on setting up the Downing Street Trust, including Cabinet Office and No 10 Downing Street officials and Lord Brownlow, it was resolved that no more works were to be commissioned for the residence without prior authorisation by Lord Brownlow. 13 October 2020: Lord Brownlow emailed the senior party official, asking: "...could you advise me of the total that The Conservative Party has 'leant' The Downing Street Trust? I will then make a donation to The Party to clear the 'debt.'" A party finance officer advised Lord Brownlow that "£52,801.72 was processed on behalf of the Trust". 19 October 2020: Huntswood Associates, a company solely controlled by Lord Brownlow, paid the party £67,801.72. Lord Brownlow stated in his email notifying the party of the payment: "I will be making a donation to The Party today for £67,801.72. That includes the £15,000 you and I have agreed and £52,801.72 to cover payments The Party has made on behalf of the soon to be formed 'Downing Street Trust' of which I am Chairman." On the same day Lord Brownlow also paid £12,967.20 direct to the supplier for the invoice received in September. 19 October 2020: the party's finance team received the £67,801.72 and notified a range of party officers of this by email, including compliance staff under Mr Mabbutt and a senior officer in the fundraising team. £15,000 was identified as a donation. The balance was described as being for the "No10 fund" and by a senior finance officer as "funds for reimbursement". 22 October 2020: at a meeting with Cabinet Office officials relating to the proposed trust, Lord Brownlow confirmed that he had made the payment of £52,801.72 to the party and had paid the invoice for £12,967.20 directly to the supplier. 26 October 2020: in the course of an email chain relating to the payment of £67,801.72, a junior member of staff in the treasurer's department of the party asked about the nature of the remaining £52,801.72 received from Huntswood Associates. They were told by a senior fundraising officer of the party that the £15,000 related to “events” and the balance was for “something else” and “don’t worry”. 29 November 2020: the Prime Minister messaged Lord Brownlow via WhatsApp asking him to authorise further, at that stage unspecified, refurbishment works on the residence. Lord Brownlow agreed to do so, and also explained that the proposed trust had not yet been set up but that he knew where the funding was coming from. 30 November 2020: Lord Brownlow confirmed to the senior party official his intention to cover the further refurbishment costs personally. December 2020: Lord Brownlow discussed further proposed works with the supplier, approved the work, and requested invoices. 6 December 2020: Lord Brownlow confirmed to the Prime Minister that he had approved further works. 18 December 2020: Lord Brownlow paid £33,484.80 to the supplier. Cabinet Office officials were informed of the payment by Lord Brownlow at a meeting regarding the proposed trust on 21 January 2021. 12 February 2021: Lord Brownlow paid a further £13,295.40 to the supplier. He sent a detailed update on the proposed trust to the Prime Minister. This brought the total sum paid by Lord Brownlow and Huntswood Associates combined to £112,549.12. £59,747.40 of this was paid directly to the supplier by Lord Brownlow and £52,801.72 was paid to the party by Huntswood Associates. 9 March 2021: a senior Cabinet Office official stated in an internal email that the Prime Minister has confirmed he has now paid all bills with the supplier personally. On that basis, the supplier was now £112,549.12 overpaid. Following discussion and agreement between Cabinet Office, 10 Downing Street, the party and Lord Brownlow, between 9 and 23 March 2021: the supplier paid Lord Brownlow £112,549.12, of which Lord Brownlow returned £52,801.72 to the supplier the supplier then paid £52,801.72 to Cabinet Office, the sum Cabinet Office had originally paid to the supplier Cabinet Office then paid the party £52,801.72, the sum the party had paid Cabinet Office originally the party paid £52,801.72 to Huntswood Associates The net effect was that Lord Brownlow, Huntswood Associates, Cabinet Office and the party had been repaid. Any payments between the Prime Minister and the supplier are outside the scope of our investigation. Our findings

The Commission is satisfied that the full amount of the payment of £67,801.72 by Huntswood Associates to the party on 19 October 2020 constituted a donation under electoral law. A donation is defined in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) as “any gift to the party of money or other property”. ‘Gift’ has its usual common usage; that the giving is voluntary, without receiving anything of value in return and without enforceable conditions attached. The payment of £52,801.72 made by Huntswood Associates to the party meets this definition. The evidence includes multiple instances where, at the time, Lord Brownlow, as Director of Huntswood Associates, described the payment as a donation. The payment was reimbursing the party for money it had paid to Cabinet Office. He explicitly stated that the donation was to ensure the Downing Street Trust, when created, would not have a debt to the party to settle. The payment was made voluntarily, without receiving anything of value in return, and without conditions attached. It was a gift, and a donation. The party said that the transaction was a repayment from Huntswood Associates following on from an arrangement under which the party had lent £52,801.72 to the unformed Downing Street Trust, by way of a payment of that amount to Cabinet Office. The Commission therefore considered whether this payment was made in respect of a loan or other similar arrangement. The Commission is satisfied there was no loan to the proposed trust. Legally, a loan only exists where there is a lender and another person who agrees to borrow money. In this case there was no such relationship. The trust did not exist as a legal entity and could not agree to borrow money, and there was no loan agreement. Further, whatever arrangement the party considered to exist did not involve Huntswood Associates. There was no evidence that Huntswood Associates received anything of value in return for its payment to the party. The Commission has therefore concluded that the payment of £52,801.72 was the voluntary payment to the party, by Huntswood Associates, of the sum the party had previously paid to Cabinet Office. The Commission is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the payment by Huntswood Associates was a gift of money, within the definition of a donation set out in PPERA. Determination regarding inaccurate reporting of the donation The Commission is satisfied that the registered treasurer of the party failed to report, without reasonable excuse, the full value of the donation of £67,801.72 from Huntswood Associates on 19 October 2020. Under section 65(4) PPERA, the treasurer of a registered party commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, he delivers a donation report to the Commission which does not comply with any requirements of PPERA as regards the recording of donations in such a report. For cash donations from a company, the report must give the name and registered address of that company, the amount of the donation and the date it was accepted. The £67,801.72 from Huntswood Associates was received by the party as a single payment. But during processing by the party it was separated: £15,000 was treated as a donation, and the remaining £52,801.72 was not. It was not reported as required by law so the Commission considered whether there was evidence of a reasonable excuse for this omission. Mr Mabbutt, as the registered treasurer of the party, is responsible for reporting donations as part of his legal duties under PPERA. It is therefore his responsibility to ensure sufficient checks are made on any payments to the party so that all reportable donations are identified. Mr Mabbutt has consistently stated that he did not know at the time about either the payment to Cabinet Office on 6 August 2020, or the £52,801.72 part of the donation received on 19 October 2020. The evidence supports this. However, the Commission is satisfied that Mr Mabbutt's lack of awareness arose from the party having inadequate systems in place which, as those systems are within his control and form a part of his duty as registered treasurer, does not amount to a reasonable excuse. The burden is on those responsible under PPERA to put in place appropriate systems that are sufficiently robust and to maintain a control and oversight so that the systems are sufficient to ensure compliance with the regime. The registered treasurer is answerable for the system and acts done in their name. The mechanics of the systems will vary depending on the financial size and complexity of the party concerned, but must be effective. For a large party with a complex internal infrastructure and substantial sums of money moving through its accounts, these systems will need to be sufficiently robust to ensure compliance in that context. Therefore, in order to comply with his PPERA obligations, Mr Mabbutt must have systems in place that allow him to ensure that any sums of money received by the party that are reportable donations are reported in line with the law. That system must be appropriate and proportionate to his party. The evidence in this case was that the finance and fundraising staff of the party did not have the necessary knowledge to recognise that the full payment from Huntswood Associates was required to be reported under PPERA, and did not ensure that others with that knowledge, such as compliance staff, were asked for advice. A senior member of the party's compliance team was copied into the email of 19 October 2020 in which the £67,801.72 payment was referred to as being only in part a donation. However, there is no evidence to suggest that the compliance team took any steps at the time the donation was made to query why only a part of the payment was being treated as a donation. When a more junior member of the treasurer's department did later query what the remainder was for, they accepted without further inquiry the statement from a senior member of fundraising staff that it was "something else". This is despite the fact that the role of that senior member of staff was in fundraising and not in ensuring compliance with PPERA. The compliance systems the registered treasurer had in place failed to ensure the necessary checks. The fact that Lord Brownlow clearly expressed his view that he was making a donation is a further reason why concerns should have arisen in this particular case. Mr Mabbott told us that as soon as he was alerted to the situation in March 2021 he contacted the Commission for advice, and the evidence supports this. By that stage though, any request for advice was too late to assist the party in deciding whether it needed to report a donation – the donation had been accepted and the relevant deadline for reporting had passed. Accordingly, the Commission has determined that there was no reasonable excuse for Mr Mabbott's failure to report this donation. Mr Mabbott failed to accurately report the full value of the £67,801.72 donation received from Huntswood Associates on 19 October 2020, and there was no reasonable excuse for this failure. The Commission is therefore satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Mr Mabbott committed an offence under section 65(4) PPERA.

The Commission is satisfied that the payment of other invoices relating to the refurbishment works were not reportable donations under PPERA, and so we found no offences in relation to those payments. Three further payments were made directly to the supplier by Lord Brownlow towards the costs of the refurbishment of 11 Downing Street. Money spent in paying expenses incurred directly or indirectly by a party is classified as a donation under PPERA. We considered whether these payments were meeting costs incurred by the party. The payment of £12,967.20 on 19 October 2020 was for the balance of an earlier invoice and was made by Lord Brownlow to the supplier, and the evidence did not support a conclusion that party had agreed to pay this invoice. In the case of the payments of £33,484.80 on 18 December 2020 and £13,295.40 on 12 February 2021, Lord Brownlow had previously made clear that his authorisation should be obtained before any further costs were incurred. His authorisation was sought and given, and he paid the invoices. There is no evidence of any agreement that these expenses were incurred by, or would be paid by, the party. The evidence does not support a conclusion that any of those further three payments made by Lord Brownlow met costs incurred by the party.

Determination relating to the recording of transactions

The Commission is satisfied that the party failed to keep accurate financial records in relation to the payment of £52,801.72 it made to Cabinet Office. Section 41(1) PPERA sets out the requirement that the registered treasurer must ensure accounting records are kept in respect of the party which are sufficient to show and explain the party's transactions. Those accounting records must show, with reasonable accuracy, the financial position of the party at that time. In particular, the records must contain entries showing from day to day all sums of money received and expended by the party, and the matters in respect of which the receipt and expenditure take place; and a record of assets and liabilities. There is no offence associated with failing to comply with this requirement, but the Commission may impose a penalty for non-compliance with it. The £52,801.72 payment made to Cabinet Office on 6 August 2020 was recorded in various internal party records as a "blind trust loan". We are satisfied that the payment to Cabinet Office was not a blind trust loan, the party had no legal right to repayment of the sum, and the recording of this by the party was materially inaccurate. Internal accounting records are essential for ensuring that the party is able to comply fully with other statutory requirements. That is particularly the case for a party with a significant volume of financial transactions. The references to this transaction as a “blind trust loan” did not accurately reflect the circumstances. As a result, the party’s records indicated that it would be reimbursed when it had no guarantee of that, and therefore misrepresented its financial position. We are therefore satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the party failed to keep accurate records as per the requirement of section 41(1) in respect of the payment to the Cabinet Office of £52,801.72 on 6 August 2020. We did not identify any further inaccurately recorded transactions amongst those in the evidence we considered. Sanctions For the inaccurate reporting of the donation of £67,801.72, the Commission imposed a penalty of £16,250. For failing to keep accurate financial records, the Commission imposed a penalty of £1,550. Before the final determination of the offence and contravention was made and the level of penalties was set, the party had the opportunity to make representations as to the Commission’s provisional findings and proposed penalty. We carefully considered those representations, and that consideration is reflected in the findings above. The Commission also noted that the party acknowledged some failings in its systems, and proposed some changes to those systems. We have offered to work with the party to support improvements. The penalties imposed reflect the seriousness of the offence and contravention. The Commission noted in particular that transparency in political finance relies on the accurate recording and reporting of donations by political parties, as does voters’ ability to understand how parties are funded. In this instance, the party conducted its financial affairs in a way which shows a lack of regard for the law that the party is bound to comply with. The Commission has a reasonable expectation that registered political parties will co-operate openly and effectively with the Commission to ensure that there is transparency in political finance. However, at various points before the investigation when communicating the situation to the Commission, the party described the payment as a loan, a commercial transaction and an agency arrangement. Similarly, at various times the payment was described as coming from either Lord Brownlow or Huntswood Associates, which are not the same entity. The party also made statements to the Commission which were not supported by the evidence subsequently obtained. It said that there was a written agreement between Huntswood Associates, the party and Cabinet Office that the Cabinet Office invoice cost would be covered by Huntswood Associates, and that the party’s finance team facilitated a transfer of funds from Huntswood Associates to Cabinet Office. Finally, this is not the first time the party failed to deliver an accurate quarterly donation report. Two penalties were previously imposed on the party in 2019 and 2020 for failures by Mr Mabbett to report donations, and there have been previous failures. Such repeat non-compliance risks undermining public confidence in the political finance regime.

attitudes 2023 You are in the Our research section Home Our research First published: 25 May 2022 Last updated: 6 April 2023 Public Opinion Tracker 2023 Since 2007, the Electoral Commission has been tracking public attitudes towards different aspects of elections and democracy in the UK. Our most recent study was carried out online, across the UK, in February 2023. It had over 4,000 respondents. Summary of findings A majority of people remain confident that elections are well-run in the UK. Despite a slight decline in recent years, the long-term pattern is positive. There has been a long-term decline in the public's perception of the transparency of party and campaign finance. Although this decline has slowed in 2023, the perceived level of transparency remains low. There is an increasing trend in the proportion of people who perceive problems around various aspects around democracy. Younger people are less likely to consider as unacceptable behaviour that could be construed as bullying or abusive towards MPs, compared to older generations. People in Northern Ireland are less likely to see themselves as eligible to vote in a UK parliament election than other parts of the UK. There has been a decline in the proportion of people who believe that votes are counted accurately at elections in the UK. There is a significant decline in the proportion of people who perceive the Electoral Commission as independent, compared to last year. There has been an increased awareness of the need for voter ID since the Election Act became law. More people in the UK are dissatisfied with the way democracy works than are satisfied. Confidence and satisfaction with the electoral process A majority of people (73%) remain confident that elections are well-run in the UK. Despite a slight decline in recent years, the long-term pattern is positive. Similarly, 79% of people are satisfied with the process of voting. Both measures are in line with their long-term average. Party finance There has been a long-term decline in the public's perception of the transparency of party and campaign finance. Although this decline has slowed in 2023, the perceived level of transparency remains low. More people have a negative perception than a positive one. 24% of people believe party funding is transparent. Over twice as many people see it as not transparent (58%). As recently as 2019, more people saw the transparency of funding as transparent (41%) than not transparent (36%). There has been a decrease in the number of people who think that if a political party or another campaigner is caught breaking the rules, the authorities will take appropriate action (30% agree). This is less than the 39% who disagree that appropriate action will be taken. As recently as 2018, 57% of the population agreed that appropriate action would be taken, which was three times the number who disagreed (19%). Perceptions of the problems faced by democracy There is an increasing trend in the proportion of people who perceive problems related to UK democracy, with people on average selecting 4.3 problems from a list of 9. This has increased from 3.6 problems selected on average in 2021. The top three concerns are bias in the media (72%), lower voter turnout (66%), and inadequate regulation of political parties' spending (60%). Attitudes to negative behaviours towards MPs Younger people are less likely to see as unacceptable behaviour that could be construed as bullying or abusive towards MPs compared with older generations. The difference in attitudes is consistent across different behaviours, including social media posts, verbal threats in public, and the use of foul language. For example, 75% of those who are 75+ say that verbally threatening an MP in public is totally unacceptable compared to 32% of 18–24-year-olds. Perceived eligibility for UK parliament elections People in Northern Ireland are less likely to see themselves as eligible to vote in a UK parliament election than people in other parts of the UK, with 62% of people in Northern Ireland seeing themselves as eligible compared to 91% in the rest of the UK. Separate qualitative research we have conducted in Northern Ireland suggests that because largely different parties are on a parliamentary election ballot paper in Northern Ireland compared to the rest of the UK, some people don't associate the elections with the UK Parliament. Perception that the vote is counted accurately There has been a decline in the proportion of people who believe that votes are counted accurately at elections in the UK, with 70% saying they are counted accurately in 2023, down from 85% in 2021. The decline is much greater among younger people. In 2021, 79% of those aged 18-24 agreed that this was the case, but by 2023, 52% agreed that this was the case. Perceptions of the Electoral Commission Of those people who have heard of the Commission and were able to choose a word to associate with us, the most commonly chosen word is independent. However, there has been a significant decline in the proportion of people who perceive the Electoral Commission as independent, with 19% of people believing this to be the case in 2023, compared with 26% in 2022. awareness There has been an increased awareness of the need for voter ID since the Election Act became law. At the beginning of February, 44% of people were aware that voter ID is required, while 39% believe that it is not needed. Satisfaction with Democracy in the UK More people in the UK are dissatisfied (39%) with the way democracy works than are satisfied (33%). There does appear to be a party political aspect to this, as those who support the Conservative Party are nearly four times more likely to be satisfied (61%) than dissatisfied (16%). Opposition party supporters are much more likely to be dissatisfied, led by SNP supporters, of whom 61% are dissatisfied and 19% satisfied. Very few of those people without any party affiliation (18%) are satisfied with the way democracy works in the UK. Integrating electoral registration into public service transactions | Electoral Commission Search Integrating electoral registration into public service transactions You are in the Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies section Home A modern electoral register Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies First published: 26 July 2019 Last updated: 8 June 2021 Summary We examined the feasibility of options enabling simultaneous voter registration applications to be made alongside accessing other public services, thereby increasing the number of channels available to citizens and improving the accessibility of the process. Summary We developed several implementation options, each of which would involve information provided during the original transaction serving as the basis for an electoral registration application, should the citizen so wish. Our preferred option involved transactional data being saved to the source (e.g. DVLA) database and then transferred to the online registration website via a secure route. While this would involve some development work for the Government Digital Service (to redevelop the IER hub) and for each Data Source Organisation, the reforms are feasible from a technical perspective. Public service transactions We first reviewed existing attempts to integrate electoral registration into other services in the UK within the current legal framework. Public service transactions Integrating electoral registration into the student enrolment process. Sheffield City Council worked with universities in the Sheffield area to develop a student enrolment form that also included an invitation to apply for electoral registration. Students were asked to provide their NINo, date of birth, open register preference, voting method and declaration. This data was then passed to the ERO at Sheffield City Council, where the data was uploaded into the EMS and processed as an application. The scheme proved very successful, with a take-up rate of around 66% of eligible students. The Northern Ireland Schools Initiative programme This was an initiative run by the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland. It involved visiting around 180 schools with pupils in Year 14 (aged 17) to promote voter registration, encourage pupils to register by completing electoral registration forms and to take photographs for Electoral Identity Cards, which pupils could use as proof of age as well as to vote. Attending British citizenship ceremonies Some EROs and their staff attend British citizenship ceremonies to encourage new British citizens to apply to register to vote there and then. This has proven to be an effective way of targeting this group of electors. Website links Many local authorities and universities include links on their websites to direct potential electors to the UK Government voter registration website, as have several UK Government departments. This is a very basic example of how electoral registration could be more joined up with other public services. Summary These types of initiative have undoubtedly been successful and could be developed more widely. We will continue to pursue these in the short-term, such as through the sharing of good practice. However, we were also interested in the extent to which the electoral registration process could be integrated more completely into other online public services – for example, by allowing a person to apply to register to vote when making a driving licence or passport application. It was the latter level of integration that formed the principal focus of the feasibility study. Data and infrastructure Currently there is no real integration between electoral registration and other online public services. We examined various ways in which data from a source website (e.g. the DVLA online transaction web form) could be sent to the online registration website and from there pre-populate fields in the electoral registration web form. Our preferred option involved transactional data being saved to the source (e.g. DVLA) database and then transferred to the online registration website via a secure route (API and IER hub). This would involve some initial development for each DSO, dependent on the current structure and environment of the source website and database. The type and format of data captured in DSO online forms would also be important considerations in developing an integrated system. Ideally, there would need to be an acceptable number of fields available from a DSO online transaction that could be reused in an online electoral registration application in order to justify integrating the electoral registration process with a particular service. The format of the reusable data from the DSO online transaction would also need to be compatible with electoral registration data formats. For example, if a citizen entered address data in a DSO online form that was then populated on the online electoral registration application form, the format of the address data in the source system would need to be compatible with the address format used for electoral registration. Integrating electoral registration into public service transactions: implementation scenarios We developed and tested two implementation scenarios that could potentially deliver a more integrated system of electoral registration system in the UK. We again considered models from other countries in developing the scenarios. For example, in Canada, most government forms feature an optional checkbox for eligible voters to share information with Elections Canada, while in the USA voter registration is integrated with driving licence application, renewal, and change of address processes. Both of the options we developed and tested could be implemented with some redevelopment of existing infrastructures (e.g. to allow for the secure pre-populating of an online electoral registration application form), including: establishing a link, e.g. API between DSOs and the IER hub; further development of the IER hub; and potential development of the DSO databases. Issues and challenges in integrating electoral registration with other public services Legal A suitable legal gateway would be needed to allow DSOs to integrate their systems with the online registration website. If a citizen chose to register to vote after completing another public service transaction, they would be invited to consent on the website to the reuse of their personal data, which would then be used to pre-populate an online electoral registration form. The implications of the Data Protection Act 2018 and General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) would need to be considered if using external data to pre-populate an online electoral registration form. Operational A more integrated electoral registration process would require some resource investment by DSOs to develop and maintain the infrastructure, liaise with the IER hub team and provide technical support where necessary. Responsibility and accountability for the transferring of data and maintenance of the infrastructure would also have to be agreed between stakeholders. Scheduling Effective coordination, planning and communication would be required to develop and implement an integrated electoral registration solution across different organisations. Economic A comprehensive cost-benefit analysis would be required to understand the cost implications of developing the necessary infrastructure to transfer data from a source website to the online electoral registration web form or the IER hub. The cost would depend on the solution that would best fit within the current DSO infrastructures. It would also be necessary to understand the commercial arrangements involved in developing solutions for wider integration e.g. whether there would be transactional costs involved in sharing data and ongoing maintenance costs payable to each DSO with which the electoral registration process was integrated. As with the better use of data study, a detailed cost-benefit analysis would need to be completed on each integration scenario to further explore the cost-effectiveness of the reforms. This would require access to public data sources, necessitating a legal gateway and incurring a cost. Response: Online Harms White Paper | Electoral Commission Search

Response: Online Harms White Paper You are in the Transparent digital campaigning section Home Transparent digital campaigning First published: 25 October 2019 Last updated: 9 June 2021 Our response to the Department for Digital, Culture, Media and Sport 1 July 2019 Summary Campaigning is an essential part of well-run elections and referendums because it enables political parties and campaigners to communicate with voters. We also need transparency and other safeguards to maintain trust and participation in our democratic processes. The Electoral Commission's role includes making sure campaigners follow the UK's laws on election spending, funding and declaring who is running a campaign. We would welcome early discussions with the UK Government and the online harms regulator. The proposals to make social media companies provide transparency about political advertising will be more effective if they are well joined-up with election and referendum law. If designed well, these proposals could: support our aims for transparency and controls on election spending, assist political parties and other campaigners to comply with their responsibilities to follow election law and help voters to have greater trust that they know who is campaigning for their vote. It is essential that any UK regulator working in the digital sphere has the right enforcement tools to deal with activity online. We urge the Government to take steps to modernise electoral law and our powers at the same time as tackling online harms. We need the power to obtain information from social media companies and want better abilities to share information with other regulators. We are pleased that the White Paper confirms our 2018 policy report into Digital Campaigning is being considered as part of the online harms agenda and we look forward to seeing the UK Government's response to our recommendations.

Introduction Electoral Commission is the independent body which oversees elections and regulates political finance in the UK. . This includes using our expertise to make and advocate for changes to our democracy, aiming to improve fairness and transparency. This response comments on the consultation questions most relevant to our statutory responsibilities. It also sets out our views on the White Paper's proposals for increasing transparency of political advertising. Responses to specific consultation questions

Q1 Building a culture of transparency, trust and accountability

The White Paper references our role to regulate funding and spending by political parties and other campaigners, including their use of social media. It recognises that there are regulatory gaps in addressing online harms and challenges (para 2.5). An increasing proportion of election spending happens online via advertising on social media platforms, websites and search engines. s also fundraise through online payment facilities and crowdfunding sites. Election law already requires political parties and other campaigners to report their spending and donations. We have a close interest in the Government's proposals to impose a duty of care and obligations on technology companies. This is because the White Paper proposes to regulate companies that supply some of the advertising or communication services that help campaigners engage with the public online. We therefore want to see how the new online harms framework can assist us to deliver parts of our responsibilities more easily and effectively. We are pleased to see that the White Paper also proposes that the new model of regulation could include measures for improving the transparency of political advertising and helping meet any requirements in electoral law (para 7.28). There is a clear opportunity to design the new requirements for technology companies to ensure that voters and regulators can get a clearer picture of what is spent on election campaigns and we can ensure that campaigners comply with election law. We look forward to our experience and expertise contributing to the development of these requirements and providing advice on the regulatory framework for election spending and funding. Q2 The role of designated bodies to bring ‘super complaints’ and other ways we may want to share information with the online harms regulator We may want to raise concerns if the technology and social media companies do not comply fully with the proposed obligations about transparency for political advertising. At the European Parliamentary Elections, we regularly used the ad libraries and reports that Facebook, Twitter and Google voluntarily published for election advertising in accordance with the EU Code of Practice on disinformation . In the future, it would support our work if the companies are formally required to run these kinds of libraries and reports. It is useful to have these additional tools for monitoring who is spending money on election and other political campaigning. If the tools become mandatory and the companies do not run or maintain these tools effectively, we could report problems to the online harms regulator. It could be treated as a ‘super complaint’ because any deficiencies would affect transparency for members of the public and would affect our monitoring role as regulator of political finance. We would also expect to work closely with the online harms regulator on operational matters where we have common interests. We recommend that the Government ensures we have appropriate information-sharing gateways with the online harms regulator. For example, we could share knowledge about the services that these companies provide to campaigners and assist the regulator with updating and future-proofing. We would also expect the online harms regulator to be equipped with sufficient powers to share information with us and other law enforcement bodies where appropriate. Q3 Other measures for users to raise concerns about specific pieces of harmful content or activity Election material that does not identify the source of a campaign is an example of potentially harmful content. It can affect voter confidence in election campaigners. It also affects our ability to enforce the rules on election spending by political parties and other campaigners. The Government should ensure that it is clear that concerns about election material without a clear explanation of its source will continue to be dealt with by us or the police and not by the online harms regulator. Election law requires campaigners to include an “imprint” on their election materials to identify the source. But these rules only apply to printed material and we have been calling for the law to be changed since 2003. We are pleased that the UK Government has recently announced its commitment to extending the imprint rules to digital election material. We will be responsible for enforcing these imprint rules on parties and some other campaigners when they are extended. The police are responsible for allegations about candidates and other local campaigners. If users raise concerns about digital material that does not contain an imprint, the online harms regulator should refer these concerns to us or to the police. Q18 Plans for education and media literacy The White Paper says that the government will develop an online media literacy strategy before the new regulator is set up and asks what role the online harms regulator should have in relation to education and awareness activity. Some countries are seeing public awareness-raising and the development of media literacy skills as being increasingly important to help the public engage with political campaigns. We are beginning to consider how we can contribute to this in a UK context, including discussions with the Government and with other regulators and public agencies. We have begun to discuss this with the DCMS and would be pleased to contribute to further scoping. Increasing transparency of political advertising and supporting electoral law This part of our response explains why we have a close interest in the White Paper’s proposals that social media and technology companies should be required to improve transparency of political advertising. If these proposals are implemented as described, it will mean that UK law, which currently provides for regulation of campaign spending by political parties and other campaigners, will also extend to the online providers of the tools they use for advertising and communicating with the public. It will also mean that the overarching aim of transparency of election spending will be delivered by two regulatory regimes – one for parties and other campaigners and one for social media companies. It is essential that these two regulatory regimes dovetail together, and this aim should be carefully considered when designing the online harms regulator and the proposed Codes of Practice. The UK presently has electoral and political finance laws that provide the ‘rules of the game’ that underpin fairness, trust and confidence in our democratic processes. These laws aim to ensure the UK’s election processes and results are trusted and accepted as legitimate and that funding and spending at elections and referendums is transparent. They level the campaign playing field to ensure elections are not unduly influenced. But there are obvious gaps when it comes to digital campaigning. It should assist if the new online harms regulator addresses some of these gaps by placing new requirements on social media companies. Other gaps need to be tackled by making direct improvements to electoral law. We recently welcomed the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee’s inquiry into electoral law and highlighted the need for reforms. For example, voters should be able to see clearly who is spending money online to influence them at elections and referendums and changes should also be made to strengthen our powers to compel social media companies to disclose information. The online harms agenda and electoral reform are complementary and should come hand in hand to maintain voters’ trust and protect elections from undue interference. Increasing transparency of political advertising and supporting electoral law Public attitudes to digital election campaigning The White Paper sets out high level expectations of companies, including addressing disinformation. It says the online harms regulator will reflect these further in Codes of Practice and we are pleased to see the government’s expectation that “ companies will need to take proportionate and proactive measures to help users understand the nature and reliability of the information they are receiving ” (para 7.27). We can share research findings to assist the government and new regulator with scoping this work. More should be done to help the public to understand digital campaign material and advertising at elections and referendums. In 2018 we commissioned research into the public’s attitude to digital campaigning and political finance regulation. In general the participants tended to approach digital campaign content with a sceptical attitude. They did not anticipate that all information online is true or that all sources are credible. However, it was also clear that they were unlikely to be aware of the extent that they may be influenced by digital material. For example, the participants often did not recognise certain issues based digital content as being political, or as linked to a specific campaign. In addition, we recently published the findings of our annual research measuring public attitudes towards elections and the voting process. We asked people whether they think inadequate regulation of political activity on social media is a problem. We found that 46% respondents overall think it is a problem, nearly half of whom (21%) say it is a ‘serious problem’. Improving transparency of political advertising We also welcome the government’s expectation that the Code on disinformation could include measures about “ improving the transparency of political advertising, helping meet any requirements in electoral law ” (para 7.28). We want to see more information about targeting of activity on social media platforms so that voters, and we as the regulator, can see why and where campaign messages are being targeted. It will assist our regulatory role if we know more about how adverts are targeted geographically and by which campaigners on behalf of others. The new online harms regulator should use this Code of Practice to ensure there are common standards and obligations on what the social media companies publish. There should also be significant sanctions if the companies do not publish meaningful information. The advert libraries/reports that Facebook, Google and Twitter ran for the European Parliamentary Elections were a positive first step and we had constructive conversations with the companies about their plans. We actively used the libraries and reports for our election monitoring work and they made it easier to identify who was paying to advertise on these platforms. From the user and voter's perspective, we think that some kinds of European election advertising were more clearly labelled than for past elections. But the companies should add better functionality so the links between candidates, parties and other campaigners can be clearly displayed. The companies should also do more to signpost users to the ad libraries and reports of top spenders. In future, there should be a more direct 'click-through' from election adverts to the reporting tools. This would help voters to access and understand the information that is provided and provide greater transparency. From our perspective as regulator, the approaches to publishing information about targeting and the level of detail were inconsistent across the three companies. For example: The definitions used by the three companies to identify political campaigning did not fully align with those used in electoral law. Significantly, this meant that in some cases the transparency libraries and reports did not identify advertising that is defined as election material under UK law, for example issue based campaigns paid for by non-party campaigners. The libraries provide information about who viewed the adverts, but they do not provide meaningful information about how adverts were targeted, such as a breakdown of the geographical areas used. The libraries and reports will only give real transparency if the companies increase the amount of information that they publish about targeting of advertising, and ensure greater consistency across different platforms. We are continuing to evaluate their policies and how the tools worked in practice and will share our conclusions in the autumn.

It will assist with scoping the proposed Code on disinformation if the differences between election campaigning as defined in electoral law and other forms of political campaigning are well understood. Political campaigning could have a wide variety of aims, including influencing public opinion or the opinions and decisions of politicians. It can happen at any time. Election campaigning is a sub-set within political campaigning. Election law covers campaigns that are intended to influence how people vote. Election or referendum spending rules only apply during a period of time ahead of a vote, known as the 'regulated period'. We can assist the online harms regulator to understand these differences and design the requirements in the Code accordingly. That should make the aims clearer to companies, campaigners and the public and make the operation of the Code more effective. As the Code will be legally enforceable and impact on electoral law, we recommend that the online harms regulator should be required to formally consult us when developing or amending it. This would be consistent with election law, where the UK's governments must consult us before making statutory instruments, and with the general practice of governments to involve us when drafting electoral reforms. The White Paper refers to political advertising, but not all election campaigning is done through formal paid advertising. Election campaign material can also be displayed or circulated by political parties, candidates and other campaigners via their websites or social media profiles. This material can be shared onwards by others. We think that all election campaigners should have to identify themselves on their campaign material, including where they have spent little or nothing on creating and distributing the message. Voters should be able to see who is trying to influence them so that they can make informed decisions about whether to trust different sources. We recommended this in our response to the Cabinet Office's consultation on extending the imprint rules and it would be consistent with the current law that requires imprints on all kinds of printed election material. We are awaiting details of the UK Government's approach to extending the imprint rules. We recommend that the Cabinet Office and DCMS consider the relationship between their respective proposals for imprints on digital election material and for a Code to increase transparency of political advertising. The timing of these two initiatives brings an opportunity for complementary proposals that increase transparency for voters about election and political campaigning, including paid advertising and other forms of content. We would be happy to contribute our expertise to these discussions.

Supporting requirements in electoral law

We welcome the government's expectation that the Code of Practice on disinformation could include measures about " helping meet any requirements in electoral law " (para 7.28). We also note that " the regulator will be expected to incorporate insights from law enforcement and other relevant government agencies to ensure the codes are adequately addressing the threat " (para 6.8). We would be pleased to provide expert advice to the regulator with scoping how a Code could ensure that companies help meet requirements in electoral law. This could include requiring companies to:

- Ensure that campaigners who are using their online services to advertise or campaign can clearly label them with the source and who has paid for the campaign. This would help campaigners meet requirements for 'imprints' and to help us enforce the spending limits for different types of
- campaigner Publish information about how adverts are targeted. This would also help us ensure the spending limits are followed by campaigners
- Ensure that a person/organisation paying for election advertising is based in the UK. This would help meet one of the overall objectives of UK election law, that campaigners and their funding are from UK based sources
- Provide information to us about the services they provide to election campaigners. This would allow us to deal with compliance issues in real time, and for example, require social media companies to give us information about the source of an online campaign that is running anonymously. These recommendations are set out in further detail in our Digital Campaigning report. We would welcome further discussions with the DCMS and Cabinet Office about how these proposals could be taken forward.

Helping meet requirements in electoral law – potential measures to prevent foreign spending and donations on social media and technology platforms

The proposed Code of Practice on disinformation could be used to set standards about how social media and technology companies and online payment providers design their software. Political parties and other campaigners already use crowd-funding sites and online payment systems to raise donations. We also note that Facebook is reported to be developing an online currency called Libra . We would expect to talk with the online harms regulator about how it sets, monitors and updates standards for companies about helping meet requirements in electoral law. For example, companies could be encouraged or required to design systems that help campaigners to comply with rules on spending and funding. It would still be a campaigner's responsibility to follow the law and we would continue to regulate that. Companies could assist by ensuring their functionality is easy to configure and includes the right features that campaigners need, such as full information about an online donor to check if the donation is from a permitted source. Powers to obtain information from social media and technology companies It is essential that any UK regulator working in the digital sphere has the right enforcement tools to deal with activity online. The UK Government should therefore consider strengthening the powers of UK regulators, including the Electoral Commission, so they are equipped to deal with future challenges. We note that the Cabinet Office is planning a consultation on improving electoral integrity in political finance. We also would welcome discussion with Government about whether the Online Harms Bill or Codes of Practice could be a suitable vehicle to enhance our powers to obtain information from social media and technology companies and online payment providers. Focus on Northern Ireland You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 On this page Summary Canvass 2021 Northern Ireland Assembly election 2022 Looking ahead First published: 1 August 2022 Last updated: 1 August 2022 Summary Summary Our work in Northern Ireland over the last year has largely been dominated by the 2021 electoral registration canvass and preparations for the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election. Alongside this, we continued to work closely with the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland, political parties and the electoral community across Northern Ireland. Despite our team in Northern Ireland continuing to work from home in response to the Covid-19 pandemic we were still able to provide advice and support to our stakeholders on issues relating to electoral law, financial reporting, campaigning and voter registration. The Northern Ireland Assembly Political Parties Panel continued to meet and we began to develop new resources specific to Northern in support of our learning and partnership strategies. Canvass 2021 Originally scheduled for 2020, but delayed by a year as a result of the pandemic, the canvass took place between July and November 2021. This was the first canvass to take place in Northern Ireland since the introduction of online electoral registration in 2018. We supported the canvass through a multimedia voter registration campaign, which reminded everyone that the register was being updated and that they should not ignore the canvass - even if they had been registered before. Over 1.3 million people registered to vote during the canvass, representing 93% of the eligible electorate. In March we published our report on the canvass, which highlighted that the register was at its highest ever level. However, we also found that the canvass in its current format is not an efficient tool for helping to maintain an accurate and complete electoral register. As such, we are now calling on the Government to reform the canvass and wider electoral registration process in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland Assembly election 2022 The Assembly elections on 5 May 2022 were the first elections to take place in Northern Ireland since the start of the pandemic. We provided advice and guidance to the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland on measures that could be put in place to protect voters, based on the experience of elections across Great Britain in 2021. As with all elections, we provided advice and guidance services to all of our stakeholders including candidates, agents, parties, campaigners and voters. New rules that extended imprint rules on printed campaign material came into effect for the first time at these elections. We updated and shared our guidance materials to promote compliance with these new rules. In partnership with the EONI and Royal Mail, we ran pre-election seminars for candidates and agents, including our first virtual seminar and our first face-to-face seminar since 2019. We also ran a new seminar specifically for political parties to help explain the reporting rules in place for them at this election. Our public awareness campaign began in March 2022 with a particular focus on reaching voters who had not responded to the canvass or whose details had changed since then. We also ran a digital campaign encouraging anyone who needed an absent vote to check that they had the required digital registration number when making their application. We also published our first suite of educational resources to promote political literacy in Northern Ireland. Looking ahead Our report on the Northern Ireland Assembly election will be published in autumn 2022. Preparations will also begin for the elections to the 11 councils across Northern Ireland in May 2023. We will continue to support parties and campaigners to comply with the law, while ensuring that political finance is transparent. We will also continue to provide support and guidance to the Chief Electoral Officer and EONI to ensure the delivery of a well-run electoral service in Northern Ireland. We will build on our stakeholder engagement activity in Northern Ireland. Building on the work we have done so far to provide educational resources we will seek to establish new partners to promote and improve political literacy across communities less likely to be engaged in the democratic process. The implementation of the Elections Act, which received Royal Assent on 28 April 2022, will also have an impact on our work in Northern Ireland. Working closely with the NIO, the Chief Electoral Officer and other stakeholders we will seek to ensure that development and delivery of the changes made to the electoral process in Northern Ireland through the Act. This will include the implementation of relevant secondary legislation for Northern Ireland, updating and producing new guidance and promoting awareness of these changes to the electoral community in Northern Ireland. 5. Impact on administration of the polls | Electoral Commission Search

5. Impact on administration of the polls You are in the May 2019 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2019 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 12 July 2019 Last updated: 12 July 2019 Contents Overview Our findings Impact on voters: experience Impact on voters: confidence Impact on security Impact of administration of the polls Background to our evaluation Key findings As in 2018, Returning Officers and their staff who were responsible for the May elections ran their pilots successfully. There were no significant administrative issues in any pilot on 2 May. Polling station staff told us that they were satisfied with how polling day went and were confident that they could manage the process of people showing voter identification at a future election. Additional staffing and training across all pilots was needed to run the pilot. The IT-enabled pilots worked well, but any Great Britain-wide roll out would need a significant level of resourcing to ensure a smooth implementation. Intro Returning Officers (ROs) and their staff were responsible for running the elections and the pilot processes. We have considered how the requirements of the pilots affected their ability to do so. Public awareness For these pilots, as in 2018, ROs were responsible for delivering the public awareness activity. This was funded by the UK Government but delivered by each local authority. Significant time and cost, in each pilot, was devoted to making sure voters were aware of the ID requirement. ROs used information gathered through equality impact assessments to help identify the most effective ways to communicate the requirements to different groups of people in their areas. This is likely to be different if the requirement to show ID were rolled out nationally, when the Electoral Commission would assume responsibility for a national public awareness campaign. However, in that event it is likely that ROs would still carry out smaller scale public awareness activities locally, as they do currently to encourage people to register to vote. Issuing local ID/replacement poll cards In each pilot, ROs ensured the provision of a free and universally available acceptable ID. In the photo only and mixed model, electors could apply for a local identity document (until 5pm on the day before polling day). In the mixed and poll card model they could apply for a replacement poll card (up to 5pm and 9pm on polling day respectively). The 2019 pilot scheme offered a limited test of the process and cost of issuing local ID to electors as there was limited take up of this route. In the photo only pilots, Woking issued 24 and Pendle issued 70 photo ID cards. Feedback from Pendle indicated that additional staffing was used to manage these applications and that they were not evenly spread over time; most applications came in and needed to be processed in the two weeks before polling day. However, in the mixed model pilots very few local identity documents were applied for or issued; Broxtowe issued two and Braintree issued one. This lower take-up is likely to be partly a result of the wider ID requirement which offered greater choice for voters, compared to the photo only pilots, and partly because electors could also apply for a replacement poll card (between 4% and 9% of electors used a poll card as a form of non-photo ID). The number of replacement poll cards ranged from one in Broxtowe to 300 in Derby. Replacement poll cards were also issued to 69 electors in Watford and 40-50 in Mid Sussex. We have heard no significant concerns about this process beyond the additional costs of keeping the council building open for electors until 9pm on polling day. Overall, the feedback suggests this was a manageable process if appropriately resourced. However, some ROs and their staff did express concerns about the challenge presented by the potential for a much greater volume of either local ID applications or replacement poll cards ahead of a UK general election, particularly with a high volume of applications coming close to the deadlines. These challenges could also have a significant impact on those people who apply for replacement poll cards close to the deadline, and their ability to show ID on polling day. Staffing and training ROs in each of the pilots made changes to staffing in order to deliver their pilot, although this varied significantly. The approaches ranged from a limited increase in central elections team resources (to support public awareness work or issue local ID) to deploying additional polling station staff on 2 May. For example: In Craven, the RO employed one additional presiding officer (out of a total of 30), seven additional poll clerks (out of 45) and three additional polling station inspectors (out of six) In Broxtowe, the RO added 12 poll clerks (out of a total of 103), two additional polling station inspectors (out of a total of eight) and two further staff in the central elections team In Watford, the RO (as they did in 2018) added two polling station inspectors (out of a total of six) In Pendle, the RO added two polling station inspectors (out of a total of seven) and three temporary, part-time staff in the central elections team There were no consistent patterns of how staffing was changed across the different pilot models; mostly changes were made based on the individual RO's assessment of the risk and issues locally. There was also no overall consensus on whether any increase in staffing at all would be required to administer voter identification at future elections with higher turnout. Some ROs expected that they would need additional staff in polling stations but others felt that it would be manageable at existing levels. Some areas that used additional staffing on 2 May said they would not anticipate using it again, even at elections with higher turnout. More and longer training sessions were required to support staff in delivering the pilots. To manage the additional training, some areas replaced online training with face-to-face sessions while others reduced the number of attendees per session. Our survey found that polling station staff thought that the training was delivered well across the pilot scheme. The majority of staff agreed that their training prepared them well for polling day and that the instructions on the types of ID that could be accepted were clear. Feedback from ROs again suggests that this was a manageable increase in work but highlighted that there was an additional resource requirement (e.g. in training fees for longer sessions). This variation in evidence from the pilot scheme means that, in the event of Great Britain-wide implementation, the UK Government would need to carry out a further, careful assessment of what the resourcing impact would be for ROs. Polling day Feedback from ROs and their staff indicate that they delivered their pilot on 2 May without significant problems. Across the pilot scheme, polling station staff were satisfied with how polling day went. In photo pilots 80% of staff were very satisfied, increasing to 81% in poll card pilots and 86% in mixed model pilots. This also reflects the experiences of Electoral Commission staff observers, who largely saw the process working well. A high proportion of all polling station staff agreed that asking voters to prove their identity had little or no impact on their work, although the extent to which they agreed varied across the pilots. Do you agree or disagree that asking voters to prove their identity had little or no impact on your work on polling day? Impact of ID requirement on work of administrators Staff in poll card pilots were more likely to agree that it had little or no impact, while staff in photo and mixed pilots were more likely to disagree than those in poll card pilots. This could be due to the quantity of the different acceptable identification types in these pilots or the additional work involved in recording information for the evaluation in the non-IT enabled pilots. The majority of polling station staff said that they would be confident in replicating the process at another election, with almost three quarters across the pilots saying they were very confident. IT-enabled pilots Mid Sussex and Watford both used IT in the polling stations to scan QR codes on electors' poll cards. In both, the system worked well and there were no notable issues on polling day related to the IT. Electoral Commission staff who observed in these pilots also saw this on polling day, with staff appearing confident in using the tablets to scan poll cards and being able to resolve any issues. However, the planning and setting up of these systems did require a significant amount of time and resource commitment from the electoral administration teams, the software suppliers and Cabinet Office. The commitment of time and resource largely stems from the development of a system to provide the necessary level of assurance and resilience to ensure no problems arise on polling day, such as ensuring there were no issues as a result of connectivity problems in polling stations. ROs raised some concerns about whether the level of individual support provided for the pilots by the software supplier would be possible if a system was being used across Great Britain. We have not had access to final data on the overall cost of delivering this element of the pilots, which is likely to have been significant. As an indication, IT equipment costs for similar activity at the 2018 pilots were estimated at £332 - £659 per polling station, though anecdotal evidence suggests that relative savings were made for 2019. While the pilot costs do not necessarily translate easily into a cost if implemented across Great Britain, it is highly likely that a notable level of resourcing would be required to ensure a smooth implementation. Public attitudes towards voting in Scotland in the context of COVID-19 | Electoral Commission Search Public attitudes towards voting in Scotland in the context of COVID-19 You are in the Public attitudes towards voting in the context of COVID-19 section Home Our research Public attitudes towards voting in the context of COVID-19 On this page Introduction Key findings Polling station voting Postal voting Other findings Background notes First published: 25 August 2020 Last updated: 26 November 2020 Introduction In February 2021, we asked a representative sample of eligible voters in Scotland about their attitudes towards voting during the pandemic. The questions covered attitudes towards postal voting and other options for the safe running of the election in 2021. This is a repeat of the work carried out in August 2020 and November 2020. In both August and November this research was requested by the Scottish Government under Section 10 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. This page provides a summary of the findings from the latest of these surveys conducted in February, making comparisons with the other surveys throughout. Key findings The key findings are consistent across August, November 2020 and February 2021 with voting in a polling place remaining the preferred option amongst a majority of voters although the results also indicate a likely increase in the proportion of voters opting to use a postal vote at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election compared to previous polls. Polling station voting Over three quarters (76%) of eligible electors and 82% of those who say they ordinarily vote in a polling station would feel safe voting there. This is not significantly different from what we saw when we asked these questions previously. When we explain the planned Covid safety measures for polling stations, based on Electoral Commission guidance, there is an increase in the proportion who see in-person voting as safe (84%). Among those who typically vote in a polling station 88% said they would feel safe. Of those who said they would not feel safe voting in polling stations, just under 9/10 (87%) said there was no measure that could be introduced to make them feel safe voting in person. While we are not able, from this research, to report specifically on BAME respondents in Scotland we can report for Great Britain as a whole. 61% of BAME respondents said voting in person was safe compared to 75% of White respondents. Once told about the Electoral Commission guidance around safety measures 73% of BAME respondents said they would feel safe voting in person compared with 84% of white respondents. Postal voting The same proportion of people, compared to November, said they would vote by post (38%) if an election were held now. The proportion of people who say they ordinarily vote at a polling station and would now choose to vote by post has remained consistent too with 22% saying they would vote by post (23% in November). While this should not be taken as a reliable indicator of the number of people who will actually vote by mail this does indicate that there could be a significant uplift in the number of postal votes compared with previous polls. Other findings There has been an increase in the willingness to vote if an election were to take place now. 90% said they would vote in February compared to 83% in November. Given a number of different options around how the May elections should be conducted the most popular option expressed was, again, for the Scottish Parliament election to be run with the same methods of voting as usual (42%). 28% would prefer polling stations to be open for more than one day, 10% wanted the election to be held as an all postal ballot and 12% preferred a short postponement. The proportion who thought the election should be postponed (by not more than 6 months) has increased from 5% in November to 12% in February. Those who were more inclined to think the elections should be delayed were also more likely to say that they think the elections would not be safe. They were also more likely to be older. Just under a third of those who intend to vote in person (31%) said they would not know anybody who could vote by proxy for them if their household had to isolate due to covid-19. Just over half were sure they did know somebody who could vote for them (57%). 12% were unsure. Respondents from social grade ABC1 are more likely to know people in their local area who could act as a proxy for them (67%) compared to C2DE (46%) As in the previous research, around a half (50%) of all those surveyed would vote by post if encouraged to (including 58% of polling place voters). Once those already registered to vote by post are included this would mean around two-thirds of electors who would vote by post. When asked why they would not apply for a postal vote, the majority (65%) said they would prefer to vote in person at a polling station Background notes All figures, unless otherwise stated, are from work done for the Commission by YouGov Plc. For the February fieldwork, total sample size was 504 adults. Fieldwork was undertaken between 29th January and 20th February. The survey was carried out online. The figures have been weighted and are representative of all adults in Scotland (aged 16+). For the August fieldwork, total sample size was 1,145 adults. Fieldwork was undertaken between 3rd and 7th August 2020. The survey was carried out online. The figures have been weighted and are representative of all adults in Scotland (aged 16+). For the November fieldwork, total sample size was 1,089 adults. Fieldwork was undertaken between 6th and 10th November 2020. The survey was carried out online. Enabling activity: A learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used efficiently You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 First published: 4 July 2023 Last updated: 27 September 2023 What we are working to achieve The world around us is changing rapidly. We need to adapt fast to be successful. In order to do this, we aim to be rigorous in learning from experience and seek continuous improvement in all that we do. With pressures on public spending set to continue, it is crucial that we continue to manage our costs and make effective use of our technology, funding, time and resources. We are working to: procure and implement value for money IT systems that improve service delivery maintain our financial strategy to keep the Commission within approved budgets continue to develop techniques to learn from experience, seek continuous improvement and become more efficient and effective develop a corporate environmental strategy that meets policy and legislative requirements for reduced environmental impact. Work done to achieve this aim We are on course to remain within the commitment we gave in the Corporate Plan to keep core spending – on regulatory activities, support for electoral administrators and overheads – flat in real terms over the course of the plan period. We regret that we were unable to complete the delivery of the new political finance online system as the project could no longer achieve its aims and would have required ongoing and costly support. We are currently in the discovery phase of our new approach, which is utilising previous work we had developed and consulted on. Like many public bodies, the Commission faces risks from cyber-attacks. To help protect against such attacks, we are investing in our systems. We have migrated our IT infrastructure to the cloud and invested in cyber-security, giving us a robust technology basis that will allow us to focus on key corporate systems. Prepared the Commission's budget for 2023-24, which was approved by the Speaker's Committee in March 2023. Ongoing and future work We will continue to move our guidance into a new more accessible format online, with all new guidance for the 2024 elections to be made available in this way. We remain committed to replacing the current political online system for registering political parties and reporting financial information and will continue to work with parties and campaigners on the next steps. We are undertaking a programme of training for internal budget managers and making systems improvements to provide budget managers with real time expenditure data to support better decision-making.

Guidance for electoral observers in England You are in the Guidance and feedback for observing elections section Home Observing elections and referendums Guidance and feedback for observing elections On this page What elections are taking place? Who does what at these elections? Postal voting Post vote opening procedure Observing at polling stations Observing the verification and count Submitting feedback First published: 14 April 2023 Last updated: 4 May 2023 Guidance for electoral observers in England This guidance is for electoral observers who have been accredited by the Electoral Commission. It includes information on the elections taking place and what to expect at the electoral processes you are entitled to observe. about becoming an accredited observer What elections are taking place? On Thursday 4 May 2023 there will be local council elections and local authority mayoral elections across England. This guidance is for accredited observers in England. Separate guidance is available for observers in Northern Ireland. What can I observe? As an accredited observer you are entitled to attend: the issue and receipt of postal ballot papers the polling stations the verification and counting of the votes We have published a Code of Practice for electoral observers. You must comply with the standards of behaviour set out in this Code. You do not need to tell electoral officials that you want to observe proceedings; by law you have a right to attend as detailed above. However, if you do tell them, they may be able to provide you with some relevant local and practical information, for example a list of polling stations or adaptations made to venues for accessibility purposes. You can still make unannounced visits or change your plans if you want to. Who can vote in these elections? A person can vote in these elections if they are: included on the electoral register at an address in England 18 years of age or over on the day of election a British, Irish or qualifying Commonwealth citizen or a citizen of the European Union What voting methods will be used? Local elections Local council and local mayoral elections in England use the first-past-the-post system. The ballot paper will list the candidates standing in that area. Voters can vote for as many candidates as there are vacancies in that area. Some councils have local elections every four years and elect all councillors at the same time. Other councils vote by thirds. This means that a third of councillors are elected every year over a three year period with no elections in the fourth year. Other councils vote by halves with half of the councillors elected every two years. There may also be by-elections taking place for other seats on the council that have become vacant. Some areas may also have town or parish council elections taking place. Who does what at these elections? Returning Officers Every county, district, unitary and metropolitan council in England is required to appoint an officer of the council to be the Returning Officer (RO) for the election of councillors to their local authority. They are usually a senior officer of the council, but independent of it in respect of their electoral functions. The person appointed as the RO for principal area elections will be the local RO for any mayoral elections in the local authority. Every district council in England must also appoint an officer of the council to be the RO for any elections of councillors of parishes within the district. This may be the same person as the RO for principal area elections, but does not need to be. You can contact the RO for the area in which you intend to observe through your local elections office. Find the contact details for election offices. The RO will offer briefings and training sessions ahead of the elections for candidates and for staff working on the election. You may be able to attend these sessions which will help you to understand the processes that you are entitled to attend and observe. If you wish to attend these briefings you should contact the relevant elections office beforehand to arrange your attendance. The Electoral Registration Officer The Electoral Registration Officer (ERO) is responsible for maintaining the register of electors and absent voters' lists for their area. The ERO is normally a senior officer of a local authority and may also be the RO. Find the contact details for EROs. The Electoral Commission The Electoral Commission is an independent statutory body set up by UK Parliament. We register political parties and non-party campaigners, monitor and publish donations to political parties and regulate spending at certain elections. We also accredit observers to attend election proceedings. We do not run elections but have responsibility for providing advice and assistance on electoral matters to all those involved in elections. We also promote voter awareness. Our contact details are: The Electoral Commission 3 Bunhill Row London EC1Y 8YZ Tel: 020 7271 0500 Email: info@electoralcommission.org.uk Website: www.electoralcommission.org.uk Postal voting Electors can apply to vote by post. The RO starts to send postal voting packs to postal voters around two weeks before polling day. Voters can return their packs by post to their local council or hand them in to certain polling stations on polling day. Completed postal voting packs must be returned by 10pm on polling day. You are entitled to attend both the issuing of postal voting packs and postal vote opening sessions. You can also appoint a postal vote agent to attend on your behalf. The RO will be able to tell you when and where these sessions are taking place. What happens at a postal vote issuing session? There are likely to be several sessions for issuing postal votes. These could take place at an external printers. At the issuing session, postal voting packs will be put together. The packs will include: Envelope A – this is the envelope that the elector returns their ballot paper(s) in. It is marked with the letter 'A' and the words 'ballot paper envelope' Envelope B – this is the envelope that the elector will use to return the ballot paper envelope and the postal voting statement. It is marked with the letter 'B' and the address of the RO The postal voting statement – this contains the elector's name, the number of the ballot paper(s) issued to them, instructions on how to vote by post and space for the elector to sign and provide their date of birth The ballot paper(s) Postal voting packs will then be delivered to electors, either by hand or by post. If the election is combined with another poll, the RO may send the ballot paper(s) for each election together or separately. When will postal votes be opened? It is likely that there will be several postal vote opening sessions before polling day, as well as on polling day itself. You can contact the RO for details of these locally. There will also be a final opening session held after the polls have closed. Postal votes handed in to polling stations will be opened at this session. This session may be held at the count venue or in another location. What happens at a postal vote opening session? Postal voters must complete and return a postal voting statement which includes their signature and date of birth, as well as their ballot paper(s). The RO will decide whether or not the date of birth and signature provided by electors on their postal voting statements matches the signature and date of birth previously provided by the elector and held on their records. If they do not match, the postal vote will be rejected. A very small number of voters will have been granted a waiver because they are unable to sign or provide a consistent signature due to a disability or an inability to read or write. These voters do not need to sign their postal voting statement. The postal vote opening process can be summarised as follows: Post vote opening procedure Stage 1 Step 1: Open the postal voters' ballot box. Step 2: Count and record the number of covering envelopes (Envelopes 'B') Step 3: Open the covering envelopes (envelopes 'B') and remove the postal voting statement and ballot paper envelope (envelope 'A') Step 4: Mark all returned postal vote statements on the postal/postal proxy list to show it is returned If not all parts of the postal vote have been returned: Step 5: Mark the envelope 'provisionally rejected', attach contents and add to the rejected votes packet. Add to the lists as appropriate: the list of ballot papers received without a valid (or any) postal voting statement the list of ballot paper numbers of postal voting statements received without a ballot paper. See Stage 4. Stage 2 Step 1: Verify the personal identifiers on the returned postal voting statements Step 2: Separate the ballot paper envelopes from the postal voting statements and keep both in order Step 3: Determine those postal voting statements that are missing a date of birth and/or signature or where either/both do not match those held on the identifier record. Adjudicate those and reject where either are not included or you are not satisfied that the statement is duly completed. Invalid postal voting statements are rejected. The statements, ballot paper and envelopes are marked 'rejected' and placed in the receptacle for rejected votes Postal voters who have been granted a waiver only need to complete their date of birth Step 4: Check the number on the postal voting statement matches the number on the ballot paper envelope (envelope "A"). After matching, package up the postal voting statements and seal the packet. If the numbers do not match: Step 5: Open the envelope. If the ballot paper matches the statement, it is valid and should go in the postal ballot box. Non-matching ones should be provisionally rejected (see below). Stage 3 Step 1: Open the ballot paper envelopes (envelopes 'A') If the ballot paper is inside the envelope: Step 2: Remove the ballot paper(s), ensuring they are kept face down at all times Step 3: Check the number on the ballot paper envelope (envelope 'A') against the number on the back of the ballot paper Step 4: Keep the ballot papers face down at all times. Don't look or allow others to look at the votes marked on the ballot papers. Step 5: Place ballot papers in the postal ballot box or appropriate receptacle and proceed to Stage 5. If the ballot paper number does not match: Step 2: Attach the ballot paper to the envelope Step 3: Mark it as 'provisionally rejected' and put it in the receptacle for rejected votes Step 4: Add to the both the list of ballot papers received without a valid postal statement and the list of ballot paper numbers of postal voting statements received without a ballot paper If there is no ballot paper inside the envelope: Step 2: Mark 'provisionally rejected' and put in the receptacle for rejected ballot paper envelopes. Step 3: Add to the list of ballot paper numbers of postal voting statements received without a ballot paper. Stage 4 Step 1: To match up separated documents, check the two reject lists against all ballot papers/postal voting statements that have been returned separately from their corresponding postal voting statement/ballot paper and, if possible, match them up The two lists must be taken to the final opening of postal votes to carry out any final matching Step 2: Record any successful match on the relevant lists Step 3: Place the ballot papers that are no longer to be treated as provisionally rejected in the postal ballot box or appropriate receptacle and place the accompanying postal voting statements in the appropriate receptacle. Stage 5 Step 1: Count and record the total number of ballot papers, keeping the ballot papers face down at all times Actual votes are not counted at this stage Step 2: Place the ballot papers in the postal ballot box, which much be sealed at the end of each opening session and stored securely Step 3: Complete postal vote ballot paper account Duty to maintain secrecy The RO will give you a copy of the statutory Requirement of Secrecy. Anyone attending a postal vote issuing or opening session must comply with this. Ballot papers will be kept face down throughout a postal vote opening session. Anyone attending an opening session must not: attempt to see how individual ballot papers have been marked attempt to look at identifying marks or numbers on ballot papers disclose how any particular ballot paper has been marked pass on any such information gained from the session Anyone found guilty of breaching these requirements can face an unlimited fine, or may be imprisoned for up to six months. Observing at polling stations You are entitled to observe inside polling stations. The RO will be able to provide you with a list of all polling stations in the area where you want to observe. Returning Officers may have reviewed their polling stations since the last elections and there may be some late changes to polling stations if venues become unavailable. Look out for such changes being communicated via local authority websites and/or social media channels. When are polling stations open? Polling stations will be open between 7am and 10pm on Thursday 4 May 2023. You are permitted to arrive shortly before this to observe the sealing of the ballot box(es) prior to the poll opening. What will the inside of the polling station look like? The layout within each polling station may differ, but it may look similar to the images below: Example of a single polling station layout with one entrance/exit: Example of a single polling station layout with separate entrance and exit: Example of a double polling station layout: Who can vote at a polling station? Any person on the polling station's electoral register can vote at the polling station unless: they are a registered postal voter they are a registered proxy voter and their proxy has already voted for them or has applied to vote on their behalf by post they are not 18 years of age or older on polling day they are registered as an overseas elector Electors receive a poll card before the election telling them where they can vote. Most electors do not need to take their poll card to the polling station in order to vote. The only electors who need to bring a poll card with them to vote are those who have registered anonymously because of risks to their safety. Registered postal voters cannot be issued with a ballot paper at the polling station. They can return their completed postal ballot pack to their polling station or any polling station in the relevant electoral area or to the RO at the elections office. Postal ballot packs returned to polling stations must be handed to polling station staff and not placed in the ballot box. Polling station staff will keep any postal votes secure until they are collected. Who is allowed to be in the polling station? The following people are entitled by law to be present in a polling station: the RO and their staff the Presiding Officer and clerks voters persons under voting age who accompany voters companions of disabled voters candidates and their election agents polling agents police officers and community support officers on duty at the polling station Electoral Commission representatives observers accredited by the Electoral Commission What do polling agents do? Candidates and political parties can appoint polling agents to be present at any polling station. The main role of a polling agent is to detect personation (when an individual votes as someone else – whether that person is living or dead, or is a fictitious person). Other duties that the polling agents may undertake include: checking that the ballot box is empty at 7am being present when the Presiding Officer marks a ballot paper on behalf of a voter being present at the close of poll to observe the sealing up of the ballot box and other packages attaching their own seal to the ballot box or any packet in addition to the official seal What happens in a polling station? Polling station staff will: ask voters for their name and address, and make sure they are eligible to vote ask voters for photographic ID mark a straight line against the voter's entry on the register of electors call out the number and name of the elector write the elector number on a list next to the number(s) of the ballot paper(s) to be issued ensure the ballot paper(s) include the official mark (e.g. a barcode or watermark) fold the ballot paper(s) and then hand them to the voter unfolded so that they can see all of the options on the ballot paper(s) Voters will need to produce one of the following documents in order to prove their identity: a passport issued by the UK, any of the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man, a British Overseas Territory, an EEA state, or a Commonwealth country (including an Irish Passport Card) a driving licence issued by the UK, any of the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man, or an EEA state (this includes a provisional driving licence) a biometric immigration document an identity card bearing the Proof of Age Standards Scheme hologram (a PASS card) a Ministry of Defence Form 90 (Defence Identity Card) a Blue Badge a national identity card issued by an EEA state an Older Person's Bus Pass funded by the Government of the United Kingdom a Disabled Person's Bus Pass funded by the Government of the United Kingdom an Oyster 60+ Card funded by the Government of the United Kingdom a Freedom Pass a Scottish National Entitlement Card issued in Scotland a 60 and Over Welsh Concessionary Travel Card issued in Wales a Disabled Person's Welsh Concessionary Travel Card issued in Wales a Senior SmartPass issued in Northern Ireland a Registered Blind SmartPass or Blind Person's SmartPass issued in Northern Ireland a War Disablement SmartPass issued in Northern Ireland a 60+ SmartPass issued in Northern Ireland a Half Fare SmartPass issued in Northern Ireland an Electoral Identity Card issued in Northern Ireland Voter Authority Certificate These documents are listed in legislation and no other forms of identity can be accepted. The identification document does not need to be current, but the photograph must be of a good enough likeness to allow polling station staff to confirm the identity of the holder. The voter will: mark the ballot paper(s) in private in the polling booth fold the ballot paper(s) and show the ballot paper number(s) and unique identifying mark on the back of the ballot paper(s) to the Presiding Officer place the ballot paper(s) in the ballot box(es) and leave the polling station A single ballot box may be used for all of the elections or one box may be used for each separate election. What assistance is available for voters with disabilities? Through our work with civil society organisations and charities we have identified a range of equipment that can help to overcome the known barriers faced by disabled people. The following equipment should, as a minimum, be provided in all polling stations to support disabled voters: chairs/seating – this provides a place to rest for voters who cannot stand for long periods and a seat for voters who would like to take some time to think before entering the polling booth magnifiers – these can provide support for voters who are visually impaired to vote independently by increasing the size of the text on a document tactile voting device – tactile voting devices provide support for voters who are visually impaired to mark their vote on the ballot paper in the correct place, provided it is placed on the ballot paper correctly. They have been found to provide assistance in completing the ballot paper once visually impaired voters know the position on the ballot paper of the candidate for whom they wish to vote. They do not allow blind voters to vote independently unless they also have accessible information about the order of the candidates on the ballot paper polling booth at wheelchair level – helps to ensure that voters who use a wheelchair are able access a lower writing surface to ensure they can cast their vote in secret in a booth that is accessible badges identifying polling station staff – these help voters more easily identify who is a member of staff in the polling station and can therefore be approached for assistance. pencil grip – these can help voters with dexterity impairments to more easily hold and use a pencil independently ramps (for buildings with steps) – these support access to a polling station for voters who use a wheelchair or have difficulty using steps temporary alerters or temporary doorbells for any doors that are required to remain shut during the day (for example, fire doors) – these provide a way for voters to let polling station staff know that they need assistance to open the door so they can access the polling station. These do not need to be permanently fixed or installed in a building used as a polling station but can be temporarily placed at an accessible level on a table or chair next to any doors that must remain closed appropriate lighting – some polling station venues have good lighting but others may need additional lighting at the desk; to ensure that voters can clearly see the faces of staff, and in the polling booths; to support voters with visual impairments to be able to read and complete the ballot paper. parking spaces reserved for disabled voters (where parking is available at the venue) – this ensures that disabled voters can park as close as possible to the polling station a large print version of the ballot papers (for reference purposes only) Voters with sight loss may use apps on their mobile phones or carry pocket-sized assistive equipment, such as video magnifiers to help them read documents. These could be used in conjunction with the template. The Returning Officer may also have provided magnifying glasses to support voting without assistance. If a voter is unable to mark a ballot paper themselves because they have a disability, the Presiding Officer or a companion can mark it for them. The voter must tell the polling station staff that this is how they want to vote and the reason why. If a companion marks the ballot paper for a voter, they will be asked to fill in a form. A companion cannot assist more than two electors to vote at an election. Electors can contact the Returning Officer to explain any specific access needs that they have. As a result, there may be extra equipment in certain polling stations where the Returning Officer has allocated specific equipment to meet those access needs. What are Tellers? Tellers stand outside polling stations and record the elector numbers of people who have voted. They can then identify likely supporters who have not voted yet and encourage them to vote before the close of poll. Tellers have no legal status and voters can refuse to give information to them. What happens after polls close? Polls close at 10pm. Any voters waiting in a queue at their polling station at 10pm will be allowed to vote, even if they haven't been issued with their ballot paper(s) yet. Once all voters who have been issued with ballot paper(s) have voted, the Presiding Officer must seal the ballot box. Candidates, agents and polling agents can also add their own seal if they want to. The Presiding Officer must then complete a number of official forms: the ballot paper account (which states how many ballot papers were issued) the list of voters with disabilities assisted by companions the list of votes marked by the Presiding Officer the statement of the number of voters whose votes were marked by the Presiding Officer the list of tendered votes the Evaluation Form (VIDEF) the Ballot Paper Refusal List (BPRL) Duty to maintain secrecy in the polling station Anyone attending a polling station must maintain the secrecy of the ballot. In particular, the following information must not be disclosed: the name or electoral number of who has or has not voted the number or other unique identifying mark on a ballot paper Anyone attending a polling station must not try to determine how a voter has voted or who they are about to vote for. A polling agent can mark off on their copy of the register of electors those voters who have applied for ballot papers. If the polling agent leaves the polling station during the hours of polling, they must leave the marked copy of the register in the polling station to ensure that secrecy requirements are not breached. Any person found guilty of breaching the secrecy requirements can face an unlimited fine, or may be imprisoned for up to six months. Observing the verification and count You are entitled to attend the verification and count. You are only permitted to observe the process. You are not allowed to enter the restricted area where staff count the votes. Returning Officers have the right to limit the number of observers who may be present at any one time during the verification and count. The RO is responsible for verifying and counting the votes cast in their area. They are responsible for declaring the results of any local council elections and any local area mayoral elections. The RO will be able to tell you when and where the counts will take place. Who can attend the count? The following people are entitled by law to attend the verification and count: Returning Officers and their staff candidates plus one guest election agents (or a sub-agent on their behalf) counting agents Electoral Commission representatives observers accredited by the Electoral Commission any other person permitted by the RO The RO may allow representatives of the media to attend the verification and count. They must not interfere with the process or compromise the secrecy of the vote. What do counting agents do? Counting agents have a number of important roles to play at the count: they observe the counting process and make sure that it is accurate they can draw to the attention of count staff any doubtful ballot papers if they disagree with a decision by the RO to reject a ballot paper, they can ask the RO to mark on the ballot paper "rejection objected to" if a count is suspended for any reason, counting agents can add their seals when the RO seals the ballot boxes and envelopes What is verification? After polling stations close at 10pm the ballot boxes will be delivered to the count venue. Postal ballot papers previously received and opened will also be brought to the venue in sealed ballot boxes. All ballot papers must then be verified. Verification has two main purposes: to make sure and show that all ballot papers issued at polling stations and all the returned postal ballot papers have been brought to the count to provide the figure that should match the result of the count The number of ballot papers in each box are counted and will be compared with the number on the ballot paper account. If the number of ballot papers in each box matches the ballot paper account the verification of that box is complete. If the numbers do not match, the ballot papers will be recounted and the documentation checked again. This process will continue until the RO is satisfied as to the actual number of ballot papers to be included in the count. How are the votes counted? After the verification stage is complete, the RO must mix the polling station and postal vote ballot papers before the votes are sorted and counted. The ballot papers should be kept face upwards and be visible at all times to any candidates, agents and observers present. Any doubtful ballot papers should be placed aside for adjudication. Staff will count the number of votes at each election cast for each candidate. Where more than one candidate is to be elected in a ward, ROs may use different methods to establish the votes cast for each candidate, for example, by using counting sheets. The candidate(s) with the most votes are elected. The RO will make a declaration stating who has been elected after each contest has been counted. What are doubtful ballot papers? A doubtful ballot paper is a ballot paper that has not been completed in accordance with the instructions. During the count, these ballot papers will be placed aside. The RO will adjudicate these ballot papers regularly throughout the count to determine whether the intention of the voter clearly appears on the ballot paper. An announcement will be made that an adjudication on doubtful ballot papers is about to be made. The RO will decide whether each doubtful ballot paper is valid in the presence of candidates, agents and observers. You can attend the adjudication but it will not be delayed if you are not present. The RO will inform those present whether or not each doubtful ballot paper is valid and the reason for their decision. The ROs decision is final and can only be challenged by an election petition. Any doubtful ballot papers that are declared as valid must be counted and included in the total number of votes cast for the appropriate candidate. A ballot paper will not be counted if it: is unmarked does not contain the official mark contains votes for more candidates than the number of vacancies (local elections) contains more than one vote (mayoral elections) contains any mark or writing that can identify the voter does not indicate the voter's intention with certainty The RO must mark the word "rejected" on any ballot paper that is rejected and must draw up a statement showing the number of ballot papers rejected for these reasons. What happens if candidates have the same number of votes? If two or more candidates have the same number of votes, the Returning Officer must decide between them by drawing lots. Duty to maintain secrecy Anyone attending the count has a duty to maintain the secrecy of the count. In particular, anyone attending must not: ascertain or attempt to ascertain number or other unique identifying mark on the back of any ballot paper communicate any information obtained at the count as to the candidate for whom any vote is given on any particular ballot paper Submitting feedback We welcome feedback from your electoral observations which you can submit using our feedback form. If you want to submit feedback on these elections, the deadline for feedback to be considered is 9 June 2023. Feedback may be shared with relevant Returning Officers to help improve the running of elections and the observer scheme. You may find it helpful to print a copy of the feedback form in advance to take with you when observing. If you would like to send feedback in a different format please email observers@electoralcommission.org.uk.

