You are in the Our responses to consultations section Home Our responses to consultations On this page The current position Practical issues of prisoner voting Cross-border issues arising from prisoners from Wales being imprisoned in England Special considerations for young offenders in custody if the franchise is extended to 16 and 17 year olds generally Example of an existing special category of elector – service voters Other countries' approaches to prisoner voting: Canada First published: 7 January 2019 Last updated: 29 August 2019 Overview This response sets out our views on the Equality, Local Government and Communities Committee of the National Assembly for Wales' inquiry into voting rights for prisoners. We are responding to this consultation as part of our statutory role to keep electoral law under review and to recommend changes where we think they are needed. We take no view on whether prisoners should be entitled to vote or not. This is a matter of constitutional policy which is for the National Assembly to determine. Our response therefore focuses on the practical implications should prisoners in Wales be given the right to vote. Any legislation should be commenced no later than six months prior to the beginning of the annual canvass. This would give Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) sufficient time to plan and implement the changes, both for the canvass and for related public awareness activities. The current position The Welsh Government and Assembly Commission are currently considering whether certain prisoners from Wales should be able to vote in local government and National Assembly for Wales elections and have previously consulted on this issue. Under existing legislation, prisoners who are detained are not entitled to be registered to vote because they are legally incapable of voting. However there are some prisoners who are currently eligible to vote: Unconvicted prisoners (i.e. those on remand) Convicted but unsentenced prisoners Persons imprisoned for contempt of court or under Prison Rule 7(3) 2. Those serving a term of imprisonment in default of payment of a sum of money, adjudged to be paid on conviction Practical issues of prisoner voting Eligibility The Welsh Government is currently considering whether to prescribe the criteria for prisoners to be eligible to vote to include for example length of sentence, nature of offence and proof of having previously resided in Wales. As residence is one of the main criteria for electoral registration, consideration will need to be given to the address in respect of which prisoners would be registered. For example if any eligible prisoners were registered to vote at the prison address, this could mean that registered prisoners make up a significant proportion of the electorate in the ward where the prison is located. As prisoners are only present at the prison address as a result of their sentence, an alternative option would be for prisoners to register at a previous or intended address. An existing category of electors who are not living at their usual UK address are service voters. In paragraph 27 we outline the process for registering service voters. A similar approach could be replicated for registering prisoners. EROs will need to be able to establish whether a prisoner is eligible to register, as it is possible that not all prisoners will meet the eligibility criteria. For example, the National Assembly may choose to enfranchise only those prisoners serving sentences of less than a determined length, or to retain the voting ban for prisoners serving sentences in relation to specified offences. In that case, details of an individual's prison sentence would need to be confirmed in order to determine if they are eligible to vote. To clearly and simply establish eligibility it might be helpful to develop a specific 'application to register form' for prisoners. This could be similar to the application to register as an anonymous elector or a declaration of local connection, the latter of which is used for remand prisoners and includes an attestation requirement. If EROs need confirmation of the length or other details of a sentence, this could be provided through some form of attestation. The level of prison staff who could attest these applications could be prescribed, as it is for certain police ranks in relation to anonymous registration. The prescribed level should be low enough that the registration process is not reliant on too few people but high enough that the attester will be aware of who can and cannot register, and would carry sufficient authority. There is a risk that prisoners won't have access to the information required in order to verify their identity as part of their application to register to vote, such as their national insurance number or any other documentary evidence. Consideration would therefore need to be given to alternative ways for prisoners to verify their identity so that they can register. The method by which prisoners would cast their vote In a polling station The setting up of polling stations in prisons would logically be very difficult and require significant resourcing. For example, making sure that all prisoners were issued with the correct ballot papers for their registered address, and that the completed ballot papers were returned to the correct wards or constituencies ahead of the count would be difficult to deliver in practice. If polling stations were set up in prisons, consideration would also need to be given to how to maintain the integrity of the voting process, ensuring that the voter can cast their vote in secret. In addition, all voter materials and the ballot boxes would need to be kept secure at all times. There are questions around who would run the polling station and how they would be trained. Given the practical challenges highlighted above, we do not recommend that polling stations are set up in prisons. This would therefore mean that prisoners would need to rely on absent voting methods, such as postal voting or voting by proxy.

Currently, prisoners on remand are classified as special category electors, and are only able to vote by post or proxy. By post There is a relatively short window between the issue of postal ballot packs by Returning Officers and the deadline for returning a completed postal ballot in time for it to be counted. The HM Prison Service - Wales would therefore need to ensure that their current arrangements for processing prisoners' mail would enable prisoners to receive and return their postal ballots within the necessary timeframe. If prisoners are entitled to vote by post, we would expect there to be necessary safeguards in place so that they can complete their postal ballot pack in secret. This may be achieved through including specific wording in the legislation or receiving an assurance from the prison service this will happen. By proxy If prisoners are able to vote by proxy they should not be required to have their application attested, as is the case for overseas and service voters. This is because by nature of being in prison the voter has a sufficient reason for not being able to attend their polling station. Information provision If some prisoners are in future eligible to vote at elections in Wales, it will be important to ensure they know that they can vote and how to register and cast a vote. The Commission would expect to work with governments and the prison service to explore how an awareness programme for prisoners would be delivered to enable this. Prison officers would need to be trained so they can support prisoners, and signs on voting rights and how to register to vote and vote could be displayed in relevant areas of the prison. Prisoners who are disabled or who have any learning difficulties should be able to receive help to complete forms if they ask for it. We would be happy to explore with the prison service the practical steps they could take to support prisoners to vote and advise on the materials that they could use to raise awareness. Access to campaign arguments If prisoners are eligible to vote at elections in Wales they must have access to information about the policies of candidates, parties and other campaigners so they can make an informed decision when they vote. The prison service would need to consider how this would be delivered.

Cross-border issues arising from prisoners from Wales being imprisoned in England As residence is one of the main criteria for registration there will need to be careful consideration about how to register people who have previously been resident or registered to vote in Wales but who are serving a prison term in a prison in England, Scotland or Northern Ireland. If prisoners were registered at the prison address, this could have a disproportionate impact on the electorate in the ward in which the prison is located. It would also mean that Welsh prisoners in prisons in England would not be able to vote in Welsh elections. Allowing prisoners to register in respect of a previous or intended address in Wales could help address this issue.

Special considerations for young offenders in custody if the franchise is extended to 16 and 17 year olds generally We are aware that the Welsh Government intends to legislate to extend the franchise for National Assembly and local government elections in Wales to include 16 and 17 year olds. This means that the local government register will include 16 and 17 year olds as full electors. Additionally, 15 year olds and some 14 year olds will be entitled to be included on the register as 'attainers'. If the franchise is extended further to include prisoners, information and support would need to be made available to 15, 16 and 17 year-olds in custody by the prison service about entitlement to register to vote, and to encourage them to apply to register online. Example of an existing special category of elector – service voters The current process for registering HM Forces as service voters is an example of a system used for registering a specific group of people who are not living at their usual UK address. HM Forces service voters complete a service declaration which states either the address where they are living in the UK, the address where they would have been living if they are serving abroad, or if they do not have either, an address at which they have lived in the UK. The application to register as a service voter is prescribed and differs from the standard registration application form. All applications to register are processed by the ERO who determines if the applicant is entitled to be registered. If they are, information on postal and proxy voting is generally provided to them as they are likely to be unable to vote in person. In the case of service voters, each unit of the services has a designated member of staff who acts as the Unit Registration Officer (URO). Each base commander gives assistance to the URO and other personnel in their unit to promote participation in the electoral process. HM Forces service voters are listed as 'other electors' on the register when they no longer have a connection to their qualifying address. Other countries' approaches to prisoner voting: Canada Canadians who will be 18 years of age or older on polling day, and who are in a correctional institution or a federal penitentiary in Canada, may vote by special ballot in an election or referendum. In each institution a staff member is appointed liaison officer and facilitates the process of registering and voting. For electoral purposes, the incarcerated elector's place of ordinary residence is not the institution in which he or she is serving a sentence. It is either: his or her address before being imprisoned the address of a spouse, common-law partner, a relative or dependant of the elector, a relative of his or her spouse or common-law partner or a person with whom the elector would live if not incarcerated; the place of his or her arrest; or the last court where the elector was convicted and sentenced. To register to vote, the incarcerated elector must fill out an 'Application for Registration and Special

'Ballot' form, which is returned to the liaison officer, who validates it. During a general election or referendum, eligible prisoners vote in their prison on the tenth day before polling day. A polling station is set up from 9am and remains open until all those who wish to vote have done so, but closes no later than 8pm. The elector is responsible for sending their ballot paper to Elections Canada no later than 6pm on polling day. They can either send it themselves or leave it with the deputy returning officer to forward by special arrangement. The ballot papers of prisoners are counted at the same time as those of other residents temporarily absent from their electoral districts. At the end of polling night, special ballot votes are added to the total results for each district. Further information is available on the Elections Canada website . May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes | Electoral Commission Search

May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes You are in the Voter identification pilots section Home Our research Voter identification pilots In this section

Background Impact on voters Impact on electoral administration Impact on public confidence Impact on security Our recommendations Summary of identification requirements Feedback on voter identification pilots Pilot area evaluations Our findings This report sets out what we found when we looked at the results of the May 2018 pilot schemes. It also looks beyond these pilot schemes at the implications for the future, and what we think the UK Government should do next. Overall, the voter identification requirements trialled in May 2018 worked well. Nearly everyone in the five pilot scheme areas who went to vote in their polling station was able to show identification without difficulty. The number of people who did not vote because they couldn't show identification was very small. Our findings People in the areas where the pilot schemes took place were significantly less likely to think that electoral fraud took place than people in other areas with elections in May 2018. Returning Officers and their staff in polling stations were able to run the new processes well and without any significant problems. These pilot schemes have provided useful and important initial evidence about how a voter identification requirement in Great Britain might work in practice. They have also highlighted areas where further work is needed, because there is not yet enough evidence to fully address concerns and answer questions about the impact of identification requirements on voters. The authorities in England that took part in the 2018 pilot schemes were not sufficiently varied to be representative of the different areas and groups of people across the rest of Great Britain. This means that we can't be sure whether people in other areas would have problems showing identification. We also know from previous analysis and feedback from other organisations such as Mencap and RNIB that some groups of people may find it harder than others to show a passport, driving licence or travel card as part of a photo identification scheme. We have some limited evidence from these pilots that younger people and those who don't always vote were less likely to say that they would find it easy to show identification. More work is needed to make sure these people can easily get the right kind of identification to be able to vote. When the UK Government invited local councils to run pilot schemes in May 2018, it also said that it was open to looking at piloting in future elections. We agree that it would be helpful to collect more evidence from further pilot schemes at elections in 2019. These pilots have shown that there may be several different ways of delivering a voter identification scheme in Great Britain. The UK Government should now focus on what further evidence they need to answer questions and address concerns about the more detailed impact of a voter identification requirement, and how the design of future pilot schemes will help to provide that evidence. We have identified some important lessons from the 2018 pilot schemes in this report and made recommendations for further work and future pilot schemes. These recommendations would help provide the best possible evidence base for any decisions about identification requirements for voters at polling stations in Great Britain. Our main recommendation is that the UK Government should encourage a wider range of local councils to run pilot schemes in May 2019. These should include a mixture of rural areas and large urban areas, and areas with different demographic profiles. This would help make sure there is more detailed evidence about the impact of voter identification on different groups of people. Our aim, which we anticipate you share, is to maintain the Commission's current independence and its accountability to all parties elected to the parliaments of the United Kingdom. Reflecting the significance of this matter, this letter is signed collectively from the full board of the Commission, save for Lord Gilbert of Panteg (our Conservative nominated Commissioner) because the House of Lords where he sits is now considering this legislation. It is our firm and shared view that the introduction of a Strategy and Policy Statement – enabling the Government to guide the work of the Commission – is inconsistent with the role that an independent electoral commission plays in a healthy democracy. This independence is fundamental to maintaining confidence and legitimacy in our electoral system. If made law, these provisions will enable a government in the future to influence the Commission's operational functions and decision-making. This includes its oversight and enforcement of the political finance regime, but also the advice and guidance it provides to electoral administrators, parties and campaigners, and its work on voter registration. The Statement would place a duty on the Commission to have regard to the government's strategic and policy priorities and to help the government to meet those priorities. The Statement would also place a duty on the Commission to have regard to guidance issued by the Government relating to any of its functions. It would thereby provide a mechanism, driven by the then governing party, enabling that party's ministers to shape how electoral law is applied to them and their political competitors. While the stated position of the current government is that it would not intend to use these powers to impact on the Commission's independent oversight and regulation of the electoral system, no such assurances can be given about how the broad scope of these powers would be used over time. The Statement has no precedent in the accountability arrangements of electoral commissions in other comparable democracies, such as Canada, Australia or New Zealand. Indeed, the Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters of the Venice Commission, of which the UK is a member, states that "Only transparency, impartiality and independence from political motivated manipulation will ensure proper administration of the election process". The Commission's accountability is direct to the UK's parliaments and should remain so, rather than being subject to government influence. The current mechanism for scrutiny and accountability to UK Parliament – with parallel arrangements in the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd – is through the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, a cross party committee which scrutinises the Commission's financial, operational and strategic planning. This is appropriate and we would welcome such additional scrutiny as the Speaker's Committee saw fit to take into account government and other views on the priorities and performance of the Commission, in determining that the Corporate Plan and work of the Commission is focussed and delivers on its statutory obligations. This would meet the Government's stated objective of more effective and full accountability to Parliament, while maintaining a cross party setting. We therefore urge the Government to think again about these measures, to remove the provisions, and to work with the Commission and Speaker's Committee to ensure that suitable accountability arrangements are in place to ensure confidence across the political spectrum. Strong accountability is essential for this, but so too is demonstrable independence. The Commission's independent role in the electoral system must be clear for voters and campaigners to see, and preserved in electoral law.

We have included summary financial information within the performance report. This is consistent with the financial statements, where more detail is available. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) established the Electoral Commission. We are independent of governments and political parties and directly accountable to the UK, Scottish and Welsh Parliaments. We have prepared our 2022/23 Annual Report and Accounts in accordance with an accounts direction, set out on page 166, issued by HM Treasury under paragraph 17 (2) of Schedule 1 PPERA. We have prepared the powers and sanctions report on page 51 in accordance with paragraph 15 Schedule 19(b) and paragraph 27 Schedule 19(c) PPERA. Preface Foreword It has been a very busy year for the Electoral Commission in its work to support stakeholders in every part of the UK. I would like to thank all the staff of the Commission for their dedication, professionalism and expertise in providing independent and impartial advice and guidance to voters, administrators, and the regulated community. A particular focus this year has been preparing for the implementation of the UK Elections Act alongside the distinct electoral agendas in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The Commission works flexibly as one cohesive unit across these geographies, challenges and opportunities. We are committed to putting the voter first. We know that public awareness of the electoral system is hugely important to voter engagement and confidence. We have invested in ensuring people can understand what the changes mean for them and how to take part in elections. More widely, we have made efforts to support newly enfranchised and young voters to get involved in the democratic process. This work is coupled with support for electoral administrators, responsible for delivering the changes on the ground. Our guidance is designed to help them fulfil their responsibilities, against the challenging backdrop of resource constraints and legal complexity. Their work and dedication have been paramount to ensuring the changes were implemented well. Those in England and Northern Ireland with elections in May 2023 have been particularly busy, but administrators in Scotland and Wales have also been preparing for new measures at future polls. There have also been changes for campaigners to get to grips with. We continue to invest in the regulatory support and advice on offer to help parties and campaigners understand and meet their legal obligations and achieve compliance. I am pleased with the level of take up from the parties and the quality of engagement we've had with them. I have enjoyed the opportunity to meet a broad spectrum of our stakeholders and those involved in democratic and political systems across the UK. During the year, the Commission Board travelled to Belfast and Chorley for engaging meetings with local organisations, youth groups, candidates, councillors and administrators. Other similar visits are planned in the coming year to support us in hearing direct from stakeholders. We were delighted to be joined by Mr Speaker in his home constituency to discuss our constructive engagement with the Speaker's Committee, through which we are accountable to UK Parliament. Hearing a range of voices and views is so important to understanding how the Commission can continue to improve and be ready for future demands. It goes hand in hand with ongoing research into modernising elections which, together, will be used to support recommendations to the UK's governments about how the electoral system can continue to support participation in the democratic process. In October, the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the UK Parliament published its report on our work. We welcomed its findings on the urgent need for consolidation, updating and improvement of electoral law. The report also made recommendations to ensure the Commission remains capable of responding to the challenges the electoral system faces, and recognised that operational independence is a fundamental aspect. In responding to the UK Government's consultation on its proposed Strategy and Policy Statement for the Electoral Commission, we shared our view that such a statement – by which the government can guide our work – is inconsistent with our role. Both the Speaker's Committee and Levelling Up, Housing and Communities Committee highlighted the importance of maintaining the Commission's independence and the risks posed by such a statement. We await the next stage in this process, but the Board remains firmly committed to independent decision-making, acting according to the needs and interests of the whole electoral community, including voters. Finally, I'd like to acknowledge that this year we have been responding to a cyber-attack by a hostile actor. This has been a major challenge and important learnings have been taken forward. I apologise to all those, including staff of the Commission, whose personal data has been put at risk. The Commission puts independence and impartiality at the heart of all its does, and that focus will continue in all our work in the year ahead. John Pullinger CB, Chair A message from our Chief Executive The Commission has, rightly, set itself ambitious objectives in its Corporate Plan, and work to deliver on those goals has been happening at pace. Our teams in England, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales have worked tirelessly to provide high-quality and efficient services to all those we support. A great deal of effort and expertise has been dedicated to ensuring that the May 2023 elections could be delivered in a way that maintained voter confidence. This was a particular challenge this year, with new changes brought in by the Elections Act layered onto an already complex system. The Commission's awareness campaign about the new requirement to show voter ID was the most publicly visible illustration of the work that went into ensuring everyone could take part; this was a truly integrated campaign combining paid advertising and partnership engagement, with press, social media and voter information activity. But voter ID is not the only change from the Elections Act. Throughout the year, the Commission also held consultations on a Code of Practice for non-party campaigners, the introduction of digital imprints, and new accessibility measures at polling stations. Engagement with parties, campaigners, electoral administrators and partners allowed us to improve the usefulness of our guidance and enhance our evidence base about how the law is applied in practice. We continue to invest and focus on how we can best support our regulated community to understand the law and achieve compliance. The laws around political finance play a big part in providing transparency and maintaining voter confidence in the fairness of the system. Our database now provides information on over £1bn of donations reported by parties and campaigners since the Commission was established in 2000. This is a noteworthy milestone and one that demonstrates the level of information that we make available for everyone to see. We will continue to highlight areas where the UK's political finance system could be reformed to increase confidence in the system. We are also committed to supporting and championing the voice of young and future voters. In January, over 220 schools across the UK signed up to take part in Welcome to Your Vote Week. This is a focal point of our learning work, which aims to promote greater consistency in political literacy education, and increase political knowledge and understanding amongst young people. This is an important and growing area of our work, and it's been great to see it go from strength to strength. Within the Commission we also continue to make positive changes. In response to a cyber-attack on the organisation, considerable improvements have been made to the organisation's digital infrastructure, which recognises the potential risks from cyber-attacks, and helps to protect our systems from such incidents in the future. Work continues on replacing the current online system for registering political parties and reporting financial information, and we regret that the project was not completed in this financial year as hoped. We have developed a new People Strategy for 2022-25, which sets out planned improvements to improve HR systems, learning and development, recruitment, and performance management. A new development programme was also launched this year, which aims to strengthen the personal leadership skills of our people and to improve and strengthen the Commission's overall culture. It has been rewarding to see these positive changes over the last year. The executive team and I remain committed to ensuring the Commission is in the best possible position to maximise our performance and support our people and stakeholders.

Shaun McNally CBE, Chief Executive

Our role We work to promote public confidence in the electoral system and ensure its integrity. Our strategic objectives

- Accessible registration and voting
- Transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance
- Resilient local electoral services
- Fair and effective electoral law
- A modern and sustainable electoral system

Our vision is to ensure people trust, value, and take part in elections and referendums. We aim to achieve this vision by delivering the strategic objectives set out in our Corporate Plan 2022/23 – 2026/27, which we laid in the UK Parliament and Scottish Parliament in April 2022, at the same time as the related Corporate Plan for Wales was sent to the Senedd. These strategic objectives are the basis on which we evaluate the Commission's performance for the year.

Enabling factors To ensure we are equipped as an organisation to meet these objectives, we have identified three key enabling activities.

We demonstrate independence and integrity

- We continue to demonstrate our independence and integrity by taking decisions on the evidence and being transparent about the reasons for them; basing our policy positions and recommendations on analysis of evidence; effectively communicating our work and views; providing responsive services to those we support; and maintaining effective governance arrangements.

We are a skilled organisation where diversity is valued

- We implement refreshed working practices to reflect wider changes in our work environment and culture; attract, retain and develop the people we need; maintain and improve high standards of management, with a focus on developing our people; and further embed equality, diversity and inclusion in all aspects of our work.

We are a learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used effectively

- We procure and implement value for money technology that improves service delivery as appropriate; maintain a sound prudent financial strategy; continue to develop techniques to learn from experience, seek continuous improvement and become more efficient and effective; develop a corporate environmental strategy that meets policy and legislative requirements.

Our role across the UK We deliver for voters across all parts of the UK, with Electoral Commission offices in Belfast, Cardiff, Edinburgh and London. We work closely with the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments. We are accountable to the UK Parliament, the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd, and are funded by each of these for the work undertaken on elections under their devolved or reserved powers. Electoral law is not devolved in Northern Ireland and remains reserved to Westminster. UK-wide organisation The Commission is a UK-wide organisation, and the Board takes decisions with that approach in mind. Due to legislation, this Annual Report must only focus on the work done in relation to our role and accountabilities to the UK Parliament.

It identifies and comments on key issues that emerged and on voters' experience of the election. It also reviews the impact of combining the election with the referendum on the UK Parliamentary voting system. Facts and figures Our report focuses particularly on the experience of voters, based on public opinion research and other research data. In total 2,289,735 people were registered to vote in Wales and 41.8% of them did so. Overall 17% of electors asked for a postal vote and a high proportion of those, 71%, used their postal vote. Postal votes accounted for 28% of all votes cast at the election. Our report reviews people's experience of voting in polling stations or by post. A total of 176 constituency candidates campaigned to be elected and 13 political parties nominated lists of regional candidates. This was 21 fewer constituency candidates and three fewer political parties than in the Assembly elections in 2007. Our report gives more detail on campaigning in the election. Did people feel informed We undertook a public information campaign to increase people's awareness of the Assembly elections and the UK-wide referendum. We sent an information booklet to all households in Wales and used television, radio and online advertising to inform people about the elections. We evaluated levels of people's awareness by conducting public opinion research before and after our campaign. Of those surveyed, 78% recognised at least one element of our campaign. After polling day, when asked if they had been aware of the Assembly elections, 82% of people said they were. Seven in 10 people surveyed said they had enough information to make an informed decision on how to vote in the election, with 79% of those aged 55 or over feeling informed compared with 60% of those under 35. In terms of people feeling informed, the prominence of the Assembly elections in the media continues to be an issue. Our public opinion research found a difference in Wales, compared with Scotland and Northern Ireland, in people's views of the amount of media coverage of the elections. Over half of people surveyed in Wales thought there was a lot of media coverage of the Assembly election, whereas 72% of people surveyed in Scotland and 70% of people in Northern Ireland thought there was a lot of media coverage of the elections being held there. People's experience of voting People in Wales continue to have very high levels of satisfaction with the voting process. Of those who voted in polling stations, 97% said they were satisfied with the process of voting and 98% of those who voted by post were satisfied. Full details of our research findings are contained in the report. A key priority for the Commission is that voters are able to vote easily and confidently, knowing that their vote will be counted in the way they intended. The Assembly election ballot papers, prescribed in legislation by the Secretary of State for Wales, were designed according to our good practice guidance on accessibility. In public opinion research, nearly all voters (96%) said they found their ballot papers easy to complete. Of those who voted in both the Assembly election and the UK-wide referendum held on the same day, meaning they completed three ballot papers, 96% said they found it easy to fill in more than one ballot paper. Lessons learnt: what we should change Timing of elections The timing of the Assembly election count became a controversial issue at the end of March, when it became publicly known that Returning Officers in the North Wales electoral region had decided to count votes the day after the close of poll rather than overnight. Our report explains the background and reviews the issue, as well as containing data on when results for each constituency and electoral region were announced. By the end of November 2011, we will circulate an Issues Paper on the timing of election counts, identifying issues that have arisen at elections across the UK in recent years. We will seek views from those with an interest in the timing of election counts, including governments, political parties, Returning Officers, broadcasters and voters. Following analysis of views received, we will seek to make recommendations in early 2012 on the timing of election counts and the way in which they are organised, taking account of the type of elections and a range of relevant circumstances.

Disqualification of two candidates returned as elected Two weeks after the election, an issue of significant public interest arose. Two candidates who were returned as Assembly Members in regional elections were found not to have been validly elected because of offices they held, meaning that they were 'disqualified'. This became the subject of investigation by the police and, after the Crown Prosecution Service concluded that no criminal offences had been committed, by the National Assembly for Wales. The Commission's own actions came under public scrutiny as a result of an error in the Welsh language version of our guidance to candidates and agents, which had a bearing in one of the cases. We apologised to the Assembly and to the person concerned. Our report covers this issue in detail. We have been working with the Welsh Language Board since this incident and are glad to implement a series of recommendations they made to us in September 2011. These include improving our processes for dealing with documents and guidance in Welsh, in order to avoid any future difficulties. In particular, we have thoroughly revised our processes for publishing information in Welsh and online on our website.

The format of the regional ballot paper had been revised for the 2011 election, so that it contained the names of political parties who had nominated candidates, together with any independent regional candidates who were standing, but not the names of party regional candidates. However, the names of candidates were required to be displayed in polling stations so that voters could see them. Early on polling day, there were complaints that regional candidates' names were not displayed or were displayed inadequately by some Returning Officers. There were also a small number of complaints from postal voters that they did not have access to the names of regional list candidates other than by consulting notices in public places or local authority websites. Our report explains the background and the actions that were taken on polling day to resolve this issue. We conclude that, following the experience at the elections, the question of whether candidates' names are included on the regional list ballot paper should be reconsidered. However, before certain relevant matters are resolved (which our report explains), it would be premature to make decisions on the regional ballot paper. We will revisit this issue no later than December 2014. We will seek further views and make any necessary recommendations to the Secretary of State for Wales in sufficient time for a decision not later than one year before the Assembly election in 2016. That would allow any change to the ballot paper to be prescribed in legislation at least six months before the 2016 election.

Invalid postal votes In common with trends at previous elections, just under 5% of returned postal votes had to be rejected as invalid by Returning Officers, for one of the following reasons: the postal vote statement which must accompany the ballot paper was missing; the ballot paper was missing; or because the signature or date of birth supplied by postal voters could not be matched with their postal vote application.

Our report contains more information and data about invalid postal votes. Allowing Returning Officers to request a refreshed identifying signature, and also to provide electors with feedback if their postal vote has been rejected would help address this problem. We first made this recommendation to the UK Government in 2007 and have since reiterated it. In September 2011, the UK Government said that it would work with the Commission and electoral administrators to avoid the problems we have highlighted with the current postal voting system, while taking into consideration the need to ensure it remains secure against fraudulent applications for postal votes. We will work with the UK Government to ensure the right changes are in place by the next UK Parliamentary general election.

Collecting postal votes Part of ensuring that every postal vote is counted involves ensuring that all postal votes are collected from mail centres by the time polls close. Individual Returning Officers are responsible for arranging and paying for Royal Mail 'sweeps', where any remaining postal votes are collected from mail centres so that they can be included in the election count. In May 2011, the Commission took responsibility for arranging and paying for the cost of the 'sweeps' in respect of the UK-wide referendum. Royal Mail delivered all postal votes resulting from the sweeps directly to referendum counting areas, rather than Counting Officers having to collect them. This meant that, for the Assembly election, the same service was available and used by all Returning Officers. Feedback from referendum Counting Officers and election Returning Officers about the sweep has been broadly positive, but there remains scepticism about its value, with only a small number of postal votes being returned as a result. We aim to develop a better model for working with the postal service. Campaigning in the election Returning Officers offered and held briefing meetings with candidates and agents to iron out any difficulties in advance of nomination, and police representatives often attended to provide advice on electoral integrity issues. However, Returning Officers and the police have told us of poor attendance, with election staff and the police sometimes outnumbering candidates and agents or meetings being cancelled. We continue to encourage candidates, agents and parties to attend briefing meetings offered by Returning Officers to ensure they are fully informed about the nomination process and the requirements of law. We will consider further with Returning Officers and political parties what more could be done to improve the attendance of face to face local briefing for candidates and agents. The new format of our candidates and agents guidance was welcomed in the feedback we received, but party officials that deal with compliance issues felt they would like in addition a comprehensive, 'one-stop' volume containing all of our guidance, with legislative references. We will consider how we can meet that request for future elections. We received feedback from certain political parties and some candidates who indicated that they were unclear about whether their election leaflets, delivered under freepost arrangements with Royal Mail, could include messages calling on people to vote for party candidates in both constituency and regional elections. We have referred these issues to Royal Mail, who agreed to look at their guidance again. We will follow this up with Royal Mail and seek to ensure that the parties in Wales are consulted on any revisions to the guidance in good time before the next Assembly elections in 2016. Our materials and resources for Returning Officers We received positive feedback from Returning Officers about the materials and resources and the direct support we provided to them, but there was also negative feedback. Some felt that the Commission 'micro-managed' the UK referendum, with consequent impact on the combined elements of the election. There was also some negative feedback about presentational issues, with some electoral administrators saying they found our website difficult to navigate, preferring to have the guidance in one printed volume and not to receive updates by email, in case these were missed. We have taken account of the feedback we received on the planning of our guidance and resources for elections in 2012 and how we present that information on our website. Costs of the election Our report gives detail on how much the election cost. The Welsh Government meets the costs of local Returning Officers in delivering the election. Although the actual costs of Returning Officers are not yet known, since the Welsh Government has set a deadline of 5 January 2012 for the submission of accounts, the maximum recoverable amount for all 40 constituencies and 5 electoral regions is £4.7 million. The Welsh Government also met the costs of Royal Mail, almost £3.4 million, in delivering over 16.5 million freepost election communications from candidates and political parties. Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 4 December 2019, subject to amendment above, be agreed. Reflections on 2019 United Kingdom Parliamentary General Election and related matters (oral update) The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance updated the Board on the work undertaken following the December election. The Commission was still collecting data from a range of sources, including a survey of candidates, a public opinion survey, and a survey of electoral administrators. Early dialogue with a range of stakeholders from across the electoral community had highlighted a good deal of consistency between what the Commission found from its review of the data and their reflections on the polls. The Board considered the challenges that arose from a high number of registration applications being made close to the deadline. The number of duplicate applications was reported anecdotally as being at similar levels to the 2017 UK General Parliamentary Election, although the data on this was not yet clear. The pressure of managing these registration applications was a significant risk to the successful administration of the polls, with the potential to impact on voters' experience. The Head of Policy outlined the initial findings of the Commission's post-poll research. The public view was that the election was well run overall, despite significant pressures on those running the polls. There were risks to the successful delivery of the election, and evidence that small numbers of voters did not receive the quality of service they had a right to expect. There were for example some localised errors with poll cards, some of which could be largely attributed to pressures with supplier capacity. Concerns had been expressed in Northern Ireland, following claims by whistleblowers. These were being fully looked into. The Commission had received a number of contacts from overseas electors who were unable to return their postal votes in time for them to be counted. Our research found some public concerns in relation to whether some campaign materials were truthful and accurate. This included labelling of material and social media accounts, candidate material looking like local news, and transparency of third-party campaigning, given the significantly increased numbers of third party campaigners at this election. This was the first General Election where there were greater transparency measures in place on social media platforms, but these were still not at the level we would like. There was also inconsistency in the levels of transparency of different social media companies. The Director of Regulation noted that the work of the election was far from over from the regulatory point of view.

Spending returns would not be submitted for some time yet but in the meantime we had already spoken to some parties and third-party campaigners, and would continue to take proactive steps to assist them in their preparation of these reports. We had found the data provided by social media companies regarding spending on their platforms useful with this work. The Director of Regulation described the work of the Election Cell, set up by the Cabinet Office, in which the Commission participated during the election period. This cell included organisations from Whitehall, the police, and other regulators. We had found our participation had been positive for the election and for stakeholder engagement. We had provided feedback to the Cabinet Office on suggested improvements to enhance the effectiveness of any such election cell around future electoral events. The Head of Policy noted the information so far received regarding intimidation of candidates. The Board considered the evidence about intimidation and recognised that establishing an effective baseline for data was difficult. Research suggested that the vast majority of intimidation was online. Intimidation was not widespread across the country, but where it did occur, it was quite serious. The Board sought to understand how far instances of intimidation were concentrated on particular social media platforms; there was not clear data on this at this stage, but as this becomes clearer the Board encouraged the Commission to share these findings. The Board discussed some specific instances in Northern Ireland. The Board reflected on its decision not to observe at polling stations on election day, which had been a pity. The Chief Executive noted that in the context of the then prevalent high security risks, the fact that nothing happened to cause concern was a good outcome. However, it was to be hoped that more normal conditions would return for future elections. The Board discussed the pressures on electoral administrators, and whether, and if so how, these pressures could be addressed. The Board sought clarity, for example, on whether the election timetable could be adjusted to reflect changes in the demands placed on administrators since the introduction of online electoral registration. The Head of Policy confirmed that any such changes would require changes to primary legislation. The Chair suggested that we should also focus on promoting improvements to the underlying system, such as progress on a look-up tool and wider registration modernisation. The Board noted the UK government's anticipated changes to the Fixed Term Parliament Act. One consequence might in fact be a shorter administration period prior to elections, as had been the case before the act. The nature of post-poll reporting this time was being considered. Reports needed to be published before the May polls. There were opportunities to bring out important messages about future polls, as well as the statutory duty to fulfil. The Board noted that the Commission had prepared well for the polls, the election had been seen as well run overall, and the outcome was trusted and had not been called into question. The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance noted the different challenges that arose when there were combined polls, as in May 2020, rather than a stand-alone election. Government policy priorities following the UK Parliamentary General Election (EC 3/20) The Director of Communications, Policy, and Research advised the Board of the areas where the UK government had announced its priorities for policy and regulatory changes that would affect the work of the Commission. There was still uncertainty about the level of ambition and timetabling in some areas. Nevertheless, it was clear that the volume of proposed changes had significant implications for the Commission's work over the term of the Parliament, although much of this was already reflected in our existing planning. The Board considered some of the specific government policy priorities, including changes to the frequency of reapplying for postal votes, and the implications of the proposed Constitution, Democracy and Rights Commission. The Board reflected on how these would be addressed in our corporate plan. The Director of Communications, Policy, and Research confirmed that the Commission would continue to make the case for its policy priorities even when these were not currently priorities for the UK's governments. The Board considered other areas where the UK government might make policy changes, such as on overseas voters. We should be ready to press for innovative solutions in such circumstances. The Board reflected on the impending final report from the Law Commission regarding electoral law reform, which would require a response from the government. Resolved: That the paper be agreed. Corporate plan and budget 2020/25 (EC 4/20 and 5/20) The Chief Executive outlined the approach that we had taken to meet our obligation to produce a corporate plan for consideration by the Speaker's Committee following a UK Parliamentary General Election. Due to time constraints, we would prepare a holding interim corporate plan for the Speaker's Committee, and request permission to prepare a more comprehensively considered corporate plan for 2021. This paper reflected the discussion from the December 2019 Commission Board meeting. The main estimate included a proposed increase in our core budget, which was in line with the increase to the Cabinet Office. The Director of Finance and Corporate Services went through the proposed budget figures in detail. More than half of the proposed increase was due to accounting changes around leasing of office accommodation which were not adjustable. The number and importance of scheduled electoral events in 2020 and 2021 impacted the proposed events budget. There was also ongoing regulatory work from the European Parliamentary Election and UK Parliamentary General Election, together with the need to work with governments on their declared electoral priorities. The Board emphasised the need for the cover letter to the Speaker's Committee in support of the corporate plan to set out clearly the reasons behind the request for a modest increase to the core budget, including the extent to which this was driven by work in support of the programmes of governments. We should also emphasise the discipline and rigour we brought to our budget management and planning, and avoid any impression of self-congratulation. Resolved: That the interim Corporate Plan 2020/2025 and budget as set out in the Annex to this item be approved That the attached Main Estimate 2020/2021 (with Parliamentary Control Totals set out in Table 4 of the document), that embodies those budgets, and the Corporate Plan 2020/2025 for submission to Speaker's Committee be agreed That delegate authority for the Chief Executive as Accounting Officer, working with the Chair, to amend the Corporate Plan and Main Estimate in non-major ways to reflect unforeseen developments between approval by the Board and submission to the Speaker's Committee be agreed Corporate plan 2021/26 The Chief Executive reminded the Board that this corporate plan would be the first time we would be reporting to three parliaments: Westminster, the Scottish Parliament, and the Senedd. Their different budget cycles needed to be taken into account. The Head of Planning, Performance and Governance explained the timetable for the production of a comprehensive corporate plan. To develop the 2021/26 corporate plan, the Commission would create a strategy map that shows how all elements of the plan interconnect in a logical way, and relate performance reporting closely to that. The narrative plan would then be written from the strategy map, which translates the strategy map into a story everyone can readily understand. There would also be early and close engagement with key stakeholders. The Head of Strategic Planning and Performance confirmed the deadlines for the preparation of this plan. Although Speaker's Committee would not look at the corporate plan until February/March 2021, we had to work to a September 2020 deadline to meet the timeline set by the devolved administrations. The Director of Finance and Corporate Services noted that the Scottish and Welsh parliaments would contribute proportional funding to the Commission, and would expect visibility on what they had funded. The Board supported early discussions with stakeholders about the strategy, considered the merits of using focus groups to complement the research knowledge base, and encouraged engagement with groups, including young people, with whom we usually had less contact. Resolved: That the paper be agreed. Forward plan of Board business (EC 6/20) Resolved: That the paper be noted. Action tracker (EC 7/20) Resolved: That the paper be noted. Chair and Chief Executive's meetings and meetings of note in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (EC 8/20) Resolved: That the paper be noted.

review – 5 May Northern Ireland Assembly KR invited feedback from the Panel.