Response to feedback on the UK codes of practice on spending by candidates and political parties consultation You are in the Our consultations section Home

Our consultations On this page How we developed the codes Key themes Conclusion Draft codes of practice First published: 22 April 2020 Last updated: 22 April 2020 Summary

On 21 April 2020 we submitted two codes of practice to the Minister for the Constitution and Devolution to approve and lay before Parliament. They are about election spending: one on spending by candidates and one on spending by parties.

Between September and December 2018 we carried out a consultation on the codes. We wanted views from a wide range of stakeholders, and we recognised how important it was that people who will use the codes support them. This paper sets out the feedback we received and how we responded to it. We've used the feedback to make sure the codes are right and clear. In some cases we were not able to make the amendments suggested because the law would need to be changed to allow us to do this. Or because proposed changes were inconsistent with what is in the law.

Overview A code of practice is a legal guidance document. The Representation of the People Act 1983 and the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act 2000 allow us to draft codes giving guidance on candidate and party spending. The Government now needs to ask Parliament to approve the codes. The legislation uses general categories such as 'advertising' and 'unsolicited material to electors' to identify costs that should be included in each category. The codes set out detailed guidance on what is and is not included in these different categories of spending. The codes relate to elections that the UK Parliament is responsible for, i.e. UK Parliamentary, Northern Ireland Assembly and local government elections. In some circumstances they will apply to other elections as well . They will improve transparency, fairness and consistency in reporting for candidates, agents and parties. They will make it clearer to voters and observers what was spent on different activities during campaigns. We're grateful to the many stakeholders who provided feedback on the codes. Overall, people were supportive of our aim for the codes to make it clearer what should be reported as party and candidate spending.

Key themes in the feedback focused on:

- Language and structure of the codes
- Transparency for spending on digital campaigning
- Splitting spending between party and candidate
- Treatment of overheads
- Treatment of costs of items used at several elections
- Treatment of material featuring a prominent party member
- Treatment of legal costs
- Interaction of the codes with other guidance we issue

Why we wrote the codes The codes are written to help parties, candidates and agents meet their legal obligations and improve transparency for voters. Election legislation allows us to prepare legal guidance on what is and is not included in categories of spending listed in the legislation. When in force parties and candidates will need to take the codes into account when they campaign and report spending after an election. If enacted the codes will give clarity to candidates, agents and parties about what items count towards spending and whether spending should be reported in a candidate return or a party return. They also set out how to report spending on digital campaigning. Electoral law is in need of reform to make it clear and easy to understand. In the absence of reform, the codes allow us to provide clarity and consistency in reporting election spending. We therefore urge Parliament to approve the codes.

What elections the codes apply to The codes will apply to elections to: the UK Parliament, Northern Ireland Assembly and local Councils in England. In some circumstances the codes will apply to other elections. We're working on separate codes for elections that the Scottish Parliament and National Assembly for Wales are responsible for – i.e. Scottish Parliamentary, Scottish local government, National Assembly for Wales and Welsh local government elections. The consultation for the Welsh Codes has closed, and the consultation for the Scottish Codes began on 15 April 2020. We are working with the Scottish and Welsh Governments on ensuring these codes are ready for the next set of scheduled elections in 2021.

How we developed the codes We used our experience regulating elections and reviewing financial returns to draw up the codes. We wanted to work collaboratively with people who would either use the codes or had expertise in particular areas. We consulted key stakeholders early in the project. For example, we spoke to parties at meetings of the Parliamentary Parties Panel and the panels for Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. We also got feedback from experts in digital campaigning and the Information Commissioner's Office. As well as inviting written and verbal feedback, during the formal consultation period we: held meetings with parties, and held drop-in sessions in Parliament for MPs. This ensured we received views from a wide range of people. We received 42 responses to the consultation . All the feedback was logged and sorted into key themes. We then started to redraft elements of the codes. While doing this, we met with parties to gather more detail and discuss the key themes. We shared updated drafts of the codes and held a round table with parties of the Westminster Parliamentary Parties Panel. This was very helpful as we were able to talk through the changes in the updated drafts and decide how we could improve the final codes.

Following further feedback from Cabinet Office and political parties we have increased the number of examples and confirmed that these examples will form part of the statutory codes. The additional examples cover: when spending counts towards the candidate or party spending limit campaign material that is distributed across a number of electoral areas situations when party staff are paid to promote particular candidates when costs associated with mobile phones will count towards a limit We have also added clarity to the examples of 'notional spending' where a candidate or agent makes use of items provided by someone else. Key themes identified from the consultation responses

Language and structure We thought carefully about language use and the structure of the codes. We worked to strike a balance between the codes being easy to understand and sufficiently formal to secure the required approval from the UK Parliament for a legal document. Respondents generally thought the codes were too technical, especially for volunteers who may not have a deep understanding of the law. We revised the overall structure of the codes and simplified the language, while maintaining the precision and accuracy a legal document needs. We shortened sentences and used bulleted lists to make the codes easier to read. We changed the introductory sections to help readers understand the legal context of the codes. We also made it clear how the codes will sit with our other guidance.

Transparency for spending on digital campaigning The campaign spending rules apply to all activities, including digital. More information on this can be found in our report ' Digital Campaigning: Increasing transparency for voters '. Election legislation does not have a separate category for reporting spending on digital campaigning. This means spending on digital campaigning has to be reported under existing categories. For example, spending to increase the visibility of an online advert would be reported under advertising. Most feedback recognised that the codes explained how the rules apply to digital activity. When we drafted the codes we included examples of different types of digital campaigning to explain when and under which category they should be reported. We received mixed comments about our approach to this. Some people said more specific examples should be used. A similar number of comments acknowledged that in order to future proof the codes we needed to use more generic examples. People also said that codes should focus equally on digital and non-digital campaigning techniques. We've included references to data analytics and photo licensing. We did this because the feedback said these were relevant and should be included. We also included additional non-digital examples to reflect more traditional methods of campaigning that are still used at elections. Splitting party and candidate spending The codes make clearer what is to be reported as candidate or party spending. The law only allows us to address this in the candidate code. The majority of feedback was supportive of our aim to clarify what should be reported as candidate and party spending. Most responses also set out the practical challenges faced by parties in splitting spending. Other comments related to the principle we adopted. The principle we adopted is, where the candidate or constituency can be identified the spending has to be reported in the candidate return. We received four types of responses on the principle we used: the principle should be expanded to include other types of activity where targeting of material occurs in a constituency asking for more clarification on how the split works in practice and how spending is split across multiple candidates and elections the principle could result in a wide interpretation of what counts as candidate spending how the principle works with the rules on notional spending The codes are based on the definitions of party and candidate spending set out in the law. We are content our drafting in the codes reflects this. We are not able to extend these definitions to include, for example, how adverts are targeted. However, we thought adding more examples would help others understand our position. The additional examples show how the principles in the code apply to splitting spending in different cases. In future we will look at providing further guidance on how to split spending across a number of candidates and elections in other guidance we produce. The large number of possible scenarios mean it's not possible to address all of these in the codes. Notional spending occurs where a candidate or party is given goods or services, towards their campaign, free of charge or at lower cost than their commercial value by supporters. The full value of the notional spending counts towards the spending limit in the same way as actual spending on the campaign. During meetings with respondents we were able to provide clarity about how the principle of splitting spending works with the rules on notional spending. In 2018 there was a criminal case about candidate election spending at the 2015 UK Parliamentary election. During this case, in July 2018 the Supreme Court considered the law on notional spending. Some of the respondents referred to the Supreme Court judgement, concerned that it had changed the interpretation of how notional spending is incurred. We welcome this opportunity to reassure them that this is not the case: the Judgement did not change the law or introduce any new requirements about what candidates and agents must report. Nonetheless, we have produced new guidance on notional spending to further explain how the rules work in practice. And while we don't have the power to add further clarity to this decision in the codes, we are confident that the codes will support candidates and agents in understanding what costs they need to report. We asked people if the codes could have any other consequences for the candidate and party spending rules. A small number of responses referred to the existing spending limits at elections. One comment was that if more types of spending had to be reported in candidates' returns the current spending limit was too low. At this time we do not think the codes will have a big impact on spending limits. We will keep this issue under review. Treatment of overheads The codes give examples of overhead costs directly connected to campaigning such as electricity, phone and accommodation costs. The candidate code has a separate heading for these types of costs. This is because the law has a specific category, called 'accommodation and administration'. The law on party spending does not have this category. Overheads form part of the spending in each category in the legislation, and the codes reflect this. We recognise however that these costs may be reported as a lump sum. There were two main types of feedback on overheads: which overhead costs should be included; and how to apportion these costs. The majority of responses talked about the practical difficulties of apportioning overhead costs and asked why certain types of overhead costs were included or excluded. The types of overhead costs we used were based on the types of costs that had been reported at previous elections and referendums. We have now included business rates in the list of items included in overheads in both codes.

We've made it clearer in the party code that it is costs over and above usual overhead costs for the campaign period that need to be reported. We have included an example to help explain this. Treatment of costs of items used at several elections The codes set out how costs of items bought and used at one election and re-used at another election are to be reported. Our view is that the full cost of items that may be reused at another election count towards the spending limit at the first election they are used at. This position has been included in our guidance for some time. Some respondents didn't appear to consider that, in some circumstances, re-use of items by different people is actually notional spending. For example if a candidate is using something that was used by another candidate this is likely to be a donation and notional spending. This is also the case where a party gives a candidate items that have been used at previous elections. We recognise this part of the code gives some advantage to candidates who stood at previous elections. So we've made this principle as narrow as possible. We have limited it to items actually owned by candidates and have excluded notional spending and items previously hired by candidates. Most respondents thought this principle was more problematic for political parties who purchase capital items rather than for candidates. We discussed this at the round-table with the Parties Panel. Some responses said that parties will often buy high value capital items during a campaign period, for example a van or computer system, which are intended to be used at future elections. They said that it did not seem appropriate to account for the full cost of such items only once. In response to this we amended the wording in both codes. They now explain that where an item is bought and used for purposes other than use at an election, the cost of the portion used at the election must be reported. We also added a range of examples to illustrate how this principle applies to different situations including physical items and computer software. Treatment of material featuring a prominent party member When we first drafted the codes we wanted to explain how spending on material that promotes well known members of the party should be reported. We were thinking about situations where, for example, material featuring the party leader is distributed in the area where they are standing for election. The same material might also be distributed outside that constituency, to promote the party more generally. In the codes we used the phrase 'prominent party member' to refer to this type of party member. Our view is that in most cases where material featuring a 'prominent party member' is distributed outside the area in which they are standing, the spending should be reported in the party return. But we also thought that some part of the cost of the material distributed in the constituency in which the prominent party member is standing should be in their candidate return. The majority of the feedback commented on the phrase 'prominent party member' and how it could be open to different interpretations. People asked for clarification on what we meant by the phrase. It was clear it was confusing. We therefore redrafted the wording to make it clearer

that this part of the codes deals with situations where material is distributed outside the constituency in which the person featured in it is standing. We also included some examples to demonstrate the principle. The examples address physical and digital distribution of such material. The costs to be included are limited to the cost of distributing the material in the constituency. Our examples recognise that with digital material these costs may not be quantifiable and therefore may not appear in the candidate return. Treatment of legal costs The consultation draft of the codes set out that the cost of legal advice could be included under a number of different categories of campaign spending in both the candidate and party codes. During meetings with parties we received very helpful feedback on this. It gave us a better understanding of types of legal costs that parties and candidates can incur. It also explained the type and frequency of litigation that candidates can face. Some respondents were concerned that reference to legal costs in the codes could encourage litigation. It could be used as a way of exhausting an opponent's spending limit. We do not want to encourage this type of litigation, and have redrafted this part of the codes to recognise that in most cases the cost of legal advice will not be an election expense, but there may be some circumstances where it might be. Interaction of the codes with other guidance we issue We used the introduction to the codes to explain their purpose and their legal background. Some people said that they found the technical wording and legal references hard to understand. People also wanted more information on how the codes were different to other types of guidance we publish. The codes give detailed guidance on the types of spending that have to be reported in spending returns. They do this by listing what should be reported under each kind of expense. Once approved, the codes will be part of the law. Candidates and parties must have regard to them. If a person is charged with breaking the law on campaign spending, and they can show that they followed the code, this will be a defence in any court case. In this way they are different to other guidance we produce. We have changed the introduction to the codes to make it clear how they differ to other guidance we publish. We have had to keep some of the technical language to reflect the legal nature of the codes and the fact that they will be laid before Parliament. The codes will be supported by other guidance we publish which set out the rules that apply at each election. Conclusion We are grateful for all the feedback we received and support for our aim of the codes to improve consistency and transparency in reporting of party and candidate spending. In response to the feedback we've updated the codes. Where we've not been able to make changes, we've explained why. We've addressed some of the feedback by including additional examples in the codes. These examples show how the principles in the code apply to different scenarios. We're also updating other guidance we produce to cover some areas of feedback that we can't deal with in the codes. This guidance supports the codes. The codes have been submitted to the Minister for the Constitution and Devolution to approve and lay before Parliament. Further information What elections do the codes apply to? Home Elections Act On this page Changes Our role First published: 5 July 2021 Last updated: 2 February 2023 Summary From May 2023, there are changes which aim to provide greater flexibility and choice in how disabled voters are supported to vote at polling stations. These changes apply to local elections in England, Police and Crime Commissioner elections in England and Wales, and general elections in the UK including recall petitions. The changes were applied for the first time at the local elections taking place in 230 areas of England in May 2023. Changes Disabled voters will be able to choose anyone who is over 18 to accompany them in the polling station to help them vote, including carers who may not themselves be eligible to vote at the election. There will also be changes to the assistance available at polling stations. From May 2023, Returning Officers will need to take all reasonable steps to provide support for disabled voters at polling stations. This will improve the range and quality of support available and speed up the process of providing additional support where needed. Our role We have consulted organisations that represent disabled people, electoral administrators, and the Government to update our guidance for electoral administrators. Our guidance will recommend what Returning Officers should make available in polling stations for disabled voters, so that they receive the service they are entitled to. Working alongside partners, we will tell disabled voters about the changes and how to contact the electoral services team at their local council if they need support. Inquiry report: the voting registration process for EU citizens resident in the UK for the 2019 European Parliamentary elections held in the UK | Electoral Commission Search Inquiry report: the voting registration process for EU citizens resident in the UK for the 2019 European Parliamentary elections held in the UK You are in the European Parliamentary elections section Home European Parliamentary elections On this page Our evidence The process for registering to vote for citizens of other EU Member States Promoting awareness of the registration process for citizens of other EU Member States Impact on EU citizens Key dates in the lead-up to the elections Background to the policy and legislation First published: 8 October 2019 Last updated: 8 October 2019 Overview Some citizens of other EU member states living in the UK, who had wanted to vote in the 2019 European Parliamentary elections in the UK, experienced difficulties in ensuring they were registered to vote. Ultimately, this meant that some people who were entitled to vote and wanted to vote in the European Parliamentary elections in the UK were unable to do so. We looked at the registration process for EU citizens resident in the UK in relation to European Parliamentary elections, and what happened in practice before polling day in May 2019 to enable EU citizens to register to vote and vote in the UK. We also gathered evidence on the impact on EU citizens and their ability to register and vote in the European Parliamentary elections in the UK. It sets out in detail: the process for registering to vote for citizens of other EU Member States the background to the policy and the legislation what the Electoral Commission, the UK Government and Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) did to promote awareness of the registration process for EU citizens data about the registration of EU citizens What we found In summary, the feedback and comments we received from EU citizens, their families and elected representatives highlighted three main areas of concern: they had not been aware of the need to complete an additional declaration as well as an application to register to vote. they had not been able to submit a declaration in time before the deadline set in law. they thought they had submitted a declaration in time, but were still not included on the electoral register and were not able to vote. It is not possible to conclusively verify how many were affected. This is because there are no comprehensive data sources available to us or any other body that would tell us how many voters wanted to register and were unable to do so, or tell us how many attended a polling station on 23 May but were not able to be issued with a ballot paper. Data provided by Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) after the elections shows that in the weeks leading up to the deadline more than 400,000 EU citizens submitted a declaration that was received and processed, which meant that they were therefore able to vote in the UK at the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. In total, around 450,000 were registered to vote in these European Parliament elections as a result of returning a declaration (UC1 form). This represents just over a fifth of citizens of other EU Member States who had been included in the May 2019 local government register. Approximately four in five EU citizens (1.7 million) who had previously registered to vote did not submit an additional declaration in time to be registered to vote at the European Parliamentary elections in the UK. Some of these people may have wanted to vote in the UK but were not able to submit the declaration in time before the deadline, although we have no data that allows us to assess how many were in this position. Equally, it is not possible to assess how many of these people opted to vote in the EU Member State where they held citizenship, or actively decided not to vote in the elections at all. Our evidence We have analysed evidence from a wide range of sources to identify the difficulties that some EU citizens in the UK had in registering to vote and submitting their declaration before the legal deadline of 7 May 2019. Our evidence included: calls made and emails sent to our enquiry lines formal complaints made directly to us concerns raised by MPs – via parliamentary questions and correspondence (before and after the elections) about the registration process for EU citizens and EU citizens being unable to vote feedback from members of the Electoral Co-ordination and Advisory Board (ECAB) – a group coordinated by the Electoral Commission and the Cabinet Office (which brings together the 12 Regional Returning Officers from across the UK), on their experiences relating to the registration and participation of EU citizens and what activity they carried out to tell EU citizens what they had to do in order to be able to vote in the European Parliamentary elections feedback from electoral administrators about the challenges they faced in relation to EU citizens registering to vote and voting data from Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) about how many citizens of other EU Member States were registered to vote at the 2019 European Parliamentary elections, and who had been included in the May 2019 local government register. The process for registering to vote for citizens of other EU Member States EU citizens' right to vote Citizens of all EU Member States living in the UK are entitled to register and vote at European Parliamentary elections. This includes EU citizens who are not British, Irish or qualifying Commonwealth citizens. British citizens resident in Gibraltar are entitled to register to vote at European Parliamentary elections in the South West electoral region. Legal requirements for registering to vote EU citizens (other than British citizens, and citizens of the Republic of Ireland, Cyprus and Malta) had to complete and submit an additional declaration if they wanted to vote in the UK at the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections, even if they were already registered to vote for local government elections in the UK. If they preferred, EU citizens living in the UK could choose to vote in the country where they held citizenship instead, and they did not have to submit a declaration in the UK to do so. The deadline for submitting an application and declaration ahead of the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections was midnight on Tuesday 7 May 2019 (12 working days before polling day). This was the same as the deadline for applications by any other eligible citizens to apply to register to vote at the 23 May elections. Practical requirements for registering to vote Applying to register to vote Citizens of other EU Member States could apply online to register to vote in the same way as UK or Commonwealth citizens. If their application was determined successful by the ERO they would be included in the register and able to vote at local government elections. Alternatively, they could download and complete a paper application form, which they would need to submit and ensure was received by their local ERO before the deadline. Paper application forms were available to download from the UK Government's register to vote website. Completing the declaration In addition to applying to register to vote, citizens of other EU Member States also needed to download and complete a paper application form which included the necessary declaration (commonly referred to as a 'UC1' form) in order to be included in the register for European Parliamentary elections. This form was available on our Your Vote Matters website from 2 April 2019. These electors could also have requested a copy of the form from their local ERO, and in many cases would have been sent the form directly by their ERO. They needed to send the signed declaration form to their local ERO. EROs could only determine applications and declarations which they had received by the deadline of midnight on Tuesday 7 May 2019. Electors could not complete and submit this declaration online as the law requires it to include a signature; however, electors could have submitted a scanned copy of the completed form as an attachment to an e-mail. Promoting awareness of the registration process for citizens of other EU

Member States What we did Contacts with Cabinet Office On 9 January 2019 the Commission's chair, Sir John Holmes, had a meeting with Rt Hon David Lidington CBE MP, in his capacity as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and a senior Cabinet Office minister. At this meeting our contingency planning work in relation to scheduled and unscheduled electoral events, including the potential for European Parliamentary elections in the UK, was discussed. Our contingency plans were also the subject of a meeting between our staff and Cabinet Office officials on 25 January 2019. On 6 March 2019 our Chief Executive, Bob Posner, had a meeting with the Minister for the Constitution, Chloe Smith MP. At this meeting, we outlined its intention to publish guidance as part of its contingency planning for potential European Parliamentary elections. Further to these meetings, our Chief Executive wrote on 29 March 2019 to David Lidington about the ongoing uncertainty about whether the European Parliamentary elections would be held in the UK. He highlighted the fixed dates in the electoral timetable and the extent to which this limited the available time for prudent operational and regulatory preparations. In particular, he highlighted the need for the UK Government to provide assurances for Returning Officers about the reimbursement of any reasonable spending by them on contingency preparations. After the date on which the UK had been due to leave the EU, 29 March, the UK Government wrote to Returning Officers on Monday 1 April, confirming that they would be reimbursed for any expenditure on activity necessarily undertaken to prepare for the possibility of a European Parliamentary elections. Guidance and advice to EROs Before any electoral event, we provide guidance and advice to ROs and EROs to support and encourage their provision of a high quality service for voters. In addition, the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board (a UK-wide body which is co-chaired by us and Cabinet Office, which brings together key stakeholders from across the electoral community, including the 12 Regional Returning Officers) held a series of teleconferences in the lead up to the European Parliamentary elections to review contingency planning for the then unconfirmed poll. The first of these teleconferences took place on 11 March 2019. The registration and participation of EU citizens was raised formally as an issue at the ECAB teleconference on 29 March 2019. We provided additional support to electors and electoral administrators by amending the existing UC1 form with supplementary information such as new deadlines and qualifying EU member states since the last polls, and circulated guidance on registering EU citizens to all EROs and ROs on 4 April 2019, advising EROs on sending declaration forms to EU citizens. Direct public awareness activity We have a statutory duty to promote public awareness of electoral systems (and connected matters). Each year, we run a voter registration campaign ahead of scheduled elections to make sure that eligible voters are aware of the need to be registered, and also that they know there is a deadline by which they need to do this. While we maintain contingency plans for unscheduled polls, the late confirmation that the 2019 European Parliamentary elections would be held in the UK significantly reduced our planning and set up time. We would normally run a campaign for a scheduled poll of this significance over a period of four to six weeks – and it would have been many months in the planning – but due to the late announcement and enabling by government of these elections proceeding, we only had two and a half weeks from launch to the registration deadline. Activity to raise awareness with citizens of other EU Member States During those two and a half weeks, we ran a mass campaign, delivered through TV advertising, to reach as many eligible voters as possible. This was supported by targeted digital advertising to reach our under-registered groups. These are primarily those who have recently moved house, and those aged 18-34. Additionally, in this case, that included those who had not had local elections earlier in May. As well as promoting awareness among UK and eligible Commonwealth citizens ahead of the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections, we used our own channels and platforms to promote the need for citizens of other EU Member States to complete the UC1 declaration if they wanted to vote in the UK. This included promoting messages on our social media channels , providing information on our yourvotematters.co.uk website , and producing a briefing pack for local authorities and other partner organisations to help them carry out their own awareness work. One of our Twitter posts on 24 April, which reminded EU citizens to submit their declaration forms, was retweeted over 1,500 times and liked over 800 times. The UC1 form itself was added to the ‘What does the European Parliament do?’ page of our Your Vote Matters website on 2 April. This was followed by additional information for EU citizens in mid-April highlighting the need to complete an additional form. This content was in line with that provided to EU citizens in 2014. We also proactively promoted those resources through an edition of our Roll Call newsletter on 30 April, through our ‘Delivering Democracy’ Facebook group with local authorities (where it was seen by well over 100 members), and directly with a variety of organisations relevant to citizens of other EU Member States in the UK. This included contacting 24 Member State Embassies. What the UK Government did The UK Government was responsible for the design and messaging on the register to vote website. This included information and messages for citizens of other EU Member States who wanted to vote at the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections in the UK. On 10 April the Cabinet Office Minister made the legislation which set the date of polling day for the 2019 European Parliamentary elections in the UK. Once that legislation had been made, the Cabinet Office updated the information provided on the landing page of the register to vote website to include messaging for citizens of other EU Member States who wanted to vote. The link to ‘about voting in the European Parliament elections if you’re an EU citizen living in the UK ’ took users to the GOV.UK European Parliament page . This contained a more detailed explanation of how to register to vote, and included a link to the Your Vote Matters website page where users could download what was described as the ‘ European Parliament voter registration form ’. We understand that the Cabinet Office considered whether it would be possible to improve navigation and develop additional functionality for the register to vote website, once it had become clear that the UK would take part in the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. This included considering how to allow citizens of other EU Member States who applied to register to vote through the website to also receive the UC1 form directly. However, officials concluded that there was not enough time to develop, appropriately test, and implement this functionality in the period available. Cabinet Office also considered adding new messaging for citizens of other EU Member States within the user journey for people applying to register to vote online. Officials concluded that it would not be possible to add this without displaying the message to all users when it was relevant to only EU citizens – which they estimated to be about 10% of total applicants. Cabinet Office has reported that there were 235,382 views of the GOV.UK European Parliament page, 25% of which came directly from the link on the Register to Vote homepage. What Electoral Registration Officers did Activity by EROs We asked the Regional Returning Officers for feedback on their experiences relating to the registration and participation of EU citizens. We also asked them about the activity EROs in their electoral region carried out to tell EU citizens what they had to do in order to be able to vote in the European Parliamentary elections. The Association of s also sent out a post-election survey to its members to ask them what they did. Most responses included reference to their local authority working hard to send out forms, and complete follow up actions as soon as the polls had been confirmed, but also that the process was difficult and restricted due to the timing and the legislation around EU electors. Some examples of what EROs did, included: emails and/or letters sent to all eligible EU nationals telling them that they were eligible to vote in the European Parliamentary elections and that they had to complete and return the UC1 form if they wanted to vote in the UK follow up reminder emails and letters providing all the necessary information, including clear instructions on when EU citizens had to complete and return the UC1 form by, on council websites and related social media targeting messaging to areas with known high concentrations of EU citizens Sending out UC1 forms After the elections we contacted EROs across the UK to ask them to tell us how many UC1 forms they had sent to citizens of other EU Member States who were already registered as local government electors. This indicates that approximately 2.4 million forms were sent out. However, it is not clear that these are all forms sent out to unique electors and it is likely that the figure includes some reminders issued by ERO. We also asked when the forms were sent to electors and the majority of EROs were able to provide this breakdown. However, the data we have received (see chart below) commonly relates to when EROs sent forms to be printed and then dispatched – not when they were directly posted to electors. The data we have received suggests that more than three quarters of all forms had been sent for print and dispatch by 18 April 2019. That is within the two week period after the Commission had emailed EROs to remind them of the need to contact citizens of other EU Member States. Chart 1: UC1 forms: Dates of print and dispatch Feedback from EROs and electoral administrators indicates that, where they held email addresses, some EROs decided to send copies of the UC1 form by email to citizens of other EU Member States who were already included in the local government register. If these emails were recorded as undelivered, they then sent a hard copy form to the elector at their registered address. Feedback from EROs on the challenges they faced After the elections we asked electoral administrations to give us feedback on their experience of running the European Parliamentary elections, and to tell us about any challenges they faced in relation to EU citizens registering to vote and voting. Many of those who responded to our survey talked about the impact of the period of uncertainty about whether the elections would go ahead in the UK, and the late confirmation that it would be held. Where local elections were also held in May, administrators told us they were under considerable pressure and in some instances unable to send UC1 forms to EU citizens as early as they would have wanted or follow up non-responders as they would have done in previous polls. Other issues included: there was a lack of understanding by EU citizens of what they had to do in order to be able to vote UC1 forms were returned after the deadline or with errors some administrators experienced blame on polling day when EU citizens realised that they were unable to vote electoral management software was not 100% up to speed to cope with the volume and processing of UC1s. Impact on EU citizens How many EU citizens were included in the register After the elections we contacted EROs across the UK to ask them to give us information about how many citizens of other EU Member States were registered to vote at the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. We also asked for information about the number of citizens of other EU Member States who had been included in the May 2019 local government register. European Parliamentary electoral data and information from EROs about citizens of other EU Member States This shows that approximately 450,000 (21%) of citizens of other EU Member States who had been included in the May 2019 local government register were also registered to vote in the European Parliamentary elections in the UK on 23 May 2019. This proportion varied considerably across individual local authority areas, although three quarters of all EROs who returned data to us reported that between 10% and 30% of citizens of other EU Member States who had been included in the May local government register were also registered to vote in the European Parliamentary elections in the UK on 23 May 2019. We cannot know how many of those who were not registered to vote at the European Parliamentary elections in the UK may have wanted to vote in the UK but were not able to submit the declaration in time before the deadline. Equally, it is not possible to assess how many of these people opted to vote in the EU Member State where they held citizenship, or actively decided not to vote in the election at all. Overall, an estimated 37.2% of all registered electors turned out to vote at the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections in the UK. Turnout at the European Parliamentary elections in the UK in 2014 was 35.4%. Comparison with the 2014 European Parliamentary elections Our estimates of the completeness of the local government electoral registers have found that citizens from other EU Member States are less likely to have complete electoral register entries (i.e. be included in the register at their current address) than UK citizens. In Great Britain, the rate of completeness among citizens of other EU Member States was estimated to be 54% in December 2018 (similar to the 53% we found in February/March 2014). This compares to 86% for UK and Irish citizens in December 2018. After the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections we asked EROs to tell us how many citizens of other EU Member States had been added to the register of European Parliamentary electors through the interim notices of alteration to the registers (in the weeks before the registration deadline). We received data covering all but five areas, which showed that approximately 400,000 citizens of other EU Member States were added to the registers ahead of the 2019 elections. Figures from 2014, when 29 EROs were unable to provide data to us, shows that approximately 325,000 citizens of other EU Member States were added to the registers ahead of the May 2014 European Parliamentary elections. However, drawing any comparison between the 2014 and 2019 data is difficult because of the different levels of non-response from EROs, the increase in the absolute number of eligible EU citizens in the UK between 2014 and 2019, and the earlier issue of UC1 forms in 2014 (which might have meant that more electors were added to the register of European Parliamentary electors in the period before the interim notices of alteration). The reasons why some EU citizens were unable to vote We have looked at evidence from a wide range of sources where concerns were raised about EU citizens being unable to vote in the May 2019 in the UK European Parliamentary elections. These sources included: 149 calls made and emails sent directly to the Electoral Commission's enquiry line 618 formal complaints raised directly with the Electoral Commission - we looked at a sample of these complaints which confirmed that they matched the findings from our other data sources concerns raised by MPs – via parliamentary questions and correspondence - before and after the elections raising the issue of EU citizens not being able to register to vote and vote We found that the reasons why some EU citizens were unable to vote fell into three main areas. It is also likely that some citizens of other EU Member States may have chosen to vote in the country where they held citizenship, either because this is something they have previously done or because they did not think that the UK would take part in the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. However, there is no available data on the number of people who actually chose this option. EU citizens who were not aware of the declaration requirement EU citizens who were not aware of the declaration requirement The most frequently cited concern was that some citizens of other EU

Member States were not aware that they needed to complete an additional declaration in order to be included in the register of European Parliamentary electors. This accounted for over half of the queries that we received from EU citizens and most of those we received from a family member on their behalf. It included people who: had successfully completed an application to register to vote (as a local government elector), but did not realise that a further declaration was needed to be able to vote in the European Parliamentary elections in the UK said that the acknowledgement that confirmed they were registered to vote as a local government elector did not tell them that a further declaration was needed, and therefore assumed that this meant they were also registered to vote in European Parliamentary elections in the UK had received a declaration form from their ERO, but didn't understand that they needed to complete it to be able to vote in the European Parliamentary elections in the UK EU citizens who had not submitted a declaration in time EU citizens who had not submitted a declaration in time A smaller number of queries were from citizens of other EU Member States who had understood that they would need to complete a separate declaration in order to be included in the register of European Parliamentary electors, but were unable to submit it before the deadline on 7 May 2019. This included people who: said that they had not received a declaration form from their ERO but found out about the requirement from another source; had downloaded, completed and submitted the form by post, but found it had not been received by the ERO before the deadline said that they had not received a declaration form from their ERO but found out about it from contacting their ERO regarding other issues but too late to be able to submit the declaration had received a declaration form from their ERO, but had not had enough time to complete and submit it by post to the ERO before the deadline EU citizens who submitted a declaration in time but were still unable to vote EU citizens who submitted a declaration in time but were still unable to vote Around a sixth of queries, almost all received directly from citizens of other EU Member States, highlighted that they had been able to complete and submit a declaration before the deadline on 7 May 2019, but found they were still unable to vote. This included people who: had completed and submitted the declaration form by email or by using an online service, but said that the ERO would not accept a submission in that way believed that they had completed and submitted the declaration form by post before the deadline, but said that the ERO claimed they had not received the form by the deadline believed that they had completed and submitted the declaration form by post before the deadline, but said that they were not included in the register of European Parliamentary electors on polling day because of a clerical error by the ERO. Key dates in the lead-up to the elections Key dates in the lead-up to the elections 2019 European Parliamentary elections: chronology of events Date Event July 2014 We publish a report on the administration of the May 2014 European Parliamentary elections in the UK. The report highlights the need to simplify the registration process for citizens of other EU Member States in time for the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. November 2014 The House of Commons Political and Constitutional Reform Committee publishes Fourth Report of Session 2014-15, Voter engagement in the UK. It recommends that we should run a specific campaign aimed at Commonwealth citizens and citizens of other EU Member States resident in the UK on eligibility and how to register to vote. It also recommends that we should bring forward proposals for simplifying the process for EU citizens living in the UK to register to vote at European Parliamentary elections promptly, so that changes can be made before the next elections in 2019. December 2014 Our staff attend initial meeting with Cabinet Office officials on registration process for EU citizens along with members of other representative groups. January 2015 UK Government responds to European Commission request for information about how it plans to remedy the electoral registration difficulties encountered by some EU citizens living in the UK at the May 2014 European Parliamentary elections. We understand that the UK Government informed the European Commission that it intended to remedy these issues through legislation or practice, with the aim of having a solution in place before the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. February 2015 UK Government publishes response to Political and Constitutional Affairs Committee's report on Voter engagement in the UK, confirming that 'Cabinet Office plans further discussions with us and other electoral stakeholders on the registration process for EU citizens to consider ways to simplify the process for EU citizens living in the UK to register to vote at EP and local elections'. 7 May 2015 UK Parliamentary general election: polling day. 23 June 2016 European Union referendum: polling day. 16 March 2017 European Union (Notification of Withdrawal) Act receives Royal Assent. 29 March 2017 UK Government issues notice of the UK's withdrawal from the EU under Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union. The default EU exit date under Article 50 is defined as 29 March 2019, before the next scheduled European Parliamentary elections in May 2019. 8 June 2017 UK Parliamentary general election: polling day. 13 July 2017 The UK Government introduces the European Union (Withdrawal) Bill. This includes from 'exit day' the repealing of legislation governing the UK's participation in European Parliamentary elections (i.e. the European Parliamentary Elections Act 2002 and the European Parliament (Representation) Act 2003). The Bill also includes delegated powers enabling the repeal of other relevant provisions through secondary legislation. 27 March 2018 We receive confirmation that our 2018-19 budget bid had been approved by Speaker's Committee, including contingency funding for possible European Parliamentary elections in May 2019. 14 May 2018 Minister for the Constitution Chloe Smith MP confirms in replying to a written Parliamentary Question that the UK will not be taking part in the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. The Minister states that the UK Government therefore does not intend to make an Order setting the date of the poll for the European Parliamentary elections in 2019; nor will it undertake the usual preparations for Information Exchange between the UK and the Member States in respect of EU citizens (including UK citizens) living in another Member State. The Minister also confirms that the UK Government has written to every local authority Returning Officer to inform them of the cancellation of the 2019 European Parliamentary election in the UK. 31 May 2018 Minister for the Constitution Chloe Smith MP writes to Sir John Holmes, Chair of the Electoral Commission, expressing the UK Government's view that 'it would not be prudent for money to be spent preparing for elections that the Government is clear will not take place'. 26 June 2018 The European Union (Withdrawal) Bill receives Royal Assent. Schedule 9 provides for the repeal of the two main Acts governing the conduct of European Parliamentary elections: the European Parliamentary Elections Act 2002 and the European Parliament (Representation) Act 2003. However, these repealing provisions would only commence on 'exit day', then defined as 29 March 2019. 3 December 2018 The European Parliamentary Elections Etc. (Repeal, Revocation, Amendment and Saving Provisions) (United Kingdom and Gibraltar) (EU Exit) Regulations 2018 are made. The Regulations provide for the repeal or revocation of all provisions not included in the 2002 Act and the 2003 Act in relation to the franchise and the registration of electors in respect of European Parliamentary elections in the UK and Gibraltar and in relation to the conduct and administration of those elections, including provisions in respect of election expenditure in the UK and Gibraltar. They would come into force on 'exit day'. 15 January 2019 House of Commons votes against UK Government's Withdrawal Agreement in the first 'meaningful vote'. 23 January 2019 Regulated period for political parties and non-party campaigners begins. 11 March 2019 First weekly teleconference of the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board. 12 March 2019 House of Commons votes against UK Government's Withdrawal Agreement in the second 'meaningful vote'. 28 March 2019 We receive confirmation that its 2019-20 budget bid had been approved by Speaker's Committee, including contingency funding for possible European Parliamentary elections in May 2019. 21 March 2019 The European Council agrees to an extension of Article 50, meaning Brexit will no longer happen on 29 March 2019. The extension will be until 22 May 2019, provided the Withdrawal Agreement is approved the following week. If not the European Council agrees to an extension until 12 April 2019 and expects the UK to indicate a way forward before this date for consideration by the European Council. 29 March 2019 House of Commons votes against UK Government's Withdrawal Agreement in the third 'meaningful vote'.

Our Chief Executive, Bob Posner, writes to Cabinet Minister David Lidington highlighting the ongoing uncertainty about whether the European Parliamentary elections will be held in the UK and on the need for assurances to Returning Officers that they will be reimbursed for any reasonable spending on contingency preparations.

1 April 2019 Cabinet Minister David Lidington writes to Returning Officers: 'Cabinet Office is therefore confirming that Returning Officers will be reimbursed in the usual way for any expenditure on activity that is necessarily undertaken, at this stage and in the coming weeks, to prepare for the possibility of European Parliamentary elections on Thursday 23 May 2019'. 4 April 2019 We advise Electoral Registration Officers on the sending of UC1 declaration forms to EU citizens. 8 April 2019 European Parliamentary Elections (Appointed Day of Poll) Order 2019 made and laid (came into force on 10 April 2019). 10 April 2019 The UK and EU27 agree a further extension of Article 50 until 31 October 2019, with the possibility of leaving earlier if the Withdrawal Agreement is ratified by both parties before this date. The conclusions state that 'If the UK is still a Member of the EU on 23-26 May 2019 and if it has not ratified the Withdrawal Agreement by 22 May 2019, it must hold the elections to the European Parliament in accordance with Union law. If the United Kingdom fails to live up to this obligation, the withdrawal will take place on 1 June 2019'. 12 April 2019 Deadline for receiving electoral registration applications for 2 May local council and mayoral elections (midnight). 2 May 2019 Local council and mayoral elections (England and Northern Ireland): polling day. 6 May 2019 Bank holiday across UK. 7 May 2019 Cabinet Minister David Lidington confirms the UK will take part in European Parliamentary elections on 23 May. Deadline for receiving electoral registration applications for European Parliamentary elections (midnight).

Deadline for receipt of UC1 declaration forms (midnight). 8 May 2019 Cabinet Minister David Lidington confirms it is no longer possible for Parliament to legislate to cancel European Parliamentary elections. 23 May 2019 European Parliamentary elections (UK and Gibraltar): polling day. Background to the policy and legislation Background to the policy and legislation In 1992, the Maastricht Treaty extended the right to vote and stand as a candidate at European Parliamentary and local government elections in each EU Member State to citizens of other Member States who were resident there. Citizens of Cyprus and Malta were already entitled to vote in European Parliamentary elections in the UK by virtue of their status as Commonwealth citizens. A European Council directive set out the detailed arrangements for the exercise of the right to vote at European Parliamentary elections: citizens of other EU Member States should have to complete the same process as national citizens in each country to register to vote, but they would also need to submit an additional declaration stating that they would only exercise their right to vote in the Member State where they were living. The UK Parliament subsequently legislated for this declaration requirement, which would only be valid for 12 months after submission.

Changes to legislation before 2014

In 2001, the UK Parliament approved changes to the declaration process for citizens of other Member States to be included in the register for European Parliamentary elections in the UK, to reflect the introduction of rolling electoral registration. Under the new system, eligible citizens could apply to register to vote at any time of the year and would be added to the register by updates published at the beginning of each month. This meant that there was now a deadline for registration applications ahead of any election at 12 working days before polling day. The same deadline would apply to declarations by citizens of other EU Member States ahead of European Parliamentary elections. In 2013, the UK Parliament approved changes to the requirements and process for registering to vote in Great Britain, to move to a system of individual electoral registration. This system had already been introduced in Northern Ireland, since 2003. From June 2014 in England and Wales, September 2014 in Scotland, and June 2018 in Northern Ireland, citizens could also apply to register to vote using an online service. This included citizens of EU Member States applying to register to vote in local government elections. Parliament did not change the requirements for applications and declarations by citizens of other EU Member States to be included in the register of European Parliamentary electors following the introduction of individual electoral registration or online registration. The online service was not configured to allow citizens of other Member States to submit the additional application and declaration needed to be included in the register of European Parliamentary electors.

The 2014 European Parliamentary elections

In our statutory election report published in July 2014, we highlighted that citizens of other EU Member States living in the UK had experienced problems at the May 2014 European Parliamentary elections. We found that a significant number of citizens of other EU Member States resident and registered to vote in the UK who wanted to vote in the UK at the May 2014 European Parliamentary elections were unable to. This was because they had not successfully completed the necessary declaration. We said that we would work with the UK Government, EROs and organisations representing citizens of other EU Member States in the UK to identify what could be done to simplify the system and remove unnecessary administrative barriers to participation, so that this problem did not affect electors at the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. In particular, we said that we would consider whether legislation could be changed so that in future, citizens of other EU Member States did not need to complete more than one electoral registration form to be able to vote at European Parliamentary elections in the UK. We said that we would make any recommendations to the UK Government in sufficient time for any changes to legislation to be introduced ahead of the 2019 European Parliamentary elections.

During autumn 2014 we were able to begin productive discussions with representative groups such as the New Europeans campaign group. These discussions aimed to analyse the problems with electoral registration for citizens of other EU Member States living in the UK, and to begin the process of identifying proposals for changes to the process for future European Parliamentary elections. During these discussions we identified that UK electoral law would need to be changed to make the improvements that would be needed. This meant the UK Government would need to develop and introduce new legislation. In December 2014 our staff attended an initial meeting with Cabinet Office officials to discuss options for resolving this issue, along with members of groups representing citizens of other EU Member States living in the UK. The UK Government indicated in February 2015 that it planned further discussions with the Commission and other stakeholders on the registration process for EU citizens, but no such discussions were held. Immediately after the June 2015 UK Parliamentary general election the Government introduced legislation to hold a referendum on the UK's membership of the EU. Following the result of the June 2016 referendum, the UK Government issued notice of the UK's withdrawal from the EU under Article 50 of the Treaty on European Union, with a default exit date defined as 29 March 2019. The UK Government made clear that the UK would not be required to take part in the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. Andy O'Neill (AON) gave apologies from those unable to attend. Minutes of 15 June 2018 The minutes from the previous meeting were approved and action points from those picked up as follows: Chris Highcock (CH) apologised for not raising with Returning Officers the parties' desire to be informed of polling place reviews at the HQ level but would rectify this as soon as possible. Maria McCann (MMc) had promised Inclusion Scotland a flexible approach in regard to timing of engagement with prospective candidates and encouraged candidates to get in touch with Inclusion Scotland at an early stage. (AON) said that the Electoral Commission had promised to help raise the profile of the Access to elected office fund and the access charter and had discussed it at the last meeting of the Scottish Advisory Group. The Commission would continue to highlight the initiatives in the future.

Scottish Government update (MMcC) apologised for the late circulation of the report on ballot paper ordering for local government elections. The consultation analysis of their earlier consultation on electoral reform and the Scottish Government response had now been published. She said there were likely to be two Bills arising from the consultation; Electoral Reform and Franchise and would include some technical matters, such as transferring oversight of some of the Electoral Commission responsibilities to the Scottish Parliament. A further update would be provided at the next meeting. (MMcC) said the Franchise Bill would likely include provisions to extend the franchise for Scottish Parliament and Local Government elections to everyone resident in Scotland and would be brought forward following a separate consultation on prisoner voting. This is in line with the recommendation made in the Scottish Parliament's Equalities and Human Rights Committee's report on prisoner voting to consult widely on any proposed change. She encouraged everyone to respond to the consultation once published. Liz Ure (LU) introduced the paper circulated prior to the meeting on candidate ordering for local government election ballot papers. Following responses to the consultation on electoral reform, undertaken between December 2017 and March 2018, Scottish Government proposed exploring a move to a system of randomisation for local government election ballot papers. The current proposal would be to have a single fixed version of the ballot paper for each ward, with the order of candidates being determined by the drawing of lots to avoid alphabetical bias. She said they were keen to hear all views, particularly from the parties most directly affected and it was proposed to test the suggested changes prior to introduction. There was a discussion on the merits of this (and other) options as well as the drawbacks and how each might impact on parties, voters and administrators. (MMcC) thanked the members for their input. (AON) said the Electoral Commission expected to be instructed to undertake a consultation exercise to look at the impact of any change on voters. Scotland Office update Annual Canvass Reform - Alastair Noble (AN) spoke about the Consultation jointly published by the UK, Scottish and Welsh Governments which proposed measures to reform the annual canvass and closed 30 November 2018. The UK Government was taking forward some statutory instruments which will affect legislation on elections. One of these will exempt disability-related expenses for candidates from electoral spending limits. The statutory instrument (SI), as drafted, will cover candidates standing for general Parliamentary elections across the UK; including by-elections. It was envisaged that the SI will be in force for local government elections in May 2019, similar provision was already in place for Scottish Parliament and Scottish local Government elections. Another SI to be laid would make regulations to amend legislation relating to European Parliament elections to amend the legislation in the light of the UK's exit from the European Union. These have now been cleared by the Sifting Committees in the UK Parliament which concluded that it was appropriate for the instrument to be subject to the negative procedure, i.e. without the need to be debated. Boundary Review – (AN) said they received (in September) the final report of the Boundary Commission for Scotland as part of the review of UK Parliament constituencies. The other Commissions had also submitted their recommendations to the UK Government and the reports were laid before Parliament and made publicly available on 10 September. Following this, under the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986, the Government was required to bring forward draft Orders in Council to give effect to the recommendations contained in the reports. The Orders were currently being drafted. The Orders must be approved by both Houses of Parliament for the recommendations to be adopted. If the Orders were accepted by both Houses, the recommendations would take effect at the next UK Parliamentary General Election. Scottish Boundary Commissions update Colin Wilson (CW) thanked (AN) for covering the update on the 2018 Review of UK Parliament constituencies and said he would address the Local Government Boundary Commission for Scotland. Scottish Ministers had agreed to adopt the Commission's recommendations to amend the boundary between Glasgow City council area and North Lanarkshire council area at Cardowan. An Order would now be drafted for the Scottish Parliament to implement the boundary changes. Following the commencement of The Islands Act the Commission had begun work on the Islands review to allow the use of 1, 2, 3 or 4 member wards. He reported that the Commission had met with the CNES, Orkney and Shetland Islands councils for initial discussions but the review would officially start later this year. The Commission expected to begin the Island review of Argyll and Bute, Highland and North Ayrshire council areas in 2019. The Commission would also consider the need for interim reviews in advance of 2011 local government elections. He said the Commissions websites were currently being updated to make information easier to find. In response to (SM)'s question about areas where reviews were not accepted, (CW) said the first step would be to look at which wards were out of step as there was a rolling timetable in place to consider those. EMB update on electoral registration and electoral administration matters Chris Highcock (CH) confirmed that the new Convener of the Electoral Management Board (EMB) was now in post, appointed 1 July 2018 and progressing work to support EROs and ROs around consistency of approach and best practice in support of the voter. There were some general concerns to address due to the recent high level of turnover in Returning Officers and their deputies which has eroded the experience and capacity of electoral administrations. The priority is to address this, ensuring that there are the skills and resources available to deliver an electoral event. Although the next scheduled election is not due until 2021, ROs needed to plan for that specific while maintaining preparedness for any unscheduled event election which may be called prior to this date, including by-elections. (CH) reminded everyone that the period of the 5 yearly review of polling arrangements commenced on 1 October and local authorities would be consulting formally with electors and other stakeholders. The reviews would need to be completed within the next 18 months but most authorities are undertaking them within the coming six months. In response to (PM)'s question about the calling of a 'snap' election, (CH) said elections teams were always ready to deliver an electoral event but conceded that a UK Parliament 'snap' election which had to be run on the new boundaries would be challenging as a degree of effort would be required to address inconsistencies in boundaries and polling arrangements. Electoral Commission update Consultation on Code of Conduct for Electoral Observers – Martin McKeown (MMcK) said research indicated the scheme had largely worked well over the last ten years but a number of changes had been identified which would improve it. The consultation paper asked specific questions in relation to our proposals and closed on 31 October; feedback on the operation of the scheme would be welcomed. Police Scotland Training Event – (MMcK) said there had been a high turnover in officers filling the role of SPOC for electoral events across the divisions of Police Scotland and it had been decided to hold a training event on 29 October hosted by the Commission with Police Scotland and the Electoral Management Board. This would be an opportunity to bring people together, set the background to elections and to focus on integrity and malpractice issues. (CH) said the list of SPOCs was available on the EMB website and said he would circulate a link. Protecting the debate: Intimidation, Influence and Information of candidates – (MMcK) said the Electoral Commission published its' response to the consultation on 15/10 in which we support creating electoral sanctions for intimidating candidates and campaigners; simplifying the law on undue influence and making imprints on digital campaign material a legal requirement. Review of party descriptions – Roisin McDaid (RMcD) said the Electoral Commission had begun a review of party descriptions, starting with the Northern Ireland register, to ensure that the identity of the party was clear from its registered descriptions. This followed from the Commission's earlier clarification of the definition of party description. Upon completion of the NI register review, a review would commence on the GB register. She said a letter would go out shortly to each of the parties informing them and giving some more information on the review. Parties were encouraged to speak to the Commission if they had any questions or concerns about the process. Any parties affected by the review would have an opportunity to make representation to the Commission. Consultation on Codes of Practice on Election Spending – (RMcD) said the Commission had issued two draft codes; one for candidate spending and the other for political party spending at a UKPGE, setting out what is and isn't included in the categories of spending for elections that are listed in the legislation and give guidance on the cases and circumstances when spending will be regarded as for the purposes of a candidate's election. The aims in preparing the codes were to provide guidance for candidates about what items of spending counted towards the spending limits and were to be reported and to provide clarity to political parties and candidates about when spending should be in a candidate return and when it should be in a political party return. The draft codes would apply primarily to UK Parliamentary elections (unless there was a combined regulated period). She encouraged parties to respond to the consultation which closed on 4 December 2018. It was noted that the Commission was in discussion with Scottish Government on how similar codes might be developed for Scottish Parliamentary and Scottish Local Government elections. (MMcC) noted that Scottish Government was considering how codes for these elections could be developed. Modernising guidance project – (AON) said the Electoral Commission was working closely with the contractor (Numiko) who is building the new website and had produced a proof of concept using the nominations guidance. Work was now starting on the RO guidance and guidance on spending and donations. The aim was to put draft guidance in the new format out for comment next year, after the May 2019 polls so it could be tested with users. Dates for 2019 meetings As dates could not be agreed at the meeting, (AON) said he would circulate further options to members. AOCB As there was no other competent business, the meeting was adjourned. Objective: Accessible registration and voting | Electoral Commission Search Objective: Accessible registration and voting You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 On this page What we are working to achieve Work done to achieve this Performance indicators Ongoing and future work First published: 14 September 2023 Last updated: 27 September 2023 What we are working to achieve Free and fair elections depend on all people who are eligible and want to vote being able to do so. With this goal, we are striving to: increase levels of voter registration, especially amongst groups that currently have difficulty engaging in the process remove barriers, especially those that affect people who currently have difficulty trying to cast their vote. We are working to achieve these outcomes through collaboration with policy makers and other partners to identify barriers to participation and propose solutions. We are directly supporting people who have difficulty engaging in the process, with tailored accessible information and learning resources, and targeted public awareness activity. United Response quote We greatly valued being able to feed in to the guidance for to ensure that these changes were made as accessible as possible for disabled people. United Response Work done to achieve this Our latest evidence shows that between 8-9 million people in Great Britain are either missing or incorrectly registered. As well as advocating for registration reform, ahead of the elections, we ran a voter registration campaign to encourage the public to ensure they were correctly registered ahead of the deadline. This was supported by our Your Vote is Yours Alone campaign, which raises awareness of voter fraud and how voters can protect their vote. Planning and implementing measures in the Elections Act has been a priority for the Commission. The legislation includes measures that impact voters directly, some of which came into force at the 2023 local elections taking place in parts of England. Ensuring voters are aware of the changes is fundamental to supporting their confidence and participation in our electoral system. We prepared for the introduction of the voter ID requirement. In January, the Commission launched a wide-reaching public awareness campaign aimed at raising awareness of the requirement and reminding the public to bring it with them when they voted. Our work helped voters understand which forms of ID can be used and supported those without an accepted form of ID to understand how and when to apply for free ID. We worked with local councils and civil society organisations to support those less likely to have an accepted form of ID, so that they were aware of the free ID and applied in time. The Commission ran a thorough consultation on the new accessibility measures before drafting its guidance, working closely with charities and organisations representing disabled voters. We also shared details with disabled voters of the new accessibility rules, which increase the range of assistance available to them in the polling station. Within the scope of our role, we continued to work with local authorities, police, and parliamentarians to protect the system against electoral fraud. This included running, with the National Police Chiefs Council, the annual conference of Single Points of Contact within police forces that lead on fraud, and engaging with Lord Hayward on his secrecy of the ballot Private Members' Bill. These campaigns and voter communication around the Digital Registration Number, helped to support the successful delivery of the local elections in Northern Ireland. Our learning work aims to promote greater consistency in political literacy education and increase political knowledge and understanding amongst young people. Over 220 schools signed up to take part in Welcome to Your Vote Week in January. Lee Rowley There are few tasks more important in public life than maintaining the trust of the British public in our electoral institutions and our electoral processes. A huge amount of work is under way, and that will continue until May. I am grateful to officials, to the Electoral Commission and to councils up and down the land for the work that they are doing. Lee Rowley, UK minister responsible for elections, February 2023 Performance indicators Indicator Target 2022-23 Additions to electoral registers during our voter registration campaigns meet or exceed our targets 379,810 for 2022/2023 280,498* The target for voter registration was not met this year. There are a number of factors that could have negatively impacted this KPM, some of which were external and some relate to the campaign including target setting itself. Notably, there was a reduction in campaign spend ahead of these elections and in the early awareness-raising phase. Since the polls, we have reviewed all data to ensure ongoing efficacy of our advertising, and our target-setting processes, to take these insights into account in planning future campaigns. Ongoing and future work We will be evaluating the May 2023 public awareness campaigns for voter ID and registration, to identify learnings and opportunities for improvement. We will be refreshing the creative approach to our voter registration campaign in time for the May 2024 elections. With the support of civil society partners, we will evaluate the tailored information we co-created for each key group most likely to be impacted by the new voter ID requirements. This will include refining resources to make them suitable for future years and identifying any gaps in our provision. In the autumn, we will publish election reports for England and Northern Ireland, reflecting on how the May 2023 elections were run and recommending changes where necessary. This will include an assessment of the implementation of the new voter ID and polling station accessibility provisions. We will work to prepare voters, administrators and the wider electoral community for further changes coming from the Elections Act, including updating guidance for those responsible for implementing the changes. This will include an extension to the franchise through changes to the overseas voter rules. We will pilot the inclusion of accessibility information as part of the online election information we provide, including our online polling station finder. This will further reduce pressure on local councils. If successful, we will roll this out throughout the UK. We will continue to extend our 'youth voice' work, building on our current activity in England, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales to ensure our work on registration and voting reflects the needs and views of young people. We will continue to maintain contingency plans for unscheduled electoral events, including a UK Parliamentary general election and a Northern Ireland Assembly election. We will finalise development of feasibility studies on a range of flexible voting options, exploring how new ways of voting could be implemented. We expect to appear before the Levelling Up Committee to expand on our written evidence for its inquiry examining voter registration, and will outline our proposals for reforming the system. EC quote The current registration system does not work well for voters or administers. To ensure all eligible voters can have their say at elections, the registration system needs to be reformed. A strategy and policy statement for the Electoral Commission | Electoral Commission Search These are the views we set out to parliamentarians before the Elections Act became law. We last updated these views in early 2022. Close alert A strategy and policy statement for the Electoral Commission You are in the Elections Act section Home Elections Act On this page Changes proposed by the government Our view Further reading First published: 5 July 2021 Last updated: 5 July 2021 Last updated These are the views we set out to parliamentarians before the Elections Act became law. We last updated these views in early 2022. Changes proposed by the government The UK Government is proposing the introduction of a strategy and policy statement for the Electoral Commission. The statement would set out the UK Government's priorities for electoral matters, and give us strategic direction. It would be approved by the UK Parliament, following statutory consultation. Our view The introduction of a Strategy and Policy Statement which enables the government to set the strategic direction for the work of the Commission is not consistent with the role that an independent Commission plays in a healthy democracy. This independence is fundamental to maintaining confidence in our electoral system. The provisions in the Bill would give current or future UK governments the power to direct our work, and may lead the public and campaigners to believe there had been political interference in the way we operate. This could affect the way we work to ensure parties and campaigners are following the political finance laws. It could also affect the advice and guidance we provide to electoral administrators, parties and campaigners, and the UK's parliaments. Our independent role in the electoral system must be clear for voters and campaigners to see and must be protected in electoral law. This underpins fairness and trust in the electoral system, and cross party confidence in the Commission. If these provisions are not removed, ministers from one party would be allowed to shape how electoral law is applied to them and their political competitors. In addition to the UK Parliament, we are accountable to and funded by the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd. While devolved matters may be removed from the strategy and policy statement, it remains likely to affect how the Commission delivers some devolved functions, for instance in terms of resourcing. It will also affect the Commission's core functions, which benefit voters, parties, campaigners and electoral administrators in Wales and Scotland. It therefore remains important that, if the proposed strategy and policy statement is brought into law, the processes for development, consultation and approval reflect the shared accountability relationships with the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd. Performance standards for Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers: consultation response | Electoral Commission Search

Performance standards for Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers: consultation response You are in the Our consultations section Home Our consultations On this page Consultation background Summary of consultation responses Using the standards in 2023 Performance Standards for ROs Performance Standards for EROs Stakeholders providing feedback First published: 17 November 2022 Last updated: 6 January 2023 Summary title (hidden) We commenced a 10 week consultation on a draft new performance standards framework for Returning Officers (ROs) in June 2022. This outlined the proposed new standards which aim to provide a robust framework for the delivery of well-run elections, support the effective and consistent implementation of legislative changes, and enable transparent reporting on how elections have been delivered at a local level and across Great Britain. The consultation also sought views on updates to the Electoral Registration Officer (ERO) performance standards, which were last reviewed in 2021, to reflect new responsibilities arising from the Elections Act 2022. The feedback we have received has been positive and, overall, respondents agreed that the standards – with minor amendments – cover the range of responsibilities of the RO and, alongside our guidance, will be effective in supporting ROs with planning for and delivering elections. The feedback provided during the consultation has been used to inform the final standards – which have now been laid in the UK, Scottish and Welsh Parliaments – and the approach to how they are used. A summary of the key themes of feedback we received during the consultation and our response to the points that were made is set out below. We will use the standards to inform our engagement with ROs on planning for and delivering elections, with a particular focus in 2023/24 on the effectiveness and consistency of the implementation of the changes introduced by the Elections Act.

Consultation background Background We have the power in law to: set performance standards for ROs and EROs issue directions to ROs and EROs to provide reports on their performance against the standards prepare and publish assessments of their performance against the standards. We first introduced performance standards for ROs in March 2009, and revised the framework in December 2011 and then again in November 2013. The Elections Act has provided a timely opportunity to review the RO framework, to ensure it will help support the consistent and effective implementation of the changes. The changes arising from the Elections Act will also impact on the role of EROs, and we identified a number of areas where the ERO framework, which was last reviewed in 2021, needed to be updated to reflect these new responsibilities.

Developing the new standards We started developing the new RO performance standards last autumn, using the ERO performance framework structure as our basis. The ERO framework was last updated in June 2021 and focuses on outcomes rather than the processes that have been followed. We informally discussed the approach with a number of ROs from across Great Britain to get their input at an early stage, and their feedback helped shape the draft standards that we consulted on. This included discussions with small groups of ROs across England, as well as engagement with the Wales Electoral Coordination Board and the Electoral Management Board for Scotland. The draft standards also benefitted from input from the Association of s, at an official level as well as through discussions around the high-level approach with members at their regional branch meetings, and were discussed with government officials and the elections leads at the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (Solace). Consultation The consultation was sent to a range of stakeholders, including: Ministers and officials in the UK, Scottish and Welsh Governments political parties ROs and EROs electoral administrators a range of agencies, professional bodies and representative organisations. In addition, we also obtained feedback through discussions with stakeholders from across the electoral community during the consultation period. This included attending various meetings – including AEA branch meetings and meeting with individual ROs and their teams – to talk about the draft standards and to seek feedback. We also held a series of virtual drop in sessions for interested groups and individuals to ask questions and provide feedback. We received 60 responses to our consultation from a range of organisations and individuals, including: UK, Scottish and Welsh Government ROs and local authorities across GB the Association of the Electoral Management Board for Scotland the Wales Electoral Coordination Board the Scottish Assessors Association (SAA) accessibility groups, including Learning Disability Wales, RNIB, RNIB Cymru and RNIB Scotland View the full list of respondents. We are grateful for the feedback we received, whether by way of written responses to the consultation or through discussions.

Summary of consultation responses

The consultation asked for views on a number of questions on the proposed performance standards for ROs, including:

- The scope of the standards: whether the draft standards are focussed on the right outcomes, while covering the full range of responsibilities of the RO, and whether there are any gaps, or anything included in the standards that shouldn't be there
- How the standards are used: whether our proposed approach to how we use the standards to engage with ROs and their teams will ensure we are providing effective support and challenge, while maintaining the right level of transparency of RO performance
- How the standards support the implementation of legislation: whether the standards, along with our guidance, will support the consistent implementation of the legislative changes introduced by the Elections Act 2022

The consultation set out the structure of the standards, which focus on the outcomes that should be delivered, rather than the processes that are followed, with the objective of helping ROs and their teams to understand and demonstrate the impact of their election activities. Overall, there was agreement from respondents that the standards focus on the right outcomes and activities. However, concerns were raised by some respondents about the risk that ROs be challenged on elements outside their control. A particular example of this was the inclusion of 'elections delivered without legal challenge' as a success measure. It was already implicit throughout the standards that it is the actions that the RO is accountable for that are covered by the framework and not (for example) the behaviour of candidates and campaigners, which would be relevant context but not something the RO can be held directly accountable for. However, to reflect the concerns raised, we have made an addition to the wording of this element to reflect that it explicitly refers to a legal challenge to the administration of the poll. In addition, we also received some suggestions of additional activities undertaken by ROs – for example, the inclusion of an additional activity 'Ensuring polling stations are set up and staff are trained to support voters to vote independently and in secret' – which has now been added into the standards. We have also amended and updated the standards to reflect how the new voter ID measures from the Elections Act will work in practice, now that the secondary legislation which provides for this has been laid in parliament. Some respondents also highlighted that the Elections Act will introduce significant differences in the devolved nations, and that these differences could be more explicit within the standards. As noted, the standards focus on the outcomes that should be delivered, rather than the processes that are undertaken, and while the specific activities undertaken may differ, the overall outcomes are still the same across Great Britain. Therefore, we believe the standards provide sufficient flexibility to accommodate any differences across England, Scotland and Wales, but they will be kept under review and further updates made whenever needed; and indeed we expect to consider this further as electoral reform proposals from Welsh Government and Scottish Government are progressed. Likewise, there are particular elements of the standards that will not apply to devolved elections – for example, the provision of photo ID when voting in person at the polling station – and therefore these elements of the standards will not apply in those circumstances. The version of the new standards sent to the Scottish Minister and the Welsh Minister for laying in the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd omit the content relevant only to reserved elections, but are otherwise consistent and focussed on the same outcomes.

How the standards are used The consultation set out how the standards, alongside our guidance and advice, form a central part of the Commission's work to support and challenge ROs in the delivery of well-run elections, and to report transparently on RO performance and how elections are delivered. Most respondents agreed with the proposed approach to how we will use the standards. However, concerns were raised by several respondents about the volume of data and information contained within the standards and their ability to collate and provide all the information and data listed. It is not our intention that ROs would collate and provide us with all the information listed within the standards as a matter of course. Instead, the information and data set out in the standards will be used to shape the structured discussions with ROs and their teams and we will focus on particular aspects of the standards in our discussions – for example, in the first year we expect to prioritise the new elements of the standards relating to the Elections Act. This is in addition to our regular risk-based approach to engaging, supporting and challenging ROs that includes focussing on areas where issues have previously arisen. However, we will continue to collect management information from all ROs, with the focus being around key information and evidence from the standards which would provide an overview of the key preparations that have been made (for example, around polling station venues and staffing, count venues and timing, and postal vote despatch arrangements). As well as giving us an important source of information to analyse and use to inform engagement with local ROs, it also provides a picture of progress at a national level and gives us data we can use proactively and reactively to tell the story of how the elections are being managed. On the whole, respondents agreed that our proposed approach to reporting - highlighting areas where there have been issues as well as using our reporting to highlight examples of good practice – would support transparency, promote confidence that elections are well-run and enable the sharing of good practice. However, a number of respondents highlighted that we could be doing more in using the framework to identify and share good practice more widely. This is already an area that we have identified we want to expand on, and we are committed to exploring this further. For 2023/24, we will seek to use our engagement and reporting to collect and highlight examples of good practice that emerge. This will be particularly important as we gather examples of new processes to support the implementation of legislative changes, which we can then share with other local authorities to help inform their local arrangements. We will also share good practice examples directly with those who we have identified as needing support and that may benefit from the experience of other teams who have faced similar challenges. Beyond this, we intend to explore further how we can use existing networks to share experiences and examples more widely. How the standards support the implementation of legislation The consultation set out how the standards, along with our guidance and advice, would have an important role in supporting the effective and consistent implementation of legislative changes, including changes resulting from the Elections Act. Whilst the majority of respondents were content that the scope of the standards addressed and supported the implementation of the changes introduced by the Elections Act, responses from accessibility organisations asked for a greater emphasis on accessibility throughout the standards. We have therefore made some minor amendments to strengthen the standards, making accessibility more explicit across the standards.

While the standards include the headline activities that ROs will need to undertake to be able to meet the overall outcomes, the detail of how to deliver these activities, including in relation to ensuring elections are accessible, will be covered in the accompanying guidance and resources. Throughout September and October, we consulted on draft guidance for ROs on providing assistance with voting for persons with disabilities, which will play a key role in helping ROs to ensure they are taking steps to enable voters to vote independently and in secret. The feedback we received, including from accessibility organisations, has informed the further development of the guidance which we are now formally consulting on. Most respondents also agreed that the standards do provide sufficient flexibility to accommodate future legislative change, although responses consistently highlighted the uncertainty about how provisions in the Elections Act will work in practice and the importance of ensuring that the standards remain appropriate and accurately reflect the responsibilities of ROs and EROs once the Act is embedded. Whilst the outcome-focussed framework we have developed should provide flexibility to cover the range of changes and how they are implemented in practice, we will continue to keep them under review and will be able to make further updates if necessary. Using the standards in 2023 The new performance standards will form an important part of our support package for ROs in preparing for and delivering elections across Great Britain. Now that the standards have been finalised and laid in the UK, Scottish and Welsh Parliaments we will start to use them to inform our engagement with ROs and EROs, with a particular focus in 2023 on the effectiveness and consistency of implementation of the changes introduced by the Elections Act. We will also use the information from this engagement, along with an analysis of the information and data we will collect, to support our reporting on how the May 2023 elections have been delivered and on the operation of the system more generally. Targeted engagement Whilst we aim to engage with all ROs with elections, as in previous years, we will take a risk-based approach to help prioritise the order, frequency and intensity of our engagement. This builds on our already-established process, where we undertake risk assessments taking into account a range of factors, including the experience of the RO and their team, any staffing changes, demographics of the area and electoral fraud risks, to inform who, how and when we engage. We will also continue to prioritise engaging with any ROs who have previously had issues with the delivery of their polls, particularly where we may have found that they did not meet elements of the standards. More generally, the framework of the standards will be used to support structured conversations with ROs, EROs and their teams. In the first year of operation, our engagement will see a focus on the following elements of the standards:

- of voting: this will include a focus on the arrangements being made to support voters to vote independently and in secret, in line with our new guidance. We will engage in advance of the elections to support and challenge ROs where necessary to help ensure appropriate arrangements are in place, and will use the information and data we collect to inform our statutory reporting after the polls on what ROs have done to ensure accessibility.
- Administering the Voter Authority Certificate process: this will look at the targeted engagement activity being carried out locally to raise awareness of the need for ID and the availability of the Voter Authority Certificate, as well as the processing of applications and managing the production and distribution, to help ensure that voters without one of the accepted forms of ID are able to obtain a Voter Authority Certificate. Again this will include support and challenge in the period leading up to the polls, as well as providing a basis for the collection of information and data to inform our evaluation of the implementation of the provisions. To help prepare for structured discussions, we will provide advance notice to individual ROs and EROs of the types of information and data that we will want to discuss with them, to help them understand the areas we will want to explore. Data collection from all ROs We will continue to collect baseline information from all ROs with elections, which aligns with the information and evidence outlined in the standards. As explained above, we do not plan on collecting all the information listed in the standards at one time, with our focus instead being on the key pieces of information during an election period which would provide an overview of the key preparations that have been made. As well as giving us an important source of information to analyse and use to inform engagement with local ROs (i.e. using the information to update risk profiles, and informing the prioritisation of our targeted engagement), it also provides a picture of progress at a national level and gives us data we can use proactively and reactively to tell the story of how the elections are being managed.

Reporting As set out in the consultation, we also need to ensure that where issues have arisen, we are transparent about these, being open and clear about what has happened, the impact, and the learning. To this end, the standards play an important role in enabling us to report on the administration of elections. Where issues arise, after we have supported the RO to resolve the situation, the relevant pieces of data and information listed in the standards will be collated and analysed to enable us to reach an assessment about whether or not the relevant aspects of the standards have been met in practice. We will continue to use our established process for doing this which includes consultation with a panel of Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board members (i.e. senior ROs from across the UK) to gather their feedback on the evidence, impact and provisional assessment of performance, before a final decision is taken. As well as highlighting areas where there have been issues, we will remain mindful of the responses to the consultation that highlighted the value of using our reporting to highlight examples of good practice. The information we gain through our engagement with ROs and their teams will not only provide us with an understanding of local performance but will also help us to build up a picture of how the system is working more generally. By capturing and collating the key points from our individual structured discussions with ROs we can identify emerging themes and issues, which can in turn inform our reporting and recommendations after elections.

Year-round engagement The new framework has been designed to be used not only in the period leading up to polls but throughout the whole year. The first of the standards in particular aims to provide a basis for year-round engagement, including in relation to the wider structure and approach to elections delivery, helping to identify and address any issues further out from elections and to help ensure readiness for polls, whenever they may take place. As part of our ongoing wider engagement programme, which ensures we have regular contact with all ROs, we will use performance standard one to support structured conversations with ROs outside a scheduled election period. These conversations will focus on ensuring that ROs have the structures and resources in place to enable and support their teams to deliver elections in practice and on the ongoing planning and preparations that are needed to ensure they are ready to deliver polls whenever they may take place. Performance Standards for ROs Outcome:

electoral services are robust and support the delivery of well-run elections What inputs are needed? RO understanding and delivery of role and responsibilities Management and oversight of the delivery of elections, including the range of statutory functions of the RO, and an understanding of the strategic landscape, including any legislative changes that will impact on delivery Stakeholder engagement Establish and maintain strong relationships with key stakeholders Planning Maintain plans for the delivery of elections, scheduled and unscheduled, ensuring they are kept under review. registers are as accurate and complete as possible, ensuring that everyone who is eligible and wants to vote is able to do so What inputs are needed? ERO understanding and delivery of role and responsibilities Management and oversight of delivery of the electoral registration service, including the statutory functions of the ERO, and stakeholder engagement Planning Maintaining a plan for registration throughout the year, ensuring it is kept under review and evaluation is undertaken, with lessons learnt fed back in, and a risk and issues register, identifying any risks to the effective delivery of your registration plan and corresponding mitigating actions Resource Identification and allocation of budget and staffing for electoral registration activities Training Identification and delivery of training to meet the needs of both permanent and temporary staff What activities are being undertaken? Identification of those not registered, including hard to reach groups: Using available data and information sources, identify those not registered, including hard to reach groups Develop and maintain a public engagement strategy, ensuring planned activities are tailored to meet the needs of different groups of electors What information is needed to understand the impact of these activities? Analysis of the scope and usefulness of data and information Ward level analysis of the registration area Identification of priority areas to target registration activity Evaluation of communications channels and approaches, including cost/benefit analysis of previous activity, supporting development of engagement strategy and activities Undertaking year-round registration activity: Maintain the property database Contact potential eligible electors, including carrying out work to target hard to reach groups Ensure those no longer entitled to be registered are identified and removed Develop and implement processes to identify and address potential integrity issues Manage special category electors What information is needed to understand the impact of these activities? Number of properties with UPRN/as a percentage of properties Analysis of any issues reported with the allocation of properties to polling districts to reflect relevant electoral boundaries The accuracy and usability of data sources used Analysis of response rates by channel, to understand impact of different approaches Number of ITRs sent (by channel) Number of ITRs followed up Number of ITRs not responded to after the reminder and personal visit stages Number of electors whose identity has not been verified and have yet to provide documentary evidence by type e.g. ordinary electors, overseas electors, etc. Number of registration applications received, by type e.g. ordinary electors, overseas electors, etc. Number of additions to the register, by type e.g. ordinary electors, overseas electors, etc. Number of reviews of registration and number of deletions as a result Number of deletions not as a result of a review, by type Number of registration applications referred to the police Number of renewals sent by elector type Number of special category elector applications (both new and renewals) processed, from different elector groups (overseas, service etc.) Number of special category electors renewed by elector type Administering the canvass: Using available data and information, identify the most appropriate method to canvass properties in your area Make arrangements to deliver the planned canvass activities Undertake the planned canvass activities What information is needed to understand the impact of these activities? The accuracy and usability of local data sources used Results of data matching (national and local) Number of households intended for each route Analysis of available communications channels (e-communications, telephone, mail, etc.), to inform contact with individual properties Number of households canvassed, by route and channel Number of communications sent, by route and channel Number of responses by route and channel Assessment of success of canvass communication channels used Number of canvassers recruited and trained Evaluation of canvasser performance Administering the Voter Authority Certificate process Develop and maintain an engagement strategy for those less likely to hold an accepted form of ID on how to obtain a Voter Authority Certificate Process Voter Authority Certificate applications Manage production and distribution of temporary Voter Authority Certificates Process Anonymous Elector's document applications What information is needed to understand the impact of these activities? Identification of those less likely to hold a required form of ID, supporting targeting of activity Evaluation of communications channels and approaches, supporting development and delivery of engagement strategy and activities Number of Voter Authority Certificate applications received by channel Number of Voter Authority Certificate applications processed Number of Voter Authority Certificate applications rejected Number of Voter Authority Certificates issued Number of temporary Voter Authority Certificates issued Number of Anonymous Elector's document applications received and processed Number of Anonymous Elector's document applications rejected Number of Anonymous Elector's documents issued What difference is being made? The demographics of the registration area and the needs of groups of electors within it are understood, enabling services to be targeted and designed to meet the needs of residents Barriers to registration are minimised, enabling all eligible individuals, including those from different elector groups, to register Potential new electors are identified and are given every opportunity to register to vote Changes in the registration status of individuals are captured and applied to the register in a timely manner Elections are effectively supported by the register Voters without one of the accepted forms of ID are able to obtain a Voter Authority Certificate to enable them to cast their vote in person How can we determine the success of our work? Performance against the KPIs/objectives set out in your registration plans Evaluation of public engagement activities undertaken, including of changes made to the register as a result of the activity Changes in levels of registration within and across the registration area, both generally and within identified under-registered groups An assessment of levels of additions and deletions, during the canvass and throughout the year. A year-on-year analysis of additions and deletions Assessment of the numbers of eligible electors who tried to vote on polling day but were unable to do so as a result of not being registered to vote or who were unable to vote due to not having appropriate identification (at relevant polls) Outcome: absent voting is accessible, ensuring that everyone who is eligible and wants an absent vote is included on the relevant absent vote list What inputs are needed? ERO understanding and delivery of role and responsibilities Management and oversight of delivery of the absent voting function, including the statutory responsibilities of the ERO, and stakeholder engagement. Planning Maintaining a plan throughout the year, including arrangements for managing the absent voting process, and a risk and issues register, identifying any risks to the effective delivery of your plan and corresponding mitigating actions. Resources Identification and allocation of budget and staffing for absent voting activities. Training Identification and delivery of training to meet the needs of both permanent and temporary staff. What activities are being undertaken? Supporting electors to engage with the absent voting process: Develop and implement a communications plan to ensure that electors are aware of the absent vote options available to them Ensure that all electors can access the absent vote process What information is needed to understand the impact of these activities? Report on the May 2023 local elections in England | Electoral Commission Search Report on the May 2023 local elections in England You are in the England local council elections section Home England local council elections Currently reading: of 6 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the elections at the elections Campaigning at the elections Delivering the elections Summary of recommendations Supporting evidence Executive summary This report looks at how the May 2023 elections in England were run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on the local elections in Northern Ireland . On 4 May local council elections took place in many areas of England. There were also local mayoral elections in Bedford, Leicester, Mansfield, and Middlesbrough. These were the first elections in Great Britain where changes introduced by the Elections Act were in place. Voters needed to show photographic identification (ID) to vote in a polling station, and this report draws on a wider range of evidence to build on our June 2023 interim analysis . It confirms the interim findings that most people who wanted to vote were able to do so, but that some groups struggled to meet the ID requirement. Our evidence indicates that this stems from two overlapping issues: variations in levels of ownership of accepted ID, and in awareness of the new requirement. We have recommended changes to the UK Government to improve accessibility and support people who do not have accepted ID. These elections also saw increased flexibility as to what support and equipment can be provided at polling stations to enable, or make it easier for, disabled people to vote independently. Although Returning Officers provided a range of support at polling stations, voter awareness of what is available continues to be low and more can be done to ensure disabled voters receive the support they need. More generally, candidates engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and voters found it easy to access information, although this did not necessarily lead to them feeling well-informed. Concerns remain about the number of candidates experiencing intimidation or harassment however, with many telling us they experienced some form of harassment in this election at least once. Coordinated action from partners across the electoral community is needed to ensure candidates and campaigners can participate freely in the democratic process without fear of intimidation.

Significant changes to the process of voting added new layers of complexity and risk to already stretched electoral administration processes, and the capacity and resilience of election teams remains a key risk for future elections. Despite these challenging circumstances, electoral administrators were able to deliver well-run elections. Further significant changes are expected to be implemented ahead of elections in 2024 and the next UK Parliamentary general election. To ensure electoral administrators can continue to deliver well-run elections that meet voters' expectations, the UK Government must ensure there is sufficient time and capacity and fully functioning operational resources to support them. Voting at the elections The experience of voters at the May 2023 elections These were the first elections in Great Britain where voters needed to show photographic identification (ID) to vote in polling stations. There was also, for the first time, increased flexibility as to what support and equipment could be provided in polling stations to enable, or make it easier for, disabled people to vote independently and in secret. Our evidence indicates that public confidence in how elections are run in England remains high. Most people are satisfied with registration and voting processes and think that voting is safe from fraud and abuse. Public views on this year's elections are broadly consistent with comparable elections in recent years. Returning Officers provided a range of accessibility equipment and support at polling stations, although voter awareness of what is available continues to be low. We will continue to work with electoral administrators, charities, and civil society organisations to raise awareness, and to further develop our voter information resources for disabled voters. Summary On 4 May 2023, there were elections for local councillors in 230 local authorities in England. There were also local mayoral elections in Bedford, Leicester, Mansfield, and Middlesbrough. Around 27 million people were eligible to vote in these elections. These were the first elections in Great Britain where changes introduced by the Elections Act 2022 were in place. In particular, there was increased flexibility as to what support could be provided in polling stations to enable, or make it easier for, disabled people to vote independently and in secret. For the first time in Great Britain, voters also needed to show photographic identification (ID) to vote in polling stations, and further evidence about the experience of the new requirement is highlighted in the next chapter of this report. Public confidence in how elections are run remains high Public confidence in how elections are run remains high After each election we ask members of the public who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections. This helps us understand if views have changed since the last comparable set of elections. Most people are confident elections are well-run and are satisfied with registration and voting processes Our research with the public found that just over two-thirds (68%) of people said they were confident that the elections were well-run – this is consistent with the 64% who said they were confident after the last comparable elections in 2019. In 2023, the most commonly chosen reasons for being confident were: it was quick and easy to vote (56%) the polling station was accessible and easy to get to (47%) a lack of negative experiences when taking part in the election (46%) everyone having the opportunity to vote (41%) helpful polling station staff (37%) Around one-in-seven (14%) people said they were not confident that the elections were well-run, in comparison to 10% after the 2019 elections. Those who did not vote were more likely than voters to say they were not confident. In 2023, the most chosen reasons were: people being unable to vote due to not having photo ID (46%) a lack of information about the elections or candidates (40%) the voting system being unfair, outdated or wanting a different voting system (32%) believing some people had difficulties registering to vote (26%) media, TV, and press coverage being biased (22%) People continue to have high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting. Our research shows that: 77% of people in England were satisfied with the process of registering to vote – this is consistent with the levels of satisfaction reported after the most recent comparable elections held in 2019 (81%) 90% of voters were satisfied with the process of voting – this is consistent with 2019, when 91% of voters were satisfied In addition, nearly all voters felt that it was easy to fill in their ballot paper, and there is no evidence to suggest that voters had problems with the change to the voting system (from Supplementary Vote to First Past the Post) in the four areas with local mayoral elections. We found that: in areas with local elections, 97% of voters said that it was easy, with 73% saying it was very easy – only 2% of voters said that they found it difficult in areas with mayoral elections, 95% of voters said that it was easy, with 78% saying it was very easy – only 3% of voters said that they found it difficult Almost everyone who voted by post said that they knew how to complete and return their postal vote and found the postal voting instructions useful. Our research shows that: 96% of postal voters said that they found the written instructions (about how to vote and return their vote) included with their postal vote useful, with two-thirds (65%) saying they were very useful 94% of postal voters also said it was easy to complete and return their postal vote, compared to 5% who said it was difficult. Most people think voting is safe from fraud and abuse. Views about the safety of voting and whether electoral fraud is a problem were also consistent with the most recent comparable elections. Our research found that: 81% of people in England said they thought voting in general was safe from fraud and abuse, with the same proportion (81%) saying this after the 2022 elections. Some people were less likely to feel that voting was safe from fraud and abuse – this included younger people, people from an ethnic minority background, and those limited a lot by a disability when asked if they thought electoral fraud was a problem. 16% of people in England said that they thought it was – this is consistent with the 19% who saw it as a problem after the 2022 elections. Our research also found that: four-in-five voters (80%) in England said they thought voting was secret, while 8% said they thought it was not – this is in line with findings from the surveys we conducted after the 2021 and 2022 elections. A similar proportion (82%) of voters said they thought voting was secure, with 55% saying it was very secure. Fewer than one-in-20 respondents (4%) said they thought voting was not secure – this is consistent with our findings in 2021 and 2022. A small proportion of voters (4% of people who voted in polling stations and 8% of people who voted by post) said that they had help completing their ballot paper. Younger voters and those limited a lot by a disability or long-term health condition were most likely to say they had help filling in the ballot paper.

For some people, help would have been provided in response to a specific request for assistance, including for example by a Presiding Officer or an officially declared companion. Nevertheless, it remains essential that voters are able to vote in secret, and we will continue to provide information for voters about their rights and ensure guidance for polling station staff supports them to protect the secrecy of voting in polling stations. Few allegations of electoral fraud have been reported so far. Throughout the year, all police forces across the UK send us data about allegations of electoral fraud that they receive and investigate. Data collected so far shows that there were: two allegations of polling station personation, both of which resulted in the police taking no further action; four allegations of postal vote personation – two resulted in the police taking no further action, while two are under investigation; one allegation of proxy vote personation, which is under investigation; one public order incident related to voter ID, which was reported by polling station staff – there were no lines of inquiry and the case was closed; one allegation of assault against a member of polling station staff by a person who could not show accepted ID. The suspect has been charged with criminal damage and common assault. In spring 2024, we will publish our annual update on the number, type and outcome of the allegations reported to police forces during 2023. Turnout at these elections was slightly lower than at recent comparable elections. Turnout at these elections was 32.0%, which is slightly lower than at the last comparable set of elections in 2019, when it was 32.5%. The most common reasons given by people who told us they did not vote were: a lack of time or being too busy at work (mentioned by 15% of non-voters); a lack of interest in, or being fed up with, politics (13%); medical reasons unrelated to Covid (8%); being away on polling day (8%). Although it was not one of the most common reasons given, 3% of non-voters said they did not vote because they did not have ID, and 1% said it was because they did not agree with the requirement to show ID to vote at a polling station. Data collected from electoral administrators on postal votes and ballot papers shows that: 2.6% of returned postal votes (approximately 88,971 votes in total) were rejected and not able to be included in the count. The most common reason for postal votes being rejected was that the signature (27%) or date of birth (22%) on the postal voting statement did not match that previously provided to the Electoral Registration Officer 0.6% of all local election ballot papers (approximately 48,547) were rejected and not included in the count the most common reason for ballot papers to be rejected was because they were unmarked, with this accounting for over three-quarters (76.3%) of all rejected ballot papers Most voters could vote using their preferred method Of all registered voters, most people (81%) could vote in person at their designated polling station, but 19% applied to be sent a postal vote and 0.1% (23,414) appointed a proxy, of which 964 were an emergency proxy, including 249 people who appointed an emergency proxy due to their ID being lost or stolen. Our research with the public found that most people who voted were able to use their preferred method: 95% of voters said they were able to use their preferred method of voting, compared to 4% who said they were not groups more likely to have voted using their preferred method included older voters, white voters, those in employment, and those without a disability Most people said that they found it easy to find information on how to vote either in person at a polling station or by post or proxy. Our research showed that: three-quarters (75%) of people said they found it easy to get information about the different methods of voting they could choose from 83% of people who voted in a polling station and 86% of people who voted by post said they found it easy to get information about different methods of voting Data from local authorities indicates that the number of people voting by post and by proxy was consistent with the elections in May 2022 and in line with post-pandemic trends. There was little evidence that the new voter ID requirement had a significant impact on the number of people choosing to vote by post. Just over one-in-six (17%) of postal voters told us that these elections were the first time they had voted by post, and the most common reasons for choosing to do so were: wanting to avoid queuing at the polling station (24%) being away on polling day (24%) difficulties accessing or travelling to their polling station (24%) Not having photographic ID, chosen by one-in-eight (12%) people who voted by post for the first time this year, was the seventh most chosen option as a reason for voting by post. Returning Officers took steps to assist disabled voters at the elections but more needs to be done to raise awareness Returning Officers took steps to assist disabled voters at the elections but more needs to be done to raise awareness Following changes in the Elections Act, electoral administrators now have increased flexibility on what support and equipment they can provide at the polling station to enable, or make it easier for, disabled people to vote independently and in secret. Restrictions have also been removed on who can be a 'companion'. Anyone who is 18 or over can now accompany a disabled voter to the polling station and, if requested by the voter, provide support. The companion no longer needs to be eligible to vote at the elections taking place, but they must still complete a declaration before assisting the voter. Returning Officers provided a range of support at polling stations Ahead of the elections, we published guidance for Returning Officers to support them to remove the barriers and challenges disabled voters face when voting at the polling station. Returning Officers were required to take this guidance into account when planning for and running the elections. After the elections, we asked electoral administrators and polling station staff for their feedback about the accessibility support provided to voters and about any specific support requested by voters. We did not receive responses from all local authorities, and not everyone answered all the questions, but among the electoral administrators who responded to our questions on accessibility: over three-quarters (81%) found our guidance on assistance with voting for disabled voters useful, with over half (54%) saying it was very useful most of the equipment that was made available at polling stations was provided proactively by administrators, with a limited number of requests from voters for specific equipment almost all respondents said that they had met the minimum requirements for equipment and support, as set out in our guidance However, follow-up responses suggest there may have been some misunderstanding of either the survey question or what constitutes a 'minimum requirement'. When asked to select which items they had provided from a list of types of support and equipment, and at how many polling stations, responses indicate that some administrators did not provide the minimum equipment. This may have led to an inconsistent provision of equipment and support for voters in some areas, which we are following up with the relevant Returning Officers. This was the first year Returning Officers had to have regard to our guidance, and we will continue to work with them to ensure they understand what equipment and support they should make available so that elections are accessible. Most survey respondents indicated that they had tried to engage with local disability groups to inform their planning and the implementation of the accessibility requirements. However, some electoral administrators noted that they had difficulties identifying or engaging with local groups, with a lack of capacity and time being a factor for some. "No difficulties as such, but more time was required to procure equipment, update polling station staff training and liaise with the equalities access officer." "We don't have the capacity and resources to engage with local groups as much as we would like to." "While the council invited and reached out to organisations, there was limited response. However, we believe this will come over time through continued invitations to work with us." The limits on capacity for local engagement also reflects feedback we have previously received from disability charities about the limited resources they have available, as well as concerns raised elsewhere about the capacity and resilience of electoral administrators. Some administrators also noted that funding played a role in their decision making. "It is not practical to provide audio devices and hearing loops within the New Burdens funding allocated." "Hearing induction loops sat unused in our office waiting to be deployed – these were on request as we could not afford 160 of these." Most of the administrators responding to our survey said that they did not have any issues providing training for polling station staff on accessibility. Among the polling station staff who shared their experiences, most were confident that they were able to assist disabled voters, including voters with a visual impairment (94% were confident) or a learning disability (90%). However, 9% of polling station staff reported that at least one disabled voter had problems with voting, with just under half (43%) of the staff reporting problems saying that it was due to problem with physical access to the polling station. In some cases, Returning Officers highlighted a lack of suitable alternative venues. "Rural polling stations tend not to be as accessible. No alternative venues unless required to travel outside of the polling district, which is less practical for many. Staff were trained on how to assist those who are unable to physically enter the polling station." "Two polling stations were not available, so had to find alternatives. One polling station was not accessible to wheelchairs (and no suitable alternative). Staff trained on how to enable people to vote where they cannot access the polling station." We will continue to work with electoral administrators and civil society partner organisations to identify and share examples of good practice. Further work is needed to ensure disabled voters receive the support they need Our research with those who voted at the elections found that: almost all (97%) adults who voted in person and told us they have a disability or long-term health condition said that it was easy to get inside the polling station and vote – one-in-10 in-person voters with a disability or long-term health condition said that they needed additional assistance or equipment voters limited a lot by a disability or long-term health condition were more likely to have gone to vote with another person who helped them vote (16%) compared with voters limited a little or not at all by a disability/long-term health condition (1%) those limited a lot by a disability or long-term health condition were most likely to say they had help filling in their ballot paper in the polling booth – 14% of these in-person voters said they had help, compared to 3% of in-person voters who said they were not limited by a disability or long-term health condition We also asked all those who have a disability or long-term health condition for their views on the experience of voting at the May elections. Overall, we found that: 52% of voters agreed that they received the equipment, information and support that they need in order to vote, with 7% disagreeing 40% felt that staff at polling stations are properly trained to assist them with voting, while 7% disagreed 49% disagreed that the way elections are run at present prevents them from voting in person, with one in seven (15%) agreeing After the elections, we asked civil society organisations and their service users for feedback on their experiences at this year's polls, and on the impact of voter ID and the new accessibility measures in particular. This feedback provides a valuable insight into disabled people's lived experience, although we only received a limited number of responses which means they are not representative of the views of all disabled people. Overall, most people who fed back found it relatively easy to register and vote. However, some people raised concerns around: the lack of information in accessible formats, including about how to register and vote the impact of voter ID on those who have compromised or suppressed immune systems, and who continue to wear masks to protect their health difficulties applying for and completing their postal vote physical access to the polling station lack of clear signage at the polling station In the feedback received, we also found that many people had low levels of awareness of the support and equipment available to assist those voting in person, such as help from a companion or polling station staff, or the provision of a large print ballot paper. "I wasn't aware that I could have had a large print ballot paper. I would have felt awkward asking for one then a big fuss to find one etc." Recommendation 1: Increase awareness of the support available for disabled voters Recommendation 1: Increase awareness of the support available for disabled voters Recommendation 1: Increase awareness of the support available for disabled voters There is some evidence that levels of awareness of the support and equipment available, especially in polling stations, is still lower than it could be. This includes awareness of both the new accessibility measures and the existing provisions that are available (such as the possibility of asking a companion or polling station staff for help with voting). We will continue to work with the electoral community, national and local civil society organisations, and the media to raise awareness of the support that is available for disabled voters. We will also work with them to further develop our voter information resources for disabled voters. This work should include pro-actively ensuring voters are aware of the support and assistance that is available to help them vote, and how they can make a request for additional equipment or support – whether in advance of the election or on polling day. at the elections The experience of the voter ID requirement at the May 2023 elections These were the first elections in Great Britain where voters needed to show photographic identification (ID) to vote in polling stations. Our interim analysis highlighted evidence that some people found it harder than others to show accepted voter ID, including disabled people and the unemployed. We have now undertaken further data collection and analysis of evidence to establish a clearer picture of the impact of the new requirement. This analysis confirms the interim findings and indicates that this stems from two overlapping issues – the variations in ownership of accepted photo ID and in awareness of the need to show ID when voting in person. It is crucial that improvements are made at the earliest opportunity, particularly given there are important elections that are due to be held during the next 18 months, to improve accessibility and support those people who do not have an accepted form of ID. at the elections These were the first elections in Great Britain where changes introduced by the Elections Act 2022 were in place. Voters needed to show photographic identification (ID) to vote in polling stations.

Photographic ID has been a requirement for polling station voters in Northern Ireland since 2003. Further work is required to ensure that elections remain accessible to all. Further work is required to ensure that elections remain accessible to all. We published our interim analysis of the new ID requirement in June 2023, using the information and evidence that was available at that time about how the new voter ID requirement was implemented and how voters found taking part. This report now draws on a wider range of information, including feedback from candidates, Returning Officers, polling station staff, election observers, charities and civil society organisations, and the police. Our interim analysis highlighted key findings about the impact of the new voter ID requirement at the May 2023 elections. Our research found that: around 4% of all people who said they did not vote at the elections on 4 May listed the ID requirement as the reason – 3% said they did not have the necessary ID, and 1% said they disagreed with the new requirement at least 0.25% of people who tried to vote at a polling station in May 2023 were not able to because of the voter ID requirement – this was equivalent to approximately 14,000 people who were not issued with a ballot paper awareness of the need to bring ID to vote at a polling station was high – 92% of people were aware of the need to bring ID to vote at a polling station, although awareness was significantly lower among people who said they did not have an accepted form of ID (74%) awareness and take-up of the Voter Authority Certificate was low – awareness of the availability of the free Voter Authority Certificate stood at 57% in May 2023, and only 25,000 certificates were actually used as a form of ID on polling day. We also said that further work was needed to improve the collection of data on the impact of voter ID at future elections. We recommended that the UK Government should ensure Returning Officers are able to collect and report monitoring data on the impact of voter ID at future elections, and that work is also needed to improve the quality and reliability of data collected at polling stations in future. There is evidence that the voter ID requirement had a greater impact on some groups of people. There is evidence that the voter ID requirement had a greater impact on some groups of people. Our interim analysis highlighted evidence that some people found it harder than others to show accepted voter ID. We have now undertaken further data collection and analysis of evidence in a number of areas to establish a clearer picture of this impact. This additional analysis confirms the interim findings and indicates that this stems from two overlapping issues – the variations in ownership of accepted photo ID and in awareness of the need to show ID when voting in person. Some people did not have the ID needed. We know, from our previous research, that some groups were less likely to have one of the forms of accepted photo ID (in particular those renting from a social landlord, the unemployed, lower social grades, and disabled people). Our evidence indicates that at least some of these groups were more likely to have a problem voting in person on 4 May. In our public opinion survey following the elections, 3% of all non-voters said they did not vote because they did not have the required ID, but this was higher for unemployed non-voters (8%) and for disabled non-voters who reported being 'limited a lot' by their disability or health condition (9%). The Voter Authority Certificate is intended to allow those without ID to vote. However, we know that awareness of the Voter Authority Certificate was relatively low (57% of people with no photo ID were aware they could get a Voter Authority Certificate). While around 89,500 people applied for a Voter Authority Certificate before the elections, this is substantially fewer than the approximately 250,000 to 300,000 people that were estimated to need one to vote. We do not have detailed data on Voter Authority Certificate applications, which we understand will be published by the UK Government in due course. Our public opinion findings suggest that Voter Authority Certificate applications were more likely to be received from certain groups including disabled people, people from an ethnic minority community, and younger people. However, there is no evidence of a greater take up among the unemployed. In addition, only around 25,000 certificates were used as a form of ID on 4 May. It is not clear why a significant number of people applied for a certificate but did not use it on polling day. From the public opinion data available, it appears that some did then choose to vote by post or by proxy rather than at a polling station. Some people did not know they needed to show ID. While awareness of the ID requirement was relatively high, our research also shows that some groups were less likely to be aware than others (in particular younger age groups, people from an ethnic minority background, and people with no photo ID). Again, our evidence suggests that these lower levels of awareness meant that these groups of people were also more likely to have difficulties meeting the ID requirement. We asked all non-voters to choose from a list of reasons why they did not vote. On average, 1% of those who did not vote said that this was because they went to vote without the required ID. However, this was higher among 18-to-24-year-old non-voters and those non-voters from a mixed or black ethnic background (both 5%). The proportion of voters turned away varied across local authorities. In order to further explore the different impact across the population, we have also used the data on voters initially turned away from polling stations in 18 local authorities (where the data was available at ward level) and compared it against census data for those wards in relation to the proportions of: non-white British population; long term unemployed/never worked in the population; and households with at least two dimensions of deprivation. We find a moderate correlation between the numbers initially turned away from polling stations and all three additional factors. This finding suggests that the distribution of voters initially turned away was not random. We need to be cautious in drawing conclusions from this analysis. Firstly, this shows only a relationship, not any direct causation. Secondly, while the overall correlation for each of these factors is moderate, individual local authorities in the analysis can have much stronger or much weaker results. Finally, we have also highlighted some issues with the accuracy of the original polling station data, which could be distorting the findings. However, taken together, the evidence available tells us that some people, in relation to socio-demographic factors, were more likely to have problems in meeting the ID requirement. Our analysis in relation to deprivation suggests that, on average, more deprived areas had a higher proportion turned away compared to less deprived areas. The particular types of voters who faced greater problems were: disabled people, unemployed people from ethnic minority communities (although it is not clear to what extent this varies between distinct ethnic minority backgrounds), younger age groups. The feedback we received through our charity partner organisations and directly from disabled voters supports these findings and provides additional evidence about the impact of the ID requirement on groups that are harder to reach through a public opinion survey (because of their size relative to the total population). The LGBT Foundation and TransActual told us that many of their users said they chose not to vote or to vote by post instead, because of the ID requirement. This was often because of the perception of the extra complexity involved in polling station voting as a result of the ID requirement. For example, some people were concerned about whether gender markers (on their ID) would be checked at polling stations. There were also concerns about legal name changes and around gender presentation in their photographs. “I felt actively discouraged to vote through new voter ID as a Trans person. My appearance has changed dramatically from when my current ID was issued.” LGBT Foundation user RNIB reported mixed feedback. Some of its users were unaffected and had ID or could apply for a Voter Authority Certificate. However, it heard from others who chose postal voting “specifically because of the introduction of voter ID” as well as where people had “become disenfranchised by the voter ID requirements, as it added yet another barrier to an already inaccessible process which some blind and partially sighted people were unable to overcome”. In its anecdotal feedback, RNIB highlighted some issues users faced including being unable to afford to pay to travel to the council offices for support to apply for a Voter Authority Certificate. Another user nearly discarded their Certificate as the tactile marking was not clear and they thought it was junk mail, however they were stopped by a sighted friend. Feedback via our own survey of voters with accessibility needs supports this: “I voted by post as the voter ID requirements, in addition to there being no accessible method of me voting secretly, caused me to change the way I voted.” “Requiring ID changes it from something you can do on your way to or from somewhere into something you have to make a specific trip for. It adds an extra step that makes it harder. Not requiring ID to vote would have made me vote.” Grace Eyre, an organisation working with people with learning disabilities, autism and mental health conditions, was concerned that the mainly online nature of the Voter Authority Certificate application process was an issue, as many people with a learning disability are not online. They also felt that it required information the person applying may not easily be able to access. They reported most of their users who voted used a postal vote to avoid needing to show ID and that “having voter ID adds significant anxiety to an already anxiety inducing process.” Improvements are needed ahead of higher turnout elections Improvements are needed ahead of higher turnout elections Elections are scheduled to take place across all of England and Wales in May 2024, including in London and Birmingham where there were no elections in May 2023. A UK Parliamentary general election must also take place before the end of January 2025. For many people, these elections will be the first time they will have voted since the requirement to show voter ID was introduced. Our research indicates that the voter ID requirement is likely to have a larger impact at higher turnout elections such as a UK general election, where people who do not always vote at local elections may want to take part. We found that: people who said they do not tend to vote at local elections had significantly lower levels of awareness of the requirement (84% were aware) compared with those who vote more frequently at local elections (94%) people who never vote in local elections are less likely to have accepted ID (7%) than those who always vote in local elections (2%) Changes must be made at the earliest opportunity to improve accessibility and support people who do not have accepted ID, particularly given there are important elections that are due to be held during the next 18 months. This should include both changes in the law and work to increase awareness of the voter ID requirement and the availability of the free Voter Authority Certificate, as recommended in our interim analysis . Recommendation 2: Review the list of accepted ID Recommendation 2: Review the list of accepted ID Recommendation 2: Review the list of accepted ID The UK Government should review the current list of accepted forms of ID to identify any additional documents that could be included to improve accessibility for voters. This should focus on forms of ID that would support people who are least likely to have documents on the current list, including disabled people and those who are unemployed. Any changes to the list of accepted forms of ID should be confirmed in legislation in time for details to be included in public awareness materials and activities, and in guidance for polling station staff ahead of polling day.

Recommendation 3: Improve access to the Voter Authority Certificate for voters

Recommendation 3: Improve access to the Voter Authority Certificate for voters The UK Government should explore whether the deadline for Voter Authority Certificate applications could be moved closer to polling day, to extend its availability for voters who do not have any other form of accepted ID. The current deadline of six working days before polling day is significantly earlier than the Government's original policy intention – as set out in a policy paper published during the passage of the Elections Bill – which was for the deadline to be the day before polling day.

Electoral Registration Officers and their staff must still be able to process applications and issue Voter Authority Certificates to voters in time for them to be able to vote, alongside other essential duties taking place in the days before polling day. Any potential changes to application deadlines must therefore take into account the operational impact and workability of a later deadline, also recognising the level of dependency on printers and postal services to deliver Certificates to voters. Recommendation 4: Provide options for voters who do not have or cannot access any form of accepted ID Recommendation 4: Provide options for voters who do not have or cannot access any form of accepted ID Recommendation 4: Provide options for voters who do not have or cannot access any form of accepted ID The UK Government should enable registered voters who do have accepted ID to make an attestation at their polling station on behalf of someone who does not have any form of accepted ID (also referred to as 'vouching'). The voter ID requirement currently assumes that people either have an accepted form of ID or are sufficiently motivated to apply for a Voter Authority Certificate by the deadline. This means that voting is effectively not accessible for anyone without ID who misses the application deadline or only decides they want to vote on polling day (or close to polling day). In the limited and exceptional circumstances where a voter does not have access to any other form of accepted ID, allowing attestation would still provide a safeguard by requiring a formal link to a named elector who has had their own identity verified. Attestations are already a legitimate option for verifying identity in other parts of the electoral process, for example in applications to register to vote and applications for Voter Authority Certificates.

Recommendation 5: Polling station staff should continue to collect data on the impact of voter ID at future elections Recommendation 5: Polling station staff should continue to collect data on the impact of voter ID at future elections Recommendation 5: Polling station staff should continue to collect data on the impact of voter ID at future elections Analysing data from the first scheduled elections where this requirement has been in place has helped to develop an understanding of the impact of the requirement and can now be used to help improve the experience of voters and polling station staff at future polls. There is no legal duty or explicit power for Returning Officers to report data for future elections until the next UK Parliamentary general election, which must be held by January 2025. It would be a significant missed opportunity to learn and identify further improvements if Returning Officers did not collect and report data at the scheduled May 2024 elections, which will cover all areas of England and Wales. The UK Government should ensure that Returning Officers are able to collect and report monitoring data on the impact of voter ID at future elections, including specifically at the scheduled May 2024 elections and at any UK Parliament by-elections held during 2023 and 2024. This recommendation was first made in our June 2023 interim voter ID analysis.

Recommendation 6: The electoral community should work to improve the collection of data at polling stations for future elections

Recommendation 6: The electoral community should work to improve the collection of data at polling stations for future elections

Accurate data recording and reporting is essential to ensure there is a clear and reliable picture of the impact of the policy. This is needed to support informed debate and help identify areas for improvement. However, initial feedback from Returning Officers, polling station staff and observers suggests that some polling station staff found it difficult to record this additional data. We will work with the UK Government, Returning Officers, and electoral administrators to review the data collection forms and guidance for polling station staff, so they are clear and user-friendly. We will also work with local authorities and their training providers to make sure the ballot paper issuing procedure and data recording processes are fully explained to polling station staff. This should include guidance for polling station staff on the appropriate role of greeters and tellers. This recommendation was first made in our June 2023 interim voter ID analysis.

Most candidates engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and felt able to get their messages across to voters effectively. Many also included information on the new voter ID requirement. Voters found it easy to get information, but some did not feel well-informed about candidates. We also identified and received concerns about the use of campaigning techniques and information (both online and in print) that could be perceived to be misleading. This risks undermining voters' trust and confidence in our elections.

Concerns remain about the number of candidates experiencing intimidation or harassment, with many respondents to our survey saying they experienced some form of harassment in this election at least once. Candidates and campaigners should be able to participate freely in the democratic process without fear of intimidation.

Tackling these problems will require coordinated action from a range of partners across the electoral community.

Campaigning at the elections

More than 25,000 candidates stood for election to local authorities on 4 May 2023. Just under three-quarters of those candidates (72.1%) stood for either the Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat parties, and 13% stood for the Green Party. Candidates standing for other parties represented 7.6% of the total. A further 7.3% of candidates were independents who did not stand for any political party.

1 A total of 20 candidates stood for election as directly elected mayors across the four local authorities where those positions were contested.