CH advised that feedback would inform the statutory Electoral Commission (EC) report on the election. Absent voting CM raised that electors didn't know they needed to keep their digital registration number (DRN) to obtain an absent vote. CH noted that it was difficult to reach electors that needed to be aware of the number. The EC ran a highly targeted digital advertising campaign aimed at groups likely to apply for an absent vote, however JM raised that more digital and particularly partnership work was required to reach the target audience. VM raised concerns that it was difficult for people to obtain an absent vote and that the Secretary of State wouldn't allow her to move the absent vote deadline. The difficulty for EONI was the short time period between electors realising they needed their DRN and the deadline for sending in their absent vote applications. EONI attempted to get press coverage on the issue but this had low take-up due to the complicated nature of the issue. GF thanked EONI,

EC, and the Royal Mail for their working relationships throughout the election period. GF reiterated the DRN was a major problem for the reasons outlined by VM, adding that the public aren't focused on the election until they receive their poll cards, which left a very tight window for receiving their DRN. CM restated that whilst party reps and candidates try to encourage engagement, it doesn't happen early enough. PM asked VM what the response time was for EONI sending out DRN notifications. VM stated there was no backlog on this during the election so letters were sent the same day (unless there was no post that day). VM advised that as there are no plans to amend legislation, more work will be required in future. Nominations

GD raised a problem with a nomination paper that passed a pre-check but a subscriber moved house (before the papers were formally submitted) causing an issue in the final nomination process. VM advised that without advance notice from candidates it is not possible for EONI to foresee this type of issue. VM outlined the work EONI did to improve the nominations process such as using an online booking system and setting up pop-ups in council offices. Campaigning CH highlighted the unsavoury nature of some campaigning at the election and requested views. GD raised that there had been damage to election posters and that some election posters had been stolen. This was more common in rural areas. CM stated that campaigning had been particularly difficult during this election with posters stolen and burnt and candidate subject to online abuse. CH stated that it is important that people do not feel intimidated when running as a candidate. VM advised she received complaints about the behaviour of some candidates on and around polling day. GD reiterated that there was more online abuse for both men and women. PM stated that for the Alliance Party there was more intimidation when entering certain communities, particularly towards younger candidates. KR highlighted that we would engage with campaigners to tackle this cross-cutting issue and highlighted the Assembly Women's Caucus as a potential group to work with on this issue. Candidate mailing (Royal Mail) CC stated there had been no major issues for the Royal Mail. CM thanked CC for the service provided however, in some areas, electors stated they hadn't received the addressed mail and others hadn't received the unaddressed mail. There were also three different postings to be sent at different times but some households received all three together. CM also questioned why all mail had to go to Mallusk. CC advised that for the Assembly Election the mailing is handled centrally, however she would raise this internally. SN also thanked CC for their help during the election. They commented that a small number of unaddressed mail had bleed-over from one constituency to another. They also raised an issue with artwork checking as some candidate mailings included information on joining a party which was not approved by Royal Mail. Public awareness JM outlined the Electoral Commission's six-week voter registration campaign in the run up to the election and the targeted DRN campaign. CH updated the panel on the learning resources created by the Commission to support young people's political literacy which will be built on at future elections. Polling stations CM raised concerns about the behaviour of some campaigners and polling agents at some polling places and that she thought that some polling staff were not confident challenging it. VM stated parties needed to ensure campaigners behaved within the rules and within the voluntary code of conduct and asked that parties let her know of issues on polling day so she could send out polling station inspectors. VM thanked parties for complying with Covid-19 guidelines but acknowledged the circulation of polling agents could have been an issue. GD advised they had noticed more campaign literature left in polling booths. He mentioned a particular polling place where restrictions on vehicle access close to the entrance had caused accessibility issues. VM advised she would look into this. GF stated they didn't have many issues, however early on polling day, some polling agents weren't allowed access to the polling station. VM advised this had been an administrative error and apologised. CH invited VM to raise any issues she had found. VM outlined difficulties with staffing as many had dropped out last minute citing Covid-19 as a reason. Another issue was that some schools did not want their grounds used as a polling place. The count CH invited feedback on the count. Participants acknowledged that the count took a long time. GD raised some issues with facilities given the length of the count. GF acknowledged the improvements to the Meadowbank count centre, however noted that a queue outside prevented access to the start of the count. He stated there were also issues with counts moving at different speeds. He suggested the use of a digital calculator to improve this. VM advised the slower pace was also due to the voting patterns of electors, but she would work with statisticians to examine where efficiencies in the count can be found. VM apologised about the issues with amenities and suggested that in future EONI may subsidise caterers. It was also raised that the layout of the Jordanstown count centre had impeded a disabled attendee. CM reiterated the problem with the queue at Meadowbank, and also suggested count centres have a facility, such as a screen for privacy in case of medical issues. CM also highlighted that she had requested more chairs as people were on their feet for a long time at the count. VM advised EONI would review the efficiency of the count and look at what improvements can be made. Spending and reporting RM reminded the parties that returns were due in August. The guidance had been significantly updated this year and there were two briefings before the election for the candidates, and one for the parties. RM requested feedback on this. CM advised that candidates found the forms complicated and that the virtual seminars were appropriate but that they were not as helpful as in-person meetings. RM acknowledged that candidates had difficulties completing forms, but as they were prescribed in law she said the EC could look at how to make the explanatory notes link better to various parts of the form. GD stated there was a new generation of people taking on agent roles and acknowledged the party's role developing the knowledge of agents, but that any additional guidance would be welcomed. CH acknowledged that more guidance would be useful. RM asked the parties if earlier seminars would be useful. CM advised that the issue is more with ensuring the right people are taking on agent roles.

Update from the Chief Electoral Officer (CEO)

VM advised that statistics from the election were available on the EONI website. VM acknowledged points raised earlier regarding the DRN and its impact on people applying for absent votes. VM reiterated she was keen to speak to parties' regarding the efficiency of the latter stages of the count and that work had already begun to examine where improvements could be made. EONI were looking into ways of improving accessibility and asked for any feedback or ideas on this. KR thanked VM and advised the EC were committed to helping EONI with this.

2022 Financial Reporting dates for political parties

RM advised the parties of the following dates:

- Donation and loan reports for the period 1 April – 30 June 2022 had to be submitted by 30 July 2022
- Audited statement of accounts for the year ending 31 December 2022 for parties with income or expenditure over £250,000 had to be submitted (with the auditor's certificate) by 7 July 2022
- Parties should renew their annual confirmation of registered details at the same time as submitting their accounts by completing form RP8
- Parties with campaign expenditure of £250,000 or less had to submit their report of campaign spending on or before 5 August 2022.

Modernising voting project

JM updated the panel on the modernising voting project that was being undertaken by the EC. The EC was gathering views on potential future improvements to voting in the UK. The work aimed to ensure that voting fits the needs and expectations of voters in 2022 and beyond. Last year the EC carried out research with public focus groups and published a summary of the findings on our website. JM stated they wanted to hear from parties to further develop the evidence base and to inform future policy debates about improving voting processes and information about elections.

JM advised the panel that if they would like to be contacted and interviewed as part of this work to get in contact with the Northern Ireland team. He advised the panel would be sent more information on this by email after the meeting.

Report on the canvass

JM advised the panel that the report on how the 2021 Northern Ireland canvass was run was published in March 2022. The report welcomed the largest ever electoral register, with over 1.36 million people registered to vote. However it recommended that the UK Government reform the canvass and wider electoral registration process in Northern Ireland. Specifically it recommended the Government reform the canvass to allow a pre-canvass match between the electoral register and available datasets. As a result people could be accurately retained on the register and would not be required to re-register unless their details had changed. The report also recommended integrating electoral registration into other public service transactions and exploring options for introducing automatic or automated registration. These changes would allow people who have recently moved to complete an electoral registration application simultaneously as part of, or alongside, accessing other public services and could be used to automatically register young people when they are given their National Insurance number. JM advised the EC continued to work in partnership with the CEO, government, data providers and the wider electoral community to develop and deliver these recommendations. He requested the panel get in touch with any questions. VM reminded the panel that due to the roll-over some electors would be coming off the register in December 2024. EONI had contacted these people but have received low levels of engagement. SN raised that the evidence required to register was inaccessible for young people. VM responded that this is due to legislation. CH advised that regular assessments take place of the register and the EC will be undertaking a comprehensive study of the register in December with findings published in 2023. Upcoming meetings dates for 2022 The next NIAPP meeting is due to take place on Tuesday 25 October. Any other business JM reminded the panel that the EC had sent an online survey to all candidates asking them to share their views of the election. There has been a good response so far but the EC wanted to make sure candidates from all parties had the opportunity to respond before the survey closes.

Investigation into payments made to Better for the Country and Leave.EU | Electoral Commission Search Investigation into payments made to Better for the Country and Leave.EU You are in the Investigations section Home Investigations On this page Summary Our investigation Potential criminal offences Referral to the National Crime Agency First published: 1 November 2018 Last updated: 29 April 2020 Overview We have completed our current investigation into certain payments made to Better for the Country Limited (BFTC) and Leave.EU Group Limited (Leave.EU). These payments were for the purposes of meeting expenses incurred by BFTC (including on behalf of Leave.EU) in the 2016 EU Referendum. The Commission has reasonable grounds to suspect a number of criminal offences and have referred the matter to the National Crime Agency (NCA). Update – 29 April 2020 The National Crime Agency, after its own investigation, has (i) concluded that there is no evidence that any criminal offences have been committed under PPERA or company law by any of the individuals or organisations referred to it by the Electoral Commission; and (ii) has stated that it has not received any evidence to suggest that Mr Banks and his companies received funding from any third party to fund the loans subject to the investigation, or that Mr Banks acted as an agent on behalf of a third party. The Electoral Commission accepts these conclusions. Read the NCA's decision . Summary A total of £8m in funding was provided to BFTC and Leave.EU to be available for paying expenses incurred by one or other of them in the EU Referendum. This included £6m provided to Leave.EU (paid on its behalf to BFTC to use for Leave.EU's referendum spending), and £2m provided to BFTC. BFTC used this money to spend at least £2.9m in the regulated campaign period for the 2016 EU Referendum, either by making donations to other campaigners, or by other spending. Leave.EU told us that Arron Banks was the only other party to the £6m loans, and that the moneys were loans from him. BFTC told us it was funded by Mr Banks and his group of insurance companies and that Mr Banks was the source for the other £2m. Following an investigation we launched on 1 November 2017, we have reasonable grounds to suspect that: Mr Banks was not the true source of the £8m reported as loans The parties to the financial transactions that led to the £8m being paid into BFTC's bank account included a non-qualifying or impermissible company, Rock Holding Limited, which was incorporated in the Isle of Man Leave.EU, Elizabeth Bilney (the responsible person for Leave.EU), BFTC, Mr Banks, and possibly others, concealed the true details of these financial transactions, including from us, and also did so by knowingly making statutory returns/reports which were incomplete and inaccurate, or false Various criminal offences may have been committed We have referred this matter to the NCA, for it to take forward. We will liaise with the NCA to provide whatever assistance it may require. This report outlines the basis our referral to the NCA. As this is now a criminal investigation, only limited information can, at this stage, be made public about the evidence we hold, our analysis and the potential offences that may have been committed. Our investigation BFTC was set up in May 2015. It was not a registered campaigner in the EU referendum, but it ran Leave.EU's campaign on its behalf, received £6m on behalf of Leave.EU, and paid Leave.EU's referendum expenses. It also received £2m to use for referendum spending. This funding, a total of £8m, was provided to Leave.EU and BFTC in late 2015 and early 2016. Leave.EU reported Arron Banks as the only source of its £6m. BFTC told us that Mr Banks and his insurance companies had made a loan to it of £2m for the referendum. BFTC gave some £2.2m to other campaigners, which were reported as donations. It spent at least £750,000 on campaign payments on behalf of Leave.EU. As a result of ongoing regulatory work we announced an investigation into BFTC and Mr Banks on 1 November 2017. This looked at whether Mr Banks was the true

source of the loans and whether BFTC was the true source of the donations made by it to others. The law is that loans and donations to registered campaigners can only come from certain permissible sources, which essentially excludes overseas or foreign funding from any consequent impermissible influence on the outcome of the EU Referendum. Further investigation information The entities we looked at During the investigation we looked at a number of companies, including the following: Better for the Country Limited (company number 0969018): BFTC was incorporated in the UK in May 2015, and registered at Lysander House in Bristol. Mr Arron Banks is listed at Companies House as a person with significant control of the company. Both Mr Banks and Ms Bilney were at the relevant time directors of BFTC, and were under a duty to ensure that it complied with the law. Leave.EU Group Limited (company number 09763501): Leave.EU was incorporated in the UK in September 2015, and registered at Lysander House in Bristol. Mr Arron Banks is listed at Companies House as a person with significant control of the company. Leave.EU registered as a permitted participant (registered campaigner) for the 2016 EU Referendum in February 2016. Its registered responsible person for the EU Referendum was Ms Bilney, and was under a duty to ensure that Leave.EU complied with the law. Rock Services Limited (company number 05960676): Rock Services was incorporated in the UK in October 2006, and registered at Lysander House in Bristol. Mr Arron Banks is listed at Companies House as a person with significant control of the company. Rock Holdings Limited: Rock Holdings is a company incorporated in the Isle of Man and is the parent company of Rock Services. Mr Banks is a majority shareholder of Rock Holdings. As it is not a UK entity, and does not carry on business here, Rock Holdings could not lawfully make any donation or be a party to any loan to Leave.EU. We also obtained information for our investigation from Mr Banks. As part of its required financial reporting for the EU Referendum, Leave.EU reported that Mr Banks had loaned it £6m. In our recent investigation into Leave.EU [link] we concluded that Leave.EU was wrong to report Mr Banks as the only party to those loans. We also received information from five registered campaigners for the EU Referendum. These five campaigners each reported receiving donations from BFTC during the referendum campaign. These were: Grassroots Out Limited, which reported a donation from BFTC of £1,952,375 Trades Unionists Against the EU, which reported donations from BFTC of £54,000 UK Independence Party, which reported donations from BFTC of £99,468 Veterans for Britain, which reported a donation from BFTC of £50,000 WAG TV, which reported a donation from BFTC of £50,000 What our investigation looked at We looked at whether Mr Banks was the true source of loans reported by Leave.EU and BFTC as coming from him, and whether there were any individuals or entities involved in those loan arrangements who/which were non-qualifying or not permitted under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPEREA) as amended by the European Union Referendum Act 2015 (EURAA). We also looked at whether BFTC was the true source of donations reported by referendum campaigners as coming from it, and what steps the recipients took to verify the donor was permissible. PPEREA sets out the law on donations and loans (referred to in the Act as 'regulated transactions') made to registered campaigners for the EU Referendum. The relevant legal provisions include the following: A donation means any gift of money to a registered campaigner, or the provision to it of a credit facility, or other property (or any sponsorship, payment of subscriptions or fees, or money spent on paying any expenses of a campaigner or the provision of property, services or facilities other than on commercial terms). Only amounts above £500 are viewed as donations under PPEREA Broadly speaking, permissible donors for the EU Referendum had to be either an individual on the electoral register in the UK, or a company or other entity from within the UK or Gibraltar (and carrying on business there) A loan is any amount over £500, and which is an arrangement between a registered campaigner and another person by which the other person makes a loan of money to the registered campaigner for the use or benefit of meeting referendum expenses incurred by that campaigner. Registered campaigners cannot be a party to, or gain any benefit from, a loan if a person or entity who is 'non-qualifying' is also a party to that loan. Qualifying persons for the EU Referendum were, broadly, an individual on the electoral register or a company or other entity from within the UK or Gibraltar. PPERA sets out a number of offences about where a registered campaigner does not comply with the law on donations and loans. These include offences of:

Facilitating (or being a party to) a loan arrangement involving a non-qualifying person as a party to the arrangement Failing to return impermissible donations within 30 days of receipt Evading the statutory restrictions on donations Making a return to us (including disclosing details of any relevant financial transactions) which is not complete and accurate, or is false Where you can find more information You can find the register of permitted participants (registered campaigners) for the EU Referendum, by looking at our online database of political parties, campaigners and political finance . Using the same database you can find details of all loans, donations and spending reported by those campaigners. You can find PPERA and EURA on the government's legislation website . The provisions governing donations are in Parts IV and VII, and Schedules 15 and 15A of PPERA, and in Schedule 1 of EURA. The provisions governing loans are in Schedule 15A of PPERA. Potential criminal offences From the evidence we gathered, we have reasonable grounds to suspect that a number of offences may have been committed. These relate to the financial transactions which led to the £8m being paid into BFTC's bank account. Mr Banks and Ms Bilney (and through them BFTC and Leave.EU) gave us unsatisfactory explanations about these transactions, and we have reasonable grounds to suspect that they knowingly concealed and sought to conceal the true circumstances. We also have reasonable grounds to suspect that a non-qualifying or impermissible person or body, Rock Holdings (incorporated in the Isle of Man), was a party to the relevant transactions. Further information about potential criminal offences Overview of our concerns The source of the £8m funding for BFTC We looked at the financial transactions that led to £8m being paid into BFTC's bank account, including analysing information concerning the various bank accounts involved. While Mr Banks was originally reported as the source of the funds, in responding to our investigation both he and Ms Bilney told us that the money came from the UK-generated funds of Rock Services. Ms Bilney also said that no undisclosed third party or foreign entity had provided funding to Mr Banks, BFTC or Leave.EU. However, she later told us that although Mr Banks was the source of the £8m, the money was in turn provided to Mr Banks by a shareholder loan. This loan, Ms Bilney said, was made to Mr Banks by Rock Services in the amount of £8m, but was not recorded in Rock Services' company accounts, and was instead recorded in Rock Holdings' company accounts even though Rock Holdings had nothing to do with the loan of £8m. In our analysis, Rock Services' then and historic profits were not sufficient to enable it to have funded the £8m. We have reasonable grounds to suspect that: Rock Services did not fund the payments of £8m it is said it made to BFTC from its UK-generated income Rock Holdings was a party to the relevant financial agreements and transactions, and to the loans For the purposes of PPERA, Rock Holdings, as a company registered in the Isle of Man, was a non-qualifying person. Registered campaigners in the EU Referendum were prohibited from accepting any loans from it, and from entering into any relevant financial transaction with it which did not comply with the relevant legislation. Concealment of other parties to the transactions BFTC and Leave.EU each provided us with various documents associated with the four loans they said were received from Mr Banks (one direct to BFTC and three to BFTC on behalf of Leave.EU). This material included loan agreements and deeds of variations. All the documentation reported Mr Banks as the only party to the transactions with, respectively, Leave.EU and BFTC. Leave.EU reported its three loans to us during the EU Referendum campaign as being from Mr Banks. In a previous investigation into Leave.EU, we concluded that this was not accurate, as at least Rock Services was also a party to the loans. During the present investigation, Ms Bilney told us that the parties to these loans were Mr Banks, Rock Services, BFTC and Leave.EU. We have reasonable grounds to suspect that the transactions, and the returns/reports made to us (and required) under the legislation, were designed to conceal the use of prohibited funds for campaigning in the EU Referendum. The evidence we looked at We asked BFTC, Rock Services, Mr Banks and Leave.EU for information, and had exchanges of letters and emails with them to obtain more information, and to clarify responses. We asked those campaigners who reported donations from BFTC for information, and received information from them all. We obtained information from Companies House in the UK and in Gibraltar. By using our legal powers under Schedule 19 paragraph 3 of PPERA, we obtained copies of bank account statements for various accounts held by Mr Banks, BFTC, Rock Services and Leave.EU. Referral to the National Crime Agency We have reasonable grounds to suspect a number of offences under electoral law may have been committed. Further offences are not within the regulatory remit of the Commission. For those offences where we may impose civil sanctions, our sanctions are limited at £20,000. The sums of money involved in these matters are significant. The relevant funding amounted to £8m, which included loans of £6m to Leave.EU, a registered campaigner in the EU Referendum. BFTC was loaned £2m, and put at least £2.9m into the referendum campaign. The financial transactions we have investigated include companies incorporated in Gibraltar and the Isle of Man. These jurisdictions are beyond the reach of the Electoral Commission for the purpose of obtaining information for use in criminal investigations or proceedings. Having considered these and other factors, the Commission, having completed its current investigation, has referred this matter to the NCA. We value the positive and constructive relationship we have with colleagues and work hard to maintain it. Our staff engagement group meets on a regular basis to seek input from colleagues on emerging issues and help to maintain good relations with staff. We also actively encourage staff involvement as part of the day-to-day process of line management, and we share information on current and prospective developments widely and regularly. To support this, we have a recognition agreement with the Public and Commercial Services Union. We completed our latest staff survey in December 2021 and 89% of employees responded. Our employee engagement score was 67% (down from 72% in 2020). Our scores compared most positively to the Civil Service benchmark in areas such as our people agreeing that: we took action after the previous survey they have an opportunity to contribute their views before decisions are made that affect them they would recommend the Electoral Commission as a place to work The areas where we compared least positively to the Civil Service benchmark and we need to improve on include people agreeing that: there are opportunities for them to progress in their careers at the Electoral Commission they have the IT systems and equipment they need to do their jobs effectively Change is managed well at the Commission Occupational health and safety We review our health and safety policy annually. We also have procedures, guidance and risk assessments in place to cover our core activities. A health and safety group oversees our arrangements. They meet regularly and report to our senior leadership group. However, primary responsibility for health and safety sits with people managers. We initiate independent health and safety audits of our premises each year, which involves inspecting working environments and reviewing safety management systems. These audits tell us if our arrangements are suitable and highlight any improvements we need to make. In 2021/22 we carried out specific risk assessments to ensure our sites were Covid secure prior to re-opening; routine assessments will restart once travel across the UK is permitted and our sites are fully back in use. Our environmental impact We recognise that delivering our activities has an impact on the environment and we continue to work towards minimising this impact. We lease office space in four cities from a combination of public and private sector property owners. We do not have direct control of utility supplier and waste disposal targets and management at our premises. For a number of our offices, the property owner manages energy and water consumption as well as waste disposal and recovers costs through a consolidated service charge. Offices in Edinburgh, Cardiff and Belfast have relocated to smaller, more environmentally efficient premises in the last 10 years. We completed the renewal of the lease for our London office in 2020. Initiatives are in place to help minimise environmental impact: reduced printed resources provided to electoral administrators and other groups, focusing on electronic provision wherever possible encouraged the use of video and teleconferencing to avoid unnecessary travel with consequential CO₂ emissions operated recycling facilities in all our offices upgraded to more energy efficient information communication technology equipment Summary (London office)

Performance commentary on emissions We aim to decrease our fossil fuel consumption year on year, an ongoing effect of the property owner's introduction of measures to reduce levels of electricity consumption, including lower 'out of hours' operation of plant and machinery and the introduction of energy-efficient lighting. Due to being in rented accommodation, we are restricted in our plans to cut emissions as these are primarily driven by our landlord. Waste report (London office) General waste and recycling figures are based on a proportion of total building waste and are not directly controllable by us. Confidential waste disposal for the organisation is handled separately from that for other building occupants. We shred the confidential waste we generate on-site before it is recycled into low-grade paper. The general and recycled waste is based on a proportion of total building waste. All general waste produced in the building, including that generated by us, is sent to a nearby energy from waste plant, instead of landfill sites. We have reduced our use of paper since 2017-18 to help cut our waste, since the introduction of hybrid working; we have further reduced our paper use significantly. Using our financial resources efficiently In 2021/22, our funding arrangements changed. Our funding is received from 3 Parliaments – UK, Scottish and Senedd. The combined resource initially made available to us was £22.5m voted activity. We also received non-voted funding of £200k to pay Commissioners' fees. This can be broken down by Parliaments: Parliament £m UK Parliament £18.3 Scottish Parliament £2.6 Senedd £1.8 Total Budget £22.7 In January 2022, we had our Supplementary Estimate Approved (HC1135). This changed our resource to capital mix, which increased our total budget by £0.3m. Our final budget breakdown: Department Expenditure Limit Voted £m Non-Voted £m Total £m Resource £17.3 £0.2 £17.5 Capital £0.9 - £0.9 Annually Managed Expenditure Voted £m Non-voted £m Total £m Resource £0.2 - £17.7 Total Net Budget Voted £m Non-voted £m Total £m Resource £17.5 £0.2 £17.7 Capital £0.9 - £0.9 Net cash requirement £17.5 - - The £2.6m from Scottish Parliament and £1.7m from Senedd, is shown as income throughout the accounts and Statements of Parliamentary Supply (SoPS). The remainder of the budget drawn down and not spent is included as deferred income in the Statement of Financial Position. In achieving our objectives, we have used £16.7m worth of resources for the whole year. This was out of the available sum of £17.7m approved by the UK Parliament in our Supplementary Estimate for the net resource voted requirement, net of income received from the devolved authorities. The graphic below summarises our financial performance on the ‘voted’ element of our budget. Financial performance 2021/22 Our financial performance follows our strategic performance, being dominated by a shifting electoral timetable. For the year 2021/22: our staff costs represented 65% of our resource expenditure, which is an increase from 2020/21 due to additional staff for the Elections Act and a lower overall budget from 2020/21 . our capital expenditure decreased by £0.6m from 2020-21 due to the refurbishment works within the London office during 2020/21. Overall Expenditure 2021/22 Expenditure Type Expenditure (£m) Staff costs £10.8 Public awareness £3.9 Other operation costs £3.6 Policy development grants £2 Depreciation and other non-cash items £0.7 Capital £0.5 The figures in the table above include costs funded by the Scottish Parliament and Senedd. We report our underspend to reflect in-year operational decisions, using HM Treasury’s preferred measure of current public spending (R-DEL excluding depreciation) and excluding Policy Development Grant which is distributed by formula set by government. In 2021/22 the underspend on this measure was £0.8m against the voted budget of £14.8m (5%). This was predominantly due to unused contingency, savings in campaigning for the May 2022 elections and staffing. The operating underspend is comprised of: £320k of unused contingency £159k reduced spend within the May elections £120k of underspends within staffing costs arising from delays filling vacancies, partly due to post-Covid labour-market conditions £116k within the digital transparency campaign and related expenditure 43k unspent Policy Development Grant from political parties Other underspend: £42k in depreciation £214k in provisions (Resource AME) due to less than expected pension and dilapidation movement £228k in capital projects due to shifts towards current investment in IT and delays to projects Our income in the accounts relates to charges for registering political parties. We also report and are accountable to the Senedd and Scottish Parliament Corporate Body. The income recognised in the accounts is predominately for devolved elections and referendum work. All income is recognised in note 4 of the accounts. We collect fines raised against political parties and individuals for failure to comply with the rules on party and election finance and then surrender these to the Consolidated Fund as required by law. The penalties due was £58k in 2021/22 received by 31 March 2022 and surrendered to the Consolidated Fund. In addition to monitoring performance against budgets, we also managed within our cash limits set by the UK Parliament. We required cash amounting to £16.3m in 2021/22 to finance our voted activities, which was £1.2m less than the sum of £17.5m approved by the UK Parliament in our Supplementary Estimate. The reconciliation of net resources outturn to net cash requirement provides a reconciliation from our outturn to the net cash we required in-year. The Statement of Cash Flows shows that the cash balance as at 31 March 2022 was £0.6m. The Statement of Financial Position as at 31 March 2022 shows positive taxpayers’ equity. Supplier Payments Although we are independent of government, we aim to comply with the Prompt Payment Code that operates across the public sector. The target is to pay undisputed invoices within 30 days. In 2021/22, we paid 100% of invoices (85% in 2020/21) within 30 days. Freedom of Information, complaints and parliamentary questions We are committed to the principles of openness and transparency in public life and acknowledge the duty to provide information to the public. In 2021/22, we received 140 Freedom of Information (FOI) requests. We responded to 130 (93.1%) of these within the 20 working days statutory timeframe (target: 90%). There were 12 FOI internal review requests received in the financial year, 11 of these were due and responded to in the financial year. Process and training improvements have had a positive impact on our response rate across this financial year. We have gone up from 91.9% in 2020-21 to 93.1% in 2021-22. We received 10 subject access requests and three requests for erasure under the UKGDPR, all responded to within the statutory response time frame of one calendar month. We handled 96 complaints compared to 51 in 2020/21. Of the 96 complaints handled; 95 have been completed and one is still active. Of the 95 that were completed; 86 were not upheld, three were partially upheld, two were upheld, two were closed due to no clarification being received from the complainant and two were withdrawn. The learnings gleaned from the investigations of these complaints were fed back to the relevant teams to support our commitment to continuous improvement. These complaints spanned a range of topics. Three complaints focussed on concerns regarding a media statement we released announcing our investigation into a party. These complaints were not upheld. 30 complaints focussed on alleged delays in assessing applications to register two new parties. These complaints were not upheld. 34 complaints focussed on concerns that we made mistakes carrying out our work when assessing an application to change the emblem of a party. Specifically when considering whether it may have misled voters. One of these complaints raised concerns about whether we had specifically considered whether voters with disabilities were more likely to be misled by the emblem. This specific complaint was partially upheld due to a lack of evidence but the other 33 were not upheld. We received three requests for review by the Chief Executive. While these reviews did not change the original outcome of the complaint, they did enable further explanation and assistance. In addition, we received correspondence from 668 members of the public that did not constitute complaints under our policy. Where possible the complaints team responded directly to the individual or alternatively forwarded the correspondence to the appropriate team to provide a response if technical expertise was required. Via our dedicated public information service, we responded to 4,463 public enquiries, received by phone and email. Through this service, we answered questions about how to register and vote in the May 2021 elections across Great Britain. We explained the public safety measures in place at polling stations, and how people can use absent voting methods to have their say without attending a polling station. We responded to 27 parliamentary questions during 2021/22, including questions about digital campaigning, electoral fraud, the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers and the effectiveness of electoral law. Chris Matheson MP, a member of the Speaker's Committee, was our spokesperson in the UK Parliament and answered questions on our behalf. Supply estimate for 2022-23 Our Main Supply Estimate for 2022/23 (HC1241) provides for a net resource requirement of £25.3m. This is a 44.6% increase from 2021/22 mainly due to the implementation of the Elections Bill. Our Main Estimate is broken down as follows:

	Departmental Expenditure Limit	Resource Voted £m	Non-voted £m	Total £m	Electoral Commission expenditure	£18.2	£0.2
£18.4	The Elections Bill	£5 - £5	Policy Development Grants	£2 - £2	Capital	£1.4 -

Capital	£0.1 - £0.1	Total Net Budget	Voted £m	Non-voted £m	Total £m	Resource	£35.3
£0.2	£25.5	Capital	£1.5 - £1.5	Net cash requirement	£26.1m	The Speaker's Committee approved this on 25 April 2022 and it was laid before House of Commons on 25 April 2022. The Commission is established by legislation and following the principles of the FReM there is an assumption of continued provision of service, there is nothing to suggest services provided by the Commission will cease or future funding will not be provided. published: 10 September 2020 Last updated: 18 June 2023 Introduction The Electoral Commission is an independent body set up by the UK Parliament, and its main functions are set out in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) as amended. Its aim is integrity and public confidence in the democratic process.
Commissioners, and the Commission as a body, are accountable to Parliament. Within the Commission, Commissioners are accountable to the Chair. Commissioners are expected to act at all times to further the Commission's aims and objectives, and uphold its impartiality. The purpose of this code is to provide clear guidance on the standard of behavior expected of you as an Electoral Commissioner, on the importance of collective responsibility, and on maintaining the highest standards of integrity, honesty, impartiality and objectivity which are integral to your role as Commissioner. These are the standards set out in the Nolan Principles (Appendix 6).
The onus is on Commissioners to declare any of the matters referred to in the Code, or report any change in their circumstances which might affect their position.
Electoral Commissioners should read the code, sign and date the declaration at the end of the document and return it to the Secretary to the Commission Board. When there are significant updates to the Code, Commissioners will be invited to sign the updated Code. Please keep a copy of the code for your information. Conflicts of interest The work of the Commission must be carried out free from any suggestion of improper influence, whether financial, personal, or political. This is crucial to maintaining public confidence in the Commission generally, and especially in its role as a regulator. We must be able to assure people that conflicts of interest are identified and managed promptly, transparently and securely; and that the information we hold is properly handled. At all times the key question to ask when assessing whether to record an interest, gift, form of hospitality or meeting is: does it impact on the work of the Electoral Commission or reasonable public perception of my role as an Electoral Commissioner? Every Commissioner is expected to act by drawing on their experience and knowledge for the benefit of the Commission's work. However, it is important that actual and potential conflicts of interest (real or that could be reasonably perceived) are disclosed to ensure that they can be recorded and that any potential reputational damage to either yourself or the Commission can be managed. The failure to declare an interest and then act appropriately can affect the validity of a decision. The test in all matters is - would a fair-minded and informed observer conclude that there is a real possibility of bias? The issue is not just whether there is bias, but instead could there be a reasonable suspicion of bias?
Decisions must be made in an impartial way without any opinions being formed beforehand (or the perception that they have been) if views and evidence have not been heard yet. You are required to declare all interests which may represent a conflict with your role at the Commission, for example paid and unpaid external appointments, consultancy, trusteeships, directorships, advisory and voluntary roles. You may wish to consult Commission colleagues, and in particular the Chair, before accepting other appointments which might affect your role either directly or indirectly, or in any way conflict with the interests of the Commission. If you have been asked to provide advice or to decide on issues relating to the work of the Commission, and which could be perceived as affecting the Commission's impartiality, you should consider carefully whether to accept the request. You are asked particularly to bear this in mind in relation to requests by: members of political parties, their officers or members a group or individual campaigning at an election or referendum (or where they could be perceived to have an association with the above). In other cases, if you are meeting someone who could be viewed as influential or significant (e.g. a minister or MP) in the Electoral Commission's sphere of activity, or if something comes up in conversation which relates to the Commission's activities, you should, within reason, consider reporting such meetings to the Chair.

There are certain political activities that you are prohibited from undertaking according to PPERA. See Appendix 1 for further details. A Commissioner ceases to hold office under PPERA on the occurrence of certain events. Removal from office may occur if the Speaker's Committee is satisfied that one or more grounds have been breached. It is your responsibility to bring actual or potential conflicts of interest, real or that could be reasonably perceived, to the attention of the Chair, the Chief Executive or the Secretary to the Commission Board as soon as you become aware of them. If you disclose an interest during a Board meeting, it will be recorded in the minutes, and you may be required to withdraw from the discussion or the decision in question. If you are aware in advance of the meeting of a conflict of interests, you may be excluded from distribution of related documents. If the conflict of interest does require you to withdraw from consideration of the matter, you should not seek to discuss the matter with or influence the decision-makers. More detailed guidance on identifying actual or potential conflicts of interest and on how the Board will manage the legal and reputational risks is at Appendix 8 . You must complete a 'Declaration of interests' form on appointment, and update it as your circumstances change. You will be sent reminders periodically asking you to update it. A register of interests is maintained by the Secretariat and published on the Commission's website. It may be found on this page. There are some grounds on which a Commissioner may cease or be removed from office. The grounds are set out in full in Schedule 1, paragraphs 3(3)-(5) of PPERA. These include being convicted of a criminal offence; being an undischarged bankrupt (or the Commissioner's estate having been sequestrated in Scotland and the Commissioner has not been discharged); there being a moratorium period under a debt relief order applying in relation to the Commissioner (under Part 7A of the Insolvency Act 1986); or having made an arrangement or composition contract with, or having granted a trust deed for, the Commissioner's creditors. . The grounds also include a Commissioner being listed by a registered non-party campaigner in its financial return to the Commission as a donor of £7,500 or more. A separate note on this exists at Appendix 1A By signing the Code of Conduct declaration, you are stating that none of these grounds apply to you. If there is a change in your circumstances which involves any of these grounds, you must report them to the Secretary to the Commission Board, or the Chair or the Chief Executive. Guidance on declaring interests is in Appendix 2 to the code. Gifts and hospitality In the course of your role as an Electoral Commissioner you may be offered gifts and hospitality, and indeed it can form an aspect of networking. However, Commissioners are expected to observe exceptionally high standards of personal honesty and integrity, and to avoid any accusations of having been unduly influenced. There is always a risk that accepting gifts or hospitality may attract criticism and leave you and the Commission open to a suspicion of undue influence. The principles underlying declarations to bear in mind include the following:

- Consideration of situations where an interest may be interpreted as a conflict
- The responsibility to declare interests rests with individual Electoral Commissioners
- Decisions of the Commission Board are taken under the principle of collective responsibility and Commissioners should ensure this is upheld

The registration of both gifts and hospitality, and interests, helps ensure public confidence in the Commission, and maintains accountability and transparency of decision-making. This helps to avoid any actual or perceived bias or influence. You are required to record all gifts and hospitality offered or received in your capacity as an Electoral Commissioner, including any which are refused. You are urged to decline where practicable any gifts you are offered, but sometimes to do so would cause offence, including when a gift is of nominal value. Completed declarations of gifts and hospitality are to be sent to the Secretary to the Commission Board, countersigned by the Chair, and reported periodically to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee. The register of gifts and hospitality is published after each Audit and Risk Assurance Committee, to this page of the Commission's website. You are also asked to disclose gifts and hospitality received in any non- Commission roles (as opposed to those of a private or family nature), for the sake of transparency and consistency, particularly if from a person or organisation which could be linked to the work of the Commission (such as a politician, campaign organisation, or lobbyist), or contacts with firms supplying goods or services the Commission is likely to use (IT, research, audit, consultancy), and these are recorded but not published. The detailed guidance on gifts and hospitality is attached in Appendix 3 to the code.

Confidentiality and personal liability

You have a general duty of confidentiality in common law to the Commission, requiring you to protect Commission information held in confidence (see also Section 5 below on information handling). You should not without authority disclose official information which has been communicated in confidence within the Commission or received in confidence from others. This applies both during and after your appointment as a Commissioner, and to information both oral and written. After your period as a Commissioner, you should avoid making any public statements which refer to your having been a Commissioner in such a way that would lead people to think that what you say represents current Commission policy or carries the implicit approval of the Commission. (If necessary, you should make an explicit disclaimer to ensure that no-one could be in any doubt on this point.) If you are minded to make a public statement about the Commission when you are no longer a Commissioner, you may conclude, depending on the context, that it is appropriate first to alert the current Chair of the Commission. In addition, there is specific legislation which applies to information held by the Commission. This includes: The Representation of the People (England and Wales) Regulations 2001 (and the corresponding regulations in Scotland and Northern Ireland) make it an offence to disclose to an unauthorised person details contained in the registers of electors to which Commissioners and Commission staff have access. The penalty for doing so is currently an unlimited fine in England and Wales, or a fine of up to £5,000 in Scotland and Northern Ireland. PPERA places a requirement on Commissioners and staff not to disclose the contents of certain donation or transaction (e.g. loan) reports from regulated recipients and participants in Northern Ireland. If you unlawfully disclose this information and are found guilty of an offence you may face an unlimited fine or be imprisoned for up to 51 weeks . You may be asked to comment on matters to the press or to answer questions. If you are approached, please direct your comments to the Media Relations Team who are responsible for helping to manage and co-ordinate the Commission's responses (the media team is on 020 7271 0704 during office hours, or out of hours on 07789 920414). Meanwhile it is advisable neither to comment nor to answer questions unless you have been authorised to do so. (See also paragraph 3.6 of the Corporate Governance Framework, on collective responsibility). Please see note on considerations to be taken into account should legal action be taken by a third party against a Commissioner in a personal capacity (as distinct from action against the Commission). Other – information handling and security whistle-blowing, bribery, resources Information handling, security and IT use The Commission's Standing Orders state, at paragraph A57, that: 'no Commissioner shall use information gained in the course of their duty for personal gain nor seek to use the opportunity of such public service to promote their own or other parties' private interests. Commissioners should at all times avoid behaving in a manner which might bring the Commission into disrepute.' The Electoral Commission has a number of policies governing the use of IT equipment and appropriate handling of information, which are available on the Commission's intranet. These include the Acceptable Use Policy, Social Media Policy and the Information Security Policy. Summarised guidance on information management and security is attached at Appendix 5 to this Code. Some key points are summarised below:

- The increasing use of e-communications for both business and personal use demands a heightened awareness of issues of security, confidentiality and what information may be placed in the public domain.
- You should be aware that anything posted to external social media sites could reflect on the Commission and its work and you should carefully consider what is posted in a personal capacity on, for example: - Twitter - YouTube - Facebook - LinkedIn - Google plus - Pinterest This list is not exhaustive and you can always contact the Commission's press team if you have any questions about this using the contact details above. Please ensure that any use of social media does not:
 - Call into question the political impartiality of the Commission
 - Present a conflict of interest with the activities of the Commission
 - Breach the confidentiality of the people and information connected to the CommissionYou should log into your virtual PC using the Commission's home working solution to access Commission information. The IT Help Desk staff will help you set this up. Access from Windows PCs and Apple Macs is currently supported. Using the home working solution means that all data remains within the Commission's network and is therefore secure. It also means that you have access to all the software systems that are available. Commissioners may, from time to time, be asked to search their email accounts for information that may be relevant to requests under the Data Protection and Freedom of Information Acts. This may include searching your personal email accounts if the account has been used to generate emails as part of your Commission role in the past. The Commission's FOI internal procedure gives further details. If the scope of a request includes communications that could be held in Commissioner personal accounts, you will be asked to conduct a search within your personal email accounts using appropriate keywords. Personal email accounts should not be used for Commission business and any difficulties encountered by Commissioners in using Commission email accounts or Commission IT facilities should be referred to the IT Helpdesk. Whistle-blowing If you believe that you are being required to act in a way which:

- is illegal, discriminatory, improper or unethical
- is in breach of this Code
- may involve possible maladministration, fraud or misuse of public funds;
- is otherwise inconsistent with the Code or if:

- you believe there is evidence of irregular or improper behavior in the organisation but where you have not been personally involved
- there is evidence of criminal or unlawful activity by others
- you are required to act in a way which, for you, raises a fundamental issue of conscience then you should immediately refer your concerns to the Chief Executive, the Chair of the Commission, or the Chair of the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee.

Bribery (a criminal offence) will occur in circumstances involving:

- The offering, giving, solicitation or the acceptance of any inducement or reward (whether financial or otherwise);
- To or from a person or company, wherever they are situated and whether they are a public official or body or private person or company;
- By any individual employee, Board Member / Commissioner, acting on the Commission's behalf; where such action is intended to amount to or bring about improper performance of a relevant function or activity of the Commission, person or company.

If you discover or suspect bribery involving any Commissioner, member of staff, person or company, you should immediately report your concerns to the Chief Executive, the Chair of the Commission, or the Chair of the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee.

The combined anti fraud and anti-bribery policy is at Appendix 7. The policy also applies to Commission staff.

Safeguarding public resources You have a duty to safeguard public resources and to use responsibly any public resources at your disposal as an Electoral Commissioner. The Commission's travel and subsistence policy (which applies both to Commissioners and to staff) can be found on the intranet. The guidance for claiming fees and travel and subsistence, which sets out how to complete claims, is in Appendix 4.