2 In our report on the May 2022 elections , we recommended that the UK Government should review subscriber requirements for nominating candidates for different elected offices, and noted that the Government was planning to introduce changes for local elections. The law was changed, from the May 2023 elections onwards, to reduce the number of signatures required to nominate candidates for local elections from 10 to two.

people want more information s are engaging with voters but some people want more information Most candidates engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and felt able to get their messages across to voters effectively. Many voters also found it easy to get information, but this did not necessarily mean that they felt they had enough information. s engaged with voters using a variety of methods and many included information on the new ID requirements At the 2023 elections, people continued to receive information about candidates and parties from a range of different sources, and in a variety of formats. The most common ways people reported seeing information on parties and candidates were: a leaflet or flyer from a candidate or political party (63%) information on social media (17%) talking to a candidate or campaigner directly (11%) Older people were more likely than younger people to have seen a leaflet or flyer or to have talked to a candidate or campaigner directly, while younger people were more likely to say that they had seen information on social media. Findings from our survey of candidates were consistent with what voters reported, with the traditional campaigning methods being most used by candidates. We found that: more than nine-in-10 candidates used leaflets, newsletters and flyers (93%) over three-quarters used door-to-door canvassing (79%) around two-thirds said they used social media (66%) Most candidates also reported that they included messages to inform people about the new voter ID requirement. The methods they used for informing voters about ID are consistent with the most used campaigning methods, with around three-quarters saying they spoke to voters about ID (75%) or included the information in leaflets, newsletters, and posters (74%), with some candidates also using social media posts (61%). Most people found getting information easy, but some did not feel well-informed about candidates Our research after the election found that: two-thirds of people (67%) said that they found it easy to find information on what the election was about/for a similar proportion (61%) said that they found it easy to find information on the candidates and parties running for election in the local elections in areas with mayoral elections, three-quarters (76%) of people said that they found it easy to find information on the candidates and parties standing in the mayoral election three-quarters (76%) of people said it was easy to get information on the types of ID that they could use at a polling station, with 39% saying this was very easy just over three-quarters of candidates who responded to our survey (77%) said they felt able to get their views across to voters effectively. While not directly comparable, due to the different elections taking place and the sample not being representative of all candidates who stood at the elections, this is consistent with the three-quarters of respondents (74%) who said this in 2022 Although most people surveyed said they found it easy to find information, this did not necessarily mean that they felt they had enough information. Our research found that: four-in-10 (43%) people agreed that that they had enough information on candidates to make an informed choice, but almost a third (31%) disagreed people aged 18 to 34 years old and non-voters were more likely than average to say that they disagreed that they had enough information almost half (46%) felt they knew what the local elections were about, but over one quarter (27%) did not agree Although evidence continues to suggest that people would like more information on candidates, there are still some challenges to meeting this need. In Bedford, candidates for the mayoral election decided not to use the opportunity that was available to include campaign material in an information booklet that would normally be sent to all voters by the Returning Officer. We understand that the candidates were not prepared to make the required contribution to the cost of printing the booklet and some had concerns about the environmental impact. Misleading campaign techniques risk undermining voters' trust During the election campaign we identified and received concerns about the use of campaigning techniques and information (both online and in print) that could be perceived as misleading. These came from, and related to, campaigners from across the political spectrum. For example, some leaflets and posters used colours normally associated with other parties, while other materials included inaccurate information (in some cases inadvertently) about voter ID, such as the types of identification that would be accepted. It is for campaigners to decide on the content and format of their election materials, and it is essential to protect the space for them to get their messages across to voters ahead of polling day. However, campaigners must recognise the impact that their campaign choices have on voters' perceptions and confidence in elections, including their particular responsibility to provide accurate information about election and voting processes. Candidates continue to experience intimidation and harassment Candidates continue to experience intimidation and harassment After each election we ask candidates about their experiences of taking part in the election. Responses cannot be directly compared due to the different elections taking place each year and the self-selecting nature of the sample, but responses show that many candidates continue to report having experienced intimidation and harassment. Concerns remain about the number of candidates experiencing intimidation or harassment Our research following the 2022 local elections highlighted that a notable proportion of candidates responding to our survey said that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. Evidence collected by the Local Government Association (LGA) has also found an increase in the number of councillors saying they felt at risk at least some of the time while fulfilling their role, due to rising levels of abuse and intimidation. Ahead of the May 2023 elections, we highlighted the abuse faced by election candidates and called for a campaign free of intimidation, abuse or fear. We also worked with police and prosecution services to help candidates understand when behaviour goes beyond political debate and may be unlawful. The LGA and the Jo Cox Foundation issued a joint call for people to show respect and civility towards candidates standing in, and officials running, the local elections in May. When asked about how much of a problem they had with harassment, intimidation, or threats in this election, 36% of candidates who responded to our survey said they had some kind of problem (rating this as a two or above on a scale of one to five). However, when shown a list of types of harassment and asked if they had experienced any of them during the campaign, 55% of respondents said that they had experienced one of the scenarios at least once. The types of harassment that candidates reported having experienced most frequently included: abuse posted on social media (35%) someone intimidating or intentionally making them feel unsafe (24%) having campaign material torn down (18%) being insulted in person (18%) When asked if they had avoided doing something as part of their campaign to keep themselves safe, 37% of respondents said that they avoided campaigning on their own. "As a woman, I feel anxious about putting my address on the ballot paper and campaign materials." "I took precautions by not doing face to face meetings alone." "The level of personal abuse on social media was the worst I've ever known. Particularly Twitter, where spam accounts seem to be created to do so. Furthermore, there was no real reporting criteria online that matched. It will deter people from standing in the future." Only 12% of those who told us that they experienced harassment said that they reported it to the police. When it came to dealing with reports of intimidation and abuse from candidates, our survey of Single Point of Contact (SPOC) officers found that 54% of respondents (13 SPOCs) said that they were very confident that they knew where to direct candidates to get advice or report an issue, with 46% (11 SPOCs) saying they were reasonably confident. The Elections Act introduces a new electoral sanction for those found guilty of intimidating candidates, campaigners, and elected representatives, which will come into force from 1 November 2023. This should strengthen the deterrent against intimidating behaviour by enabling someone to be banned from standing for elected office, as well as imposing criminal sanctions, such as a prison sentence or fine. The UK Government has recently committed to explicitly exempt reasonable security expenses from contributing to spending limits for parties and candidates at certain elections, to ensure that these limits are not a barrier to providing necessary levels of security during election campaigns. Recommendation 7: The electoral community should take action to protect voter trust and confidence in the democratic system Recommendation 7: The electoral community should take action to protect voter trust and confidence in the democratic system Recommendation 7: The electoral community should take action to protect voter trust and confidence in the democratic system Candidates and campaigners should be able to participate freely in the democratic process, ensuring that voters can hear from a range of voices and have confidence in our elections. However, abuse and intimidation continue to persist. Tackling these problems will require coordinated action from a range of partners across the electoral community, including political parties and campaigners themselves as well as police forces and prosecuting authorities. They should recognise the impact their choices have on how the public views our democratic system. They should actively discourage the use of inflammatory language and emphasise the importance of respect and constructive engagement with opposing viewpoints. Political parties should consider reviewing their membership criteria to include a clause explicitly emphasising respect for other campaigners and fostering a healthy political debate. The police and prosecutors must continue to treat allegations and cases of election-related intimidation seriously and demonstrate that those committing offences against candidates and campaigners will face significant sanctions. We will continue to work with parties, campaigners, the police and prosecutors, and the wider electoral community to understand what is driving this intimidatory behaviour and collectively develop effective responses to ensure that campaigners can get their messages across to voters openly and directly without fear of intimidation. Delivering the elections The experience of electoral administration at the May 2023 elections Electoral administrators were able to deliver well-run elections in challenging circumstances. However, significant changes to the process of voting added a new layer of complexity and risk to an already stretched process. The capacity and resilience of election teams remain a significant concern, especially looking ahead to the polls that are scheduled for 2024 and the further changes from the Elections Act that will need to be implemented. To ensure they can continue to deliver well-run elections that meet voters' expectations, electoral administrators need to be confident that they will have sufficient time and capacity and fully functioning operational resources needed to implement further electoral administration changes ahead of elections in 2024. Before making any final decisions about implementing the remaining Elections Act changes, the UK Government must carefully consider whether the necessary time and resources are, or will be, available. Delivering the elections Elections took place in 230 local authorities in England with local elections to district councils, most metropolitan boroughs (excluding Birmingham and London) and unitary authorities. Many local authority areas also had town and parish council elections, and there were local mayoral elections in Bedford, Leicester, Mansfield, and Middlesbrough. Local authority officers and their teams were responsible for electoral registration, managing the nominations process, absent voting, polling stations, and the counting of votes for the elections. As a result of new requirements introduced by the Elections Act, electoral administrators were also responsible for processing Voter Authority Certificate and Anonymous Elector's Document applications, and issuing temporary Certificates or Documents, as well as providing equipment and support in polling stations to enable, or make it easier for, disabled voters to vote independently and in secret. The capacity and resilience of electoral administration teams has been further stretched. The capacity and resilience of electoral administration teams has been further stretched. Our reports on the May 2022 elections highlighted significant concerns about capacity and resilience of the UK's electoral administration systems and structures. In particular we noted that the changes being introduced by the Elections Act had the potential to increase the challenge of recruiting and retaining skilled and trained polling station staff for future elections. Elections teams were able to deliver the May 2023 polls, despite the additional pressures and challenges of significant and complex legislative changes. However, there is evidence that capacity and resilience within the electoral administration community was further stretched this year, and that administrators were only able to make these elections work by exceptional efforts and commitment. These remain key concerns for future elections, particularly looking ahead to the polls that are scheduled for May 2024 and the next UK Parliamentary general election which must be held by January 2025. We have already begun to work with senior representatives from the electoral administration community to consider these concerns, and there is a strong commitment to work together at a strategic level to tackle key challenges facing the sector in the medium to longer-term, including: electoral law reform; the role of technology; resilience and capacity of suppliers; resourcing of elections teams; and funding for elections. Many Returning Officers again faced challenges finding staff and relied on support from areas without elections. We received feedback from 17% of local authorities after the elections. Comments and views received from administrators show that longstanding problems with staff recruitment remain a key concern. When asked to indicate how much of a problem they had recruiting staff, we found that: nearly a quarter (24%) of respondents said that they experienced significant issues recruiting polling station staff almost one-in-six (16%) said that they had significant issues retaining polling station staff between recruitment and polling day. Recruiting count staff was less of a problem, with over two-thirds of respondents (68%) saying that they had no issues. Comments from administrators highlighted a lack of experienced staff and a high number of recruits dropping out ahead of polling day, including some Presiding Officers (POs). "We really struggled with recruitment of polling station staff this year. We had lots of last-minute dropouts and several POs pulled out after the training." "We have very low resilience amongst polling station staff and the core team. There are not enough experienced staff available to staff stations or the core team." The feedback also shows that the changes introduced by the Elections Act added a new layer of complexity and risk to an already stretched electoral system. In some cases, the higher levels of staff dropouts were attributed to the additional responsibilities added by the Elections Act changes. Administrators did, however, generally welcome the impact of the reduction in the number of subscribers required for local elections which came into effect for the first time at these elections. Further changes are being introduced by the Elections Act, such as new restrictions on handing in postal votes at polling stations, which will mean Presiding Officers have more new responsibilities from May 2024 onwards. These have the potential to further increase the challenge of recruiting and retaining skilled and trained polling station staff for future elections. Because elections did not take place in all parts of England this year, some electoral administration teams were able to call on neighbouring local authorities for support. This is not a sustainable long-term solution, however, and staffing is likely to remain a significant challenge. In May 2024, for example, elections will take place across all parts of England and Wales, so there will be no additional support available from neighbouring areas with no polls. In addition to staffing challenges, there is continuing evidence that electoral administrators are finding it difficult to identify and book venues for polling stations. This creates additional work for administrators particularly if changes need to be made close to election day. “Polling stations were more challenging than usual, we were unsure whether two venues would be in use up until the days before the poll, despite being booked in November. Two polling stations lost their polling booths between them being delivered and polling day. A couple of venues changed the room the polling station was located in without prior consultation.” “A couple of polling stations were problematic to book, one cancelled just before the poll card data was sent.” Additional pressures from new electoral processes exacerbated existing challenges and increased risks to well-run elections. The changes introduced by the Elections Act added a new layer of complexity and risk to an already stretched electoral system. For the May 2023 elections, there were a number of additional responsibilities for electoral administrators, including: processing Voter Authority Certificate and Anonymous Elector’s Document applications; issuing temporary Certificates and Documents; voter ID data collection at polling stations; and developing and delivering training to polling station staff on new processes. Although feedback indicated that the new processes in themselves were relatively manageable at these particular polls – local elections with relatively low turnout and fewer than anticipated Voter Authority Certificate applications – administrators have nevertheless expressed significant concerns about the potential impact and risks at higher turnout elections, particularly the next UK Parliamentary general election. “Once we were aware of what we needed to do, the process was straightforward and with low numbers there were no challenges. I am more fearful for when the general election is announced, as voter turnout is likely to be double what it was for the locals.” “The election went very smoothly for us, though this was on a low turnout with quite high postal voting rates. The bigger unknown is how we would have dealt with considerably higher numbers for a poll with a much higher turnout, such as a general election.” Comments from administrators also suggest that the additional pressures of delivering new processes exacerbated existing challenges and have increased the risk of administrative errors or failure. “Service provision becomes increasingly difficult each year and with each new burden. We are seeing growing challenges in the recruitment and retention of staff, both in casual election roles (polling stations, count etc.) and in the core team of electoral administrators. New burdens obviously add to this, particularly with the Elections Act which has been consistently rushed, with guidance provided at the last minute when regulations are rushed through.” A number of electoral administration errors did occur at these elections that had the potential to affect levels of confidence of candidates, agents and voters in the effectiveness and integrity electoral process. We are aware of issues in eight local authorities, which have led us to conclude that the Returning Officers did not meet elements of our performance standards. In three areas there were errors related to nominations and postal voting, directly impacting on candidates and voters: The determination of nomination papers: In Arun, a candidate who had submitted a valid nomination form was not included in the notice of uncontested election. In Bedford, nomination papers for a candidate were accepted without a home address form. Errors relating to the production of ballot papers: In East Devon, ballot papers included with the first issue of postal voting packs for one ward did not contain a party political emblem for one candidate, which led to the packs being reissued. The other errors related to the administration of the count and declaration of results: Votes not included in the count: In Newcastle, 193 postal votes spread over 26 wards were not processed and therefore not included in the final results. Similarly, in North Lincolnshire, around 800 postal votes were found to have not been included in the count for one ward following the declaration of the result. Inaccurate declarations of results: In West Devon, an error in transposing the votes cast for four candidates in one ward led to the incorrect result being declared initially. In Oadby and Wigston, a miscalculation when tabulating the votes, led to incorrect results being published for one ward, although this did not affect the overall election outcome. In East Devon, the declaration of results was incorrect in recording the total number of votes cast for one candidate in one ward – this had no impact on the final result. In Pendle, there was an election petition after the wrong candidate was announced as elected. This was due to the totals for the two candidates being mixed up and incorrectly transferred onto the declaration of result. In all of these cases, election teams acted quickly to rectify the error, as far as was possible in each case, once they became aware of the issue. Once made aware of the issues, we were able to provide each of them with support and guidance to help them address their error. Since the elections, we have worked closely with the Returning Officers and their teams as they have investigated what caused the issues to occur and identified actions to prevent similar issues arising in the future. We will continue to work with the Returning Officers as they implement the required improvements to processes to help ensure that voters, candidates and political parties can have confidence in the delivery of election processes. Increasing reliance on suppliers highlights risks for Returning Officers Elections are delivered through complex systems involving many different partners, including commercial suppliers. During the election, we received reports of some localised issues with the delivery of postal votes and with ballot paper proofing and printing, which raised administrators' concerns around the capacity and resilience of their suppliers. "Used Royal Mail 1st class post for delivery of all postal vote packs. Higher than usual requests for replacement postal vote packs from electors claiming not to have received initial pack. Currently liaising with both service providers (postal and printing)." "Our main issue was with the postal packs not being delivered by Royal Mail which led to over 200 needing to be re-issued. I believe other councils had similar problems. Issues with the post office in relation to returning postal votes. Frequently receiving postal votes for other authorities. More postal vote re-issues than in previous years because a postal vote was not received." Feedback also suggests that significant changes to operational infrastructure during the election period – specifically updates to the central digital ERO portal (EROP) that is operated by a team at the Department for Levelling Up, Housing and Communities – created unanticipated challenges for administrators when processing Voter Authority Certificate applications. "Functionality in the ERO portal was very limited at the start and not being able to send follow-up communications was difficult to track outside of the portal. A lack of proper information in the customer-facing website, i.e. no examples of an appropriate photo, meant a lot of applications had to be placed on hold to request a new photo to be provided. This created unnecessary extra work." "The only difficulty was the changing functionality of the EROP, and although the functionality improved, the extent of functions at the outset were limited.” Recommendation 8: Ensure centrally provided digital systems are operational and updated in good time ahead of scheduled polls Recommendation 8: Ensure centrally provided digital systems are operational and updated in good time ahead of scheduled polls Recommendation 8: Ensure centrally provided digital systems are operational and updated in good time ahead of scheduled polls The UK Government should improve the operation and functionality of the central digital portal for processing Voter Authority Certificate applications, to better support Electoral Registration Officers dealing with applications particularly during the period close to polling day. Administrators should be able to rely on a fully functional ERO portal especially in the immediate run-up to an election, when there is likely to be a peak in Voter Authority Certificate applications. Updates should not be released during the live election timetable for future sets of polls, to minimise disruption for EROs. The UK Government should also ensure that any further digital infrastructure required to support new policy changes – in particular the new online absent vote application process – is available and fully operational in good time ahead of changes coming into force, to allow Electoral Registration Officers and Returning Officers to not only meet their legal duties but also provide the level of customer service that voters deserve. Implementation of policy changes must be carefully managed to minimise the risk to well-run elections Implementation of policy changes must be carefully managed to minimise the risk to well-run elections It is now a well-established and widely supported principle of effective electoral administration that Returning Officers need confirmation and clarity about changes to policy and legislation in good time to plan and deliver them. This principle, which was first highlighted after significant issues at the 2007 Scottish Parliament and local government elections, specifies that legislation should be clear at least six months before it is due to be implemented or complied with by voters, campaigners, or electoral administrators. The experiences of and feedback from electoral administrators following the May 2023 elections have highlighted the impact of delays to the development and delivery of secondary legislation and operational infrastructure ahead of these polls. Further changes will be introduced for the elections that are expected to be held in 2024, and administrators will have to deliver these alongside changes to UK Parliamentary constituency boundaries, polling district reviews, and the annual canvass. This will increase risks, which will be exacerbated without sufficient clarity and resources for administrators to prepare effectively well in advance of delivery. Further significant changes to elections need to be carefully managed ahead of important polls in 2024 Further changes from the Elections Act are expected to be implemented ahead of the scheduled May 2024 elections taking place across England and Wales and the UK Parliamentary general election that must be held by January 2025. These include: the introduction of online absent vote application processes changes to commonly used names that can be used on ballot papers by candidates changes to arrangements and time limits for postal and proxy voting appointments the removal of the 15-year registration limit for overseas voters Electoral administrators need early clarity and certainty about how and when these changes will be implemented, including any new or changed central digital infrastructure, so that they can prepare for and deliver well-run elections during 2024. The experience of planning for the May 2023 elections highlights the impact and risks of delays to confirming legislation and delivery infrastructures, which are both key dependencies for the wider electoral community. The detailed secondary legislation specifying how the voter ID requirements would work in practice were not approved by Parliament until late December 2022, and the Voter Authority Certificate application service (hosted on gov.uk) did not go live until 16 January 2023. This not only made it more difficult to raise awareness of the new requirements with voters, but it also meant that detailed guidance for electoral administrators could only be made available with limited time for it to be considered before it needed to be implemented in practice. Although the final secondary legislation for the changes that remain to be implemented is currently expected to be available by November 2023, Returning Officers will still be highly dependent on further new digital services that will be provided by the UK Government. For example, introducing an online absent voting process will enable voters to apply for a postal vote and some types of proxy vote using a new online portal ahead of elections in 2024. While processing applications received online could be quicker than is currently the case for paper forms, the new portal system will need to be delivered with the necessary level of functionality to support quick and efficient processing from the outset. This will be particularly important if the online application process leads to larger volumes of applications, particularly close to key deadlines ahead of major polls (as has consistently been the case following the introduction of online voter registration since 2014). The portal must also be made available sufficiently far in advance of the election period so that administrators have time to familiarise themselves with the portal, and to allow time for any issues with the technology to be identified and resolved before the election period and avoid updates being issued close to voter deadlines. Electoral Registration Officers will also be dependent on digital services provided by the UK Government when processing applications from overseas voters who become eligible to vote following the removal of the 15-year limit. When determining applications, they will need to use data from the Department for Work and Pensions to check the identity and, in some cases, the historical residence of overseas voters. The context for implementing these changes for elections during 2024 is particularly complex, and Electoral Registration Officers and Returning Officers will be highly dependent on others to support and enable them to deliver their new statutory responsibilities: electoral law is already fragmented and complex, and the capacity and resilience of electoral administration teams are already stretched the electoral administration community is highly dependent on a range of commercial suppliers and external partners, including central government a UK Parliamentary general election could be called at any time and, once it is, must be delivered within a short timescale of less than six weeks the impact of the new online absent vote application option on application volumes in the weeks ahead of a major poll is unknown but may be significant widespread changes to UK Parliament constituencies must be implemented from late 2023, alongside a required review of local polling districts and polling places some new absent voting changes will only be implemented in Scotland and Wales for voters at UK parliamentary elections (and PCC elections in Wales), and not for voters at devolved elections This context increases both the risks to delivery of future polls and the need for effective management and robust decision-making by the UK Government. Recommendation 9: Ensure that dependencies and delivery risks are carefully managed for future changes to elections Recommendation 9: Ensure that dependencies and delivery risks are carefully managed for future changes to elections Recommendation 9: Ensure that dependencies and delivery risks are carefully managed for future changes to elections Further significant electoral administration changes are expected to be implemented ahead of elections in 2024, in addition to the new voter ID and accessibility policies that have been delivered for the first time this year. To ensure they can continue to deliver well-run elections that meet voters' expectations, electoral administrators need to be confident that they will have sufficient time and capacity and fully functioning operational resources to support them. Before making any final decisions about implementing the remaining Elections Act changes, the UK Government must carefully consider whether the necessary time and resources are, or will be, available. Any decisions must be informed by a robust analysis of available data and evidence about realistic levels of preparedness, particularly given the complex range of changes that must be delivered and the interdependencies between them. The UK Government should publish its assessment of the evidence and the risks to successful delivery of the next set of Elections Act changes, and set out its proposals for mitigating those risks. This assessment should be available to Parliament and the wider electoral administration community so that it can be considered alongside draft legislation bringing these changes into effect.

Summary of recommendations

Recommendation 1: Increase awareness of the support available for disabled voters There is some evidence that levels of awareness of the support and equipment available, especially in polling stations, is still lower than it could be. This includes awareness of both the new accessibility measures and the existing provisions that are available (such as the possibility of asking a companion or polling station staff for help with voting). We will continue to work with the electoral community, national and local civil society organisations, and the media to raise awareness of the support that is available for disabled voters. We will also work with them to further develop our voter information resources for disabled voters. This work should include pro-actively ensuring voters are aware of the support and assistance that is available to help them vote, and how they can make a request for additional equipment or support – whether in advance of the election or on polling day.

Recommendation 2: Review the list of accepted ID The UK Government should review the current list of accepted forms of ID to identify any additional documents that could be included to improve accessibility for voters. This should focus on forms of ID that would support people who are least likely to have documents on the current list, including disabled people and those who are unemployed. Any changes to the list of accepted forms of ID should be confirmed in legislation in time for details to be included in public awareness materials and activities, and in guidance for polling station staff ahead of polling day.

Recommendation 3: Improve access to the Voter Authority Certificate for voters The UK Government should explore whether the deadline for Voter Authority Certificate applications could be moved closer to polling day, to extend its availability for voters who do not have any other form of accepted ID. The current deadline of six working days before polling day is significantly earlier than the Government's original policy intention – as set out in a policy paper published during the passage of the Elections Bill – which was for the deadline to be the day before polling day.

Electoral Registration Officers and their staff must still be able to process applications and issue Voter Authority Certificates to voters in time for them to be able to vote, alongside other essential duties taking place in the days before polling day. Any potential changes to application deadlines must therefore take into account the operational impact and workability of a later deadline, also recognising the level of dependency on printers and postal services to deliver Certificates to voters.

Recommendation 4: Provide options for voters who do not have or cannot access any form of accepted ID The UK Government should enable registered voters who do have accepted ID to make an attestation at their polling station on behalf of someone who does not have any form of accepted ID (also referred to as 'vouching'). The voter ID requirement currently assumes that people either have an accepted form of ID or are sufficiently motivated to apply for a Voter Authority Certificate by the deadline. This means that voting is effectively not accessible for anyone without ID who misses the application deadline or only decides they want to vote on polling day (or close to polling day). In the limited and exceptional circumstances where a voter does not have access to any other form of accepted ID, allowing attestation would still provide a safeguard by requiring a formal link to a named elector who has had their own identity verified. Attestations are already a legitimate option for verifying identity in other parts of the electoral process, for example in applications to register to vote and applications for Voter Authority Certificates. Recommendation 5: Polling station staff should continue to collect data on the impact of voter ID at future elections Analysing data from the first scheduled elections where this requirement has been in place has helped to develop an understanding of the impact of the requirement and can now be used to help improve the experience of voters and polling station staff at future polls. There is no legal duty or explicit power for Returning Officers to report data for future elections until the next UK Parliamentary general election, which must be held by January 2025. It would be a significant missed opportunity to learn and identify further improvements if Returning Officers did not collect and report data at the scheduled May 2024 elections, which will cover all areas of England and Wales. The UK Government should ensure that Returning Officers are able to collect and report monitoring data on the impact of voter ID at future elections, including specifically at the scheduled May 2024 elections and at any UK Parliament by-elections held during 2023 and 2024. This recommendation was first made in our June 2023 interim voter ID analysis. Recommendation 6: The electoral community should work to improve the collection of data at polling stations for future elections Accurate data recording and reporting is essential to ensure there is a clear and reliable picture of the impact of the policy. This is needed to support informed debate and help identify areas for improvement. However, initial feedback from Returning Officers, polling station staff and observers suggests that some polling station staff found it difficult to record this additional data. We will work with the UK Government, Returning Officers, and electoral administrators to review the data collection forms and guidance for polling station staff, so they are clear and user-friendly. We will also work with local authorities and their training providers to make sure the ballot paper issuing procedure and data recording processes are fully explained to polling station staff. This should include guidance for polling station staff on the appropriate role of greeters and tellers. This recommendation was first made in our June 2023 interim voter ID analysis. Recommendation 7: The electoral community should take action to protect voter trust and confidence in the democratic system Candidates and campaigners should be able to participate freely in the democratic process, ensuring that voters can hear from a range of voices and have confidence in our elections. However, abuse and intimidation continue to persist. Tackling these problems will require coordinated action from a range of partners across the electoral community, including political parties and campaigners themselves as well as police forces and prosecuting authorities. s should recognise the impact their choices have on how the public views our democratic system. They should actively discourage the use of inflammatory language and emphasise the importance of respect and constructive engagement with opposing viewpoints. Political parties should consider reviewing their membership criteria to include a clause explicitly emphasising respect for other campaigners and fostering a healthy political debate. The police and prosecutors must continue to treat allegations and cases of election-related intimidation seriously and demonstrate that those committing offences against candidates and campaigners will face significant sanctions. We will continue to work with parties, campaigners, the police and prosecutors, and the wider electoral community to understand what is driving this intimidatory behaviour and collectively develop effective responses to ensure that campaigners can get their messages across to voters openly and directly without fear of intimidation.

Recommendation 8: Ensure centrally provided digital systems are operational and updated in good time ahead of scheduled polls

The UK Government should improve the operation and functionality of the central digital portal for processing Voter Authority Certificate applications, to better support Electoral Registration Officers dealing with applications particularly during the period close to polling day. Administrators should be able to rely on a fully functional ERO portal especially in the immediate run-up to an election, when there is likely to be a peak in Voter Authority Certificate applications. Updates should not be released during the live election timetable for future sets of polls, to minimise disruption for EROs.

The UK Government should also ensure that any further digital infrastructure required to support new policy changes – in particular the new online absent vote application process – is available and fully operational in good time ahead of changes coming into force, to allow Electoral Registration Officers and Returning Officers to not only meet their legal duties but also provide the level of customer service that voters deserve.

Recommendation 9: Ensure that dependencies and delivery risks are carefully managed for future changes to elections

Further significant electoral administration changes are expected to be implemented ahead of elections in 2024, in addition to the new voter ID and accessibility policies that have been delivered for the first time this year. To ensure they can continue to deliver well-run elections that meet voters' expectations, electoral administrators need to be confident that they will have sufficient time and capacity and fully functioning operational resources to support them. Before making any final decisions about implementing the remaining Elections Act changes, the UK Government must carefully consider whether the necessary time and resources are, or will be, available. Any decisions must be informed by a robust analysis of available data and evidence about realistic levels of preparedness, particularly given the complex range of changes that must be delivered and the interdependencies between them. The UK Government should publish its assessment of the evidence and the risks to successful delivery of the next set of Elections Act changes, and set out its proposals for mitigating those risks. This assessment should be available to Parliament and the wider electoral administration community so that it can be considered alongside draft legislation bringing these changes into effect.

Report: How the 2011 Northern Ireland Assembly election was run | Electoral Commission Search Report: How the 2011 Northern Ireland Assembly election was run You are in the Northern Ireland Assembly elections section Home Northern Ireland Assembly elections On this page Summary Planning for the election Polling day The count Moving forward Recommendations Our recommendations to the UK Government Our recommendations to the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland Our commitments Download our full report First published: 5 December 2019 Last updated: 7 August 2019 Summary There was no security disruption either on polling day or at the counts and the elections passed off peacefully. The vast majority of voters interviewed in our public opinion survey felt that the Assembly election was well run. However, the time taken to complete the single transferable vote (STV) counts continues to be a source of considerable frustration among political parties, candidates and the media in Northern Ireland. The administration of the combined elections and referendum in Northern Ireland was a significant challenge for the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland (CEO) and his staff.

The evidence suggests that the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland (EONI) had the capacity to deliver two elections and a referendum on the same day, and should be able to do so in the future – provided there is effective planning and resources in place. Planning for the election Planning began well in advance of polling day and our regular monitoring showed that the CEO and his senior staff put a considerable amount of time and effort into planning for the successful delivery of three polls on one day. However, it was evident that much less focus and attention had been given to planning for the counts, with Area Electoral Officers (AEOs) left to plan and manage their own counts. There was no evidence of an overall plan on how the counts should be delivered, and instructions on how to conduct the counts were very late in being sent to AEOs from the EONI head office. Sufficient funding was made available by the government to the CEO to deliver the elections and referendum in Northern Ireland. It remains difficult to benchmark the funding of electoral services in Northern Ireland in comparison to other parts of the UK. In Great Britain, through the Electoral Commission's performance standards regime, information is collected from local authorities about the cost of electoral administration, but these standards do not apply to Northern Ireland. Over 17,000 voters were added to the register during the period of 'late registration' and much of this can be attributed to the fact that poll cards were issued much earlier than at any previous election in Northern Ireland. The number of postal and proxy votes also increased at this election.

Candidates and agents were generally complimentary about the nominations process and the support they received from electoral administrators in advance of the polls. AEOs were responsible for the recruitment and training of approximately 6,000 election staff. This proved to be a particular challenge and placed a considerable burden on their preparations for polling day and the count. Although feedback from the EONI evaluation of the training was largely positive, it was clear at the count that presiding officers encountered significant difficulties completing their paperwork at the close of poll. The structure of the EONI and the combined polls highlighted the heavy reliance placed on a small number of staff within the EONI. AEOs in particular had significant workloads in preparing for polling day and the counts. There was evidence that they were overstretched and had to work long hours to get the job done. As a result, some were fatigued by the time it came to managing their counts. Polling day The overall conduct and management of polling day proved to be successful. The day passed off without any significant interruption and there were no reports of queues outside polling places when the polls closed at 10pm. The appointment of an additional poll clerk proved to be of particular benefit given that three ballot boxes were used at each polling station. There was some confusion on polling day resulting in a number of voters being unable to distinguish between the Assembly and local council ballot papers. The number of ballot papers spoilt at STV elections continued to be high even though the same voting system was used for the Assembly and local council elections. There was frustration amongst candidates and political parties about the lack of clarity and consistency regarding the right to canvass outside polling places and a desire on their part to have the matter resolved before the next election in Northern Ireland. Some parties again suggested that there was a need for an exclusion zone outside polling places where canvassing would be prohibited. The count The STV counts were, not for the first time, the subject of sustained criticism from some candidates, political parties and the media. The primary cause of complaint concerned slowness and the general lack of information on how counts were progressing. As at previous Assembly elections the entire count process (verification and counting) lasted two full days. However, having to verify three sets of ballot papers simultaneously before counting began, caused significant delays in announcing turnout and first preference totals. Other factors also had an impact on the speed of the count, including staff failing to turn up at some count venues and the poor quality of paperwork returned by many presiding officers. There was also evidence of inconsistent practice and the lack of an overall plan for the Assembly and referendum counts. AEOs were also unclear about how the referendum count totals should be collated and communicated. As a result the referendum count total in Northern Ireland was not declared until 2am on Saturday 7 May, long after the result was known in the rest of the UK. The process of manually counting ballot papers in an election using STV is by its nature a time-consuming one and it appeared that many of those present at the count, including candidates, agents and the media, did not understand the verification and counting processes. Overall, there was a general lack of information on how the counts were progressing, and this contributed to a growing sense of frustration and tension amongst those present and in the media. This could have been avoided if better communication plans had been put in place, if regular updates through public announcements were made and through making better use of technology.

Moving forward After the election the CEO made a commitment to carrying out a full review of the arrangements in place for managing elections and conducting counts in Northern Ireland. We welcome this initiative. The difficulties encountered at the May polls mean it is imperative that the review's terms of reference are sufficiently wide to address the shortcomings identified in this report. The review should be led by the CEO with input from experienced electoral administrators and Electoral Commission representatives. One of its outputs should be a timetabled and resourced action plan for improving the future delivery of elections and counts in Northern Ireland. The accountability of the CEO to the electorate in Northern Ireland has been identified in previous Commission reports as an area that needs to improve. All electoral matters remain the responsibility of the UK Government and the Northern Ireland Assembly has no remit in this area. In order to enhance the confidence of the electorate, the UK Government should introduce improved accountability arrangements. These include extending to Northern Ireland the statutory framework of performance standards that apply in the rest of the UK, and considering how the people of Northern Ireland and their elected representatives can have greater visibility of, and a greater stake in, how the CEO manages electoral matters. Currently the CEO is the only electoral officer in the UK whose performance against independent standards is not reported publicly to electors. It is therefore difficult to make comparisons about how well electoral services are administered in Northern Ireland compared to the rest of the UK. Although the structures in place for the delivery of electoral registration and elections are different, the provision of such comparative data is necessary, to benchmark the CEO's delivery against other Returning Officers in the UK and to make future improvements. In order to address this, the CEO has committed in his 2011/12 Business Plan to working with the Commission on the development of performance standards for elections and electoral registration in Northern Ireland. This has the potential to transform how elections and electoral registration are administered. We will work with the CEO in developing appropriate performance standards for Northern Ireland by April 2012. Recommendations Throughout this report we make a number of recommendations aimed at improving the provision of electoral services in Northern Ireland. These have the potential to enhance the delivery of elections from the perspectives of voters, those standing for election, and electoral administrators who manage elections and counts. Many of the recommendations in this report are addressed to the CEO and are relevant to the strategic review of elections and counts that he announced at our post-election seminar at the end of May 2011. We will work with the CEO in ensuring that the recommendations in this report are addressed in full. We have also made a number of recommendations to the UK Government, some of which will require legislative change. We have also set out a number of our own commitments to enhance electoral services in Northern Ireland and we will work with the CEO and the UK Government to ensure their implementation. Our recommendations to the UK Government To enhance the experience of voters, electoral administrators and candidates we recommend that the UK government addresses the following issues in advance of the next scheduled elections in Northern Ireland in 2014: Legislative change Amend the law to permit the name of the election being contested to be clearly printed on the ballot paper when elections are combined in any part of the UK. Amend or clarify the law in respect of the use of languages, other than , on electoral documentation in Northern Ireland Amend the Electoral Administration Act (2006) so that the performance standards regime that applies in Great Britain is extended to Northern Ireland. Policy reviews Review the deadlines for absent voting in Northern Ireland so that those who apply during the 'late registration window' can avail of an absent vote if they are eligible. Review the arrangements for postal voting in Northern Ireland to ensure that there is consistency across the UK. Consult with parties across the UK on the future of polling agents with a view to having their role either abolished or modified. Review freepost at combined elections in Northern Ireland, consulting political parties and relevant stakeholders to develop recommendations. Complete an equality impact assessment on candidate deposits and subscribers before making a final decision on the way forward in Northern Ireland. Consult stakeholders in Northern Ireland on what accountability arrangements could be put in place to enhance confidence and transparency in the CEO's decision making. Our recommendations to the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland To enhance the experience of voters and improve the administration of elections in Northern Ireland we recommend that the Chief Electoral Officer addresses the following issues in advance of the next elections in 2014: Poll cards Issue poll cards to electors at least four weeks before polling day. Review the messaging on poll cards for future elections informing voters that he has a legal obligation to send poll cards to all eligible voters, including those who have permanent postal or proxy votes. Electoral registration and absent voting Consider what else he could do to simplify electoral registration in Northern Ireland, without compromising the security of the system. Record the reasons why applications for postal and proxy votes at elections in Northern Ireland have been rejected. Introduce a system to give voters applying for a postal or proxy vote the opportunity to refresh their signature. Ballot papers Conduct user-testing of ballot papers used at combined elections to alleviate the potential for voter confusion. Polling places Clarify what parts of a polling place party campaigners can access and canvass at on polling day and ensure that presiding officers are trained consistently on this issue. In the absence of legislation, work with political parties in developing a voluntary code of practice on canvassing outside polling places and have this in place for the next election in Northern Ireland. Review the design and content of the documentation used at the close of poll with a view to simplifying it for use at future stand-alone or combined polls. Training and management Review how training is organised and managed in advance of the next set of elections. Review the working practices of AEOs in the future management of elections and clarify their roles.

Counts Ensure that the verification of unused ballot papers is conducted in accordance with the law at all elections in Northern Ireland. Ensure that teams responsible for classifying doubtful ballot papers are trained in this aspect of the count. Review how new technology can be used to keep the public better informed of how election counts are progressing. Review the potential for conducting constituency-based counts for the 2015 Assembly election. Establish a broadcasters' liaison group to ensure that arrangements for media access and reporting at counts are improved. Local elections Publish details of the expenditure returns received from the councils on the cost of local elections on the EONI website. CEO strategic review Ensure that the strategic review of elections and counts is led by the CEO and draws input from experienced electoral administrators and Commission representatives. Complete the strategic review by September 2012 as outlined in the terms of reference. Share his final report of the strategic review of elections and the count with political parties and other key stakeholders. Our commitments We have given a number of commitments to enhance electoral services in Northern Ireland and we will work with the CEO, the UK Government and relevant stakeholders where appropriate, to deliver these. We will work with the CEO and the Northern Ireland Office to ensure that the recommendations contained in this report are addressed in full. We will report on the progress achieved in implementing the recommendations by October 2012. We will report separately on integrity issues arising at the 2011 polls across the UK in early 2012. We will report on the financial aspects of the 2011 elections in early 2012, after all campaign spending returns have been submitted. We will work with the CEO to consider what further action could be taken before the next election to instil greater confidence and trust in the electoral process in Northern Ireland. We will work with the CEO in addressing count issues in Northern Ireland with the aim of improving the effectiveness of the count model for the next set of elections using STV in Northern Ireland. We will work with the CEO in developing appropriate performance standards for elections and electoral registration in Northern Ireland by April 2012. We will work with the EONI to ensure improvements are in place for the delivery of the public helpline by the next election in 2014. The Chair welcomed all to the meeting and advised the Board that the renewal of the terms of office of both Elan Closs Stephens and Sue Bruce had been approved by the House of Commons and that the Royal Warrant had been received for Alasdair Morgan. Declarations of interest There were no new declarations of interest. Minutes of the previous Board Meeting (EC 87/20) Commissioners noted the lengthy statutory process for the appointment of Commissioners. This could impact on quoracy at Board meetings, but this was not presently likely. Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 21 October 2020 be approved. Supplementary Estimate 2020/21 (EC 88/20) The Chief Executive and the Director of Finance and Corporate Services introduced the report and the supplementary paper analysing the proposed changes. The changes were mostly related to the postponement of the May 2020 elections, and the consequent ability to return a significant sum to HM Treasury. It was noted that there had been a delay in implementing the new Political Finance Online project due to supplier difficulties outside of the Commission's control. There was confidence that the project could be successfully completed using in house resources, including some extra recruitments. Roll-out of the system was now scheduled for September 2021. This would incur additional resources above the project budget. Action against the suppliers could not be ruled out. The Chair of Audit Committee had been briefed in detail. It was agreed that further regular updates would be given to the Board on the Political Finance Online project. Resolved: That the Commissioners approved the changes required for the 2020/21 budget and onward submission to the Speaker's Committee. Performance report quarter 2, 2020/21 (EC 89/20) Commissioners received the report, noting the stability within Human Resources. The status of some current party registration cases was discussed. Commissioners discussed the ways of working refresh of the office accommodation at Bunhill Row and the impact of public health guidelines for Covid-19 including working from home. Resolved: That the report be noted. Governance matter (EC 90/20) The Chief Executive introduced the report on proposed interim arrangements from 1 January 2021 pending the appointment of a new Chair. The Commissioners noted the position on the recruitment of the new Chair and also a new lead Commissioner in Northern Ireland.

Resolved: That pending the new Chair of the Commission being appointed and commencing duties, Rob Vincent should act as lead Commissioner as appropriate, including chairing the meetings of the Board, interacting with the other Commissioners, working closely with the Chief Executive and the Directors of the Commission, and engaging with key external stakeholders. Resolved: That other Commissioners, particularly Sarah Chambers, may also be asked to assist as necessary.

Update on 2021 elections (EC 91/20) The Commission directors provided a presentation covering the following key headlines:

- Planning to ensure that the May 2021 polls are as safe as can be in a Covid- 19 context, including planned public opinion research on attitudes to voting in this context in England and Wales
- Engaging with governments, including new legislation by both Scottish and Welsh governments
- Supporting electoral administrators
- Supporting voters, including through public campaigns
- Supporting and regulating campaigners

Commissioners discussed the impacts of Covid-19 restrictions, particularly in polling stations, managing expectations and providing assurance to members of the public on voting in person.

Resolved: That the presentation be noted.

Update on voter education resources (EC 92/20) Commissioners received a background paper along with a presentation introduced by the Head of Digital Communications and Learning, noting the following key points:

- Strong partnerships with the devolved administrations
- Promotion and dissemination of both digital and physical materials
- Stakeholder feedback, which had been very positive so far
- Future plans

Commissioners welcomed the progress on this area of work, and discussed learning providers, cost of materials, resources and future budgets. It was noted that feedback from educators and students from ages 16-18 year olds would be sought via surveys, and via plans to conduct focus groups in April 2021.

Resolved: That the report and presentation be noted.

Update from Committee Chairs Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo) (EC 93/20) The RemCo Chair provided the Commissioners with a brief update of the last RemCo meeting on 2 December 2020, covering the following:

- Feedback from staff session
- People strategy
- Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI)
- work Pay benchmarking exercise

Resolved: That the update be noted.

Audit Committee (EC 94/20) The Audit Chair provided the Commissioners with a brief update of the last Audit Committee meetings held on 11 November and 1 December 2020, covering the following:

- Internal and external audit plans
- Risk appetite workshop
- Business Continuity Plan review
- Schedule of policies
- Nation Audit Office update
- Board Effectiveness Review recommendations
- Deep dive – financial risk

It was noted that the deep dive on financial risk would go onto the Board forward plan of business for a future meeting.

Action: To update the Forward plan of Board business with ‘Deep dive – financial risk’

Resolved: That the update be noted.

Chief Executive’s update (EC 95/20) The Chief Executive introduced the report, drawing attention to the impact of the Covid-19 pandemic on the work of the Commission. The Commission had come through this well so far, but there were still challenges. Commissioners were interested in the effect of the coronavirus pandemic on productivity, what the ‘new normal’, once we were through the pandemic, might look like, and the opportunity this represented for a fresh look at ways of doing things.

An update was provided on Ofcom being tasked by government with regulating online harms. It was noted that the Commission’s written submission to the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Select Committee (PACAC) enquiry within the UK Parliament would be circulated to all Commissioners.

Commissioners thanked the Chief Executive and teams for a comprehensive update. The possibility of streamlining the Chief Executive’s update to reduce resource required to prepare it, without reducing key information, was noted. Action: The Director of Regulation to circulate the Commission's written submission to the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Select Committee inquiry. Resolved: That the report be noted. Commission Board action tracker (EC 96/20) Resolved: That the Commission Board action tracker be noted. Forward plan of Board business (EC 97/20) Resolved: that the Forward plan of Board business be noted. Any other business The Chair thanked Anna Carragher on behalf of the Commission Board and Executive Team for her contribution to the Commission Board for the past nine years. It was noted that she had probably been the longest serving member on the Board to date. Anna had brought a wealth of experience and significantly helped the Commission by her work in Northern Ireland. The Chief Executive thanked the Chair, John Holmes, on behalf of the Executive Team and staff as a whole for his leadership over the past four years. Alasdair Morgan thanked the Chair on behalf of the other Commissioners, and wished him well for the future.

SC is a member of the Determinations Panel of the Pensions Regulator (remunerated) Minutes of the Commission Board meeting of 26 June 2018 The minutes of 26 June were approved and the record of the catch-up call of 18 July 2018 was noted. Delivering the Commission's policy agenda CB introduced the paper, explaining that it followed work by various teams and the Executive Team to look at how the Commission should set its future priorities and develop plans. CB provided the context of these discussions, identifying some of the policy opportunities and challenges ahead. She noted that this paper was part of the Commission's planning to make the most of these opportunities and was coming to the Board at an early stage, when priorities were still being identified. CB outlined the need for this focus on policy to allow the Commission to raise its own profile and have both a proactive and reactive strategy to address policy issues and achieve practical goals. CB invited input and feedback from Commissioners. TH explained that the list of policy priorities had been drawn from previous work to identify and track all existing recommendations and then prioritise these in line with the current corporate plan goals. The priorities did not exclude other policy recommendations and the team would still take advantage of opportunities to bring these forward when possible. The paper included discussion of likely policy priorities for the devolved offices. TH noted that the team would like to come back to the board in summer 2019 to report progress, particularly on digital campaigning. NN then spoke about the communication of these priorities. She explained that the aim was not just to respond to others but also to influence others. She noted that a key aim was to use communications expertise to promote the changes we were seeking - for example by producing memorable phrasing to get ideas across more quickly. The team were also looking at creating new communications opportunities along the lines of the Vote 100 'I vote' campaign, without forgetting roundtables and other traditional methods. As the plan for the policy agenda was staggered over three years, the communications around them would also be phased. RP noted that although the paper indicated that this work would be managed within approved resourcing, resource implications might be greater if the agenda were to take off and additional work were agreed. JRH suggested that the policy agenda should draw the distinction between those activities where the Commission's role was as advocate, while Government and Parliament had the executive power, and those where the Commission could take on the work itself. CB noted that his example of the accessibility agenda was a good one for the latter, as legislation would not be required for some aspects of our recommendations. SB noted that the communications plans might draw more press attention, and create a dialogue with a wider public, which would be welcome. She noted that accessibility was a high priority for Scottish government. She also observed that the expected Scottish electoral bill and the Welsh bill were distinct and should be addressed as such. ECS complimented the work, though she noted that the presentation of the recommendations could still be clearer. She suggested that a pocket sized prompt card on our priorities might be helpful for Commissioners in the future. RV said he was pleased to see the paper, though cautioned that it could be a long process to change public opinion on some issues. He suggested that the Commission's role was as a 'careful voice' to facilitate discussion, and warned against over-simplistic messages. CW explained that there would be a comms plan for each priority with its own strategy. The purpose of these strategies was to prepare the ground of the debates we hoped would follow. AC welcomed a change to a more proactive policy agenda. She suggested it would be helpful to have versions of the agenda specifically geared for the particular circumstances in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. AC asked if there was more work planned on the evidence base for the recommendations. She was advised that this work was planned and would be scheduled according to need. The planned Board discussion on research would feed into this. AM asked about policy positions no longer active in the Commission, and was advised these were documented in the tracker referred to earlier. A discussion followed on deprioritised activities. AM also noted that devolved governments and legislatures were in some cases doing things that were completely different, for example voting age in Scotland. The language of 'different policy priorities' did not quite address what might in some cases be different policies altogether. BP noted that different positions among the different legislatures could be an advantage in some respects. DH cautioned that it was important to check that evidence had not changed over the course of the 3 year programme, using the example of the extension of the franchise to those under 18. JEH summed up the discussion as the Commissioners giving broad agreement to the proposals in the paper, and supporting the production of a ‘pocket explainer card’ of the recommendations, as well as the separation of Wales, Scotland, and Northern Ireland. In further discussion, RV noted the importance of influencing the commentariat, while JRH reiterated the importance of research. CB added that in addition to deploying the Commission’s research capacity, the Commission was seeking to influence other researchers. The aim was a multilateral evidence base, which would be stronger than anything the Commission could do by itself. 4.19 JEH noted that the policy work of the Commission was not about advocacy for its own sake, but more about gathering the evidence, taking positions on that basis, and encouraging interest and discussion among stakeholders and the wider public. Referencing our corporate images, DH noted that the images used in communications should be consistent with the messaging. CW briefly updated the board on our recent corporate branding update, which helped to address that point. SC noted that the majority of the policy recommendations involved some influencing role, which the Commissioners themselves could help advance. It was agreed to include this in the communications plans. Prosecutions policy LE introduced the paper. The proposals included building limited capability to bring prosecutions, setting out how we would do this and ensuring transparency by including this in our published Enforcement Policy. LE advised that the policy proposed was based on an industry standard and the consultation would provide the organisation with an opportunity to discuss details. Many stakeholders were already aware of the consultation and were broadly supportive. Once the consultation had closed early in 2019, the team would use the Regulatory Steering Group to consider the response and agree any amendments to the proposed policy. The intention was to publish a new enforcement policy in May 2019, which would include the prosecutions language. It would then be possible to prosecute cases if necessary. DH queried the inclusion of financial gain as one of the bullet points against the public interest test. LE noted this was already written into the existing enforcement policy, and there had been some cases where financial gain had indeed played a role. SC counselled caution in proceeding, based on her experience at CMA, and noted that creating a ‘small prosecution capability’ would not be as easy as it sounded. Despite these notes of caution, she did agree that what was proposed was the right way forward. LE agreed that CMA would be consulted and their advice considered. BP agreed with SC, noting that it was important to maintain confidence in the Commission. She asked why the policy was described in the paper as outside the scope of statutory guidance. LE noted that the guidance issued by the Commission was much broader already than the statutory requirements, to support transparency. BP noted that clarity would be needed as to what would be passed to police and what prosecutions would be undertaken by the Commission. LE explained that the Commission had no intention to take over all the work of the police or CPS and would liaise where appropriate. The final guidance would be clear and consistent in explaining this. SC noted that one of the risks around establishing capability at the Commission could be that the police might be less willing to take on referrals. AC asked if the policy would come back to the Board; RP reported it would be discussed at the regulatory steering group, and brought back to the Board if a major issue arose. RV noted the risk of judicial review if the perception was that the selection of prosecutions was inconsistent. LE explained that the guidance would be careful to note the distinction between sanctions versus prosecutions. The guidance set out checkpoints as cases progressed, which included considering resources. We would of course always need to be able to justify decisions to prosecute or not prosecute, including publicly. ECS noted that consultation was coming at a very difficult time, and suggested that the management of comms would be important. JEH asked if any political parties had already objected; LE responded no. In response to JEH's question on potential criticism about resourcing this new step, LE explained that the team was expanding their toolkit to deal with different scenarios. The goal was to look at the whole toolkit and establish how prosecutions fitted in overall. JRH strongly supported the move, though he cautioned that some criticism would be unavoidable, particularly around the notion of bias. AC asked for clarification as to the use of civil versus criminal sanctions. LE noted that the possibility of criminal conviction for groups with no political future (for example, referendum campaigners) could present more of a deterrent. SB noted it was important to have a discussion with a wider public audience, many of whom would support the Commission having more 'teeth'. She also noted that despite the fact that no prosecutions were possible in Scotland, it was important to consult nonetheless. She noted in passing that the appetite was there to allow the Commission to give higher fines in Scotland. JEH declared the Board's endorsement of the paper. Public awareness campaign for May 2019 – approach and budget CW kicked off the discussion with the presentation of the campaign team's award for their 'Got 5' campaign. The Board congratulated the team. EH explained the context for the forthcoming May 2019 elections in England and Northern Ireland. The planned campaign would build on the success of the award-winning 2018 campaign. She noted that the Commission had met its target for additions to the electoral register from its 2018 campaign, so would continue with a similar approach and some minor improvements. New opportunities would come from being able to evaluate the impact of the campaign in Northern Ireland in more detail now that online registration was in place. There were also discussions ongoing with Cabinet Office, to investigate the possibility for setting up bespoke landing pages on the gov.uk service. JEH enquired about messaging on registration duplication. EH responded that they were doing some extra messaging to try to reduce duplicate applications, and Comms were also discussing the issue with Cabinet Office. AC asked if the 'your vote is yours alone' campaign would be used in Northern Ireland. EH replied that it would, but potentially with some tweaking of the messaging. A discussion followed on communications during a difficult period, and how this would be accomplished. EH said the Commission had the requisite budget and networks to deliver the messaging, and would focus on our remit. The Board confirmed the plan and its budget. Q1 performance and finance report CB introduced the paper in KR's absence. She noted that the revised report aimed to respond to feedback from the Board to be more visual, and welcomed feedback on the new format. She also noted that the project updates were more recent than quarter 1. AM noted that some of the targets missed were due to excessive workload. He asked how this was being reconciled with the idea of a new prosecutions capability. RP responded that it was for the Commission to consider, in the planning round, whether the current circumstances around investigations and court cases were exceptional or the 'new normal'. CB noted that the missed targets were around event-driven work, and that, in future business planning, an increase in event-related resources could help the organisation to deliver these activities more consistently. At the December board meeting, the intention was to bring an 'in principle' budget and business plan in advance of the final documents. AM noted that numbers of staff leavers as presented could be more informative. CB replied that more comprehensive charts were available and considered by ET. RV also noted that more detailed information was provided to Remco. SB remarked that a staff turnover of 12% seemed quite high. In her experience, the outside London standard was nearer 8%. She also asked about the speed at which

leavers were replaced. CB advised that the impact of turnover depended on whether it was planned or not. The Commission had previously relied on fixed term contracts in some areas but was moving towards a higher number of more flexible permanent staff to provide a more stable base. The current strategy was not immediately to fill a vacant post, but take time to think what was really needed. ET were involved in every decision on posts, and each had to come forward as a business case at an ET meeting. SB commended the new format. ECS noted that the Electoral Coordination Board in Wales was working well. RV commended the efforts made to address the underspend issues. The report was noted. Chief Executive's update CB introduced the paper, noting that good progress had been made on contingency planning for a fresh election or referendum. She noted the court judgment on the recent judicial review, explaining that while the Commission had been prepared for the result to be announced, it was much more difficult to prepare for deliberate misinterpretation of the judgment, which had happened in some of the media coverage. It was however, a good indication of the sort of communication challenges the Commission might face in future. AI highlighted three areas of work, beginning with canvass reform. The work here would use DWP data to put resources where they were most needed. The three governments (Westminster, Wales, and Scotland) were to publish a joint policy statement in October, followed by a two-month period for consultation ahead of legislation. The aim was to bring about a culture change among ROs, alongside new guidance and a new performance standards framework. AI noted that work was continuing on preparations for the May 2019 elections, and that Cabinet Office plans for the 2019 electoral fraud pilots were also being developed. AI highlighted the work on the recall petition in Northern Ireland, noting that the Commission had a statutory duty to report on the petition. She noted also that there might be questions around the framework for such petitions, even if the analysis showed that the poll itself had been well run. RV reported on the observation visit he and SC had made to see the petition process in action. They had found that the administration of the process was good, though noted that six weeks appeared too long, and could paradoxically result in a low engagement in the process. He also noted that the Commission was the only observer. The note of their findings was to be circulated after the meeting. AC commented that the opening hours for the petition were perhaps unhelpful - 9-5 – though postal votes were available. She noted also that being seen to sign the petition was in its own way fraught, given the particular circumstances in Northern Ireland. In the case of the petition, merely being present was a 'giveaway' as to one's choice. This might need further thought. AI commented on the Northern Ireland assembly elections. The current understanding was that the Secretary of State would introduce primary legislation in October to stop elections for a fixed period, length to be determined. AC noted that the SoS had also given permission to civil servants to take decisions in the absence of lawmakers. A discussion followed on the role of the Commission in these matters, and how best to support democratic processes in Northern Ireland. It was agreed to take up the issues with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. RP provided an update on investigations, and touched on the result of the Supreme Court case. He noted that the Crown Court trial around the South Thanet constituency had been set for mid-October. Appeals from the referendum campaigners were due to be heard in the County Courts in early 2019. RP also noted that the team were actively undertaking a review of registered political party descriptions, and that the consultation on statutory codes for party and candidate spending was ongoing. RP explained the result of the judicial review of the Vote Leave case, and its potential implications, including on the wider electoral regime for candidates, political parties and non-party campaigners. RP explained that the Commission would probably be seeking leave to appeal, and then considering whether an appeal itself should go forward. The decision to do so (or not) was delegated to the Chief Executive. RP also noted that Vote Leave were also likely to appeal. DH asked if the implication would be that the Commission would have to review older judgments in light of the change of law. RP said that the judgment could not have retrospective effect. However LE confirmed that the team were looking at where the judgment could impact other areas of our work, and what effect that might have on eg third party campaigners. This would be relevant to any appeal. CW noted that the Communications and Research aspects of the business had included a new section in the Chief Executive's update to increase the visibility of their work. KT noted the arrival of the new permanent Head of HR. She also briefly discussed the work of the Finance and Corporate services team, including business planning, budgeting, IT developments, FOI increases, and upgrade work. Forward plan of board business 2018-19 JEH noted that the next meeting would be a Commissioner day, and that an agenda would be circulated shortly. ECS noted that there had been a recent decision taken to hold a youth parliament in Wales. The date of the March 2019 board meeting was unclear and would be resolved promptly. Action tracker The action tracker was noted. Chair and Chief Executive's meetings and meetings in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales The paper was noted. Conclusion of the meeting At the conclusion of the meeting, the Chair expressed his warm gratitude, and that of the Commission as a whole, for the commitment, integrity and enthusiasm of the departing nominated Commissioners (BP, DH, and JH), and wished them well for the future. They had all made significant contributions and would be much missed.

Appendix 5 of the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners | Electoral Commission Search Appendix 5 of the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners You are in the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners section Home Commissioners Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners On this page Information Management and Security Protected Information Data Protection Storage Portable Devices, (iPads, Laptops, Blackberrys etc) Incident reporting Portable Equipment Advice and Contacts First published: 31 January 2023 Last updated: 18 June 2023 Information Management and Security Everyone working with the Electoral Commission has a responsibility to protect sensitive and personal information at all times. This brief guide will provide you with some key measures to ensure that you are doing all you can to make sure that information is managed in a secure and responsible way. It will also point you in the direction of more detailed guidance, policies and support.

Protected Information

The Electoral Commission maintains three types of Information; UNCLASSIFIED – Most of the Commission's information falls into this category PERSONAL – This information would contain identification details of an individual, such as name; age; gender; address; phone numbers; bank account details and; nationality. If disclosed without permission, they could cause distress or damage and breach the person's privacy or human rights SENSITIVE – This is information given in confidence that might result in embarrassment and loss if revealed to unauthorised parties. For example: "commercial in confidence", "allegation casework" "enforcement actions" etc.

Data Protection

The Commission collects the personal information of a variety of individuals in the course of its business. As well as those who work for it, the Commission acquires personal data in a number of ways when it discharges its statutory functions, e.g. during an investigation into party's receipt of donations, in the course of maintaining the electoral register, when receiving and publishing political party Statements of Accounts and when sending out and receiving information electronically.

Responsibilities when handling this type of information include:

- Personal information should be stored securely and only accessible to those who have a specific reason to view it
- Personal information should not be shared within or outside of the Commission without explicit consent
- Personal information should only be used for the purpose that it was collected
- Personal information should be destroyed in a secure way

Storage

If saving electronic information it should be stored on the Commission's network which you can access through your virtual PC

Information must not be saved to non-Commission PCs or sent to personal email addresses

Best practice is to store paper information in folders, organised to facilitate finding information quickly

If in hardcopy format it must be held securely in locked cabinets.

When disposing of information, personal and/or sensitive information in paper form should be securely destroyed, i.e. shredded or returned to the Commission for disposal.

Information in electronic form should be permanently deleted.

Portable Devices, (iPads, Laptops, Blackberrys etc)

Ensure that the equipment is not unattended for any period of time and locked away when you have finished using it

If you have to leave a laptop unattended and switched on for a period of time, please ensure the machine is locked by simultaneously pressing the <Ctrl><Alt><Delete> keys and selecting 'Lock Computer' option from the menu

Take into account your surroundings when viewing information e.g. on a train where the screen may be overlooked

Unauthorised users (e.g. children, partners, etc), should be prevented from using the equipment

such as external hard drives or memory sticks, ensure that it is carried out carefully. Please follow the instructions from the IT Helpdesk. If you are in any doubt consult the IT Helpdesk team Avoid taking portable equipment to social venues such as bars, restaurants and clubs. Incident reporting Staff should immediately report any incidents where they suspect that the confidentiality of Commission information or, the security of its IT systems has been compromised. Examples would include; Information which has accidentally been sent to the wrong recipient Loss of information that was being transported from one location to another Loss of computer equipment Suspected access to an IT system by an unauthorised person Infection of a system by a computer virus. Such incidents should be reported to the IT helpdesk in the first instance. Portable Equipment You may be supplied with a Blackberry, laptop or other mobile device e.g. an iPad, for use on Commission business on a long or short term loan. It is also possible use a personal mobile device to access your Commission email account, this service is available on request from the IT helpdesk and is subject to approval by the Head of ICT. This is currently restricted to Apple iPads and iPhones. You should take all necessary steps to protect this equipment and any information stored on it from damage or theft and observe the following: Do not store personal or confidential information on portable devices. When using portable equipment outside EC premises, ensure that the equipment has the minimum amount of information stored on it and is not left unattended Avoid taking portable equipment to social venues such as bars, restaurants and clubs Portable equipment stored in the office should be locked away in a cabinet or desk drawer. If left in a car, it should be locked in the boot If you decide to use a personal mobile device to access Commission information you must still abide by the security and usage controls as set out below: You must not attempt to disable or circumvent the encryption software loaded on your laptop. You must use minimum six digit PIN code on your iPhone or iPad If you lose a piece of equipment or suspect that the information on it has been compromised, you must immediately report this to the IT Help Desk. The Commission reserves the right to remotely wipe any device that has connected to a Commission email account in the event that it is lost, stolen or misused to protect any information that may reside on it. Advice and Contacts For any further advice on this guidance, please contact the Information Management Team on 020 7271 0703/0554. The Chair welcomed everyone to the all-virtual Commission Board meeting, and confirmed that, in the circumstances, the agenda would be varied, including a deferment of the scheduled item on policy priorities. Section 10 request by Scottish Government for the Commission to provide advice and assistance by considering the wording and intelligibility of a potential referendum question (EC 24/20) The Chair informed the Board that the Scottish Government had written to the Commission late on 17 March 2020 regarding this matter. This correspondence would be shared with the Board, who it was agreed should have time to consider it before discussing the Section 10 request. The Board noted that the work could not commence currently in any case as a consequence of the Covid-19 pandemic. This item should therefore be deferred to a future meeting. The Board requested that an estimate of the total cost and total time required of Commission staff in undertaking the assessment be provided to inform that discussion. The Chief Executive reminded the Board of previous legal advice received on participation by nominated Commissioners in this discussion. Action: That the letter received from the Scottish Government on this matter be circulated to Commissioners. Resolved: That this item be deferred for consideration to a later meeting. Declarations of interest No new declarations of interest. That the draft minutes of the meeting of the Audit Committee meeting on 25 February 2020 were noted. Governance update (EC 32/20) The Chief Executive provided an update on the impact of Covid-19 on the Commission and on its work. The elections in England and Wales scheduled for May 2020 had been postponed for one year. The Board discussed how the decision to provide advice to the UK Government on this matter was reached. The Chair confirmed that the Chief Executive made this decision in consultation with the Chair. The Director of Communications, Policy and Research confirmed that the decision to postpone the elections had been made in time for the planned public awareness campaign to be cancelled. The Board heard that the release of our report on the UK Parliamentary General Election (UKPGE) would be slightly rescheduled. The May 2021 polls would be a very busy election day, with multiple elections on the same day using different electoral systems. Work had begun on understanding the implications for our work, including in relation to the support that could be provided to local authorities. There were still outstanding issues to resolve, such as any by-elections that would otherwise be held between March 2020 and May 2021. The Commission was also working to understand any impact on the annual canvass in Great Britain, noting the postponement of the canvass in Northern Ireland to 2021, and would continue to engage with Cabinet Office and others about this. The Director of Regulation confirmed that we had contacted all registered parties and campaigners to explain that our advice service would remain open, and that a sensible and pragmatic approach would be taken to financial returns due during this period. We had asked parties to keep us informed of any impact of Covid-19 on their ability to meet statutory deadlines. We had also continued our publication, monitoring, compliance and enforcement work. The Chief Executive advised the Board that Commission staff had moved to home working, except for a brief transition period for a small number of staff who were needed on site at our London offices. We were conscious of staff welfare in these circumstances, and support was being provided to all staff. We had spoken to the Speaker's Committee about updating our draft Corporate Plan and Main Estimate in light of the delay to the May 2020 elections. We had also had initial discussions with the Speaker's Committee on any potential impact on the renewal and/or appointment of Commissioners over the next six months. The Board welcomed the Commission's ability to carry out efficiently business-as-usual work from home, and encouraged the Commission to support stakeholders to do likewise. The Head of Strategic Planning and Performance explained the proposed changes to the urgency procedure, decision-making by electronic means, written comments, and the decision-making procedure. The Board agreed with the proposals, and noted that they would also apply to Committees and sub-committees of the Board. The Board requested revisiting the Standing Orders at a future meeting, and paying particular attention to the standing orders relating to when votes could be re-taken. The Board discussed the position of nominated Commissioners as relates to quorum and decision-making. The Chief Executive noted we were required to write the Standing Orders in this way, as nominated Commissioners must be in the minority in decision-making. We were bound to follow that position consistent with the intention of Parliament. Action: That the Chief Executive convene a meeting with the Chair and the nominated Commissioners to discuss further the role of nominated Commissioners. Resolved: That the proposed changes to our Corporate Governance Framework be agreed. Update on legal proceeding (EC 28/20) The Chief Executive (who declared a conflict of interest) and the Head of Strategic Planning and Performance left the meeting for this item. The Interim General Counsel provided an update on legal proceedings involving the Commission. The Board agreed with the recommendations in the report. Action: That regular updates on the litigation would be provided in the Legal Matters section of the Chief Executive's update. Resolved: That the Board agreed to defend the potential proceedings brought against the Electoral Commission and its Chief Executive alleging defamation and misuse of private information. That the Director of Finance and Corporate Services as Deputy Accounting Officer's decision to fund the Chief Executive's legal costs and to keep him indemnified against monetary award made against him be endorsed. That the Deputy Accounting Officer's conclusion that the recommendations were consistent with ‘Managing Public Money’ be noted. Key messages for the annual report (EC 27/20) The Board recommended that the list of issues arising from the year should include the number of recall petitions that took place during the year, separate from the comments on the elections that were held. There should also be a more detailed explanation on the level of complexity involved in the investigations undertaken during the year. The Board also requested that the recent report from the Law Commissions on electoral law reform be highlighted, and mention be made of ensuring the accessibility of elections. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Review of Electoral Registration Officers performance standards (EC 25/20) The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance explained that the next canvass in Great Britain would run under the new legislation for the reformed canvass, subject to approval of the one remaining piece of required legislation by the Scottish Parliament and subject to any further changes that might emerge as a consequence of the Covid-19 pandemic. We had focused on supporting Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) with the implementation of canvass reform. The proposed performance standards work formed a key part of this. We had developed a new framework designed to help EROs and the Commission better understand performance and to identify and drive improvements where necessary. We had focused on working with EROs to help them make better use of the data they collect to understand the impact of their activities and to evaluate their practices. We would use this data to improve our reporting processes so we could make clear publicly what we knew about ERO performance. We were unable to complete the consultation process on the original timeline due to delaying the start of the process as a consequence of the UKPGE. However, we had been able to speak to stakeholders over the past three months, including at all Association of s branch meetings across England and Wales and with the Scottish Assessors’ Association. Feedback was broadly positive. The consultation period was ten weeks, and closing at the end of March 2020. We had been issuing reminders as the deadline approached, and would continue to do so. The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance explained the difficulties in setting targets for EROs, which could be strongly influenced by the circumstances in individual local authorities. The proposed changes would allow for reports on performance to be run more regularly, rather than waiting nine to twelve months after the event as was currently the case. More regular reporting would allow the Commission to highlight issues and drive performance improvement. The new standards should reduce the burden on EROs as the data reports should be automated within software systems. We would provide tools and templates so that local authorities could report on their performance locally. The Board discussed ways to evaluate success in the new system, and ways to report on how the system as a whole was performing. The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance confirmed that this was being explored. Action: The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance to provide an update to the Board in Spring 2021 once the standards have been implemented. Resolved: That the paper be noted and that the Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance undertake approval of the final performance standards framework. Reappointment of member of Remuneration and Human Resources Committee Resolved: That Rob Vincent be reappointed to the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee, and that he be reappointed as Chair of that Committee Corporate planning 2021/26 - session 2 Commissioners were asked to send suggestions of stakeholders to consult with to the Head of Strategic Planning and Performance. Resolved: That the item be noted. Forward plan of Board business (EC 29/20) Action: That for the present Board meetings include an update on Covid-19 and how this affects the Commission. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Commission Board action tracker (EC 30/20) Resolved: That the paper be noted. Meetings of note (EC 31/20) The Chair highlighted key points from a meeting earlier in the week with Chloe Smith MP. Resolved: That the paper be noted.

3. Putting voters first in Wales You are in the Corporate Plan for Wales 2022/23 to 2026/27 section Home Our plans and priorities Corporate Plan for Wales 2022/23 to 2026/27 On this page Raising public awareness Removing barriers to registering and voting Ensuring laws for parties and campaigners are clear and followed Ensuring the electoral system works effectively First published: 25 April 2022 Last updated: 25 April 2022 Summary To have a healthy democracy, voters need to be engaged in our electoral process, and confident that elections are free and fair. We will work to increase voter engagement and confidence in Wales and the wider UK by: raising public awareness of the electoral process removing barriers to registering and voting ensuring laws for parties and campaigners are clear and followed ensuring the electoral system works effectively Raising public awareness Public awareness of the electoral system – including how to register and vote – is key to voter engagement and confidence. Our research demonstrates that public awareness of how to register and vote is currently high. In February 2021, 93% of those surveyed (both in Wales and UK wide) as part of our annual public opinion tracking survey stated they knew how to register to vote, and 92% were confident they knew how to cast their vote. It is important that we continue to maintain and increase this awareness, and we will continue to refine and deliver effective public awareness activity ahead of elections in Wales and other parts of the UK. We will ensure the information we provide to voters is accessible and transparent, keeping pace with developments in digital communications, and ensuring our public information services are tailored to voters' needs. We will develop and expand our learning work, producing political literacy resources to help people understand how to get involved in our democracy. We will continue to undertake public awareness campaigns and work with the wider electoral community and partner organisations. Following the extension of the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds and foreign nationals resident in Wales, we will continue to work to ensure new voters understand their eligibility and can confidently participate in the 2022 local government elections and 2026 Senedd election. We will also continue to work alongside all relevant partners to promote greater consistency in political education, and increase political knowledge and understanding amongst young people to ensure they can fully engage in our democratic system in Wales. This will include developing the good work already achieved with the publication of education resources and the further development of an education and learning programme in Wales. Removing barriers to registering and voting Our research shows that the current electoral system could be improved to meet the needs of all eligible voters. Results from our 2021 UK wide public opinion tracking survey show that people with a disability are more likely to be dissatisfied with the process of voting (10%) than those without a disability (6%). We already know what many of the barriers people experience are, but we will do further work to identify issues with registering and voting, and will then take action to address them. We will broaden the range of third sector organisations we work with to understand the challenges, and will collaborate with policy makers and other partners to identify solutions. This includes influencing the development of new policies, to ensure additional barriers are not introduced. We will deliver effective targeted voter awareness activities for the groups identified, and will specifically support under-registered groups to engage in the democratic process. We will also continue to explore the feasibility of modernising the voting process itself, aware of the changing needs of voters in our digital age. Ensuring laws for parties and campaigners are clear and followed The legitimacy of elections is dependent on clear laws which are understood and respected by parties and campaigners. We will ensure voters have accessible information about parties and campaigners participating in elections, including transparency on how they are funded and what they spend. We will raise public awareness of the rules on party and campaigner registration, donations, and campaign spending, and will help voters take action if they see something which concerns them. We will continue to maintain the official registers of parties and non-party campaigners, and will seek to remove barriers to campaigning to ensure that voters hear from a wide and diverse range of campaigners. We will improve voter access to our Political Finance Online database by updating and upgrading the search functionality. Where political financial data is incomplete, we will continue to enforce the law to ensure transparency and increased voter confidence in the system. We provide more details on how we will support parties and campaigners to comply with the law in Section 4 of this Corporate Plan.

Ensuring the electoral system works effectively Key to voter confidence is an electoral system that works effectively. People should be confident elections are well-run, and should trust in the legitimacy of the results. Our 2021 public opinion tracking survey showed that 75% of people in Wales are confident that elections are well-run (compared to 80% UK wide). We will continue to conduct significant research to report on how elections have been run, including detailed understanding of voters' experiences. This will enable us to raise concerns and make evidence-based recommendations where appropriate, with the ultimate aim of maintaining public confidence in the electoral system. We outline our plans to ensure the delivery of free and fair elections in Section 5, including our work to support resilient local electoral services. Navigation 2. Report on the May 2022 local elections in England | Electoral Commission Search Report on the May 2022 local elections in England You are in the England local council elections section Home England local council elections Currently reading: of 4 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the elections Campaigning at the elections Delivering the elections Supporting evidence Summary This report looks at how the May 2022 elections in England were run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held in Northern Ireland , Scotland and Wales . On 5 May elections took place in many areas of England, including in all London boroughs. There were also six local mayoral elections and the South Yorkshire combined authority mayoral election. Overall, people were confident that these elections were well-run and were highly satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. Turnout at these elections was broadly consistent with previous elections, although it remains low. Almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper, but we continue to see a small proportion of postal ballot packs rejected. s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and felt able to get their views across effectively. Voters generally found it easy to access information about the elections, but this did not necessarily translate to them feeling well-informed about the elections and who they could vote for. A notable proportion of candidates told us that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. Robust debate is an essential feature of election campaigns, but this must not lead to threats, abuse or intimidation that discourage candidates from standing for election or campaigning. We will work with the UK's governments and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. The pattern of elections was less complex this year than in May 2021, with fewer combinations of elections and unscheduled elections. However, the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern, with staffing and booking venues posing a significant challenge in some areas. The range and scale of changes to be introduced by the Elections Act adds to this concern, with some significant changes intended to be delivered for the first time in England at the May 2023 local elections. Effective implementation will rely on the detailed secondary legislation being in place in time to allow the necessary preparations to be made. Voting at the elections The experience of voters at the May 2022 elections Most people were confident that these elections were well-run and were highly satisfied with the process of registering to vote, and 96% of voters were satisfied with the process of voting. This is consistent with findings from recent elections. Polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person and almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. Almost everyone who voted by post said that they knew how to complete and return their postal vote, and found the postal voting instructions useful. However, we continue to see a small proportion of postal ballot packs rejected. Overview On 5 May 2022, there were elections for local councillors in many areas of England, including in all London boroughs. There was also a combined authority mayoral election in South Yorkshire and six local authority mayoral elections. A total of 22.4 million people across England were registered to vote in these elections. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run After each election we ask members of the public who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections, which helps us understand if views have changed since the last comparable set of elections. Satisfaction with the registration and voting process remains high. People continue to have high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting. Our research shows that: 79% of people in England were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. This is consistent with the levels of satisfaction reported by people after the most recent comparable elections held in 2018. 96% of voters in England were satisfied with the process of voting. This is an increase from 2018 when 90% of people were satisfied. Older age groups are more likely to say that they are satisfied with the process of registering, while people who say that they have been 'limited a lot' by health or disability over the previous 12 months are slightly less likely to be satisfied with registering and with voting. Almost everyone (97%) who voted in person at a polling station felt safe voting with relevant Covid provisions in place. 1% said they felt fairly unsafe while the remaining 2% said they did not know. Most people were confident that the elections were well-run. More than seven-in-10 (73%) people said they were confident that the elections were well-run. Just under one-in-10 (9%) said they were not confident, and people who didn't vote were more likely to say they were not confident the elections were well-run than voters. When we asked people why they were not confident that the elections were well-run, the most commonly chosen reasons were: there wasn't enough information about the candidates (32%) there wasn't enough information about the elections (25%) I did not see any candidates campaigning / canvassing (25%) media / TV / press coverage was biased (23%) campaigning was based on incorrect information / made untrue claims (21%). Views about the safety of voting and whether electoral fraud is a problem were also consistent with the most recent comparable elections. In 2022, 81% of people in England said they thought voting was safe from fraud and abuse. When asked if they thought electoral fraud was a problem, 19% of people in England said that they thought it was. This is consistent with the 21% who saw it as a problem after the 2018 elections. Concerns were raised before the elections in some areas that voters' rights to a secret ballot could be compromised. It is vital that voters can cast their vote in secret, and anyone attempting to interfere with how a person votes is breaking the law. We work closely with the police and the electoral community to ensure the secrecy of the ballot. Our guidance for Returning Officers and polling station staff makes clear that voters must go to polling booths individually so that their right to a secret vote is protected. We also have a role in raising public awareness; ahead of every election, in partnership with Crimestoppers and the Cabinet Office, we run the 'Your Vote Is Yours Alone' campaign. This targets areas with historic concerns around electoral integrity to empower people to protect their vote and encourage them to report any concerns. In Tower Hamlets, where specific concerns had been expressed about the risk of electoral fraud, the Returning Officer and the police took a range of additional actions to help ensure the secrecy of the ballot at this year's polls. This included assigning an additional member of staff to each polling station to help direct voters individually to polling booths and police officers being on duty at polling stations throughout the day, so that anyone with concerns about intimidation or fraud was able to raise these with the police. We worked closely with them to provide guidance and advice. A range of communications were sent to voters and campaigners, highlighting that everyone must be able to vote in secret and free from intimidation and undue influence. At all polling stations there were prominent posters displayed both outside of polling stations and at the point of issue of ballot papers to reinforce the message that voters must enter the polling booth alone. On polling day, we visited a selection of polling stations and observed a small number of cases where someone tried to go with a voter into the polling booth. We also saw polling station staff stopping this happening, so that voters could cast their vote in secret. An accredited observer organisation, Democracy Volunteers, has reported that their observers 'saw several challenges to the electoral process' and 'once again these focused around the challenge of family voting, where more than one person attempts to vote together in a polling booth, or affect, direct, or oversee the vote of another', concluding that family voting 'continues to be a challenge, despite the many actions taken by polling staff to attempt to prevent it at these elections.'¹ It is completely unacceptable for anyone's vote to be watched or pressured inside a polling station, but concerns remain in this area. We are committed to tackling any such influence, working in partnership with polling station staff and the police. We will continue to work with the electoral community to identify opportunities to enhance our guidance and training for polling station staff to reinforce the importance of secrecy and the actions that should be taken to address any issues that arise on polling day. Throughout the year, all police forces across the UK send us data about allegations of electoral fraud that they receive and investigate. We will publish the full data in the spring, including the number, type, and outcome of any allegations relating to the May 2022 elections. Turnout at these elections was consistent with previous comparable elections Turnout at these elections (33.6%) was broadly consistent with previous comparable elections, although it remains low compared with some other types of elections. Overall, estimated turnout decreased by one percentage point compared to the last time there were comparable elections for district, metropolitan, unitary councils and London boroughs in 2018. There was a larger decline in turnout in elections in London, with a decrease of 3.4 percentage points. The most common reasons given by people who told us that they didn't vote were: lack of time / too busy / I was busy at work (18%) I'm just not interested in politics / fed up with politics (11%) there was no point in voting because it was obvious who would win / my vote wouldn't have made a difference to the outcome / my vote doesn't count (9%) I was away on 5 May / voting day (8%) I didn't like the candidates / parties / they didn't represent my views (7%) People were confident that they could vote using their preferred method In England, people can choose to vote in one of three ways: they can vote in person at their polling station, by post, or by proxy (asking someone they trust to vote on their behalf). If their situation changes close to an election due to work or disability, people can appoint an emergency proxy up to 5pm on polling day. Ahead of the 2021 elections, the law was changed so that anyone who had to self-isolate close to polling day because they had tested positive for Covid, or had been in close contact to someone who had tested positive, could also appoint an emergency proxy. This change remained in place for the 2022 elections in England. People knew that other options were available if they didn't want to vote in a polling station Most people said that they found it easy to find information on how to vote either in person at a polling station or remotely by post or proxy. Our research showed that: 73% of people said they found it easy to get information about the different methods of voting they could choose from 82% of people who voted in a polling station and 84% of people who voted by post said they found it easy to get information about different methods of voting 10% of postal voters told us that these elections were the first time they had voted by post. The most common reasons for choosing to do so were convenience and being too busy to go to the polling station, with most finding it easy to understand how to apply for their postal vote Voting using their preferred method was possible for most voters The majority of people (80.4%) were eligible to vote in person, while 19.5% were sent a postal vote and 0.1% (20,191) appointed a proxy, of which 1,417 were an emergency proxy. This represents a slight increase in the number choosing a postal vote compared to the last time these elections took place in 2018, but is similar to the proportion who did so at the elections in 2021. Most people who voted were able to use their preferred method: 95% of voters said they were able to use their preferred method of voting, compared to 4% who said they were not voters aged under 34 were slightly less likely than other age groups to have used their preferred method to vote, while voters identifying as Black, Asian and Minority Ethnic were less likely than white voters to have voted using their preferred method. Most people were confident they knew how to vote without making a mistake. Nearly all voters said that they found it easy to fill in their ballot paper or to complete their postal vote, but some votes continue to be rejected and not included in the count. Most voters found filling in the ballot paper very easy. Nearly all voters (97%) said that it was easy to fill in their ballot paper, with three-quarters (76%) saying they found it very easy. Only 1% of voters said that they found it difficult. Data from electoral administrators shows that 0.5% of all ballot papers (approximately 39,500) were rejected and not included in the count. The most common reason for ballot papers to be rejected was because they were unmarked, with this accounting for almost three-quarters (72%) of all rejected ballot papers.

Most people who voted by post were confident they knew how to vote without making a mistake. Almost everyone who voted by post said that they knew how to complete and return their postal vote and found the postal voting instructions useful. Our research showed that: 96% said that they found useful the written instructions included with their postal vote on how to vote and return the vote. 96% said it was easy to complete and return their postal vote, compared to 4% who said it was difficult. Data from electoral administrators shows that, in the metropolitan, London borough, unitary and district elections, 2.8% of returned postal votes (approximately 80,000 votes in total) were rejected and were not able to be included in the count. The most common reason for postal votes being rejected was that the personal identifiers (their signature and/or date of birth) that voters provided on the postal voting statement did not match those that they had previously provided to the Electoral Registration Officer. This is the same as the last time these elections took place. Other reasons for postal votes being rejected included where voters did not provide either or both of their personal identifiers, or where the ballot paper or postal voting statement was missing. The Elections Act includes a new requirement for voters to reapply for a postal vote every three years. This may help to ensure that voters' personal identifiers are up-to-date and accurate, and we will monitor whether this change has an impact on the number of rejected postal votes at future elections. We will also continue to explore ways of improving the electoral system to better meet voters' needs. As part of this, we will consider evidence about whether changes to postal voting documents or processes could help to reduce the number of postal ballot packs that are rejected at future elections.

The experience of campaigning at the May 2022 elections felt that they were able to get their views across to voters, using a range of face-to-face, online and printed campaign methods. Traditional campaigning methods (leafletting and canvassing) were the most popular. A notable proportion of candidates responding to our survey said that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. In most cases this involved verbal or online abuse, and the majority of instances came from members of the public. We will work with the UK's governments and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Although voters generally found it easy to access information about the elections, this did not necessarily translate to them feeling well-informed about the elections and who they could vote for. A perceived lack of information also affected people's confidence that these elections were well-run. Transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online remains important for voters. New transparency requirements are expected to come into force for UK Parliament and local elections from the end of 2023. Campaigning at the elections overview More than 15,000 candidates stood for election to local authorities on 5 May 2022. Three quarters of those candidates stood for either the Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat parties, and 15% stood for the Green Party. Candidates standing for other parties represented 7% of the total. A further 3% of candidates were independents who did not stand for any political party. A total of 37 candidates stood for election as directly-elected mayors across the six local authorities where those positions were also contested. There were six candidates for the South Yorkshire combined authority mayoral election. 2 s were able to engage with voters but some raised concerns about intimidation s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and the majority felt able to get their views across effectively. Our research does, however, find that some campaigners raised concerns about intimidation. s used a variety of methods to communicate with voters At the 2022 elections, people continued to receive information about candidates and parties from a range of different sources, and in a variety of formats. The most common ways people reported seeing information on parties and candidates were: leaflet or flyer, either from a candidate / political party (49%) or another source (23%) word of mouth / mentioned by friends / family / carer (12%) social media (generic posts or adverts which did not seem targeted) (10%) newspapers (10%) posters or billboards (10%) I talked to a candidate / candidates directly (10%) Older age groups (65+) were more likely than the youngest age group (18 to 24) to say that they had seen a leaflet or flyer from a candidate or political party, and to say that they had spoken to a candidate or political party. Younger age groups were more likely to mention seeing information on social media. Findings from our survey of candidates were consistent with what voters reported, with traditional campaigning methods (leafletting and canvassing) being the most popular, specifically: over half of the candidates (51%) told us that their most used campaigning method was leaflets, newsletters or flyers, with 90% of candidates saying this was one of their top three campaigning methods door-to-door canvassing was second most popular, with three-quarters (76%) listing it in their top three methods Social media was the most popular digital campaigning tool, compared with targeted emails, website or in-app advertising or other types of digital campaigning. Around a third (35%) of candidates said social media was their third most used campaigning method, although it was primarily used to support more traditional campaigning methods. Free methods of digital campaigning were more popular than paid-for tools with candidates who responded to our survey. We found that: just under two-thirds of candidates (64%) said they posted on social media about their campaign a third (33%) said they asked supporters to share their posts almost a third (31%) said they emailed their supporters only 16% of respondents said that they paid for adverts on social media Most candidates did not experience problems campaigning, but some raised concerns about abuse and intimidation Just under three-quarters of candidates (74%) responding to our survey said that they felt able to get their views across to voters effectively. While not directly comparable, due to the different elections taking place and the sample not being representative of all candidates who stood at the elections, this is an improvement on 2021 when fewer than half of respondents to the survey said this. Due to the improved public health situation, official restrictions on campaign activities were no longer in place, but Covid did continue to affect campaigners. Three-quarters (76%) of candidates who responded to our survey said that Covid affected at least one aspect of their campaign, with a quarter (26%) of respondents saying that it impacted a lot on their ability to enlist volunteers and get assistance with campaigning. When asked about whether they had experienced some kind of problem with threats, abuse or intimidation, more than half of the candidates (60%) told us that they did not have a problem at all. Our research with candidates did highlight some significant concerns about abuse towards campaigners, specifically: two-fifths of respondents (40%) said they experienced some kind of problem, rating this as a 2 or above on a scale from 1 to 5 just under one in 10 (8%) reported having a serious problem (rated 4 or 5 out of 5) nearly a fifth (18%) witnessed threats, abuse or intimidation towards those campaigning on their behalf of those that said they experienced some kind of abuse, the most common sources were verbal (62%) and online (52%), and most reported receiving it from members of the public (71%) one in 10 (10%) of those who said that they experienced threats or abuse told us that these would discourage them from standing as a candidate again in the future Evidence collected by the Local Government Association has also highlighted the democratic impacts of abuse and intimidation, including the impact on local councillors and candidates' willingness to stand for election. 3 This research also found that there is a growing feeling that abuse and intimidation, particularly online, are becoming normalised. The Elections Act 2022 introduces a new electoral sanction for those found guilty of intimidating candidates, campaigners and elected representatives. Banning someone from standing for elected office, as well as imposing criminal sanctions, such as a prison sentence or fine, will strengthen the deterrent against this intimidating behaviour. Robust debate is an essential feature of election campaigns, but this must not lead to threats, abuse or intimidation that discourage candidates from standing for election or campaigning. Recommendation 1: Urgent action needed to prevent abuse and intimidation Recommendation 1: Urgent action needed to prevent abuse and intimidation Urgent action is needed to tackle and prevent abuse and intimidation of candidates and campaigners at elections. Candidates and campaigners should be able to participate freely in the democratic process, ensuring that voters can hear from a range of voices during elections. Tackling these problems will require coordinated action from a range of partners, including central and local government, police forces, social media companies and political parties and campaigners themselves. We will work with the UK's governments and the wider electoral community to understand what is driving abuse and intimidation and to develop effective responses to protect candidates and campaigners at future elections. People want more information about candidates and campaign material Many voters found it easy to find information about these elections, but this did not necessarily mean that they felt they had enough information. Our research also confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections. Most people find it easy to get information but some do not feel well-informed about candidates Our research after the election found that: just under two-thirds of people (64%) said that they found it easy to find information on what the election was about / for a similar proportion (61%) felt that they found it easy to find information on the candidates and parties running for election Although the majority of people asked said they found it easy to find information, this did not necessarily mean that they felt they had enough information. Our research found that: four in 10 (42%) people agreed that that they had enough information on candidates to make an informed choice, but almost a third

(32%) disagreed younger age groups (18-34) were less likely to agree they had enough information to make an informed decision compared to older age groups (65+) non-voters were more likely to say they did not have enough information to make an informed decision, with 46% of non-voters disagreeing that they had enough information, compared to 26% of voters four in 10 (43%) felt they knew what the local elections were about, but three in ten (30%) did not agree There is also evidence that a perceived lack of information affected people's confidence that these elections were well-run. Our research found that many of those who were not confident the elections were well-run said this was because there wasn't enough information about the candidates (mentioned by 32% of people who were not confident) or about the elections more generally (mentioned by 25%). Transparency about who is producing election campaign material is important to build trust Our research after the elections confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections. We found: two-thirds of people (64%) agreed that it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online half (51%) said they would trust digital campaigning material more if they knew who produced it one-in-three (31%) said that they cannot find out who has produced the political information that they see online The UK Government has introduced legislation that will require most campaigners to include information to identify who has promoted or published their online campaign material in future. This new digital imprint requirement will help voters understand who is targeting them online with information at elections and referendums in future. These changes are expected to come into force from the end of 2023. We will monitor any impact of the new digital imprint requirement on people's levels of confidence in political information online. Candidates were able to access strengthened support to understand and comply with election law We increased the opportunities for candidates and parties to access our support to understand and comply with political finance law both before and after the elections. We continue to recommend that candidate nomination requirements should be proportionate to reduce barriers to standing for election. Increasing opportunities for supporting candidates and parties We provide guidance to candidates and agents to help them understand their obligations under political finance laws and campaign with confidence. As part of our commitment to delivering more proactive support for candidates and parties and ensuring those taking part in elections have the right information, we held pre-election webinars to explain the law. The event for candidates and agents in England was attended by 160 people and the feedback was positive, and we received a number of requests for webinars to be held more regularly. We also held virtual advice surgeries that allowed candidates and agents to book an appointment to speak to one of our expert advisers and discuss specific issues around the spending and donation law. Due to the take up and demand, particularly from new and independent candidates, we offered further advice surgeries after the elections and in advance of the reporting deadlines, to provide support with spending returns. Our approach has been informed and led by the evidence and feedback we received in our most recent survey of the regulated community. We will continue to focus on delivering more bespoke advice and guidance resources so that parties and campaigners can easily understand the political finance law, regardless of their size or experience. Candidate nomination requirements should be proportionate To minimise the travel and personal contact involved in completing nomination forms during the Covid pandemic, the Government legislated to reduce the number of subscribers required by candidates to stand in elections in England in 2021. This change did not remain in place for the May 2022 elections. Our survey of candidates at these elections found that most thought the nomination process was clear and well run, with 84% of respondents agreeing that it was easy to get the number of signatures required to secure their nomination. Despite this, some respondents questioned the purpose of having this requirement at all.

"Having to collect 10 signatures seems pretty pointless, it's high enough to be a task that takes time but not high enough to be a barrier to anyone standing (and I don't want any for local elections!)." "I suffer with disabilities meaning that going outside and getting 10 signatures was hard to do. We only needed 2 signatures last time, however, this has gone back up to 10. My agent had to collect the signatures instead. This was a barrier for me as a disabled person wanting to run for council."

Recommendation 2: Review subscriber requirements for nominating candidates

Recommendation 2: Review subscriber requirements for nominating candidates We continue to recommend that the Government should review whether the range of current subscriber requirements are proportionate for different elected offices, taking into account evidence from this year's elections and conclusions from our Standing for Election review in 2015 . This would help to ensure candidates do not face unnecessary barriers to standing for election, giving voters a more diverse range of views to choose from. We are aware the Government intends to introduce legislation to reduce subscriber requirements for local elections ahead of the next scheduled elections in May 2023.

Delivering the elections The experience of electoral administration at the May 2022 elections The pattern of elections was less complex this year than in May 2021, with electoral administrators facing fewer combinations of elections and unscheduled elections. Our evidence indicates that these elections were relatively more straightforward to manage, with fewer issues emerging. However, the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern, with staffing and booking venues posing a significant challenge in some areas. Early clarity on legislative changes remains essential to allow Returning Officers and their teams sufficient time to plan for elections. The Elections Act makes a range of significant changes to how elections are run, and effective implementation will rely on the detailed secondary legislation being in place in time to allow the necessary preparations to be made. We continue to recommend that legislation is clear six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by Electoral Registration Officers or Returning Officers.

Delivering the elections overview Elections took place in 165 local authorities in England with local elections to district council, metropolitan borough and unitary authorities as well as all 32 London boroughs. There were also six local mayoral elections. The South Yorkshire combined authority mayoral election covered four local authority areas, including two which would not otherwise have had elections. Elections were also held in over 1,000 town and parish councils. There were 167 local authorities that did not have elections this year and, compared to 2019 and 2021, the pattern of elections in England this year was less complex, with fewer combinations of elections and unscheduled elections taking place. Local authority elections teams were responsible for delivering electoral registration, nominations, absent voting, polling stations and the counting of votes for the elections. Our evidence shows that these elections were well-run, and voters and campaigners reported high levels of confidence.

However, underlying concerns relating to capacity and resilience remain, and there were a small number of issues that had an impact in some areas. The capacity and resilience of electoral administration teams remains a significant challenge We received feedback from around a quarter of local authorities after the elections.

administrators suggests that, in comparison with last year, these elections were more straightforward to manage. But the feedback also shows that elections teams still struggled to recruit staff and find suitable venues for polling stations and the count. Reduced complexity helped administrators to run the elections effectively. Alongside the continued effort and commitment of Returning Officers and electoral administrators, the less complex pattern of elections in England this year, with fewer combined polls, appears to have supported the delivery of well-run elections. There were a small number of minor errors with printed materials, but Returning Officers and their teams worked quickly to mitigate these and we will support them in learning any lessons for future polls. However, in one area there was a more significant issue at the count which had the potential to reduce the confidence of candidates, agents and voters in the count process and therefore the result. In the elections to Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, a significant number of postal votes were not included in the final result for one ward, which has led us to conclude that the Returning Officer did not meet elements of the performance standards. The issue had no impact on the overall result. The Returning Officer has since commissioned an independent report on the conduct of the election by the Association of s, to help ensure lessons can be learned ahead of future polls. We are also continuing to work with the Returning Officer to support them as they review their election processes. Despite this broadly positive picture, the capacity and resilience of the electoral system remains a concern. The range and scale of changes to be introduced by the Elections Act adds to this concern, with some significant changes intended to be delivered for the first time in England at the May 2023 local elections. We have previously highlighted concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in the UK, which are not helped by the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We will continue to work in partnership with the electoral community, the UK Government and local authorities to develop and deliver proposals to support resilient electoral services. Alongside this, we continue to call on the Government to set out how it will simplify and modernise election law, building on the comprehensive and well-supported recommendations of the UK's Law Commissions. Some Returning Officers struggled to find enough staff to work on polling day and at the count Recruiting staff to work at the elections remained a problem. This was highlighted by many of the electoral administrators responding to our survey. Administrators highlighted problems around finding experienced polling station staff and a high number of recruits dropping out ahead of polling day. While Covid had less of an impact on the administration of elections this year than last, it still remained a factor, despite many of the restrictions required in 2021 being removed. "We had significant numbers of staff not taking up their positions again and this seems to be an increasing problem. We were lucky in that our neighbouring authority did not have elections and loaned us a number of staff. If they had also had elections we'd have been struggling to fill vacancies. We appointed many more Presiding Officers who had had no experience of working in a polling station than we are usually comfortable with" "Staffing was a big issue this year as we are still feeling the effects of the pandemic. A lot of our staff were taking holidays, had hospital appointments etc. that had previously been postponed. We also had around 30 polling station staff that had tested positive the week of the election and so had to pull out" "The delivery of this election was challenging even though Covid restrictions had been removed, with our main issue this year relating to staffing which is expected to present ongoing challenges in future with Elections Act requirements for example staff additional responsibilities and more staff required to work in polling stations" The scale and pattern of elections taking place this year meant that some electoral administration teams could call on neighbouring local authorities for support. But this is not a sustainable long-term solution, particularly at future England-wide or UK-wide elections. The changes being introduced by the Elections Act have the potential to increase the challenge of recruiting and retaining skilled and trained polling station staff for future elections. This is due to the additional responsibilities that poll clerks and Presiding Officers will need to deliver, such as checking the identification of voters. We have formed a sub-group of the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board (ECAB) to discuss and identify solutions to the staffing, resilience and capacity challenges experienced by Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and their teams. An immediate area of focus for the sub-group will be on addressing the challenges of recruitment of polling station staff. Fewer suitable venues were available for polling stations and the count Booking venues for polling stations and the count is another aspect of managing the elections that administrators highlighted as a continuing challenge. In part, this appears to be an ongoing impact of Covid, as some venues have permanently closed while others have increased hire fees. Comments suggest that the problem of securing appropriate venues is also exacerbated by difficulties with booking school buildings. "Schools are continually a problem, with school administrators fighting to not be used as polling stations. Some schools/headteachers are now being deliberately difficult and uncooperative in an attempt to force the Returning Officer away. Where we have to as a result move to either another building or a temporary mobile station, this is at significantly greater cost to the authority." The ability for administrators to be able to access suitable venues is key to ensuring the smooth delivery of the elections and a positive experience for all voters. The changes being introduced by the Elections Act will place additional demands on electoral administrators, as they will have to make sure polling station venues can be made suitable for disabled voters to support them to vote independently and in secret, as well as having space to allow voters to show their ID in private where required. We will continue to work closely with ECAB to explore options for addressing the challenges of finding suitable venues for polling stations and the count. "We are dealing with an ever-decreasing pool of available polling venues. Schools are down to the minimum and churches and other venues are either closing or becoming too expensive. The number of temporary buildings is likely to increase which is a concern in the light of the additional processes required at polling stations under the Elections Act." Early clarity on legislation is essential to support effective planning Early confirmation of legislative changes allowed Returning Officers to plan with certainty for the elections this year. The Elections Act makes a range of significant changes to how elections are run, and effective implementation will rely on the detailed secondary legislation being in place in time to allow the necessary preparations to be made. Legislative changes were made clear in good time to give Returning Officers the certainty they needed In 2021, owing to the uncertainty created by the public health situation, changes were made to nomination processes and emergency proxy rules shortly before the elections. This created additional challenges and risks to the delivery of those elections. In comparison to last year, feedback from administrators about changes to legislation was more positive. Confirmation of the changes to nomination processes and the extension of changes to the emergency proxy vote rules were communicated in good time. "The confirmation that Covid emergency proxy voting arrangements [were] to be extended for 5th May was received in good time.” “[...] Reversion to 10 signatures on nomination papers and continuation of Covid emergency proxies was communicated in good time. [...]” We continue to recommend that the UK Government ensure that legislative changes are clear six months before they are required to be implemented or complied with by Electoral Registration Officers or Returning Officers in order to enable them to plan effectively. This is especially important given the range and scale of changes to be introduced by the Elections Act. Returning Officers need early clarity to be able to deliver significant changes introduced by the Elections Act

Significant new policies from the Elections Act are expected to be delivered for the first time at next year’s local elections in England, including introducing a requirement for voters to show identification before they can vote at polling stations. These will present new challenges for voters, campaigners and electoral administrators in England. There have been significant delays in the development and delivery of the secondary legislation that will set out the detail of how these changes will operate. Both the Commission and the wider electoral community need to undertake preparatory activity, which cannot be done without this detail. We are committed to supporting the effective implementation of voter ID and the other changes introduced by the Elections Act, but it remains vital that they are delivered in a way which ensures accessibility, security and workability. We know that electoral administrators are concerned about the short time now available before the new provisions are due to come into effect – whether they have scheduled polls in May 2023 or not – and that they will need to start taking steps soon to get ready for them. Given these delays, we are concerned about whether the voter ID requirement can be delivered in a way which is secure, accessible and workable, ahead of the next scheduled elections in May 2023 as planned. We are continuing to develop our plans for how we will support electoral administrators to prepare for and deliver the changes. We published some initial planning guidance in August to highlight key areas of planning that electoral administrators can take forward now, even in the absence of the detail on how the provisions will work. This guidance is based on our current knowledge of UK Government implementation plans.

Electoral administrators need clarity and certainty in order to plan and prepare to deliver well-run elections in advance of the important polls that are scheduled to take place during the next two to three years. The UK Government should work with the electoral community to ensure they have clear and accurate information about how and when changes in the Elections Act are going to be implemented. This includes ensuring legislation is clear at least six months before any new changes are due to be implemented, so that Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and electoral administrators have enough time to prepare. The UK Government should also ensure that the changes in the Elections Act are supported with the necessary funding required for the electoral community to be able to continue to deliver well-run elections.

Preparations for the Scottish Parliamentary Election 2021 Legislative matters relating to Scottish Parliamentary election 2021 Iain Hockenhull (IH) confirmed the order to make the changes to proxy voting had been approved. Electoral registration, postal voting, proxy voting Pete Wildman (PW) said that the SAA TV Ad campaign had reached 2.1 million people across the country. The Household Notification Letter had received a positive response with over 70,000 requests for postal votes, not including downloads or parties. He said people could email a scanned or photocopied postal vote application and if received by 5pm on 6 April would receive a postal vote for the 6 May Scottish Parliament election. If they missed that deadline, they could still vote in person or appoint a proxy. He confirmed the Chief Medical Officer (CMO) letter had promoted a lot of interest. Chris Highcock (CH) confirmed there would be a number of sweeps to ensure pick-up on polling day Action: PW agreed to email Rachel Winham a list of ERO addresses in Scotland. Martin McKeown (MMcK) referred to the Electoral Commission's Code of conduct which directed parties to return applications within two days and to check absent voter lists to reduce the potential for duplication. Polling stations Chris Highcock (CH) talked about the directions the EMB had put in place, advice around one day of polling; the appropriate allocation of in-person polling station numbers to avoid long queues; the dates when poll cards would be sent out and he listed the health and safety measures which would be in polling places. Action: He said he would discuss out with the meeting how parties could get early communication of the locations of polling places. Counting of votes CH talked about the arrangements for the commencement of counts and stressed that physical distancing would mean they would take longer and mean less available space for counting agents, or guests of the RO, but allow an appropriate degree of scrutiny and safety. The subject of Covid testing of staff was still under discussion but being considered. EC guidance update MMcK confirmed core guidance for parties had been published and spending return forms would be published shortly. All core guidance for candidates was on line and spending return forms published this week. There would also be a supporting document setting out what would be different at this election. He suggested early contact with Regional and Constituency Returning Officers who would give information on the conduct of elections locally. ACTION: He would send round a link to the RRO/RO Contact details. Campaigning under Covid-19 Penelope Curtis, said the Minister for Parliamentary Business had updated on preparations for the safe running of the election but also outlined how campaigning was likely to take place. The Scottish Government update included a link to that statement which sought to align campaigning activity as closely as possible to the updated strategic framework. It was anticipated leafleting by volunteers could begin from 15 March, subject to a decision taken that restrictions would be eased. Face to face door step campaigning could commence from 5 April. The public health test would be that infection rates across Scotland had reached 50 per 100,000 across Scotland and the test positivity rate under 5%. Any individual local authority exceeding these figures would have to suspend campaigning until figures dropped below that level. She said public acceptance and reaction to campaigning would be absolutely key and not all would welcome it. Briefings for parties MMcK said he and Andy O'Neill (AON) had engaged with parties, particularly new ones, to get across key messages regarding rules they needed to be aware of, (e.g. new imprint rules). He said the offer was still there if parties wanted to meet. Public awareness Sarah Mackie (SMa) talked about the Commission's registration campaign, 'Got 5' which would launch on 9 March. She said the democratic engagement area of the website provided resources for stakeholders, including animations on how to vote, how to complete ballot papers and what to expect in the polling station. SMa also said that an animation about how postal votes are processed and kept secure would also be shared. She reported the Scottish Parliament website was developing a video on how the voting system worked. The Commission's household booklet would be distributed from the week beginning 22 March with accessible versions available week commencing 15 March. A link to the booklet has been circulated, but SMa asked that members do not share this until the accessible versions were available. There had been requests from parties to be added to the press distribution list and she asked anyone who wished to be added to send her a request (in line with GDPR regulations). Catherine Heggie (CHe) reported that the 'Welcome to your vote' campaign would begin on 9 March, was aimed at 16 & 17 year olds and newly-enfranchised foreign nationals and would run until the registration deadline. Digital and print resources were available for partners to use across their channels, as well as a voting factsheet for newly-enfranchised citizens and learning resources for 14-18 year olds. Police Scotland Superintendent Gerry Corrigan (GC) reported the policing structure was in place and key risks were public order, terrorism, cyber threat and candidate safety though he stressed no specific threat had been identified. The police intended to provide all candidates with personal safety advice in relation to being a candidate and would support ROs in facilitating the throughput of people at polling places. They would engage, explain and encourage to abide by the rules, with enforcement activity as a last resort in extreme circumstances. He said they were keen to have sight of guidance going out to canvassers so their knowledge would be in tune. He said planning meetings were well under way and divisional points of contact well linked to local authorities so building a knowledge of where polling places were to develop a local picture. On polling day and the day of the count, police operation command centre would be maintaining a national overview of anything developing for a police perspective.

Scott Martin (SM) asked if a 24 hour point of contact telephone list existed. ACTION: GC said he would communicate back on this over the next few days. Scottish Government update MMCC asked if anyone had questions regarding the previously circulated update. She said the SSI had gone to committee that morning. Scotland Office/Cabinet Office update Helena Brice (HB) asked if there were any questions regarding the previously circulated update. Scottish Boundary Commission update Isabel Drummond-Murray said there was not much to report, she had postponed the meeting with the parties about the 2023 review and were now focussed on the islands review work. She said she would be back in touch in May to set up a meeting after the election. Action: Isabel Drummond-Murray to arrange meeting with parties through EC after the election. Royal Mail update Rachel Winham (RW) commented on performance concerns from stakeholders but assured all that postal votes and election materials were a priority and contingency plans were in place. Priority mailboxes were emptied two to three times a day and managers would make sure mail with purple flashes were pulled out. There was also Sunday working. She said candidate mail could be tracked through the network and would be delivered by day 3 for addressed and day 7 for unaddressed with an update provided to any party. Final sweep information would be going out to EROs soon. She said they would be sending out packs with details of their guide and election sort details and asked to send out to candidates after close of nominations and particularly to help with Independent candidates. A meeting with parties' printers had taken place and one to one meetings about a party's mailing could be held. Pete Wildman (PW) reported that as at 1 March, 770,000 postal votes had been registered and the number was climbing daily. He could not give a definitive figure now but said it would be in excess of that. ACTION: AON said he would send Rachel Winham the Electoral Commission research. SM asked if there was an indication on uptake of postal votes at recent by elections. PW reported pre by election postal vote levels of 13.6% in the Borders which rose to 22%, an increase of 8.4% where normally would only see 1% increase. In December, postal vote demand was 16.6% and now was just over 18%. He predicted that figure would change and people do leave it to the last minute to apply. EMB update CH said they had interacted with ROs, EROS and government around the practical delivery of the election. Electoral Commission update AON said all had been covered in previous discussion. Sue Bruce informed the panel there was a preferred candidate for the position of Chair of the Electoral Commission and his name was John Pullinger who was a past president of the Royal Statistical Society. He had gone through processes led by the Speaker's Committee and on Monday had been involved in a public session with them. If they agreed it would go for debate and be subject for the Royal Warrant. Alex Attwood Northern Ireland had been appointed as smaller parties Commissioner and the Royal Warrant was in processing. The Commission was also recruiting for a country Commissioner for Northern Ireland. Dates of future meetings AON said a date approximately 10 days after the election would be set for the next meeting as well as dates from autumn onwards to May 2022 for the Scottish council elections.

For this, data was collected from Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers across Great Britain and the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland (EONI).

This comprised the Declaration of Result of Poll, the statutory Form K 'Statement as to Postal Ballot Papers' and an additional data form, specified by the Commission, which included data relating to electoral registration, turnout, absent voting and rejected ballots. The election resulted in a hung parliament, with no party winning an overall majority. The Conservatives won 317 seats (42.2% of votes) compared with 262 seats (40.0% of votes) for Labour, 35 seats for the SNP (3.1% of votes), 12 seats (7.4% of votes) for The Liberal Democrats and 10 seats (0.9% of votes) for The DUP.

Electorate The election gave 46.8 million registered electors the opportunity to vote. Despite a small decrease (2.7%) in Scotland from the 2015 UK general election, this was the largest ever electorate for a UK-wide poll. Table 2.1: Electorate, 2010

Britain, an estimated 2.4 million applications to register were received in the weeks leading up to the election. More than a third (36.9%) of these were recorded as duplicates 2 and an estimated 226,565 individuals applied to register after the registration deadline. Returning Officers reported that approximately 10,500 individuals tried to vote on election day despite not being registered. This data is inconsistently reported and we did not receive a complete data return from all constituencies. 3 Overseas voters Across Great Britain, there were approximately 285,000 registered overseas voters (0.6% of the electorate). This ranged from 0.1% in 20 constituencies to 6.0% in two London constituencies (Dulwich and West Norwood, and Streatham). 4 Table 2.2: Overseas voters Region Overseas voters % of electorate

Table 3.1 confirms that only a small fraction of votes cast are not allocated to candidates standing for election. This figure has decreased slightly from 2015 and 2010. At a constituency level, 81 constituencies rejected 0.1% of ballots. As was the case in 2015, the highest rejection rate was seen in the seat of the Speaker of the House of Commons, Buckingham, where 3.6% of ballots were rejected. Across the UK, the majority of rejected ballots (71.9%) were rejected due to being unmarked or wholly void for uncertainty. Almost a quarter (24.9%) were rejected due to voting for more than one candidate. This compares with 16.4% in 2015 and 15.3% in 2010. At a constituency level, postal voters ranged from 1.0% in Belfast West to 44.3% in Newcastle upon Tyne North. As was the case in 2015, the biggest increase from the previous election was in Scotland, where postal voting increased by 1.8pp from 17.6% to 19.4%. Postal voting remains much less common in Northern Ireland (1.9%) where different rules are in force. Table 4.1: Postal voting 2015 - 2017 2015 2017 Change (pp)

Postal votes accounted for 21.6% of all votes included at the count. This compares with 20.5% in 2015 and 18.8% in 2009. Table 4.2: Postal vote vs in-person turnout

These identifiers are then matched against those provided at the time of application. If the signature or date of birth is missing or does not match, the postal vote is rejected and is not included at the count. Since 2014, Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) have been required to notify electors if their postal vote has been rejected and give the reason(s) for rejection. They can also request the elector to provide an up-to-date signature.

Table 4.3: Rejected postal ballots Rejected ballots as % of envelopes returned 2017
2.4% 2015 3.3% 2010 3.8% The rate of rejection of postal votes has decreased to 2.4% from 3.3% in 2015 and 3.8% in 2010. This trend was consistent across the UK, ranging from a decrease of 0.9 percentage points in England and Scotland to a decrease of 1.8 percentage points in Northern Ireland. This trend mirrors decreases across local elections in 2017 and suggests that the new policy may be having a positive impact.

Almost half (48.5%) of all rejected ballots are rejected due to mismatched information. In a third of cases (33.2%), postal ballots were rejected because voters returned their postal voting envelopes but failed to include either the ballot paper itself or the verification statement or both. Table 4.4: Reasons for postal vote

forms	Ballot paper	10.1%	24.0%	13.9	PV statement	14.9%	9.2%
			-5.7			-1.7	Missing

It is worth noting that these percentages represent very small numbers of postal votes. For example, although 48.5% of rejected postal votes were rejected due to mismatched information, this represents 1.2% of covering envelopes received and 0.3% of all votes cast. The vast majority of postal voters did correctly file their returns. Proxies and waivers A total of 283,928 electors appointed a proxy (0.6% of the electorate). This compares with 0.3% in 2015. The number of emergency proxies issued across Great Britain was 14,096. This is considerably higher than in 2015 wheA concession granted under the terms of the Electoral Administration Act 2006 was that postal electors in Great Britain who either had a disability, or were illiterate, or were unable to furnish a consistent signature could apply for a waiver to use their date of birth as their sole identifier. n 8,901 emergencies were issued. In 2017, 51,452 waivers were granted, representing 0.1% of the electorate. This is consistent with 2015. At a constituency level, the proportion of waivers granted ranged 0.01% in four constituencies in England, to 0.7% in Bassetlaw. Appendices Appendix A There remain inconsistencies in the ways in which local authorities record and report information.

We continue to notice differences in the coding of information by different electoral management software. For example, customers of one electoral management software supplier consistently report a higher proportion of 'mismatching' than others.

Inconsistencies relating to the reasons for and total number of postal vote rejections on the Form K appear to result from the potential for differences in interpretation and treatment. For example, in the treatment of the numbers of covering envelopes and ballot papers returned, covering envelopes may be sent in without the A envelope or postal voting statement enclosed, while the missing document may or may not be sent in a separate covering envelope later, or multiple ballots may be returned in one envelope. When local authorities are contacted about such anomalies they are often unable to provide revised figures or clarify why the data were coded in that way. In practice, we use a calculation of field B6 minus field C18 as a surrogate for the total number of postal votes rejected regardless of whether or not it is the same as recorded in field C19. The different breakdown of reasons for rejection collected on the additional data form does not always match this B6 minus C18 calculation. However, the discrepancies seem less severe and the categories have the advantage of being embedded in software and of having greater 'common sense' meaning. It would seem sensible to consider replacing fields B15-17 on

Form K with three other aggregated categories: rejections for mismatching; rejections for missing identifier information; rejections for absent documentation. As it is, field B15 is largely redundant given that almost all authorities now verify 100% of postal vote returns. There is no field that captures the number of postal voting statements received by the Returning Officer or at a polling station before the close of poll. In practice, we use field B6, 'Number of covering envelopes received by the Returning Officer or at a polling station before the close of poll' as a surrogate but we know that, as mentioned, electors can return multiple postal ballots in one envelope or return envelopes without any ballots. Signing the recall petitions Transparency and secrecy Running the recall petition
Background First published: 10 October 2019 Last updated: 10 October 2019 Summary
There have been two petitions during 2019 to recall the MPs for the constituencies of Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire . Both Petition Officers (POs) delivered all their duties as required under the Recall Act 2015 and provided a high standard of service. There were no significant problems which affected people eligible to sign or wishing to campaign. Only one recall petition had been held before, in 2018 in the North Antrim constituency . The experiences of these three recall petitions have provided us with valuable evidence about how the existing petition rules work in practice, in different parts of the UK types of constituencies political contexts.
There are some areas where applying electoral rules to a process which is not an election has led to administrative challenges and issues with transparency and secrecy, and we have made recommendations for changes to the rules and processes for running future recall petitions. Our recommendations Recommendations for the UK Government The UK Government should now review the policy and legislation for recall petitions to identify changes that would improve the experience for electors and the administration of future petitions. The Government should: Identify the appropriate length for a reduced petition period of less than six weeks. This should start by considering whether a four-week period would be sufficient. Review the scope of who can observe the process in signing places to extend transparency and scrutiny, while ensuring that secrecy is maintained for people signing the petition. Review the recall petition regulations for Northern Ireland to ensure there is appropriate access to inspect the marked register if there are concerns about fraud at future recall petitions. Consider whether eligible electors should be given the chance to complete an equivalent to the signing sheet to indicate that they oppose the petition. Set out more clearly what time signing places should close on the final day of the petition period and the deadline for receipt of postal signing papers, and when and how the Speaker should be notified of the petition result. Keep the rules for donations and spending by campaigners under review as more experience is gained at future recall petitions, to ensure there is appropriate oversight and regulation of campaigner spending. Recommendations for Petition Officers and Returning Officers We also recommend that Petition Officers and Returning Officers should review their plans for running future recall petitions: Petition Officers for future recall petitions should ensure they offer some extended opening hours for people to sign the petition, beyond the minimum hours of 9am to 5pm. Returning Officers should review their contingency planning to include arrangements for delivering any recall petitions which could potentially take place in their constituencies, particularly to identify possible locations for signing places. Signing the recall petitions In both Peterborough and in Brecon and Radnorshire more than 10% of the people eligible to sign the recall petition had done so by the end of the six-week signing period. This meant that the sitting MPs would be recalled and a by-election would be held to fill the vacant seat in each constituency. Chart 1: Percentage of eligible people who signed the recall petitions in Brecon and Radnorshire and Peterborough Signing the recall petitions Length of the signing period Data provided by both Petition Officers (POs) shows that the majority of people who decided to sign the petitions did so early in the six-week signing period: In Peterborough 79% of all those who went to a signing place or returned a postal signing sheet (22% of all those eligible to sign) did so within the first two weeks of the signing period In Brecon and Radnorshire 70% of all those who went to a signing place or returned a postal signing sheet (14% of all those eligible to sign) did so within the first two weeks of the signing period

In both constituencies the number of people signing the petition each week began to reduce after the first two weeks of the signing period, and the threshold had been reached. However the full duration of the petition process had to take place before the outcome could be counted and announced. Chart 2: Proportion of eligible people who had signed the petitions during the signing period Postal signing sheets People could also choose to sign the petition by post. Many of the signatures recorded in both constituencies were from people who had completed and returned postal signing sheets to the PO. This included a significant proportion that were returned within the first two weeks of the signing period. Table 1: Number of postal signing sheets issued and returned Peterborough Brecon and Radnorshire Total number of postal signing sheets issued 13,395 (19% of all those eligible to sign the petition) 8,795 (17% of all those eligible to sign the petition) Number of postal signing sheets returned during first two weeks of signing period 6,914 (45% of all signing sheets recorded during first two weeks) 3,288 (46% of all signing sheets recorded during first two weeks) Total number of postal signing sheets returned by the end of the signing period 7,848 (41% of all signing sheets recorded during the signing period) 3,790 (37% of all signing sheets recorded during the signing period) Everyone who had previously applied to vote by post at UK Parliamentary elections in these constituencies was automatically sent a postal signing sheet at the beginning of the signing period. This meant that a significant proportion of people in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire received a postal signing sheet without having to make a new application to express their view by post. By contrast, in Northern Ireland postal voting is only available at elections to people who can provide a reason why they cannot be reasonably expected to go to their polling station. Only 4% of people eligible to sign in North Antrim were sent a postal signing sheet. We have not been made aware of any significant problems with the process for signing by post. Almost everyone in our public opinion survey in Peterborough who said they signed by post felt it was easy to do so, including over two-thirds who said it was very easy. Views on the length of the signing period Some people who were involved in the petitions felt that the signing periods were too long, and could possibly be shortened. Their feedback highlighted concerns that: Providing signing locations and staff for a six-week period was a significant public expense, and managing the petition was an additional burden on local authority resources and capacity. Public interest in the petition reduced significantly over the course of the six-week period. Some staff in signing places reported that they had been quiet during most days of the recall petition. Our research with the public in Peterborough found that more than two thirds (69%) of people felt that there was enough time during the signing period, while one in five (21%) felt the period was too long. People who didn't sign the petition were much less likely to say they felt the period was too long (9%, compared with 30% of those who did sign) and were slightly more likely to say the period was too short. Evidence from the recall petitions in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire suggests that there is scope to reduce the length of the signing period without significantly reducing access for those people who want to sign. We recommend that the UK Government should review the rules for recall petitions to identify the appropriate length for a reduced petition period of less than six weeks. This should start by considering whether a four-week period would be sufficient. Signing places and opening hours POs can designate up to 10 signing places for a recall petition, which must be open from 9am to 5pm on Monday to Friday, for a total of six weeks. POs can also choose to offer additional, extended opening hours. The decisions taken by the POs in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire on signing places and opening hours are set out in Table 2.

	Peterborough	Brecon and Radnorshire
Number of signing places	10	6
Extended opening hours	Opened at 7am on Tuesdays. Closed 10pm on Thursdays	Opened at 8am on Tuesdays. Closed 8pm on Wednesdays
Views on signing places and opening hours	The POs in both Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire said that the length of the signing period made it harder for them to find suitable venues for signing places which were available for the full six-week period. They also only had a relatively short timeframe, 10 working days, to do this. Both found that they were unable to use venues that had been tried and tested as polling stations at elections, because they had already been booked during the signing period. Data from POs about when people signed the petition (shown in Table 2 above) shows that a significant number of people took advantage of the extended opening hours offered by the PO to sign the petitions. We recommend that POs for future recall petitions should ensure they offer some extended opening hours beyond the minimum hours of 9am to 5pm.	The POs in both Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire said that the length of the signing period made it harder for them to find suitable venues for signing places which were available for the full six-week period. We recommend that POs for future recall petitions should ensure they offer some extended opening hours beyond the minimum hours of 9am to 5pm.
On 10 May 2019 we received a copy of a letter sent to the PO from Glyn Mathias (a former Electoral Commissioner) and Sir Paul Silk (former parliamentary official) who were both eligible to sign the petition in Brecon and Radnorshire. The letter set out their concerns about the administration of the recall petition. These concerns primarily related to the number of signing places that had been allocated, the location of two of the signing places within council office buildings rather than being located in the centre of town, and the opening times of the signing places. We did not find any evidence to substantiate this claim. While the PO in Brecon and Radnorshire met the obligations to provide signing places under the Recall Act 2015, we suggest that for future recall petitions POs should consult with the Electoral Commission about the number of signing places and their suggested locations as part of their planning process. The PO and her staff suggested it would be useful for all Returning Officers as part of their contingency planning process to carry out a review of their arrangements to include planning for potential recall petitions which could take place in their local authority. This would mean they would be able to refer to their contingency planning documents if a recall petition was held. They suggested a useful starting point could be polling station reviews that occur every five years. We recommend that Returning Officers should review their contingency planning to include arrangements for delivering any recall petitions which could potentially take place in their constituencies, particularly to identify possible locations for signing places. If the overall length of the signing period is also reduced, this would also help POs to find suitable available venues to use as signing places for the full duration of the signing period. POs should make sure that there are enough to mean that there is a site close enough to be easily accessible for all electors. Our research in Peterborough asked what people thought about the signing places. Overall, as shown in Chart 3, around two-thirds of all people surveyed indicated they thought it was easy to get to their allocated signing place. A majority of those who said they had signed the petition in person also indicated that the building was appropriate for use as a signing place and that it was accessible.	Chart 3: Views on accessing signing places in Peterborough Transparency and secrecy

ensure that people who are entitled to sign a recall petition feel able to express their views freely, while also having confidence that petition processes are well-run and that any allegations of fraud can be investigated. Restrictions on transparency and secrecy are more significant for a recall petition, compared with an election, because it is obvious what position someone signing a petition is taking: they have made an active choice in favour of the proposal to recall the current MP. By contrast, polling station observation or inspection of the marked register after an election shows only that a ballot paper was issued to an individual elector, and does not indicate whether they cast a vote for a particular candidate or party. There are some areas of the petition process, discussed below, that could be clarified for POs, electors and the public more widely to ensure that the appropriate levels of secrecy and transparency are in place. The UK Government should review the law in these areas. The Government could also consider whether all eligible electors should be given the chance to complete an equivalent to the signing sheet to indicate they oppose it. This could reduce the risk of compromising secrecy for individuals, particularly if access to independent observation of the process in signing places were to be extended. Transparency and secrecy Observing the recall petition Unlike at elections, only Electoral Commission representatives can observe all parts of the recall petition signing process during the whole six-week period. For both petitions, Electoral Commission representatives observed the petition process in signing places (including days with extended opening hours), the daily process for verifying the number of signing papers completed that day, and the final count. Individuals who are accredited under the Electoral Commission's electoral observation scheme are only able to attend the final counting of signatures, while accredited organisations are not entitled to observe any stage of the process. No accredited individual observers attended the counts. Limiting observation in this way helps to ensure secrecy for those signing a recall petition, and also prevents others from estimating whether the 10% threshold has been reached before the end of the petition period. However, it does also mean that transparency and scrutiny of the signing process are limited. We recommend that the UK Government should review the scope of who can observe the process in signing places to extend transparency and scrutiny, while ensuring that secrecy is maintained for people signing the petition. Secrecy of the petition and access to the marked register The petition regulations provide some secrecy protections for people signing the petition. POs should take into account the need for privacy when allocating signing places in their constituency. During the petition period it is also an offence to publish a statement that could indicate if an individual has signed the petition or not, or to publish any forecasts about the result of the petition. After the conclusion of a recall petition in Great Britain, a marked copy of the electoral register (showing who had signed the petition) may be made available by the Electoral Registration Officer (ERO) for public inspection on request. The ERO is only required to make those documents available in response to a request for inspection if they are satisfied that fraud may have taken place at the petition. These secrecy measures are intended to limit the scope for undue influence and pressure on people to sign or not sign a petition, while maintaining protections against fraud. We are not aware of any complaints about the secrecy of the signing places, intimidation or fraudulent signing during either of the petitions. Our research in Peterborough found: only 6% of people who said that they had signed the petition in person indicated that there was not enough privacy inside the signing places 17% of people who said that they had signed the petition in person indicated that there was not enough privacy around the signing places almost two-thirds of people agreed that signing with a signature was sufficiently anonymous around half agreed that the process meant that they could sign in secret In Northern Ireland there is no provision in the legislation to allow the marked register to be inspected in cases of suspected fraud, or for the PO to supply it to the police, the Electoral Commission or anyone who requested it. We recommend that the UK Government should review the recall petition regulations for Northern Ireland to ensure there is appropriate access to inspect the marked register if there are well-founded concerns about fraud at future recall petitions. Running the recall petition In both constituencies the petitions were well-run. Most people in Peterborough said they were confident that the petition was well-run (87%), with almost all of those who actually signed the petition saying they were confident (96%). However, both POs faced practical challenges in running the petitions in their constituencies. These were increased, in the areas outlined below, by a lack of clarity in some areas of the legislation, POs having to take on new responsibilities and difficulties in POs having to use electoral management software to run a petition which is not the same as an election. POs were also faced with planning and delivering other electoral events which impacted on resourcing the petitions. Running the recall petition Closing the recall petition and announcing the result Under the Recall Act there is a requirement for the PO, or assigned member of staff, to verify the number of signing papers completed during each day of the petition period. However the Recall Act lacks clarity in relation to the final count and does not set out: what time signing places should close on the last day the deadline for receiving postal signing papers; or timings for the count (except that it should take place “as soon as reasonably practicable after the end of the signing period”). As a result, the POs in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire took different decisions about the deadline for returning postal signing papers and started counting at different times, which were both different from the decision made by the PO in North Antrim. Table 3: Comparison of arrangements for closing the petition and count start times

Peterborough Brecon and Radnorshire North Antrim Signing places closed 5pm on Wednesday 1 May 5pm on Thursday 20 June 5pm on Wednesday 19 September Deadline for returning postal signing papers 5pm on Wednesday 1 May Midnight on Thursday 20 June Midnight on Wednesday 19 September Count started Straight after the signing places closed at 5pm 9am on Friday 21 June 0.01am on Thursday 20 September There is no evidence that these different approaches had an impact on the running of the count, and feedback from our representatives at the counts was that they worked well. However, to ensure a more consistent experience for those wishing to sign at future recall petitions, the legislation should specify what time signing places should close on the final day of the petition period and the deadline for receipt of postal signing papers. Once the signing papers have been counted, the PO must notify the Speaker of the House of Commons of the result before an announcement is made. However there is no provision in law as to how this should happen and in what form the notification should be made. The POs in all three constituencies agreed with the Speaker in advance that they would send an email, and once this was acknowledged they could then publish the result. We recommend that the UK Government should review the recall petition legislation to set out more clearly when and how the Speaker should be notified. Registering campaigners At elections and referendums, the Electoral Commission is responsible for registering political parties and non-party campaigners wishing to spend over a certain amount. At recall petitions, uniquely, the registration of campaigners is undertaken by POs. People or organisations wishing to campaign for or against the recall petition, and intending to spend over £500, must notify the PO that they want to be a registered campaigner. POs must also receive donation and spending returns from registered campaigners within 30 days of the end of the regulated period of the recall petition. A total of eight people and organisations registered to campaign during the petitions. They submitted donation and spending returns to the POs after the petitions. At time of publication reported donations and spending had not been received for one individual and one trade union in Peterborough. Table 4: Registered campaigners and value of reported donations and spending Peterborough Brecon and Radnorshire Registered campaigners Two political parties, two Trades Unions and one individual Three political parties Spending £6,988.79 £13,365.87 Donations £3,212.11 £10,324.50 These spending returns are made available for public inspection by the PO and copies sent to us, but there is no provision for returns to be scrutinised by a statutory agency. This differs from the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act (PPERA) rules for elections and referendums, where it is required for the Commission to receive spending returns from political parties and campaigners so we can check that these comply with the law. However, the Recall Act appears to have been based on the Representation of the People Act (RPA) requirements for candidates at UKPGE who are required to send their spending returns to the RO and not directly to us. The lack of statutory scrutiny of donation and spending returns means that there could be significant spending on activity intended to influence electors at future recall petitions that is not fully monitored to check that campaigners have complied with the law. We recommend that the UK Government should keep the rules for donations and spending by campaigners under review as more experience is gained at future recall petitions, to ensure there is appropriate oversight and regulation of campaigner spending. Other challenges to running the recall petitions The use of electoral management software (EMS) is an established part of running electoral events. Using it for a recall petition, which despite having many of the same processes is not an election, was not straightforward for POs and their staff. The EMS systems used by the POs did not provide templates for recall petition paperwork, and were not able to run two events with different timetables in parallel. This was more challenging as both signing periods overlapped with other electoral events – the 2 May local government election in Peterborough and the European Parliamentary election in Brecon and Radnorshire held on 23 May. Although recall petitions may not frequently overlap with other electoral events in future, it would assist POs if EMS providers were able to develop their systems to manage multiple events on different timetables and to produce templates for use in recall petitions. Background Why did the petitions take place? The Recall of MPs Act 2015 introduced a process where a sitting MP can lose their seat in the House of Commons if there is a successful petition to recall them. All those in the relevant constituency who are eligible to vote at a UK Parliamentary election can sign. They can choose to do so in person, by post or by appointing a proxy. Over 10% must do so for the MP to be recalled. The Commission is required to publish a report, following the petition. This process was first used in 2018, when a petition in North Antrim to recall Ian Paisley MP was unsuccessful. We published our report on the North Antrim petition in November 2018. There have been two more recall petitions in 2019. The first was in Peterborough following Fiona Onasanya MP's conviction on 19 December 2018 on charges of perverting the course of justice. On 29 January 2019, Ms Onasanya was sentenced to three months in prison. Her appeal against the conviction was rejected by the Court of Appeal on 5 March, and the Speaker of the House of Commons gave notice to the Returning Officer in Peterborough that a recall petition was to take place. The petition took place between 19 March and 1 May. The second was in

Brecon and Radnorshire. This was a result of Chris Davies MP's conviction on 23 April 2019 of having made a false expenses claim relating to setting up his constituency office after the 2015 UK Parliamentary General Election. On 24 April, the Speaker of the House of Commons notified the Returning Officer in Powys that a recall petition was to take place. The petition took place between 9 May and 20 June. Roles and responsibilities The constituency's Returning Officer, acting in the role of Petition Officer, is responsible for opening and running a recall petition. Their role includes setting the opening date of the petition, which must be no later than 10 days, or as soon as reasonably practical, after the notification from the Speaker of the House of Commons. They must also publish a register of people eligible to sign the petition and notify them that the petition is taking place. A total of 69,673 people in Peterborough and 53,032 in Brecon and Radnorshire were able to sign the petition. People were notified by letter why the petition was taking place, what the outcome would be, how they could sign and information about their allocated signing place. In Peterborough, our public opinion survey found that almost three quarters of people could remember receiving a letter telling them that a recall petition was going to take place. During a recall petition, local police forces have a role investigating any breaches of the rules set out in the Recall Act and to enforce compliance with the law. The Commission provides advice and guidance to help people to understand the rules. We can also seek forfeiture of impermissible donations, if necessary, by court order. Feedback from people in Peterborough Due to its proximity to the May 2019 local elections, we were able to extend our post-election public opinion research to cover the recall petition in Peterborough. This allowed us to increase our understanding of people's awareness and perceptions of the Peterborough recall petition. Research agency BMG conducted 159 telephone interviews between 3 and 23 May 2019, with a sample of people who would be eligible to vote at a UK Parliamentary general election in Peterborough. Quotas were set on age and gender to ensure that the respondents were as representative as possible of the population of the area. Data are weighted to correct any demographic differences between the interviewed sample and known population profile from the census population data. The chair welcomed Amanda Kelly to her first meeting. Declarations of interest No new declarations of interest. Minutes of the Commission Board meeting of 13 March, 9 April, and 24 April 2019, and Commissioner Day on 24 April 2019 (EC 26/19, 27/19, 28/19, and 29/19) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 13 March, 9 April, and 24 April 2019 be agreed. The record of the Commissioner Day on 24 April was noted. Update on May polls Bob Posner introduced the item and commented that the work arising from an election could last up to two years after polling day in some instances. The chair thanked staff for their efforts throughout the recent polls. This was endorsed by the Board. The Board heard that the local authority elections had run well. However, the late confirmation by government of the European Parliamentary election had been a factor in the delivery of that poll. Despite this, the internal structures we had developed to prepare for unexpected electoral events had worked well to support the delivery of the European Parliamentary election. Lessons learnt from this contingency planning would inform future electoral events. Due to the compressed period prior to the registration deadline, and despite efforts by ourselves and local authorities to publicise the requirements, a number of non-UK European Union citizens resident in the UK were unable to complete their registration on time. Some were turned away from the polling station on election day. It would not be possible to quantify how many people were affected in this way, but we had asked for more information from Electoral Registration Officers and Returning Officers, including about when the registration forms were sent out, and what their response rate was. In addition there were overseas voters who did not receive their ballot in time, which had previously been the case in other recent unscheduled polls. We had previously identified and informed government and parliament of a number of areas where legislative changes were required to improve ease of registering for non-UK European Union citizens resident in the UK and ease of voting for overseas electors. The Board heard of the new ways that information was gathered to support the monitoring of campaigners and political parties during the regulated period. This was a more intelligence-based approach than in the past. It also included the use of online ad libraries. The data collected through the ad libraries was used to identify sources of advertising spending; in some instances we then contacted those people to determine whether their spending should have been reported to us. However, these libraries did not provide as much assurance as we would like, as their definition of digital political campaigning was not the same as in law. The Board also heard of the approach we took to determine the level of monitoring of political parties. Risk factors that related to each party were considered before a risk rating was assigned based on a range of factors, including the experience of individuals involved in the party and our previous interactions with them. There was also an expectation that we would meet with parties with higher risk profiles while they were compiling their returns. The Board received an update on the registration campaigns run prior to the local elections and the European Parliamentary election. These campaigns significantly exceeded their targets for registration before both polls. The communications team had started to analyse more detailed information on how these campaigns performed, and would publish an evaluation later this year. This information would also inform next year's campaign.