The Code of Conduct was reviewed and approved by the Board on 22 March 2023

Report: 2018 recall petition in North Antrim | Electoral Commission Search Report: 2018 recall petition in North Antrim You are in the Recall petitions section Home Recall petitions On this page Summary How the recall petition was run Transparency and secrecy Further recommendations for change First published: 5 November 2018 Last updated: 29 July 2019 Overview From 8 August to 19 September 2018, electors in the constituency of North Antrim were able to take part in the first ever recall petition in the UK. This report covers how the petition was run and makes some recommendations for future recall petitions. Summary The North Antrim recall petition was the first to take place across the UK since the Recall of MPs Act was introduced in 2015. It was the first time the legislation was tested and has provided an opportunity to look at lessons to be learnt and improvements that could be made for any future recall petition in the UK. Our report is based on feedback from those who administered the petition and those who campaigned during the petition period, as well as our own observations. This highlighted a number of issues which would merit further consideration by the UK Government. However, it should be acknowledged that these are based on the experience of running only one recall petition, and different issues could arise if a recall petition were to take place in any other constituency in the UK. Findings and recommendations Overall we found that the Petition Officer successfully delivered all of her duties as required under the Act. There were no significant problems in the delivery of the recall petition which affected voters or any individuals or organisations wishing to campaign. We recognise that the decision to use only three signing places was the subject of much debate and criticism. However, we have found no evidence that an increased number of signing places would have contributed to a different result at the end of the recall petition. Feedback from those who worked and campaigned at the recall petition was that the six week signing period was too long. Concerns were also raised as to whether there was enough awareness amongst electors on how they could participate. In light of this we have recommended that the UK Government should: Consider whether a signing period of six weeks is appropriate and whether this should be changed for future recall petitions. Consider how electors can get information about the recall petition and how they can take part in it if they so wish. We have also asked the Government to explore what more can be done to improve transparency in the delivery of recall petitions whilst also ensuring that electors can have confidence in the integrity and secrecy of a petition How the recall petition was run Background On 26 July MPs voted to suspend Ian Paisley MP for North Antrim for 30 sitting days. This was in response to a report by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards, which found that Mr Paisley had committed multiple breaches of the Code of Conduct for MPs in relation to two family holidays paid for by the Sri Lankan government. The Recall of MPs Act 2015 introduced a process where a sitting MP can lose their seat in the House of Commons if there is a successful petition to recall them. One of the conditions to trigger a recall petition is if an MP is barred from sitting in the House for 10 or more sitting days. As required under the Act, the Speaker of the House of Commons wrote to the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland, in her role as Petition Officer, to notify her that a recall petition should be opened in the constituency of North Antrim for a period of six weeks. The report We are required to publish a report on any recall petition after the end of the recall petition period. For this report we have gathered information from the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland; Electoral Commission representatives who observed at the signing places, verification and count; staff who worked at the signing places; and political parties and campaigners. Although we did not carry out research with the public we have taken into account any comments made by electors to the Electoral Office, staff at the signing places and ourselves about their experience of signing the petition. The North Antrim recall petition was the first to take place across the UK and the first time the legislation was tested. It has provided an opportunity to look at lessons to be learnt and improvements that could be made for any future recall petition in the UK. However, it is important to bear in mind the unique political circumstances that can exist in any one constituency when considering what a recall petition might look like elsewhere in the UK. How the recall petition was run Roles and responsibilities The Petition Officer is the same person as the Returning Officer in a constituency. As the constituency where the petition took place was in Northern Ireland the Petition Officer was the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland. Her role was to: open a recall petition oversee the administration of the petition, including publishing a register of electors who can sign the petition and notifying those electors of the petition declare the result, including notifying the Speaker of the House of Commons receive donation and spending returns and make them available for public inspection We also has a number of roles in the recall petition process. This includes providing advice and guidance to help people running and taking part in the petition understand the rules. We can also seek forfeiture of impermissible donations, if necessary by court order. The police also have a role in recall petitions to investigate breaches of the rules set out in the Recall Act and to enforce compliance with the law.

Setting up the recall petition Notification of the recall petition Under the Recall Act the Petition Officer is required to designate a day for the petition to open no later than 10 days, or as soon as reasonably practical, after notification from the Speaker of the House of Commons. Within this time the Petition Officer was required to publish a register of electors who could sign the petition and notify them that the petition was taking place. The notification letter gave the elector information about: why the petition was taking place what would happen if the petition was successful and unsuccessful - either that a by-election would be held, or Ian Paisley MP would continue in his role how someone could sign the petition the address and a map of their designated signing place (including opening times) how to apply to sign by post or proxy the need to bring electoral ID (as required in Northern Ireland). A total of 75,428 electors were eligible to sign the petition at their allocated signing venue, or by applying to sign by post or proxy. There was little opportunity to allow for any new applications to register to be made given the requirement for a petition to be opened within 10 days of the notification being received from the Speaker. All of these requirements placed a considerable administrative burden on the Petition Officer and the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland, particularly as many senior staff were absent in the normally quieter summer months. Despite this, the Petition Officer successfully met all her statutory requirements within the required timeframes. The register was published on 3 August, notifications were sent to all electors on 6 and 7 August and the petition opened on 8 August. Signing places Under the Recall Act, the Petition Officer can designate up to 10 signing places where people can sign the petition. Signing places must be open for the six weeks of the recall petition on Monday to Friday between the hours of 9am and 5pm. However, the Petition Officer has discretion to extend these hours. The Petition Officer decided to use three places located in the main towns of the constituency – Ballymena, Ballymoney and Ballycastle. This meant that no elector would have to travel more than 15 minutes to get to their designated signing venue. Unlike elections in Northern Ireland, applications to vote by post or proxy could be made without having to provide a valid reason. This offered greater flexibility in how someone could sign the petition. The decision to only use three signing places was met with opposition by a number of political parties. They highlighted that there were 53 polling places used in the constituency during the last election and that the decision to use only three places greatly reduced accessibility for electors, particularly for those living outside of the main towns. The Petition Officer did receive some complaints from electors about the choice of places, but we received no complaints from electors about their allocated signing place. It is difficult to judge what impact using more than three places for the recall petition would have had on electors in the constituency. We have seen no evidence that an increased number of signing places would have contributed to a different result at the end of the recall petition. The use of more places would have required additional staff and put extra pressure on the Petition Officer and her staff throughout the duration of the recall petition. We have no evidence that an increased number of signing places would have contributed to a different result at the end of the recall petition, but this needs to be considered in the context of an individual constituency, and balanced against the length of the signing period and the hours in which the signing places are open. Electors had six weeks in which to sign the petition at their designated venue and could also sign by post or appoint a proxy on demand. This is a significant factor to consider when compared to all other electoral events in Northern Ireland where electors are required to give a valid reason as to why they cannot attend their polling station in person. Opening hours of the recall petition Signing places were open Monday to Friday, 9am to 5pm, for a period of six weeks. There was criticism from some political parties that the signing hours were a barrier for people working traditional full time working hours and therefore unable to sign the petition at their designated signing place. Comparisons were made with polling stations which are open from 7am to 10pm at elections and therefore recognise and facilitate the work and life commitments of many voters. To address this concern, the Petition Officer extended the opening hours of the signing places to 9pm on two evenings. However, this decision was only confirmed after electors were notified of their signing venue and opening hours of 9am to 5pm. The Petition Officer used media and social media in the constituency to highlight the extended hours and the deadline for postal and proxy applications but it is hard to assess what impact, if any, this may have had. However, the feedback from the Petition Officer suggests there was a small increase in the number of electors who signed on these days compared to other days. The six week signing period Commission representatives observed proceedings on 11 days during the six week period, including the two evenings when signing hours were extended. Our representatives spoke to petition staff at each of the signing places and watched as electors signed the petition. Overall, the feedback was that the signing places were quiet during most days of the recall petition. Overall feedback received from petition staff and those who campaigned at the recall petition was that the six week period was too long. The Petition Officer told us that at the start and the end of the six week period turnout was considerably higher than on some other days in the middle weeks, and on some days it was very low. On the first day of the recall petition there was significant media interest and queues at some of the signing places but it became quieter after that at each of the signing places. A number of alternative suggestions were proposed by petition staff and campaigners on how long a recall petition should last. These ranged from two to four weeks with longer opening hours and the availability of weekend signings. It was also suggested that the petition could be signed on one day as is the case with elections and referendums. It was suggested that reducing the length of the recall petition period would increase accessibility to the overall process for electors. While there may be merit in some of these suggestions, further consideration would be needed on the wider implications of any such change. For example, longer opening hours could make the petition more accessible to people wanting to sign in person, but would have an impact for those running the petition, particularly in terms of staffing and resourcing. The UK Government should consider whether a signing period of six weeks is appropriate and whether this should be changed for future recall petitions.

Absent votes In total 3,233 postal signing papers were issued at the recall petition. Approximately 1,000 postal signing papers were not returned. A total of 10 electors chose to appoint a proxy. At the 2017 UK parliamentary general election, where electors were not allowed to have a postal vote on demand, 1,163 postal votes were issued in North Antrim, and 1,048 were returned. Overall the postal and proxy application process worked well and no significant issues emerged. The Petition Officer also asked Royal Mail to do a sweep of their sorting offices as the deadline approached to ensure that any postal signing papers could be included in the final count. A total of 12 signing papers were found during this sweep. As previously outlined, the fact that electors could apply for a postal signing paper 'on demand' during the six week period increased the accessibility of the recall petition as it offered electors choice via an alternative way to sign the petition if they were working, away from home, or were unable or who did not want to go to their designated signing place.

Verification of signing papers There is a requirement, under the Recall Act, for daily verification of signing papers to take place during a recall petition. This required the breaking of the seal of each ballot box and verifying the number of each signing paper within it. This process could be carried out by the Petition Officer or the Petition Clerk in each of the signing places. To maintain the security and integrity of the recall petition, the Petition Officer decided to complete the daily verification of the ballot boxes at the Belfast headquarters of the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland. This meant that the boxes were collected, delivered and returned each day between Belfast and the three signing places. The boxes were stored securely in Belfast each night.

Although this process worked well in practice, we think it lacked transparency. This is because the Recall Act makes no provision for observers and/or campaigners to observe this part of proceedings. The Petition Officer shared our concerns about the lack of transparency and therefore requested that Commission representatives attend every daily verification of the signing papers. We take a risk based approach to observing electoral events and did not believe attending every verification was necessary as we were satisfied with how the process was being conducted by the Petition Officer. However, Commission representatives were able to observe and attended verification on 15 evenings and were content with the processes put in place to manage the daily verification and how it was completed. Although we were satisfied with the processes put in place to manage the verification of signing papers at this recall petition, it is clear that more access to independent observation of this process would be beneficial to ensure confidence in its integrity. The UK Government should give careful consideration to how access to the recall petition proceedings can be enhanced so as to improve transparency.

The count The counting of signing papers commenced at 00:01 on Thursday 20 September. Although signing places closed at 5pm the previous day there was no provision within the Recall Act for when the count should start. The law was also unclear about the deadline for the receipt of postal signing papers. For this reason, the Petition Officer decided to commence the count after midnight to allow for any additional postal signing papers to be received. Commission staff attended the count and saw that, overall, the count process worked well. Sufficient count staff were put in place and the overall management of the count was professional. The count was completed in approximately one hour and the Petition Officer notified the Speaker of the House of Commons of the result immediately. It was unclear from the provisions of the Act as to how the Speaker should be notified, but the Petition Officer had agreed in advance to email his office and await a reply. Once this was received the Petition Officer published the result and notified the media. In total, 9.4% of eligible electors signed the petition. This meant that the petition was unsuccessful and no by-election was triggered. Ian Paisley MP therefore kept his seat. Overall awareness of the recall petition In the absence of public opinion research or direct contact with electors it is difficult to gauge public opinion on the administration of the recall petition. Given the time constraints, and that this was a local issue within one constituency, we did not conduct any public opinion research as we would at major electoral events. However, the evidence available to us from our observations and feedback from campaigners and petition staff suggests that there may not have been a strong awareness amongst electors of the recall petition throughout the whole six week period. As expected, there was significant and intense interest in the run-up to and start of the petition by the media. However, this quickly diminished within a few days. Campaigning by the two registered campaigners was relatively low key and the sitting MP, Ian Paisley, did not actively campaign in the petition. A number of political parties told us that they felt there was an overall lack of public awareness of the recall petition. They argued that, as this was different from an election, many of those who could sign the petition were unaware of how the process was run or how they could participate. It was suggested to us by one political party that some electors only realised the petition was over when the result was announced in the media. One political party also highlighted to us that, although much was made of the increased availability of postal and proxy signing, many electors did not know what 'on demand' applications meant or how they could apply for one. It is not possible to know if this had any impact at the North Antrim recall petition, and there is no evidence available to suggest it would have changed the result. However, it is important to emphasise that a recall petition is different from an election. At an election promoting awareness and encouraging participation are possible without appearing to favour any particular candidate or party. This is not the case with a recall petition where there is a significant risk that actively encouraging participation could be seen as taking a side and could therefore potentially undermine the integrity of the recall petition. It may be the case that when the Recall Act was introduced there was an expectation that campaigners themselves would raise awareness of the recall petition and how electors could take part. However the general lack of campaigning in North Antrim may have contributed to a lack of awareness of a new process being run for the first time. Government and Petition Officers at future recall petitions should consider further ways of how electors can get information about the recall petition and how they can take part in it if they so wish. Any changes to how a recall petition is promoted should be clearly set out in legislation with clearly defined instructions on the actions a Petition Officer should take. Transparency and secrecy Concerns were raised at an early stage of the recall petition by some campaigners about a 'lack of secrecy' which may have stopped some electors from signing the petition. This was because when an elector entered a room at a signing place it was clear that their intention was to sign the petition to unseat their MP and trigger a by-election. The feedback we received from petition staff was that this seemed odd when compared to an electoral event where the elector's decision remains secret throughout. The Petition Officer was aware of this issue and made efforts to ensure there was a balance between privacy and ease of access for electors at the signing places. During the recall petition period the rooms used within some of the signing places did change to address this, but this was often met with further criticism around accessibility and privacy. In our view, the rooms used were suitable for the recall petition but we recognise that some concerns were raised about the room used in the Ballymena signing place as it was clearly visible from the reception area and close to the front door of the leisure centre. We received no complaints from electors around secrecy or intimidation at any of the signing places. Anyone who had concerns about signing at a signing place had the option to sign by post or appointing a proxy, which would offer greater secrecy.

Petition Officers at future recall petitions should take into account the need for privacy when allocating signing places within their constituency. Transparency and Secrecy Access to the marked register The wording on the official petition notice sent to electors stated that the marked register would be available for public inspection after the petition if there was suspected fraud. However, there is no actual provision in the legislation that would have allowed the marked register in North Antrim to be made available for public inspection, or for it to be supplied to the police, the Electoral Commission or anyone who requested it. The Petition Officer made clear that her intention was that the marked register would not be available at all for public inspection. This is different from Great Britain, where there is provision in the legislation for the marked register to be made available for inspection after a recall petition in the event of potential fraud. It is not clear whether this was a deliberate policy difference or an accidental omission in the legislation, but it does raise questions about the secrecy of the recall petition. At elections the marked register is made available to political parties to assist in campaigning at future elections. Although it indicates that an elector did vote, it in no way shows how the elector voted. This is not the case with the marked register at a recall petition which would show that someone had signed the petition with the intention of unseating their MP. We recommend that the UK Government review the purpose and workings of the provision to access the marked register ahead of any future recall petition in order to ensure the appropriate balance is struck between maintaining secrecy and challenging fraud. Observing the recall petition Independent observation is an important part of any democratic process. For over a decade we have accredited hundreds of electoral observers who have attended and observed the electoral process in action. However, under the current legislation, the opportunity to observe proceedings at a recall petition is limited only to Commission representatives: Electoral Commissioners and staff of the Electoral Commission. Individuals and organisations accredited as electoral observers are not entitled to observe any proceedings within a signing place, the issue and receipt of postal signing papers, or verification of the signing papers. Accredited individual electoral observers can attend the counting of signatures, but those nominated by an accredited organisation cannot. It may be the case that this was a deliberate policy decision to ensure the secrecy of the recall petition and to prevent individuals or organisations from working out if the 10% threshold had been reached before the end of the petition period. We received no queries from accredited observers who wished to attend proceedings at the recall petition and only one accredited individual observer attended the count. It would be helpful for future recall petitions for the UK Government to clarify its rationale for limiting observation of the process and to consider if anything further can be done to enhance transparency and confidence in the recall petition process. Integrity of the recall petition Despite concerns around transparency, we are satisfied that the integrity of this recall petition was maintained throughout. We received no complaints regarding allegations of fraud and saw no evidence of fraud during the six week signing period. Further recommendations for change Throughout the duration of the recall petition, the Commission and the Petition Officer identified a number of inconsistencies and omissions in the legislation. This may be expected given that this is the first time that the legislation has been tested. While many of these are minor, they can create an additional administrative burden and a lack of clarity that could impact on the successful delivery of a recall petition. The UK Government should consider opportunities that are available to make amendments ahead of any future recall petition. We have addressed some of these changes in our report, including access to the marked register and observation of proceedings, but draw particular attention to the following: Further recommendations for change Close of the recall petition Although the legislation states that signing places must be open at least from 9am to 5pm, there is no clear provision for what time the recall petition should close on the final day. This needs to be addressed as currently postal signing papers can still be returned on the final day up until 11.59 as there is no deadline for the receipt of postal signing papers. The lack of certainty around timing meant that the count did not commence until 00:01 on Thursday 20 September when the Petition Officer was satisfied the petition was closed. Notifying the speaker The Petition Officer must notify the Speaker of the House of Commons of the result before an announcement is made. However, there is no provision in law as to how this should happen and in what form the notification should be made. There is an expectation for instant news amongst the public, and clarity on this process would assist the Petition Officer in their planning process. There is also no provision to notify the MP who is subject to the recall petition of the result. Consideration should be given to addressing this issue ahead of any future recall petition. Appointing a Deputy Petition Officer There is currently no provision to allow for the Petition Officer to appoint a Deputy to act on their behalf. During daily verification of ballot boxes only the Petition Officer or Petition Clerk at a signing venue can break the seal. At the North Antrim recall petition this meant that the Petition Officer was required to be present every evening for the daily verification for the entire six week period. This created an unnecessary burden on the Petition Officer and the UK Government should consider enabling the Petition Officer to appoint a Deputy to assist them in delivering their duties. Prohibition on the publication of exit polls Under the current rules for a recall petition, it is forbidden to publish a statement that could indicate if an individual has signed the petition or not. It also prohibits publication of any forecasts on the result of the petition. This provision caused concern and confusion among campaigners, the media and the public. As currently drafted it appears that anyone who makes any statement on turnout or about individuals who sign the petition would be guilty of an offence. This could be punishable by a fine or imprisonment of up to six months. For example, two elected representatives were spoken to by the Police for making remarks online that gave some suggestion as to what turnout may have been at points during the recall petition process. Although the original intention may have been to maintain secrecy of the recall petition it is not clearly defined as to how this should be done in practice. As such it would be beneficial if more clarity and guidance on this provision was put in place ahead of any future recall petitions. Using public data sources to improve electoral registration in the UK | Electoral Commission Search Using public data sources to improve electoral registration in the UK You are in the Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies section Home A modern electoral register Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies First published: 26 July 2019 Last updated: 8 June 2021 Summary We conducted feasibility studies to explore the potential for giving EROs access to reliable and trusted information from other public sources to maintain accurate and complete electoral registers. Public data sources included the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, HM Passport Office, HM Revenue and Customs, Department for Work and Pensions, Department for Education and the Education and Skills Funding Agency. Policy options included: Policy options included: allowing EROs to access recent transactional data to identify potentially eligible electors and invite them to register; enabling EROs to use data sources to target specific groups of under-registered electors; and more automatic or direct forms of electoral registration, whereby eligible individuals could be added to the electoral register, or have their details updated without their intervention. The implementation scenarios we tested assumed that the Individual Electoral Registration Digital Service could be further developed to act as a conduit, receiving recent transactional data from new data sources and passing this on to EROs, who could download the information into their EMS systems and then target potential electors.

We also considered whether these reforms could be taken further to support increased levels of automation within the electoral registration system. We found that digital data sharing, including more automated forms of registration, could be implemented by building on the existing IER infrastructure and without fundamentally changing the structure of the electoral registration system in the UK

Data sources and infrastructures

Public data sources

We began by identifying potentially useful national data sources. We were interested in finding out the types of information recorded in the data sources that could potentially help identify different social groups; the geographical scope of each database; and current uses of the data.

Public data sources

Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (DVLA) databases These contain information about drivers and registered keepers of vehicles in the UK. They can provide transactional data of all new applications for driving licences or vehicle registered keepers. With approximately four million driving licence applications and three million driving licence changes per year, DVLA data could potentially be a very useful source to identify potentially eligible electors. This data source could be useful in identifying movers as drivers are meant to update their address data every time they move (although of course some do not).

HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC) databases

HMRC hold data on tax payers and citizens claiming child benefit. Several organisations use HMRC data for statistics or to verify datasets against. Their data could be useful to identify eligible electors within a geographical area who have not yet been identified by an ERO.

HM Passport Office databases

The Passport Office receives an estimated seven million UK passport applications annually, information which could potentially be used by EROs. An advantage of passport data compared to other public data sources is that it includes information about a person's nationality, which is one of the current criteria for determining a person's eligibility to register.

Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) databases

Electoral registration applications are already verified against DWP data, using full name, date of birth and National Insurance number (NINO). Since only citizens applying for benefits will regularly be in contact with the DWP, there may be limits on the accuracy and currency of other address data held by the DWP.

Education databases

There are a number of potentially useful databases in the education sector that could help EROs to identify attainers and other young people. These include databases held by the Education and Skills Funding Agency, including the Learning Records Service, which collects data relating to learners registering for relevant post-14 qualifications. Each learner has a unique learner number (ULN). There is an estimated 1.1 million new ULN applications annually, as well as 1.8 million apprenticeship applications that could be used to identify attainers and potentially eligible 18-25 year olds. In addition, the Department for Education keeps a record of pupils in England attending state schools and colleges and higher education (although not pupils in private education) in the National Pupil Database, while the Scottish Government, Welsh Government and Northern Ireland's Department of Education administer and collate data for their respective Annual School Censuses.

Data infrastructures

We also wanted to understand the infrastructure requirements needed to support more data-driven approaches to electoral registration. An obvious starting point was the IER Digital Service. This is because it already links all local authorities with a central service capable of verifying people against the DWP system as part of the registration application process. The IER Digital Service was implemented in 2014 and incorporates an "IER hub", which acts as 'link' and coordinator between the website (online application), DWP (application verification) and the EROs' EMS systems (372 registers). We felt that there might be scope to enhance the IER Digital Service by building APIs (Application Programming Interfaces) that would link new data sources with the IER hub. EROs could then download transactional data relating to citizens living locally who had recently accessed a particular government service (for example, DVLA, HM Passport Office) through their EMS system and use this data to identify potential electors who could then be invited to register, or registered automatically. We discussed data infrastructures with representatives from a number of Data Source Organisations (DSOs) in order to examine the scope for linking their systems to the existing IER architecture, and also had conversations with several EMS suppliers to explore potential compatibility with their systems.

Making better use of public data: implementation scenarios

Based on our understanding of national data sources and infrastructures we developed and tested two implementation scenarios. The scenarios assumed (an assumption tested by the feasibility study) that the IER hub could be further developed to act as a conduit, receiving datasets from a data source and passing it on to EROs who could download it via their EMS systems. The feasibility study showed that both data sharing scenarios could be implemented by building on the existing IER infrastructure and without fundamentally changing the structure of the electoral registration system. Electoral registers would still be compiled and maintained locally, but with EROs being given access to transactional data from DSOs through further development of the IER hub.

Issues and challenges in public data sharing

While the feasibility studies showed that digital data sharing using national data sources is feasible technically, there are a number of outstanding issues and challenges. Issues and challenges in public data sharing

Legal Data cannot be shared by a DSO without legislation, e.g. the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Act 2005 does not allow the HMRC to share data without a legal gateway. However, we believe that a suitable legal gateway could be created by the Secretary of State making regulations giving EROs power to inspect the records held by specific public authorities. An alternative route based on an individual consenting to the sharing of their data with another public authority could also be pursued.

Operational The success of any data sharing arrangements would depend upon the availability of adequate resources with the necessary skillsets available on both sides of the data sharing link to implement and manage the data sharing process. For example: The DSO would need resources to set up the required infrastructure on their side to share data, e.g. an automated trigger to create and/or send recent transactional datasets to EROs or the IER hub. The DSO and Government Digital Service (GDS) would have to work together to set up an interface between the data source and IER hub, e.g. an API. GDS technical staff would need to be available for further IER hub developments and support the DSOs and EROs to develop the interfaces. The ERO and/or EMS supplier would need technical staff to work with the DSO or GDS to set up the interfaces between the EMS system and the IER hub or directly with the data source systems, e.g. APIs, as well as any other necessary developments or enhancements, e.g. automated processes in the EMS system. DSO and ERO staff would have to be trained to ensure they have the right skillset to follow the data sharing process.

Scheduling Any initiative to introduce digital data sharing using national data sources would require effective coordination to ensure that development and implementation schedules were agreed and all required stakeholders worked together and were committed to delivering the reforms. Any scheduling conflicts between stakeholders would need to be assessed carefully and resolved before any work was commenced.

Economic A detailed cost-benefit analysis would need to be completed on the data sharing options to further explore the cost-effectiveness of the proposed reforms. This would require access to public data sources, enabling detailed testing to be undertaken (which would require a legal gateway and incur a cost). One option would be to conduct a pilot scheme matching transactional data from national public databases against electoral registers in a number of areas (covering different demographics) to produce a list of potential unregistered electors for EROs to contact. The transactional data would need to be recent (e.g. the record currency could be restricted to the previous month) and matched against the most recently updated version of the full electoral register in the selected local authority areas. The aim of such a pilot scheme would be to provide a reliable assessment of the proportion of transactional data returned to EROs containing potential new electors. The pilot could also include an assessment of the added value to EROs of allowing access to national data, as compared to local data which they already have access to. In this way, it might be possible to estimate the cost-benefit of national digital data sharing – e.g. by calculating the cost per new elector registered. This could be calculated by dividing the total cost of implementing high-level digital data sharing (i.e. set-up and ongoing costs) by the number of potential new electors identified within the transactional data that resulted in a new registration. It would then be possible to assess whether the initiative was a cost-effective way of getting people onto the electoral register. Other potential cost implications that would need to be explored relate to the commercial arrangements between the DSOs, GDS and EROs, and would need to cover:

- Set-up costs, including APIs, IER hub development, automation of tasks e.g. triggers to send datasets or letters to citizens
- Cost per transaction i.e. cost of sending transactional data from a DSO

Any charges for accessing an organisation's data

- Additional staff and non-staff resources to set up and maintain the solution
- Maintenance cost of software and hardware
- Cost of data matching tools

Further development and maintenance of the IER hub

- Automated and automatic registration

We considered whether the models of digital data sharing between DSOs and EROs could be taken further and support the implementation of automated or automatic systems of electoral registration. To recap: Automated registration would see reliable data being used as the basis of an individual's electoral registration application, but the individual would still be required to take some further, affirmative steps before being added to the register. Automatic registration would see citizens added to the electoral register, or their address updated, without them being required to take any further steps at all. We developed and tested two implementation scenarios – one for a system of automated registration, the other for a system of automatic registration. In developing the scenarios, we also considered models from other countries. For example, in Australia, a Federal Direct Enrolment & Update process has been introduced to enrol or update a citizen's details on the electoral roll using information provided to the Australian Electoral Commission from other government agencies, without the person having to complete an enrolment form. The feasibility studies concluded that both automated and automatic registration could be implemented in technical terms, in theory by utilising the same data sources and infrastructures explored in the better use of data feasibility study. The operational requirements of both reforms would also be similar. However, we identified several important issues unique to automatic registration. Automated and automatic registration Data quality The higher the level of automaticity in the electoral registration process, the greater the requirement for public data sources used by EROs to be trustworthy, current and complete. Clearly, recent transactional data from reliable data sources would offer the most potential in these respects. But the data would ideally need to be complete too, insofar as it would need to contain all of the fields necessary (i.e. name, address, date of birth, National Insurance number and nationality) to initiate an automatic registration. In practice, automatic registration may require EROs to combine information from different datasets, which would make implementation more complex. Automatic registration and individual choice Current legislation requires the individual to make an application to register to vote. There are statutory questions that form part of the electoral registration application process that can only be answered by an individual and cannot be extracted from any other source, e.g. whether the elector would want to opt out of the open register or apply to vote by post. Any move towards automatic registration would need to consider the implications of removing these additional choices that citizens have when registering to vote. More fundamentally, automatic registration would represent a shift away from the current default position that an individual must always take proactive steps to be registered or update their details; it would represent an in principle acceptance of the idea that the state may in certain circumstances proactively register citizens without their consent. Report: Political finance regulation at the May 2015 UK general election | Electoral Commission Search Report: Political finance regulation at the May 2015 UK general election You are in the UK general elections section Home UK general elections On this page Recommendations for improving the regulatory framework Download our full report Download the candidate spending data First published: 20 June 2019 Last updated: 6 April 2020 About this report On 7 May 2015, a UK Parliamentary general election (UKPGE) was held to elect 650 members to the United Kingdom Parliament. This report focuses on spending and donations reported by campaigners in relation to these elections. 1 This is the Commission's second report on the UKPGE held in 2015. We have a statutory duty to report on the administration of certain major electoral events, including UK Parliamentary general elections. We also have a duty to keep under review and report on the law relating to elections, including the registration of political parties and the regulation of their income and expenditure. This report forms part of our work under those duties.

Recommendations for improving the regulatory framework The Electoral Commission's statutory role as the regulator of party and election finance in the UK includes a duty to keep the legal framework under review, and report on our conclusions. Some of these recommendations will require the UK Government and Parliament to implement changes. Following the implementation of the Smith Commission and St David's Day Agreement, most of the matters covered in these recommendations will also be within the remit of the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly in relation to elections to the Scottish Parliament and National Assembly for Wales and local government elections.

Recommendation 1: Investigation and sanctioning powers for noncompliance with candidate spending and donation rules

We continue to recommend that the Electoral Commission should be provided with investigative powers and sanctions for offences relating to candidate spending and donations at specified elections. We think these tools should initially be available at elections where, from our experience, unsanctioned breaches of those rules are likely to have the most impact.

These are elections to the following legislatures: UK Parliament Scottish Parliament National Assembly for Wales Northern Ireland Assembly Any proposed changes would need to consider the costs of setting up a new regulatory framework together with the potential regulatory benefits. We would then consider whether these powers should be extended to other elections in due course.

Recommendation 2: Spending in constituencies

We recommend that the relationship between the definitions of regulated candidate spending and regulated political party spending that has been in place since 2000* should be reviewed by Governments, Parliaments and others, with a particular focus on spending in constituencies. We intend to contribute to this consideration by undertaking further analysis of spending reported at recent elections.

Recommendation 3: Campaigning using social media

We will give further consideration to how campaigners should report spend on social media at future elections. As spend in this area grows, there is the potential for less transparency if expenditure on social media is not easily identifiable within the spending returns because social media is not a specific reporting category*. This will need to be considered as part of reviewing all of the expenditure reporting categories to ensure that they remain proportionate and relevant to future trends in campaigning. We recommend that Governments and Parliaments should consider the timing needed for implementing changes before the next major elections expected in 2019, 2020 and 2021. (*The reporting categories for the spending returns are set out in legislation.) ( European Parliament Elections in 2019, UK Parliamentary General Election in 2020 and elections to the Scottish Parliament, Welsh Assembly and Northern Ireland Assembly in 2021.) Recommendation 4: Regulation of spending on staff time dedicated to election campaigning We continue to recommend that, in principle, staff costs associated with regulated campaign spending should be included within the regulatory controls for all types of campaigners: candidates, political parties and nonparty campaigners. The solutions outlined in our Regulatory Review provide a solid foundation for introducing changes and addressing the anomaly that means that the spending controls for political parties do not cover a potentially large strand of their election campaign spending. The Government should give further consideration to this issue when proposals for wider changes to the rules are developed. We have developed two options that could form the basis for further testing and consultation with political parties and other campaigners. Recommendation 5: Sanctions for non-compliance with obligations placed on political parties and other campaigners under PPERA We think there is a case for reviewing and increasing the present cap of £20,000 on our power to issue sanctions. It is important to keep the cap under review, particularly in light of experience from the initial 5 years of the civil sanctions regime and comparisons with other regulatory and sanctioning systems. As the cap is set in legislation, any increase would need to be implemented by Government and/or Parliament. Recommendation 6: Joint campaigning by registered non-party campaigners We continue to recommend that the UK Government amend the recently introduced legal provisions for lead and minor non-party campaigners working in a joint campaign, to require minor campaigners to provide accurate spending information to the appointed registered lead campaigner. We also recommend that a campaigner in a joint campaign should be required to report the total spending of itself and its partners, not just its own spending, for transparency purposes and for verifying compliance with the spending limits. Recommendation 7: Targeted spending by registered non-party campaigners For future elections, we recommend that the UK Government introduce a specific mandatory reporting category for targeted expenditure that non-party campaigners have incurred and spent in relation to an authorisation given by a political party. Without this requirement, the recently introduced targeted spending provision only provides limited transparency and it is difficult to identify in the spending returns how much targeted spend has been incurred.

Recommendation 8: Expected changes to UK parliamentary constituency boundaries and impact on campaigner spending limits It will be important to consider the implications of the UK Parliamentary constituency boundary review in relation to spending limits for candidates, political parties and non-party campaigners before the next UKPGE expected in 2020* to ensure that spending limits reflect any changes to the size and number of constituencies and to also ensure that campaigners can adequately communicate messages to voters. We recommend that the UK Government take this into account when planning for the implementation of the boundary review.

Recommendation 9: Publication of candidate spending returns To improve transparency and accessibility of candidate spending returns, we continue to recommend that Returning Officers should be required to publish spending returns online as well as through the existing methods of public inspection. We support recommendation 12-5 of the Law Commissions' review of Electoral Law which proposes a method for implementing this change through legislation. Recommendation 10: Clearer candidate spending limits To reduce the risk of candidates spending over the limit, and of unintended non-compliance with the rules, we continue to recommend that the spending limits should be made clearer for candidates and their agents. We support the method proposed in recommendation 12-313 from the Law Commissions' review of Electoral Law that, when based on formulas set out in legislation, the limits for candidates at elections should be published by the Returning Officer along with the notice of election. This change would need to be implemented through legislation. Recommendation 11: Simplifying the rules on pre-candidacy spending and donations At the 2010 and 2015 UKPGE we have observed that having two separate candidate regulated periods and two separate spending limits causes administrative burdens on candidates and agents and adds to the risk of noncompliance with the rules. We provide more details on this in our 2013 regulatory review. We continue to recommend that the UK Government consult campaigners on this matter as part of its next review of candidate regulation.

Recommendation 12: Pre-election reporting of donations for UK general elections:

Political parties and non-party campaigners We continue to recommend that the UK Government implement our proposals to replace weekly pre-election donation reporting for political parties and nonparty campaigners with a single report that would cover most of the period between the dissolution of Parliament and polling day. The report should only be required from political parties that are standing candidates in that election and receive a reportable donation or loan during the relevant period. Making these changes would reduce the regulatory burden upon these campaigners while retaining the same level of pre poll transparency as under the current rules.

Prior to 11 April 2016, when the events under investigation occurred, it was registered as the Conservative Party. The 2015 United Kingdom Parliamentary General Election ("the 2015 UKPGE") took place on 7 May 2015. Under PPERA and given that the Party's campaign spending exceeded £250,000, the registered treasurer of the Party, Mr Simon Day 1 , was required to deliver to us a financial return of all campaign spending incurred by the Party during the 2015 UKPGE campaign period, by 7 November 2015. Mr Day delivered this return in advance of the statutory deadline. We published this return on 20 January 2016. During the preparation for, and following, publication, we engaged in its routine scrutiny of all the returns for the 2015 UKPGE, looking at their completeness and accuracy. Whilst carrying out this work, it noted reports, most notably by Channel 4 News in January and February 2016, that raised concerns that the Party's spending return for the 2015 UKPGE may have been incomplete. We were concerned that the Party's 2015 UKPGE return may have been missing items of Party campaign spending and may have included items that were not Party campaign spending. These reports also indicated that the Party's spending return for the 2014 European Parliamentary Election ("the 2014 EPE") may not have been complete. Following enquiries with the Party, we opened an investigation on 15 February 2016. This is a report of that investigation. It is being published alongside the publication of the outcome of the investigation and the sanctions imposed. Summary of findings In summary, we found that: there was no evidence that the Party's spending return for the 2014 EPE was incomplete it is likely that expense returns delivered by Party candidates at three by-elections during 2014 understated the value of the Party's spending on their campaigns on three instances in 2014, relating to the said three by-elections, Mr Day as registered treasurer failed to ensure that the Party's accounting records were sufficient to adequately show and explain the Party's transactions with the candidates and/or their agents, as required by section 41 of PPERA the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return was not a complete statement of its campaign spending payments, as required by section 80(3) of PPERA. Mr Day had included payments that were not Party campaign spending and omitted other Party campaign payments the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return also failed to include all the required invoices and receipts associated with the Party's campaign spending that were required by section 80(3) of PPERA Summary of findings Accordingly we determined that Mr Day committed three contraventions under section 41 of PPERA and two offences under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA. The Party has been fined £70,000 in total as a result of these contraventions and offences. In addition, we identified information which raised doubt about whether Mr Day took reasonable steps to ensure that he could make a proper declaration that the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return was complete. Knowingly or recklessly making a false declaration would be an offence under section 83(3) of PPERA. We do not have the power to sanction this offence and therefore, having identified it during its investigation, it referred Mr Day to the Metropolitan Police Service.

Issues under investigation

The scope of the investigation

In January 2016 our attention was drawn to broadcast reports in which Channel 4 News made a number of allegations about spending by the Party and/or its candidates in the South Thanet constituency during the 2015 UKPGE campaign. Channel 4 News subsequently ran other broadcast reports concerning the way the Party had reported party and candidate campaign spending during 2014 and 2015. After assessing the evidence provided by the reports, and having had discussions with the Party, we opened an investigation on 15 February 2016.

The scope of the investigation extended as further evidence came to light. In total this investigation considered the following matters:

- Whether the Party's campaign spending return for the 2014 EPE was a complete statement of all campaign payments made. The investigation looked at campaign spending by or on behalf of the Party and/or its candidates in three by-elections in Clacton, Newark and Rochester and Strood in 2014. The first of those by-elections took place during the regulated period for the 2014 EPE, and any party campaign spending in relation to the EPE during that by-election was required to be included in the spending return for the EPE. Failures in relation to this may constitute offences under section 82(4) of PPERA. In this report these are referred to as the 'by-election issues'.
- Whether the Party's campaign spending return for the 2015 UKPGE was a complete statement of all campaign payments made, again in relation to spending by the Party during the 2014 by-elections, all of which took place during the regulated period for the 2015 UKPGE. Failures in relation to this may constitute offences under section 82(4) of PPERA. In this report, these again are referred to as the 'by-election issues'.
- Whether the then registered treasurer of the Party, Mr Day, ensured that accounting records were kept which were sufficient to show and explain the Party's transactions. This concerned the Party's accounting records in relation to campaign activity carried out by the Party on behalf of the candidates in the three aforementioned by-elections, and reported by the candidates. Failing to keep sufficient accounting records constitutes a contravention of a prescribed requirement under section 41 of PPERA. These are the 'accounting records issues'.
- Whether the Party's 2015 UKPGE campaign spending return was a complete statement of all campaign payments made by the Party during the 2015 UKPGE campaign, in respect of payments incurred by the Party in the South Thanet constituency. This concerned whether the Party's return included spending that was for the purpose of electing its candidate in South Thanet, and was not therefore Party campaigning and whether it failed to include all Party campaign payments relating to this constituency. Failures in relation to the campaign spending return such as this may constitute an offence under section 82(4) of PPERA. These are the 'UKPGE spending return - South Thanet issues'.
- Whether the Party's 2015 UKPGE campaign spending return was a complete statement of all payments made in respect of spending on transporting Party activists to a number of constituencies across the UK to carry out campaign activity. This concerned whether the Party's return included spending associated with this activity which was not Party campaign spending, and whether it failed to include all Party campaign payments relating to this activity. Failures in relation to the campaign spending return such as this may constitute an offence under section 82(4) of PPERA. These are the 'UKPGE spending return – Battlebus2015 issues'.
- Whether further payments were omitted from the Party's 2015 UKPGE campaign spending return. Failures in relation to the campaign spending return such as this may constitute an offence under section 82(4) of PPERA. These are the 'UKPGE spending return – omitted payments issues'. Whether there were any invoices or receipts missing from the Party's 2015 UKPGE return. Failures in relation to this may constitute an offence under section 82(4) of PPERA. This is the ' UKPGE spending return - omitted invoices/receipts issue '. Whether there was evidence to suggest that the then registered treasurer of the Party, Mr Day, may have knowingly or recklessly made a statutory declaration in respect of one or both returns that those returns were complete and accurate when they were not. Failures in relation to this may constitute an offence under section 83(3) of PPERA. This is the ' declaration issue '. Under its section 145 of PPERA duty to monitor and take all reasonable steps to secure compliance with election spending under the Representation of the People Act 1983 (RPA), we also considered the accuracy or otherwise of a number of campaign expense returns made by Party candidates and their agents, following the 2014 EPE and the 2015 UKPGE. We have no powers to make findings of offences in respect of these returns, and have not sought to do so. However, we have made observations in respect of these returns under its section 145 duty, which are included in this report.

Legal framework

The legal framework set out in PPERA Section 41(1) of PPERA requires the registered treasurer of a party to ensure that accounting records are kept with respect to the party which are sufficient to show and explain the party's transactions. Under section 41(4) these records must be kept for at least six years from the end of the financial year of the party in which they are made. Party campaign spending is defined in section 72 of PPERA as expenses incurred by or on behalf of a party which (a) fall within paragraph 1 of Schedule 8, and are (b) incurred for election purposes. 'Election purposes' is defined as being in connection with promoting or procuring success for the party and its candidates generally.

Section 72(7) excludes anything which falls to be included in a candidate's own election expenses return, namely expenses incurred in connection with promoting or procuring that specific candidate's election. Section 80(2) of PPERA requires the treasurer to prepare a campaign spending return at the conclusion of an EPE or UKPGE campaign period. Section 80(3) requires that the return contains: a statement of all payments made in respect of campaign spending incurred during the campaign period a statement of all disputed claims (where the treasurer refuses to pay the claim) of which the treasurer is aware a statement of all unpaid claims (if any) of which the treasurer is aware Section 80(4) requires that the return contains: all invoices or receipts related to the payments (of a value greater than £200) a declaration of all notional spending Section 82(1) of PPERA requires the treasurer of a party which incurred more than £250,000 of campaign spending to deliver the campaign spending return within six months of the end of the relevant campaign period. Under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA, the treasurer commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, he or she delivers a return which does not comply with the requirements of section 80(3) or (4) of PPERA. This may occur where information required under those sections is omitted, or where the return includes payments that in fact relate to candidate campaign expenses, and so are excluded from the definition of 'campaign expenditure' under section 72(7) of PPERA, or includes spending unrelated to campaigning at all.

In determining that any of the offences under PPERA have been committed, the Commission must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt. Section 83 of PPERA requires a spending return to be accompanied by a declaration made by the treasurer. That declaration must state that the treasurer has examined the return in question, and that to the best of his or her knowledge or belief it is a complete and correct return and all expenses shown in it as paid have been paid by the treasurer, the deputy treasurer or a person authorised under PPERA to pay party campaign expenses. Section 83(3) states that a person commits an offence if he or she knowingly or recklessly makes a false declaration. Party campaign spending and candidate campaign expenses The RPA imposes restrictions and requirements on candidates and their agents who incur spending in relation to their election campaigns. This includes a limit on the value of campaign expenses a candidate may incur, and a requirement to deliver a return of candidate campaign expenses to the relevant returning officer after the election. The restrictions and requirements imposed by the RPA are distinct from those on registered political parties. The Commission has no specific investigation powers it can use to enquire into potential breaches of the RPA rules, and enforcement of those rules falls to the police and prosecution authorities. The investigation This section summarises the conduct of the investigation and the key actions taken by us. The Party did not cooperate fully with our enquiries. While at times answers were forthcoming, and in particular cooperation was given when arranging interviews with certain Party officials, at other times the Party hindered and caused delay to the investigation. During the investigation we had contact not only with the Party but with a number of other individuals and organisations. Those other individuals and organisations cooperated with our enquiries throughout 2 . The opening and scope of the investigation In January 2016 Channel 4 News made a number of allegations about Party spending in South Thanet during the 2015 UKPGE campaign. Its broadcast reports alleged that: The Party had included spending in its 2015 UKPGE campaign spending return which was not party campaign spending. The spending related to hotel bills at the Royal Harbour Hotel in Ramsgate. According to the reports, this spending should instead have been included as part of candidate expenses in the South Thanet constituency, for the Party candidate Mr Craig Mackinlay. Spending incurred by the Party in the neighbouring constituency of North Thanet, at the Premier Inn Hotel in Margate, had not been included in the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return. The cost of advertising in a local Thanet newspaper had been included in the Party's return, but was in fact candidate campaign expenses since the newspaper had only been distributed in the North and South Thanet constituencies. It should, the report alleged, have been split between the returns for the two candidates in those constituencies. We raised these allegations with the Party, which explained that South Thanet had been its base for its 'anti-UKIP' campaign. We then opened an assessment to determine whether or not it had reasonable grounds to suspect offences under PPERA in relation to the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return. The assessment concluded that an investigation should be opened. The Party was notified accordingly and evidence sought in order to progress the investigation, both from the Party and from the UK Independence Party (UKIP). In a report broadcast on 8 February 2016, Channel 4 News made further allegations, this time about Party spending during three by-elections in 2014. These by-elections were held in the constituencies of Newark (on 5 June 2014), Clacton (on 9 October 2014) and Rochester and Strood (on 20 November 2014). The report alleged that the Party had incurred spending on accommodating employees and activists at hotels in those constituencies during the by-election campaigns, and that those employees and activists were working on the by-election campaigns. However, the spending was not reported on the candidate returns for those by-elections. The dates of the spending at these hotels fell within the regulated periods for the 2014 EPE and 2015 UKPGE. Any Party campaign spending during those periods should have been included in the Party's campaign spending returns for those elections. However, none of the spending identified in the report appeared to have been declared in the Party's spending returns. We assessed these further allegations and concluded that they should be investigated to determine whether the Party's 2014 EPE, and 2015 UKPGE, returns were complete and accurate. We told the Party that the scope of the investigation had widened and again sought relevant evidence. In April 2016, while the investigation was progressing, the Party told us that it had identified omissions in the Party's campaign spending return for the 2015 UKPGE. It said that Channel 4 News had raised new concerns with it about a national tour by Party activists that took place during the election campaign, under the name 'Battlebus2015'. The Party had reviewed its reporting of spending on Battlebus2015 and uncovered £39,511.90 of spending that it considered it should have reported in the Party's spending return, but which had been missed. The review was ongoing at the time but completed during the investigation. Shortly afterwards, Channel 4 News broadcast its report about the Party's spending on the Battlebus2015 tour. It alleged that the Party had paid for an operation to transport activists to over 20 marginal seats across England, known as Battlebus2015, and that it had evidence those activists campaigned for individual candidates as well as the Party. It stated that none of the costs associated with this were included in the relevant candidate returns, and referred to the Party's acknowledgement that some costs had not been included in the Party's spending return. The Party's acknowledgement gave us further reasonable grounds to suspect that the Party's spending return was incomplete. However, we did not accept at face value the Party's assertion that all the missing spending should have been reported in the Party's spending return. Instead, we explained to the Party that it would be whether the Party had, over 2014 and 2015, been improperly reporting spending by the Party on its and its candidates' campaigns.

Engagement with the Party From February to May 2016 we sought to obtain relevant documents and information from the Party by way of three statutory notices. These notices were issued under Schedule 19B paragraph 3 of PPERA. They covered, in turn, the South Thanet issues (issued on 18 February), the by-election issues (issued on 23 March) and the Battlebus2015 issues (issued on 9 May). The Party responded in part to the first and second notices by the deadlines given. Following that, however, it caused delay by incorrectly asserting that we did not have the power to request some of the material, and by citing administrative reasons for taking additional time to respond. We granted extensions, both by amending the first notice and through voluntary agreement with the Party. Despite this, by May 2016 we still had not received full disclosure from the Party of the required material. Consequently, we were no longer willing to agree to the Party's continuing requests for further periods of time to provide the material and, given the Party's limited disclosure up to that point, did not have confidence that the Party would provide all the material. In May 2016 we lodged an application with the High Court for a documents and an information disclosure order. Later that day the Party provided the remaining material from the first two notices. After reviewing this material we withdrew our application to the High Court. The Party complied with the third notice by the deadline given. During October 2016 we interviewed four former or current Party officials. These were: Lord Stephen Gilbert of Panteg, who was the Campaigns Director at the Party during the 2015 UKPGE campaign. Lord Gilbert was interviewed in lieu of a Senior Campaigns Officer at the Party who had been based in South Thanet during the 2015 UKPGE campaign period. The officer declined an invitation to be interviewed on the grounds of ill health. Mr Alan Mabbutt, who was interviewed in his capacity as Chief Legal Officer of the Party, which he held during 2014-15. A Senior Press Advisor who had been employed by the Party as a consultant media advisor, and was based in the South Thanet constituency during the election campaign. Mr Simon Day, who was interviewed under caution on behalf of the Party and as its registered treasurer during the events under investigation. We also interviewed a number of individuals who were involved in the decisions and/or conduct of the Party's campaign activity during 2014-15. They were all interviewed in their personal capacity. These individuals were: the Right Honourable Mr Grant Shapps MP, Co-Chairman of the Party in 2014-15; the Chief of Staff to Mr Shapps during 2014-15; and the Director of Roadtrip2015 and Battlebus2015. We also spoke to three volunteers for the Party who acted as 'team leaders' on the buses used to visit constituencies as part of the Battlebus2015 campaign. Further, we issued a notice under Schedule 19B paragraph 3 of PPERA to one of these team leaders who had chosen not to provide information voluntarily. We had ongoing correspondence with the Party from May 2016 to the conclusion of the investigation. This correspondence covered the issues under investigation, set out our developing views on these and contained further information and explanation from the Party. During this correspondence two further notices under Schedule 19B paragraph 3 of PPERA were issued by us on 15 September 2016 and 12 October 2016 to obtain material required to progress the investigation. In both cases notices were issued after the Party did not provide the material on initial request. The Party responded to both notices by the deadline given by us. In February 2017 we issued three initial notices to the Party under Schedule 19C of PPERA. These set out our initial determinations in respect of contraventions and offences committed by Mr Day, and, in accordance with Schedule 19C, invited the Party to make representations. Under Schedule 19C the Party had 28 days from receipt of the notice to make any representations, and this deadline expired on 7 March 2017. We copied the initial notices to Mr Day and explained we would accept representations from him also. Mr Day did not make representations on the notices. The Party made their representations on the deadline of 7 March 2017. These were considered by us and a final determination made in respect of the contraventions and offences, and the sanctions resulting from them. This final determination was issued to the Party on 13 March 2017. Engagement with other individuals and organisations During the course of the investigation we issued three notices under Schedule 19B paragraph 3 of PPERA to Channel 4 News, to obtain the evidence underpinning its broadcast reports and allegations. Channel 4 News complied with these notices. In addition, we issued a notice under Schedule 19B paragraph 3 of PPERA to UKIP. This followed an assertion by the Party that it based a number of officials and volunteers in South Thanet during the 2015 UKPGE campaign as a direct result of UKIP running its national campaign from the area. The notice required the provision of information relating to the location of UKIP's national campaign. UKIP provided the information, which was analysed as part of the investigation. Finally, a number of emails and letters were received from members of the public, concerned about whether campaign spending in their constituency had been properly reported by the Party. Many of these supplied examples of campaign activity by the Party. Each one was carefully considered and, where relevant, analysed as part of the investigation. Engagement with the Police and Crown Prosecution Service When opening the investigation in February 2016, we noted that the evidence disclosed potential offences in relation to candidate returns under the RPA. If candidate spending had been improperly included in the Party's spending returns then it was possible that, in addition to the issues with the Party's return, the candidate returns were inaccurate. As mentioned above, we do not have investigation or enforcement powers in respect of offences under the RPA. These can only be investigated by the police and, if appropriate, prosecuted by the Crown Prosecution Service (the CPS). However, as noted above, we have a duty under section

145 of PPERA to monitor and take all reasonable steps to secure compliance with the RPA candidate spending rules. We recognised that any potential RPA offences relating to the 2014 by-elections were out of time for police investigation as more than a year had passed since the alleged offences. However, those relating to the 2015 UKPGE were, at that point, less than a year old. In February 2016 we discussed the matters relating to South Thanet with Kent Police, who decided that, at that time, the evidence to hand was insufficient for it to investigate. In April 2016, following the identification of the Battlebus2015 issues, we wrote to the Director of Public Prosecutions. We expressed our view that these issues raised reasonable suspicion of a course of conduct by the Party that may involve offences under the RPA. We drew attention to the fact that it was approaching a year since any such RPA offences may have been committed. In its view, the evidence and the seriousness of the issues warranted applications to the court to extend the time available to the police and the CPS to investigate. At the request of the CPS we hosted a meeting with the CPS and relevant police forces. Consequentially, a number of forces made applications to the court and were granted an extension to undertake their investigations. This included Kent Police, which decided that it would take the matter forward. Our investigation was entirely separate from any police investigation. In order to assist the police, we agreed to meet with its representatives and with the CPS on a number of occasions. We provided information to the Police under request to further their investigations and did so in accordance with our information-sharing powers. Our findings in respect of the 2014 by-elections and accounting records

The by-election issues

The by-election issues looked at three by-elections held during 2014. These were in Newark (June 2014), Clacton (October 2014) and Rochester and Strood (November 2014). In February 2016, Channel 4 News published an allegation that the three Party candidates in these by-elections had failed to declare hotel payments incurred by the Party for Party staff and activists working on the by-election campaigns. Invoices and documents obtained by Channel 4 News, and subsequently provided to us, indicated that the Party booked the following accommodation for employees and volunteers during those by-elections:

- Newark by-election: Kelham House: 54 nights between 1 May and 6 June 2014 at a cost of £4,519.95
- Premier Inn: 125 nights between 19 May and 6 June 2014, cost unknown
- Clacton by-election: Lifehouse Spa: 290 nights between 4 September and 11 October 2014, cost unknown
- Premier Inn: 71 nights between 9 September and 1 October 2014 at a cost of £6,582.86
- Rochester and Strood by-election: Bridgewood Manor: 597 nights between 6 October and 22 November 2014 at a cost of £51,191.16
- Premier Inn: 246 nights between 17 October and 22 November at a cost of £20,985.91

All three by-elections took place during campaign periods for national elections. In particular, the spending associated with the Newark by-election took place during the campaign period for the 2014 EPE, and also during the beginning of the campaign period for the 2015 UKPGE. The spending associated with the Clacton and the Rochester and Strood by-elections took place during the campaign period for the 2015 UKPGE. We do not have specific powers to investigate and enforce incomplete candidate returns. But we were concerned about whether the Party employees and volunteers based in the constituencies where the by-elections were being held may have also been carrying out campaigning for the Party for the purpose of the EPE and UKPGE campaigns. If this was the case, then a proportion of the hotel accommodation costs incurred in locating them in those constituencies may have been reportable in the Party's spending returns for the 2014 EPE and 2015 UKPGE. However, the spending detailed above was not included in either of these returns. In response to our enquiries, including the notice issued to it on 23 March 2016, the Party provided us with information concerning the individuals located in the hotels and their roles. This included evidence of the work the individuals undertook whilst located at the hotels, such as electronic diaries, campaign material and letters. The Party explained that while they were located in those constituencies its employees both campaigned for the Party candidates and continued with their routine work for the Party. We also considered the information published by, and obtained under notice from, Channel 4 News, including the accommodation invoices and receipts. By-election issues outcome Having considered the role the individuals based in the by-election constituencies had and the evidence of their work during that time, we are satisfied that they were not campaigning on behalf of the Party in respect of the 2014 EPE or the 2015 UKPGE. Consequently, the Party's spending returns for those elections were not incomplete in this regard. The accounting records issue The accounting records issues As explained above, at each of the three 2014 by-elections contested by the Party's candidates, the Party located staff and volunteers in those constituencies. Its employees both campaigned for the Party candidates and continued with their routine work for the Party. The Party therefore incurred spending on these activities by way of accommodation costs and volunteer expenses, and by allocating staff time to these campaigns. In each case the Party provided its candidate with an invoice of an amount it calculated to be its spending on these campaigns. The candidate then reported this as a donation from the Party and as notional spending in his or her candidate return. This is an acceptable way to report Party spending in candidate returns. The amounts reported by the candidates were as follows 3 : In Newark the Conservative candidate declared a total election spend of £96,190.98. Of this £23,596 relates to spending on agent and other staff costs and was invoiced by the Party. In Clacton the Conservative candidate declared a total election spend of £84,049.22. Of this £12,314 relates to spending on agent and other staff costs and was invoiced by the Party. Of this, £3,894.39 relates to spending on accommodation and administration. In Rochester and Strood the Conservative candidate declared total election spending of £96,793.08. Of this £23,724 relates to spending on agent and other staff costs and was invoiced by the Party. Of this, £17,873.08 relates to spending on accommodation and administration. In this manner the Party entered into a specific transaction with each of the three candidates and agents; it incurred spending on behalf of each candidate, and then provided an invoice to each candidate and agent. Whilst investigating the by-election issues set out above, we asked the Party to explain how the transactions were calculated. The Party explained that it applied a formula to calculate the value of the costs it incurred on election expenses for its candidates. This formula was, according to the Party, used for each of the three 2014 by-elections. The Party explained that the formula was based on the full costs of locating volunteers in the constituencies, and a proportion of the salary and accommodation costs incurred by its employees while based in the constituencies. Having considered the role those employees had and the evidence of their work during that time, we are satisfied that it was reasonable for the Party to invoice only a proportion of the staffing costs of those employees based in the by-election constituencies to the candidates' campaigns. However, it was unclear how the proportion was calculated. Further, in relation to the costs of accommodating those staff, the only credible purpose for which the individuals were located to the relevant constituencies was to facilitate their campaign work in the by-elections. Consequently, we were not satisfied that only a proportion of these costs being invoiced to the candidates alone were a true reflection of the spending incurred by the Party on the candidates' behalves. Under section 41(1) of PPERA, Mr Day was required to ensure that records were kept sufficient to both show and explain the transactions. However, the Party could provide no record of how those proportions were determined for any of the by-elections. It did not have any written record of the formula at all, either generally or in relation to any of the three by elections, other than the outline provided in its correspondence of the three elements used. The Party argued that: “The notional invoice supplied by the Party to a candidate or his agent is for notional expenditure. It does not show actual expenditure and therefore does not show transactions as defined by PPERA.” The Party explained that it did not “...keep records of the estimated time spent by party staff or volunteers which are included in the notional invoice”, and that records were not required because “...no money is received from the agent or his candidate...” This is not the position under PPERA. In each of the by-elections the Party entered into a transaction with its candidate and agent to provide services. It incurred spending on accommodation and volunteer expenses and on staff salaries where it allocated time from those staff members to the by-election campaigns. Those services cost the Party money and resources and thereby affected its financial position by depleting its resources. Mr Day was under an obligation to keep appropriate accounting records to explain each of the transactions entered into with the candidates and agents in the three by-elections. He was required by PPERA to be able to show the financial position of the Party taking them into account. In an interview we asked Mr Day why there were no records of the formula for calculating the amounts included in the invoices for the three 2014 by-elections. Mr Day did not offer an explanation, saying: “It’s not something that I was involved in.” Outcome Accordingly, the Commission has found that Mr Day committed three contraventions of section 41(1) of PPERA during 2014. These contraventions relate to the three transactions entered into between the Party and the candidates and agents in the Newark, Clacton and Rochester and Strood by-elections in 2014, for which Mr Day failed to ensure that the Party maintained accounting records to explain them. In furtherance In furtherance of our duty under section 145 of PPERA, we note that the absence of records of this formula make it impossible to establish how the amounts invoiced by the Party to each of the three candidates and agents were calculated. From the general terms in which the Party described the calculations, we consider that the invoices were likely to be inaccurate. The Party told us in general terms the elements of the formula 20 used to calculate the value stated in each notional invoice, including a proportion of the cost of accommodation for staff based in each constituency. We can understand why staff time would be apportioned between that spent on the by-election campaign and that spent on routine Party work, but the lack of records means the Party cannot explain how it determined that the apportionment in these instances was correct. Furthermore, there is no reason why we can see as to why only an unspecified proportion of the accommodation costs for staff was included in the invoices to candidates. We are satisfied that the entire accommodation costs, for staff and volunteers, were incurred for the purpose of basing individuals in Newark, Clacton and Rochester and Strood, to facilitate those individuals’ work on the respective by-election campaigns. This money would not have been spent otherwise. Our findings in respect of the Party’s 2015 UKPGE spending return The UKPGE spending return South Thanet issues Mr Craig Mackinlay was the Party candidate for the South Thanet constituency during the 2015 UKPGE. Under the RPA, Mr Mackinlay and his agent were required to deliver an election expenses return including all expenses relating to his campaign. In this return Mr Mackinlay reported the following amounts: For the Long Campaign, from 19 December 2014 to 6 April 2015 which was the day before Mr

Mackinlay became a candidate, Mr Mackinlay reported expenses totalling £32,661.26. His spending limit was £37,016.38. For the Short Campaign, from 7 April 2015 when Mr Mackinlay became a candidate to 7 May 2015 which was polling day, Mr Mackinlay reported expenses totalling £14,837.77. His spending limit was £15,016.38. The team based in South Thanet The Party advised us that it had chosen to base a small team in the South Thanet constituency. It said that the constituency was of particular importance during the campaign because the candidate for UKIP in that constituency was its then leader Mr Nigel Farage. The Party stated: As part of its broader general election campaign, [Conservative Campaign HQ] had set up a series of national rebuttal and attack teams for Labour, the Liberal Democrats and for UKIP. To address the unusual method adopted by UKIP, CCHQ decided to base its national UKIP campaign team in Kent ("CCHQ UKIP team"), mirroring the fact that the UKIP national campaign operation was, uniquely, in Kent, and not in Westminster. The Labour Party also focused substantial national anti-UKIP activity in Kent. Each of CCHQ's party-focused teams researched and created political material to deploy nationally as part of the national campaign literature. They also had a role in ensuring that any local literature was consistent with national campaign messages. Further, the Party said that the team researched and created national campaign material and "...also had a role in ensuring that any local literature was consistent with national campaign messages." This team stayed in hotels in the Thanet area, notably the Royal Harbour Hotel and the Premier Inn Margate. Mr Mackinlay's spending return does not include any entries in relation to these two hotels. Nor does it include any spending associated with the people who stayed at the hotels, such as salary or subsistence costs. The Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return contained four entries, with associated invoices, totalling £15,640.65 in relation to spending at the Royal Harbour Hotel. The invoices relate to hotel rooms booked at the Royal Harbour Hotel between 23 and 29 March, 8 and 15 April and 20 April and 7 May 2015. The Party's spending return did not include any expenditure in relation to the Premier Inn Margate. However, invoices seen by us indicated that the Party had booked rooms at the Premier Inn Margate between 14 April and 9 May 2015. We obtained and reviewed significant evidence from the Party and under interview about the activities of the team based in South Thanet. From our analysis, we are satisfied that several of them were, for a proportion of their time during the campaign, working to procure the electoral success of Mr Mackinlay rather than of the Party and its candidates generally. In particular, we looked into the role and activities of the following members of the team based in South Thanet: A Senior Campaigns Officer, who the Party said was tasked with taking a lead role in the CCHQ UKIP team, liaising with Mr Mackinlay's campaign team where necessary. This Officer was based in the Royal Harbour Hotel during part of the election campaign. The Commission concluded that she took an active organisational role in Mr Mackinlay's campaign. She had oversight of his activities and took an active role in coordinating his campaign. She also contributed to drafting campaign material promoting Mr Mackinlay's electoral success. This role in Mr Mackinlay's campaign was evident in many of the emails sent by her during the election campaign. By way of examples from these emails the Commission noted the Officer commenting in correspondence to another of the individuals based in South Thanet that Mr Mackinlay had not been writing his own literature and that she had spent her "...first couple of weeks here getting stuff re drafted..." In another correspondence, Mr Mackinlay refers to her as "the Campaign coordinator", whilst in further correspondence she advised a volunteer that "...we are running Craig's campaign". A Senior Press Advisor, who was, according to the Party, responsible for managing national and international media outlets, and liaising with the press with regards to the UKIP national campaign. Again, he was based in the Royal Harbour Hotel for part of the election campaign. We concluded that he was, for at least a proportion of his time, acting as a press liaison on behalf of Mr Mackinlay in particular rather than the Party generally. This included handling queries from local and national press on behalf of Mr Mackinlay, and advising him on his personal media handling approach and messages. For example, the Senior Press Advisor explains in correspondence during the campaign that he has "...been drafted in to help Craig Mackinlay with media issues during the election campaign..." and in separate correspondence explains that he is "...working full-time for our candidate in South Thanet..." Two Political Advisors, who according to the Party were providing research support on UKIP and literature sign off in relation to UKIP target seats, to ensure it was in accordance with the Party's national campaign messages. The Political Advisors, who were also based in the Royal Harbour Hotel, in fact played key roles in determining Mr Mackinlay's campaign messages and in drafting campaign material promoting Mr Mackinlay's electoral success. There were a number examples of them commenting or advising on the wording of Mr Mackinlay's campaign message and digital content. For example, one comments on a video the other has created for YouTube on behalf of Mr Mackinlay, stating: Thanks... This is ok as far as it goes BUT why are we not trying to convey the messages better? Anybody can stand in sandwich saying traffic is bad. The point is that [C]raig brings cabinet ministers here and can get things done.... Every time we communicate without the messages we are at best wasting our time and at worse losing votes. The Party also listed several other individuals as being part of this team, including volunteers providing further support, such as assisting with national tours and events held in Kent, attending UKIP rallies and events and monitoring the activities of Mr Farage. Some of the emails involving or referring to the other volunteers show they also played a role in Mr Mackinlay's campaign; for example, by updating Mr Mackinlay's 'digital output', issuing instructions in respect of the budget on social media messaging for Mr Mackinlay, and drafting campaign material promoting Mr Mackinlay's electoral success. As a result of its analysis of the evidence, we are satisfied that the Party did not distinguish adequately between (a) campaigning that opposed UKIP as a party and (b) campaigning that opposed Mr Farage as a candidate and/or promoted Mr Mackinlay as a candidate in the South Thanet constituency. While evidence shows that the Party may have made the political judgement that to oppose Mr Farage was in essence the same as opposing UKIP, the regulatory framework of PPERA required spending on the Party campaign to be reported separately from any spending it undertook on behalf of its candidate. The evidence shows that, to a significant extent, the team based in South Thanet went about their 'anti-UKIP' work by promoting and supporting Mr Farage's rival for the constituency, the Party candidate Craig Mackinlay. There was no evidence to indicate that Mr Day or the Party made the necessary distinction between the team's work campaigning against UKIP as a party, and work opposing Mr Farage as a candidate and/or promoting Mr Mackinlay as a candidate. Lord Gilbert, for example, stated that it "...never occurred to [the Party] that this was... constituency spending." Further, the evidence the Party provided in respect of the submission of candidate campaign material for factual accuracy and policy checks, showed that this was unrelated to the work that was undertaken by the individuals based in South Thanet as described above. The correspondence, invoices and general election campaign packs seen by us indicated that this was a separate package of services provided by the Party. Premier Inn Margate The Party advised us that in error no spending in relation to the Premier Inn Margate had been included in its spending return. The value of the spending incurred in relation to the Premier Inn Margate was provided by the Party and, after omitting non-relevant spending, totalled £3,809.03. In correspondence and in interview the Party ultimately advised that the explanation for the missing accommodation spending from the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return was "simple human error". We are satisfied that this does not constitute a reasonable excuse. It does not represent evidence of unforeseen or exceptional circumstances beyond Mr Day's or the Party's control that prevented it from reporting this spending. Reporting staff accommodation costs During the investigation the Party said that it considers that hotel costs for employed staff members are not reportable in its spending return pursuant to Schedule 8, paragraph 2(1)(d) of PPERA, which exempts remuneration and allowances for employed staff. It therefore has argued that the hotel spending should not be included in the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return at all and so it has not omitted spending in that regard. Having sought and obtained from the Party details of the employment terms and conditions for the individuals concerned, we are satisfied that Schedule 8, paragraph 2(1)(d) does not apply. Spending on an employee's remuneration and allowances is not reportable; spending on expenses incurred by staff while campaigning for the Party are reportable. Conclusions in respect of the UKPGE spending return South Thanet issues It is acceptable for a party to apportion spending between the Party's campaign and that of a particular candidate or candidates. However, we concluded that it was not accurate for all of the Party's spending on the team in South Thanet to be considered Party campaign spending. Some should have been apportioned to Mr Mackinlay's candidate expenses. Outcome Accordingly we are satisfied that a proportion of the costs included in the Party's campaign spending return associated with the team based in South Thanet did not relate to Party campaign spending and should not have been included in the Party's spending return. In particular, a proportion of the £15,641 included in the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return in relation to the Royal Harbour Hotel constituted candidate campaign expenses and should not have been included in the return. Additionally, we are satisfied that a proportion of the £3,809 spent by the Party on accommodating its staff in the Premier Inn Margate was Party campaign spending. This proportion should have been included in the Party's return, and was not. Summary We cannot determine precisely what proportion of spending on the Party's team in South Thanet should have been apportioned to Mr Mackinlay's campaign. This is largely as a result of the Party failing to keep records sufficient to establish the appropriate apportionment. However, we note that as a consequence of the Party reporting these costs, they were missing from Mr Mackinlay's candidate campaign expenses return. Consequently it appears that the Party understated the spending it incurred on Mr Mackinlay's campaign, and as a result there is doubt as to the accuracy and completeness of his election expenses return. Other spending in relation to South Thanet During the course of the investigation, we reviewed examples of advertising, including advertising placed in a local Thanet newspaper. We assessed the material in order to decide whether spending on them had been properly included in the Party's return, or was in fact candidate campaign expenses. After careful consideration, we were satisfied that the spending on the advertisements it considered was Party campaign spending. The advertisements promoted the Party on a national level, referring to national policies, the national political landscape, and making no reference to local issues or local candidates. They had been properly reported in the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return. The UKPGE spending return battlebus issues Battlebus2015 was a Conservative Party campaign which involved transporting activists by coach to campaign or canvass in target seats across England. It took place in the last two weeks of the 2015 UKPGE campaign period, and comprised coach tours to three geographical areas in England – the North, the Midlands and the South West. Each of the three tours included the coach transport of around 50 activists to approximately 10 constituencies in the area over a period of between six and 10 days, with hotel accommodation provided for the activists. The Party funded the campaign's costs, including the volunteers' accommodation, the coach travel and subsistence. The total spending associated with Battlebus2015 reported in the Party's return was £38,996.06.

Reporting in the Party spending return We investigated whether some or all of the Battlebus2015 spending reported by the Party was in fact incurred in promoting the electoral success of Party candidates for the constituencies visited by the tour. Other parties operated similar activities during the UKPGE campaign period and had already been the subject of consideration by us, but the scale of Battlebus2015 and the potential for candidate campaigning was significantly larger than these.

According to the Party, the decision to incur spending on this activity was made by its Executive Senior Management Team (ESMT). It said that this activity was part of its national campaign, focussing on marginal seats as a strategy to procure the electoral success of the Party overall. From its analysis of the evidence obtained during its investigation, we noted the following: There were extensive social media posts from the time of the Battlebus2015 campaign activity that show activists from the coaches holding campaign material promoting individual candidates as opposed to the Party. Whilst the social media posts cannot show the true scale of the candidate campaigning that was taking place on the Battlebus2015 activity, viewed as a body of evidence they are consistent with candidate campaigning having been taking place across a number of constituencies. The Party kept no records of ESMT meetings or decisions relating to the Battlebus2015 campaign activity. Despite this, from voluntary interviews with members of the ESMT, it is clear that the risk of activists campaigning to promote or procure the electoral success of individual candidates while participating in the Battlebus2015 campaign activity was not identified or considered, and little or no monitoring or supervision was put in place to mitigate the risk. This risk, as shown by the social media posts, clearly materialised. We have found no evidence to suggest that the Party had funded the Battlebus2015 campaign with the intention that it would promote or procure the electoral success of candidates. Nevertheless, coaches of activists were transported to marginal constituencies to campaign alongside or in close proximity to local campaigners. In our view, there was a clear and inherent risk that activists might engage in candidate campaigning. Further, it is apparent that candidate campaigning did take place during the Battlebus2015 campaign. There is no evidence to show that either during the campaign or during the compilation of the spending return consideration was given to whether this had occurred. Instead, the Party stated that it was "assumed, but not expressly discussed," that spending on the activity would be reported in the Party's campaign spending return. Consequently an inaccurate assumption was made that the full spending should be reported by the Party. We cannot determine from the available evidence what proportion of spending on the Battlebus2015 campaign activity was properly Party spending and what was candidate campaign expenditure. This is in large part because no records were kept to show how spending was apportioned, despite the fact that PPERA required spending on the Party campaign to be reported separately from any spending the Party undertook on behalf of its candidate. Nonetheless we are satisfied that a proportion of the reported spending was candidate campaign spending and should not have been included in the Party's return. That proportion was also, as a result of this, not included in any relevant candidate's campaign expenses return, casting doubt on the accuracy of those returns. Mr Day was under a duty under PPERA to provide us with the Party's campaign spending return which included a statement of all payments made in respect of the Party's campaign. An offence may occur where this statement includes payments not related to Party campaign spending. Mr Day has provided no excuse for candidate campaign expenses being included. Rather, their inclusion appears a consequence of a lack of consideration given to Battlebus2015 and whether candidate campaigning might take place. We have not sought to identify the extent to which any affected candidates may have underreported their campaign spending, which is an RPA matter and therefore a matter for the police. Omitted spending in respect of the Battlebus2015 campaign activity During the investigation the Party identified further spending of £63,487 on Battlebus2015 campaign activity that had not been reported in its campaign spending return. Mr Day and the Party explained that the omission happened because, during the compilation of the return, spending on a particular budget code was not coded properly and not properly reviewed in accordance with the Party's financial systems. Consequently, they stated, as a result of human error the Party did not identify this spending as campaign spending and did not include it in the return. This does not represent evidence of unforeseen or exceptional circumstances beyond the Party's control that prevented it from reporting this spending. Consequently it is not a reasonable excuse for the omissions. Conclusions in respect of the UKPGE spending return Battlebus2015 issues The Party reported spending of £38,996 incurred in relation to Battlebus2015. In addition, during the investigation the Party identified spending of £63,486.83 on the Battlebus2015 campaign activity that was not reported in its return due to human error. In total, we therefore understand that the Party spent approximately £102,483 on this activity. For the reasons given above, we do not consider that the full cost of the Battlebus2015 campaign activity constituted Party campaign spending. A proportion constituted candidate campaign expenditure incurred on behalf of those candidates who benefitted from the activity. Outcome Consequently, we are satisfied that a proportion of the reported £38,996 was not in fact Party campaign spending and should not have been included in the Party's spending return. Further, we are satisfied that a proportion of the missing £63,486.83 spent on the Battlebus2015 campaign was Party campaign spending. This proportion should have been included in the Party's return and was not. UKPGE spending return UKPGE spending return – further omitted payments issue During the investigation a further five items of spending to the value of £104,765 were identified that were omitted from the return, as follows: Two payments to St Ives Management Services Ltd that were apportioned between the Party and candidates. The Party's apportionment of the first payment was £69,012 and of the second payment was £32,693. A payment of £2,400 to Coach Miles. A payment of £555 in respect of accommodation booked at the Alpha Hostel Margate. A payment of £105 in respect of accommodation booked at the Premier Inn Ramsgate (Marsden Airport). The Party accepted that these payments should have been included within the return and attributed their omissions to administrative failures. We are satisfied that the explanations do not constitute a reasonable excuse; however, given the low value of the two accommodation payments, we chose to accept the Party's statement that they were omitted from the return and not undertake further enquiry in relation to them. Outcome Accordingly, we are satisfied that five campaign spending payments to the value of £104,764 should have been included in the Party's return and were not. Offence under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA Offence under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA We are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the then registered treasurer of the Party, Mr Simon Day, in respect of the Party's campaign spending return for the 2015 UKPGE and without reasonable excuse: failed to include all payments, and associated invoices and receipts, made in respect of Party campaign spending relating to accommodation costs at the Premier Inn in Margate; included payments in the Party's campaign spending return that were candidate campaign expenses incurred in respect of the Party's candidate in South Thanet; failed to include all payments, and associated invoices and receipts, made in respect of Party campaign spending relating to the Battlebus2015 campaign activity; included payments in the Party's campaign spending return that were candidate campaign expenses incurred in respect of the Battlebus2015 campaign activity; and failed to include five further payments, and associated invoices and receipts, to the value of £104,765; Outcome Accordingly, Mr Day committed an offence in that he failed to deliver, without reasonable excuse, a spending return that was a complete statement of campaign spending payments as required under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA. Our findings in respect of omitted invoices and/or receipts Under section 82(4)(b) it is an offence for a treasurer, without reasonable excuse, to submit a campaign spending return that is not accompanied by all the required invoices or receipts relating to the payments in the return. Section 76(2) specifies that an invoice or a receipt is required for all payments with a value of over £200. We identified 81 payments of over £200 included in the return which were not accompanied by the required invoices or receipts. These payments had a total value of £52,924. These payments were identified from credit card statements provided with the return. A credit card statement does not meet the requirements of s80(4) and 76(2) PPERA. It does not provide the itemised details of each payment that would be included in an invoice or receipt. Once raised by us during the investigation, the Party provided the required invoices or receipts for these payments. The Party provided no explanation in relation to this failure other than to refer to administrative errors in the compilation of its campaign spending return. Outcome Accordingly, Mr Day committed an offence under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA in that he delivered, without reasonable excuse, a spending return of which payments totalling £52,924 were not accompanied by the required invoice or receipt. Our actions in respect of the declaration issue Under section 83 of PPERA, campaign spending returns must be accompanied by a declaration to us made by the registered treasurer of the Party. The treasurer is required to state that they have examined the return and, to the best of his or her knowledge and belief, it is complete and correct as required by law. It is an offence for the treasurer to knowingly or recklessly make a false declaration. Civil sanctions do not attach to this offence; it can only be pursued via a criminal prosecution. When Mr Day made the declaration accompanying the 2015 UKPGE spending return, he declared that he personally had examined the return, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief, the return was complete and correct. As explained above, we have concluded that the Party's spending return was missing payments worth at least £104,765, and more likely a far higher figure; that it included payments worth £118,124, a proportion of which should not have been included; and that it did not include the required invoices and receipts for 81 payments to the value of £52,924. Consequently, the spending return was not complete or correct in a number of significant respects. Our enforcement policy explains that where we consider a criminal offence may have occurred that is outside our enforcement role, if appropriate we will refer the matter to the police. We considered the evidence gathered in this investigation about Mr Day's actions in respect of the compilation and submission of the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return. As a result, we have referred Mr Day to the Metropolitan Police Service for consideration as to whether to investigate him for a potential offence under section 83(3) of PPERA. It will be a matter for the Metropolitan Police Service as to what steps they take in this regard. Representations made by the Party In accordance with the procedure set out in Schedule 19C of PPERA, we issued the Party with initial notices setting out its initial determination in respect of the matters under investigation. For each contravention and offence, the initial notices also set out the proposed sanction and the grounds for proposing it. The Party made representations in respect of each of the contraventions and offences, and proposed sanctions, set out by us in our initial notices. In its representations, the Party raised a number of points about, and disagreements with, our conclusions in matters of fact and law. This section summarises the key representations made by the Party, and our response to them. In addition to the key representations set out below, the Party submitted that it had not been uncooperative during the investigation, and that the proposed sanctions were disproportionate in comparison with the penalties issued to other parties in respect of similar matters. We did not agree with these points.

The Party's unreasonable failure to cooperate with us caused delay to the investigation, as described in this report. In addition, when determining the sanctions we considered the specific facts of this case, and its aggravating and mitigating factors, in line with our enforcement policy. The accounting records issues The Party submitted that only those situations where the Party received a monetary income or paid out a monetary amount could be 'transactions' entered into by the Party. The calculation of the notional invoices provided by the Party for inclusion in its candidates' returns for the three 2014 by-elections were not, according to the Party, transactions under section 41 of PPERA as there was no movement of money. This is not the position under PPERA. What counts as a transaction under section 41 of PPERA must be understood in the context of that legislation. The Party's position would mean that there would be no accounting records kept to cover agreements between a party and its candidates and agents for the provision of campaigning services. This would be a major gap in a party's financial records, and inconsistent with the purpose of the PPERA rules, which are there to ensure transparency, scrutiny, fairness and legitimacy in elections. The Party submitted that if contraventions were to be determined in respect of the three 2014 by-elections, then only one sanction in respect of all three should be imposed. The three by-elections were, however, three distinct elections. For us to conclude that three separate sanctions are appropriate is fair and proper. We accepted that the fact that the three arose from the Party taking the same wrong approach to the rules in relatively short succession was a mitigating factor. The 2015 UKPGE spending return – South Thanet, Battlebus2015 and further omitted payments issues The Party raised a point of law that in its view there was no duty on Mr Day as the then registered treasurer to exclude candidate campaign expenses from its Party campaign spending return. This position is at odds with section 72(7) of PPERA, which states that party campaign expenditure does not include anything which falls to be included in a return as to election expenses in respect of a candidate or candidates at a particular election. It is also at odds with the purpose of section 80 of PPERA and the wider PPERA campaign spending regime. To read into the rules that a return can include anything, with the impression that it is all reportable campaign spending, and still be lawful, is inconsistent with a regime the purpose of which is for there to be clear transparency about, and public confidence in, campaign spending. The Party repeated its point, made during the investigation, that it did not consider spending on accommodation for its staff campaigning for the UKPGE to be reportable.