The Board also heard about the "Your vote is yours alone" campaign, through which we provided resources to local authorities to raise awareness of electoral fraud. The Board was told about the second round of voter identification pilots. The pilots ran in ten local authority areas during the local elections. These local authority areas covered a greater range of areas than previous pilots, which allowed for a broader range of evidence. There would be further analysis of data, informing our statutory report on the pilots, and the Board would return to the issue at its next meeting.

The Board asked about the visit to the Brexit Party, and heard that it was normal for us to contact parties close to polls. Bob Posner noted that in other regulatory areas such activity was a normal aspect of life. Political finance regulation was a heightened area of sensitivity, and as we were increasingly regulating in real-time, we sometimes needed to respond to issues during campaigns. The Board heard about the scope of the review of the Brexit Party, and that the visit had resulted in a large number of emails and phone calls. Where appropriate, we had notified the police of the content of a few of these emails and phone calls. Action: For the next meeting's item on the voter identification pilots, include information on other forms of voter fraud (postal, proxy etc), so the Board can understand the proportionality that Voter identification pilots seek to address. Confirm the number of parties that applied for registration before the European Parliamentary election but were not able to be processed in time. Modernising electoral registration project (EC 30/19) Ailsa Irvine introduced the item, and provided an update on different feasibility studies that assessed potential routes to improving the registration system. The Board heard that this work had put us in a strong position to inform and influence public debate on issues relating to electoral registration reform. The Board also heard that we were establishing a contact campaign that would involve a number of meetings with key stakeholders likely to be interested in the information that we had collated in the report. The Board commended the work of the team in producing the report, and discussed the different approaches to ensuring that the paper contributed helpfully to the public debate on changes. A proactive approach was recommended. The Board encouraged staff to be clear about how data collected for this purpose would be used and managed. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Confirmation of actions arising from the 24 April 2019 Board Effectiveness review (EC 31/19) Bob Posner introduced the paper, and sought confirmation of the actions noted in Appendix A of the paper. Rob Vincent recalled that the actions needed to include more systematic appraisal of individual members of the Board. Resolved: That the paper be agreed with the addition of appraisal of individual members of the Board. Performance Report Quarter 4 2018/19 (EC 32/19) Bob Posner introduced the paper and noted the key areas where future action would be targeted. The Board discussed whether we had done enough to effectively communicate the roles of the organisation. On the rate of staff turnover, it was noted that this was at least partly a function of the number of fixed-term contracts and the nature and size of the organisation. Kieran Rix spoke to the underspend in the last financial year as being well within acceptable public sector accounting expectations, and gave a brief overview of expected spending for the 2019/20 financial year. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Update on Ways of Working (EC 34/19) Ailsa Irvine introduced the item and provided a reminder of the objectives of the project. Jo Crofton-Diggins provided an update on the accommodation negotiations for the London office, and on the required investment in technology. There was discussion on how to use our office space more effectively and more efficiently. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Forward plan of Board business 2019/20 (EC 35/19) Resolved: That the paper be noted. Action tracker (EC 36/19) Resolved: That the paper be noted. Chair and Chief Executive's meeting and meetings of note in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (EC 37/19) Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Letter: Spending by Britain Stronger in Europe at the 2016 EU referendum | Electoral Commission Search Letter: Spending by Britain Stronger in Europe at the 2016 EU referendum You are in the Key correspondence section Home Key correspondence On this page Letter summary Read our letter in full First published: 15 January 2018 Last updated: 16 July 2019 Summary of the letter Date: 15 January 2018 To: The Rt Hon Priti Patel MP Address: House of Commons, London, SW1A 0AA From: Louise Edwards, Head of Regulation Format: Sent by post Full letter Dear Ms Patel Assessment decision: spending by Britain Stronger in Europe at the 2016 EU referendum Further to our letter dated 8 January 2018 we have now completed an assessment into your complaint about Britain Stronger in Europe (BSiE) and other 'remain' campaigners in the 2016 EU referendum. You raised concerns about whether BSiE had failed to report joint spending in its return for that referendum, and whether it had exceeded its spending limit as a result. The relevant offences are set out in sections 118(2) and 122(4) of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 ("PPERA"). Following an assessment, the Commission has determined that it does not have reasonable grounds to suspect BSiE committed these offences. We will not be opening an investigation into this matter.

Scope of the assessment Your letter dated 29 December 2017 raised two complaints. As you are aware from our earlier letter, we did not assess your complaint about campaigners that registered in the final month of the campaign; your letter did not provide evidence that the rules may have been broken in any of these regards. This assessment did look at your complaint that Britain Stronger in Europe may have failed to report joint spending with the Liberal Democrats, the Labour Party and Conservatives IN by way of paying for campaign materials and/or coordinating campaigns via a daily phone call. In particular you were concerned that BSiE and the aforementioned referendum campaigners may have coordinated their campaigns to the extent that the rules on joint spending in schedule 1 paragraph 22 of the European Union Referendum Act 2015 applied.

Further, you alleged that taking those rules into account, BSiE may have exceeded its spending limit and may have submitted a false spending return. The assessment We have conducted an assessment into this matter in accordance with our Enforcement Policy. In doing so, we reviewed the information highlighted by your letter together with other publicly available information, as well as BSiE's spending return and our records from the referendum. We also spoke to senior figures from BSiE. Payments for campaign materials You highlight payments in your letter as follows: 'Britain Stronger in Europe paid for campaign materials worth £52,062.23 for the Liberal Democrats between 15 April 2016 and 8 June 2016 and campaign materials worth £22,829 for Labour on 15 April 2016. In addition, the Labour Party paid for materials worth £7,265.65 for Britain Stronger in Europe on 26 May 2016'. We are aware of these payments from the referendum spending returns of the campaigners concerned. The spending on campaign materials for the Liberal Democrats was incurred as part of a commercial agreement with the Liberal Democrats. This was not joint spending under the rules. In respect of the Labour Party, the £22,829 you refer to is recorded as joint spending by BSiE. We are satisfied that this was correctly reported under the rules. The £7,265.65 you refer to as paid by the Labour Party to BSiE was incurred as part of a commercial agreement between BSiE and the Labour Party. We are satisfied that this was not joint spending.

Coordination between BSiE, Conservatives IN, the Labour Party and the Liberal Democrats You refer to extracts from two books published since the referendum that describe daily telephone meetings of certain 'remain' campaigners chaired by BSiE and ground campaigning by the Labour Party. Following examination we are satisfied that while liaison took place there is no evidence of joint spending as a result. The evidence indicates that the meetings were advisory in nature, focussed on communications and did not involve or result in decisions on referendum spending, or the coordination of campaign activities across campaigners, as part of a common plan or other arrangement. We are also satisfied that any instances of working together resulting in referendum spending between BSiE and other campaigners, including spending associated with the coordination of volunteers by BSiE, has been reported. Assessment outcome We have determined, following our assessment of the available evidence, that we do not have reasonable grounds to suspect that BSiE committed offences pursuant to either section 118(2) or section 122(4) of PPERA in relation to joint spending. We will not be opening an investigation into this matter. While we appreciate that you felt that an investigation was justified, our decision has been taken after careful examination of the evidence. As with any regulatory matter, should new evidence come to light that makes it appropriate for us to look again at this matter, we would do so. The Commission recognises the ongoing public interest in the campaign finances of the EU referendum. Since that referendum the Commission has published the conclusions of investigations into campaigners for both the 'leave' and 'remain' outcomes. More investigations are ongoing, and their conclusions will be published in due course. The Commission will continue to investigate where evidence causes us to suspect the campaign finance rules were broken. 8. Underpinning this work | Electoral Commission Search 8.

Underpinning this work You are in the Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 section Home Our plans and priorities Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 On this page We demonstrate independence and integrity We are a skilled organisation where diversity is valued We are a learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used efficiently First published: 25 April 2022 Last updated: 25 April 2022 Summary The preceding sections of this Corporate Plan summarise the work we will undertake to achieve our five strategic objectives. We will ensure we are equipped as an organisation to meet these objectives, focussing on the key enabling activities summarised below.

1. We demonstrate independence and integrity The electoral system depends on the Electoral Commission being an independent non-partisan body, and we therefore hold ourselves to high standards of integrity. We work hard to ensure we are respected for our expertise, and that our advice and decision making are free from bias. Given our unique role, our integrity needs to be clear and demonstrable. We will continue to demonstrate our integrity by: taking decisions on the evidence and being transparent about the reasons for them basing our policy positions and recommendations on analysis of evidence effectively communicating our work and views providing responsive services to those we support maintaining effective governance arrangements Taking decisions on the evidence and being transparent about the reasons for them In making decisions, of a regulatory nature or otherwise, we will proceed based on the law, evidence, fairness and proportionality, and in accordance with sound governance processes. Our published policies, such as our Corporate Governance Framework and Enforcement Policy, provide a clear understanding of how we operate and make decisions. Wherever and to the extent it is appropriate for us to provide reasons for decisions we will do so, including in accordance with freedom of information and data protection law. To that end we will continue to publish the outcome of every investigation, and highlight instances where learning from investigations could assist other campaigners in understanding and applying the law. We are accountable to the Courts for our decisions and the reasons for them, as well as being accountable to parliaments. Basing our policy positions and recommendations on analysis of evidence Our recommendations must be evidence-based and underpinned by research if they are to be trusted, adopted and taken forward. We will continue to conduct research to understand how elections and referendums have been run and experienced. We will continue to develop our evidence base on all issues that impact the electoral system – from voters' perceptions of the legitimacy of elections, to challenges faced by electoral administrators. We will embed the horizon-scanning approach that underpins our policy development work, and will continue to identify challenges and recommend solutions. Effectively communicating our work and views We want to ensure our work and our considered views have impact. We will therefore use plain and avoid jargon to aid understanding, and will communicate clearly to all audiences. We will continue to make our services and the information we provide accessible. Providing responsive services to those we support We support our stakeholders – including voters, campaigners, and electoral administrators – with accessible information and guidance on all aspects of the electoral system. They come to us for advice and support, and expect a responsive service that meets their needs. We will continue to consult our stakeholders to understand their expectations of our services, and will make improvements based on their needs. We will maintain high standards of customer service. Maintaining effective governance arrangements We outline our governance arrangements in Section 12 of this Corporate Plan. 2. We are a skilled organisation where diversity is valued We want our workforce to feel valued and be supported to achieve their potential. In the next five years we will: implement refreshed working practices to reflect wider changes in our work environment and culture attract, retain and develop the people we need maintain and improve high standards of leadership and management, with a focus on developing our people further embed equality, diversity and inclusion in all aspects of our work Implement refreshed working practices to reflect wider changes in our work environment and culture The coronavirus pandemic has impacted our working practices and resulted in new behaviours and approaches. We will learn from this to ensure that we retain the benefits, embedding more flexible working in ways that benefit our people, the Commission as a whole and our stakeholders. We will ensure our culture and behaviours reflect these values. We will also strengthen our approach to internal communications, working hard to keep our people connected, informed and motivated. We provide more information about how we will utilise technology to support new working practices below. Attract, retain and develop the people we need Our people are the core of our organisation. We will enable them to be skilled, with the diverse expertise needed to deliver our work. We will ensure they are capable, with a focus on being effective in everything they do, and committed, with a passion for democracy and our role in supporting it. We don't take these qualities for granted, and we will continue to implement our People Strategy to ensure we continue to attract, retain and develop the best team possible. Maintain and improve high standards of leadership and management, with a focus on developing our people Learning is a key part of our people's day to day work, and we are committed to supporting their development. We will continue to achieve high standards of leadership, management and people development, consulting our people to ensure we support their specific needs. Further embed equality, diversity and inclusion in all aspects of our work We value diversity, and aim to be an open and inclusive organisation. We celebrate the breadth of thinking, skills and experience that our people bring to our organisation. And, we are committed to being an inclusive regulator, with strategies and processes that reflect the diversity of those we serve. We will deliver a renewed equality, diversity and inclusion strategy. We will implement the Business in the Community Race at Work Charter. And, we will work to increase and support diversity at senior levels, including representation on our Commission Board. 3. We are a learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used efficiently The world around us is changing rapidly. We need to adapt fast to be successful. In order to do this we aim to be rigorous in learning from experience and seek continuous improvement in all that we do. With pressures on public spending set to continue, it is crucial that we continue to manage our costs and make effective use of our technology, funding, time and resources. In the next five years we will: procure and implement value for money IT systems that improve service delivery maintain our financial strategy to keep the Commission within approved budgets continue to develop techniques to learn from experience, seek continuous improvement and become more efficient and effective develop a corporate environmental strategy that meets policy and legislative requirements for reduced environmental impact We will do this through effective leadership and management within a five-year financial plan that is aimed at costs of no more after inflation in 2026/27 than it does in 2021/22. Procure and implement value for money IT systems that improve service delivery Technology and data are crucial to our work. Our website and Political Finance Online database allow us to publish vital information which is in the public interest, bringing transparency to our democracy. Our internal systems are key to ensuring the quality of our work, and enable us to effectively manage risk. We will continue our programme to procure and implement new IT systems. We will ensure our infrastructure is up to date and fit for purpose. We will launch our new Political Finance Online database to make it easier and faster for parties and campaigners to submit financial data. We will also implement a new customer relationship management tool. Maintain our financial strategy to keep the Commission within approved budgets We detail our financial strategy in Section 8. With pressures on public spending and a need to ensure value for money, our spend on core services will be no higher in real terms at the end of the Corporate Plan period than it is at the beginning. We will work to increase the value we deliver for parliaments. Continue to develop techniques to learn from experience, seek continuous improvement and become more efficient and effective Technology enables us to run an efficient workplace, but our processes are also key to ensuring the quality of our work. We will embed quality management processes across all our services and functions. We want to improve the way we make decisions, and will also make better use of our knowledge. We will develop and implement a new knowledge management framework. We want to meet the needs of voters, parties and campaigners, electoral administrators and parliaments, and will undertake research to understand their expectations of our services. Develop a corporate environmental strategy that meets policy and legislative requirements We outline our plans to reduce the environmental impact of the electoral system in sections 2 and 5 of this Corporate Plan. We are also committed to reducing the environmental impact of our organisation. We will enhance our expertise, ensuring we have the environmental skills we need. We will carry out an environmental audit. We will develop and implement an action plan to achieve our environmental targets in line with legislation. This will include reducing waste and increasing recycling where possible. Navigation 7. A modern and sustainable electoral system Section 7 of our 2022/23 to 2026/27 corporate plan 9. Reforming electoral law A modern electoral register Transparent digital campaigning of elections introduction Historically, the UK has robust and effective electoral rules. But many of the laws that set out how our elections are run have not been properly updated since the nineteenth century. Many of them are large, complex, and no longer fit for purpose. This needs to change. We've identified four areas where things can be improved. We are working with the UK's governments, parliaments, and other important groups to make this happen. Improvements We want: an electoral registration system fit for today everyone to be able to vote with confidence, regardless of their access needs electoral law that is easier for everyone to follow everyone to be able to see who is spending money to campaign and influence voters at elections and referendums, regardless of the channels Related content Elections Act about the UK Government's Elections Act and what it means for voting and campaigning Modernising elections research This qualitative research looks at public attitudes to voting and the information available around elections.

You are in the May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 24 July 2019 Last updated: 24 July 2019 Impact on public confidence There is some evidence to suggest that requiring voters to show identification had a positive impact on public confidence in the May 2018 elections: People in areas where the pilot schemes took place were less likely to think that electoral fraud took place at the May polls than those in other areas where elections were also held in May 2018 Across the pilot areas as a whole people were more likely to say they thought electoral fraud was not a problem than they were in January 2018 People who voted in polling stations in the pilot scheme areas, and therefore experienced the process of showing identification, were more confident in the security of the voting system than non-voters in those areas Intro However, this picture is not consistent within the individual pilot areas and there is evidence that wider local circumstances also have an impact. Overall findings from the pilot schemes Perceptions of electoral fraud People in the pilot scheme areas were significantly less likely than those in other areas with elections in May 2018 to say that fraud took place at the elections. Our research also showed that in the pilot scheme areas there was a notable increase in the proportion of respondents saying that electoral fraud was not a problem between January and May 2018 (24% compared with 42%). At the same time, fewer people saw it as a serious problem (19% compared with 9%). This significant change in views between before and after polling day was not seen in other areas with elections in May 2018. In these areas the number of people who thought that electoral fraud was not a problem remained broadly consistent between January and May (37% compared with 33%). This was also the case for people who thought that electoral fraud was a problem (24% compared with 29%). The extent to which people's views about electoral fraud changed between before and after polling day also varied by individual pilot areas. People in Bromley and Watford were significantly more likely to say that electoral fraud was not a problem after polling day than before (increasing from 21% to 57% in Bromley and 34% to 57% in Watford). In the other three areas there was only a small increase in the proportion who said electoral fraud was not a problem. There is some evidence to suggest that local circumstances may affect the changes we can see in these surveys. For example, in our January survey, out of the five pilot scheme areas, people living in Woking were much more likely to say that they thought that electoral fraud was a problem than in the other areas. This could reflect relatively recent high profile cases of electoral fraud in Woking. Perceptions of voting in polling stations being safe from fraud and abuse The proportion of people in the pilot scheme areas saying that voting in polling stations was safe from fraud and abuse did not change significantly between January and May 2018 (90% and 86%).¹¹ Across the pilot areas as a whole, the strength of confidence did increase between January and May: the proportion of people saying it was very safe increased from 43% to 57%. There was no evidence of a similar change in the other areas with elections in May 2018, which suggests some effect from the pilots. However, it is worth noting that we did not find this increase in Watford either, where the proportion saying that voting in a polling station is very safe from fraud and abuse fell between January and May 2018. Our survey results also show that people who voted in the pilot areas, and therefore experienced showing their identification, were more likely to say voting in a polling station was very safe from fraud and abuse than those who didn't vote (64% compared with 43%). Overall impact of an identification requirement There is inconsistent evidence from the May 2018 pilot schemes about whether a requirement to show identification at polling stations in Great Britain would improve confidence in the security of the voting system overall. There were some significant differences between the pilot scheme areas. A majority of people in Bromley (63%) and Gosport (57%) said that an identification requirement would make them more confident in the security of the voting system. In the other three areas a majority of people said it would make no difference, although around a third of people did say it would make them more confident. The experience of showing identification may have had a positive effect on levels of public confidence. People who voted in polling stations in pilot areas were more likely than those who didn't vote to say that the requirement to show identification would make them more confident in the security of the voting system (52% compared with 37%). Forty seven per cent of people in the pilot scheme areas thought that a requirement to show identification would make them feel more confident in the security of the voting system, and 62% thought this in the other areas where there were elections in May 2018. Beyond the pilots: the impact on public confidence at future elections The evidence from the pilot schemes suggests that showing identification in polling stations may have had some positive impact on the level of public confidence in the security of the system. Overall, however, the evidence is mixed as the impact was not consistent across all of the pilot areas. It is worth noting again the impact of the relatively low levels of engagement with local elections. As set out above, voters who engaged with the election were more likely to be more confident than non-voters and it may be that any potential impact on confidence from an identification requirement is limited when turnout at polling stations is low. Further work, including in future pilot schemes, would be needed to help the Government and Returning Officers better understand any connection between a voter identification requirement and public confidence in the election. Commission Board action tracker (EC 82/20) The Board requested an update on the Commission's response to the Committee on Standards in Public at the next meeting. Action: That an oral update on the Commission response to the Committee on Standards in Public Life be provided at the December meeting. Resolved: That the Commission Board action tracker be noted. Forward plan of Board business (EC 83/20) The Board discussed the forward plan and noted the Audit Committee change of date from October to November. Commissioners requested an update on the election process for the Scottish and Welsh Parliament elections with particular focus on planning in response to the coronavirus pandemic. Action: An update on the election process for the Scottish and Welsh Parliament elections be included as part of the May 2021 election update items on the January and February meeting agendas. Resolved: That the forward plan was reviewed. The challenges, risks, and issues around frontline delivery (EC 84/20) The Chief Executives of two local authorities joined the meeting to provide an update on the challenges facing local government and the impact of these on how electoral services can be delivered effectively and efficiently. The Board heard of the importance of the successful delivery of elections, and considered the particular challenges and opportunities of delivering the elections in May 2021 against the backdrop of the coronavirus pandemic, including a likely rise in postal voting, and possible staffing difficulties. Both Chief Executives also stressed the need to make progress on modernising electoral processes to reflect the digital age, if younger voters were not to be alienated, and the rapidly changing local authority landscape as authorities were merged and reorganised. Financial pressures were meanwhile increasing. There was a case for greater collaboration between authorities, for example in dealing with suppliers. The Board heard that the local authorities appreciated the support they received from the Commission and in particular its regional teams. They paid tribute to the electoral community who continued to deliver largely well-run elections despite the financial pressures. The Board noted the emphasis on the importance of modernising the electoral process and keeping it aligned with public expectations and the needs of voters, while still respecting the need for security and public confidence. After the local authority representatives had left the meeting the Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance, provided a progress update to the Board on work being carried out by the Commission to research voter attitudes in relation to modernisation of the electoral process, and on work to develop and implement a strategy to help increase local authority resilience and capacity, with an emphasis on the consideration to be given to sub-national electoral coordination structures in England. The Board discussed the possibility of involving Commissioners in this. Action: A more regular opportunity to hear directly from local authorities to be built into the forward plan. Action: An update at each Board meeting on the state of preparations for the May 2021 elections to be added to the forward plan. Resolved: That the points made in discussion be noted, and that Stephen Baker and Graham Farrant be thanked for their contribution to the discussion.

Corporate planning 2021/2026 (EC 85/20) The Board received an update on progress with the development of the Corporate Plan for 2021/2026. They discussed the need to balance ambition and realism in recognition of the current operating context and to put voters at the centre of the plan. The Board considered whether the plan was currently too internally focused and whether external stakeholders had been sufficiently engaged on the development. The Board considered the issue of the timing of the plan and the appointment of the new Commission Chair, as well as the reports expected from the CSPL and PACAC It was noted that we have a current five year corporate plan in place and the Board considered whether it would be preferable to take forward a one year Budget Estimate and supporting narrative for 2021/22 to allow the new corporate plan to be developed in discussion with the new Chair. It was agreed that whilst work on the new corporate plan should be continued, the Speaker's Committee and the devolved administrations should be approached to establish whether they would agree to a delay to allow discussions with the new Chair. A one year Budget Estimate and supporting narrative could then be produced for 2021/22. Action: Work to continue on the Corporate Plan 2021/2026 with a view to agreeing it with an incoming Chair, and that a one-year Budget Estimate and supporting narrative should be produced for 2021/22. Confirmation of this approach to be established with the Speaker's Committee and the devolved administrations. Resolved: That the work so far on the Corporate Plan 2021/2026 had the right elements in it, but more work was needed, for example to ensure the context of the post-COVID world was fully reflected, as well as the relationship between our work and that of other players such as the ICO. Resolved: That the Audit Committee further consider the risk appetites associated with the draft Corporate Plan 2021/2026. Chief Executive's update (EC 86/20) The Board discussed the update and particularly noted the ongoing implications on Commission work and staff of the coronavirus pandemic. The Board noted the preparations for May 2021 elections and the regular review of contingency plans. Resolved: That the update be noted.

Requirement to show ID at polling stations You are in the Elections Act section
Home Elections Act On this page Changes Our role First published: 5 July 2021 Last updated: 2 February 2023 Summary The UK Government has introduced a new requirement that voters will have to show an accepted form of photo ID to vote in a polling station. This requirement applied for the first time at the local elections taking place in 230 areas of England in May 2023. about voter ID, including the accepted forms of ID and how to apply for a Voter Authority Certificate. Changes From 4 May 2023, voters in England needed to show photo ID to vote at polling stations in some elections. This applied to: Local elections and by-elections Police and Crime Commissioner elections UK parliamentary by-elections Recall petitions From October 2023 it will also apply to UK General elections. Voters in Wales will need to show ID at Police and Crime Commissioner elections and at recall petitions. They will not need to show photo ID to vote at a polling station at Senedd elections or local council elections. Voters in Scotland will not need to show photo ID at Scottish Parliament elections or at council elections. If voters don't have accepted photo ID, they can apply for a free voter ID document, which is known as a Voter Authority Certificate. Our role Support to voters As part of our duty to inform voters about democracy and elections, we are responsible for making sure that voters know they need to bring an accepted photo ID to vote. We launched a new public awareness campaign in January 2023. The campaign explains that voters will need to show an accepted form of photo ID in polling stations, and the types of photo ID they can use. It also explains how and when voters can apply for the free Voter Authority Certificate, if they do not have an accepted form of ID. We're working closely with civil society organisations to produce tailored resources for voters who we know are less likely to have the ID they need to vote. Support to local authorities We will provide updated guidance and resources to support electoral administrators to deliver the new voter ID requirement. The guidance will include how to manage and process applications for the Voter Authority Certificate, and procedures for polling station staff to follow. We are also supporting local authority communications teams by providing a range of resources, such as template press releases and social media content, to help them to raise awareness of voter ID with their residents. Political parties We will use a variety of channels to ensure that political parties and campaigners are aware of the new voter ID requirement, and how voters can apply for the free Voter Authority Certificate. This will include updates to the code of conduct for campaigners. Reporting on 4 May local elections in England We've published our initial research on the implementation of the voter ID policy at local elections in England in May 2023. The research pulls together initial data from polling stations and the results of large-scale public opinion research. We are running more research and will publish a full, more in-depth report in September 2023. Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies Overview We want to see big changes to the electoral registration system in the UK. Summary The launch of the government's online registration service was a big leap forward. It's helped those less likely to be registered, like young people and British citizens overseas. But people's expectations in a digital age are constantly evolving, and voter registration needs to keep up. We're calling on the UK government to build on this success and make electoral registration even simpler and more accessible to voters.

Changes we want to see We want to see: better use of public data, like from other government services, to make registration easier for voters electoral registration being encouraged all year round, not just in the run up to an election a more joined-up electoral registration system to reduce duplicate registrations and encourage registration all year round Changes like these will:

create opportunities for electoral registration to be automated, or integrated with other public services help electoral registration officers identify and potentially register eligible citizens, while keeping the electoral register up to date reduce the overall costs of the electoral registration system by making it more efficient improve accessibility by providing more ways to register to vote What's happening now We've been exploring a number of options, like the use of public data, automated and automatic registration, and ways to detect and manage duplicate applications. Creating a more efficient system is possible. Our event budget reflects the costs associated with each year's elections. This varies significantly year-to-year owing to the cycle of elections, and will change if unscheduled polls are added which need to be delivered effectively. This is presented as a separate budget line to allow for more effective control and scrutiny of our core budget. Spending on core budgets includes our work supporting voters, electoral administrators, parties and campaigners outside of the cycle of elections, as well as our corporate overheads. Our core budget will be no larger at the end of the period, after inflation, than it was at the beginning (using HM Treasury's preferred measure for public spending and inflation assumptions where available). While we would always seek to manage our costs within these budgets, increases to the rate of inflation or changes to our work programme to reflect changes outside our control represent the main risks to our spending plans. The levels of capital spending in 2024/25 and 2026/27 represent new or renewed leases for offices in Cardiff and Edinburgh. We remain committed to having continued presence in all parts of the UK, and as we take advantage of increasingly flexible ways of working we will keep our office needs under continuous review. The Scotland Act 2016 also makes the Commission accountable to the Scottish Parliament, and we remain accountable to the UK Parliament. The direct costs of delivering our functions for each parliament are funded by that parliament, with overheads (including depreciation but not capital budgets or provisions) shared according to population. Cost shares can vary due to changes in work programme or electoral cycle. In Wales, as a result of the Senedd and Elections (Wales) Act 2020, the Llywydd's Committee oversees our funding and corporate accountability. In Scotland, this role is undertaken by the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body, and in the UK Parliament by the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission. Scrutiny and accountability on specific aspects of our work is generally undertaken by specific policy committees, such as the Senedd's Local Government and Housing Committee. Each year in the autumn we submit an estimate of income and expenditure to the committees, accompanied by our plans for the coming year (or five years when we submit a Corporate Plan). The committees then consider these according to the timetables in each parliament. The plans, budgets and other information that we submit to the committees are as required by each committee. We will continue to work with the committees, the parliamentary officials and other relevant partners to ensure effective accountability. Navigation 8. Home How we make decisions On this page Part 1: Vision, approach, principles and accountability Part 2: The Commission Board and Committees Part 3: Roles, responsibilities and code of conduct for Commissioners Part 4: Commission's business and delegated powers Annexes First published: 11 October 2019 Last updated: 18 June 2023 Part 1: Vision, approach, principles and accountability The Commission The Commission (in Welsh, Comisiwn Etholiadol) is an independent body corporate, established by the United Kingdom Parliament under the provisions of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (the Act), amended by subsequent legislation. The Commission 1 has the statutory functions given to it by that and other legislation (a summary of applicable legislation is at Appendix B of this document). The Commission is accountable to the UK Parliament, and specifically to the Speaker's Committee of the House of Commons which is appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The role of the Speaker's Committee and its relationship with the Commission is described in Annex B. The Commission is also directly accountable to the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd in relation to the exercise of its devolved Scottish and Welsh functions. The Commission's duties as defined in statute can be found in Part 4, which also describes which powers are delegated from the Board to sub-committees of the Board or to the Chief Executive. The following is a summary of the Commission's main activities:

- register political parties and other campaigners at elections and referendums
- make sure people understand and follow the rules on party and election finance
- take enforcement action where appropriate so that parties and campaigners know they need to comply with the rules and voters can be confident they are complying
- publish details of where parties and candidates and other campaigners get money from and how they spend it
- support the delivery of well-run electoral events
- provide timely and accurate guidance and advice to Returning Officers (ROs) and Electoral Registration Officers (EROs)
- set performance standards frameworks and support ROs and EROs to deliver well- run elections
- deliver public awareness campaigns and facilitate others' support for those campaigns, so that people register to vote and are able to take part in elections and referendums
- run any referendums held in accordance with the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000

Vision Our vision is to be a world-class public sector organisation – innovative, delivering great value and getting right what matters most to voters and legislators. We plan to achieve this vision through a five-year work programme with four goals:

- Our goals are: to enable the continued delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible to ensure an increasingly trusted and transparent system of regulation in political finance, overseeing compliance, promoting understanding amongst those regulated and proactively pursuing breaches to be an independent and respected centre of expertise, using our knowledge and insight to further the transparency, fairness and efficiency of our democratic system and help adapt it to the modern, digital age to provide value for money, making best use of our resources and expertise to deliver services that are attuned to what matters most to voters. This goal underpins and supports all of our work
- Our values Our governance procedures aim at all times to reflect our values – making an impact, engaged, authoritative, independent, and transparent.
- Governance In its governance, the Commission will at all times: observe the highest standards of propriety involving impartiality, integrity and objectivity in relation to the stewardship of public funds, the management of Commission business and the conduct of its business, maintaining at all times the Commission's independence pursue the Commission's vision for free elections that support a healthy democracy maximise value for money through ensuring that its work is performed in the most economical, efficient and effective way, within available resources be accountable to Parliament for the activities of the Commission and the extent to which performance targets and objectives have been met reflect the Commission's wider commitments to carry out its work and the use of money and resources made available to it in the interests of voters be consultative in style, and transparent and responsive to all stakeholders ensure that there is in place an effective system of internal control to enable the Commission to meet its corporate objectives act lawfully, consistent with the Commission's statutory duties and responsibilities The Board will review its governance arrangements annually to ensure that they remain fit for purpose, support delivery of the Commission's vision, and reflect the Commission's values and principles. Accountability The Commission demonstrates its accountability to its stakeholders by: as required, submitting to the Speaker's Committee, the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body (SPCB), and the Senedd's Llywydd's Committee, a five-year plan and estimated requirements for relevant resources during that five-year period, both of which are published externally annually submitting to the Speaker's Committee, the SPCB, and the Llywydd's Committee, an annual plan and estimated requirements for relevant resources during that period laying its Report and Accounts annually before the UK Parliament, the Scottish Parliament, and the Senedd the appointment of the Chief Executive as Accounting Officer audit of its accounts, and of the efficiency and effectiveness with which it uses resources, by the National Audit Office consultation on new areas and programmes of work a clear complaints process covering services provided by us to our stakeholders Part 2: The Commission Board and Committees The Commission Board Together the Commissioners constitute the Board of the Commission and ensure that the Commission discharges its functions as set out in the Act and other associated legislation. They set the strategic direction, monitor the Commission's performance and are responsible for ensuring that it acts within its statutory remits. The Chair and Commissioners are appointed by His Majesty the King on the recommendation of the House of Commons. They may be reappointed for a further period after expiry of their initial term, Commissioners are appointed for a period not exceeding ten years. There shall be nine or ten Commissioners. A Commissioner may cease to hold office or be removed in accordance with the grounds set out in Schedule 1, paragraphs 3-5 of the Act. Appointments will terminate at the end of the period specified for each Commissioner, unless the Commissioner is reappointed before the period expires. Appointments may also be terminated at the request of the Commissioner. Together the Commissioners constitute the Board of the Commission and ensure that the Commission discharges its functions as set out in the Act and other associated legislation. They set the strategic direction, monitor the Commission's performance and are responsible for ensuring that it acts within its statutory remits. The Chair and Commissioners are appointed by His Majesty the King on the recommendation of the House of Commons. They may be reappointed for a further period after expiry of their initial term, Commissioners are appointed for a period not exceeding ten years. There shall be nine or ten Commissioners. A Commissioner may cease to hold office or be removed in accordance with the grounds set out in Schedule 1, paragraphs 3-5 of the Act. Appointments will terminate at the end of the period specified for each Commissioner, unless the Commissioner is reappointed before the period expires. Appointments may also be terminated at the request of the Commissioner. Committees reporting to the Commission

Board The Audit and Risk Assurance Committee The Remuneration and Human Resources Committee Committees reporting to the Commission Board Accordion The Audit and Risk Assurance Committee The Board has established an Audit and Risk Assurance Committee to support it, and to support the Chief Executive as Accounting Officer in her/his responsibilities for ensuring the adequacy of risk management, internal controls, efficient and effective use of public funds and financial governance arrangements within the Commission. This includes: accounting policies the annual report and accounts of the Electoral Commission, including the process for review of the accounts prior to submission for audit; and management's letter of representation to the National Audit Office matters relating to the National Audit Office the adequacy of management response to issues identified by audit activity expenses proposals for tendering for audit services, or for the purchase of non-audit services from contractors who provide audit services The Audit and Risk Assurance Committee comprises three members and meets at least three times a year. Three Commissioners are appointed by the Board to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee. The Board appoints an Independent Adviser to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee who is a suitably qualified independent person who has no connection with the Commission. The Commission Board also appoints the Chair of the Committee. The Chair of the Commission may not be appointed as a member of the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee. Members of the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee and the independent adviser will normally serve for three years, unless a member ceases to be a Commissioner or asks to stand down. They may be re-appointed for a further period, normally not exceeding three years. The Audit and Risk Assurance Committee minutes will be circulated to the Board and a report of the work of the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee will be presented annually to the Board.2.9 The Audit and Risk Assurance Committee's terms of reference are attached at Annex G. The Remuneration and Human Resources Committee The Commission's Remuneration and Human Resources Committee comprises three Commissioners and meets at least three times a year. The Commission Board appoints the Chair of the Committee. The Remuneration and Human Resources Committee has responsibility for: approval of significant changes to organisational structure and/or overall staff terms and conditions of employment and any impact of the change such as termination of contracts approval of significant changes to the structure of the Executive Team supporting the Chair in the recruitment of the Chief Executive, including recommending to the Board the composition and membership of the Appointment Panel recommending to the Board the framework for the remuneration of the Chief Executive, if different from the framework applying to all other staff agreeing the annual negotiating remit for staff pay awards (including the Executive Team) recommending to the Board the composition and membership of the Appointment Panel for the Independent Adviser / Chair to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee setting the fee of the Independent Adviser to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee It also acts as an advisory group on the extent to which organisational development and strategic Human Resource matters support the Board's strategic direction for the Commission. Members of the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee will serve for three years, unless a member ceases to be an Electoral Commissioner or asks to stand down. They may be re-appointed for a further period not exceeding three years. The minutes of the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee will be circulated to all members of the Board at its next available meeting, for information. The Committee's terms of reference are included at Annex H.

Part 2: The Commission Board and Committees continued Development and strategy events

The Commissioners may also attend development and strategy events, referred to as

'Commissioner Days'. The purpose of such events will be to provide an opportunity for Commissioners to reflect more thoroughly on strategy and key issues and also to develop their working practices. In such circumstances Commissioners do not have delegated powers and are not acting as a decision making body. The membership, terms of reference, and arrangements for such events are decided by our Board, and progress monitored and reported for the information of the Board. Linked Commissioners Periodically the Board may invite Commissioners to be a point of contact or Linked Commissioner for staff on an issue or project. In such circumstances Commissioners do not have delegated powers and are not acting as a decision making body. The appointment, scope, and life of such a request are decided by the Board, and progress monitored and reported for the information of the Board. Part 3: Roles, responsibilities and code of conduct for Commissioners The Chair The Chair leads the Board. The Board regulates its own proceedings, and has approved Standing Orders for that purpose (see Annex A). The Chair has particular responsibilities for the following matters: strategic leadership – leading the development and implementation of the Commission's Corporate Plan Corporate governance – encouraging high standards of propriety and promoting the efficient and effective use of staff and other resources throughout the Commission. The Chair presides at Board meetings and ensures that these are held at regular intervals throughout the year and are accurately recorded. The Chair will also ensure that the Board's effectiveness is reviewed annually in accordance with this framework external communication – representing the views of the Commission to key stakeholders including government ministers, leaders of political parties and other senior politicians, Chairs of public bodies and other organisations, leaders of local government and the media agreeing the objectives and undertaking annual appraisals of the Chief Executive, following consultation with other Commissioners The Chair is also responsible for: taking a lead in identifying the skills and experience required to fill vacancies among the Commissioners, with a view to seeking a proper balance of expertise and diversity; and that this is represented to the Speaker's Committee as part of the process for recruiting new Commissioners ensuring that new Commissioners receive a full, formal and tailored induction on joining the Commission assessing the performance of individual Commissioners seeking feedback on the Chair's performance In the absence of the Chair, the other Commissioners act as necessary to ensure the continuity of Commission business in accordance with the procedures outlined in the Standing Orders in Annex A of this Framework. Commissioners with serious concerns about the Chair's conduct or ability to carry out the role, who feel unable to raise this with the Chair, may raise their concerns with the Independent Adviser to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee. The Independent Adviser to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee will, on the basis of information gathered, decide whether or not to pursue the matter further. If considered necessary he/she may commission an independent investigation. Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners Commissioners must act in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners, which forms part of the Corporate Governance Framework. They must sign the declaration agreeing to the principles and procedures of the Code of Conduct and return it to the Secretary to the Commission Board. When the Code is significantly amended, Commissioners will be invited to sign the updated Code. (The Code is at Annex I to this Framework). Corporate responsibilities of Commissioners Commissioners act collectively: they do not have individual authority other than may be accorded in a specific role (such as Chair of a Committee) or by the Board on a particular occasion (see 3.7 below). The Commissioners have corporate responsibility for ensuring that the Commission fulfils its aims and objectives and for promoting the efficient and effective use of staff and other resources. The Board can decide to delegate a decision to the Chief Executive in consultation with the Chair, and where appropriate another Commissioner or Commissioners nominated by the Board. When, in the opinion of the Board, an issue has particular significance for Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland, the relevant Commissioner(s) will be consulted. Other responsibilities of Commissioners include: ensuring that high standards of corporate governance are observed at all times ensuring that the Commission identifies and manages its risks effectively establishing and maintaining effective arrangements for the discharge of the Commission's functions, including delegating to staff within a clear framework of strategic control, consulting interested bodies on major developments and responding to their views, where appropriate establishing advisory and consultative bodies to inform the Commission's work, and facilitating good communication with external organisations and the public As individuals Commissioners are responsible for upholding the values and principles of the Commission, should act in good faith and in accordance with the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners, and follow the Seven Principles of Public Life set out by the Committee on Standards in Public Life – the 'Nolan Principles' – (see Annex C). Responsibilities of individual Commissioners All Commissioners have a UK-wide remit. Parliament appoints lead Commissioners with responsibility for Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales respectively. In addition the Board allocates additional responsibilities to individual Commissioners. This can encompass: chair of the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee chair of the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee (when the Chair of that Committee is a Commissioner) taking a lead in contributing to and/or reviewing work on particular projects e.g. as part of a steering group Complaints The Commission shall approve, publish and maintain a Complaints Policy and Procedure covering the services provided by us to our stakeholders which includes independent review of our complaints via the Parliamentary Ombudsman (with a separate review procedure for freedom of information matters), the details of which shall be made available on the Commission's website. Review of Board effectiveness The Board will review annually its performance and that of its committees. Commissioners will have individual meetings with the Chair at least annually at which issues may be raised, which may include how to support individual contribution, commitment to the role (including commitment of time for Board and committee meetings and any other duties), and any learning and development needs identified by the Commissioner. The Chair also seeks feedback on his own performance at these meetings. During the Board's review of its effectiveness, an independent evaluation of the Chair's performance may also be carried out. The Chair will act on the results of the performance evaluation by recognising the strengths, and addressing the weaknesses, of the Board as a whole and, where appropriate, seek the resignation of Commissioners or make recommendation to the Speaker's Committee concerning the removal of members or the qualities to be sought when considering new members to be appointed to the Commission. Review of the corporate governance framework Duty to monitor and review the Framework, including the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners The Board will review the corporate governance framework on an annual basis. The General Counsel is responsible for the operation of the scheme of corporate governance to ensure that the aims and principles of the framework are given full effect. Changes to the framework Changes to the framework will only be approved by the Board, except when the General Counsel makes and publishes the following changes: such changes as may be necessary to reflect or as may be necessary to comply with or give effect to any legislative changes or requirements such other changes of an editorial or consequential nature as may seem appropriate to make the framework of governance internally consistent, up-to-date and readily understandable The General Counsel shall ensure that Commissioners are informed of the changes in addition to any other means of publishing changes. Publication The General Counsel will ensure that the framework is made widely available to Commissioners and staff, is published on the Commission website and is updated as necessary. The Chief Executive The Chief Executive is responsible for ensuring that the Chair and Board have timely, accurate and clear information, as required, to carry out their responsibilities. The Board has delegated authority (see paragraph 4.2 below) for the day-to-day management of the Commission to the Chief Executive. S/he therefore has responsibility for the overall organisation, management and staffing and for its procedures in financial and other matters including conduct and discipline. This involves the promotion, by leadership and example, of the values embodied in the Nolan Principles. Commissioners should support the Chief Executive in undertaking this responsibility. The Commission's Delegated Powers are the arrangements described in Part 4 of this document. The Chief Executive is in turn authorised to delegate matters to other Commission staff, and those delegations are set out in an Executive Scheme of Delegation. The Chief Executive is the Commission's Accounting Officer as designated by the Speaker's Committee pursuant to paragraph 19 Schedule 1 of the Act. This role carries with it personal responsibility to ensure that appropriate advice is given to the Commission on all matters relating to financial propriety and regularity, for keeping proper accounts and for the efficient and effective use of resources. As Accounting Officer the Chief Executive is answerable to the UK Parliament, the Scottish Parliament, and Senedd for ensuring that all the resources available are used properly and give good value for money. Political activity For the Commission to perform effectively the functions given to it by Parliament, it must command wide confidence that it is independent of government and of political parties. Commissioners and the Chief Executive must provide to the Commission full details of any activities that might lead to claims that they are or have been an active supporter of one political party or another, or of a particular policy which is associated with the objectives of a political party, or of an outcome that is (or may be) the subject of a referendum, recognising that Commissioners appointed under the amendments to PPERA brought about by the Political Parties and Elections Act 2009 are entitled to be members of a political party. Failure to provide all relevant information regarding political activity may be grounds for removal from office or post. A Commissioner or the Chief Executive may be regarded as unfit to continue in that office or post should they engage in any activity that might call into question the Commission's political impartiality or cause risk to public confidence in the Commission, whether actual or perceived. Further details of prohibited activity are set out in the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners at Annex I to this Framework. The appointments of Commission staff, including the Chief Executive, are also subject to statutory requirements set out in PPERA. The Chief Executive is subject to an additional disqualification to other staff, which effectively means that s/he is subject to the same disqualifications as Commissioners who are not nominated by political parties (the disqualifications are set out at PPERA Schedule 1, paragraph 3, which is included in Appendix 1 of the Electoral Commissioners' Code of Conduct). Part 4: Commission's business and delegated powers This section describes the roles and powers reserved to the Board in relation to the activities and statutory functions of the Commission and those delegated to committees of the Board and to the Chief Executive. The arrangements in Part 4 are referred to as the Commission's Delegated Powers. Schedule 1, paragraph 12 of the Act provides that the Commission, or any committee or sub-committee of the Commission, or the Chief Executive, may delegate functions to the Commission's staff. The Board has delegated certain of its functions to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee and the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee, and the Chief Executive. The Board by approval of this corporate governance framework delegates to the Chief Executive all responsibility for the day-to-day management of the Commission. Where a matter is not specifically reserved to the Board, or a Committee or sub-committee, the Chief Executive has authority to act subject to the following conditions: any relevant approved Commission policy shall be complied with any expenditure shall be within the agreed budget In addition, the Board by approval of this corporate governance framework authorises the Chief Executive to appoint another officer of the Commission to act on the Chief Executive's behalf. References in these arrangements to the Chief Executive include any person(s) to whom the Chief Executive has delegated their authority. The Commission has an Executive Scheme of Delegation which sets out the authority for various levels of staff and decision-making. This is reviewed periodically, and not less than annually, by the Executive Team. The Commission delivers its work through a combination of projects and business delivery work. Our approach to project management helps to ensure that a consistent approach is applied to work across the Commission, and supports delivery through the development of detailed plans. Members of the Executive Team in their roles as Project Directors are responsible for the overall delivery and achievement of objectives for each project. Decision-making within our project management arrangements takes place variously at Executive Team, or Project Board level, but will in any event be consistent with the Board Scheme of Delegation and the Executive Scheme of Delegation. The Commission has a Schedule of Policies, which sets out in table form our key policies, whether statutory or discretionary, their purpose, the policy 'owner', and when due each policy is due for review. Electoral Commission – delegation of powers and duties The Electoral Commission Board is accountable to the: Speaker's Committee of the UK Parliament Llwydd's Committee of the Senedd (in relation to the exercise of our devolved Welsh functions) Scottish Parliament Corporate Body of the Scottish Parliament (in relation to the exercise of our devolved Scottish functions) The Electoral Commission Board can delegate to: The Accounting Officer and Chief Executive The Audit and Risk Assurance Committee The Remuneration and Human Resources Committee The Accounting Officer and Chief Executive are also accountable to the Speaker's Committee of the UK Parliament, the Llwydd's Committee of the Senedd, and the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body. Annexes Annex: A Standing Orders Introduction Standing Orders, together with the Delegated Powers and Financial Policies, provide a procedural framework within which the Commission discharges its business. They deal with the business of the Commission, procedure at meetings of the Board and any committees, delegation of powers, declaration of interests and standards of conduct.

Place of business The principal place of business of the Commission is 3 Bunhill Row, London, EC1Y 8YZ. Meetings of the Board

Calling meetings The Board shall meet on such dates and at such times and places as the Board shall from time to time determine. Such meetings shall be known as ordinary meetings. An extraordinary meeting may be called at any time by the Chair or the Chief Executive, or by no fewer than five Board members lodging with the Chair or Chief Executive a written request for such a meeting, stating the business to be transacted. No business shall be transacted at such a meeting other than that specified in the notice of the meeting. Notice of meetings At least four clear working days (a working day excludes Saturday, Sunday, Bank Holidays and other days when the Commission offices are closed) before any ordinary meeting of the Board, written notice of the time and place of such meeting and of the business to be transacted shall be sent by the Chief Executive, or a nominated officer acting on his/her behalf, to each Commissioner. The accidental omission to give notice to or the non-receipt of notice by any member shall not invalidate the proceedings of the meeting, save that failure to serve such a notice on four or more members will invalidate the meeting. Business to be transacted The Chair is responsible for drawing up the agenda of the meetings in consultation with the Chief Executive. No business other than that specified in the notice of the meeting shall be transacted at that meeting unless the business is of an urgent nature or required by statute to be transacted and not less than two-thirds of the members present decide that the business shall be transacted. A member wishing a matter to be included on an agenda shall make his/her request in writing for the Chair to consider at least ten clear days before a meeting. Requests made less than ten days before a meeting may be considered for inclusion on the agenda at the discretion of the Chair. Agendas for meetings shall include declarations of interest as a standing item. After each Board meeting there shall normally be a review between the Chair and Commissioners, to consider any issues in the management of the meeting, and provide an opportunity for Commissioners to give feedback to the Chair. Written comments If a member who is not present submits written comments on an agenda item(s) then at the discretion of the meeting Chair, these may be circulated at the meeting or read out by the meeting Chair at the appropriate point in the meeting. Quorum Board meetings are quorate if there are at least six Commissioners present and able to take part in the discussion, of whom four shall be Commissioners appointed other than under Section 3A of the Act. However, the quorum shall be five Commissioners, of whom three shall be Commissioners appointed other than under the provisions of Section 3A of the Act in the following circumstances: in the case of political finance regulatory decisions in the case of decisions to be taken in relation to referendums, or when three or more vacancies exist for Commissioners A smaller quorum for regulatory decisions and decisions relating to referendums provides the greater flexibility needed in these circumstances, enabling the Commission to meet and take decisions at relatively short notice, and avoid delay. Such decisions will be communicated by the Secretary to the Commission Board at the earliest opportunity to any Commissioners not able to be present at the meeting. Members may attend meetings of the Board by video or telephone conferencing facility. Members attending a meeting by these means shall be deemed to be present in person at the meeting. If a member has been disqualified from participating in a discussion or resolution to be taken about any matter by reason of the declaration of a conflict of interest, s/he shall no longer count towards the quorum. If a quorum is then not available for the discussion or resolution to be taken about any matter, that matter may not be subject to a decision. The responsible officer shall record this situation in the minutes of the meeting. Record of attendance The responsible officer shall record the names of all members present at the meeting of the Board in the minutes of the meeting. Chair of meetings The Chair shall preside at any meeting of the Board. In the absence of the Chair those attending a meeting will agree from among the non-nominated Commissioners a Chair to conduct the proceedings of that meeting. The Chair determines the detailed procedure for the conduct of business at meetings of the Board and the Chair's decision on questions or order will be observed at the meeting, subject to the provisions of Standing Orders and to any decision of the Board to the contrary. Decision making Decisions of our Board will normally be made by consensus rather than by formal vote. Failing consensus, decisions will be reached by a vote when: the meeting Chair judges that there is a body of opinion amongst members at the meeting that disagrees with a proposal or has expressed reservations about it and no clear consensus has emerged or is likely to do so, or a member who is present requests that a vote be taken and this is supported by at least one other member, or any other circumstances have arisen where the meeting Chair judges that a vote is appropriate In these circumstances each member has a single vote. The meeting Chair will cast his or her vote at the same time as other members. Voting shall normally take place by a show of hands or such other means of assent or dissent as the meeting Chair deems appropriate. Only members present (including by telephone or video-conference) may vote. The decision will be carried by a simple majority. The meeting Chair's ruling as to the outcome of the vote shall be final. In the case of an equality of votes, the meeting Chair shall not have a casting vote and the decision will not have been carried. A vote once taken will not usually be re-taken within the same meeting. If a vote is taken, the number voting for, against and any abstentions shall be recorded in the minutes. Members may ask for their dissenting views on any matters to be recorded in the minutes. Decision making by electronic means Our Board Secretary will manage the process for decision making by electronic means as set out below. Papers will be produced for all items of electronic business clearly setting out the recommendations to our Board and options considered together with any supporting analysis necessary. Our Board Secretary will agree with our Chief Executive and our Chair a timeline for a decision to be taken. This will include sufficient time for our Board to read the report, seek clarification on the issues raised and to confirm their decision on the recommendations in the report. If our Chair is unavailable, then the views of the Chair of the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee will be sought on the matters above. Similarly, if our Chief Executive is unavailable then the views of at least one Director will be sought in their absence. Our Board Secretary will circulate the report to our Board electronically, e.g. by email, and set out the timeline at A29 above. Questions or points of clarification should be directed to our Board Secretary who will arrange for a response to be drafted and circulated to our Board in line with the agreed timeline. Commissioners should confirm their decision on the recommendations in the report by the deadline indicated in the timeline. Once this deadline has passed our Board Secretary will confirm to our Board, Chief Executive and the report author the decision of our Board. The normal standing orders for declarations of interest and quorum apply to decisions made using electronic means. The quorum for decision making using electronic means is defined as the number of Commissioners participating in the decision by electronic means. The principle that decisions of our Board are reached by consensus applies to decisions taken using electronic means. Where the procedure on voting is used to make a decision using electronic means, then the means of voting shall be by electronic means, e.g. email. Principles of decision-making All decisions of the Board, including delegated decisions, will be made in accordance with the following principles: proportionality (i.e. the action must be proportionate to the desired outcome) due consideration and the taking of professional advice from staff reasonableness, fairness, impartiality, equality and in accordance with natural justice and human rights a presumption in favour of transparency in what we do and how we do it, subject to acknowledging that this may not always be appropriate e.g. legal advice and certain regulatory matters reasoned, with clarity of aims and desired outcomes, to ensure that those responsible for decision-making provide the reasons for decisions efficiency (decisions must not be unreasonably delayed) regulatory decision-making should accord with good regulatory practice consistency with the duties and responsibilities, aims and objectives of the Commission, including effective and efficient use of resources the Board will operate on the principles of collective responsibility, support and respect external pressure will not alter Board processes except for potential time-lines Board members' behaviour in response to decisions is required to be the same inside and outside the Commission Openness and responsiveness The Commission and its staff will conduct all dealings with the public in an open and responsible way, and ensure full compliance with the principles of the Freedom of Information Act 2000.

The Commission recognises the need for confidentiality of certain information, in accordance with statutory requirements or agreed commercial interests, subject to the rights of Parliament, the National Audit Office, HM Treasury and other public bodies to obtain information, and to the rights of individuals to obtain information in accordance with statute. Adjournment Any meeting of the Board may be adjourned from time to time and from place to place at the discretion of the Chair. Reasonable notice shall be given where practical of the date and time of the reconvening of the adjourned meeting, save that where a meeting has been adjourned for thirty days or more, notice of the reconvening of the adjourned meeting shall be given as for an ordinary meeting of the Board. Minutes Minutes of all Board meetings shall record the decisions taken, and where appropriate, the views of individuals present. The minutes shall record any declarations of interest made at the meeting. The minutes will be submitted for agreement at the following Board meeting. Once agreed, the minutes, including any amendments required by the Board, shall be signed by the Chair.

Approved minutes (or a version redacted as appropriate) will be published on the Commission's website. Delegation of Powers The Commission has approved Delegated Powers that specify those matters that are reserved to the Board for decision, and those matters that may be delegated to committees of the Board or to the Chief Executive for decision. The Chief Executive may in turn delegate any matter within their authority to another officer of the Commission. Any person to whom a matter is delegated by the Chief Executive or under arrangements approved by them shall carry the authority of the Commission in respect of the matter so delegated. The Board shall review and approve the Delegated Powers annually. Urgent or non-contentious business Urgent business may arise between scheduled ordinary Board meetings that requires a decision of our Board before the date when an ordinary or extraordinary meeting of our Board can be convened. Where decisions that would ordinarily be taken at Board meetings have to be made on an urgent basis they may be taken by our Chief Executive, in consultation with our Chair, with the exclusion of regulatory decisions on party finance matters, or determination of matters relating to referendums, where it is accepted that the nature of the business may require meetings to be called on notice. In such cases our Chief Executive should take all practicable steps to consult with our Chair, and with as many other Commissioners as our Chief Executive considers appropriate (and if at all possible no fewer than two Commissioners). Our Chief Executive should seek Commissioners' views as to: the urgency of the matter requiring decision the significance of the decision required the possibility of holding an extraordinary Board meeting to consider it the possibility of making the decision by electronic means the circumstances for Commissioners to comment on the matter the action to be taken Our Chief Executive should decide in the light of Commissioners' views what action to take, should notify as many Commissioners as practicable (and in any event no fewer than two Commissioners) of the proposed action and should allow as much time as they consider reasonable in the circumstances for Commissioners to comment on the proposals. Our Chief Executive should then act as they consider appropriate. Our Chief Executive can request our Board Secretary to arrange for a business matter to be decided or discussed using electronic means, e.g. email, at an extraordinary Board meeting or at a meeting called on notice. The exercise of such powers shall be reported to the next meeting of our Board as an item on the agenda, to approve the minute and date of the decision taken, and note the reason for the exercise of such powers. Our Board will consider whether further action is required. The matter will be recorded in the minutes of the Board meeting to which it is reported. If our Chair is unavailable, then the views of the Chair of the Audit and Risk Committee will be sought on the matters above. Similarly, if our Chief Executive is unavailable then the views of at least one Director will be sought in their absence. Committees The Board may establish standing or ad hoc committees or advisory groups, and the Chair may establish advisory groups, consisting of such numbers and for such purposes as the Board, or as the case may be, the Chair, may determine (for example Commissioner Reference Groups). The membership of Appointment Panels for the roles of Independent Adviser/Chair to the Audit and Risk Committee, and for the Chief Executive, is decided by the Board on the recommendation of the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee. Only Commissioners can be a member of a Commission committee. The provision of these Standing Orders (SOs) shall apply where relevant to the operation of all committees, unless these SOs specify otherwise. They shall not apply to Commissioner Reference Groups (see paragraph 2.16 of the Corporate Governance Framework, above). Declaration of Interests Commissioners must declare any potential interests or connections they may have to the Secretary to the Commission Board. Where there is a conflict of interest, the Board will decide the proper course of action and whether the Commissioner should withdraw from the meeting for discussion and/or the decision-making process. The interest declared will be recorded in the minutes of the meeting. Standards of conduct Commissioners are required to comply with the Commission's Corporate Governance Framework and the Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners. Staff are required to comply with the standards set out in the Code of Conduct for staff and with Human Resources policies. Use of information No Commissioner shall use information gained in the course of their duty for personal gain nor seek to use the opportunity of such public service to promote their own or other parties' private interests. Commissioners should at all times avoid behaving in a manner which might bring the Commission into disrepute. Gifts and hospitality Offers of gifts and hospitality, whether accepted or not, must be reported to the General Counsel at the earliest opportunity but within a maximum of 28 days together with details of the donor and the approximate value. A Register of Gifts and Hospitality will be maintained by the General Counsel, and published on the Commission's website. Suspension of Standing Orders At any meeting the Board may, by a majority of not less than two-thirds of those present and voting, resolve to suspend these Standing Orders for the duration of the meeting or of any item of business to be transacted at the meeting, provided that: suspension of Standing Orders does not contravene any statutory provisions or directions any decision to suspend Standing Orders is recorded in the minutes a separate record of matters discussed during the suspension shall be kept Amendment of Standing Orders These Standing Orders or any of them may be amended by alteration, addition or deletion, provided that: amendment or variation of the Standing Orders does not contravene any statutory provisions or directions at least five days' notice shall be given of the proposed amendment the amendment shall be approved by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting at the meeting in which it is moved

Review of Standing Orders The Board shall review Standing Orders annually. The review shall include Annex B: Summary of the statutory framework for the Commission Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 The Commission is an independent body, established by the United Kingdom Parliament under the provisions of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (the Act). The Commission is accountable to the UK Parliament, and specifically to the Speaker's Committee of the House of Commons which is appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The principal powers and duties, and membership, of the Speaker's Committee are set out below. Scottish Elections (Reform) Act 2020 and the Senedd and Elections (Wales) Act 2020 The Scottish Elections (Reform) Act 2020 and the Senedd and Elections (Wales) Act 2020 amended the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 to provide that the Commission is directly accountable to the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd in relation to the exercise of its devolved Scottish and Welsh functions. The Scottish Parliament Corporate Body (SPCB) and the Senedd's Llywydd's Committee provide scrutiny of the Commission.

Legal status

Administrative Law As a public body, the Commission is subject to normal principles of administrative law. The Commission must act reasonably (in the sense that it should not act in a manner in which no reasonable body such as the Commission would act) and should base its decisions on relevant considerations, disregarding irrelevant factors. The Commission, and the Commissioners, should be objective and impartial and bear in mind that the Commission is an independent statutory body.

A statutory body As a statutory body, the Commission is subject to the principle that it can only do the things which Parliament through statute has given it the power or the duty to do ('the ultra vires' principle). It must be possible, in relation to any act or decision of the Commission, to identify the statutory authority upon which the Commission is relying.