It extended this argument to spending on accommodation for volunteers. To support this point it referred to Part 1 of Schedule 8 of PPERA, which sets out a list of what may be considered campaign expenditure by a Party. Part 1 does not refer explicitly to accommodation. We are satisfied that spending on accommodation that is incurred by or on behalf of a registered political party for electoral purposes, is reportable where it is not excluded from reporting by virtue of being candidate campaign expenses or staff remuneration or allowances. The list given in Part 1 of Schedule 8 should be regarded as categories of spending and does not state all types of spending falling within each category, but confirms that all payments qualifying under it are reportable. Staff and volunteer accommodation is not excluded from being reported by paragraph 2 of Schedule 8 – unless it forms part of staff remuneration and allowances which was not, as a matter of fact, the case in this matter. The consequence of the Party's position would be that political parties with the staffing and financial resource to pay for staff and volunteers to stay and campaign in particular constituencies would have an advantage over those without that resource, as that spending would not count towards the relevant spending limit. This is not consistent with the purpose of the PPERA regime. The Party disagreed that the evidence demonstrated its team based in South Thanet took active roles in campaigning for its candidate, Mr Mackinlay. It also disagreed that the evidence demonstrated activities on the Battlebus2015 tour was campaigning in part for candidates in the constituencies visited. We, however, were satisfied with the evidence on this point.

The 2015 UKPGE spending return - omitted invoices/receipts issue The Party submitted that failing to include the required invoices and receipts for 81 payments of over £200 was not an omission from its 2015 UKPGE campaign spending return, as the payments themselves were included. The rules in PPERA are clear, however, that an invoice or receipt was required for each of these payments. Final determinations Contraventions and Offences We determined that Mr Day had committed three contraventions under section 41 of PPERA, in that he failed to ensure that accounting records were kept that showed and explained the Party's transactions. Specifically the Party's accounting records failed to explain three transactions entered into with three candidates and their agents for a notional donation and spending by the Party on campaigning in by-elections in Newark, Clacton and Rochester and Strood during 2014. We determined that Mr Day committed an offence under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA in that he failed to deliver, without reasonable excuse, the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return accompanied by a statement of all campaign spending payments.

Specifically: Spending in relation to South Thanet that was not Party campaign spending was included in the return. Party campaign spending in relation to South Thanet was omitted from the return. Spending in relation to the Battlebus2015 campaign that was not Party campaign spending was included in the return. Party campaign spending in relation to the Battlebus2015 campaign was omitted from the return. Five further payments were omitted from the return. We determined that Mr Day committed a further offence under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA in respect of the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return, as a result of payments totalling £52,924 having been reported without the required invoices or receipts. Penalties In respect of each of the three contraventions under section 41 of PPERA, we have imposed the maximum financial penalty of £20,000 for the first contravention, £15,000 for the second and £10,000 for the third, a total of £45,000. In determining this penalty we took into account the following factors: The magnitude of the contraventions and the harm caused to confidence in the PPERA regime were, in our view, significant. The correct apportionment of spending between parties and candidates has a significant impact on the effectiveness of, and public confidence in, the PPERA regime. The advantage obtained by the Party from its actions with each invoice provided to each of the three candidates and agents which inaccurately understated the amount spent by the Party on behalf of the three candidates. This is irrespective of whether, in the end, the Party's candidates were successful in the by-election. The significant uncertainty for voters as to whether the Party complied with its duties significantly, which increased the weighting to be attached to the magnitude of the breach and the impact on public confidence. The lack of cooperation by the Party during the investigation. The fact that the Party does not accept the requirement to keep records of this type, which leads us to consider the risk that the Party may follow a similar course of action in future if we do not take robust action to make our position clear. An acceptance that, while the second and third contraventions were no less serious than the first, the three separate failures resulted from the same misconceived course of action. In respect of the offence under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA related to the failure to deliver the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return with a statement of all campaign spending payments, we have imposed the maximum financial penalty of £20,000. In determining this penalty we took into account the following factors; The omission of over £100,000 of spending from the Party's return alone, which was a significant loss of transparency and a failure of significant magnitude. The actual value of the under- and overstated spending was likely to be far greater. The advantage obtained by Party by its actions; the inclusion in the Party return of what in our view should have been reported as candidate spending meant that there was a realistic prospect that this enabled its candidates to gain a financial advantage over opponents. In this respect we noted that the Battlebus2015 campaign visited target constituencies and that South Thanet was also a key priority for the Party. The unreasonable uncooperative conduct by the Party, of which this offence was one element, which delayed without good reason and for a number of months the provision of information needed to progress the investigation. This in turn increased the public funds incurred by us during the investigation. In respect of the offence under section 82(4)(b) of PPERA related to the failure to deliver all the required invoices or receipts with the Party's 2015 UKPGE spending return, we have imposed a financial penalty of £5,000. In determining this penalty we took into account the following factors: The harm caused to confidence in the party finance regime represented an aggravating factor, in light of the value of the payments and the campaign to which they related. The omission of supporting information undermines the ability of us and the public to review and verify the spending figures within the return. There was a consequent impact on transparency and most likely, as a direct result, on public confidence. The unreasonable uncooperative conduct by the Party during the investigation, of which this offence was one element, which delayed without good reason and for a number of months the provision of information needed to progress the investigation. The Party has now provided the missing invoices and receipts. However, these were only provided as a result of our enquiries. The total value of the penalties imposed on the Party following this investigation is £70,000.

Response to statutory consultation on guidance for Returning Officers on assistance with voting for disabled people You are in the Our consultations section Home

Our consultations On this page Summary Background Themes raised through consultation First published: 6 February 2023 Last updated: 8 February 2023 Summary There should be no barriers to voting for disabled people. Everyone should have the right to vote on their own and in secret. The Elections Act 2022 includes provisions requiring Returning Officers (ROs) to provide such equipment as is reasonable to enable, or make it easier for, disabled people to vote independently and in secret at the polling station. Between 5 December 2022 and 16 January 2023, we conducted a statutory consultation on our draft guidance for ROs on assistance with voting for disabled people. The consultation received 41 responses from members of the public, electoral administrators, and a range of charity, civil society and third sector organisations. We are grateful to everyone who provided us with feedback, including as part of our initial consultation earlier in 2022. We have used this to inform the further development of the guidance which will be used for the May 2023 polls. View the guidance We set out below a summary of the key themes and issues that emerged in the statutory consultation, and how we have considered them in updating the guidance and in our wider work to support making elections accessible for all.

Background

Elections Act 2022 The Elections Act 2022 includes amendments to the Representation of the People Act 1983 which introduce a new requirement for ROs to provide such equipment as is reasonable for the purposes of enabling, or making it easier for, relevant persons to vote independently and in secret at the polling station. We must give guidance to ROs on this duty, and to consult on this guidance. ROs must have regard to this guidance in performing their duty. 'Relevant persons' are defined in the legislation as those who find it difficult or impossible to vote due to blindness, partial sight or another disability. 'Independently' refers to voting without assistance from another person, not without any form of assistive device. These provisions will apply to: UK parliamentary elections Police and Crime Commissioner elections in England and Wales Northern Ireland Assembly and local elections Local elections in England ROs are personally responsible for the conduct of elections in their area. In Northern Ireland, the Chief Electoral Officer (CEO) is the RO, so references to 'ROs' should be read to include the CEO.

Development of the guidance The guidance was developed in three phases: A pre-consultation phase: We engaged with representatives from the electoral administrator sector and a range of civil society, charity and third-sector organisations across the whole of the UK. An initial six-week public consultation on draft guidance : We received 67 responses from members of the public, electoral administrators and a range of organisations. We also engaged with electoral administrators from across the UK at a national seminar. A statutory consultation on the updated guidance. Themes raised through consultation Here is a summary of the key themes and issues that emerged in the statutory consultation. This includes how we have considered them when updating the guidance, and in our wider work to support making elections accessible for all.

Addressing barriers to voting Overall, respondents welcomed the updated guidance and felt it provided a comprehensive overview of the barriers faced by disabled voters and how these might be addressed. We have made the following updates to our guidance as a result of comments received on barriers to voting: We included those with cognitive impairments in the list of people for whom instructions may not always be provided in an accessible format. We expanded on the specific additional barriers that blind and partially sighted people face, due to the method of voting, making a cross in a specific location on a piece of paper, being principally a visual exercise. We expanded on areas to be covered in training for polling station staff, to include: awareness that there are no legal barriers to prevent disabled people from voting, including voters with any learning disability or cognitive impairment awareness that not all disabilities are visible or obvious, and that polling station staff should not make assumptions about what equipment voters might need awareness that a companion, if they have completed the declaration, can accompany a voter into the polling booth to assist them awareness of equipment with which staff may be less familiar, such as hearing loop systems awareness of Makaton and British Sign Language as alternative methods of communication that voters may use We included making information available in large print to support elderly voters, dyslexic voters, and voters who have dementia. We clarified that support and auxiliary aids need to be easily accessible to help people to vote independently and in secret. Supporting ROs to help make voting accessible Some respondents asked for additional information to be provided to ROs to support them in delivering accessible elections. We also received requests for more guidance on ROs' statutory duties under the Elections Act and the wider framework of equalities legislation. We have made the following changes to the guidance as a result: We clarified that the strength of magnifier needed will vary depending on the amount of vision a voter has. Therefore, ROs may need to provide more than one strength of magnifier. We made clear that tactile voting devices on their own do not allow blind voters to vote independently, unless they also have accessible information about the order of the candidates on the ballot paper. We expanded on and updated the language in the guidance around the legislative framework, including: ensuring the wording in the guidance consistently and more closely mirrored the relevant wording in the Elections Act 2022 referring more consistently to ROs' anticipatory duty to make reasonable adjustments under the Equality Act 2010 and how ROs must consider requests for adjustments, including keeping a record of requests for future planning purposes referencing the Public Sector Equality Duty and how this interacts with ROs' other duties under the Equality Act 2010. We expanded on how ROs can proactively use local data to inform their decisions about the additional support and equipment they provide at polling stations to enable or make it easier for disabled people to vote independently and in secret. For example, we have referenced how ROs might use the sight loss registers or the Sight Loss Data Tool provided by the RNIB, to help them identify how many electors in their area are affected by sight loss. This could help ROs to anticipate the needs of blind and partially sighted people in their area and comply with their duty under the Equality Act 2010 to make reasonable adjustments to assist individuals on the register to participate in electoral events. Equipment to be provided in polling stations Some points were raised about the suggested minimum requirements for equipment at the polling station and around ensuring consistent provision across all polling stations: We received some suggestions that audio devices should be included on our list of equipment that all ROs should provide as a minimum in every polling station. We have recommended that ROs consider providing audio devices at specific polling stations where they identify, or are made aware, that an audio device would enable or make it easier for a voter in a specific polling station to vote independently and in secret. We highlight how ROs can use sight loss registers or the Sight Loss Data Tool as a way of identifying blind and partially sighted voters in their area who may need such a device, as part of meeting their anticipatory duty under the Equality Act 2010. Some respondents raised concerns about the possible lack of consistency across the UK in terms of equipment and support provided at different polling stations. Under the Equality Act 2010, ROs have an anticipatory duty to make reasonable adjustments. This means they must take steps to understand and anticipate on an ongoing basis the needs of disabled voters with different types of disability, support and access requirements. Such adjustments will necessarily reflect local circumstances and approaches, which means that a standardised list alone would not be appropriate. Our guidance aims to support ROs in meeting their duties under the Elections Act and the wider framework of equalities legislation. We also received feedback asking us to mandate, rather than suggest, provisions and equipment in the guidance. The Elections Act does not give us scope to prescribe a list of items or equipment that ROs must make available in each polling station. ROs must have regard to our guidance to help them decide, based on ongoing review of local needs. We will keep the guidance under regular review, including in relation to the equipment that should be provided as a minimum, and any additional equipment and support. We will ask for feedback from voters and electoral administrators on the equipment provided to support disabled voters. This will be as part of our reporting on elections and to support the identification and sharing of good practice. Additional resources for ROs We have included some suggestions in the polling station handbook, rather than in the guidance. This includes: a checklist for equipment to be provided at the polling station, as part of the polling station set-up checklist information on providing directional signage at the polling station ensuring that polling station staff know how to use equipment in order to support voters ensuring that equipment is visible and readily available for voters to use ensuring that polling station staff are aware that there are no legal barriers to prevent disabled people from voting, including voters with any learning disability or cognitive impairment. The polling station handbook is a resource designed to assist polling station staff. The handbook describes the procedures to be followed and how to deal with any issues that may arise. Supporting ROs with public awareness and partnerships work Some respondents asked for more support for ROs to help them identify and communicate with disabled voters in their local area and provide them with information in accessible alternative formats, including on their voting rights. We also received feedback about the lack of information in alternative formats for voters who are digitally excluded, and about providing ROs with a list of partners, including in other local authority teams, with whom they could work. We expanded on how ROs can communicate directly with disabled voters to provide information and find out more about the types of provision they might need. This includes how ROs can work with others across a local authority. We highlighted how ROs can use local authority sight loss registers to ensure that they communicate with people in their preferred formats, including those who are digitally excluded. We expanded on how ROs can communicate with voters about the voting process and the support that is available to voters. We clarified that, in addition to providing a dedicated web page, ROs may display advance information on voting at the polling station on public notice boards. We referenced the fact ROs can work with care homes and day centres in their local area. We referenced existing guidance from the Government Communication Service on making communications accessible. We have also developed additional resources to support the delivery of accessible elections. This includes resources to help organisations raise awareness of the voter ID requirement , which contain information about registering to vote and voting in the elections. These are printable resources that organisations can disseminate with their users and members. In previous years, we have co-created voter information materials in accessible formats, including easy read guides (co-produced with Mencap), mock ballot papers (co-created with United Response), and a suite of videos and guides in BSL. We are working to build on our offering and to co-create voter information resources and programmes for disabled voters with partner organisations for future elections, to ensure that they are fit for purpose and impactful. We anticipate that new resources will be evergreen, for year-round use, beyond election periods. We will continue to grow our partner network and seek further opportunities for co-creation, and to refine resources and programmes in response to voter feedback. Evaluation and learning lessons for the future Most respondents welcomed the additional information and resources we will provide to help ROs to evaluate and learn lessons for future polls. They also welcomed the activity we will undertake to report on the implementation of the new accessibility provisions. Many respondents also appreciated the emphasis on the guidance being a living document, which will be kept under regular review. Some respondents asked us to provide ROs with a questionnaire to collect feedback from the disabled community. Others suggested making surveys available in easy read and print formats, and that voters should be able to complete these outside the polling station environment. We intend to provide a template survey that can be used by ROs to gather feedback from disabled voters. We will consider making this template survey available in easy read format for the 2023 elections. We will gather feedback from disabled voters by two main routes: Our public opinion survey will include a boosted sample of disabled people, including voters and non-voters, asking questions about their experience and perceptions of the recent elections. We will not survey voters in the polling station environment. We will also gather feedback from representative organisations through a survey that they can share with their members and service users. This survey will be available as a Word document, which can be printed, filled out and returned by post for those who are digitally excluded. As part of our post-poll surveys of poll staff and electoral administrators, we will ask for feedback about the accessibility support provided to voters, and about any specific support requested and provided to voters. We will also use our new performance standards to support and challenge ROs around the accessibility of elections, and to inform our reporting on the support and equipment provided. Comments received which were out of scope Some responses raised issues outside the scope of this consultation and the guidance, some of which would require further legislative change in order to be actioned. Issues included: The suitability and location of polling stations The availability of telephone or electronic voting Publication of candidate and party information in accessible formats, well ahead of an election Providing the canvass and postal vote application forms, and the invitation to register letter in alternative formats (including Welsh or other language versions) Allowing voters to declare specific requirements when registering to vote Creating a national risk list where difficulties with accessible voting are recorded While we have not addressed these here, we will continue to consider how we can take these into account in our guidance, research and public awareness work. Some respondents also raised wider concerns around staff capacity, recruiting staff, and funding. We will continue to monitor these as part of our wider engagement with ROs. Funding remains a matter for the Department for Levelling Up, Housing and Communities. Breakdown of statutory consultation responses by question The breakdown of statutory consultation responses by question does not include those respondents who chose to submit feedback in other formats or as free text only. All responses have been considered when updating the guidance and in our wider work to support making elections accessible to all. published: 4 July 2023 Last updated: 27 September 2023 Our people Staff relations and engagement The Commission relies on the dedication, expertise and hard work of its staff. Together, teams work to deliver a high-quality service to voters and stakeholders, while also striving to fulfil the strategic objectives set out in the Corporate Plan. This work relies on constructive relationships across the Commission, with the Executive Team, and the Board. A staff engagement group, made up of representatives from all parts of the organisation, meets regularly to discuss corporate issues and Commission culture to seek input and views from colleagues. This is supported by regular cross-team project meetings, team meetings, and line management check ins, to ensure that views and voices are being heard. This year the Commission launched a new Culture Charter, created by staff, and a new Dignity and Respect Policy. We also rolled out bullying and harassment training. Staff Awards were also held to recognise and celebrate the efforts and achievements of those working within the organisation. The Commission has an active union, which plays an important role in the dialogue between staff and management. There was an official trade dispute in relation to pay settlements this year, but dialogue and engagement remained constructive. We completed our latest staff survey in December 2022 and 86% of employees responded. Our employee engagement score was 66% (down marginally from 67% in 2021). Our scores compared most positively to the Civil Service benchmark

(2021) in areas such as our people agreeing that: They have the opportunity to contribute views before decisions are made that affect them (at 60%, 21% points higher than the benchmark) They feel proud when they tell others they work for the Commission (at 81%, 18% points higher than the benchmark) The areas where we compared least positively to the Civil Service benchmark, and we need to improve, include people agreeing that: There are opportunities to progress in their career at the Commission (at 23%, 36% points lower than the benchmark) They have the IT systems and equipment needed to do their job effectively (at 48%, 24% points lower than the benchmark) Performance indicators Indicator Target 2022-23 Maintained staff wellbeing

66% Occupational health and safety We review our health and safety policy annually.

We also have procedures, guidance and risk assessments in place to cover our core activities. A health and safety group oversees our arrangements. They meet regularly and report to our senior leadership group. However, primary responsibility for health and safety sits with people managers. We initiate independent health and safety audits of our premises each year, which involves inspecting working environments and reviewing safety management systems. These audits tell us if our arrangements are suitable and highlight any improvements we need to make. In 2022/23 we: Installed LED lighting at our London office, providing a feeling of natural light Conducted fixed wire testing at our offices in London and Cardiff Supported homeworkers and office-based staff with equipment requests, such as workstation and orthopaedic chairs and back support cushions Conducted portable appliance testing at all of our offices

Continued enhanced cleaning regimes, including provision of hand sanitisers and antibacterial wipes. Our environmental impact We recognise that delivering our activities has an impact on the environment and we continue to work towards minimising this impact. We lease office space in four cities from a combination of public and private sector property owners. We do not have direct control of utility supplier and waste disposal targets and management at our premises. For a number of our offices, the property owner manages energy and water consumption as well as waste disposal and recovers costs through a consolidated service charge. Offices in Edinburgh, Cardiff and Belfast have relocated to smaller, more environmentally efficient premises in the last 10 years. We completed the renewal of the lease for our London office in 2020.

N/A	Sustainability report	The Commission is committed to supporting the governments and the wider electoral community. We will adopt a strategy and implementation plan which meets environmental standards required of our electoral system. Internally, we recognise the importance of sustainability as an organisation. During 2023/24 we will start the process of developing a full environmental and sustainability review. Our aim is that this work will help us to report on our sustainability strategy in more detail in the coming years and to measure progress. More detail will be available in the next Annual Report & Accounts, and will take into account our work across all nations in the UK and with devolved administrations. Initiatives are in place to help minimise environmental impact reduced printed resources provided to electoral administrators and other groups, focusing on electronic provision wherever possible encouraged the use of video and teleconferencing to avoid unnecessary travel with consequential CO2 emissions operated recycling facilities in all our offices	London Office Performance commentary on emissions	We aim to decrease our fossil fuel consumption year on year, an ongoing effect of the property owner's introduction of measures to reduce levels of electricity consumption, including lower 'out of hours' operation of plant and machinery and the introduction of energy-efficient lighting.

				We have reduced out of hours working since 2017-18 to help cut our emissions. Since the introduction of hybrid working, we have reduced our travel and energy consumption within the office. In February 2023, a project to install LED lighting at our London office was completed. The impact on the energy consumption was immediate and resulted in a 43% reduction during February and March 2023, when compared with the corresponding 2-month period in 2022.
Waste	report	General waste and recycling figures	are based on a proportion of total building waste and are not directly controllable by us. Confidential waste disposal for the organisation is handled separately from that for other building occupants. We shred the confidential waste we generate on-site before it is recycled into low-grade paper. The general and recycled waste is based on a proportion of total building waste. All general waste produced in the building, including that generated by us, is sent to a nearby energy from waste plant, instead of landfill sites. We have reduced our use of paper since 2017-18 to help cut our waste. Since the introduction of hybrid working, we have further reduced our paper use significantly. and not spent is included as deferred income in the Statement of Financial Position.
In achieving our objectives, we have used £25.1m worth of our resource budget for the whole year. This was out of the available sum of £25.2m approved by the UK Parliament in our Supplementary Estimate for the net resource voted requirement, net of income received from the devolved authorities. The graphic below summarises our financial performance on the 'voted' element of our budget. Financial performance 2022/23 Our financial performance follows our strategic performance. For the year 2022/23: our staff costs represented 42% of our resource expenditure, which is a decrease from 2021/22 due to additional spend within our public awareness campaigns. The overall spend on staffing is higher by £1.3m. our capital expenditure increased by £0.1m from 2021-22 due to the continued improvement within ICT. Overall expenditure Scottish Parliament and Senedd expenditure in the table above are a subset of the overall cost. We report our underspend to reflect in-year operational decisions, we exclude Policy Development Grant which is distributed by formula set by government. In 2022/23 the underspend on this measure was £79k against the voted budget (>1%). Other underspend £211k in provisions (Resource AME) due to less than expected pension and dilapidation movements. £612k in capital projects due to not continuing with our Political Finance Online project and the shift of on-premise servers to cloud based systems. Our income in the accounts relates to charges for registering political parties. We also report and are accountable to the Senedd and Scottish Parliament Corporate Body. The income recognised in the accounts is predominately for devolved elections work. All income is recognised in note 4 of the accounts. We collect fines raised against political parties and individuals for failure to comply with the rules on party and election finance and then surrender these to the Consolidated Fund as required by law. In addition to monitoring performance against budgets, we also managed within our cash limits set by the UK Parliament. We required cash amounting to £22.5m to finance our voted activities, which was £3.6m less than the sum of £26.1m approved by the UK Parliament in our Supplementary Estimate. The reconciliation of net resources outturn to net cash requirement, within the accountability report, provides a reconciliation from our outturn to the net cash we required in-year. The Statement of Cash Flows shows that the cash balance as at 31 March 2023 was £9k. The Statement of Financial Position as at 31 March 2023 shows negative taxpayers' equity. These liabilities will be met through future provision of supply funding. Supplier payments Although we are independent of government, we aim to comply with the Prompt Payment Code that operates across the public sector. The target is to pay undisputed invoices within 30 days. In 2022-23, we paid 100% of invoices within 30 days. Supply estimate for 2023-24 Our Main Supply Estimate for 2023-24 (HC1385) provides for a net resource requirement of £28.8m. This is an 14% increase from 2022-23 mainly due to the inflationary increases and additional public awareness budget. Our Main Estimate is broken down as follows: Expenditure Voted £m Non-voted £m Total £m Departmental Expenditure Limit: Resource 28.775 0.225 28.980 Departmental Expenditure Limit: Capital 2.005 0.000 2.005 Annually Managed Expenditure: Resource 0.050 0.000 0.050 Annually Managed Expenditure: Capital 0.100 0.000 0.100 Total Net Budget: Resource 28.805 0.225 29.030 Total Net Budget: Capital 2.105 0.000 2.105 Net cash requirement 29.133 0.000 29.133 Naivgation Previous Next Enabling activity: A learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used efficiently Powers and sanctions report

This area of work focuses on innovation and strengthening our evidence base. Our expertise in policy, research and communications are core to enabling this work. Key achievements To share our independent and expert advice on our democratic system, we: deployed a public awareness campaign to support understanding of online advertising techniques, in conjunction with regulatory partners published our annual survey of public opinion, which found public confidence in the running of elections at a record high provided detailed analysis of the UK Government's Elections Bill, including feedback to Cabinet Office, briefings to parliamentarians, oral evidence to parliamentary committees, meetings with the Minister, and content for our website provided analysis to parliamentarians in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland on the impact of measures in the Elections Bill, and briefings to the Scottish and Welsh governments, particularly in relation to their consideration of requests for legislative consent responded to the Welsh Government's consultation on election rules for local government elections in May 2022, and shared thinking and evaluation plans for the pilots they intend to run extended our engagement with educators and published more learning resources for young people, and those that work with them, to promote political literacy and understanding of democratic processes provided evidence to the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the UK Parliament on our work, and published our views on the findings of the Committee on Standards in Public Life's report on political finance published the findings of qualitative research on modernising elections, looking at public attitudes to voting and the information available around elections Performance measures Measure Performance We publish 100% of our reports to planned deadlines 100 % Achieved We comment on 100% of relevant legislation and policy proposals 100 % Achieved Work in support of the electoral law reform recommendations from the England and Wales, Scotland and the Northern Ireland Law Commissions Ongoing Our activities during the year Providing independent and expert advice We published three reports on the May 2021 elections, the most complex set of polls in recent years, with the additional challenges brought by the coronavirus pandemic. We found that the changes put in place by the UK's governments, electoral administrators and by us helped to support and reassure voters and campaigners. Our reports described the continued concerns about the resilience and capacity of local electoral services teams across Great Britain. In response, we highlighted our plans to work in partnership with the electoral community, including Government and local authorities, to help build more resilience for the future. The UK Government's Elections Bill has been a significant focal point of our work over the last year. As well as working closely to support officials on developing the legislation, we gave evidence to the Joint Committee on Human Rights, the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and the Public Bill Committee, on the Bill as a whole or particular aspects. We also provided briefings to parliamentarians across Great Britain about key considerations and potential impacts, including before key parliamentary debates. We provided evidence to the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the UK Parliament on our work, and briefed selected peers ahead of Dissolution and Calling of Parliament Bill Second Reading in Lords. We published findings from a new research study looking at the public's needs and expectations about the voting process and the information they receive about voting. This research is part of a wider project looking at the future of voting, and we will use it to develop recommendations to the UK's governments about how the electoral system can continue to support participation in the democratic process. We continued to expand our engagement with educators to promote political literacy and understanding of democratic processes, publishing more learning resources for young people and those that work with them. This included form-time activities, lesson plans and activities for assemblies, for use in secondary schools in Great Britain. Acting on analytics and feedback from user testing, we continued to develop our website functionality and content. We deployed new search functionality and restructured guidance content on our website for electoral administrators, political parties and campaigners. Apologies and welcomes There were no apologies received. The Chair welcomed all to the meeting welcoming Commissioners in person (reminding of the meeting social distancing requirement) and joining remotely, and formally welcomed Commissioner Katy Radford following receipt of her Royal Warrant. The Board noted that they would be joined by an external facilitator, Marcia Bluck at agenda item 6, to facilitate part of the discussions on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion. The Board took a moment to reflect on the life and work of Sir David Amess MP and noted the statement of condolences issued by the Commission. Commissioners expressed their concerns in light of the tragic event, about the physical and verbal threats received by elected representatives, and lack of respect for the contributions made by public servants. Discussions were had relating to the Metropolitan Police advice on private security for candidates standing for elections, and that this raised a difficult aspect for candidates as under elections law currently the cost of security would count against their candidate spending limit. Commissioners considered that security should not be an election expense. The Board requested that the Commission Chair write to Mr Speaker with condolences and to note concerns about treatment under election law of security costs for candidates standing for elections. The Board noted updates from the Chair, Commissioner Elan Closs Stephens and the Chief Executive on activities that had taken place since the last meeting, including a meeting with UK Minister Kemi Badenoch, preparations for 2022 elections in Northern Ireland, consideration by the Llywydd Committee of the Commission's draft Corporate Plan, the recruitment of the new Chief Executive role was underway, the EDI Strategy to go out for consultation including translation in Welsh, and progress in relation to the Elections Bill. The Board requested further briefing on the devolution aspects of the Elections Bill. There was further discussion of the proposals for a Strategy and Policy Statement and the Commission's response. Declarations of interest Commissioner Joan Walley declared in writing to the Board Secretary, that she attended a seminar in September 2021 organised by the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, which was remunerated. The Board noted that the Commissioners' Register of interests would be updated and this reflected on the Commission's external website in line with the Commissioners' Code of Conduct. Minutes of the previous Board meeting (EC 68/21) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 22 September 2021 be agreed noting the following addition to the action point at paragraph 6.8 "and a mechanism for engaging Commissioners". Commission Board action tracker (EC 69/21) Resolved: That the Board noted the progress against actions requested by the Board.

Forward Plan of Board business (EC 70/21) Resolved: That the Board reviewed and noted the Forward Plan of Board business scheduling further topics for the next few meetings, including a discussion of Key Performance Indicators for the new Corporate Plan. Board effectiveness review and follow up on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) discussion on improving Board diversity (EC 71/21)

a. Governance Structure: Committee terms of reference The General Counsel introduced the report providing context to each session of the report to be discussed and for next steps agreed. The Board reminded itself that the Commission's duties and responsibilities were set out in PPERA and the Board are indivisible from the Commission. The Committee Chairs of Audit and Risk (ARC) and Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo) advised that they had reviewed their committee terms of reference in their previous meetings but would consider reviewing further to make sure they were content and aligned with the Commission's strategy in the new Corporate Plan. The Board discussed that the Corporate Governance Framework (CGF) be reviewed in light of the new Corporate Plan (CP), once finalised, to ensure that it appropriately reflects the Commission's new objectives and the legal duties of Commissioners as set out in PPERA. It will be brought back to the March 2022 Board meeting for endorsement. Action: Both ARC and RemCo to review their terms of reference in order to agree that they align with the Commission's strategy, and bring back to the March 2022 Board meeting for agreement.

Action: The CGF to be reviewed once the CP has been finalised to ensure it appropriately reflects the Commission's new objectives and the legal duties of Commissioners as set out in PPERA, and to be brought back to the March 2022 Board meeting for endorsement. Action owner: General Counsel Submitted by: March 2022.

b. Review of Forward Plan of Business The General Counsel introduced the session on the Forward Plan of Board Business. The Board discussed future items to be included onto the Forward Plan, making sure that it reflected its objectives and priorities, including monitoring of the Corporate Plan, and planning future 'deep dive' strategic sessions. The Board discussed that they would like to see the Forward Plan reflect the annual cycle of business including preparation of the Forward Plan in the autumn. The Board discussed that the review and reporting items including the Board effectiveness review should be planned before the end of the financial year, and horizon scanning in the summer, with updates from the Chief Executive at each Board meeting with detailed written performance reports every quarter. The Board discussed the desired approach for the performance reports, making sure they align to the Key Performance Indicators for the Corporate Plan, focussing on outcomes rather than activities, and drawing out impacts on all four nations. The Board further discussed topics for 'deep dive' strategic sessions on risk, which has been scheduled for December 2021, regulation, which the Board scheduled for January 2022, Elections Bill, understanding devolution and the wider landscape in England. It was noted that the Board would where appropriate welcome external speakers for 'deep dive' strategic sessions, and that items for the Forward Plan could be constructed over a 2 year period. It was further noted that rolling consideration over the lifetime of the Corporate Plan, on each of the 5 objectives and underpinning work relating to the Commission should also be programmed. The new Forward Plan will be brought back to the Board for review and agreement.

c. Review of Board delegations The Board reviewed the schedule of Board delegations, in order to be satisfied it continued to strike the right balance between the Board, its Committees and the Executive, to set strategy and enable non-executive oversight. It was noted that the Board is accountable for all decisions of the Commission notwithstanding the delegations made to the Executive. The Board discussed how they could work more effectively in support of the Executive Team and wanted to see a fuller partnership model. The Board requested that the Corporate Governance Framework is made clearer as to the circumstances where the Executive should inform or consult the Board on delegated matters. The Board agreed that Commissioners Sarah Chambers and Stephen Gilbert work with Director, Regulation by joining a new quarterly strategy session on regulation.

Action: The CGF to be reviewed to be clearer as to the circumstances where the Executive should inform or consult the Board on delegated matters and to be brought back to the March 2022 Board meeting for endorsement. Action owner: General Counsel Submitted by: March 2022. Resolved: The Board agreed that Commissioners Sarah Chambers and Stephen Gilbert work with Director of Regulation to join a new quarterly strategy session on regulation. d. Linked Commissioners The Board noted the session on linked Commissioners and noted the significant contribution made by Commissioners in specific areas. The Board noted the importance of closer working between Commissioners and the Executive. Commissioners offered to share their skills and experience and this will be captured by the forthcoming Commissioner questionnaire.

Resolved: That the Board agreed that Commissioners Joan Walley and Katy Radford be linked Commissioners for work on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI). e. Managing risk of divergence and resolving conflicts The Board noted the session on managing risk of divergence and resolving conflicts, striving to maintain high standards of independence and integrity. f. Board Equality, Diversity and Inclusion The General Counsel introduced Marcia Bluck, an external consultant, to participate in discussions for this session. The Board considered the proposal for an Independent Adviser to the Board on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI). The Board resolved that the work for the Independent Adviser would likely take 2 days per month for an initial period. The Board resolved that Commissioners Joan Walley and Katy Radford work with Commission staff to recruit an Independent Adviser and to propose Board level commitments on EDI. SM suggested that the PPP consider a letter from the Director of the Scottish Conservative and Unionist Party, to the Convener of the Electoral Management Board for Scotland, as the first substantive item. Minutes of previous meeting The minute was confirmed subject to the inclusion of an amendment suggested by Isabel Drummond-Murray. There were no action points outstanding. Covid-19 Impact on by elections SM referred to a letter from the Director of the Scottish Conservative and Unionist Party, to the Convener of the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB), requesting that the EMB recommend to Councils and the Scottish Parliament that all by-elections in Scotland be held over to 6 May 2021 in line with England and Wales. SM sought the views of the PPP on the proposals, accepting it was a matter for the EMB. The following points were raised and discussed: SM felt holding two different types of election on the same day might result in confusion (as happened in 2007) and said democracy should happen when the health situation allowed it to happen. He suggested an alternative approach of a 'Super Thursday' i.e. holding by-elections the month after the Scottish Parliament election. Matt Edmonds (ME) agreed postponement was a way to provide clarity to councils and minimise confusion. He referred to the recent Clackmannanshire by-election. He suggested the possibility of postponing elections could allow focus on other activities, such as the 2020 Annual Canvass. Paul Moat (PM) agreed with the principle of delaying by-elections until next year as it was uncertain if by-elections could take place in the current climate. He suggested that holding by-elections on the same day as Scottish Parliament elections would raise issues and considered it prudent to delay holding by-elections until March next year. Michael Sharpe (MS) felt we should hold by-elections when safe to do so but there was still ambiguity about when that would be. With rolling lockdowns a possibility, it would be useful for us to know, practically, how we can deliver democracy and we should take the opportunity to hold socially distanced elections where possible. He did not want to see a repeat of holding multiple types of elections on one day, but if democracy were continually interrupted then we would have to consider alternatives where we could. James Newman (JN) advised on Scottish Government thinking behind the revisions to the Coronavirus Act 2020. He noted that the Clackmannanshire East by-election had been postponed before the Act was in place. A number of Council by elections in Scotland had since been postponed under the Act. Postponement provisions currently run only until May 2021. Scottish Government were considering options for the May 2021 election should restrictions continue. SM asked if any consideration had been given to the application of the “6-month rule” when meetings were not physically held. Important that this did not create unintentional vacancies. Malcolm Burr (MB) indicated he was happy to speak to Solace about the ‘six month rule’. MB noted the potential impact of vacancies on the ability of smaller local authorities to conduct business. He thought that it was important not to lose sight of the ‘local’ impact of vacancies. He indicated his view that by elections should be held as soon as practically possible. Craig Chalcraft (CC) noted that Parliamentary time to limited in terms of providing scope for legislative change going forward. Andy O'Neill (AON) noted the Electoral Commission had no official view on the terms of the letter but, essentially, thought the Scottish provisions were a subtle solution which allowed by-elections to take place when they could. He acknowledged the particular issues and difficulties of holding Council by elections on the same day as Scottish Parliamentary elections. Dame Susan Bruce (SB) agreed that it would be preferable not to hold Council by elections on the same day as the Scottish Parliament poll, given experience of the past. She did not feel Scottish elections required alignment with England and Wales arrangements. Chris Highcock (CH) expressed the view that there should not be undue delays to the democratic processes while accepting that there would be practical difficulties in holding by elections during restrictions. SM thanked everyone for their contributions to the discussion.

Scottish Government update James Newman (JN) and Iain Hockenhull provided the following updates: The prisoner voting aspects of the Scottish Elections (Franchise and Representation) Act 2020 had been implemented. The remaining provisions were likely to be commenced from early August 2020 with secondary legislation being introduced to the Scottish parliament imminently. A provisional date had been set for Stage 3 consideration of the Scottish Elections (Reform) Bill. Confirmation of the date was awaited. Work has started on the conduct Order for the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. Consideration is being given to any impact from Covid-19 on how the poll may be conducted. The E-counting project for the 2022 elections is progressing, with the contract out to tender. AON highlighted the impact that any delay to the Bill would have on the Commission’s accountability to the Scottish Parliament and for Codes of Practice. JN acknowledged the concern. SM referred to the issue he had raised with Scottish Government on Bill related to local government candidate spending. IH advised that the issue was being considered. SM asked if any other amendments were likely to appear in the SP Conduct Order. JN advised that the Order was likely to be an updated version of the 2015 Order, plus any essential changes. In respect of the E-counting project, SM noted he had looked at the public procurement document through the public contracts website. He asked why the specification required the first preference graphs to stop at the 80% votes threshold. JN said he would discuss with CH and others and come back to the PPP.

Scotland Office update Craig Chalcraft (CC) provided an update on the review of UK Parliamentary boundaries. The UK Government had decided that the number of UK constituencies would remain at 650 with no change to the parliamentary quota levels. Future reviews would be conducted on that basis. Scottish Boundary Commission update The PPP noted the written update provided by Isabel Drummond-Murray (ID-M) who, while present, was unable to be heard due to technical difficulties. The report highlighted the following: On 18 March, LGBCS submitted its recommendations to Scottish Ministers following its interim review of the boundary between Glasgow Provan and Coatbridge and Chryston constituencies. If accepted, the recommendations would realign the constituency boundaries with the Glasgow City and North Lanarkshire council area boundary further information was available on the website. In terms of the Islands (Scotland) Act 2018, LGBCS had completed its consultations in Na h-Heileanan an Iar, Orkney and Shetland Council areas. Consultations in respect of proposals for Argyll and Bute, Highland and North Ayrshire council areas will be expected to begin shortly. Recommendations for all 6 council areas would be submitted to Scottish Ministers in May 2021 in order that, if passed by the Scottish Parliament, changes would be in force for the local government elections expected in May 2022. Scottish Elections (Reform) Bill – The legislation has a number of potential implications for LGBCS including a name change to Boundaries Scotland; change in scheduling and approval process for reviews of both Scottish parliament constituencies and regions and a local government electoral arrangements; introduction of use of 2 and 5 member wards across Scotland. Review of UK Parliamentary constituencies in Scotland – the Minister for State for the Cabinet Office made a Written Ministerial Statement on 24 March setting out the Government's intentions regarding implementation of the 2018 Review and plans for future reviews. No further information was available at this time.

Royal Mail update Scott Forsyth (SF) talked about the accelerated plan prepared by Rachel Winham for the snap UKPGE in December 2019 to ensure processes were in place. Pressure on infrastructure reflected the pace required to execute an election in incredibly short timescales and at their absolute busiest period of the year. As a result of the truncated timelines, lessons were learned. SF confirmed procedures had been reviewed to ensure those improvements are in place for future campaigns.

Electoral Management Board update Pete Wildman (PW) updated on electoral registration. He reported on how Electoral Registration offices were operating under Covid-19 restrictions and noted the main focus of work was on the new style Annual Canvass which was likely to start on 3 August and included the enfranchisement of foreign nationals. EROs were considering the practicalities of how the work would be progressed. He indicated it was unlikely follow up visits to properties could take place under current restrictions and EROs would rely on telephone calls. Chris Highcock (CH) advised that the EMB had reviewed how the UK Parliamentary General election had gone and were now thinking about planning for the 2021 Scottish Parliament elections under future Coronavirus restrictions. In relation to comments from SB, he noted that the Election Reform Bill carried provisions for extending the role of the Electoral Management Board to Scottish Parliament elections. It would be important to see that Bill taken through to legislation. He noted the progress of the e-counting contract and agreed to look with JN at the issue raised by SM about first preference display screens. The Electoral Commission update Sarah Mackie (SMa) said the Electoral Commission's report on the 2019 UK Parliamentary elections confirmed the poll had, in general, been well run with high levels of satisfaction amongst voters. Some people indicated dissatisfaction with tactics used by parties in campaigning. There had been strain on electoral services, EROs and ROs in the run up to Christmas and extra pressure on the postal service; some related to voters already registered trying to register again. SM asked if the report should have said more about the provisions on the electoral register during the canvass. Only applied where the poll was after 1 December as opposed to election happening during the time. PW said they had certainly heard back from Scottish Government and Cabinet Office and is something which needs to be looked at. He remarked that the Electoral Commission had also highlighted this as an issue. Martin McKeown (MMcK) reported that a consultation had recently been launched on the development of a Party and a Candidate Code of Practice for Scottish Parliament elections which will run until mid-July. This had already been highlighted to party members on the PPP and also directly with party treasurers. He confirmed he would be keen to hear views from people who have to comply with the Codes and would contact PPP party representatives to discuss. The aim was to have codes in place for the 2021 SP elections but this was dependent on the passage of existing legislation. MMcK advised that the 2019 electoral fraud data had been published and included a link to the data on the WC website. The data continued to show there is no real issue with electoral fraud in the UK. Users are able to analyse data on the website. SM asked questions in relation to what the data revealed about instance of personation in Scotland. From discussion it was acknowledged that allegations of personation could arise for a variety of reasons and that the issuing of a tendered ballot paper did not necessarily mean that an offence had occurred. A new tool had been published which allows spending of candidates at the 2019 UK Parliamentary election to be analysed. Gordon Dickson (GD) asked if the tool could be revised to draw out the Green parties from the 'other' category. MMcK undertook to raise this. AON updated on a request from Scottish Government that the Commission test the question of any future referendum on Scottish independence. The matter had been put on hold by the Board under the current restrictions. Scottish Ministers were aware. SM asked if the EC Board had ever refused to give advice to Government. AON said he would check records and report back to the panel.

Public attitudes towards voting in Scotland in the context of COVID-19 | Electoral Commission Search Public attitudes towards voting in Scotland in the context of COVID-19 You are in the Public attitudes towards voting in the context of COVID-19 section Home Our research Public attitudes towards voting in the context of COVID-19 On this page Introduction Key findings Polling station voting Postal voting Other findings Background notes First published: 25 August 2020 Last updated: 26 November 2020 Introduction In February 2021, we asked a representative sample of eligible voters in Scotland about their attitudes towards voting during the pandemic. The questions covered attitudes towards postal voting and other options for the safe running of the election in 2021. This is a repeat of the work carried out in August 2020 and November 2020. In both August and November this research was requested by the Scottish Government under Section 10 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. This page provides a summary of the findings from the latest of these surveys conducted in February, making comparisons with the other surveys throughout. Key findings The key findings are consistent across August, November 2020 and February 2021 with voting in a polling place remaining the preferred option amongst a majority of voters although the results also indicate a likely increase in the proportion of voters opting to use a postal vote at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election compared to previous polls. Polling station voting Over three quarters (76%) of eligible electors and 82% of those who say they ordinarily vote in a polling station would feel safe voting there. This is not significantly different from what we saw when we asked these questions previously. When we explain the planned Covid safety measures for polling stations, based on Electoral Commission guidance, there is an increase in the proportion who see in-person voting as safe (84%). Among those who typically vote in a polling station 88% said they would feel safe. Of those who said they would not feel safe voting in polling stations, just under 9/10 (87%) said there was no measure that could be introduced to make them feel safe voting in person. While we are not able, from this research, to report specifically on BAME respondents in Scotland we can report for Great Britain as a whole. 61% of BAME respondents said voting in person was safe compared to 75% of White respondents. Once told about the Electoral Commission guidance around safety measures 73% of BAME respondents said they would feel safe voting in person compared with 84% of white respondents. Postal voting The same proportion of people, compared to November, said they would vote by post (38%) if an election were held now. The proportion of people who say they ordinarily vote at a polling station and would now choose to vote by post has remained consistent too with 22% saying they would vote by post (23% in November). While this should not be taken as a reliable indicator of the number of people who will actually vote by mail this does indicate that there could be a significant uplift in the number of postal votes compared with previous polls. Other findings There has been an increase in the willingness to vote if an election were to take place now. 90% said they would vote in February compared to 83% in November. Given a number of different options around how the May elections should be conducted the most popular option expressed was, again, for the Scottish Parliament election to be run with the same methods of voting as usual (42%). 28% would prefer polling stations to be open for more than one day, 10% wanted the election to be held as an all postal ballot and 12% preferred a short postponement. The proportion who thought the election should be postponed (by not more than 6 months) has increased from 5% in November to 12% in February. Those who were more inclined to think the elections should be delayed were also more likely to say that they think the elections would not be safe. They were also more likely to be older. Just under a third of those who intend to vote in person (31%) said they would not know anybody who could vote by proxy for them if their household had to isolate due to covid-19. Just over half were sure they did know somebody who could vote for them (57%). 12% were unsure. Respondents from social grade ABC1 are more likely to know people in their local area who could act as a proxy for them (67%) compared to C2DE (46%) As in the previous research, around a half (50%) of all those surveyed would vote by post if encouraged to (including 58% of polling place voters). Once those already registered to vote by post are included this would mean around two-thirds of electors who would vote by post. When asked why they would not apply for a postal vote, the majority (65%) said they would prefer to vote in person at a polling station Background notes All figures, unless otherwise stated, are from work done for the Commission by YouGov Plc. For the February fieldwork, total sample size was 504 adults. Fieldwork was undertaken between 29th January and 20th February. The survey was carried out online. The figures have been weighted and are representative of all adults in Scotland (aged 16+). For the August fieldwork, total sample size was 1,145 adults. Fieldwork was undertaken between 3rd and 7th August 2020. The survey was carried out online. The figures have been weighted and are representative of all adults in Scotland (aged 16+). place across England, Wales and Scotland: Scottish Parliament Senedd Cymru Police and Crime Commissioners (England and Wales) Local councils and local mayors (England)

Electoral Fraud Cases Election petitions An election petition is a legal challenge to the result of an election. There were five petitions following the May 2021 elections, including two that involved allegations of electoral fraud. Three others involved alleged electoral administration problems. One petition that involved allegations of electoral fraud has been decided, and we have included a summary below. We are waiting for a decision on the other electoral fraud petition and will report on it once we know the outcome. Fens and Greatham ward, Hartlepool Borough Council The petition alleged that the successful Labour candidate had made a false statement about his personal conduct in an election leaflet. The court found that the statement was about his political, rather than personal, conduct. The petition was unsuccessful, and the court certified that the Labour candidate was duly elected.

The Board discussed the number of indicators to consider and whether the balance was right for the Board, as lower level indicators should remain operational for the Executive. The Board noted that we have a new architecture for performance indicators focused on Corporate Plan objectives. Report: How the 2016 Police and Crime Commissioner elections were run | Electoral Commission Search Report: How the 2016 Police and Crime Commissioner elections were run You are in the Police and Crime Commissioner elections section Home Police and Crime Commissioner elections On this page About the elections Registration and turnout The experience of voters The administration of the poll Campaigning Looking ahead Recommendations: Voter experience Recommendations: Candidates and campaigners Recommendations: Looking ahead to 2020 Download our full report First published: 25 June 2019 Last updated: 13 August 2019 About the elections On 5 May 2016 elections for Police and Crime Commissioner (PCCs) were held across 40 police force areas in England and Wales (but not in London, where the Mayor of London carries out the functions of a PCC, or in Greater Manchester where a directly elected Mayor for the Greater Manchester is intended to assume the functions of a PCC after May 2017). There were also elections to local authorities across parts of England, and mayoral elections in Bristol, Liverpool and Salford. This report looks specifically at the administration of the PCC elections across England and Wales, including the combination of the polls for the PCC elections with the National Assembly for Wales (NAW) elections and local government elections. Registration and turnout Almost 33.7 million people were registered to vote in the Police and Crime Commissioner elections on 5 May 2016: 31.4 million in England and 2.25 million in Wales. More than 5.5 million electors (representing 16.4% of the total electorate) were issued with postal votes for the PCC elections. Overall turnout at the May 2016 PCC elections was 27.3%, ranging from 18% in Durham to 52% in Dyfed Powys. Turnout at the 2012 PCC elections was 15.1%. By comparison, turnout at the May 2016 National Assembly for Wales elections was 45.6%², and turnout at the local government elections in England was 33.9%. At the PCC elections, across England and Wales just over 61% of postal votes issued were returned compared with less than 21% of voters that cast their vote at a polling station. For the local government elections in England, more than two thirds of those voting by post (67.9%) returned their ballot compared with a turnout of 27.5% among those who voted in person. The experience of voters Our public opinion research suggests that most voters believed the elections were well-run, and they were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. Nonetheless there is clear evidence to suggest that people did not feel informed about the PCC elections, with 72% reporting that they knew not very much or nothing at all about them. The majority of respondents to our research said that they did not have enough information to understand the role of the PCC in order to make an informed decision about the elections. Almost twice as many people said that they found it difficult to access information on the PCC candidates compared with local election candidates (44% compared with 23%). In Wales, only 12% of people said it was difficult to access information about candidates at the NAW elections. Candidates themselves were also overwhelmingly negative about the Government's arrangements for communicating the views of candidates to voters, with 96% of those who responded to our survey saying that they were dissatisfied with the arrangements. These findings underline a key concern, which we first highlighted in our report on November 2012 PCC elections – that the information needs of voters at PCC elections have not been adequately met. We are concerned that the UK Government has not yet made improvements in this important area. Evidence from our research suggests that sending a booklet including candidate addresses to all households in each PCC area (similar to the approach adopted for elections of the Mayor of London and directly elected mayor elections, and the UK Government's proposed approach to elections for mayors of Combined Authorities in 2017) would have a significant impact on people's levels of understanding about future PCC elections and the candidates standing for election. It would also ensure consistency across the different types of elections covering large electoral areas which currently use the supplementary vote electoral system. Data from the May 2016 PCC elections shows that some voters continue to mark their ballot papers incorrectly, which means that their votes are not counted. This highlights the need for further improvements to be made to the design and wording of ballot papers for all elections which use the supplementary vote electoral system, and legislation should be amended to reflect the Commission's recommendations on ballot paper design which were submitted to the UK Government in 2015. The administration of the poll Overall the PCC elections were administered professionally and efficiently, although we have again highlighted the importance of ensuring that relevant legislation is in place in good time before the elections to allow for effective planning and the commitment of resources. Duplicate electoral registration applications (from electors who were already correctly registered) continued to be a significant issue at these elections, which led to additional unnecessary pressure on electoral registration staff resources. This reinforces the need for an online registration status check to be made available for voters, as we recommended following the May 2015 UK Parliamentary general election. The deposit and subscriber requirements for PCC candidates continue to represent a barrier for some potential candidates, particularly independent candidates. There is also a need to ensure that independent candidates have access to the electoral register on a more consistent basis with candidates representing political parties, to enable them to plan and deliver their campaigns effectively Campaigning Our post-election survey of candidates suggests that the majority of candidates agree that the rules on spending and donations are clear. However, access to information about candidate spending and donations could be improved by making candidates' election returns available for viewing online. Looking ahead The next scheduled PCC elections in May 2020 will be held on the same day as scheduled local government elections in England, which include local council elections and, in some areas, directly elected local authority mayoral elections and combined authority mayoral elections. In London, there will be elections for the Mayor of London and members of the London Assembly. In addition, the next UK Parliamentary general election is scheduled to be held on the same day, Thursday 7 May 2020. In our view, this potential combination of polls presents significant risks which need to be mitigated in order to give voters, campaigners and Returning Officers confidence that the elections can be well-run. While it may be possible to manage some of these issues by early planning by Returning Officers, suppliers, campaigners and the Commission, the most effective way to mitigate these significant risks would be to change polling day for one or more of these elections, so that they do not coincide with the next scheduled UK Parliamentary general election which will be held on Thursday 7 May 2020. Any change to the date of scheduled elections would be a significant proposal, and must be informed by appropriate consultation with political parties, the Electoral Commission, relevant Government departments, elected bodies, administrators and voters themselves to ensure that the interests of voters are put first. Recommendations: Voter experience Recommendation 1: Electors should have better access to information about candidates at future PCC elections We remain concerned that the UK Government did not accept and implement our recommendation following the 2012 PCC elections to ensure that electors are sent printed information about candidates at future PCC elections. It is clear from our research that voters at the 2016 elections found it less easy to access information on PCC candidates than those standing in other polls. We continue to recommend that electors should be sent printed information about candidates at future PCC elections. This should take the form of a booklet containing information provided by each candidate, sent by the relevant Police Area Returning Officer to every household in the police area. The UK Government should ensure that any necessary amendments to the 2016 Order are made no later than November 2019, in line with the timescales set out in Recommendation 3 for improving planning and the management of legislation for the May 2020 PCC elections.

Recommendation 2: The design of ballot papers for elections using the supplementary vote system should be improved We remain concerned that the UK Government did not accept and implement our recommendation to improve the design of ballot papers for elections using the supplementary vote system ahead of the May 2016 elections. In 2015, following user testing, we recommended to the UK Government that the supplementary vote ballot paper used at Police and Crime Commissioner and mayoral elections should be amended to: Ensure that the instructions draw voter's attention to key words to emphasise how voters should complete their ballot paper. This would include emboldening key words to make them more prominent on the ballot paper. Re-label Column 1 and Column 2 as Column A and Column B to avoid confusion. We also recommend that additional information for voters about how to complete a supplementary vote ballot paper should be provided, including highlighting that the voting system is different from a first-past-the-post election. This should include information explaining that voters can select two candidates, a first and a second choice, and that they cannot vote for the same candidate twice. This information should be prominent on all voter materials to guide, support and reassure voters in completing their ballot paper. In some areas in May 2020 the scheduled PCC elections will be combined with local authority mayoral elections, which also use the SV voting system. Combined Authority Mayoral elections may also be held in some areas in England in May 2020, and it is proposed that they will also use the SV voting system.

We continue to recommend that the prescribed design and wording of ballot papers for PCC elections, local mayoral elections and Combined Authority Mayoral elections should be amended to reflect our 2015 recommendations, to ensure that voters at the May 2020 elections receive well-designed ballot papers. Recommendations:

Administration of the poll Recommendation 3: Legislation for elections should be clear in good time before it is required to be implemented or complied with The Police and Crime Commissioner Elections Order 2016 was laid in Parliament on 17 December 2015, just under five months before polling day for the 2016 elections.

Governments with legislative competence over elections within the UK should manage the development and approval of legislation so that it is clear (either by Royal Assent to primary legislation, or by laying secondary legislation for approval by Parliament) at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners or electoral administrators. If a government has not been able to make legislation clear at least six months before the date of a scheduled poll, it should table a formal statement in the relevant legislature, explaining why it has not, and setting out its assessment of the likely impact of the late confirmation of legislation for campaigners, electoral administrators and electors. Recommendation 4:

Information and analysis of the costs of the 2012 and 2016 PCC elections should be made publicly available Information about the costs of running elections will help governments and Returning Officers to secure the most efficient allocation of resources at future polls. The UK Government should publish as soon as possible full cost details for the 2012 and 2016 PCC elections, and make any recommendations for improvements in the way the process is administered at future elections.

Recommendation 5: Electors should be able to check online whether they are correctly registered to vote Providing a way for electors to check their registration status at the beginning of the online registration application process would reduce the action required by voters to keep their register entry up to date, and would also reduce the impact on EROs of processing duplicate applications. The UK Government should develop an online service to allow people to check whether they are already correctly registered to vote before they complete a new application to register. Any such service would need to carefully manage and protect voters' personal information.

Recommendations: Candidates and campaigners Recommendation 6: The number of subscribers should be set as low as reasonably possible in order to promote candidate participation in elections To be validly nominated, candidates for the PCC elections were required to secure the signatures and elector numbers of 100 electors (known as subscribers) who are included in an electoral register within the relevant police area. This number of subscribers is irrespective of police force area size, and significantly more than that required for candidates at UK Parliamentary elections or local government elections (both ten). We reported that this had been an issue for some candidates, especially independent candidates, in the 2012 PCC elections and our evidence continues to suggest that the requirements to obtain subscriber signatures are a barrier to standing for election ad participation in elections. The UK

Government should set out its assessment of the impact of the requirement for such a large number of subscribers on participation by candidates at elections for PCCs. The UK Government should also explain why the proposed subscriber requirements are appropriate for these elections, and should also set out why it does not believe the number of subscribers required can be reduced. Recommendation 7: Candidates should not be required to pay a deposit in order to be able to stand for election Our evidence continues to suggest that deposits represent a significant financial hurdle for independent candidates and candidates from smaller parties and the ability to pay a deposit is not a relevant or appropriate criterion for determining access to the ballot paper. We continue to recommend that there should be no deposit requirement for candidates or political parties at all UK elections, as we consider that the ability to pay a deposit is not a relevant or appropriate criterion for determining access to the ballot paper. Recommendation 8: Independent candidates should be given more equal access to the electoral register for electoral purposes We continue to recommend that the law is changed to allow all candidates to get earlier access to the register for electoral purposes. This would particularly enable independent candidates to campaign on a more equal basis with candidates from political parties. Recommendation 9: Candidate spending returns should be published online To improve transparency and accessibility of candidate spending returns, we have previously recommended that Returning Officers and Police Area Returning Officers should be required to publish spending returns online as well as through the existing methods of public inspection. We recommend that spending returns of Police and Crime

Commissioner candidates should be published online in future. We support recommendation 12-5 of the Law Commissions' review of Electoral Law which proposes a method for implementing this change through legislation. 3 Recommendation 10: Legislation for the registration of party names and descriptions for use on ballot papers should be reformed We continue to recommend that where a candidate represents a political party on a ballot paper, it should be clear to voters which party the candidate represents. The legal provisions for registration of party descriptions present risks of confusion for voters and restrict the participation of political parties. The Governments of the UK should work with the Electoral Commission to reform the provisions on party descriptions. Recommendations: Looking ahead to 2020

Recommendation 11: Analysis and consultation on the risks of holding polls on the same day The next scheduled PCC elections in May 2020 will be held on the same day as scheduled local government elections in England, which include local council elections, directly elected local authority mayoral elections and combined authority mayoral elections. In London, there will be elections for the Mayor of London and members of the London Assembly. In addition, the next UK Parliamentary general election is scheduled to be held on the same day, Thursday 7 May 2020. In our view, this potential combination of polls presents significant risks which need to be mitigated in order to give voters, campaigners and Returning Officers confidence that the elections can be well-run: There will be multiple sets of elections in different parts of the UK, incorporating up to four ballot papers and three methods of voting: UK Parliamentary elections use the 'first-past-the-post' system; elections for PCCs, directly elected local authority Mayors, Combined Authority Mayors and the Mayor of London use the supplementary vote system; elections for Constituency Members of the London Assembly use the 'first-past-the-post' system and elections for London-wide Members use the closed list system which is a form of proportional representation; local government elections use the 'first-past-the-post' system, in single- and multi-member wards. Clear and tailored information on how to complete their ballot papers will be essential to minimise confusion for voters. It will be communicating with voters about a range of issues across multiple contests: Given the political and media prominence of Parliamentary general elections, there is a significant risk that coverage of the May 2020 polls will be dominated by the UKPGE. It is likely to be harder for candidates and campaigners at the other polls to get their messages across to voters, and it may mean that voters feel they have less information that they require to be able to participate in those elections. Regulated periods for campaigners will overlap: Under the Political parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, a regulated period will apply to the spending of political parties and non-party campaigners for a year prior to the UK Parliamentary general election scheduled in 2020. This will mean that spending by these campaigners on other elections taking place during that time period will also be regulated and count towards the UKPGE spending limit. Careful consideration will therefore need to be given to the regulation of party, candidate and campaigner spending for the polls in 2020 to ensure that the relevant rules are understood and complied with. The voting areas for the different sets of elections may not be consistent: Constituency boundaries for the May 2020 UK Parliamentary elections are likely to change as a result of the current review being carried out by the UK's Boundary Commissions. The other elections scheduled to be held on in May 2020 have previously been administered on the basis of local government areas. While early planning can help to mitigate the risks for those administering the May 2020 elections, any significant differences to the boundaries of electoral areas will also present challenges – for example, in relation the administration of postal voting and the management and timing of the counts. The UK Government should immediately begin the necessary analysis and consultation on the risks of holding these polls on the same day, including giving consideration to the potential for changing the date of elections currently scheduled to be held in May 2020, so that they do not coincide with the next scheduled UK Parliamentary general election which will be held on Thursday 7 May 2020. The Government should publish its assessment and any proposals for change by September 2017, to allow sufficient time to make any changes to legislation which might be required, and to allow Returning Officers, suppliers, campaigners and the Commission time to prepare. Any change to the date of scheduled elections would be a significant proposal, and must be informed by appropriate consultation with political parties, the Electoral Commission, relevant Government departments, elected bodies, administrators and voters themselves to ensure that the interests of voters are put first. The Board requested sight of a report into the extent to which bullying and harassment was an issue within the Commission, which was reported to a meeting of the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee in 2021, as well as an update on work done following the report. They also requested more of a strategic insight on the new digital IT implementation programme. Resolved: That the Board welcomed the report and noted the work across the breadth of the Commission, in meeting its role and responsibilities. (b) Elections Act update (EC 112/22) The Director, Regulation introduced an update on the Elections Act since receiving Royal Assent, with key changes and messages on the Strategy and Policy Statement (SPS). The Board discussed that the Commission would continue to act as an independent regulator and noted that ministers and representatives of all parties had expressed the importance of the Electoral Commission's independence during the parliamentary debates. The Board noted the importance of clear engagement with the Speaker's Committee. Resolved: That the Board noted the update. (c) Quarterly performance update report 2021/22 – Q4 (EC 113/22) Resolved: That the Board noted the delivery of our work programme and that the budget was being managed. Key messages for the Annual Report (EC 114/22) The Director, Finance and Corporate Services introduced the report, which proposed key messages overall and by Goal. It also included key performance information, and key events and achievements for the year. The Board gave feedback on some improvements to finalise the document. It noted that a lot of the structure set out in the Annual Report was determined by statute, so our key messages will fit into that structure. Resolved: That the Board was content and agreed the proposed key messages. public awareness campaign approach (EC 115/22) The Director, Communications, Policy and Research introduced the report, welcoming input from linked Commissioners on finalising the paper. The Board noted that the Commission had significant expertise in delivering campaigns in the context of elections, but that voter ID posed a very different challenge requiring a fresh approach. The outlined proposal was set out in the paper, including in relation to audience breakdown; time pressure in relation to confirmation of the policy; and interrelation with the voter registration campaign. The Board discussed the importance of delivering this campaign well, of ensuring good value for money and the establishment of clear statistical objectives. It reflected on the proposed approach and phasing of the campaign, and the risks to delivery, including of the UK government not meeting its own delivery requirements. Resolved: That the Board welcomed and agreed the approach, and that the linked Commissioners would carry the Board interests through. Risk appetite statement (EC 116/22) Resolved: That the Board considered the risk appetite statement agreeing for a risk appetite workshop to be scheduled on to the Forward Plan of Board business 2022/23, to agree the direction of travel and test our tolerance level. Action: A Risk appetite workshop to be scheduled onto the Forward Plan of Board business 2022/23. Action owner: Director, Finance and Corporate Services Returning Officer (RO) and Electoral Registration Officer (ERO) performance standards (EC 117/22) The Board received the report on the outlined approach to updating the RO performance standards framework and proposed approach for its use. The Board were advised that the statutory powers only covered Great Britain and that work was underway to continue to press for future extension to Northern Ireland, which had been a longstanding recommendation. Resolved: That the Board agreed and supported the outlined approach. Update from the Audit and Risk Committee Chair (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chair of the Audit and Risk Committee, on their work following their meeting yesterday. The Board noted that the Committee considered the internal audit reports and agreed the website management, follow-up and electoral fraud audits, with discussions on quality assurance scheduled for a future Audit and Risk Committee meeting. The Board also noted an update from the National Audit Office (NAO), a paper on recruitment and retention and the schedule of audit recommendations. The Chair of the Audit and Risk Committee advised the Board that a paper on information risk management was received, designed to allow the Committee to provide the Accounting Officer with the Committee's independent review of information assurance. The Committee reviewed the detailed report on Information Risk Management, exploring the risk issues identified and proposed mitigation plans. It considered that the Commission is bearing high degrees of risk arising from its outdated information technology systems; and it noted the resilience issues and potential security vulnerabilities. The Committee welcomed the activities underway aimed at addressing or mitigating those risks. It noted that a proper assessment of the effectiveness of overall information risk management had been conducted but it did not consider that the risks identified should be tolerated long-term by the organisation. The Committee wishes to monitor these risks through regular reporting. It was content to provide the Accounting Officer with assurance that the management of information risk has been independently reviewed. Resolved: That the Board noted the updates.

Report on the May 2022 Scottish council elections | Electoral Commission Search Report on the May 2022 Scottish council elections You are in the Scotland local council elections section Home Scotland local council elections Currently reading: of 4 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the elections Campaigning at the elections Delivering the elections Supporting evidence Summary This report looks at how the May 2022 Scottish council elections were run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held this year in England , Northern Ireland and Wales . On 5 May 2022 elections were held across Scotland's 32 councils. Voters used the Single Transferable Vote (STV) system to elect their councillors, numbering the candidates in order of preference. We found that the vast majority of voters were satisfied with the process of voting and almost all were able to use their preferred method. Polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person. Most voters said they found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. However, while the level of spoilt ballots across Scotland has declined since the 2017 council elections, they increased in some wards and further targeted action is needed to address this. Some voters felt able to get their views across to voters, but many voters said they needed more information on the candidates in order to make an informed choice when they came to vote. Some candidates reported experiences of intimidation and abuse at these elections, which is not acceptable. We will work with the UK's governments, Police Scotland and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. While the elections were well-run the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern. Adequate staffing for polling stations proved a challenge in many areas. We found that Returning Officers took all the necessary steps set out in law to support disabled voters at the poll, and our public opinion research found increased levels of satisfaction amongst disabled voters. The Scottish Government has committed to a public consultation on ideas for future electoral reform in Scotland in the coming months. We hope that our report helps to inform that debate. Voting at the elections The experience of voters at the May 2022 elections The vast majority of voters (97%) were satisfied with the process of voting. This is consistent with findings at recent elections. Almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. Polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person. While the level of spoilt ballots across Scotland has declined since the 2017 council elections, they increased in some wards; further action is needed to address this. Overview On 5 May 2022, elections were held to Scotland's 32 councils. Voters used the Single Transferable Vote (STV) system to elect their councillors, numbering the candidates in order of preference. Six wards out of the 355 across Scotland were uncontested, meaning that the number of candidates nominated was equal to or fewer than the total number of seats available. In these wards no poll went ahead and the nominated candidates were declared elected on polling day. In three of these wards the number of candidates was less than the number of seats available and, following 5 May, by-elections took place to fill the outstanding vacancies. A total of 4,222,332 people were registered to vote at the council elections. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run After each election we ask members of the public who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections. This enables us to understand whether there have been changes in the views of voters between comparable sets of elections. People remain satisfied with the registration and voting process People had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and

voting. Our research shows that: nearly all voters (97%) said that they were satisfied with the process of voting. This is consistent with the levels of satisfaction at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election (95%). Levels of satisfaction with the voting process were consistent across all age groups 82% of respondents said they were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. This is a slight fall from the 89% who expressed satisfaction after the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. Of the 10% of respondents who expressed dissatisfaction with the process, the main reason given was that they thought voter registration should be automatic (32%) or that it should be compulsory (23%) the vast majority of Scottish voters (94%) found participating in the election easy, and four out of five (81%) felt casting their vote was secret and that the elections were secure nearly all voters in Scotland (97%) felt safe voting in polling stations with the Covid measures in place Most people were confident the elections were well-run Nearly four in five (77%) people said they were confident the elections were well-run, with one in 10 (10%) saying that they were not confident. People aged 25 to 34 were the most likely to say that they were not confident (14%). When we asked people why they were not confident the elections were well-run, the most commonly given reasons related to a lack of information about candidates or the elections in general. Most people think that voting is safe from fraud Nearly nine in 10 (86%) people think that voting in Scotland is safe from fraud and abuse, which is an increase from the 80% who said so after the 2017 council elections. However, one in five (21%) said that they thought that either a 'lot' or 'a little' electoral fraud had taken place at the 5 May elections. We asked those people who thought fraud had taken place why they thought this, and the most cited reason was the lack of ID requirements when voting (45%). Other reasons given focused on things people had read or heard rather than anything they had directly experienced. Turnout at these elections was broadly consistent with the 2017 council elections Turnout at these elections was 44.8% which was a slight decrease from the turnout in 2017 (46.9%). People who told us that they didn't vote were most likely to say that this was because they did not have time (21%), they had medical or health reasons (11%) or they were not interested in politics (12%). People were confident that they could vote using their preferred method At each election people can vote in person, by post or by proxy (asking someone they trust to vote on their behalf). If a voter's situation changes close to polling day (for work or health reasons) then they may be eligible to appoint an emergency proxy up to 5pm on polling day. Ahead of the 2021 elections, the law was changed so that anyone who had to self-isolate close to polling day because they had tested positive for Covid, or had been in close contact with someone who had tested positive, could also appoint an emergency proxy. This change remained in place for the 2022 elections. In February 2022, the majority of Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) in Scotland wrote out to all households to remind them of who was registered to vote at that address, and whether they had a postal or proxy vote in place. Voting using their preferred method was possible for most people Most people who voted were able to use their preferred method: 78% of people said that they found it easy to get information on the different methods of voting available. nearly all people said they were able to vote using their preferred method with 96% of polling station voters and 94% of postal voters saying they had used their preferred method. Nearly four in 10 votes counted were cast by post Nearly 1 million (976,108) people were registered as postal voters at these elections, amounting to 23% of the electorate. This is a very slight decrease from the 2021 Scottish Parliament election but a substantial increase from the Scottish council elections in 2017 (17.8%). Over three-quarters (76%) of postal voters cast their vote, amounting to 38.4% of all votes included in the count. The vast majority (97%) of people who voted by post told us that they found it easy to understand what to do, with 96% finding the postal voting instructions useful. Rates of postal vote rejection remain consistent with recent elections. When a postal ballot pack is returned to the Returning Officer (RO), the signature and date of birth are checked against those provided previously. Where these details are missing or do not match, the postal vote is rejected and not included in the count. Data collected from ROs indicates that 18,557 postal votes were not included in the count due to missing or mismatched signatures and/or dates of birth. This amounts to 2.5% of all postal ballots returned. This is comparable to the 2.4% that were rejected at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. We will continue to explore ways of improving the electoral system to meet voters' needs. As part of this, we will consider evidence about whether changes to postal voting documents or processes could help to reduce the number of postal ballot packs that are rejected at future elections. Emergency proxy voting remains an important safeguard to enable people to vote. There were 4,840 proxy voters appointed for these elections, amounting to 0.11% of the electorate. Of these, 550 people were issued with an emergency proxy as a result of medical or work emergency, including 242 for Covid reasons. Some Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) continue to raise concerns that eligibility for an emergency proxy does not extend to carers. This is of particular concern in the Scottish island communities where patients may be transferred to the mainland for medical treatment. In this case the patient would be eligible for an emergency proxy, but not any family member accompanying them. Recommendation 1

We continue to recommend that the Scottish Government work with the electoral community to explore ways to extend the provisions for emergency proxies to cover carers. Voters said that they found the ballot paper easy to fill in but concerns remain about levels of rejection in some wards. Nearly all voters (95%) said that they found the ballot paper easy to fill in, with 4% saying that they found it difficult. People aged 25-34 were the most likely to say that they found the ballot paper difficult to fill in (9%). Rejection rates for ballot papers remain high in some wards. Data from ROs indicates that 1.85% of all ballots were rejected at the count. This is slightly down from the 1.95% which were rejected in 2017. However, there is significant variation in rejection rates both across Scotland and within specific council areas, and in some wards the rejection rates have increased since the last set of council elections in 2017.

Glasgow – Canal Ward	5.64	5.36
West Dunbartonshire – Kilpatrick	4.51	3.71
West Dunbartonshire – Clydebank Central	4.21	3.66
North Lanarkshire – Coatbridge South	4.13	3.91
Dundee – Coldside	4.08	3.91

Of those votes that were rejected, the data shows that the majority (64%) were rejected because there was more than one first preference expressed. Our observations at the counts and feedback from campaigners and electoral administrators suggests that these are largely where someone has placed an 'X' or a '1' next to multiple candidates from the same party. The Electoral Commission has previously carried out research which indicated that the wards with the highest levels of rejection were more likely to have higher levels of deprivation and unemployment. However, we also found that these wards were more likely to have more than one candidate standing from a particular party, thereby increasing the risk of voters placing 'Xs' against their preferred party's candidates on the ballot paper. We will repeat our ward level analysis when the new Scottish census data is available in 2023. The Electoral Commission will work with the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB) and Returning Officers to improve voter communications in polling stations and postal ballot packs to reinforce messaging about how to complete the ballot paper. Further work to identify the wards at risk of a higher rate of rejected ballots will also support the targeting of election communication activity, to help minimise voter errors on the ballot paper. Some prisoners were entitled to register and vote at the elections. The 2022 elections were the second in which prisoners serving a sentence of 12 months or less in a UK prison, who would usually be resident in Scotland, had the right to vote, following the introduction of the Scottish Elections (Franchise and Representation) Act 2020. Data from EROs indicates that 49 eligible prisoners were registered to vote ahead of the council elections in 2022. EROs worked with the Scottish Prison Service (SPS) to ensure that they received notification where any eligible individuals entered the prison system so that they could invite them to register to vote. The Commission also worked with the SPS to develop and circulate a guide for prison staff and a poster to raise awareness amongst prisoners. The Scottish Government is required to review the arrangements for prisoner voting by March 2023. Ahead of this review, we are committed to continuing to work with EROs, the SPS and the EMB to ensure that prisoners who have the right to vote understand how to register and vote, and can access information and support as required. Work continued to support recently enfranchised voters to participate. The Commission continued to work in partnership with the electoral community and Scottish civic society to support young people and qualifying foreign nationals to engage in the elections. To encourage schools to run political education sessions and raise awareness amongst young people, we worked with partners across the education sector to run Welcome to Your Vote week in January 2022. Ahead of the awareness week, the Commission launched new education resources, including lesson plans, a template assembly on the council elections, and short interactive activities. We also delivered information sessions for teachers and care providers working with young people, in partnership with West of Scotland Development Education Centre (WOSDEC) and the Care Inspectorate. The Commission worked with a number of partners to distribute information to qualifying foreign nationals, including consulates, regional equality councils and charities. In collaboration with EROs and civil society organisations, we ran Welcome to Your Vote Day on 10 March, providing communication resources to support partners to raise awareness and running online information events. Civil society organisations which work with a range of under-registered audiences have highlighted a frustration that work to increase registration is only carried out ahead of elections. Whilst we have strong relationships with organisations across the third sector, there is a high level of staff turnover in charities, and a shift towards ongoing engagement work would reduce the need to rebuild relationships ahead of each election. The Electoral Commission will embed work to increase registration amongst under-registered groups outside of election periods. Existing partnerships will be maintained and strengthened through ongoing collaboration, and the Commission will scope opportunities for new partnerships to reach under-registered groups. Campaigning at the elections. The experience of campaigning at the May 2022 elections. The majority of candidates responding to our survey (69%) felt they were able to get their views across to voters, with printed material, social media and door-to-door canvassing the most popular methods. Just over half of voters said they had enough information on who to vote for, but a substantial minority (26%) disagreed. A notable minority of candidates who responded to our survey reported experiences of intimidation and abuse at these elections and action is needed to tackle this. We will work with the UK's governments, Police Scotland and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. While most candidates found election law easy to understand, there was an increased demand for advice and guidance on the law.

Introduction

A total of 2,548 candidates were nominated to contest the 1,226 councillor vacancies at the 2022 council elections. This was broadly equivalent to the numbers standing in 2017 (2,572). There were 357 independent candidates standing at the election and 2,191 candidates representing 26 different political parties (four more parties than in 2017). There were a number of changes to the campaign laws for candidates at these elections which included a requirement to report donations for the first time and the need to include an imprint on any digital candidate campaign material. The Electoral Commission provided guidance for candidates and agents on the laws in force at these elections. To inform our report we carried out research with candidates to understand their experience of standing at the elections, and we also talked to parties about the process. 5 were largely able to engage with voters Just over two-thirds of candidates who responded to the survey (69%) felt that they were able to effectively get their views across to voters. This is a significant increase from the 43% who expressed that view at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. 5 used a variety of methods to engage with voters Traditional campaigning (namely leaflets and canvassing) remain the most popular campaigning methods compared to any digital method. Our research found that: the most popular campaigning method used by respondents was leaflets/newsletters/flyers. Overall, 90% of respondents put leafletting in their top-three campaigning methods, with just under two-thirds (63%) of respondents citing this as their most used a substantial number of respondents used social media in their campaigns, though it was primarily used to supplement traditional campaigning methods rather than being the primary tool. Two-thirds (68%) put social media in their top-three most used campaigning methods, with one in 10 (12%) saying it was their most used compared to almost a third (31%) who said it was their third most used when asked what digital campaigning methods respondents used, free methods were far more popular than any paid-for campaigning. Almost four in five (78%) respondents put posts on social media about their campaign, and over two-fifths (44%) asked supporters to share their posts. By comparison, the most popular paid-for digital campaigning method was paying for adverts on social media, which was done by 14% of respondents the other popular campaigning method was door-to-door canvassing, which was the most used tactic for just under a fifth (17%) of respondents. Overall, over half (56%) of respondents said that canvassing was in their top three campaigning methods One in five (20%) of candidates who responded to the survey said that the spending limit was too low, largely citing difficulties of reaching voters in large rural wards while remaining within the spending limit. Voters want more information about candidates Just over half (52%) of all voters said they had enough information on candidates to be able to make an informed decision on who to vote for. However, more than a quarter (26%) disagreed. Voters aged 25-34 were most likely to disagree (40%). When asked where they had seen information about candidates and parties, the most cited sources were leaflets or flyers from the candidate or party (61%) or from another source (27%). Political parties and candidates have raised concerns about their ability to provide information to voters and have called for council election candidates to be able to access a freepost delivery as is available at other elections. This proposal has been supported by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (Cosla). Should this proposal be taken forward for the 2027 Scottish council elections, the Scottish Government will need to ensure there is sufficient time and resource to implement the proposal ahead of the elections. Some candidates reported experiences of intimidation at these elections. While over half (56%) of candidates who responded to the survey said that they did not have a problem with threats, abuse or intimidation, over two in five (44%) experienced some kind of problem (that is, on a scale of '1 to 5', rated their problem with threats, abuse or intimidation as a '2' or above). One in 10 (11%) said that they had a serious problem (rated '4' or '5' out of '5'). There was a difference between the reported experiences of those respondents identifying as either male or female. 1 , with a larger proportion of female respondents reporting problems with threats, abuse or intimidation (64% of male respondents said they did not have a problem with threats, abuse or intimidation, compared to less than half (48%) of female candidates who did not have an issue.) "In person intimidation/threats/abuse only happened when I was campaigning alone. I've decided not to do that in future, however it's frustrating when seeing other (male!) candidates campaigning solo seemingly without such concerns of intimidation." Of those that said they experienced some kind of abuse, the most common sources were verbal (55%) and online (53%). Over four in five of these (84%) said the abuse came from members of the public. Three in 10 (31%) said it was from an anonymous/unknown source, while a further one in 10 (11%) received threats or abuse from other candidates. One in 10 (10%) who experienced threats or abuse said that their experience(s) would discourage them from standing as a candidate in the future.

The 2022 elections were the first council elections where candidates could choose whether or not to have their home address displayed on the ballot paper. This option was legislated for in response to concerns raised by candidates at previous elections about personal safety. The vast majority of candidates opted not to display their home address on the ballot papers. Recommendation 2 Action is needed to tackle and prevent abuse and intimidation, and to ensure candidates and campaigners can participate freely in our democratic processes. We will work with the UK's governments, Police Scotland and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency.

The vast majority (94%) of candidates who responded to the survey were confident that the Scottish council elections were well run. Almost two-thirds (64%) said they were very confident, and no respondents said they were not confident. The majority of candidates who responded to our survey were satisfied with all aspects of the nomination process: the vast majority (96%) agreed that the rules for becoming a candidate were easy to understand and follow over nine in 10 (94%) agreed that the nomination process was well run 85% of respondents agreed that they found the pre-nomination checks helpful, compared to 1% who disagreed, and 14% who said they neither agreed nor disagreed/didn't know. of those that interacted with their elections teams or needed to access their local authority offices, the majority (87%) were satisfied with their ability to do so

Over nine in 10 (92%) of candidates who responded to the survey attended the count and the majority of those who attended were satisfied with the experience. Of those who attended: nearly nine in 10 agreed that elections staff made it clear what was happening at all stages of the count (86%) and a similar proportion (92%) were satisfied with how efficiently the verification/count processes were run 94% agreed that the count process was transparent 93% were satisfied with when the count took place finally, 89% agreed that electronic counting of ballot papers worked well Candidates were broadly confident that no electoral fraud had taken place

Over nine in 10 (94%) respondents felt that, in general, voting is safe from abuse. Over two-thirds (69%) of respondents thought that it is very safe.