Ombudsman The Commission falls within the remit of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration (the Ombudsman). It is required to comply with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Freedom of Information The Commission is listed as a public authority in Schedule 1 to the Freedom of Information Act 2000 and is therefore subject to the Freedom of Information regime. The Commission has published a Publication Scheme under the Freedom of Information Act 2000. The Commission is required to comply with requests for information unless a defined exemption applies.

Data Protection and document security The Commission complies with Data Protection law, which requires any organisation that is processing personal data about individuals to comply with certain safeguards. It also gives individuals the right to access information held about them. This right of access is subject to certain exemptions.

The Speaker's Committee The Speaker's Committee is appointed in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) to perform the functions conferred on it by that Act. A summary of the principal powers and duties of the Committee are: to receive the Commission's annual accounts and examine the Commission's estimates to examine the Commission's plan of aims and objectives over the next five years and its estimated requirement for resources during that period and to consult with Treasury to designate the Commission's accounting officer and to specify his or her responsibilities to report to the House, at least once a year, on the exercise of its functions putting in place and overseeing a selection procedure for Commissioners

The membership of the Speaker's

Committee is determined in accordance with the provisions of Section 2 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. It consists of the members listed at the Parliament website The Llywydd's Committee Section 28 of the Senedd and Elections (Wales) Act 2020 sets out that, in Wales, the scrutiny of the Commission is to be carried out by a committee of the Senedd. The Llywydd Committee was therefore established to scrutinise financial estimates and plans submitted by the Commission in discharging its functions relating to devolved Welsh elections and devolved Welsh referendums. Each year, the Commission is required to submit to the Llywydd Committee an estimate of income and expenditure relating to its devolved Welsh functions. The Commission is also required to periodically submit a plan that sets out its aims, objectives and estimated budget for its functions relating to devolved Welsh elections and devolved Welsh referendums in the following five-year period. The Commission's Accounts and Reports are laid before the Senedd. The Scottish Parliament Corporate Body The Scottish Parliament Corporate Body (SPCB) considers and makes decisions on a wide range of issues to do with the running of the Scottish Parliament including the financing of the Parliament and allocation of its budget. Section 15 of the Scottish Elections (Reform) Act 2020 changing the funding arrangements of the Commission so that the SPCB became financially responsible for the work of the Commission in relation to Scotland. The Commission is required to submit a five-year plan and estimated requirements for resources to the SPBC. The Commission's Accounts and Reports are also laid before the Scottish Parliament. Summary of applicable legislation The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, as amended (and other legislation that governs the work of Commission). The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, includes amendments that have been made to it by subsequent legislation since its enactment in 2001. It establishes the Electoral Commission; makes provision about the registration and finances of political parties; donations and expenditure for political purposes; election and referendum campaigns and the conduct of referendums election petitions and other legal proceedings in connection with elections. In addition to the 2000 Act, other legislation is relevant to the Commission in the discharge of its functions. This includes the primary legislation that under-pins the conduct of elections in the UK and related matters, such as: Local Government Acts 1972, 1985, 1986, 1992, 2000 and 2003 Greater London Authority Act 1999 Representation of the People Acts 1981, 1983, 1985 and 2000 Election Publications Act 2001 Electoral Administration Act 2006 European Parliamentary Elections Acts 1978, 1999, 2002 and 2004 House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975 House of Lords Act 1999 Greater London Authority Act 1999 Broadcasting Acts 1981 and 1990 and Communications Act 2003 Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 Scotland Act 1998 Local Electoral Administration and Registration of Services (Scotland) Act 2006 Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 Government of Wales Acts 1998 and 2006 Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006 Armed forces legislation Political Parties and Elections Act 2009 Local Electoral Administration (Scotland) Act 2011 Police Reform and Social Responsibility Act 2011 Electoral Registration and Administration Act 2013 Transparency of Lobbying, Non-party Campaigning and Trade Union Administration Act 2014 (Transparency Act) Senedd and Elections (Wales) Act 2020 Scottish Elections (Reform) Act 2020 There are also many key orders, regulations and rules made under the legislation that govern the operation of elections. In addition, the lawful governance and running of the Commission requires compliance with the general law, such as, equality, human rights, employment, procurement, health and safety, property, intellectual rights, and access to information legislation. Annex C: The Nolan principles The seven principles of public life The 'Nolan Principles' code of practice has been written with regard to the seven principles of public life identified by the Nolan Committee in their First Report on Standards in Public Life in May 1995 and subsequently endorsed by the Government. Selflessness Holders of public office should take decisions solely in terms of the public interest. They should not do so in order to gain financial or other material benefits for themselves, their family, or their friends. Integrity Holders of public office should not place themselves under any financial or other obligation to outside individual or organisation that might influence them in the performance of their official duties. Objectivity In carrying out public business, including making public appointments, awarding contracts, or recommending individuals for rewards and benefits, holders of public office should make choices on merits. Accountability Holders of public office are accountable for their decisions and actions to the public and must submit themselves to whatever scrutiny is appropriate to their office. Openness Holders of public office should be as open as possible about all the decisions and actions they take. They should give reasons for their decisions and restrict information only when the wider public interest clearly demands. Honesty Holders of public office have a duty to declare any private interests relating to their public duties and to take steps to resolve any conflicts arising in a way that protects the public interest. Leadership Holders of public office should promote and support these principles by leadership and example.

Annex D: Prime financial and internal control policies

Introduction This document sets out the Commission's prime financial policies. The key objective of setting financial policies is to give a framework for maintaining financial control over Commission resources, which enables strategic priorities to be delivered and the Chief Executive to discharge his/her Accounting Officer responsibilities. In support of these policies, further detailed policies have been prepared and approved by the Director of Finance and Corporate Services. These detailed financial policies are included in the Finance Manual. The Prime and detailed financial policies together are referred to as the Commission's financial policies. The Commission financial policies comply, and are consistent, with the financial provisions laid down in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000.

Status and scope of the Commission's financial policies

Compliance with Commission financial policies is mandatory on all Commissioners, contractors and staff (temporary or full time) irrespective of their directorate or role. Any member of staff failing to comply with the financial policies may be subject to disciplinary action under the Commission's disciplinary policy. Any significant breaches of Commission financial policies will be notified to the Audit and Risk Committee and to Internal Audit. It is the responsibility of the relevant Director to ensure that staff are made aware of the existence and content of these and the detailed financial policies and that staff with financial responsibility are fully acquainted with them.

Declarations of interest There were no new declarations of interest. Minutes of the Commission Board meeting of 18 March 2020 Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 18 March 2020 be agreed. Coronavirus (COVID-19) - impact on the Commission and progress on key work areas (EC 33/20) The Chief Executive noted the organisation's swift transition to remote working had gone well overall, and he hoped it had also been beneficial for our staff's health, as we did not have reports of widespread illness. The Board heard that the Speaker's Committee had approved our interim Corporate Plan and budget, and work was now underway to consider how best to deliver what was in the plan in the context of the coronavirus pandemic. The Board discussed the impact of the current situation on the ability for parties and campaigners to submit their returns by the statutory deadlines and what this would mean for our transparency publications. The Director of Regulation said we were in communication with our stakeholders to understand their specific situations and the impact this would have on compliance. She noted a late return was not automatically an offence. The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance updated the Board on the secondary legislation relating to the postponement of the 2020 polls, and the work that the Cabinet Office were leading to plan for the elections that would now take place in 2021. The Board heard that the government was due to take a decision on the canvas shortly. The current expectation was that the reformed canvas would proceed, though possibly with a revised end date, and we continued to support Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) and their teams in preparing for this. The Board agreed that a discussion at a future meeting around the May 2021 polls and the sequencing of elections after that would be useful. The Director of Communications, Policy and Research updated the Board on the work his teams were doing to ensure our stakeholders continued to be informed, while at the same time acknowledging that some currently had different priorities. The Director of Finance and Corporate Services said work was underway to prepare the end of year accounts. Overall, this was progressing smoothly, but he noted there would likely be a couple of issues that would need discussion with the National Audit Office (NAO) before the accounts could be settled. He also updated the Board on the financial position at the end of the financial year, noting we had ended the year with a substantial underspend. This related principally to the unscheduled UK

Parliamentary General Election (UKPGE) and the volatile electoral year, along with decisions we had taken around the core budget to manage what could have been a significant overspend. He noted that while we had a good narrative to explain the situation, we would also be challenging ourselves to see if there was anything we could have done differently to manage the situation. The Board discussed the possible impact the current situation around the coronavirus pandemic and the economic crisis this had created could have on the Commission's future budgets. Action: Add an agenda item on the timeline for the 2021 polls and the sequencing of elections after that date, to the forward plan of Board business. Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Updated timeline for the corporate planning process 2021/26 (EC 34/20) The Head of Strategic Planning and Performance updated the Board on the revised timeline for the production of the new Corporate Plan. The Board discussed the opportunities this could present to take account of the current situation and our ambitions for the longer-term modernisation agenda. The Chief Executive noted the occasions on the Board forward plan for these discussions. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Annual review of risk (EC 35/20) The Head of Strategic Planning and Performance reminded the Board this report was a backward looking review of how risk had been managed through the last year. He noted that Risk 5 relating to Brexit had now been closed. The Chief Executive highlighted some of the actions taken though the year to improve the way the organisation managed risk. The Board discussed the importance of reflecting the impact of the coronavirus pandemic in our current risk registers. Resolved: That the paper be noted. Commission Board effectiveness review (EC 36/20) The Chair noted that due to the current coronavirus situation, the independent led Board effectiveness review had been delayed, but plans were in place for them to observe at a future meeting and to consult with individual Board members. This delay meant we had not completed an effectiveness review in the last financial year, so this was the Board's opportunity to raise anything in advance of the more substantial review, which would get underway shortly. The Board discussed the Report. Issues noted for further consideration included The make-up and diversity of the Board How Board members might increase their engagement with a wider range of stakeholders How Board members could be engaged in the wider organisation between meetings Resolved: That the paper be noted, in advance of the full Board effectiveness review being carried out by the independent organisation engaged for those purposes. Forward plan of Board business (EC 37/20) The Board considered whether a discussion around electoral divergence and the different approaches the devolved governments were taking to electoral modernisation might be useful. Action: Add a discussion around how we use our research to the May Board agenda, with a more substantive discussion at the September Board meeting Action: In the present context, Chief Executive's Update reports to include an update on risk Resolved: That the paper be noted. Commission Board action tracker (EC 38/20) Resolved: That the paper be noted.

Single Equalities Scheme for Northern Ireland | Electoral Commission Search Single Equalities Scheme for Northern Ireland You are in the Our plans and priorities section Home Our plans and priorities Currently reading: of 11 - Show page contents On this page Chapter 1: Introduction Chapter 2: Our arrangements for assessing our compliance with the section 75 duties Chapter 3: Our arrangements for consulting Chapter 4: Our arrangements for assessing, monitoring and publishing the impact of policies Chapter 5: Learning and development for our staff Chapter 6: Arrangements for ensuring and assessing public access to information and services we provide Chapter 7: Timetable for measures proposed Chapter 8: Our complaints procedure Chapter 9: Publication of the Single Equality Scheme Chapter 10: Review of our Equality Scheme Appendix Foreword The Electoral Commission is a public body that serves the electorate across the whole of the United Kingdom. Our aim is to provide equal access to democracy for all. That is why, in line with previous Equality Schemes, we have produced an Equality, Diversity and Inclusion Strategy which covers all parts of the UK. Like any organisation, we have a range of statutory obligations to ensure we promote equality, diversity and inclusivity. We have set out in the strategy what these are and how we comply with them in our activities. But equality, diversity and inclusion go beyond compliance. We know we have to do more to meet this challenge. Our Strategy sets out our aspirations to go further and challenge ourselves to reflect fully the diversity of the electorate in our work to support democracy. We recognise however that different legislation on equalities applies in Northern Ireland. Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act (1998) requires public authorities, in carrying out their functions relating to Northern Ireland, to have due regard to the need to promote equality of opportunity and regard to the desirability of promoting good relations between people of different religious belief, political opinion or racial group. In this Equality Scheme we set out how the Electoral Commission proposes to fulfil these statutory duties and the other statutory duties which apply. We will commit the necessary resources in terms of people, time and money to make sure that we comply with the Section 75 statutory duties and that the equality scheme is implemented effectively and on time. We commit to having effective internal arrangements in place for ensuring our effective compliance with the Section 75 statutory duties and for monitoring and reviewing our progress. We will continue to deliver a programme of communication and training for staff and Board members. We will continue to raise awareness for our consultees on the Section 75 statutory duties and our commitments in our equality scheme. We realise the importance of the role of the community and voluntary sector and the general public in ensuring that these duties are effectively implemented; our Scheme is designed to ensure that there are opportunities for those affected by our work to influence how we carry out these duties and to offer the opportunity to make complaints where we do not. We will report annually to the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland (ECNI) on our delivery of this scheme and our equalities progress in Northern Ireland including our progress against our Disability Action Plan. On behalf of the Electoral Commission we are pleased to support and endorse this Equality Scheme which has been drawn up in accordance with Section 75 and Schedule 9 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and the guidelines of the Northern Ireland Equality Commission and which forms part of our wider Equality, Diversity and Inclusion Strategy. We are fully committed to effectively fulfilling our Section 75 statutory duties across all our functions (including service provision, procurement and employment) through the effective implementation of this Scheme. Chapter 1: Introduction Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 requires the Electoral Commission to comply with two statutory duties: Section 75 (1) of the Northern Ireland Act (1998) requires us, in carrying out our functions relating to Northern Ireland, to have due regard to the need to promote equality of opportunity: between people of different religious belief, political opinion, racial group, age, marital status or sexual orientation between men and women generally between people with a disability and people without, and between people with dependants and people without Section 75 (2) requires us in addition to have regard to the desirability of promoting good relations between people of different religious belief, political opinion or racial group. "Functions" includes our "powers and duties" including our employment and procurement functions. How we propose to fulfil the Section 75 duties in relation to our relevant functions Schedule 9.4 (1) of the 1998 Act requires us as a designated public authority to set out in an Equality Scheme how it proposes to fulfil the duties imposed by Section 75. This Scheme accordingly sets out how we propose to do so and our plan for implementation. We are committed to the discharge of our Section 75 obligations in all parts of our organisation, and we will commit the necessary available resources in terms of people, time and money to ensure that the Section 75 statutory duties are complied with and that our Equality Scheme can be implemented effectively. We have set out in Chapter 1 of our Equality, Diversity and Inclusion Strategy the purpose and objectives of the Electoral Commission across the UK. Chapter 2: Our arrangements for assessing our compliance with the section 75 duties The Electoral Commission has three key objectives for equality, diversity and inclusion: Objective 1: ensure that everyone who is eligible is able to participate in the democratic process, whether as voter, campaigner or standing for office, by identifying barriers, making recommendations and working with others to remove them. This will be delivered through a range of activities seeking to promote equality in the democratic process. Objective 2: ensure that we embed equality, diversity and inclusion in all our work, treat all our customers and partners fairly and with respect, and are transparent in the decisions we make. This will be delivered by ensuring that equality is embedded in our processes and decisions. Objective 3: ensure equality of opportunity for everyone at the Commission and ensure that all our staff are treated fairly and with respect. This will be delivered through a range of policies designed to ensure equality, diversity and inclusion for all those who work and apply to work at the Commission. We set out in our Strategy the steps we have already taken to promote equality, diversity and inclusion and our priorities for action. The Action Plan sets out what we propose to do next, when we will do it, how we will measure success and who is responsible for delivery. Our arrangements for compliance with our statutory duties under Section 75 are set out at para 2.7 below. Further detail can be found in Chapter 3 (consultation), Chapter 4 (assessing, monitoring and publishing the impact of policies), Chapter 6 (ensuring and assessing public access to information and services), Chapter 8 (complaints) and Chapter 9 (publication). Responsibilities and reporting We are committed to the fulfilment of our Section 75 obligations in all parts of our work. By delegated authority, overall responsibility for the Commission's Single Equality Scheme rests with our Chief Executive. Operational responsibility for the day to day implementation of this scheme in respect of Northern Ireland rests with the Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland. The development, maintenance, implementation and review of our Single Equality Scheme in line with our statutory duties and good practice issued by the ECNI is the responsibility of the Commission's Equality, Diversity and Inclusion Lead. They report to the Head of Strategic Planning and Performance as part of the Directorate of Finance and Corporate Services. If you have any questions or comments please contact: Cahir Hughes Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland 4 Cromac Place The Gasworks Belfast BT7 2JB 0333 103 1928 infonorthernireland@electoralcommission.org.uk Objectives and targets relating to our statutory duties and our objectives for equality, diversity and inclusion are integrated into our strategic and operational business plans. These are also reflected in employees' job descriptions, objectives and regular performance reviews. We will prepare an annual review of the progress we have made on implementing the arrangements set out in this scheme and how we meet our Section 75 statutory duties. We will send this annual report of our progress to the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland by 31 August each year and will be mindful of any guidance on annual reporting issued by the Equality Commission. We will publish progress reports on our website after each annual review, and will include an update on progress in our Annual Report. Our Annual Report is available on our website www.electoralcommission.org.uk or by contacting: Cahir Hughes Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland 4 Cromac Place The Gasworks Belfast BT7 2JB 0333 103 1928 infonorthernireland@electoralcommission.org.uk We will liaise closely with the ECNI to ensure that progress on the implementation of this equality scheme is maintained. Our EDI Strategy and this Scheme have been approved by the Electoral Commission Board. Our Action Plan and our Timetable for Action in Northern Ireland We have developed an Action Plan for the Commission which forms part of this Strategy. Appendix 4 of this Scheme sets out a Timetable for Action in Northern Ireland. Our Plan and Timetable have been developed and prioritised on the basis of an audit of inequalities set out in Chapter 1 of the Strategy. This has gathered and analysed information across Section 75 categories to identify the inequalities that exist for our service users and those affected by our policies. It sets out how we propose to deliver against our three equality objectives based on our analysis of the inequalities that may exist for our service users, those affected by our policies and those who work for the Commission. We have set out proposed actions which are specific, measurable, linked to achievable outcomes, realistic and timebound, We have identified performance indicators, timescales and responsibilities. The Action Plan and Timetable are aligned with our corporate planning and annual business planning cycles, and actions are reflected in our Operational Plans. We have consulted stakeholders on the Strategy, Action Plan and Timetable and will keep under review with them. We will monitor progress on the delivery of these action measures annually and update the Action Plan and Timetable as necessary. We will inform the ECNI of any changes or amendments to our Action Plan and Timetable and will also include this information in our Section 75 annual progress report to the Commission. Our Section 75 annual progress report will incorporate information on progress we have made in implementing our action plans/action measures. The Action Plan and Timetable can be obtained from our website www.electoralcommission.org.uk or by contacting: Cahir Hughes Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland 4 Cromac Place The Gasworks Belfast BT7 2JB 0333 103 1928 infonorthernireland@electoralcommission.org.uk The Scheme is available on request in alternative formats. Chapter 3: Our arrangements for consulting Chapter 3 summary We recognise the importance of consultation in all aspects of our work and specifically in the implementation of our statutory equality duties. We will consult on our Strategy, Scheme and Action Plan, on Equality Impact Assessments and other matters relevant to our equality duties and specifically to the Section 75 statutory duties. We will consult in accordance with the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland guidance 'Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 – A guide for public authorities (April 2010). This may include consulting the ECNI, representative groups of Section 75 categories, voluntary and community groups, and other groups who have a legitimate interest in the matter as appropriate. All consultations will seek the views of those directly affected by the issue under discussion: the ECNI, representative groups, voluntary and community groups, staff and trade unions and other groups who have a legitimate interest in the process whether or not they have a direct economic or personal interest. This will be carried out initially by notifying all consultees we have identified in the most appropriate way (for example e-mail), followed up as appropriate by targeted consultation. We will consult as early as possible and tailor our methods of consultation to what our stakeholders tell us is appropriate. Methods of consultation could include e-mail contact, discussion with representative groups and discussion with those directly affected. This list is not exhaustive and we may use other methods. We will consider accessibility and format in providing information to ensure barriers in responding to consultation are removed as far as possible, and give consideration to how best to communicate with young people, people with disabilities such as learning disabilities, and black, Asian and minority ethnic communities. We will make information available in alternative formats on request and make sure we do so in a timely fashion allowing equal time for consultees to respond. We will where appropriate provide specific training on facilitating consultations. We will develop a programme of awareness raising through social media, campaigns and partnerships which complements the work we currently do with stakeholders. In order to ensure groups have enough time to consult amongst themselves, we will consult for a minimum of twelve weeks unless there are exceptional circumstances, for example any created by public health emergencies or unscheduled electoral events, where this is not feasible: in such circumstances we may consult for eight weeks or after implementation. We will review and monitor to ensure that any impacts of the policy are considered. We will as a matter of course allow a longer period for consultation on complex matters or where holiday periods supervene. We will take appropriate measures to meet the differing needs of those attending consultation meetings. We will make information available in appropriate formats and including detailed information on the policy proposal and relevant quantitative and qualitative data. In making a decision with respect to a policy which is adopted or proposed for adoption, we will take into account any assessment and consultation. We will provide feedback which is timely; which covers the policy, a summary of comments and a summary of our consideration and response; and which is in a format suitable to consultees. We have included a list of our consultees at the end of this appendix and it is available on our website. It can also be obtained from our website www.electoralcommission.org.uk, or by contacting Cahir Hughes Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland 4 Cromac Place The Gasworks Belfast BT7 2JB 0333 103 1928 infonorthernireland@electoralcommission.org.uk Our consultation list is not exhaustive and will be reviewed on an annual basis to ensure it remains relevant to our functions and policies. We welcome enquiries from people and/or organisations who would like to be added to this list, and invite them to contact the Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland. Chapter 4: Our arrangements for assessing, monitoring and publishing the impact of policies Our arrangements for assessing the likely impact of policies adopted or proposed for adoption on the promotion of equality of opportunity In terms of our equality duties ‘policy’ is broadly defined and covers all the ways in which we carry out or propose to carry out our functions as a regulator; this includes any strategy, plan, function, project, service, event or review. The term policy is also used for any proposed, amended or existing strategy, policy initiative or practice and/or decision, whether written or unwritten and irrespective of the label given to it, e.g. 'draft', 'pilot'. When we make policy decisions, we will take into account any assessment and consultation that has been carried out in relation to the policy. We use evidence based screening and equality impact assessments to analyse the likely impact of a policy on the promotion of equality of opportunity and good relations. In carrying out these assessments we will relate them to the intended outcomes of the policy in question and will continue to engage with the ECNI to ensure best practice. We will trial and consult on a new Equality Impact Assessment approach. This comprises a new form for screening, an updated EQIA template and full guidance to help officers complete an EQIA. We have also clarified our scrutiny and sign-off process. The recruitment of a permanent EDI lead will provide resource and support for those completing EQIAs. We have also rolled out in-depth training. Screening Screening enables us to identify those policies that are likely to have an impact on equality of opportunity and/or good relations. Screening is completed at the earliest opportunity in the policy development and review process. Policies we propose to adopt will be subject to screening prior to implementation; where there are a series of stages we may screen more than once. The lead officer responsible for putting together the policy and taking the decisions will take the lead role in screening that policy. Screening will also involve other relevant team members, for example, our senior EDI lead, those who implement the policy and staff members from other relevant work areas. Where appropriate we will include key stakeholders in the screening process. The screening process for all policies includes the following: The likely impact on those in the Section 75 equality categories Opportunities to better promote equality of opportunity for those within the Section 75 categories The extent to which the policy is likely to impact on good relations between people of a different religious belief, political opinion or racial group; Opportunities to better promote good relations between people of a different religious belief, political opinion or racial group To help us answer these questions we gather relevant information and data, both qualitative and quantitative. In taking this into account we consider the different needs, experiences and priorities of the Section 75 equality categories. The screening decision is informed by this evidence. Our screening will lead to three potential outcomes: The policy is screened in and needs a full EqIA The policy is screened out but needs mitigation or an alternative policy The policy is screened out and does not need an EqIA If our screening concludes that the likely impact is minor, we may decide to carry out a full EqIA anyway; and we will consider potential mitigations and alternative policies. Where we do so we will explain this in the screening assessment. The decision will be discussed with our EDI Senior Lead and signed off at Director level. If the effect is major we will as a rule proceed to a full EqIA. This will be discussed with our EDI Senior Lead and signed off at Director level. If the screening concludes that there is no impact, we will give reasons as to why we are screening the policy out. The assessment will be discussed with our EDI Senior Lead and signed off at Director level. As soon as possible following the completion of the screening process, the screening template, signed off and approved by the senior manager responsible for the policy, will be made available on our website www.electoralcommission.org.uk and on request from: Cahir Hughes Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland 4 Cromac Place The Gasworks Belfast BT7 2JB 0333 103 1928 infonorthernireland@electoralcommission.org.uk We will publish a quarterly list of screenings we have carried out on our website and alert our consultees. Screenings will be made available on request. If a consultee raises a concern about the screening based on supporting evidence, including the ECNI, we will review the screening decision. Our screening reports are published quarterly (see below for details) Equality Impact Assessments (EqIAs) An EqIA is a thorough and systematic analysis of a policy. Its primary function is to determine the extent of any impact on the Section 75 categories and to determine if the impact is an adverse one. It is also an opportunity to demonstrate the likely positive outcomes of a policy and to seek ways to promote more effectively equality of opportunity and good relations. If screening identifies the need for an EqIA, we will carry this out in line with the principles laid down by the ECNI and set out in our own guidance. It will be carried out as part of the policy development process before the policy is adopted and implemented. EqIAs will be subject to consultation as set out in chapter 3 above. We will allow sufficient time for effective consultation and observe the timescales set out in the ECNI's Guide to the Statutory Duties. Our arrangements for publishing the results of screening and EqIAs As set out above, we make publicly available on our website the likely impact of our policies on the promotion of equality of opportunity and good relations. What we publish Screening reports are published quarterly. Screening reports detail: All policies screened by the Electoral Commission over the three month period A statement of the aim(s) of the policy/policies to which the assessment relates Consideration given to measures which might mitigate any adverse impact Consideration given to alternative policies which might better achieve the promotion of equality of opportunity; Screening decisions, i.e: whether the policy has been 'screened in' for equality impact assessment. whether the policy has been 'screened out' with mitigation or an alternative policy proposed to be adopted. whether the policy has been 'screened out' without mitigation or an alternative policy proposed to be adopted. Where applicable, a timetable for conducting equality impact assessments A link to the completed screening template(s) on our website We will publish a quarterly list of all screenings carried out and alert consultees. Where exceptionally a policy applies only in Northern Ireland we will do this only in Northern Ireland. Conversely where a policy exceptionally does not apply in Northern Ireland we will not follow this procedure. All screening reports will follow our template. For details on the availability of our screening templates please check our screening process . We will publish our EqIAs on our website following our EqIA template and setting out the results of the assessment. Equality impact assessments include: A statement of the aim of the policy assessed Information and data collected Details of the assessment of impact(s) Consideration given to measures which might mitigate any adverse impact Consideration given to alternative policies which might better achieve the promotion of equality of opportunity Consultation responses The decision taken Future monitoring plans How we publish the information All information we publish meets WCAG guidelines and can be made available in alternative formats. Where we publish the information The results of our assessments (screening reports and completed templates, the results of equality impact assessments) are available on our website <http://www.electoralcommission.org.uk/about-us/equality-anddiversity> and by contacting: Cindy Williams The Electoral Commission 3, Bunhill Row London EC1Y 8YZ edi@electoralcommission.org.uk In addition to the above, screening reports (electronic link or hard copy on request if more suitable for recipients) which include all policies screened over a 3 month period are also sent directly to all NI consultees on a quarterly basis. As set out above we will not do this if, exceptionally, the measures do not apply in NI. We will inform the general public through communications such as press releases where this is necessary and/or appropriate. Our arrangements for monitoring any adverse impact of policies we have adopted on equality of opportunity Monitoring can help us to deliver better public services and continuous improvements. Monitoring equality information involves the processing of sensitive personal data (data relating to the racial or ethnic origin of individuals, sexual orientation, political opinion, religious belief, etc). To ensure that we monitor information confidentially and effectively we will follow guidance from the Office of the Information Commissioner and the ECNI. We will monitor any adverse impact on the promotion of equality of opportunity of policies we have adopted. We are also committed to monitoring more broadly to identify opportunities to better promote equality of opportunity and good relations in line with ECNI guidance. The systems we have established to monitor the impact of policies and identify opportunities to better promote equality of opportunity and good relations are: collection, collation and analysis of existing relevant primary and secondary quantitative and qualitative data across all nine equality categories on an on-going basis a review of information and data collected within one year of approval of this equality scheme, to identify the extent of current monitoring and take action to address any gaps in order to have the necessary information on which to base decisions collection of new data if necessary We will revise a policy if over a two year period of monitoring, evaluation shows a greater adverse impact than predicted, or if opportunities arise which would allow for greater equality of opportunity to be promoted and ensure better outcomes for relevant equality groups. We review our equality impact assessment monitoring information on an annual basis. Other monitoring information is reviewed in line with the performance cycle set out in our published Corporate Plan. Our arrangements for publishing the results of our monitoring We will publish the results of our monitoring of adverse impacts of policies we have adopted in a timely manner and welcome feedback to further inform our policy development. However, we are committed to monitoring more broadly and the results of our policy monitoring are published as set out below. EqIA monitoring information is published as part of our Section 75 annual progress report. We will be proactive in announcing the outcomes of our monitoring (which will be in six monthly updates on our website) by contacting consultees in Northern Ireland when these are published. All information published is accessible and can be made available in alternative formats on request. Chapter 5: Learning and development for our staff Commitment to staff training The Commission recognises the value of learning and development in enabling us to be fully aware of and to effectively implement our equality duties. Our Chief Executive has been and remains clear about the importance of equality, diversity and inclusion in line with our statutory duties and as an essential part of the Commission's ethos. To this end we have developed an equality and diversity communications and training programme for all staff at the Commission including our responsibilities under Section 75. Training objectives Our training arrangements including objectives and monitoring and evaluation arrangements are set out in our EDI Strategy. They are designed to ensure that: All staff are aware of the provisions of Section 75 of the 1998 Act, our Equality Scheme commitments and the particular issues likely to affect people across the range of Section 75 categories, to ensure that our staff fully understand their role in implementing the scheme Staff engaged in policy assessment through screening and EqIAs are provided with the necessary skills and knowledge Staff engaged in dealing with complaints on compliance, consultation and monitoring implementation of the Equality Scheme are provided with the necessary skills and knowledge Awareness raising and training arrangements We have put in place the following arrangements to ensure staff and Board members are aware of and understand our obligations on equality, diversity and inclusion: A summary and access to all key material are easily available on a link from our homepage The full equality scheme is available to all staff through this link Staff were briefed in a session led by the Chief Executive on the draft strategy, and there will be further briefing sessions post approval Material on our statutory obligations and our EDI commitments is included in our induction training Focused training is provided where needed for those working on the implementation of commitments in the Strategy and Scheme Training is provided as appropriate on the issues experienced by those with protected characteristics and identified in Section 75 Our Senior EDI lead ensures that awareness is updated as appropriate on issues relating to equality, diversity and inclusion The Board is to be supported by an independent adviser on equalities This programme has been developed in consultation with staff groups such as our Equality, Diversity and Inclusion group, our Race at Work Charter Task Force, our Staff Engagement Group and our Dignity, Respect and Empowerment Group. It reflects our learnings from external stakeholders in the course of business. Monitoring and evaluation We evaluate as we would for any learning and development the extent to which participants have built their skills and knowledge; and we monitor numbers trained. The extent to which training arrangements have been met will be reported on as part of the Section 75 annual progress report, which will be sent to the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland. Chapter 6: Arrangements for ensuring and assessing public access to information and services we provide The Commission is committed to ensuring that the information and services we provide are fully accessible to all of our stakeholders across the UK. We keep our arrangements under review to ensure that they remain accessible. We are aware that there are a range of needs for accessible information. People with sensory, learning, communication and mobility disabilities may require printed information in other formats, and we work closely with relevant organisations. Members of ethnic minority groups whose first language is not English may have difficulties with information provided in English. Access to information To ensure equality of opportunity in accessing information, we provide information in alternative formats such as Braille, EasyRead and audio format (such as CD, MP3 or DAISY) and in minority languages to meet the needs of those for whom English is not their first language on request where reasonably practicable, and will ensure a reasonable alternative is provided if we cannot meet a request. We will respond to such requests within a month where possible in line with our response to all requests. We will liaise with representatives of young people, disability and minority ethnic organisations and take account of existing/developing good practice and work in partnership with them to develop the best ways of reaching such groups. We will advertise in a range of media as appropriate. Our website is WCAG compliant. Access to services Democracy is for us all, and we are committed to ensuring that all our services are fully accessible to everyone with protected characteristics or within Section 75. We adhere to the relevant provisions of current anti-discrimination legislation. We have set out in our EDI Strategy our arrangements for ensuring that all of our services are fully accessible to customers and stakeholders. We make access recommendations and work with others to remove barriers as part of our work to ensure that everyone who is eligible is able to participate in the democratic process. We identify groups who are less likely to have access to democracy and undertake a range of initiatives to target them such as campaigns and partnership working. Assessing public access to information and services We monitor access to our information and services annually in all our work to ensure we promote equality of opportunity and good relations. We ensure that these aspects are covered in our regular programme of research and monitoring such as: access audits, website audits, monitoring requests for information in alternative formats, monitoring complaints, seeking feedback, including relevant questions about access to information and services in service user surveys, engagement with stakeholders etc.

Chapter 7: Timetable for measures proposed A Timetable for measures proposed is at Appendix 4 of this Scheme. These have been reflected in our operational and business planning. We have set out in our Action Plan for the Strategy and in the Timetable attached to this Scheme the actions we propose to take and when. Chapter 8: Our complaints procedure We are here to serve the public We are here to serve the public, and will endeavour to resolve all complaints made to us. If anyone believes that they have been directly affected by a failure of the Electoral Commission to comply with our approved equality scheme in relation to our equality duties in Northern Ireland, they are invited to complain to the Head of Office, Northern Ireland. Cahir Hughes Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland 4 Cromac Place The Gasworks Belfast BT7 2JB 0333 103 1928 infonorthernireland@electoralcommission.org.uk We will in the first instance acknowledge receipt of each complaint on the same working day it is received. We aim to respond to complaints within 20 working days, and will contact you if we cannot meet this deadline. We will carry out an internal investigation of the complaint and respond within twenty working days. If the complaint is complex enough to need more time, this period will be extended to two months and the complainant advised within one month of the original complaint. The complainant will be kept informed of progress. If the complaint has not been resolved within a reasonable timescale, we will advise the complainant that the complaint can be brought to the ECNI. The Electoral Commission will co-operate fully with any subsequent investigation by the ECNI on any breach of relevant statute, and will provide access in a timely manner to any relevant documentation that the Commission may require. We will make all efforts to implement promptly and in full any recommendations arising out of any ECNI investigation. Chapter 9: Publication of the Single Equality Scheme Our Equality Scheme is available on our website www.electoralcommission.org.uk, and free of charge including in alternative formats from Cahir Hughes Head of the Electoral Commission in Northern Ireland 4 Cromac Place The Gasworks Belfast BT7 2JB 0333 103 1928 infonorthernireland@electoralcommission.org.uk We will make the following arrangements for publication: We will make the following arrangements for publication: We will make every effort to communicate our scheme widely, for example through social media and partnership working We will e-mail a link to the scheme to the consultees set out at Annex E; and we will respond to requests for the scheme in an alternative format in a timely manner. Other consultees without email will be notified by letter that the scheme is available on request. Our Scheme is available on request in alternative formats such as Braille, EasyRead, large print, audio formats; and in minority languages Stakeholders A list of our stakeholders and consultees can be found annexed to the EDI Strategy, on our website and by contacting us using the details given above. This scheme will be made available in a range of accessible formats. We will directly consult and inform our equality consultees and stakeholders through a range of channels. Chapter 10: Review of our Equality Scheme As required under Schedule 9 paragraph 8 (3) of the 1998 Act, we will conduct a review of this Equality Scheme. This review will take place within five years of submission to the ECNI but could be carried out within a shorter timescale. We will review our Action Plan yearly. The review will evaluate the effectiveness of our

Scheme in relation to the implementation of the section 75 duties relevant to our functions in Northern Ireland. In undertaking this review we will follow any guidance issued by the ECNI. A report of this review will be made public in the same way as the Scheme and sent to the ECNI. Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act guidance 1 proposes that for most purposes, the main categories are: those under 18; people aged between 18 and 65; and people over 65. However, the definition of age groups will relate to the policy under consideration. Disability: Under Chapter 1 of the Equalities Act 2010 a person has a disability if s/he has a physical or mental impairment which has a substantial and long-term adverse effect on that person's ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities. Gender reassignment: Under Chapter 1 of the Equalities Act this refers to people who are proposing to undergo, are undergoing or have undergone a process or part of a process for the purpose of reassigning their sex by changing physiological or other attributes of sex. A reference to a transsexual person is a person who has the protected characteristic of gender reassignment. Marriage and Civil Partnership: Under the Equality Act 2010 civil partners must be treated the same as married couples on a wide range of legal matters. 'Status' can refer to whether a person is single, divorced or separated, married or in a civil partnership. Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act guidance refers to married people; unmarried people; divorced or separate people; and widowed people. Pregnancy and maternity: Pregnancy is the condition of being pregnant. Maternity refers to the period after the birth, and is linked to maternity leave in the employment context. In the non-work context, protection against maternity discrimination is for 26 weeks after birth, and includes treating a woman unfavourably because she is breastfeeding. Race: Race is defined in the Equality Act 2010 as including colour, nationality and ethnic or national origins. Religion: Religion has the meaning usually given to it but belief includes religious and philosophical beliefs including lack of belief (e.g. Atheism). Sex is defined in the Equality Act 2010 as referring to men and women. Sexual Orientation is defined in the Equality Act 2010 as referring to whether a person's sexual attraction is towards their own sex, the opposite sex or to both sexes. People with dependants: Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 guidance defines this group as: people with a primary responsibility for: a child; a person with a disability; a dependent elderly person. Political opinion: Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 guidance defines political opinion as: Unionists generally; Nationalists generally; members/supporters of any political party; other. Language: In compliance with the Welsh Language Act 1993 and the Welsh Language Measure 2011, this consideration refers to a group of people defined by the language they speak. In Wales we have a duty to provide services in Welsh and as set out in the Welsh Language Standards. Appendix 6: Action Plan This forms Chapter 8 of the EDI Strategy. 1. welcomed those present. Minutes of the last meeting and matters arising It was noted

correction to the minutes of the previous meeting held on 19 May 2021. Matters arising (a) Item 3.4 candidate acceptance forms were currently designed for paper not electronic usage. (b) Item 3.8 The EMB would look at the idea of hosting results for Scottish Parliament and Council elections on their website. Report on 2021 Scottish Parliament elections Sarah Mackie (SM) highlighted the main findings and recommendations in the Commission's report on the Scottish Parliament election 2021. The Electoral Commission should have powers to compel social media companies to provide information from campaigners, voters were satisfied the election had been well-run despite Returning Officers (ROs) facing significant staffing challenges due to the impact of COVID. There was an over reliance on a small pool of companies supplying services to people who run elections. The small numbers of newly enfranchised voters in Scotland made it difficult to get good quality data but there would be census data coming down the line. Parties and candidates had been able to campaign although some of their usual practices (e.g. face to face campaigning) were curtailed by the impact of the pandemic. The household notification write-out undertaken by Electoral Registration Officers (ERO) in February improved the completeness and accuracy of the register ahead of the election and helped to manage the predicted surge in postal vote applications. This was really good work and would be good to see this happen again but EROs would need to be resourced if they were to do this at future elections. Maria McCann (MMcC) agreed the HNL had been helpful but was a costly exercise and Pete Wildman (PW) said it may come down to the availability of local funding which would make it harder to achieve a national write-out. The matter would be considered further. Preparations for Scottish Council elections 2022 Legislation (MMcC) said it was expected the SSIs required for the local government elections would all have been laid by the end of the week. She thanked all for their feedback as they had been developed. Scott Martin (SM) asked if the candidate expenses limits could be the subject of a wider review to make them more appropriate to the Scottish system. MMCC said Scottish Government would consider this after the May polls. Guidance Martin McKeown (MMcK) indicated that the Electoral Commission's core guidance was being drafted and will reflect the forthcoming legislative changes. The revised guidance will be published before the end of the year. Co-ordination by EMB Chris Highcock (CHi) informed the PPP of work associated with the e-Count project was on-going. The co-ordination of the election would be effected through directions from the Convener of the EMB. The directions were currently being developed and were building on those issued for the 2021 election. General support for Returning Officers (ROs) and Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) would likely be through a joint seminar with the Electoral Commission in January to support general planning, consistency in adjudication classification of rejected ballots (particularly where multiple first preferences were given) and consistency in printing documents so there would be a standard postal vote pack across Scotland. EMB would provide general support and promote best practice across ROs and EROs. There would also be training in e-counting provided. E-Counting James Newman (JN) indicated there was currently an intensive period of in-person testing of the software and hardware at Silvan House, Edinburgh. The next phase would engage more intensively with councils on issues around the delivery; demonstration training, equipment set-up and so on. PPP members would be invited to a demonstration of the e-counting project and indicated that bulletins were now being produced and published on the EMB website. PPP members could be included on the circulation list or obtain them direct from the EMB website. (SM) asked for copies of the sample reports that were going to come out of the system post results. (MMcC) said the style of reports had been amended based on comments from users of the reports. (SM) said reports were primarily for the electorate and candidates and the views of recipients should be sought. The reports were still under development and therefore an opportunity for revision remained. She would speak to the e-count team. Registration and Absent Voting Pete Wildman (PW) indicated that following the election in May, absent voting remained high as most people had applied for a permanent postal vote. Common dates for PV issue, recommended second interim update dates to establish consistency would likely form part of the direction from the EMB. The postal voting deadline for the 2022 election would return to the normal schedule of D-11. Public Awareness and Partnership Activity Catherine Heggie (CHe) said the Electoral Commission will be running their 'Got 5' registration campaign ahead of the council elections, which would target young people, recent movers, and those living in rented accommodation. The Electoral Commission will also be running a specific voter information campaign on how to vote using STV, and will be building on partnership work carried out ahead of the Scottish Parliament election to target a number of under-registered groups. The Electoral Commission is currently scheduling meetings with organisations to plan activity, including engagement with schools. Equality Data Project Gillian Cruickshank (GC) and Hannah Rutherford (HR) Indicated to the PPP that due to the absence of complete and accurate data on protected characteristics made it impossible to understand diversity fully. It was proposed that a survey be undertaken of candidates issued at the point of nominations. Completing the survey was voluntary and the plan was to trial the survey at the local government elections and if found to be useful to repeat at future elections. (GC) assured the panel that data protection laws would be fully adhered to. (SM) said that parties may have a monitoring form of their own and it may be useful to have early sight of theirs as it could help with consistency. The paper was to be published in October but they could share an early draft of the form. UK Elections Bill Cabinet Office & the Office of the Secretary of State for Scotland written update indicated that the UK Parliament Elections Bill was introduced on 5 July 2021. Parliamentary scrutiny of the Elections Bill had begun with Second Reading in the House of Commons on 7 September. The Bill introduced a number of measures which apply to UK Parliamentary elections, local elections in England and PCC elections. These were: A requirement for voters to show photographic identification to vote in a polling station Changes to integrity of the absent ballot process by increasing protection on postal and proxy voting Removing the 15 year limit on voting rights of British citizens overseas Changes to access to voting for electors with disabilities; and Revising the franchise to reflect the new relationship with the European Union. The Bill also introduced a number of changes intended to apply to all polls, across the UK. These were in relation to: laws on intimidation and undue influence laws surrounding political finance 'Imprint' requirement to digital political campaigning; and Parliamentary accountability of the Electoral Commission The Cabinet Office had involved devolved governments in the development of the Bill and shared draft clauses. Chloe Smith, Minister for the Constitution and Devolution had regularly met with her counterpart in Scotland both bilaterally and through the Inter Ministerial Group for Elections and Registration to discuss matters relating to elections and specifically the Bill. Ian Hockenhull (IH) indicated that Scottish Government had issued a request for comments on the proposed Legislative Consent Motion (LCM) to Scottish stakeholders in July and were grateful for the comments received. It was likely that Scottish Ministers would recommend that the Scottish Parliament reject the proposed LCM and it would seek to consider the proposed changes and legislate for Scottish elections as appropriate in the future. Updates (not related to Scottish local government election 2022) Scottish Government (MMcC) said Boundaries Scotland had submitted proposals for six islands reviews, subsequently Scottish Ministers had laid SIs in the Scottish Parliament which were subject to an affirmative instrument. She welcomed the Electoral Commission's report on the May 2021 elections and noted the recommendations. Scotland Office/Cabinet Office Helena Brice (HB) said the Elections Bill was due to go to committee on 16 September and the Dissolution and Calling of Parliament Bill finished its stages in the Commons and had its first reading in the House of Lords today. Boundaries Scotland Colin Wilson (CW) On 14 May 2021, the Local Government Boundary Commission for Scotland was re-named Boundaries Scotland. This was to reflect its added responsibilities for reviews of Scottish Parliament boundaries. In late May, early June the Commission submitted its final proposals for the electoral reviews of the six council areas with inhabited islands (Na h-Eileanan an Iar), Orkney Islands, Shetland Islands, Argyll and Bute, Highland and North Ayrshire Council areas). Boundary Commission for Scotland For the 2023 Review of UK Parliament Constituencies, the Commission was looking to consult on its initial proposals in mid-October 2021 for an 8 week period. They hoped to confirm this in the next few weeks. The 2023 Review will recommend 57 constituencies in Scotland, two less than at present. Boundary Commission for England have concluded their initial consultation stage. Wales began their consultation on the 8th September and Northern Ireland will consult probably late October. Royal Mail Rachel Winham (RW) said the weekly calls with Pete Wildman and Chris Highcock (CH) had worked well during the May 2021 elections and asked if there was anything the parties/panel wished them to be aware of or to do. She confirmed Royal Mail would be working in Scotland on Good Friday in 2022. Electoral Management Board for Scotland (CHi) said there had been good co-operation with Royal Mail which they hoped to repeat next year. The last by election (currently scheduled) would take place in Falkirk on 14 October as once within 6 months of the ordinary election of councillors, any vacancies occurring would likely not be filled unless a 1/3rd of the council was vacant. An issue of comment at the Scottish Parliament election in May was the level of scrutiny possible, given the context of the pandemic and the intention in May 2022 was to provide a good sight of the electronic counting process, particularly the Box opening process. The EMB intended to discuss with Public Health Scotland the public health context going forward to facilitate election planning to ensure the delivery of the elections with a trusted result but also maintain safety. Pete Wildman (PW) was keen to repeat this year's effective engagement with Royal Mail. The canvass was on-going and similar response rates to last year were being experienced. It was hoped door-to-door visits would be possible. (SM) asked (PW) about monthly updates, whether they would receive a complete set for each month and when they would know all were in. The Electoral Commission Alex Attwood, Electoral Commissioner representing smaller parties said he was available and keen to speak with smaller parties if they felt it added value. He sought to ensure the views of the smaller parties were known by the Chair of the Electoral Commission and the wider Board. Sue Bruce (SB) said the Scottish Parliament election report brought forward by the Electoral Commission reflected our roles and the co-operation between us all. She welcomed the positive response of the panel to the report. She informed the panel that a new Commissioner, Katy Radford had been appointed as the Commissioner with responsibilities in Northern Ireland. She also informed the PPP that the Chief Executive of the Electoral Commission had indicated his intention to retire in the first half of 2022. The Presiding Officer had been notified and appropriate plans for recruitment would be put in place. Martin McKeown (MMcK) said the online party stakeholder survey aimed at people we regulate would be launched over the next few days. The aim was to assist us in better understanding our strengths and weaknesses in how we engage with those we regulate. Feedback was welcomed and he asked that the parties circulate the link to anyone they thought should have it. As discussed at various PPP meetings, PF online was being redesigned with the launch expected in January 2022. A number of demonstrations of the new system would be arranged prior to launch. Dates of Future Meetings Andy O'Neill (AON) confirmed the next meeting would be virtual on 10 November but would write seeking the views of the Panel as to whether they would prefer to maintain virtual meetings, move back to all in-person meetings or establish a hybrid approach. 2021 10 November 2022 20 January *8 March 16 May Pre-meeting 10:30 and meeting proper at 11:00 am except for *8 March which will be 2:30 pre-meeting and 3:00pm meeting

Investigation: UK Independence Party (UKIP) | Electoral Commission Search
Investigation: UK Independence Party (UKIP) You are in the Investigations section Home Investigations On this page Summary Our investigation Our findings First published: 18 September 2018 Last updated: 18 September 2018 Overview We have looked at whether, during 2015 and 2016, the UK Independence Party (UKIP) took donations from impermissible sources. We have concluded that they did not. Summary We have finished our investigation into whether the UKIP took impermissible donations from a European political party and foundation, namely the Alliance for Direct Democracy in Europe (ADDE) and the Initiative for Direct Democracy in Europe (IDDE). We looked at this because of a decision by the European Parliament Bureau in December 2016 that ADDE and IDDE had broken its rules by spending its grant money on polling of interest to UKIP. We found that: the polling did look at geographical areas and Eurosceptic issues of potential strategic significance to UKIP at the time two ADDE contractors who worked on some of the polling also worked as UKIP campaign managers during the 2015 general election whilst the polling could have been of benefit to UKIP had it been provided, the evidence was insufficient to support a conclusion that the purpose of the polling was to be for the benefit of UKIP or that they received the polling results We concluded that the polling did not meet the definition of a donation to UKIP under UK political finance rules. Should new evidence come to light that makes it appropriate for us to look again at this matter, we would do so. We recognise that the European Parliament Bureau came to a different conclusion in respect of the purpose and ultimate usage of the polling. Our conclusion is based on the evidence we got as part of our investigation into specific offences under UK political finance law. And it reflects the fact that by law, we are required to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that an offence has been committed. UKIP is a registered political party in Great Britain. It is a member of a European political party called the Alliance for Direct Democracy in Europe (ADDE). ADDE has an affiliated foundation, the Institute for Direct Democracy in Europe (IDDE). UKIP must comply with the UK's political finance rules; ADDE and IDDE are not subject to those rules. Further information Who are UKIP, ADDE, and IDDE? UKIP is a registered political party in Great Britain (there is a separate registered party called UKIP in Northern Ireland). UKIP fought a number of seats across the UK in the 2015 general election, and reported spending around £2.8m on its campaign. As a UK registered political party, UKIP: cannot accept donations from organisations outside the UK must report all its donations of £7,500 or more to us on a quarterly basis must report all its campaign spending after each general election ADDE and IDDE are not registered political parties in the UK, so these rules do not apply to them. As with other European political parties and foundations, ADDE and IDDE received grant funding from the European Union. The funding can cover up to 85% of the parties' and foundations' eligible spending, and can be used for a range of activity from administrative functions through to the campaign costs for European elections. It cannot be used for certain purposes, including for the direct or indirect funding of national parties, election candidates and political foundations at either the national or European level. The donation rules in detail The donation rules for UK political parties are set out in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA). They say that: a donation means any gift to a party of money or other property, sponsorship, payment of subscriptions or fees, money spent on paying any expenses of a party or the provision of property, services or facilities not on commercial terms only amounts above £500 are viewed as donations under PPERA a registered party cannot accept a donation if it is made by a person who, at that time, is not a permissible

donor permissible donors are, broadly, an individual on the electoral register or a company or other entity from within the UK If a party receives a donation from an impermissible source, it must return the donation within 30 days. If the party does not do this, its treasurer commits an offence. However, the treasurer has a defence to this if he or she took all reasonable steps to verify if the donor was permissible, and as a result he or she believed that the donor was permissible. We enforce these rules using a range of investigatory and sanctioning powers. Further information You can find PPERA on the government's legislation website . The donation rules are in Part IV. Our investigation In December 2016 the European Parliament Bureau (EPB) concluded that €500,616 spent by ADDE, and €33,864 spent by IDDE, in 2015 broke the rules for grants to European parties and foundations. This included spending on polling done within the UK which it concluded was done in the interest of UKIP. We investigated, getting information by issuing legal notices and interviewing key people. This gave us enough evidence to complete our investigation. Investigation evidence What we looked at In December 2016 the European Parliament Bureau (EPB) decided that €500,616 spent by ADDE, and €33,864 spent by IDDE, in 2015 broke the rules for grants to European parties and foundations. The EPB had concluded that some of the grant money had been indirectly used to finance UKIP, which was against its rules. The EPB considered that polling undertaken by the ADDE and IDDE during 2015, showed strong indications that it was undertaken for the interest of UKIP and noted the Eurosceptic nature of its questions and the locations of the polling. The legal framework for the funding of European political parties and foundations lays the burden of proof for eligibility of funding on the beneficiary. Polling was undertaken: in North Thanet, Rochester & Strood, Sittingbourne & Sheppey, and South Thanet in February 2015 in Great Grimsby and Thurrock in April 2015 in Cardiff South & Penarth in April 2015 in Merthyr Tydfil & Rhymney in April 2015 across the UK in June/July 2015 across Wales in September 2015 in Scotland and London in November 2015 across the UK in December 2015 across seven EU countries in December 2015 again across the UK in December 2015 The total cost of the polling to the ADDE and IDDE was approximately €321,000. The EFB told us about this in October 2016. It gave us significant evidence to explain its concerns, and after looking at this we opened an investigation. The issues under investigation were: whether any polling or other work paid for by ADDE or IDDE was given to UKIP for its benefit if so, whether this constituted a donation under PPERA if so, whether the UKIP treasurer and UKIP had committed an offence of failing to return an impermissible donation as required by PPERA During the investigation the EFB also said it was concerned that UKIP MEP assistants may have been working for UKIP, and their MEP salaries may therefore have been a donation to UKIP. We looked at the evidence but decided that it did not meet the threshold for adding the issue to our investigation. How we investigated Between December 2016 and May 2017 we issued a series of legal notices requiring documents and information from UKIP and the polling company that did the polling work for ADDE and IDDE. We also sent legal notices to a then director of UKIP and a private individual contracted by the ADDE to lead work on many of the polls whom had previously worked as a UKIP campaign manager. We received a considerable amount of documents and information in response to all these notices, which we examined. We then arranged interviews of key individuals, which ran up to February 2018. This included the lead ADDE contractor who worked on many of the polls, an additional individual contracted by the ADDE to write reports on the polls, the ADDE President, and a founder and former director of ADDE and IDDE. These were all voluntary interviews. The Executive Director of ADDE declined to meet with us but provided a written response. Our findings While the ADDE and IDDE polling paid for by EFB grant money was on topics relevant to UKIP, we did not conclude that it was done to help UKIP, or that UKIP received any of the outputs from the work. Therefore, the polling work was not a donation to UKIP under UK political finance rules. Our analysis and evidence What our analysis showed We saw that the polling work paid for by EFB grant funding was relevant to UKIP's political position in 2015/6. It was carried out in geographical areas of potential strategic significance to UKIP The questions were about attitudes towards the EU The reports drawn up from the polling partly considered the data from a UKIP point of view But we found insufficient evidence that the polls were commissioned to be for the benefit of UKIP and no evidence that UKIP received or benefitted from any of this work. We saw invoices and emails provided by the polling company which showed that the ADDE commissioned and were invoiced for the polls. Those we interviewed gave the same account. We found no other information from any of the entities we approached to suggest the polls were UKIP's polls. The EFB gave us a letter of 2 November 2016 to the European Parliament by the ADDE, sent to object to the EFB's conclusions. It appeared to acknowledge that two of the polls had been 'UKIP polls' for which the ADDE had received the invoice to pay 'in error'. But this was not consistent with the evidence we saw. The ADDE contractors and the founder of the ADDE told us that ADDE and IDDE commissioned the polls in order to spend EFB grant money as efficiently as possible in order to justify more funding. They said that the polls were not designed to cover issues of importance to UKIP. The contractors running the polls said they were largely unguided by the ADDE and were left to pick the issues that interested them. We found no documentary evidence to suggest that any of the data from the ADDE polls was given to UKIP. We asked the contractors who worked on ADDE polling about this. They were both campaign managers for UKIP candidates during the 2015 general election. This was before their involvement in the ADDE polls which began in June 2015. During the general election they worked in constituencies where the polling during February and April 2015 took place, but said that they did not see the polling data while they worked there. Given their campaign manager roles, they said that it was likely they would have known if UKIP had the data because it would have been of potential interest to them. The evidence we looked at The EFB gave us polling data and reports, contracts, and their analysis, as well as internal ADDE and IDDE documents obtained by them and correspondence with the polling company. By using our legal powers we got information from ADDE contractors and from the polling company. This included invoices and further correspondence between ADDE, the contractors and the polling company. UKIP were not able to provide us with significant information in response to the Notice, because they held no documents relevant to the polling. We also got important evidence from the people we interviewed about the polls. We noted the areas where they gave us a consistent explanation, about the reason for the polls, who was involved in agreeing and organising them, and what happened to the polling reports. The Meeting Chair welcomed all to the meeting in particular Alex Attwood, appointed as the new Commissioner for Smaller Parties. The Board noted an update on the Speaker's Committee's 'preferred candidate' for Commission Chair with the process underway. The preferred candidate has now been invited to a session with the Speaker's Committee on Monday 1 March, which will be public. Declarations of interest There were no new declarations of interest. Minutes of the previous Board Meeting (EC 11/21) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 20 January 2021 be approved. Update on elections (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chief Executive, Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance, Director, Regulation and Director, Communications, Policy and Research. The Board noted that we continue to use the objectives for well-run elections in the current public health context to ensure that they can still be delivered, and are continuing to work with everyone across the electoral community to make sure this can be delivered in practice. The Board noted the UK Minister's statement confirming their intention for elections in England and PCC elections in Wales to proceed, and alongside this, the publication of a delivery plan setting out the arrangements for the polls. The Board noted that following statutory consultation with the Commission, secondary legislation has been brought forward to reduce the numbers of subscribers required on nomination papers for those elections taking place across England and for the PCC elections in Wales; this is a sensible change in the circumstances and supports one of our objectives that those who wish to stand for election should have access to reasonable options for completing and submitting the necessary nomination papers that minimise the risk of transmission of the virus to or by them, and appears to have broad support. The Board noted that the main points of concern from the electoral community continue to be around staffing and venues. The progress being made to address these was discussed. It was noted that we've been considering our approach to observing at the polls, ensuring we have sufficient people out on polling day to inform our election reporting while also managing the safety of our staff and recognising the challenges of local authorities in accommodating additional attendees at key election processes. Board members who want to observe on polling day or at a count were invited to indicate their interest so that risk assessments can be completed and practical arrangements made. It was noted that this year we saw 65 new applications to register parties or amend party details, the highest we have ever recorded prior to an event. We will take decisions on all of these before close of nominations. The Board noted that as of 23 February we had considered 15 instances where our intervention was needed to manage the risk of non-compliance. The predominant issue was missing or incomplete imprints on campaign material, with the additional area of digital material in Scotland. In all cases our aim is to support campaigners into compliance, with enforcement action only when appropriate and proportionate. It was noted that voter-facing plans are proceeding to schedule across a range of strands to drive voter registration and support safe participation in the polls. Particular activity is focussed on known under-registered and hard-to-reach audiences, those new to the franchise in Scotland and Wales, and those more at risk from contracting Covid-19. The Board continued to seek assurances around the delivery service of Royal Mail in the context of the pandemic and the extra demand on postal votes expected in the current climate. It was noted that we have a close working relationship with Royal Mail, and will continue regular dialogue throughout the election period and bring any specific issues to their attention.

Resolved: That the oral updates be noted. Business Plan and Main Estimate 2021/22 (EC 12/21) The Board received the report following agreeing an outline approach closely based on previous business plans at the February Board meeting. The Board thanked the report authors for their contribution especially Carol Sweetenham (Head of Projects) for a delivery focussed, diligent paper.

Resolved: That the approach is endorsed of meeting pressures within the original overall funding envelope.

Resolved: That the Board agreed the current and capital budgets as set out in Tables 2 and 3 of the report.

Resolved: That the Board agreed the Business Plan 2021/22 and that this should be submitted to the Speaker's Committee, the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body and the Llywydd's Committee of the Senedd for their approval.

Resolved: That the Board agreed the Main Estimate 2021/22 (with Parliamentary Control Totals set out in Table 4), in line with budgets, and that this should be submitted to the Speaker's Committee for their approval.

Resolved: That the Board delegated authority for the Chief Executive as Accounting Officer, with anything other than minor changes to be in consultation with the acting lead Commissioner (in the absence of a Commission Chair) and the Chair of the Audit and Risk Committee, to amend the Business Plan and Main Estimate in non-major ways to reflect unforeseen developments between approval by the Board and submission.

Regulatory support strategy (EC 13/21) The Board received the report on progress made by the new Regulatory Support team on embedding itself in our proactive compliance work. The Board considered plans to develop a strategy to offer a range of proactive tools and methods to support parties and campaigners comply with campaign finance law. The Board firmly supported the approach and requested to be kept regularly informed of progress.

Resolved: That the Board is content with the proposed approach to and timings for developing the strategy.

Performance report quarter three 2020/21 (EC 14/21) Resolved: That the report be noted.

UK Government Electoral Integrity Bill (EC 15/21) The Board received a report providing an overview of the expected Bill, and of our approach to engaging with the parliamentary process of its consideration. It was noted that the Board would return to this discussion once the Bill had been published. There were several elements of the Bill around content, including likely provisions directly related to the Commission and more broadly how the Commission engages in the process. The Bill and work arising from it from enactment through to the practical implementation of changes in electoral law will be a significant workstream for the Commission over a number of years. Resolved: That the report be noted. Update from the Chair of Audit and Risk Committee (Oral) The Audit and Risk Committee Chair gave a brief update of the last Committee meeting on 23 February 2021, highlighting the following topics: National Audit Office update Risk management Risk Maturity Review Annual review of Risk Framework Risk improvement plan It was noted that a discussion on the Board's understanding of identifying risks is being scheduled in the Board Forward Plan Internal audit – Budget Management and Monitoring Internal audit strategy 2021-2024 Risk deep dive – presentation on Covid-19 risk measures and impact It was noted that the presentation could be shared with the wider Board as it responded to Covid-19 and the impact, thoughtfulness and pastoral care of colleagues with practical implications on the organisation, taking positive lessons learnt from working in a pandemic. Schedule of audit recommendations Government Cards Registers of interests, donations, gifts and hospitality It was noted that the Audit and Risk Committee should not be asked to agree these registers but to note, as the onus is on the individual Commissioner to self- declare. A recommendation was to change the report template to not the report. Resolved: That the work of the Audit and Risk Committee be noted. Chief Executive's update (EC 16/21) The Chief Executive introduced the report, drawing attention to the approved motion recommending the appointment of Alex Attwood as the new nominated Commissioner for the 'smaller parties', the Speaker's Committee process for appointments of a new Commission Chair and that a new Commissioner with lead responsibilities for Northern Ireland, is progressing. The Board noted the annex to this update, on the work which is underway in partnership with other organisations to reach under-registered groups, those new to the franchise and those more at risk from Covid-19. The Board was provided with an update from the General Counsel on discriminatory incidents from members of the public against some staff and the likelihood of similar as we move towards the May polls, with possible heightened emotions. Resolved: That the report be noted. Commission Board action tracker (EC 17/21) Resolved: That the Commission Board action tracker be noted. Forward plan of Board business (EC 18/21) Commissioners asked that we think about more strategic discussions coming to Board with individual Commissioners supporting members of the Executive Team on specific topics. The General Counsel provided an update on the scheduling of the next Board Effectiveness Review. It was decided to defer the review from spring 2021 to autumn 2021 which will give us an advantage of having the new Commissioner Chair in post to provide input into the review and the arranging items of business onto the Forward plan. Resolved: That the forward plan of Board business be noted.