However, only half (51%) believed that no fraud at all took place in elections in their area. A fifth (21%) thought that there was ‘hardly any at all’, 5% said ‘a little’, and almost a quarter (23%) said they didn’t know. Reassuringly, no respondents said that there was ‘a lot’ of fraud. Most candidates understood the campaign spending laws. The majority of respondents to our candidate survey agreed that the law around spending, donations and personal expenses was clear, although the proportions were smaller than those who found the nomination process clear. Three-quarters (76%) agreed that the law on election spending and reporting was clear. 71% found the law on donations and how to check permissibility to be clear. Almost three-quarters (73%) found the law about personal expenses clear. Awareness about expenses related to disability was far lower than self-reported awareness about the general spending and reporting law. Just half (51%) of respondents said that they knew that expenses relating to a candidate’s disability did not count towards the spending limit. Candidates understood the new laws on the requirement for digital imprints on their campaign material but concerns continued to be raised around printed material. Nearly nine out of 10 (88%) respondents agreed that they understood the requirement to include imprints on digital campaign material, compared to 5% who disagreed. A smaller majority (72%) agreed that it was easy to meet these requirements, with almost one in 10 (8%) disagreeing. 70% agreed that digital imprint requirements improve the transparency of digital campaigning, while 7% disagreed and 17% said they neither agreed nor disagreed. The Electoral Commission received a small number of complaints about the lack of imprints on printed election material both from candidates and from political parties and non-party campaigners. Where complaints were received, we followed up with the party or campaigner concerned to remind them of the law and, where relevant, to ask them to bring their candidates into compliance. The Electoral Commission is responsible for investigating potential breaches of law on party and campaigner imprints while Police Scotland is responsible for investigating breaches of candidate imprint law. The Commission will continue to monitor compliance with the law by parties and campaigners and will take action where necessary and proportionate. Candidates and parties have called for the ability to submit spending returns electronically. Currently it is at the Returning Officer’s discretion whether they will accept spending returns electronically. Some political parties have asked for a consistent approach across Scotland in relation to the acceptance of digital spending returns. Our research with candidates found two-thirds (68%) of candidates would prefer to submit their spending returns electronically, compared to 16% who prefer paper spending returns and 17% who said they don’t know.

Recommendation 3 The Scottish Government should consider electronic submission of spending returns as part of their electoral reform agenda. Disabled candidates continue to value the Access to Elected Office Fund. The Access to Elected Office Fund is administered independently by Inclusion Scotland and financed by the Scottish Government. Its purpose is to offer financial assistance to disabled people to stand at elections. The financial assistance can be used to meet the costs of any adaptations needed to ensure a level playing field for disabled candidates.⁵⁴ 11 applicants were supported by the fund, with 48 of them going on to be candidates at the election. Of these, 22 were successfully elected. Our survey with candidates found that: more than half (52%) said they knew about the Access to Elected Office Fund. 11 respondents received support from the Access to Elected Office Fund. Of these, four said they would not have been able to stand if the Fund had not existed. A further five said they did not know whether they would be able to stand for election had the fund not existed. In a few comments, respondents made references to not being quite sure how the Fund worked, even from those who used it There was an increasing demand for advice and guidance from candidates The Electoral Commission and electoral administrators faced an increased demand from candidates for advice and guidance on the nomination process and the spending laws. Particular demands came from independent candidates and those representing smaller and more recently registered political parties. “As you would expect, independent candidates required more support than those standing for political parties, which resulted in an increased number of calls from independent candidates requiring additional information and support” “Smaller parties had poor paperwork, did not engage with the office early in the process, and frequently had to be reminded at deadlines”

Increasing opportunities for supporting candidates and parties The May 2021 Scottish Parliament elections were the first at which the Electoral Commission had a statutory role to provide advice and guidance to candidates and agents (although we had done so at previous elections at the request of the Scottish Government). Following feedback from the electoral community, we offered candidates and parties at these elections an increased range of support to understand and comply with political finance rules both before and after the elections. Alongside our standard advice and guidance support to candidates, we also ran seminars on the candidate laws at political party conferences in Scotland in the run up to the May polls. The Commission also ran an online seminar for candidates in advance of the polls which was attended by 183 candidates and agents. We also delivered virtual advice surgeries that allowed candidates and agents to book an appointment to speak to one of our expert advisers and discuss specific issues around the spending and donation laws. Due to the take up and demand, particularly from new and independent candidates, we offered further advice surgeries after the elections and in advance of the reporting deadlines, to provide support with spending returns. Our approach has been informed and led by the evidence and feedback we received in our most recent survey of the regulated community. We will continue to focus on delivering more bespoke advice and guidance resources so that parties and campaigners can easily understand the political finance laws, regardless of their size or experience. Delivering the elections The experience of electoral administration at the May 2022 elections The elections were well-run with no significant issues arising. However, the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern, with staffing polling stations proving challenging in a number of areas. Returning Officers took all the necessary steps to support disabled voters at the poll, and 96% of disabled voters said they were satisfied with their experience of voting. Section introduction Our evidence shows that the May 2022 polls, including electoral registration services, were well-run. Voters and campaigners reported high levels of satisfaction and confidence in both the voting process and the count. However, electoral administrators have reported that diminishing council resources are increasing pressures on the delivery of elections. The capacity of election teams continues to be stretched While Returning Officers and their staff reported fewer challenges than in 2021, at the height of the pandemic, concerns were still raised about their ability to continue to deliver elections with diminishing resources. Many Returning Officers struggled to recruit and retain enough poll staff Many Returning Officers experienced difficulties in recruiting sufficient staff for polling stations. The challenges included recruiting enough people in the first place and then managing levels of ‘call-off’ close to or on polling day. Planning for the council elections was undertaken when Scotland was still subject to Covid prevention measures, although many of these had begun to lift as voters went to the polls. This exacerbated the staffing challenges faced as some long-standing poll-staff were reluctant to work in the context of relaxed public health restrictions, whilst others were keen to take advantage of the easing of restrictions by going on holiday. "We had a number of polling staff call off due to Covid. We had to use all standby staff and some information officers ... to ensure that all posts were covered on day of poll." "Appointment of staff - particularly retention of Presiding Officers and other poll staff was a significant challenge and call offs (not Covid related) soaked up standbys recruited twice before the election. Causes huge administrative burden on small administration team at point of delivery in the last 2 weeks as backtracking to fill posts repeatedly and retrain." "Initial request to staff on our list returned limited availability and as Covid restrictions eased throughout the country, many poll staff – including long standing ones – called off." The Electoral Commission is working with the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB) and the wider electoral community across the UK to discuss and identify solutions to the staffing, resilience and capacity challenges experienced by Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and their teams. An immediate focus is addressing the challenges of recruiting on polling station staff. Further changes to the delivery of elections have the potential to increase pressure on already stretched elections teams unless well managed While Covid was the predominant factor highlighted as affecting the recruitment of staff, Returning Officers have also reported that diminishing council resources more generally are having an effect. This includes making it more difficult to pull in staff from other council departments to support staffing at the polls. Changes to the delivery of UK Parliament elections in Scotland are being introduced through the Elections Act. These have the potential to increase the challenge of recruiting and retaining skilled and experienced polling station staff for future elections, due to the additional responsibilities that Presiding Officers and Poll Clerks will need to deliver, such as checking voter ID. The Scottish Government is also planning to consult on electoral law reform, with any changes expected to take effect in time for the 2026 Scottish Parliament election. It is important that electoral administrators have early clarity about any legislative changes in order that they can plan effectively to deliver them. As a minimum, legislation should be clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented by administrators. Changes to legislation add to the already fragmented and complex sets of rules which must be followed at an election, increasing the risks of mistakes being made and public confidence in election results being undermined. We continue to recommend that both the Scottish and UK Governments commit to simplifying and consolidating electoral law, in line with the recommendations from the UK's Law Commissions. Counts were delivered well across Scotland Due to the complexities of counting the votes and calculating the results at an election which uses the type 2 of the Single Transferable Vote system of voting in place for council elections, all counts in Scotland were conducted electronically. The e-Counting equipment, including the software, is procured nationally by the Scottish Government on behalf of the 32 Returning Officers. As highlighted above, candidates had high levels of satisfaction with the count process. Electoral Commission representatives who attended counts across Scotland did not have any concerns about the delivery or transparency of the counts. Counts were delivered well across Scotland points Some Returning Officers raised concerns about late appointment of staff by the count suppliers A number of Returning Officers noted that, while their counts had gone well overall, the late appointment of supporting technical staff by the supplier had led to some difficulties, as the technical staff then had to familiarise themselves with the count process very close to the event. This had led to initial set up and operational delivery problems at some counts which, while resolved, had raised concerns amongst those Returning Officers affected. “[They] appeared to lack experience of the system which gave us cause for concern in the run up to the count. While the team was very helpful and positive in their engagement their inability to diagnose problems and their lack of confidence using the system was quite worrying.” The Scottish Government and the EMB are currently carrying out a review of the e-counting project. Once that review has been concluded we would expect that any relevant recommendations are implemented so that Returning Officers can have full confidence in their delivery of future electronic counts. National co-ordination made it easier for people to find information on the election results At previous elections the media had raised concerns about difficulties in accessing reliable results information in real time. This had led broadcasters to send staff to every count venue in Scotland in order to collate results information. Concerns had also been raised by others with an interest in Scottish politics, including voters, about the lack of a central source for all election results. Ahead of the elections, the Electoral Commission worked with the EMB and communications staff from Scotland’s 32 councils to agree a common hashtag and format for the tweeting of each council ward’s results declaration. The EMB also collated the results for all councils and published them on their website, which enabled voters to access all the results in one place. Feedback from broadcasters was positive, and this approach should continue for future elections. The Electoral Management Board continued to support consistency in the delivery of elections The Electoral Management Board (EMB) has statutory responsibility for supporting the delivery of council elections in Scotland, including a power to direct Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers in respect of their duties at these elections. Directions issued by the Convener of the EMB at this election included timings for the dispatch of poll cards and postal votes and also for counts. Electoral administrators and the wider electoral community continue to value the role that the EMB plays in providing support and advice for the delivery of local elections. “Directions of the Convener of EMB invariably helpful and well timed.” “Everything worked well. Directions were helpful without being overly prescriptive or heavy-handed.” ROs improved the support available for disabled voters at these elections The Electoral Commission has a specific legal duty 3 to report on the steps taken by ROs to assist disabled people to vote at the election. To inform our report we asked for information from Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and polling station staff. We also looked at the views of disabled voters who responded to our public opinion research and gathered evidence from disability organisations. ROs improved the support available for disabled voters at these elections points The electoral community worked to improve access for disabled people. Following the 2021 Scottish Parliament elections, where some concerns were raised about Covid measures impacting on disabled people’s access to the poll, 4 work was undertaken to improve the service disabled voters received in polling stations. In January 2022, the Electoral Commission and the EMB ran a briefing event for electoral administrators which included contributions from representatives of disabled people in Scotland outlining some of the barriers faced in accessing voting. Following the event, videos of the contributions from disability organisations at these sessions were disseminated to electoral administrators and were widely used in the training of poll staff. “We used all EC training slides and accessibility at training events and encouraged staff to view videos on how to deal with disabled persons at the poll.” Electoral administrator All Returning Officers who responded to our survey reported having provided the measures required in law to support disabled voters. In 2021 some

sight impaired voters raised concerns about polling staff confidence in supporting voters to use tactile voting devices (TVDs)⁵ in polling stations. At this election no concerns were raised in relation to this, although some electoral administrators highlighted concerns raised by sight impaired voters about the usefulness of the TVD at an election using STV. "We did receive a couple of comments...regarding the use of TVDs – specifically that voters find it harder to use these in elections using STV (i.e using numbers to allocate multiple preferences)." The UK Government's Elections Act makes changes to the way disabled people are supported in the polling station at UK Parliament elections by replacing the prescription of what must be provided, including TVDs, with a requirement for Returning Officers to take all reasonable steps to support disabled voters to vote independently and in secret. This has the potential to improve the range and quality of support available and should speed up the process of providing additional support when a gap is identified, as legislation would no longer be required to allow the use of new technology. The Electoral Commission will provide guidance, developed in consultation with disability organisations and the electoral community, which ROs must have regard to in delivering their duties. It is important that disabled voters receive an equivalent level of support regardless of which election they are voting at in Scotland. The Scottish Government should monitor the impact of this legislation and consider whether similar provisions should be introduced to support the participation of disabled voters at devolved Scottish elections. Disabled voters reported a high rate of satisfaction with the voting process Respondents to our voter survey who defined themselves as disabled or with a long-term health condition were only marginally less satisfied with the process of voting than non-disabled voters: 96% of disabled voters reported satisfaction, compared to 97% of non-disabled voters. Nearly three-quarters (74%) of voters who had a disability or health condition that limited them a lot said they found the help/support from polling station staff useful, compared with 72% of non-disabled voters, and over half (55%) said they found the help/support from polling station staff very useful, compared with 51% of non-disabled voters. Disabled voters also reported finding it easy to get inside their polling station to vote (100%), including 83% who said it was very easy. More work is needed to reach disabled people with information on how to register and vote Respondents to our voter survey who defined themselves as disabled or with a long-term health condition were less likely to say they had enough information on how to cast their vote than respondents who did not consider themselves disabled (61% vs 69%). The Electoral Commission will continue to work in partnership with organisations representing disabled people in Scotland, and the wider electoral community, to address the information needs of disabled voters and to strengthen polling station staff training on accessibility. Our recommendations | Electoral Commission Search Our recommendations You are in the May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 24 July 2019 Last updated: 24 July 2019 Our recommendations When the UK Government invited local councils to run voter identification pilot schemes in May 2018, it also said that it was open to looking at further piloting in future elections. We agree that it would be helpful to collect more evidence from further pilot schemes at elections in 2019. This will help the Government and Parliament to decide whether or not to introduce an identification requirement for future elections, and how any such requirement should be designed. This first round of pilots has shown that there could be several different ways of delivering a voter identification scheme in Great Britain. It is right that the Government should now focus on the detail of what further evidence they need, and how the design of future pilot schemes will help to provide that evidence. We have some limited evidence from these pilots that younger people and those who don't always vote were less likely to say that they would find it easy to show identification. We think that more work is needed to look at evidence about the impact of different schemes on these people, and to identify what additional steps can be taken to minimise the risk that they are not able to vote in future. We have identified some important lessons from the 2018 pilot schemes in this report and we have set out our recommendations for further work and future pilot schemes below. These recommendations would help provide the best possible evidence base for any decisions about identification requirements for voters at polling stations in Great Britain in the future. The UK Government should: ensure that a wider range of local councils run pilot schemes in May 2019 These should include a mixture of rural and urban areas, and areas with different demographic profiles. This would help make sure there is more evidence about the impact of voter identification requirements on different groups of people. set out more specifically how pilot schemes in May 2019 should be designed and run The Government should take a stronger role in setting the design of pilot schemes in 2019, instead of allowing Returning Officers as much flexibility to design their own schemes as in 2018. This would help to make sure there is a good range of evidence to test the impact of different options in different parts of England. Too many different schemes will make it harder to identify the impact of requirements on different groups of people. work with the Equality and Human Rights Commission and organisations that represent people with different needs to carry out robust Equality Impact Assessments for future pilot schemes This would help to make sure that the Government and Returning Officers think carefully about the potential impact of different voter identification requirements for different groups of people. It would also help Returning Officers to identify the most effective ways to communicate the requirements to different groups of people in their areas. carry out further work to identify what kinds of alternative identification are available for people who would find it harder to show their passport, driving licence 21 or travel pass This is particularly for people with protected characteristics as defined by the Equality Act Most voters in the 2018 pilot schemes that required either photo or non-photo identification were able to show their passport, driving licence or travel card, but some groups of people are less likely to have these documents. Further work, which could include research as well as more pilot schemes, should look at whether these groups in particular would find it helpful to show other types of identification, and should also look at the impact on polling station staff. carry out further work to gather more evidence on the levels of identity assurance provided by different types of documents This would help the Government and Parliament to assess the relative security benefits of different types of identification, and consider those against the potential impact on voters. carry out further work to establish whether poll cards could be included as acceptable identification without needing scanning technology in polling stations This would help to establish whether this could be a cost-effective and affordable part of a future identification scheme. The pilot schemes in Swindon and Watford were significantly more expensive than those in Bromley, Gosport and Woking. This was because of the extra cost of the scanners and technology that staff used in the polling stations. Further work, which could include more pilot schemes, should explore whether it would be possible to check poll cards without using such expensive technology. Future pilot schemes should: continue to include options for people who don't have any of the required forms of identification This will make sure that no-one who is eligible is prevented from voting because they don't have the right identification. Although only a small number of people in the 2018 pilot schemes used alternative options, it will still be important to offer these or similar options in future pilot schemes. It will also be important to promote these options more widely and to test the practical impact if they are used by larger numbers of voters. Our advice on the proposed Scottish independence referendum question | Electoral Commission Search Our advice on the proposed Scottish independence referendum question You are in the Scottish Independence referendum section Home Scottish Independence referendum On this page Summary of our advice Download our reports First published: 30 January 2013 Last updated: 30 January 2013 Summary of our advice We have responded to the Scottish Government's request to provide advice and assistance by considering the wording and intelligibility of the proposed question for the referendum on independence for Scotland, which is: 'Do you agree that Scotland should be an independent country? Yes / No' To inform our assessment we carried out research with members of the public to see how well the proposed question meets our guidelines for intelligible questions, and whether it is easy for voters to use and understand. 1 We also wrote to people and organisations including the main political parties represented in the Scottish Parliament and would-be campaigners, to seek their views on the proposed question. We took account of views expressed by other individuals and groups who contacted us, and by members and committees of the UK and Scottish Parliaments. Our guidelines say that a question should be clear and simple, that is, easy to understand; to the point; and not ambiguous. It should also be neutral, which means it should not encourage voters to consider one response more favourably than another or mislead voters. In the research we looked at whether or not the question is clear, simple and neutral. We found that the question is written in plain language and is easy for people to understand and answer. It is clear to people what they are being asked to vote on. However, based on our research and taking into account what we heard from people and organisations who submitted their views on the question, we consider that the proposed question is not neutral because the phrase 'Do you agree ...?' could lead people towards voting 'yes'. Our recommendation The referendum result should be one that all voters and referendum campaigners can accept and have confidence in. For that reason, we recommend changing the way the question is asked, so that it is more neutral. Instead of asking 'Do you agree...?' we recommend the following wording: 'Should Scotland be an independent country? Yes/No' Information about independence A common theme that arose during our research was that people wanted more information about the pros and cons of independence before polling day, to be able to make an informed choice on how to vote. Download our reports You can download our: advice on referendum question for independence referendum for Scotland report on our research with voters which informed our views on the question 1. It was noted that item 9 of the agenda (Incoming Chief Executive salary) would be taken at the end of all business items, as limited staff members would remain. Declarations of interest Commissioner Sue Bruce declared that she had stepped up from Deputy Chair to presently Chair the 'Prince's Foundation'. The Board noted that the Commissioners' Register of interests would be updated and this reflected on the Commission's external website in line with the Commissioners' Code of Conduct. Minutes of the previous Board meeting (EC 58/21) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 21 July 2021 be agreed. Corporate Plan 2022/23 – 2026/27: Final (EC 59/21) The Chief Executive introduced the report updating Commissioners on the present position with regards to processes for the three parliaments and on the final budgets. It was noted that Commissioners for Scotland and Wales would further review the cover letters to respectively the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd that will accompany the narrative for the Corporate Plan and Main Estimate. Performance report quarter one 2021/22 (EC 60/21) The Chief Executive introduced the report providing a summary on progress. The Director, Finance and Corporate Services advised that he was currently confident that financial pressures could be managed within budget, although he and the Chief Executive would be holding meetings with Directors during October to assure the mid-year forecasts. Commissioners discussed several aspects of recent performance including speed of complex investigations and staff turnover. The Board requested a paper to a future meeting showing the process of an investigation including the length of time it takes and outcomes. The Board further requested the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee to report back on staff turnover, liaising as necessary with the Audit and Risk Committee. Action: To bring back to a future meeting a paper on the process of an investigation, time allocated and outcomes.

Action owner: Director, Regulation. Submitted by: December Board meeting. Resolved: That the Board noted the delivery of the work programme and considered areas where more scrutiny was required. Discussion on Board diversity and update on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) activities (EC 61/21) The General Counsel introduced the item updating Commissioners on the recent progress made delivering the Commission's commitment to Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI). The second item on well-being was deferred to a future meeting. The Board reviewed and discussed areas within the draft EDI Strategy including widening the range of groups reached such as carers and people with various disabilities and generally to recognise diversity of thought beyond the groups identified in law with protected characteristics. Serious consideration needs to be given to unconscious bias.

Commissioners emphasised the importance of demonstrating commitment to the themes of the strategy rather than simply being compliant with rules. It was suggested that we should explore best practice adopted elsewhere, notably in Northern Ireland. The Board noted the importance of getting the strategy out and for the consultation to be put in place and the work programme introduced. Further progress will be reported to future meetings. The General Counsel introduced Marcia Bluck, an external consultant who led a session on exploring options to improve Board diversity. The Board noted a presentation focussing Commissioners on the following: Improving diversity at Board level Improving representation – protected characteristics and socio-economics Widening the perspectives of the Board Deepening authentic engagement with diverse groups The Board discussed various ways in which to build confidence and reputation and set clear objectives and value for individuals, including recruiting an independent advisor on EDI to the Board. The Board thanked Marcia for a provoking, thoughtful presentation and welcomed discussions. Further detail and job description for an EDI independent advisor to the Board will be brought back to a future meeting for agreeing. Action: The Board delegated authority to the Chief Executive and General Counsel to prepare further detail and job description, for an independent advisor on EDI to the Board and a mechanism for engaging Commissioners. Action owner: Chief Executive and General Counsel. Submitted by: October 2021. Resolved: That the Board noted and agreed the actions taken during this year to promoting equality, diversity and inclusion. Resolved: That the Board agreed for the Commission to go out to consultation on the EDI Strategy and the new EIA material. Policy Development Grants scheme (EC 62/21) The Chief Executive and the Director, Communications, Policy and Research introduced the report. The Executive invited the Board to agree the Alba party joining the Scheme, but wanted to further consider both how the allocation of grant should work and the additional recommendation. The Board agreed that the Alba party join the Scheme and delegated to the Chief Executive, with Director, Communications, Policy and Research, reviewing and then writing to the Board with proposed recommendations to the Minister. Board responses would enable the Chief Executive to finalise the approach and write accordingly to the Minister.

Action: The Board delegated to the Chief Executive, with the Director, Communications, Policy and Research to review how the grant will be allocated with the Alba party being part of the Scheme, then write to the Board with proposed recommendations to the Minister. Action owner: Chief Executive Submitted by: End of October Resolved: That the Board agreed to include the Alba Party as an eligible Scotland-only party. Dates of proposed Commission Board and Committee meetings 2022/23 (EC 63/21) The Chair advised Commissioners to liaise directly with the Board Secretary on slight adjustments to the proposed Board and Committee meeting dates for 2022/23. This would include a meeting outside London and continuing to plan for hybrid meetings. Action: The Board Secretary would revisit the proposed Board and Committee meeting dates for 2022/23 incorporating a meeting outside London and continuation of hybrid meetings. Action owner: Board Secretary Submitted by: December 2021 Resolved: That the Board noted a revised proposal would be circulated by the Board Secretary on Board and Committee meeting dates for 2022/23. Resolved: That the Board noted the oral update. Update from the Audit and Risk Committee (ARC) Chair (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chair of the Audit and Risk Committee (ARC) of their meeting held on the 21 September 2021. The Board noted a report on the Risk appetite statement of which recommendations will come to a future Board meeting for discussion, an oral update on the Risk improvement plan and oral updates from our internal and external auditors. It was noted that non-ARC Commission members would be welcome to observe a future ARC meeting. The Board noted a presentation on a deep dive into training and development of ARC members. There was a review of schedule of policies and codes which is done periodically. It was noted that within the post meeting discussion following main ARC business, a discussion was had about recruitment and retention in the Commission and a risk of losing corporate memory. A discussion on an action plan arose and a suggestion was to invite the Chair of RemCo to a discussion on this topic. The Board noted that it was Commissioner Alasdair Morgan's last ARC meeting serving on the Committee for 10 years and Commissioner Stephen Gilbert's first ARC meeting as a participating observer until he joins as a full member in November. investigations in respect of Leave.EU You are in the Key correspondence section Home Key correspondence On this page Letter summary Read our letter in full First published: 16 November 2017 Last updated: 16 July 2019 Summary of the letter Date: 16 November 2017 To: Mr Arron Banks, Chairman, Leave.EU Email address: info@leave.eu From: Louise Edwards, Head of Regulation Format: Sent by email Full letter Dear Mr Banks Electoral Commission investigations in respect of Leave.EU Ms Bassett has asked me to respond to your letter of 9 November. As you note, the Electoral Commission currently has two investigations open in respect of Leave.EU, one relating to whether services were provided to Leave.EU and used during its campaign for the June 2016 referendum on the UK's membership of the EU, and the other relating to loans provided to Leave.EU for that referendum. Both are being progressed in line with the Commission's published Enforcement Policy and will reach proper outcomes based on full enquiry. How long an investigation takes will depend on the steps the Commission needs to take to determine whether or not offences have been committed. They can require substantial material to be reviewed, leading to further enquiry. Progress is likely to be slower if those we request information from initially fail to comply and the Commission is required to use its formal statutory powers to progress the investigation. In that respect I refer you to our correspondence of 30 June 2017. Investigations can take further time where the Commission needs to go back to organisations to ensure that full disclosure of requested material has been provided.

In relation to our first investigation in respect of Leave.EU, the Commission will shortly set out to Leave.EU areas where it appears material has not been provided, notably relating to documents comprising the services provided by Goddard Gunster in late 2015/early 2016. We look forward to cooperation in disclosing this material to us. In relation to the second investigation, please note that investigations are not opened on the basis of questions asked in parliament or elsewhere by MPs. We will consider your requests for specific information – those numbered 1-4 in your letter – in accordance with our obligations under the Freedom of Information Act 2000.

However, we can confirm now that no meeting with Mr Bradshaw MP was held in the run up to the announcement of this investigation. The Electoral Commission is an independent regulator of political finance in the UK. We apply the rules set out in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 fairly and proportionately to all parties and campaigners. During and after the EU referendum we published guidance and offered an advice service to assist campaigners to comply with the rules. We also responded to allegations the rules had not been followed. This included my email to Leave.EU, copied to you, of 8 March 2017 about the leaflets published by the Government prior to the referendum. You will recall that I explained that other than the rules in section 125 PPERA, which were not engaged, the regulatory framework set out in PPERA does not apply to the Government. Since the June 2016 referendum on the UK's membership of the EU, the Commission has published the conclusions of investigations into campaigners for both the 'leave' and 'remain' outcomes. More investigations are ongoing, again into campaigners on both sides. For example, you can expect the conclusions of our publicly announced investigations in respect of Vote Leave's and Britain Stronger In Europe's referendum spending returns to be published in due course. We will continue to investigate, and to publish the conclusions, where evidence causes us to suspect the campaign finance rules were broken. Voter identification in polling stations Trustworthy campaigning Increase in proportion of people who believe the vote is not counted accurately Political education in schools Electoral Commission perceptions Tables First published: 11 July 2019 Last updated: 11 July 2019 Public Opinion Tracker 2022 Since 2007 the Electoral Commission has tracked public attitudes to different aspects of elections and democracy in the UK. Our most recent study was carried out online, across the UK, in February 2022. Key findings Public confidence in the running of elections continues to be high. The long-time negative trend in the public's perception of the transparency of party and campaigner finance has continued. More people think that the introduction of a requirement to show ID when voting in polling stations will improve elections (43%), but it is polarising, with (31%) saying that they disagree with this. Around 4% do not have the required ID with a recognisable photo. 1 This is higher among disadvantaged groups. 43% of those without the correct ID said they would definitely or probably apply to get a free voter ID card. People have a difficulty knowing whether the information they read online is reliable or not. There is a great deal of suspicion regarding both political content online and political campaigning material. Though starting from a low position (4% in 2021), twice as many people this year think that votes are not counted accurately at elections in the UK (8% in 2022). Among those that think votes are not counted accurately, the most used news source is social media websites. For those that do think the vote is counted accurately, social media is only their sixth most used news source. Confidence and satisfaction with the electoral process While there has been a decline, since last year, in the public's perception of whether elections are well run and in their satisfaction with the process of voting, the longer term trend is still positive. Last year's results showed the highest recorded satisfaction (86%) with the process of voting at elections, and this year is the second highest (81%). While Northern Ireland has slightly lower satisfaction than the other UK nations, the gap has been decreasing in recent years (3% lower than England in 2022 compared to a 21% gap in 2019). There has been little change over time in the public's confidence in knowing how to register (90% confident) or in knowing how to vote (92% confident). Party finance There has been an increase in the proportion of people who think there is inadequate regulation of the money political parties spend on their election campaigns. Over half of people see it as a problem (56%), up from 48% in 2021. Of the issues we asked about it was up to third 2 in the list of concerns, behind only bias in the media and low voter turnout. Positive perceptions around the transparency of the spending and funding of political parties/campaigners has been in decline since we first asked the question in 2011 (when 37% agreed it was transparent). 13% think it's transparent in 2022. The proportion who actively disagree that spending and finance is transparent had remained in the low 40s (40-42%) between 2018 and 2020, but since then has increased to over to over half (52%) in 2022. In the last year Wales has gone from the least negative (45% in 2021) on whether spending and finance is transparent, to the most negative (56% in 2022). Until 2020, Northern Ireland was the most negative on this but for the last couple of years it is in line with the UK average. There is a similar trend on the funding of political parties and campaigners. 55% say that the system is not transparent (0-4 on a 0-10 point scale) and 24% say it is transparent (6-10 on a 0-10 scale). In 2020 there was an equal proportion saying it was and was not transparent (36% in each case). Over twice as many people thought they could not find out how parties are funded (43%), compared to the 18% that said they could. As recently as 2017, 40% agreed they could find out how political parties were funded. 32% agree that the authorities will take appropriate action if an organisation is caught breaking the rules. This also has been in decline since 2017 when it was 58% (45% in 2020). The number disagreeing had not changed much between 2018 and 2020 (19-22%) but now it has increased to 37% in 2022. Voter identification in polling stations More people think that the introduction of voter ID would improve the way that elections are run in Great Britain (43%) compared to those who disagree (31%). Electoral fraud is seen as less of a problem than other problems around elections. It was rated as a problem by 26% of the population which is ninth out of nine on a general list of potential problems related to elections.

35% of the population say that it's not a problem at all. 62% of people say that the introduction of voter ID will increase security around the election. 50% though say it will make voting less convenient. 17% of people say that it will make them less likely to vote, compared to 12% who say it will make them more likely to vote. 4% of the population in Great Britain either does not have any photo ID (3%) or does not have any photo ID where they think they are recognisable (1%). A further 2% said they did not know whether they had any of the forms of photo ID we asked about. Less than half of those people without recognisable photo ID (43%) said that they would probably or definitely apply for a free voter ID card. 29% said they would definitely or probably not apply for the free voter ID card. Those people who did not have recognisable photo ID were more likely to be from disadvantaged groups, such as those who are renting from their local authority (17% of whom did not have the correct ID), those renting from a housing association (10%), those who are unemployed (14%), those from lower social grade (8% of those who are DE social grade), and those with lower levels of education (7%). 74% in Great Britain will not need to do anything different when they go to vote as they typically carry the necessary ID with them every time they leave their house. 20% of the population do have the correct ID but will need to be reminded to take it with them as they go to the polls, as they do not typically take it with them when they leave the house. Trustworthy campaigning Just over half of people (59%) agree that they can judge whether the information they read online is reliable or not. Out of those that did agree, only 13% agree strongly with the statement and 46% said they tended to agree. 12% actively disagree that they could judge whether the information they read online is reliable or not. 20% of people said they had seen a deepfake video in the last year. Of these over a third of people (36%) do not think that they could easily identify a deepfake. Under half (44%) actively think that they could. Just under half (48%) disagree that the information available online about politics is trustworthy. Also just under half of people (46%) say they think political campaigning online is untrue or misleading. Increase in proportion of people who believe the vote is not counted accurately Twice as many people think that votes are not counted accurately (8% in 2022) at elections compared with last year (4% in 2021). The number who agree that the vote is counted accurately has decreased from 85% in 2021 to 74% in 2022. Of those who disagree that votes are counted accurately, their main news source are social network websites (34% use social media as their main news source). For the majority who agree that the vote is counted accurately, social media websites rank as their sixth main news source (18% use social media as their main news source). Those that don't believe that votes are counted accurately are more likely to say that they do not feel well equipped to judge whether the information they read is accurate or not (18%) compared with those that do think the vote is counted accurately (11%). Political education in schools tables You are in the Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies section Home A modern electoral register Modernising electoral registration: feasibility studies First published: 26 July 2019 Last updated: 8 June 2021 Appendix tables Appendix A: Better use of data by EROs: implementation scenarios Scenario 1: Medium level digital data sharing Scenario 2: High level digital data sharing The DSO uses an automated trigger to send a snapshot of their data on a regular basis to the IER hub. An API between the DSO and IER hub is used to transfer data to the hub. The existing IER hub receives datasets periodically (e.g. monthly) from the DSO and makes it available to EROs for download. An ERO downloads the dataset from the IER hub into a spreadsheet via their EMS system. An API and the Public Service Network (PSN) are used to transfer the data from the IER hub to the EMS system. The ERO has some basic data cleansing and matching tools, but still does manual checks on the quality of the data. The ERO uses the new data to trigger a mail merge process to contact the identified individuals that could be potential electors, inviting them to register, or existing electors where changes to their personal details have been identified.

79% of parents of children aged 14-18 agree that it is important that children learn the basics about politics, voting and democracy at school. More parents are dissatisfied (35%) with the information that their children aged 14 to 18 receive about politics and democracy, compared to the 26% who are satisfied. Electoral Commission perceptions 35% had heard a great deal or fair amount about the Commission in 2022. 20% said they had heard about the Commission in the last year. Both statistics are identical to last year's result. 'Independent' is still the word most associated with the commission (25%). 'Important' is back to the second highest association (21%). 'Bureaucratic' is back down to the third largest association (19%).

The DSO uses an automated trigger to send transactional data as it happens or at regular intervals to the IER hub. An API between the DSO and IER hub is used to transfer data to the hub. The existing IER hub packages the transactional data received from the DSO and makes it available to a specific ERO, based on the address data of the transaction. An ERO downloads the data package specific to their electoral area via their EMS system. An API and the PSN are used to transfer the data from the IER hub to the EMS system. The ERO uses advanced data cleansing and matching tools, with light touch manual checks on the quality of the data to identify potential electors from multiple data sources. Letters are automatically generated by the EMS system for all potential electors or existing electors where changes in personal details have been detected.

Appendix B: Automated and automatic registration scenarios Scenario 1: Automated registration Scenario 2: Automatic registration The ERO identifies potential electors or existing electors where details have changed, from one or a combination of data sources. The citizen is flagged in the EMS system as a potential elector or an existing elector where a change in personal details has been detected. An electronic electoral registration form is populated with available data from the EMS system to initiate the registration or change to personal details. If contact details were obtained from a data source, a link to the electronic registration form (with known fields prepopulated) is sent to the citizen in an email or SMS, requesting the citizen to complete the registration. The citizen has X number of days to complete the electronic registration form. If the citizen has not responded after X number of days, the prepopulated registration form is automatically printed from the EMS system and sent to the citizen. After X number of weeks, a reminder is sent to the citizen to complete the online or printed registration form. If the citizen has not taken any action after X number of weeks, their record remains flagged in the EMS system until the canvass period, during which they could be contacted again. The ERO identifies potential electors from one or a combination of data sources, where there is sufficient information to register the citizen. The citizen is flagged in the EMS system as a potential elector or an existing elector where a change in personal details has been detected. An electronic electoral registration form is populated with sufficient data from the EMS system to automatically register a potential elector or update personal details of an existing elector. If contact details were obtained from a data source, an email or SMS is sent to the citizen to notify them of the proposed electoral registration or update to their existing details on the register. The citizen has X number of days to respond if the information in the form is incorrect or they have a valid reason to opt out of the registration. If the citizen has not responded after X number of days, the prepopulated registration form is automatically printed from the EMS system and sent to the citizen. If the citizen has not responded after X number of weeks, to change information or opt out, the citizen is automatically registered. The ERO sends a notification letter to the citizen to inform them of the actions taken.

Scenario 1: Medium level integration

Scenario 2: High level integration

A citizen is given a choice to register to vote at the end of an online application for a new passport, driving licence, or other public service transaction. The citizen clicks on a link to redirect to the Register to Vote website, with relevant data sent from the source and populated in the electoral registration web form. The citizen follows the standard process to completing the online registration application. This is a more advanced approach to integrating electoral registration into other public services, with the citizen completing the missing information to register after completing the third party transaction, for example: Additional fields on the third party website would capture missing information required to register to vote, as an extension to the third party transaction, e.g. at the end of an online driving licence application. If the citizen selects the option to register to vote, additional fields appear for the citizen to complete. All of the required information is saved to the third party database and transferred to the relevant ERO via the IER hub.

Appendix D: Unique identifier as a prerequisite to managing duplicate records

Prerequisite Summary Benefits Risks

Unique identifier

Currently there is no identifier in the electoral registers to identify an elector uniquely. Creating local identifiers would not solve the issue of duplicates across multiple registers and therefore a UK-wide identifier should be created. All electoral registration applications are currently verified against DWP data, via the IER hub. Therefore, the unique identifier that is linked to the NINo could be generated during this process by either the DWP or GDS. For existing electors, it might be possible to build on canvass reform. Where register entries are validated against DWP data where there is a match, a unique identifier could be linked to the elector. A unique identifier could help to identify duplicates arising from a change in the elector's details, e.g. address. A unique identifier could also identify complete duplicate registration applications, e.g. citizen completes an application to register but is already registered at the same address. Existing electors without a match against DWP data during the canvass discernment step would not be automatically allocated a unique identifier. Electors without a NINo will not be automatically allocated a unique identifier.

Appendix F: ERO focused solution: the impact of centralisation of electoral registers on management of duplicate records

Solution Summary Benefits Risks

Decentralised registers with unique identifier

Current system is decentralised with no unique identifier. However, EMS systems provide tools to identify duplicates within a single, local register. With a unique identifier, duplicates could be detected within a single register. Without the unique identifier, the duplicates problem will not be resolved. Does not allow comparison between registers to identify duplicates. May not be possible to provide unique identifiers for all entries in the register if the elector could not be verified.

Single view of all registers with unique identifier

Maintain separate registers, but enable EROs to view (read-only) all entries on all registers. Would enable comparison of all registers to identify possible duplicates, especially if unique identifiers have been allocated to register entries. The single view of registers could support a

UK wide lookup tool, without having to develop separate solutions. May increase security risks around personal data. Four national registers with unique identifier Single national register for England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland already has a centralised register. Welsh government is considering this option. This would require national keepers of the registers. Could identify duplicates across multiple registers within a nation. Could facilitate a wider lookup function than local registers, although not UK wide. This would not allow comparison across the national registers. Impact of any data breaches would be far greater than with local registers. Operational impact, e.g. restructuring of ERO function could be disruptive. National keepers would be required – potential responsibility and accountability issues to resolve. Could disenfranchise voters if moving across to a different nation and assume that they are still registered. Risk that a citizen could be registered in more than one nation or move has been updated in one nation, but not yet the other. Single, UK wide register with unique identifier Restructuring electoral registration process so that there is one UK wide register, rather than the current 372 registers. This would require a keeper of the register. Could identify duplicates across all UK registers. Could facilitate a UK wide lookup function. One unique identifier per elector Unique identifier is issued centrally Facilitate electoral reform more generally, e.g. early voting, voting anywhere Impact of any data breaches would be far greater than with local registers. Operational impact, e.g. restructuring of ERO function could be disruptive. National keeper— potential responsibility and accountability issues to resolve. Different governments may have conflicting rules, structures, processes, etc. that could complicate one register. Also different governments would have to actively support the creation of a single register.

Appendix G: Electoral registration reform and the degree of centralisation

Summary Automation Integration Duplicates Risks Decentralised registers Current system This would be deliverable under the current system. The IER hub would provide the infrastructure to support automation of registration. This would be deliverable under the current system. IER hub would provide the infrastructure to support a more integrated registration system. Does not allow comparison between registers to identify duplicates. However, EMS systems provide tools to identify duplicates within a single, local register. Will not resolve duplicates problem, especially across individual registers. Single view of all registers Maintain separate registers, but enable EROs to view (readonly) all entries on all registers This would help to address some of the risks associated with automation under the current system, e.g. confirming whether a potential elector is already registered elsewhere. This would not offer any obvious advantages for developing a more integrated system. Would enable comparison of all registers to identify possible duplicates. However to identify actual duplicates with certainty, a unique identifier would be required.