Whistleblowing Policy and Procedure You are in the How we make decisions section

Home How we make decisions On this page Introduction Audience Purpose What is whistleblowing? General principles Who you should contact How to raise a concern The procedure What else may happen Record keeping Anonymity and confidentiality Reporting in good faith Who else you can contact First published: 15 October 2021 Last updated: 15 October 2021

Introduction We are committed to the highest standards of openness, probity and accountability. In line with that commitment, is a recognition that an important aspect of accountability and transparency is providing a mechanism to enable people who believe they have concerns, to voice them without fear of reprisal.

Audience This policy applies to employees, contractors and agency workers and Commissioners. This procedure does not form part of an employee's contract of employment. Consequently, the Electoral Commission – following consultation where appropriate – will make amendments to the policy and procedure when considered necessary. This could be due to an economic, technical (usually statutory) or organisational reason.

Purpose The purpose of the policy and procedure is to:

- provide staff with a mechanism to raise concerns at an early stage in the correct manner
- ensure concerns can be raised confidently without fear of victimisation, recrimination, discrimination or disadvantage
- encourage confidence to raise concerns about practices or procedures
- provide a procedure to raise concerns and receive feedback on any action taken

What is whistleblowing? Whistleblowing is the raising of a concern, either within the workplace or externally, about a danger, risk, malpractice or wrongdoing which affects others. In line with the Enterprise and Regulatory Reform Act 2013 a whistleblower must reasonably believe that any disclosure of information is in the public interest and tends to show one or more of the following:

- a criminal offence has been, is being or is likely to be committed
- a person has failed, is failing or is likely to fail to comply with any of their legal obligations, including a legal obligation that arises from a contract of employment (Parkins v Sodexho Ltd (EAT/1239/00))
- a miscarriage of justice has occurred, is occurring or is likely to occur
- the health or safety of any individual has been, is being or is likely to be endangered
- the environment has been, is being or is likely to be damaged
- information tending to show any of the above matters has been, is being or is likely to be deliberately concealed

General principles Those who in the public interest raise genuine beliefs under this policy will not under any circumstances be subjected to any form of detriment or disadvantage as a result of having raised their concerns. This policy will only apply to whistleblowers where they reasonably believe that the information disclosed and any allegation contained in it are substantially true. If any disclosure is made in bad faith, or concerns information which employees do not substantially believe is true, or indeed if the disclosure is made for personal gain, then such a disclosure will be dealt with under the Commission's disciplinary policy and procedure. The whistleblowing policy is primarily for concerns where the interests of others or the organisation are at risk. Staff who are aggrieved about their personal position must consider the most appropriate policy for raising their concern; a list of other relevant policies is shown in section 15 of this document. If you feel the whistleblowing policy is the most appropriate, it is possible that the initial investigation will recommend your concern be managed using another policy. Reasonable adjustments will be made to support those with a disability to participate fully in any part of this policy and procedure.

Who you should contact In the first instance raise your concern with your manager. If you feel unable to raise the matter with your manager please raise your

- your Director or
- the Head of HR

If you have decided to raise a concern with one of the above people, please say if you want to raise the matter in confidence. If none of the above are appropriate you can raise your concern with the Chief Executive or Chair. If they are involved in the issue then you can contact the Chair of the Audit and Risk Committee, our Internal Auditors or the Comptroller and Auditor General of the National Audit Office. Contact details can be found at the end of this policy. If you do not feel comfortable raising your concerns with any of the persons listed above, you may wish to contact one of the organisations that the Government has designated as a body to which whistleblowing concerns can be raised (a "prescribed body"). See a full list of prescribed bodies, and the matter which they are able to consider. All reasonable attempts should be made to raise the issue through the routes outlined in this policy. Making a public statement or approaching the media on the basis of concerns which have not been researched or investigated, and without exhausting other channels for resolution, has the potential to create general anxiety and may prejudice the outcome of any investigation. It may also mean you lose your right to protection under this policy, so if you have a concern we encourage you to raise it with one of the individuals or bodies listed above. If you would like independent advice, the charity Public Concern at Work will give you free confidential advice at any stage about how to raise a concern. Contact details can be found at the end of this policy.

How to raise a concern

You are encouraged to raise your concern openly as it is important that you feel able to question matters in the workplace and have them addressed. It would be helpful if you could set out some factual basis for the issues being raised. There is no need for you to prove that the breach or failure that you are alleging has occurred or is likely to occur; a reasonable suspicion will suffice - where you reasonably believe that the information disclosed is substantially true.

The procedure

If you have raised your concern openly the matter will be dealt with by your manager. Your manager or the person you contact will conduct an initial interview to discuss the nature of your concern. You may be accompanied by a trade union representative or colleague at any meeting about the disclosure, if you wish to do so. After the interview, you will be asked to sign and date the notes of the meeting to confirm that this is an accurate record of the concerns that you have raised. The person you contact will either keep you updated, or advise you as to who will update you regarding the progress of your concern. However, there may be occasions where this is not possible due to the ongoing investigation or sensitivity of the issue. The interviewer will usually report the matter within five working days to the Chief Executive, depending on the nature of the issue. If the concern is about the Chief Executive the interviewing officer will report the concern to the Chair of the Commission and to the Head of Internal Audit.

RSM Risk Assurance Services LLP are the Commission's Internal Auditors. The Chief Executive (or Chair of the Commission or the Head of Internal Audit, depending on who you raised your concern with initially) will decide on an appropriate course for further action, dependant on the nature of the matter. This further action may be that the matter is: considered internally; referred to the Internal Auditor; the subject of an independent inquiry; referred to external audit. The Chief Executive (or Chair of the Commission or the Head of Internal Audit) will determine a course of action within 10 working days of receipt of the written notification. Some matters may need to be referred to the relevant outside body, such as the Police, again the Chief Executive (or Chair of the Commission or the Head of Internal Audit) will decide. Based on the outcome of an initial review the Chief Executive (or Chair of the Commission or the Head of Internal Audit) will decide if it is appropriate to instigate internal procedures. If the matter does relate more appropriately to grievance, discipline or other procedures the matter will be referred back to the person who raised the concern to determine if they wish for action to be taken using the internal procedures. The Audit and Risk Committee will consider matters raised under this policy and procedure on an annual basis. The Chair of the Audit and Risk Committee should be informed of whistleblowing concerns relating to fraud. A flow chart is available which outlines the key stages in the process. What else may happen If the investigation finds there is a case to be answered then normal disciplinary procedures may apply. The investigation will be objective and evidence based; a report will be produced that focuses on learning lessons to prevent problems recurring. If the investigation recommends any changes to existing working practices, policy or procedure these will be acted upon and the changes communicated to employees. If there is no case to answer but there was a genuine concern without malice or in good faith those involved in your complaint will take all appropriate and necessary action so that there are no reprisals. If an allegation is proven to be false and malicious or in bad faith the matter will be managed in accordance with the disciplinary procedure. Record keeping A written record will be kept of any disclosure. This will include the nature of the disclosure, the notes from the initial investigation meeting, what was decided and what actions were taken as a result. Details of all concerns raised internally and the subsequent investigation will normally be retained for seven years. The purpose of this is to ensure that a central record is kept which can be cross referenced with other complaints to monitor any patterns of concern and assist the Commission in assessing the effectiveness of this policy. Anonymity and confidentiality The Commission understands that disclosures made under this policy may involve highly confidential and sensitive matters and that you may prefer to make an anonymous disclosure. When this is the case we will endeavour to investigate your concerns fully, although a full investigation may be impeded if we cannot obtain further information from you. If you ask to have your identity protected and kept confidential, it will not be disclosed without your consent. If the situation arises where we are unable to resolve the concern without revealing your identity (for example, evidence is needed at court) we will discuss with you how we will proceed. Reporting in good faith Those making a protected disclosure are protected from detrimental treatment by the Commission, by a co-worker or by an agent of the Commission. The Commission is vicariously liable for detrimental treatment. If this occurs, it must be raised immediately with your line manager so that the matter can be investigated thoroughly without undue delay. Detrimental treatment includes, for example, harassment and bullying or not complying with a person's rights and entitlements under his or her contract of employment. Feedback on voter identification pilots | Electoral Commission Search

Feedback on voter identification pilots You are in the May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 24 July 2019 Last updated: 24 July 2019 Feedback on voter identification pilots RNIB "RNIB completely understand and respect the need to make sure that voting processes are secure, but fear that introducing voter ID in its current form is potentially a further way of disenfranchising blind and partially sighted people. RNIB undertook research before the pilot schemes to look at attitudes amongst blind and partially sighted people to providing ID at a polling station and people raised concerns about access to photo ID and the security around taking such documents to the polling station. The biggest concern raised was the lack of driving licenses amongst blind and partially sighted people, meaning that they had fewer options of what they could provide at the polling station. In respect of the pilots that ran during the local elections in May, RNIB expressed concern on several occasions that not enough was being done to communicate to people with sight loss what was required of them when it came to ID and voting – leaflets and printed materials were too heavily relied upon by local authorities, and it was unclear whether adequate equality impact assessments were done as no reasonable adjustments seemed to have been put in place. "One of the biggest concerns that we raised was the use of polling cards as the ID requirement. Residents across the country have been told over a number of years that they don't need their polling card to vote and now that has changed. RNIB has consistently highlighted that polling cards are still inaccessible and often get mistaken for junk mail and put in the bin, so until there are moves to make polling cards more accessible we would not recommend relying on them as a valid voter ID. The feedback that we received on polling day this year was primarily focussed on the continued inaccessibility of voting, and problems that people had found in their polling station, but the comments that we received in relation to was solidly focussed on not knowing that it was happening, and also questions about why in some areas a Freedom Pass/Disabled Persons' Pass couldn't be used as ID. Many people suggested that as some local authorities issue blind and partially sighted people with a registration card that this should be accepted as appropriate ID by polling station staff. We recommend that a wide-range of ID is accepted at polling stations and that when deciding what ID to accept that thought is given to those who are less likely to have a formal ID. "Whilst we know that some people were disenfranchised due to not having the right ID at the polling station and then not coming back a second time, it is difficult to know how many people simply did not even try to vote because they viewed it as too difficult a process. Similarly, we don't know the numbers of people who didn't understand that there was a back-stop provided by local authorities if they didn't have any other ID. For blind and partially sighted people, completing a separate form in order to get permission to vote could just be one more inaccessible barrier to voting in the same way as their sighted peers. Given that there is a government commitment to introducing for elections across the country, we believe more must be done to really tackle the accessibility problems that came up through the pilots undertaken in 2018 so that blind and partially sighted people aren't further disenfranchised from voting. Real effort must be made by local authorities to look at equalities issues when designing their pilot plans, and the government should make accessibility a key part of the way that they evaluate future pilots. "We acknowledge that communications around will be much easier when there is a national standard and one set of ID requirements the same for every local authority, but the government should think now about how to engage with those who are less likely to have formal ID and how their national and local communications around the requirements can reach those who have sight loss." Mencap About Royal Mencap Society and learning disability "We support the 1.5 million people with a learning disability in the UK and their families. We fight to change laws and improve health and care services as well as and access to education and employment. A learning disability is caused by the way the brain develops before, during or shortly after birth. It is always lifelong and affects intellectual and social development. Numbers of people with a learning disability voting Only 31% of people with a learning disability reported that they voted in the 2001 in comparison to 59.4% of the general population had actually voted A study featuring 1600 people with a learning disability across Cambridgeshire found that over 80% had not voted in the 2005 General Election in comparison to 39% of the general population A survey conducted by Mencap in 2014 found that 70% of people with a learning disability say they intended to vote in the 2015 general election However, 60% said they found the process of registering to vote too difficult and 17% said they had been turned away from a polling station Soon to be published research of over 1000 people with a learning disability in Bradford - found that while 86% were registered to vote only 26% cast their vote in the 2015 General Election There are no figures on numbers for the 2017 General Election although research would be helpful to ascertain whether a 'snap election' impacts on participation rates Barriers to voting "People with learning disability have has much right to vote as anyone else. However, multiple barriers prevent people with learning disability from being able to engage in politics, register to vote and vote itself. "Unfortunately, many people working with people with a learning disability, support workers, families and professionals do not understand the law or empower the person they support to vote. In some cases, people with a learning disability are actively dissuaded from voting. Research shows that if families and professionals have the tools and knowledge to support people with a learning disability to make an informed decision and vote, they will in turn do so. "Inaccessible communication remains one of the largest hurdles faced by people with a learning disability with media communications, manifesto and election materials often jargon filled. All of this means that people with a learning disability feel excluded and are therefore less likely to see the value in voting.

"The 2017 Conservative Party manifesto outlined that a future Conservative Government would "legislate to ensure that a form of identification must be presented before voting" . Subsequently, the Cabinet Office was directed to begin work on piloting voter ID in the 2018 local elections. Bromley, Gosport, Swindon, Watford and Woking volunteered to take part in these pilots under the supervision of the Cabinet Office. Each area tested a different set of acceptable ID from simply presenting a polling card to producing a piece of photo ID. Ahead of the pilots each volunteer area put out varying communications regarding the pilot and what ID would be accepted. This included holding shop stalls, producing posters and speaking with local Mencap groups. However, the majority of these communications seemed to take place only a few weeks ahead of the 2018 local elections. We fear this will have left many people with a learning disability unaware of the pilots and their requirements. "On the day of the local elections there were numerous reports of people being turned away from polling stations for failing to show acceptable ID. Subsequently, the BBC revealed that 340 people were turned away from casting their vote. These are only early figures and we await the evaluation being undertaken by the Electoral Commission. Mencap's Concerns "Mencap is extremely concerned that introducing ID at polling stations could inadvertently disenfranchise people with a learning disability. People with learning disability often do not have ID such as a passport as they are unable to travel abroad or cannot afford it. Almost none will have a driving licence and in some cases will not even have access to utility bills or other forms of ID. Danny Brice, a Mencap employee shared his concerns about access to ID in a blog for the Huffington Post ; "I understand the Government want to prevent voter fraud, but it also needs to remember that not everyone has all types of ID. For me, for example, being able to produce my bus pass would be perfect – this is something I always have to hand and a type of ID that many people with a learning disability will already have." Throughout the lead-up to the elections, Mencap raised concerns about the lack of accessible communications about the pilot. Local Mencap groups were only approached by pilot areas at a late stage leaving little room for engagement. Mencap is also concerned about how the results of the pilot's evaluation will be interpreted. To provide a complete picture the evaluation must look at those who voted but also those who didn't to ascertain whether presented an additional barrier to the practical and attitudinal barriers we have detailed above. What we want to see The Government must urgently conduct research to ascertain the types of ID that the 1 million people with a learning disability of voting age in the UK are in possession of and look at the impact that the introduction of compulsory ID at the polling station would have. Rolling out compulsory ID at the polling stations must be accompanied by an accessible communications strategy targeted at people with a learning disability, their families, carers and professionals. There is also an opportunity with any communications strategy to challenge negative attitudes out there which are preventing people from participating. Additionally, we hope the Cabinet Office continues to engage with national and local organisations to better understand the effects of voter ID on people with learning disability. Stonewall "Along with many others, Stonewall raised concerns when the Government announced their plans to pilot a new vote ID scheme for the local government elections on the 3 May 2018. Not only are cases of electoral fraud very rare, we were concerned that a requirement to provide a form of approved ID would create a further barrier to minority groups who may want to vote. For many minority groups, including LGBT, black, Asian and minority ethnic, disabled and homeless people, the complicated and costly process to obtain ID, such as a passport or driving licence, means many simply do not have these documents. Furthermore, trans and non-binary people may have been particularly vulnerable to these ID requirements as the photo on their ID may not reflect their gender expression or identity. Stonewall was deeply concerned that this may lead to confusion or challenges from staff at the pilot polling stations. "Stonewall now urges the Government to reconsider rolling these pilots out as standard and instead work closely with minority communities to understand what can be done to reduce the barriers they face when voting." Labour Party "At local government elections the Government piloted voter ID in five local authorities: Woking, Gosport, Bromley, Watford and Swindon. Those without the required ID on polling day were turned away at the polling station and denied their right to vote. The Labour Party believes in a democracy for the many not the few. We want everyone's voice to be heard, no matter someone's background. Although we welcome the opportunity to submit evidence regarding our experience of the pilots, we fundamentally disagree with the Government's plans to introduce voter ID at polling stations. This submission is made by Cat Smith MP, the Shadow Minister for Voter Engagement and Youth Affairs on behalf of the Labour Party. To inform our response, we invited Labour Councillors, unsuccessful candidates, and election agents to submit evidence of their experience of voter ID in the pilot areas. A solution in search of a problem "The Government intention to introduce voter ID is presented as a solution to tackle the specific issue of voter impersonation. Electoral fraud is a serious crime and every allegation needs to be investigated fully. Indeed, isolated incidents of electoral fraud have taken place and it is vital that the police have the resources they need to bring about prosecution. However, the proposals outlined by the Government are clearly disproportionate. In 2017 there were 28 allegations of impersonation out of nearly 45 million votes cast. This reflects just 1 case for every 1.6 million votes cast. Of these 28 allegations, one case resulted in a conviction. In addition, none of the five boroughs that took part in the voter ID pilots have experienced a single instance of polling station impersonation in the past decade. Trust in our democratic system is vital, which is why strategies to tackle fraud should be based on facts.

Discriminatory measures "The Windrush scandal has demonstrated that it can be difficult for some communities to provide official documentation, which could prevent legitimate voters from taking part in our democratic process. The Electoral Commission itself has reported that 3.5 million electors – 7.5% of the electorate – do not have photo ID. Moreover, in the 2011 Census, 9.5 million people stated they did not hold a passport and in 2013/14 1.7 million people lacked even a bank account. That makes mandatory voter ID – with no free provision – a barrier to many people exercising their right to vote. The Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) warned the Government that voter ID will have a disproportionate impact on voters with protected characteristics, particularly ethnic minority communities, older people, trans people, and people with disabilities. The EHRC also warned that if voters were disenfranchised as a result of restrictive identification requirements, this could violate Article 1 Protocol 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights, as incorporated into domestic law by the Human Rights Act 1998. This significant intervention from the EHRC echoes similar concerns raised by a coalition of over 40 leading charities and academics earlier this year who urged the Government to abandon the pilots. In a letter dated 1st March addressed to the Cabinet Office, the coalition stated that the voter ID pilots presented "a significant barrier to democratic engagement and risk compromising a basic human right for some of the most marginalised groups in society". Anecdotal evidence on polling day suggests that voters who were impacted by the ID requirements were often older people, disabled people, and/or from ethnic minority communities. "We had numerous (10-15) people inform us they would not be able to go and vote due to these reasons when we were canvassing in the run up to the election. These people were often from an ethnic minority background. Particularly in the Canalside ward, where there is a significant population of people of ethnic minority background the turnout dropped from 38.07% to 36.07%." Election Agent, Woking Labour Party "At a Hoe Valley polling station, a blue disability badge was presented as ID - this was not on the list of accepted ID and so was down to the presiding officer's discretion. I was told that this ID was not accepted." Election Agent, Woking Labour Party "One elderly lady in her late eighties using walking aid had one id and poll card but even though staff assisted her as best they could she did not have another valid id and did not return. This lady has probably voted the same way all her adult life and it is some in her generation that could be put off or confused." Councillor June Cully, Leader of Gosport Labour Group "I heard a conversation about a deaf person in the polling station having difficulty with the request to read out the address. I heard comments from people who objected to being asked to read out their address as they did not want others to hear."

Councillor Vanessa Allen, London Borough of Bromley Restrictive measures for replacement ID "The Government claims that voters without required ID in the pilot areas could obtain replacement documentation from their local authority. For example, voters in Bromley, Gosport and Woking could apply for a certificate of identity or a local elector card. However, charities and academics warned that the measures did not go far enough to alleviate the potential risk of disenfranchisement and deterrent to voting. Proof of identity "Voters had to supply proof of identity and proof of residence to process the application for an elector card. In Woking, this required either two pieces of photo ID and one piece of non-photo ID, or four pieces of non-photo ID. This present a somewhat impossible task for voters who do not have the required ID to vote but then are required to supply the same form of identification to apply for an elector card. Attestation "The application required an attestation in writing from a person of good standing in the community. This person must be a registered elector, not a family member, and has not already signed an attestation for or two or more applicants. Anecdotal evidence on polling day suggests this presented a barrier to participation and prevented some voters from taking part in the election. "We know of several people who struggled to obtain a local elector card and some who were unable to and therefore could not vote last Thursday. The reasons for this were due to the difficulty to get a photo attested by someone 'of good standing', a lost birth certificate, etc." Election Agent, Woking Labour Party In person "Voters were required to hand in the application in person at the local council. The typical visit hours would be 8:30am to 5pm, Monday to Friday. This could present significant challenges for working people, as well as people with disabilities or mobility issues who may have difficulty getting to their local town.

Timing "The application process had to be completed by 5pm on Wednesday 2 May 2018. This meant that voters could not obtain replacement documentation on polling day, which presents a significant barrier for voters. Even in the U.S. states of Texas, where they have adopted some of the most restrictive voter ID laws in the US, electors without ID can still cast a "provisional ballot" at the polling station on polling day. Voters are then required to confirm the validity of the vote at a later date. Negligence on behalf of the Government local authorities "S.149 of the Equality Act 2010 (Public Sector Equality Duty) requires a public authority in the carrying out of all its functions to have due regard to the need to eliminate discrimination, to advance equality of opportunity and to foster good relations across the protected characteristics of age, disability, gender, gender reassignment, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief and sexual orientation. The Government claim that each local authority completed an equality impact assessment, which was subject to expert and detailed scrutiny from Cabinet Office, the Electoral Commission and the Association of s. However, there is clear evidence that this has not taken place and most of the local authorities participating in the pilot schemes failed to carry out adequate equality impact assessments (EIAs) on protected individuals in their areas. The Equality and Human Rights Commission have said that they "observed a failure to fully identify all potential impacts on each of the protected groups and/or to provide sufficient mitigation for any adverse impact identified". They also stated that "analysis of the potential impact of the scheme on persons with protected characteristics in a national context was not conducted by the Cabinet Office prior to the introduction of the pilot scheme". This echoes the concern raised by charities and academies who said that the pilot authorities "have failed to carry out adequate equality impact assessments of the pilots on protected individuals in their areas". Bromley London Borough Council "Bromley's EIA considers some superficial negative impacts as a result of the requirement for ID and equally superficial mitigation is suggested to address these. However, the council did not consider in any detail how the needs of those with protected characteristics would be met by the mitigation. It concludes that there will be no adverse impact on those with the protected characteristics of: disability, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief, gender and sexual orientation. No consideration of possible negative impacts were made on those with a disability, protected characteristic of race (including travellers), and those who are homeless. Gosport Borough Council "Gosport's EIA failed to give due regard to the impact the new requirements would have particularly on those with the protected characteristics of Age and Race. There appears to have been no consideration of any potential negative impacts of the changes on these protected groups. No consideration of possible negative impacts on those of different racial backgrounds, different religions and beliefs, and on the homeless. Swindon Borough Council "Swindon's EIA considers a number of negative impacts but states for each that training of Poll Station staff in combination with the Communications Plan will be sufficient to mitigate these negative impacts. The EIA does not explore in much detail the possible negative impacts. Watford Borough Council "Watford's EIA mentioned a number of negative impacts superficially and proposes no mitigation proposed (aside from communications plan) or analysis of likely impacts on those with protected characteristics. Woking Borough Council "Woking's EIA was undertaken in much more detail and negative impacts have been considered for each and mitigation proposed and explained. A flawed pilot scheme "A significant issue with the pilot scheme is that the areas chosen were self-selection. As a result, all the pilots took place in urban areas and most in the South East. This meant that the pilot areas did not adequately represent the groups most likely to be affected by the introduction of voter ID. In addition, none of the trial areas had a significantly older, poorer or ethnically diverse population than the national average who we know are the people most likely to be excluded by voter ID. Because of this, it will be impossible to determine the true impact of voter ID on the wider population. Limitations to the evaluation process "We welcome the opportunity to feed into the Electoral Commission's statutory evaluation process. However, there are a number of limitations to the evaluation: There will be no detailed analysis of the impact of voter ID on different demographics. The evaluation does not include an analysis of the marked registers to understand the effect of the pilots on levels of turnout. Figures collected in polling stations will not be able to capture the number of voters who were put off from entering a polling station altogether because of the new ID requirements. Figures collected in polling stations will not be able to capture voters in neighbouring local authorities who have been put off from voting because of the new ID requirements. Experience on polling day "Despite a number of serious warning signs, the Government decided to pilot discriminatory measures with the full knowledge that voters could be disenfranchised. "One of our councillors informed me that two people were unable to vote in Canalside because they brought incorrect ID (a taxi ID and post office ID, respectively). Another turned up with the correct ID and was refused a ballot paper (rail photocard) - it was not until the elector insisted that the council was called that they eventually were allowed to vote." Election Agent, Woking Labour Party "In Goldsworth Park someone had lost their ID and provided a utility bill instead, which was refused. Several others turned up completely unaware that ID was required. Another provided a blue disability badge that was refused. Some returned later with correct ID to vote." Election Agent, Woking Labour Party "Advised by polling clerk that a family had come to vote but did not have correct whilst mother was being ID advised father tore up poll card and left their son stayed provided correct id and voted."

Councillor June Cully, Leader of Gosport Labour Group “I spoke to one person on the doorstep who had been turned away, he went home and got his ID and returned to vote. I spoke to people on the doorstep who said they would not be voting and included the requirement for ID in their reasons.” Councillor Vanessa Allen, London Borough of Bromley Independent observers found that voters were refused a ballot paper in 21% of polling stations because they did not have the required ID to vote. 1.67% of all voters across the five pilot areas were unable to vote because they did not have the required ID to vote. Based on these figures, the Electoral Reform Society estimated that nearly 4,000 would-be voters were turned away over lack of ID. Conclusion The Labour Party believes in a democracy for the many not the few. We want everyone's voice to be heard, no matter someone's background. Although we welcome the opportunity to submit evidence regarding our experience of the pilots, we fundamentally disagree with introduction of voter ID at polling stations. Objective: Resilient local electoral services You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 On this page What we are working to achieve Work done to achieve this aim Performance indicators Ongoing and future work First published: 4 July 2023 Last updated: 27 September 2023 What we are working to achieve Local electoral services face significant economic, social, and environmental challenges which risk impacting on their ability to deliver well-run elections and referendums. We are working to help local authorities and electoral administrators to respond to these pressures. We are also working to support the consistent delivery of high-quality services for voters, and the development of resilient local electoral services by: setting challenging performance standards for local electoral services providing accessible guidance and support for electoral administrators supporting increased resilience of local electoral services ensuring the electoral system works effectively. Work done to achieve this aim The capacity and resilience of electoral administrators remains a significant challenge. Our May 2022 election reports found that administrators struggled to recruit staff and find suitable venues for polling stations and the count. The Commission called for sufficient clarity on funding to effectively prepare for changes from the Elections Act. The implementation of the Elections Act is having a significant impact on electoral administrators, and we have continued to support their understanding and preparation for these changes. This has included the development of guidance and resources to support implementation of the new provisions, as well as the continued provision of an advice service for local authorities, delivered through our devolved and regional teams. As always, we produced comprehensive guidance on preparing for and delivering the May 2023 elections, designed to support Returning Officers and electoral administrators. Resources were also developed to help local authorities to communicate the new voter ID requirements to their residents. This is an important part of our objective to support local authorities and electoral administrators to deliver effective, sustainable and resilient services. We consulted on new Returning Officer performance standards, which have been designed to provide a robust framework for the delivery of well-run elections, support the effective and consistent implementation of legislative changes, and enable transparent reporting on the delivery of elections. The standards also address the changes arising from the Elections Act. They were finalised and laid in parliaments in December 2022, and are now in place. We have also updated the Electoral Registration Officer (ERO) framework, last reviewed in 2021, to reflect the new responsibilities on EROs arising from the Elections Act. An electoral administrator following May 2022 elections We had significant numbers of staff not taking up their positions again and this seems to be an increasing problem. We were lucky in that our neighbouring authority did not have elections and loaned us a number of staff. If they had also had elections we'd have been struggling to fill vacancies. An electoral administrator following May 2022 elections Performance indicators Indicator Target 2022-23 Accurate advice to Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers, and candidates & agents within three days (Great Britain) 100% 93.35% Publication of accurate and timely guidance products for electoral administrators 100% 100% Ongoing and future work As part of our post-election reporting, we will be gathering data from local authorities and surveying those responsible for delivering elections to understand the impact of the new measures, including how they found implementing voter ID. We will seek feedback to enable us to evaluate our new guidance for Returning Officers and to identify and take on board

any learnings that emerge. We will update our guidance to reflect further changes to elections and electoral registration, including reforms to postal, proxy and overseas voting rules, arising from the Elections Act. We will continue to use the performance standards to support the consistent delivery of high-quality, electoral services for voters and to support the ongoing resilience of local electoral services. We will continue to work with the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board to address challenges around resilience and capacity, including in relation to polling station staffing and suppliers. Association of s, October 2022 We believe the Electoral Commission's statutory work on how to run elections is very effective. It provides excellent guidance, supporting resources and good practice for Returning Officers and electoral administrators. Summary The names of some 4.3% of those on the 'final' register in London were added between December 2015 and 13 March 2016, and a further 2.4% between 13 March and the deadline of 16 April. More than 3,500 postal electors were granted a waiver (0.42% of all such electors); proxies were appointed by over 9,000 London electors (0.17% of the total electorate) with about 550 emergency proxy votes recorded as being issued. Over 860,000 postal votes were issued – 15.0% of the eligible electorate. Some 71.2% of those with a postal ballot returned it. In contrast turnout among those required to vote 'in person' was 42.1%. The proportion of postal votes rejected or otherwise not included in the count was 3.7% compared with 4.6% at the last GLA elections in 2012. Rejection for a mismatch of signature and/or date of birth was three times as common as rejection for incomplete information. Commissioner Day notes: 17 July 2019 | Electoral Commission Search Commissioner Day notes: 17 July 2019 You are in the Electoral Commission Board section Home How we make decisions Electoral Commission Board On this page Apologies Managing regulatory risk First published: 27 November 2019 Last updated: 22 January 2020 Meeting overview Date: Wednesday 17 July 2019 Location: Boothroyd Room, 3 Bunhill Row, London Who was at the meeting Who was at the meeting John Holmes, Chair Sarah Chambers Elan Closs Stephens Alasdair Morgan Rob Vincent Stephen Gilbert Alastair Ross Joan Walley Bob Posner, Chief Executive Ailsa Irvine, Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance Craig Westwood, Director, Communications and Research Kieran Rix, Director, Finance and Corporate Services Louise Edwards, Director, Regulation Dan Adamson, Head of Monitoring and Enforcement Majella La Praik, Head of Registration and Reporting David Meek, Senior Advisor, Governance Apologies Anna Carragher and Sue Bruce gave their apologies. The Chair congratulated Rob Vincent on the recommendation from the Speaker's Committee that his term as Commissioner be renewed. Managing regulatory risk The Director of Regulation introduced the item and gave an overview of the investigative and regulatory work we undertake. We had refreshed our approach in recent years to ensure that our quality assurance framework kept pace with changes to our investigative and regulatory processes. The Regulatory team separated decisions in any process to avoid risk of pre-judgement. It also ensured separation between officers that considered evidence, and provided evidenced recommendations and more senior managers to take decisions. The Board heard about how staff were recruited and trained in the Enforcement team. The Enforcement team sought people with investigative experience and a familiarity with objective decision-making. Like all staff, enforcement staff were required to declare their political interests. Staff were also required to sign a conflict of interest declaration for each individual investigation case, in addition to codes of conduct and information management systems and processes that governed how we manage cases and conflicts of interest. The Board received an overview of the structure of the directorate, and the way the teams were managed so that no individual member of staff made a decision on their own. There were always checks and balances and review by other people during the process. The Chief Executive noted that we reflected best practice across other regulatory and investigative bodies. Consistency and quality were ensured through the use of the Quality Management System, as well as written processes that everyone in the team was familiar with and followed. The Board received a brief summary of recent legal challenges to our findings. This included a small number of challenges to registrations we had processed, and three enforcement cases. The courts had generally concluded, on the basis of our robust recording of decisions and the reasoning that supported these decisions, which left no room for ambiguity, that our findings were legally sound. The Chief Executive explained that the Enforcement team worked closely with the in-house Legal team, and where appropriate with other teams across the organisation. As a result of changes to the sanctions regime in 2010 we had implemented three layers of decision-making (Enforcement Manager – determination of offence; Sanctions Adviser – initial sanction notice; Director of Regulation – final sanction notice). There could be a risk of the perception of partiality, as there was some cross-over in line management and the decision-making, but this was carefully controlled to keep any risks to a minimum. The recent successes that we had achieved in court indicated that suitable checks and balances were in place. The Board discussed the merits of decision-making processes used by other organisations, such as independent panels. We had considered introducing such panels, but it was not deemed necessary at this time. This might be reconsidered if appropriate. The Board commented that the reputational consequences of our regulatory findings could have a greater impact than our fines. There could be issues in determining what cases needed to go to an independent review. There was a discussion on how we could ensure any independent process would be seen as unbiased. The Chief Executive told the Board that the Commission was not subject to institutional bias in favour of finding people guilty of committing an offence. The Board heard that the mind-set of a good investigator was attaining satisfaction from getting to the bottom of a case, rather than a bias towards what that outcome was. The Director of Regulation explained that the team culture and training, and the written procedures, emphasised searching for evidence - including evidence that suggested no offence had been committed. This influenced how we collected evidence and built a case. The Board sought assurance on how staff were insulated from outside pressure applied on the Commission. One way this was managed was by limiting the number of names in the public domain. There was also a concerted effort to match the intensity of case-loads across the team. The Board considered whether some of our public comments might imply that we were pleased to issue fines, and noted that we did try to temper this by emphasising our desire for compliance. We also published investigations where no fines were levelled, but these did not get as much media attention. We did not routinely publicly report on the occasions where we identified compliance needs and where the issue was resolved before an investigation was required. The Board was taken through a case study of how a new party was registered, how that party was monitored, and how monitoring and enforcement of that party's regulated activities would be conducted. The Board heard about an internal quality assurance process for registration which we followed when registering parties, including considering the case for and against registration. The registration officer recommended whether to register the party. This decision was then peer-reviewed, before the written assessment was considered by the Director of Regulation who provided an initial view. An approval board, made up of seven heads from across different teams at the Commission, then provided their considered views as to the decision, which were communicated to the Director of Regulation to make a final decision. The Board heard of the methods we used when monitoring campaigners, and how this monitoring was used to build intelligence reports. These reports could then be used to compare against the returns that we received from parties, to assist with our compliance work. The Board heard about how potential compliance issues were assessed, where a written record was created that can be referred to at a later date. The Enforcement Team manager would usually decide whether the matter should proceed to an investigation. Routinely an investigation would include writing to the party to obtain evidence. We always considered any mitigating circumstances. We considered a sanction once an initial determination of an offence had been made by the Enforcement Team manager. There was a legal process to follow when imposing sanctions. The Sanctions Adviser proposed a sanction and the recipient could make representations before a final decision was taken. The Director of Regulation would not be involved in a case until it was due for his/her review, and would recuse himself or herself from a decision when appropriate. The Board explored how we protected ourselves from accusations of inconsistency in the application of sanctions. We had been challenged by some parties that felt that fines appeared inconsistent, but this was usually explained by differences of fact in the case. We kept records of every case which could be used to help understand previous decisions. Work had begun to ensure that institutional knowledge of past sanctions was not concentrated in individual members of staff. The Board asked about the compliance checks of financial returns from parties, and whether we had a process that ensured that all parties were checked within a given timeframe. The Head of Registration and Reporting noted that we knew which parties we expected to submit a financial return and always checked that those parties had indeed submitted. As part of developing our strategic regulatory approach, we planned to move to more strategic systematic reviews of the compliance of parties. The Chair questioned how we responded to cases which arose from the public or media. The Board heard that over the past 12 years we had gone from the majority of cases being responses to external allegations, to the majority of cases being responses to information we had identified. There would always be allegations that come to light through other means, such as investigative journalism, for example if they had information that we could not reasonably have known. The Board heard that we had a separate process for sharing evidence with the police. The decision to refer a matter to the police was taken by the Chief Executive, on the recommendation of the Director of Regulation and the Legal Counsel. We set out our reasonable grounds for the referral and asked what the police needed from us to take the case forward. The Board heard of our relationships with other regulators to ensure that we kept pace with best-practice. The Board suggested considering using other regulators as peer-reviewers. The Board discussed the requirements for taking on prosecutions. We were building the infrastructure to become a prosecutor. We were also consulting on a prosecutions policy. We had discussed the resource implications of this additional work with the Speaker's Committee. After the end of the discussion on managing regulatory risk, the Board received a brief update from the Chief Executive and the directors on areas of Commission business, including appearances before select committees and devolved legislatures, and publications of reports. There was an update on litigation in which the Commission was involved. The Chair then provided an update on the Four Countries electoral commission conference. Issues discussed included foreign interference, cyber security, digital campaigning and use of social media, voter ID, automation of electoral processes, avoiding undue influence of money, and advance voting. The meeting finished at 4.25pm

Delivering the elections Supporting Evidence Summary This report looks at how the May
what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held in England , Northern Ireland and Scotland . On 5 May elections took place across the 22 local authority areas in Wales. Overall, people were confident that these elections were well-run and were highly satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. Turnout at these elections was lower than at previous comparable elections, and was lowest for voters under 35 years of age. Further education and engagement is recommended to support newly enfranchised voters to understand and participate in Welsh elections. Almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and felt able to get their views across effectively. Voters generally found it easy to access information about the elections, but this did not necessarily translate to them feeling well-informed about the elections and who they could vote for. A notable proportion of candidates told us that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. While robust political debate is part of a healthy democracy, sometimes things go too far and cross the line into threats, abuse and intimidation. When this happens, it is vital that action is taken against those found guilty of these criminal offences. We will work with Welsh Government, the police and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Finally, the late introduction of legislation making changes to the rules for running the elections brought significant additional challenges for Returning Officers and electoral administrators. All relevant Governments need to consider the impact of legislative changes on the administration of elections and commit to legislation being clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with. Voting at the elections The experience of voters at the May 2022 elections Most people were confident that the elections were well-run and the vast majority were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. Almost all found voting in person at a polling station easy to do. Most voters were able to vote using their preferred method and found the ballot paper easy to fill in. Turnout at these elections was lower than at previous comparable elections, and was lowest amongst voters under 35 years old.
Overview On 5 May 2022, there were local government elections across all 22 authorities in Wales. This was the first time that 16 and 17 year olds and foreign nationals resident in Wales were able to vote in local elections. Four local authorities trialled advanced voting at these elections. We evaluated the pilots, and our report - which was published in August - identified several specific areas to be addressed if a further roll out of advanced voting is considered for future elections. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run Satisfaction with the registration and voting process remains high People had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting. Our research shows that: 81% of people across Wales were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. 95% of people who voted were satisfied with the process of voting. 71% of people said they were confident that the elections were well-run; however, 10% were not confident. These figures are broadly consistent with findings following the most recent comparable elections in 2017 and the 2021 Senedd election. Most voters were able to obtain enough information on the candidates Our research shows that the majority of people could obtain information on the candidates standing for election. We found that: 41% of people said it was fairly easy and 18% said it was very easy to obtain the information they required; 19% said it was fairly difficult and 9% said it was very difficult. 45% of people said that they had enough information about the candidates to make an informed decision when voting, but just over a third (34%) tended to disagree. Turnout at these elections was lower than at previous comparable elections In 2022 there was a decrease of 4% in turnout for the local government elections (38%) compared to 2017 (42%). People were most likely to tell us that they didn't vote because of: lack of time/too busy (18%) not interested/fed up with politics (12%) vote wouldn't have made a difference to the outcome/ doesn't count (11%) medical/health reasons not related to COVID-19 (9%) didn't like the candidates/parties/they didn't represent my views (8%) 94% of people who voted said they were able to use their preferred method of voting (in person, by post or by proxy). This figure was lower amongst in-person voters with a disability or health condition (82%). Most people were confident they knew how to cast their vote Nearly all voters (97%) found the ballot paper easy to fill in, and three in four (74%) found it very easy. However, this figure was lower amongst voters with a disability or health issue (67%). Almost everyone who voted by post said that they knew how to complete and return their postal vote and found the postal voting instructions useful: 97% said it was easy to complete and return their postal vote, compared to 3% saying it was difficult Data from electoral administrators shows that: 3.3% of returned postal votes were rejected. The most common reason for postal votes being rejected was that the personal identifiers (signature and/or date of birth) that voters provided on the postal voting statement did not match those that they had provided previously 0.6% of votes cast were rejected at the count. The most common reason for ballot papers to be rejected at the count was because they were unmarked, with this accounting for almost three-quarters (73%) of all rejected ballot papers Changes to postal voting statements did not reduce the postal vote rejection rate In March 2022, Welsh Government, through the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, requested that a trial group of Returning Officers make a change to the postal voting statement to include an additional "today's date" box. The aim was to reduce the postal vote rejection rate due to errors by an elector in providing their personal identifiers (specifically their date of birth). 13 local authorities (out of 22) made this change to the statement. Rejection rate for postal votes 2017 2022 In the trial areas 2.5% 3.3% Not in the trial areas 3.3% 3.1% In the trial areas where the postal voting statement was modified, there was a 0.8% percentage point increase in the rejection rate compared with the most recent comparable elections in 2017. In non-trial areas, there was a 0.2% percentage point reduction in the rejection rate compared with 2017. There is no pattern evident in the data to indicate why this increase may have occurred. We know from our other research that the majority of people who vote by post do so for most elections, so may have become used to using the unmodified version of the form. Welsh Government should consider the available data carefully in making any decision to legislate for permanent changes to the statement. We will also continue to explore ways of improving the electoral system to meet voters' needs. As part of this, we (working alongside the Wales Electoral Coordination Board) will consider evidence about whether changes to postal voting documents or processes could help to reduce the number of postal ballot packs that are rejected at future elections. Further education and engagement is recommended to support new voters to understand and participate in Welsh elections. The Local Government and Elections Wales Act 2021 extended the voting franchise for Welsh local government elections to 16 and 17 year olds and qualifying foreign citizens. To ensure new voters understood this change and knew how to register, we worked with the Welsh Government and partners across Wales to encourage registration and educate new voters about their vote. The Welcome to Your Vote campaign ran for a second time. Ahead of the elections we re-ran our 'Welcome to Your Vote' paid voter registration campaign, targeted at newly enfranchised 16-17 year olds, alongside our 'Got 5?' campaign targeting the whole electorate. Alongside the campaigns, we held awareness raising events including 'Welcome to Your Vote Week' and 'Welcome to Your Vote Day' targeted at each of the newly enfranchised groups. During the campaign period, a total of 38,438 people in Wales applied to register to vote, including 3,596 16-17 year olds and 663 qualifying foreign citizens. 1 The most applications were from citizens of Hong Kong, USA, Turkey and the Philippines. 2 We worked with partners to reach under-registered groups. Alongside our work to encourage newly enfranchised groups to register, we worked with partner organisations to explain the democratic process to other groups who are typically under-registered or disengaged. Our partners included the British Deaf Association Wales, Mencap Cymru, Welsh Women's Aid, Llamau and Gypsies and Travellers Wales. Ahead of the elections, the Welsh Government provided funding to local authorities to recruit Electoral Registration Support Officers, to help improve registration rates among newly enfranchised and under-registered groups. We worked closely with these officers via the Wales Electoral Coordination Board communications sub-group and the Welsh Government registration partnership. This additional resource was welcomed by local authorities and was crucial in delivering key areas of work to local target groups, especially young people. The strongly held opinion of those local authorities that we talked to was that this resource should continue to be made available to ensure that the foundations already laid are built upon and this important work can continue.

Participation by young people is less than in other age groups. Our research shows a clear difference in turnout amongst those under the age of 35 compared to all other older age groups. Approximately 1 in 5 (12,338) newly enfranchised 16-17 year olds registered to vote ahead of this election. 3 More focus on political education is needed. Ahead of the elections, we developed our democratic education work to help young people understand how to get involved in the democratic process. We published updates to our resources for educators, all linked to the current Welsh curriculum. We partnered with The Democracy Box and have been working with the project's young co-creators and focus group participants aged 16-26 to gain feedback on our resources for young people. Feedback from young people and partners involved in our education work has consistently shown: a lack of understanding as to how to participate in our democratic process; a lack of motivation to engage in elections due to insufficient knowledge about candidates, parties and the process in general. Our Public Opinion Tracker 2022 research (carried out in February 2022) also found that: 77% of parents think it's important that children learn the basics about politics, voting and democracy at school; more parents think the information their children get around politics, voting and democracy at school is insufficient (31%) than sufficient (22%). The Democracy Box's Youth Voice evaluation report recommended that: "Democratic education should start young and be embedded into the curriculum, but continue as young people go on to do different things in different places in both formal and informal education settings and beyond." The New Curriculum for Wales aims to support learners to become 'ethical, informed citizens who understand and exercise their human and democratic responsibilities and rights.' There is therefore an opportunity for democratic awareness to be woven consistently through education, rather than being a standalone topic during an election. We will continue to build on the work already delivered by engaging further with young people and educators across Wales, and with the Welsh Government, to identify more themes and topics our resources can address and to provide teacher training. We will work closely with the Welsh Government to ensure our resources can effectively support the delivery of democratic education in schools through the new curriculum. Recommendation 1 Recommendation 1 Welsh Government should consider continuing to provide an additional resource to local authorities to increase registration rates and support participation amongst newly enfranchised and under-registered groups, building upon the work carried out by the Electoral Registration Support Officers. Campaigning at the elections The experience of campaigning at the May 2022 elections s communicated with voters using a number of methods, including printed material, face-to-face and digital campaigning. The majority of candidates felt they were able to get their views across to voters. Traditional campaigning methods (leafletting and canvassing) were the most popular. Transparency around who is responsible for producing online and digital campaign material remains important to voters. Late legislation relating to the nomination forms caused some confusion for candidates, particularly around the declaration of party affiliation. A notable proportion of candidates responding to our survey said that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. In most cases this involved verbal or online abuse, and the majority of instances came from members of the public. We also received reports of poor candidate behaviour from the police. We will work with Welsh Government and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Overview Over 3000 candidates stood at the local elections in Wales, representing 24 political parties as well as 711 independent candidates. Of the 1,233 seats available, 74 candidates were elected without a contest. s were able to engage with voters but some raised concerns about the continued impact of Covid s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and the majority felt able to get their views across effectively. s used a variety of methods to communicate with voters At the 2022 elections, voters reported receiving information from candidates in a variety of different ways including: leaflet from a candidate (56%) leaflet from another source (individual or organisation supporting a candidate) (27%) door-to-door canvassing (15%), which was higher in rural areas (23%) word of mouth (15%) untargeted social media posts (14%) advert on social media (12%) Candidates responding to our survey told us that more traditional campaigning methods were used at these elections: 83% put leafletting in their top three campaigning methods, with 45% of respondents saying it was their most used method. Door-to-door canvassing was also popular, with 30% saying it was their most common approach a substantial number of respondents used social media in their campaigns, though it was primarily to supplement traditional methods, rather than being the main tool. 55% put social media in their top three methods of campaigning, with 8% saying it was their most used method, compared to 40% saying it was their third most used when asked about digital campaigning, free methods were far more popular than any paid-for digital methods. 56% of respondents put posts on social media, and 25% asked supporters to share their posts. The most popular paid-for digital campaigning was adverts on social media, although this was utilised by just 7% of respondents around a third (30%) of respondents said they did not use any digital campaigning Covid continued to have an impact on campaigning Our research showed that Covid continued to have some impact on campaigning. According to candidates who responded to our survey, 65% felt that they were able to effectively get their views across to voters, while 9% disagreed. However, the majority of candidates reported that Covid affected their campaigns in some way, specifically: 60% said that Covid impacted their ability to enlist volunteers 'a lot' or 'a little', and over half (55%) said that fewer opportunities for face-to-face campaigning impacted their campaign to some degree 45% said that concerns about their own health impacted their campaign in some way People want to know who is responsible for producing campaign material Our research confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections. Transparency about who is producing election campaign material is important to build trust We found that: three in five adults in Wales say it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online almost half of respondents (49%) said they would trust digital campaign material more if they knew who produced it 40% feel that they cannot currently trust the political information that is available online, whereas only 14% said the information online was trustworthy The UK Government has introduced legislation that will require most campaigners to include information to identify themselves as part of their online campaign material. This new digital imprint requirement will help voters understand who is paying to target them online at future elections and referendums. We will monitor any impact of these new requirements on people's levels of confidence in political information online. Recommendation 2 Recommendation 2 We continue to recommend that Welsh Government ensures that a digital imprint regime is in place in advance of the next set of scheduled elections in Wales. Late legislation caused confusion for some candidates standing for election Two issues have been identified where late legislative changes made ahead of these elections affected candidates. Changes to the nomination process caused confusion The first change was a declaration of party affiliation, where candidates must now declare whether they have been a member of another political party within the 12 months leading up to the day on which the notice of election is published. This caused confusion for some candidates, who either failed to complete this section or completed it incorrectly. This issue is covered in further detail in the Delivering the elections section of this report. The second change related to the use of joint descriptions on the ballot paper. The new legislation permitted two parties to use a joint description on the ballot paper which must include the full registered names of both parties involved. The law for Senedd elections and other UK-wide elections is different, and allows for the use of joint descriptions that are registered with the Electoral Commission and which identify the parties involved but don't necessarily include the full registered party names. At the local government elections, these registered joint descriptions were not permitted under the new legislation. Recommendation 3 Recommendation 3 Welsh Government should review the legislation around joint descriptions ahead of the next scheduled local elections, to allow for registered joint descriptions to be used on the ballot paper, in line with the position for Senedd elections and other elections across the UK. We provided support to candidates throughout the election process We attended candidate sessions at party conferences and stand-alone virtual events, to provide candidates and agents with information on the rules for the elections from the nomination process through to the reporting of campaign spending. We also arranged a bespoke virtual session for independent candidates, and attended local authority briefing sessions to ensure that we were able to provide as much support as possible prior to the nomination period and through to polling day. Increasing opportunities for supporting candidates and parties. We also introduced virtual post-poll advice surgeries for candidates and agents who wanted to ask specific questions. These sessions were popular and the feedback has been positive. Feedback included: almost three quarters of candidates (73%) agreed that the law on election spending and reporting was clear. A fifth (20%) either said they didn't know or neither agreed nor disagreed, and 7% disagreed just under two thirds (64%) agreed that the law on donations and how to check permissibility was clear, compared to 6% who disagreed. 69% found the law about personal expenses clear, while 6% disagreed. Threats, abuse and intimidation continue to be an issue during elections. 3 in 5 candidates who responded to our survey (60%) said that they did not have a problem with threats, abuse or intimidation; however, 40% experienced some kind of problem and 8% experienced a serious problem. Our research found that: of those that said they experienced some kind of abuse, the most common sources were verbal (69%) and online (46%) over two thirds (69%) said the abuse they experienced came from members of the public. Almost 2 in 5 (39%) said they received abuse from other candidates, while 15% received threats or abuse from campaigners or volunteers. 16% witnessed threats or intimidation towards those campaigning on their behalf of those who experienced or witnessed abuse, 15% said they reported it to the police, and almost a fifth who experienced threats or abuse said that their experience would discourage them from standing in the future. We have received information from the four police Single Points of Contact (SPOCs) in Wales regarding issues experienced during the election period. In general, it was reported that some candidate behaviour was poor, particularly on social media. The police have said that: "The behaviour shown by some candidates at the local elections in May was completely unacceptable." The SPOCs have proposed that they, on behalf of the police forces in Wales, create some guidance for candidates and campaigners on expectations around behaviour during an election period, and that this should be provided to all candidates as part of the nomination process. This new guidance would sit alongside the resources already available on the College of Policing website relating to candidates, and the Code of Conduct for campaigners. We will work with the relevant police forces and SPOCs in the development and support of this material. We will work with Welsh Government and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation and to develop effective responses to protect candidates and campaigners at future elections.

The elections were well run across Wales, but issues with the capacity and resilience of elections teams, coupled with the high recent turnover of Returning Officers created challenges. The late introduction of legislation making changes to the rules for running the elections, brought additional challenges for Returning Officers and administrators. This could be avoided if all legislation relating to electoral events is clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with.

Overview

Local authority elections teams were responsible for managing electoral registration, candidate nominations, absent voting, polling stations and the counting of votes. Our evidence shows that the May 2022 polls were well-run, and voters and campaigners reported high levels of satisfaction and confidence. For Returning Officers and electoral administrators, however, these elections presented significant challenges, with one notable issue being the lack of time available to plan as a result of the late introduction of new legislation. There also remain underlying issues relating to the capacity and resilience of election teams. These challenges were felt most strongly in local authorities where capacity was more limited, or in some cases where there had been a recent change of Returning Officer or Electoral Services Manager. However, with considerable diligence and effort, together with support from the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, local authorities were able to deliver the polls successfully, albeit under pressurised circumstances. The timing of legislative changes meant Returning Officers lacked the certainty they needed to plan. The Welsh Government undertook a review during the summer of 2021, which resulted in the introduction of legislation providing a new set of rules for the local government elections in May 2022. The Local Elections (Principal Areas) (Wales) Rules 2021 and The Local Elections (Communities) (Wales) Rules 2022 came into force on 14 December 2021. The changes in the rules meant, that for the first time, candidates: did not require the signatures of supporters (apart from one witness) could choose not to have their home address shown on the ballot paper had to disclose previous party membership (within the last 12 months) could submit their nomination electronically Changes were also made to the disqualification criteria which meant that you could stand as a candidate at a local authority election if you were a paid officer or employee of that local authority, but had to resign your post if elected. In March 2022 the new rules were amended by The Local Elections (Miscellaneous and Consequential Amendments) (Wales) Regulations 2022. These amendments were made partially in response to comments received during the short period of consultation on the substantive rules, but also to add provisions that were necessary to support the advance voting pilots in four local authority areas. 4 The late introduction of the new rules created challenges for administrators in preparing for the elections, as well as for us in producing guidance and resources to support them. The key impact was on the nomination forms, which we could not make available until 18 February when the amending legislation had been laid. Electoral administrators who responded to our survey said they found that the introduction of legislation so close to the elections made it difficult for them to plan effectively. Specifically, they reported that the lateness of nomination forms impacted on the availability of guidance and the briefings they could offer for candidates. "Legislation was too late for the local elections. Our candidate briefings started in January and legislation came through late December. How are we supposed to encourage candidates to come forward and stand for election when we don't know the rules and processes well enough in advance particularly given the potential scale of changes that were being proposed?" - Returning Officers need early clarity to be able to deliver significant changes introduced by new legislation Returning Officers need early clarity to be able to deliver significant changes introduced by new legislation Significant reform is expected in Wales over the coming years, which will present new challenges for electoral practitioners in Wales. This includes new policies expected to be introduced by Welsh Government as well as changes arising from the UK Government's Elections Act 2022. Governments need to ensure there is effective planning, management and communication with the electoral community around new legislation and avoid significant delays and short notice changes. Recommendation 4 Recommendation 4 We once again urge Welsh Government to ensure that all legislation relating to electoral events is clear (either by Royal Assent to primary legislation, or by laying secondary legislation for approval by the Senedd) at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with. We also call on the UK Government to ensure the legislation is clear at least six months before any changes in the Elections Act 2022 are going to be implemented so that Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and electoral administrators have enough time to prepare. Failure to do this creates significant risks to the delivery of well-run polls and public confidence in elections. It means that electoral administrators are put under intense pressure, with the successful delivery of elections then relying on their goodwill to work additional hours during the pre-election period, which is not sustainable. It also impacts directly on candidates and agents, who have less time to familiarise themselves with the process. Resilience and capacity in election teams remains a significant challenge In previous reports we have highlighted our concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in Wales. The high turnover of Returning Officers continues and increases the risks to the delivery of well-run polls. The support provided by the Wales Electoral Coordination Board through its events and mentorship scheme was appreciated by new Returning Officers. "The personal support I received from my mentor and other experienced Returning Officers in my region was extremely useful. I also found the support from the Wales Electoral Coordination Board very useful, particularly for making me aware of the critical issues across Wales, and offering solutions." Returning Officers and electoral administrators who responded to our survey said the resilience of electoral services was still an issue, but that these elections were more straightforward to manage compared with the challenge of delivering the Senedd election in 2021. There was an issue in Denbighshire where a printing error was made in the instructions on how to vote, which were sent out to 16,000 postal voters. When the problem was identified, action was taken to contact those voters affected to provide them with the correct instructions. While the number of voters who received incorrect instructions was significant, the number of postal ballot papers re-issued because of the error was small (15). We recognise the pressures faced by Returning Officers and their teams, particularly where officers are new and inexperienced. It is important, however, that voters, candidates and political parties can have confidence in the election process and that the election material they receive is accurate. Following the polls, the Returning Officer in Denbighshire and his team have reviewed how the error had occurred and their processes for dealing with it, and have made a commitment to improving processes in the future. We have also provided advice to the Returning Officer and his staff to support them in improving their proofing processes for future elections. Returning Officers struggled to recruit enough staff to work in the polling station Recruiting staff to work at the elections in some areas was a problem. Two thirds of administrators who responded to our survey said that recruiting enough suitable staff for polling stations was an issue. In certain cases, administrators reported having to recruit Presiding Officers with limited or no experience of the role in order to ensure polling stations could be staffed appropriately. Also, administrators highlighted that a number of people who had previously undertaken the Presiding Officer role had said they were no longer interested in doing so. Administrators also said they believe this will continue to be an issue, limiting the number of experienced people who will be available to work at each set of polls. The Electoral Commission will continue to work with the Wales Electoral Coordination Board and the wider electoral community across the UK to discuss and identify solutions to the staffing, resilience and capacity challenges experienced by Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and their teams as well as in recruiting sufficient polling station staff. Effective planning and support helped Returning Officers to deliver the elections The Wales Electoral Coordination Board played an important role supporting Returning Officers and electoral administrators and promoting consistency As at previous recent elections, the Wales Electoral Coordination Board played an important coordination role for these elections, supporting local authorities by holding all-Wales briefing events for Returning Officers and Electoral Services Managers in the autumn of 2021 and spring of 2022. The Board, which was established in 2017, operates on a voluntary basis to co-ordinate the planning for all-Wales electoral events and activity related to electoral modernisation and reform. As well as this, the Board supports collaboration between Regional and Local Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and key partners in Wales. Those who responded to our survey said they felt that the Board's role was sometimes confusing and that communication could be improved. If the Board was made statutory, as recommended in our reports on elections in Wales in 2017 and 2021, we believe this would begin to address these concerns.

National agreement was reached on holding the count the day after the poll rather than overnight. The Wales Electoral Coordination Board had early discussions about the timing of the count, and sought consensus from across Wales. In January 2022, with the support of the main political parties, the Board recommended to all Returning Officers in Wales that the count should take place on the day after polling day and not overnight. This recommendation was implemented across Wales. Similar to feedback received at the Senedd election in 2021, we heard from administrators that daytime counting was a success, and was appreciated by candidates and election staff. It made staffing the count easier and was reported to have improved the overall atmosphere.

Welsh Government should strengthen the Wales Electoral Coordination Board and place it on a statutory footing, which will enable it to play an enhanced role in the delivery of future elections and electoral reforms in Wales. New nomination forms and electronic submission processes made the process easier for candidates but created administrative challenges. New legislation changed the nomination forms for the local elections, and candidates were also able to submit them to Returning Officers electronically for the first time. Legislative changes to the nomination forms caused confusion and created extra work for administrators. While the nominations process generally ran smoothly and provided candidates with different ways to submit their nomination papers, feedback from electoral administrators highlighted issues with the nomination forms and the electronic process for submission. For example: the processing of electronic nominations forms added to the workload at a point when time is limited many candidates submitted nomination forms electronically very close to the deadline making it difficult for any issues to be addressed. The forms were felt to be repetitive and not straightforward to complete. “Online applications were a double-edge sword. It made it relatively easy for candidates to submit papers at a time of their choosing and removed the need for them to come into the office to hand them in. At a time when we are extremely busy with nominations, minor errors on the form that could be corrected in seconds in the office, could take a couple of days to resolve via emails.” Through the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, work is currently underway to identify improvements to the nominations process that could be introduced for future elections.

Statement of party affiliation

The new rules also made changes to the nomination forms requiring candidates to provide a statement confirming whether they had been a member of any registered political party during the period of 12 months ending with the day when the notice of election was published (defined as ‘the relevant period’) and, if so, to provide details of this membership. At the end of March 2022, administrators expressed to us that there was confusion around the information they needed to transfer from the nomination forms to the statement of persons nominated, which they would then make publicly available. If the legislation had been in place earlier, and more time given to consultation with those affected by the changes, this issue may have been avoided. To address the confusion, we issued supplementary guidance to Returning Officers and Electoral Services Managers advising them to only extract and include information from the statement of party membership relating to the relevant period. We also advised Returning Officers and Electoral Services Managers to remind candidates and agents, during the informal check stage, of the specific circumstances under which they needed to include details on their statement of party membership. We are working with Welsh Government to minimise the potential for misunderstanding in future and will consider further additions to our guidance to provide additional clarity. May 2019 voter identification pilot schemes You are in the Voter identification pilots section Home Our research Voter identification pilots In this section 1. Our findings 2. Impact on voters: experience 3. Impact on voters: confidence 4. Impact on security 5. Impact on administration of the polls 6. Background to our evaluation Summary At the local elections, people in ten areas had to show proof of who they were (ID) before they could vote in a polling station. We looked at what happened in these areas and have explained what we found. What we found We found that a large majority of people already have access to the forms of ID used in these pilots. We also found indications that some groups of people can find it harder than others to show ID. There were no significant issues in any pilot area with the administration of the election. The experience of taking part in the pilot scheme appears to have had a positive impact on people's perception of the security of the polling station process. The pilots have provided further evidence, but they do not allow for definitive conclusions to be drawn in all areas; several important questions remain about how an ID requirement would work in practice, particularly at a national poll with higher levels of turnout. Before introducing a requirement for elections in Great Britain, the Government and Parliament should consider carefully the available evidence about the impact and proportionality of different approaches on the accessibility and security of polling station voting. This evaluation Voters at polling stations in Great Britain do not need to show ID to vote. At the May 2019 local elections, the UK Government asked for volunteers amongst Returning Officers, to run pilots to test requiring people to show ID at polling stations. Ten areas agreed to run pilots: in two areas, people had to show a specified form of photo ID; in five areas, they could choose to show either a specified form of photo ID or two pieces of specified non-photo ID; and in three areas people could show either their poll card or a specified form of photo ID. This is the Electoral Commission's independent evaluation of the 2019 pilot scheme. It explains what we found to be the impact of asking people to show ID in these elections. Our evaluation follows a smaller scale voluntary pilot scheme at the 2018 local elections, which we also evaluated , and the existence of a photo ID requirement for voters at polling stations in Northern Ireland since 2003.