Could be used as lookup function, without having to develop separate solutions. May increase security risks around personal data. Four national registers Single national register for England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland already has a centralised register. Welsh government is considering this option. This would require national keepers of the registers. Would simplify the infrastructure required to support automated / automatic registration by reducing the number of registers linked to the IER hub. Would enable a move toward a more continuous system of registration with less re-registration required, unless you move to a different part of the UK. Would simplify the infrastructure required to support backend processes of integrating electoral registration. No impact on the elector side of integration.

This would not allow comparison across the national registers. To be of benefit, this would require a unique identifier to identify actual duplicates within each nation. Could facilitate a wider lookup function, although not UK wide. Impact of any data breaches would be far greater than with local registers. Operational impact, e.g. restructuring of ERO function could be disruptive. National keepers would be required – potential responsibility and accountability issues to resolve. Single, UK wide register Restructuring electoral registration process so that there is one UK wide register, rather than the current 372 registers. This would require a keeper of the register. Further simplify the infrastructure by providing a single link to the IER hub. Would enable a move toward a more continuous, portable system of registration, with updating, rather than re-registering of details. Further simplify the infrastructure by providing a single link to the IER hub. To identify actual duplicates with certainty, a unique identifier would be required. Could facilitate a UK wide lookup function. Impact of any data breaches would be far greater than with local registers. Operational impact, e.g. restructuring of ERO function could be disruptive. National keeper of register – potential responsibility and accountability issues to resolve. Different governments may have conflicting rules, structures, processes, etc. that could complicate one register. Reporting on elections You are in the section Home On this page What we report on What our reports include Reporting on the May 2023 elections First published: 11 April 2023 Last updated: 28 April 2023 Summary of our duty We have a statutory duty to collect data and publish reports about elections that take place across the UK. We also choose to report on other elections. What we report on We have a statutory duty to report on the administration of : UK Parliament elections recall petitions Police and Crime Commissioner elections council elections in Scotland Scottish Parliament elections Northern Ireland Assembly elections Senedd elections referendums (if they're held under the Political Parties Elections & Referendums Act (PPERA) 2000) In the past, we have chosen to report on: local council elections in England, Wales and Northern Ireland local and combined authority mayoral elections Greater London Authority (GLA) elections What our reports include Our reports aim to look at the experience of people voting and campaigning at elections, and of people delivering the elections. We carry out a public opinion survey to find out voters' views about elections, including whether they thought it was well run and how confident they felt about it. We also ask candidates and campaigners to give us feedback, and we send them a survey after the election. Councils, who are responsible for the running the elections, have to provide data to us about electoral registration, postal voting and turnout. We ask them to fill out a survey, and also ask for feedback from people who worked at the election, such as polling station staff. We usually aim to publish our reports on elections within six months of polling day. Reporting on the May 2023 elections At the local elections in England on 4 May, voters will need to show photo ID to vote at a polling station. In the weeks following polling day, we will carry out research with the public to collect data about the experience of voters. We will also collect data from the local councils who had elections in their area. This will inform an initial analysis of the implementation of voter ID, which we will publish as quickly as possible in the weeks after the elections, subject to data being available. We expect this initial analysis will include: top line data from our public opinion survey on the awareness and experience of voters data from polling stations on the proportion of people turned away from polling places or refused a ballot paper, and those who returned and were able to vote data about the number of Voter Authority Certificates or Anonymous Elector's Documents issued In September, we will publish our full report on the May 2023 elections. This report will feature additional data, including the reasons people were turned away (such as having the wrong or no identification) as well as turnout, postal voting and rejected ballots. It will also provide analysis on other aspects of the elections, including accessibility support that was provided for voters in polling stations for example. We will also publish a separate report about the local elections taking place on 18 May in Northern Ireland in September. Greeters at polling stations We're aware that staff acting as greeters may be used in some polling stations to welcome voters, remind them about the need to show photographic ID, and help speed up the voting process. The Elections Act and the Voter Identification Regulations 2022 require polling station staff to collect data on the people that cannot be issued with a ballot paper because they were unable to provide an accepted form of ID. This includes data on people who are turned away and later return to the polling station with accepted ID. This information can only be recorded at the ballot issuing desk, and not gathered by a greeter at the entrance. The presence of a greeter at a polling station is likely to affect the data recorded at the desk. For this reason, local authorities will need to separate out data for polling stations with and without greeters when submitting data after the polls. We're experienced at using wider survey work to supplement quantitative data to assess the overall impact of changes to elections. In our reporting on the elections, we will make an assessment of the wider impact of the ID requirements using other types of research. Importantly this will include public opinion surveying across England, asking about people's experiences of voting or trying to vote on 4 May. We will also, as we do each year, survey electoral administrators, campaigners and electoral observers.

- Our place in the regulatory environment
- Delivering outcomes in practice
- Where do we go from here? The Board discussed how resources were allocated to deliver the agreed strategic approach for regulatory work. The Board also discussed the way the political finance regime was based on self-reporting by political parties of declared donations and spending, and the importance of transparency for scrutiny of this. The Board thanked the Director, Regulation and the team for work done, focussing on continued diligence, open and transparent work.

Home Transparent digital campaigning On this page Summary Recommendations The rise of digital campaigning Our role in regulating digital campaigns Who runs digital ads? Spending Who pays for digital campaigns? Enforcing the rules First published: 1 June 2018 Last updated: 9 June 2021 Summary We want to improve voter confidence that digital campaigns are following the rules. We've made recommendations for the UK's governments and legislatures, social media companies and campaigners to follow. These recommendations increase the transparency of digital campaigns. They will help prevent foreign funding of elections and referendum campaigns. And they will give us the power to impose higher fines on campaigners who break the rules. This will be a greater deterrent to those who may be tempted to break them.

Recommendations Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should:

- change the law so that digital material must have an imprint saying who is behind the campaign and who created it
- amend the rules for reporting spending and make campaigners sub-divide their spending returns into different types of spending. These categories should give more information about the money spent on digital campaigns
- clarify that spending on election or referendum campaigns by foreign organisations or bodies is not allowed.

They would need to consider how it could be enforced and the impact on free speech.

increase the maximum fine we can sanction campaigners for breaking the rules, and strengthen our powers to obtain information outside of an investigation

Social media companies should:

- work with us to improve their policies on campaign material and advertising for elections and referendums in the UK
- label adverts about elections and referendums on their platforms to make the source clear
- make sure their political advert databases follow the UK's rules on elections and referendums

s should:

- be required to provide more detailed and meaningful invoices from their digital suppliers to improve transparency.
- We will make proposals to campaigners and each of the UK's governments about how to improve the rules and deadlines for reporting spending.
- We want information to be available to voters and us more quickly after a campaign, or during.

The rise of digital campaigning Good campaigns that communicate with voters are central to well-run elections and referendums. When campaigners clearly explain their policies and political views, voters are better able to exercise their right to vote in a meaningful and informed way.

In the UK, the evidence shows campaigners are increasingly using new ways of communicating to reach voters. In particular, they often use advertising services bought from digital and social media companies like Facebook, Google, YouTube, Snapchat, Twitter or Instagram.

The chart below shows that the proportion of money campaigners have reported spending on digital advertising has continued to increase during this decade.

Chart 1: Reported spending by campaigners on digital advertising as a percentage of total advertising spend

In 2011, spending by campaigners on digital advertising was 0.3% of total spend. This increased to 1.7% in 2014, 23.9% in 2015, 32.3% in 2016, and 42.8% in 2017.

Further information about the digital campaign spending chart

This chart shows spending that campaigners reported in their statutory spending returns for:

- UK general elections in 2015 and 2017
- Scottish Parliament elections in 2011 and 2016
- National Assembly for Wales elections in 2011 and 2016
- Northern Ireland Assembly elections in 2011, 2016 and 2017
- EU referendum in 2016
- Scottish Independence referendum in 2014
- Referendum on changing the UK's voting system in 2011

But this chart doesn't show the full picture of digital advertising at elections and referendums. It only contains spending data for the most well-known

digital platforms, which registered campaigners have reported to us. Advertising is not the only way campaigners communicate with voters on social and digital media. s can also ‘like’, ‘share’ and ‘post’ messages for free and potentially reach wide audiences. Digital campaign tools can make it easier and cheaper for legitimate campaigners to communicate with voters. It is a sign of a healthy democracy when campaigners tell voters about their policies and political views. However, we recognise that new techniques for reaching voters could reduce confidence in the integrity of elections and referendums. People may think the law doesn’t cover new techniques. These techniques can also be misused. For example, it could be easier for foreign individuals or regimes to try to influence voters online without any physical presence in the country. UK-based campaigners may also try to get round limits on spending through hidden digital activity. The rise of digital campaigning raises important issues for a number of regulators and organisations, as well as us. The Information Commissioner is investigating the use of personal data and analytics by political campaigns, parties, social media companies and other commercial organisations. Within the UK Parliament, the Digital, Culture, Media and Sport Select Committee is continuing its inquiry into the impact of ‘fake news’ on modern democracy. Governments and legislators have expressed concerns about the wider misuse of digital communications in many countries. In the UK, the Prime Minister, Head of the Security Service and the Attorney General have all highlighted the risks of foreign governments mounting cyber espionage and disruption campaigns in the UK. This is not limited to interference in elections and is part of wider attempts to cause disruption. Voters, campaigners and law enforcement agencies have raised concerns about disruption, interference and misuse of digital campaigns at recent elections and referendums in the United States, France, Germany and Ireland. Legislators in the United States, France and the UK have set out proposals for statutory regulation of digital campaigns, and social media companies have begun to publish their own proposals for reform. These concerns have fed into a wider debate about reform of the rules for social media and digital communications, both here in the UK and in other countries around the world. Following its Internet Safety green paper, the UK Government has set out its Digital Charter, a programme of work to agree and put into practice norms and rules for the online world. It aims to ensure that the rights people have offline are protected online. This includes “limiting the spread and impact of disinformation intended to mislead for political, personal and/or financial gain”. Our role in regulating digital campaigns We have been looking at the risks and the challenges that digital campaigns bring to the UK’s election and referendum rules. As the regulator, our main role in this area is to monitor and enforce the rules about where the money behind campaigns comes from and how campaigners spend money. This includes money spent on digital campaigns intended to influence UK voters. We talked to political parties after the 2017 UK general election and looked at spending returns from campaigners at other recent elections and referendums. We have talked to the main social media companies that work in the UK. We have carried out research with the public to find out what they think about digital campaigns. The UK Parliament has given us a role to report on elections and referendums, to keep electoral law under review and to recommend changes where we think they’re needed. The Scottish Parliament and Government are responsible for Scotland-only elections. The Welsh Government and National Assembly for Wales are responsible for Wales-only elections. We work with all relevant governments on the changes to electoral law they are responsible for. This is why some of our recommendations are for each of the UK’s governments and legislatures, not just the UK Government and Parliament. A quote from

GfK on digital campaigning There was acknowledgement from some that although people may approach online messages with scepticism, there was a risk that unverified information could still have an influence to some degree. There was an acceptance that the nature of digital campaigns made it difficult to discern the source of all the materials that they receive. GfK, Political finance regulation and digital campaigning: a public perspective Who runs digital ads? Recommendation Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should change the law so that digital material must have an imprint saying who is behind the campaign and who created it. How campaigners use digital ads s use digital platforms to campaign during an election or referendum. These campaigners range from registered political parties to individual campaigners. Political parties must register with us to stand candidates in elections. Non-party campaigners and referendum campaigners that want to spend over a certain amount must also register with us. Only people who live in the UK or are registered to vote here, or organisations based here, are able to register. Who is behind online campaigns? Who is behind online campaigns? Printed campaign material must contain information about who is behind the campaign and who created the materials. Voters can see who is distributing this material by looking at the imprint on it. We have a role in ensuring that these rules on including an 'imprint' on campaign material are followed. But we don't regulate the other content or arguments used in campaign material. It may not be clear who is behind an online campaign because the law doesn't require campaigners to include an imprint on digital material. It may not be clear that something on social media is from a campaigner as social media posts can appear to come from individuals expressing their personal opinions. s can purchase 'bots' and pay people to spread their campaign messages, and this is misleading if voters cannot see that this has happened. A bot is an automated software program that mimics human behaviour on social media by posting, liking and talking to real people. A 'troll' is a real person who spends time on websites and social media posting divisive or irrelevant messages and comments to annoy or anger other people. Organisations or individuals can set up fake social media accounts. They pretend these accounts are held by real people and attempt to sway opinion by posting messages or liking and sharing the messages of others. Sometimes campaigners in other countries pay trolls to spread their messages and attack their opponents. The press has reported on instances of governing parties in other countries using bots, fake accounts and paid trolls to 'amplify' campaign messages when they are standing for re-election. This creates the appearance of grassroots support – a phenomenon known as 'astroturfing'. The aim is to make a campaign appear popular with the public. But the support isn't genuine because it hasn't come from real people. The party has manufactured it and paid money for it. Several academic research projects have looked at the use of bots and fake accounts to amplify campaign messages during the EU referendum and US election campaigns in 2016. Although they have identified that there were active networks of both bots and fake accounts during and after these campaigns, it's not clear how or if they affected the outcome. We do not think that there is anything wrong with campaigners using bots to post messages telling voters about their policies and political views. But it should be clear who is doing it. Similarly we do not think there is anything wrong with campaigners telling their staff to post campaign messages. But these forms of campaigning are a problem when they are used to deceive voters about a campaigner's identity or their true level of support, or used to abuse people. Imprints on digital material Imprints on digital material We have been recommending since 2003 that online campaign material should include an imprint. s would then have to identify who they are so that it is clear who is campaigning. We currently advise campaigners to include an imprint, even though it is not required under law. This could include posts made by bots and paid trolls. Although posting on social media is free, it costs money to employ people and acquire bots. These costs count towards a campaigner's spending limit for an election or referendum. A campaigner who doesn't include an imprint would run the risk of a fine. Imprints on digital campaign messages would also help us enforce the spending rules. This is because we would have a better idea who may need to register and submit a spending return after an election or referendum. It was a legal requirement at the Scottish independence referendum for digital material to have an imprint. Overall it worked fairly well. There were some questions about what kinds of digital material the law applied to, including personal opinions. We can learn from this experience when considering any new requirement. The UK Government has said it will consult on whether to change the law so that digital material has to have an imprint. This consultation will be a good opportunity to hear from campaigners and others about how the new rules could work.

One of the main concerns about online information is whether it's true. During election and referendum campaigns, this concern applies to both the content of digital campaign material and the news that appears in voters' social media feeds. Fake news was a cause of considerable concern during and after the US presidential election. Our research with the public showed that they were less trusting of online materials. They were concerned about both the content and source. They considered that the internet gave less credible sources a greater ability to mislead people and spread false information. They viewed fake news as a spectrum from entirely false stories to real news that was distorted to fit a political agenda. We are not in a position to monitor the truthfulness of campaign claims, online or otherwise. However, changing the law so that digital material has to have an imprint will help voters to assess the credibility of campaign messages. Voters will know who the source is and be more able to decide how credible it is.

The role of others

The law does not require claims in campaign material to be truthful or factually accurate. But it is a crime to make or publish a false statement of fact about the personal character or conduct of a candidate. Campaign material must not incite others to commit crimes. The police investigate such allegations. The UK Statistics Authority can complain to campaigners if it thinks they have misused official statistics in their campaign material. The Advertising Standards Authority oversees campaign adverts about some political subjects, but does not have a role in election or referendum campaigns. The Committee on Standards in Public Life recently held an inquiry into intimidation in public life. It recommended that political parties should develop codes of conduct about intimidatory behaviour. We think that campaigners should also take more responsibility for the tone of their arguments and the claims they make in their campaign material. The Information Commissioner is responsible for the rules about how organisations in the UK use personal data. They are looking at how campaigners, social media companies and others use personal data for political purposes. We expect that the Information Commissioner will report later this year on whether campaigners need to change how they use voters' personal data. We will work with the Commissioner to give campaigners guidance to help them make any changes.

Spending on digital campaign activity

Recommendations should be required to provide more detailed and meaningful invoices from their digital suppliers to improve transparency. Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should amend the rules for reporting spending. They should divide their spending returns into different types of spending. These categories should give more information about the money spent on digital campaigns UK election and referendum adverts on social media platforms should be labelled to make the source clear. Their online databases of political adverts should follow the UK's rules for elections and referendums Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should change the law so that campaign-related staff costs are included in the spending limits on political party election and referendum campaign spending We will make proposals to campaigners and each of the UK's governments about how to improve the rules and deadlines for reporting spending. We want information to be available to voters and us more quickly after a campaign, or during it We and the UK's governments and legislatures should look again at when the spending and funding controls should start to apply before a referendum Reporting spending on campaigning to us UK electoral law sets limits on the amount of money that campaigners can spend on campaign activity during the regulated period before elections and referendums. The regulated period is the period in which the spending rules apply. Money spent on digital campaigning carried out during that period counts towards campaigners' spending limits. For example, the regulated period lasts 12 months before a UK Parliament election and four months before a Scottish Parliament election. The regulated period before the EU referendum was ten weeks. Registered political parties, non-party campaigners and referendum campaigners must send details of their spending to us after the election or referendum. Candidates have to submit a spending return to the local election Returning Officer. We publish details about the spending on our website. Transparency of digital political advertising Transparency of digital political advertising s can use digital and social media tools to direct their messages to the people they most want to reach. s use the personal data they and social media platforms have to target voters. They target voters based on demographic factors like age and gender, on their interests and on their physical location. This is often called 'micro-targeting' because campaigners are able to send messages tailored to specific groups of voters based on this information. They can also adjust the messages they send very rapidly, to take account of what seems to work best with particular groups or individuals. Only the voter, the campaigner and the platform know who has been targeted with which messages. Only the company and campaigner know why a voter was targeted and how much was spent on a particular campaign. This is why the term 'dark ads' has been used to describe micro-targeting, although it is perfectly legal. People in our recent research said that targeted messages from campaigners could be helpful if it meant they got information that was more relevant and interesting to them. But they were worried about how their personal data had been gathered and used. They also said that they would be worried about targeted messages that spread false or misleading information. Other concerns have been raised about the transparency of spending on and targeting of digital political advertising as well. The UK's election rules set spending limits to stop campaigners being able to spend so much more money than their opponents that they would gain an unfair advantage. As part of this, campaigners must report how much they have spent to produce and send targeted messages to voters using digital channels. This includes messages targeted at specific groups of people in a particular constituency. Political parties should report the costs of many kinds of messages at elections. But if messages promote a particular candidate, the rules may require the candidate to report the cost of those messages instead. These rules do not work properly if candidates and political parties do not report the money they spend on targeted messages against the right limit. We want to check that campaigners have properly reported the money they spend against the right limit. It would be helpful if the law said campaigners have to include an imprint on all their digital campaign material. More detailed invoices More detailed invoices It would help us if campaigners' invoices showed the detail of which groups of people they targeted with digital adverts. Although spending over £200 needs to be supported by an invoice, the law is not clear on the level of detail that should be included in the invoice. Some invoices contain very little detail, making it difficult or impossible to know what the money was spent on and where. For example, campaigners have given us invoices from Facebook which say only "campaign 1, campaign 2". However, other campaigners have given us more meaningful detail. Their invoices show the text of the campaign messages sent to voters or information about the area of the country they were targeted at. It should be required to provide invoices from their suppliers which contain more meaningful information about the details of their campaigns. This should include the messages used in those campaigns, which parts of the country they were targeted at, and how much was spent on each campaign. Revising the spending categories Revising the spending categories Spending on campaign activity is declared to us under broad categories such as 'advertising'. There is no specific legal category for digital campaigning. We can see from our records that different campaigners have declared it under different spending categories, but mostly as advertising. We recommended after the 2015 UK Parliament general election that the spending categories should be revised to provide more useful information about what campaigners have spent money on. This has not been acted on so far, but would be a valuable additional tool to track and check the spending on digital campaigning. We think it could be too simplistic to add a new 'digital' category alongside the existing ones. The existing categories focus on types of communication with voters, including 'unsolicited material to electors' or 'advertising' or 'events'. If a category was introduced for 'digital spending', it might displace all of that spending into one large category based on how it was done. The information would not be easy to use and it would not increase transparency. Instead, it would be better to create sub-categories to record what medium or format was used for the activity. The solution needs to be practical for campaigners to report their spending. It also needs to provide meaningful information for everyone who uses it. Database of political adverts Database of political adverts Social media companies have started to set out how they could make political adverts more transparent. Facebook, Google and Twitter have said that they will make sure that campaigners who pay to place political adverts with them will have to include labels showing who has paid for them. They also say that they plan to publish their own online databases of the political adverts that they have been paid to run. These will include information such as the targeting, actual reach and amount spent on those adverts. These companies are aiming to publish their databases in time for the November 2018 mid-term elections in the United States. Some of them also published data ahead of the May 2018 referendum in Ireland. Facebook has said it aims to publish similar data ahead of the local elections in England and Northern Ireland in May 2019. 'Who targets me?' is a citizen-led project which Sam Jeffers and Louis Knight-Webb set up shortly before the 2017 UK Parliament general election. They created software that voters could install on their web browsers. It tracked the political adverts they saw. The project recommended that social media companies publish all the adverts they run on a central website. Some organisations like the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising also support creating a central public register of online political adverts, rather than leaving it to the social media companies themselves. We welcome the intention of each of these proposals. Databases like these would bring greater transparency for voters. They would also make it easier for us to enforce the spending rules. We would be able to see what adverts a campaigner has taken out and how much they paid. For example, if we could see that certain campaigners are targeting adverts to the same voters, it could indicate that they are working together. We expect the social media companies to make sure that their new databases of political adverts reflect the UK's election and referendum rules, and provide meaningful information for us and for voters. We want all the major social media companies that run election adverts in the UK to make sure they create such databases. We expect them to discuss with us whether they can publish their data in the same format. Paid-for adverts and organic reach Paid-for adverts and organic reach Digital campaigning costs campaigners money if they pay companies like Facebook to target their messages at voters. However, campaigners can also spread their messages for free by encouraging their supporters to share them with their friends and family. This is called 'organic' reach. Media reports claim that the Labour Party and Momentum did this effectively during the 2017 general election campaign. The current rules for election and referendum campaigns focus on the money campaigners spend. They don't cover the organic reach campaigners can harness. For example, the rules would cover the costs of targeting an advert or message at a campaigner's online supporters. But there would be no additional costs if the supporters share the message further with their online contacts. This can be particularly effective if messages have humorous or otherwise striking content. Some people might think that it is unfair if some campaigners have greater organic reach than others. But it could also give campaigners an incentive to attract more supporters to broaden their organic reach. In this respect digital campaigning is not different from more traditional forms of campaigning, where some campaigners are more effective than others. We consider that getting more voters to participate in election and referendum campaigns is good for those campaigns and for democracy itself. The current rules were developed in 2000. At that time, it was more difficult to spread messages widely and cheaply through organic reach. s now depend less on spending money for paid adverts to reach some voters directly. But money is still needed to make and manage databases of supporters and target the messages which can build organic reach. It will be important to keep considering whether it is enough to regulate the money that campaigners spend at elections and referendums. There is a question about whether the UK should regulate campaigning at elections and referendums in different ways. Unregulated spending on staffing Unregulated spending on staffing The money that political parties and referendum campaigners spend on staff they directly employ to work on their election and referendum campaigns doesn't count towards their spending limits. But it does count towards non-party campaigners' and candidates' spending limits. We held meetings with several political parties and a registered non-party campaigner after the 2017 UK Parliament general election to discuss how they used digital campaigning and social media as part of their campaigns. All of them told us that they had their own permanent staff working on their digital campaigns, and all took on additional staff or consultants for the election. All of the parties told us that digital was an increasingly important aspect of their campaigns. We have recommended since 2013 that the costs of directly employed staff working on election and referendum campaigns should count towards political parties' and referendum campaigners' spending limits. This would close an obvious gap and inconsistency in the rules that allows political parties and referendum campaigners to spend potentially large sums of money on campaigning without having to declare them. It would also make it more transparent how much campaigners spend on digital campaigning. Improving understanding about regulated spending Improving understanding about regulated spending The UK's election rules cover the most important costs of campaigning, but some journalists and commentators seem unsure about which costs are covered. The rules cover the costs of distributing and targeting digital campaign materials or developing and using databases for digital campaigning. This applies even if the original purchase of hardware or software materials falls outside the regulated period for reporting spending.

Spending limits and rules to report spending apply to campaign spending on advertising. The same rules apply whether campaigners use long-standing techniques, such as printed mailshots or billboards, or newer ones, such as emails and online adverts. Statutory codes about election spending Statutory codes about election spending We are currently drafting statutory codes of practice for political parties and candidates. The codes are intended to add clarity and give examples about how the law applies to different kinds of spending. The draft codes outline how campaigners should report digital campaigning and use of data. We are preparing these codes for the UK Parliament to approve, so that there will be statutory guidance for campaigners about how the law on election spending. The Scottish and Welsh Governments are also interested in introducing codes for elections in Scotland and Wales. We aim to have them approved in time for the next major elections in 2021 and 2022. We are planning to consult on the statutory codes on election spending in the latter part of 2018. We encourage a wide range of responses to improve the draft Codes before they are presented to legislators. When and how we receive spending information When and how we receive spending information s that spend under £250,000 have three months after an election or referendum to submit their spending returns to us. s that spend £250,000 or more have six months. This is a long time after the campaigns have finished. During this time, voters have no information about how much money campaigners spent, or what they spent it on, to influence the result. Members of the public who took part in our research thought that submitting spending returns after a campaign was too late. Some thought that campaigners should have to report their spending during a campaign. Currently, campaigners can choose to submit their returns to us electronically or on paper. If we receive paper records, we have to use resources on data entry and that delays publication. It takes more time to check information in the paper spending returns and cross-check it with other information we hold before we can publish it. Voters should be able to see how campaigners have spent their money as soon as possible after an election or referendum while it is still a live issue. Earlier deadlines for campaigners to submit their spending returns would make it easier for voters to understand this. If campaigners had to submit electronic records to us, it would also mean that we could identify any possible problems more quickly after the election or referendum. When the spending and funding rules apply to campaigners When the spending and funding rules apply to campaigners UK electoral law sets limits on the amount of money that campaigners can spend on campaign activity during the regulated period before elections and referendums. The period of time when spending rules apply has been different for several referendums. For the Scottish independence referendum, the spending controls applied for 16 weeks. For the EU referendum it was ten weeks. There were also different lengths of time between the legislation for the referendum being passed and the spending rules coming into effect. s may use this gap to spend large sums of money that don't count towards their spending limits. There are similar issues about when the funding rules start to apply and whether campaigners can use this gap to raise money that is not covered by the rules. Who pays for digital campaigns?

Recommendations Social media companies should put in place new controls to check that people or organisations who want to pay to place political adverts about elections and referendums in the UK are actually based in the UK or registered to vote here. Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should clarify that spending on election or referendum campaigns by foreign organisations or individuals is not allowed. They would need to consider how it could be enforced and the impact on free speech. The UK Government and Parliament should make clear in law that campaigners cannot accept money from companies that have not made enough money in the UK to fund the amount of their donation or loan. The UK Government and Parliament should consider with us how to improve the controls on donations and loans to prevent foreign money being used in UK politics. Approaches for enhanced due diligence and risk assessment could be adapted from recent money laundering regulations. The UK Government and Parliament should amend the law so that all new parties and referendum campaigners with assets or liabilities over £500 have to submit a declaration that includes an estimate of the costs the campaigner has invested in buying or developing the data they hold when they register. Rules on spending at elections and referendums. Rules on spending at elections and referendums. The UK Parliament made rules so that only those with a real interest in the UK's politics can use their money to influence voters.

The only groups that can give money to parties or campaigners, or register as non-party campaigners are people who live in the UK or are registered to vote here, or organisations based here. But global digital communication tools are challenging these rules. Preventing spending from outside the UK. Preventing spending from outside the UK. Registered campaigners in the UK have been open about their use of digital campaigns to reach voters. However, anyone outside the UK can also pay for adverts on digital and social media platforms to target voters in the UK. This means that people who are not allowed to register as campaigners can still spend money to influence voters in the UK. This could be from foreign nation states or from private organisations and individuals. Although there is a general principle that funding from abroad is not allowed, the rules do not explicitly ban overseas spending. The UK's rules set minimum amounts for campaign spending before people or organisations have to register as a non-party campaigner. This means that a foreign individual or organisation that spends under these amounts would not have broken any specific electoral laws in the UK. These rules were meant to reduce the risk of too much spending by non-party campaigners and bring more transparency, while not limiting free speech. At the time when the rules were made in 2000, the UK Government and Parliament were worried about foreign donations to political parties. They had not seen the potential for foreign sources to directly purchase campaign advertising in the UK. The UK Government and security services have recently set out their view on foreign interference. They said that foreign sources are likely to have tried to disrupt and interfere with UK election and referendum campaigns using digital and social media tools. Academic research has also started to show that foreign sources appear to have carried out some social media activity in the UK. The current evidence available to us does not suggest that this has taken place in the UK on the scale alleged at the 2016 US Presidential election. We will continue talking to the UK Government and security services about any more evidence if it comes out. In any case such activity is unacceptable. The Government has informed us that it "is alert to the threat of subversion and other means of seeking to manipulate the electoral process or undermine democratic institutions". Facebook, Google and Twitter have said that they will put in place new controls to check that people or organisations who want to pay to place political adverts about elections in the United States are actually based there. We would like to see similar controls introduced for elections and referendums in the UK. A specific ban on any campaign spending from abroad would further strengthen the UK's election and referendum rules. Digital and social media companies' own controls would be one set of tools to stop foreign spending on digital advertising or promotion. The UK would need to look carefully at the practical and legal implications of a ban on any campaign spending from abroad. This includes how a ban could be enforced and the impact on free speech. It should also look at the impact on UK citizens who live abroad who are registered to vote at UK elections and referendums. This includes changes that have been proposed in a Bill to the UK Parliament to allow any UK citizen living abroad to register to vote in the UK.

Preventing company funding from outside the UK Preventing company funding from outside the UK Companies that are registered in the UK or a European Union member state and that are carrying on business in the UK can give or lend money to campaigners in the UK. These companies can also register as campaigners. Companies do not have to show that they have made enough money in the UK to give or lend to campaigners. This means that campaigners could receive money which originally came from outside the UK. This could include goods or services that companies give to campaigners as a gift or at a discount, including digital campaign services. In 1998 and 2011, the Committee on Standards in Public Life said foreign companies should not be able to use subsidiaries in the UK just for the purpose of giving money to campaigners. Companies should show that they had made enough money in the UK to give or lend to campaigners. In 2013, we recommended that the UK Government and Parliament should look at whether the rules were strong enough to stop campaigners using money that comes from outside the UK. We said the rules should reflect more closely the Committee on Standards in Public Life's recommendation. We repeated this recommendation in our report on the 2016 EU referendum. The UK Parliament has not changed these rules yet, but the UK Government has said it will discuss it with us.

Improving controls on donations and loans Improving controls on donations and loans It would also help to look at other ways to improve the controls on the money that campaigners accept. The UK's money laundering rules require businesses to take steps to make sure that money does not have any obvious link with criminal activity. The UK Government updated these rules in 2017. We think that some of the tools that businesses use for risk assessment and due diligence on customers could also be considered as part of the rules for campaigners at elections and referendums in the UK. These kinds of changes could help to make sure that foreign money is not used in UK election and referendum campaigns, including in digital campaigns. New campaigners' assets and data New campaigners' assets and data The rules on donations and loans only apply to campaigners after they have registered with us. The rules do not require transparency about money or assets that campaigners have before they register. Even after a party has registered, the deadline for submitting the first statement of accounts may be 18 months away. These accounts provide information about a new party's finances. But the rules mean that voters and other campaigners will not have information about a campaigner's early financial position. It also means we have less information to plan and focus our monitoring and other regulatory work.

We recommended in 2013 that all new parties should submit a declaration of assets and liabilities over £500 upon registration. We also think that this requirement should apply to all referendum campaigners who have to register with us. Datasets and databases are an increasingly valuable asset for running targeted election campaigns. The declaration should include an estimate of the costs the campaigner has invested in buying or developing the data they hold when they register. Enforcing the rules

Recommendations Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should increase our powers to obtain information outside of an investigation Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should increase our powers for information sharing with other agencies when it is in the public interest Each of the UK's governments should increase the maximum fine we can sanction campaigners for breaking the rules Each of the UK's governments and legislatures should give us powers to investigate and sanction candidates for breaking the candidate rules Social media companies should work with us to improve their policies on campaign material and advertising for elections and referendums in the UK The law on funding and spending at elections and referendums UK electoral law sets requirements relating to funding and spending for election and referendum campaigns. There are criminal offences for not complying with the rules. As the regulator of political finance, we have powers to investigate breaches of the rules. We can impose a monetary penalty known as a civil sanction. The police can also investigate suspected breaches of the rules and refer cases for criminal prosecution in a court. Increasing our powers to obtain information Increasing our powers to obtain information Digital campaigning materials can be distributed instantaneously to large target audiences. It can have an immediate effect on an election or referendum campaign. It is therefore important that we are able to look into concerns about a campaign. We want to do this in 'real-time', as well as after a vote. We have wide powers to get evidence when we are investigating whether an offence has already been committed. Most of the offences we can investigate are about reporting to us. This can reveal issues about a campaigner's spending or funding during a campaign. By the time we receive the reports, the campaign has been over for months. Our preferred approach is to prevent the rules being broken, or to put a matter right as quickly as possible. Our powers are more limited where we need to make enquiries outside of an investigation. We may need to request information from suppliers of digital campaigning tools about the identity of the originating account. Or we may request that parties and campaigners provide rapid answers to our questions about the digital activity. Our statutory powers to compel the provision of evidence cover all organisations and individuals that are regulated under the law – including registered campaigners. However, our powers outside an investigation only cover material related to income and expenditure. Our powers do not extend to third parties such as suppliers of digital platforms. We recommend that our powers to compel the provision of documents, information and explanation outside of an investigation should be extended. We should have the power to request information from any person who may hold relevant material. The Information Commissioner recently asked for similar powers and the UK Parliament gave them to her organisation. If we had this power, we could make suppliers of digital services or platforms provide relevant information that they hold. This change would make things faster when we assess concerns that we identify or when allegations are made to us. It would also help us when gathering information about a campaign that involves a number of different campaigners and suppliers. Improving our powers to help enforce other laws Improving our powers to help enforce other laws Our main role is to ensure campaigners comply with the political finance rules. Sometimes we have information that relates to compliance with other legal frameworks, such as data protection law. However, it is not always clear whether we are able to share that information with the relevant regulator or law enforcement body. We have a clear power to share information that relates to electoral law matters with relevant bodies. But we are reliant on others' powers to allow us to share information that does not relate to our legal functions. This gap in our powers to share information applies both within and outside UK. Fortunately, for matters of data protection, the Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) has a power that enables us to provide and receive information relating to its functions. Without that we would not have the power to pass information relating to breaches of data protection to the ICO. However, the power relies on us having to determine that the information is necessary for the ICO's functions. This could slow down our ability to refer relevant information in future. We would prefer a general power enabling us to share information with other regulators or law enforcement bodies where we think it is in the public interest to do so. This would enable us to refer information more proactively where needed and streamline our processes. Strengthening our powers to enforce the rules Strengthening our powers to enforce the rules The maximum fine we can impose for breaking the UK's political finance rules is £20,000 for each offence. We have previously said that this is too low. s spend millions of pounds at UK elections and referendums, including on digital campaign activities. We are worried that a maximum fine of £20,000 risks becoming a cost of doing business for some campaigners. This penalty does not provide an effective deterrent to stop campaigners committing offences. Where offences have already taken place, this penalty is not proportionate to the impact that many of the offences could have. This is particularly the case when campaigners are not established political parties, for example in the context of a referendum. These campaigners may be less concerned about damaging their image or reputation in the future. We want the UK's governments and legislatures to change the law which limits our maximum fine. There should be a consultation about the level of fine. We think it should be similar to other regulators' fines. Currently, only the police and prosecutors can investigate if they suspect the candidate rules have been broken. We have previously recommended that we should be given powers to investigate breaches of the candidate spending and donation rules at major elections. This would be the same as our responsibility for party and other campaigner spending and donations. This change, and the others we've recommended, would help us find out if candidates and parties are correctly reporting digital spending against their own limits. What digital and social media companies can do What digital and social media companies can do We want digital and social media companies to do more to help improve confidence in digital campaigns. They have already shown that they can help to uphold specific laws in different countries. For example, they have developed tools to help make sure their users do not break copyright laws. They have also shown that it is possible to take action on political adverts. For American elections coming up in autumn 2018, Facebook, Google and Twitter have said they will check whether campaigners are based in the USA. s won't be allowed to if they aren't. We want them to make similar changes to their advertising policies in the UK. This would help improve compliance with the UK's rules before voters even see campaign adverts. Both Facebook and Google made changes to their policies on political adverts before the May 2018 referendum in Ireland. Facebook stopped campaigners outside Ireland from buying referendum adverts, and Google banned all paid adverts about the referendum. s and commentators criticised both companies for making these changes very close to referendum polling day. They did not consult publicly on their plans beforehand. We want digital and social media companies to make sure their policies on political adverts better reflect our election and referendum campaign rules. This could include removing campaign adverts or material that does not show clearly who is responsible for promoting it. It could include social media companies giving us information about campaigners we think have broken the rules. They could also look for campaigners they think have broken the rules and report them to us. We also want to make sure that people in the UK can expect a consistent approach to political adverts from all the companies that operate here, rather than different individual policies from different companies. This means that they need to consult and work closely with us and also with campaigners in the UK. It also means we will need to check whether new companies are developing popular platforms or sites which campaigners are starting to use in the UK in future. We will monitor how well the digital and social media companies' voluntary proposals work at upcoming elections. If the proposals don't work well, the UK's governments and legislators should consider direct regulation.

February 2023 Summary From November 2023, there will be changes that simplify and clarify the offence of undue influence. Undue influence is when someone uses, or threatens to use, force or violence to make someone vote a certain way or not vote at all. These changes will apply to local elections in England, Police and Crime

Commissioner elections in England and Wales, and general elections in the UK including recall petitions. Changes The changes will simplify and clarify the offence of undue influence and will define the types of illegal behaviour used to unfairly influence someone's vote. This should make it simpler for the police to take action when allegations of undue influence are made. This includes the offences of both direct and indirect undue influence, and those taking place both before and after an election. The changes apply to all campaign activity, including printed materials, and would extend to anyone who seeks to intimidate a voter either inside or outside a polling station. There will be an extra sentencing option, in addition to imposing criminal penalties such as a prison sentence or fine, to strengthen the deterrent against the intimidation of candidates and campaigners. This covers hostility towards someone based on their relationship with a campaigner (for example, a family member of the campaigner) as well.

Our role We will support the electoral community by updating our guidance for electoral administrators, and polling station staff, setting out what behaviour is and is not allowed at polling stations. We also run public awareness campaigns ahead of elections. Our ' your vote is yours alone ' campaign, delivered in partnership with Crimestoppers, empowers voters to protect their vote. We provide a range of resources for local authorities to use in the run up to polling day, to help ensure no one feels pressurised to vote in a certain way.

We will update our Code of Conduct for campaigners on what they should consider when campaigning outside polling stations. We will also update our guidance for candidates and agents. We already publish joint guidance with the National Police Chiefs' Council, Crown Prosecution Service, and College of Policing to help candidates recognise and respond to intimidatory behaviour. We will continue, with those partners, to keep this under review and update it appropriately. Related content

Katharine Sparrow, Senior Executive Assistant Update on May polls Bob Posner reminded the Board of the different electoral events that were to take place in May, including the recall petition in Peterborough, the local elections on 2 May, and the European Parliamentary election. He said the organisation had moved to delivery mode and where possible other work had been paused or reprofiled to allow staff to focus on the polls. Directors then provided an update on their team's work in supporting the delivery of these polls. Ailsa Irvine said the recall petition in Peterborough seemed to be going well, and there had been regular contact with the Petition Officer.

Initial anecdotal feedback was similar to North Antrim in that the six week period for signing the petition felt too long. We had sought to collect more data to evidence any recommendations we might want to make on the length of petition periods and other aspects of the process. She also noted there was little in the legislation about the timing of the count, but the result had to be announced within one day of close of the petition, which meant the result was likely to be announced just as people started going to the polls for the local elections. The Board heard that preparations for the local elections were going well and we had engaged with all authorities with elections taking place. Some issues were arising, but they were relatively minor so far. However, compared to previous years, we were receiving significantly more queries from administrators. This was partly due to the higher number of areas with elections than last year, but also to the late change to the legislation around candidate's home addresses on the ballot papers, which had led to a significant number of queries around the nomination process. Ailsa Irvine said the contingency planning we had undertaken through the Events Delivery Steering Group had put us in a good place when preparing for the European Parliament election. We had issued our guidance to administrators at the end of March, and we had also provided additional guidance to authorities with local elections to help them manage the issue of overlapping timetables. The Board was reminded that the administrative structure for the European Parliament elections was different to other elections, with Regional

Returning Officers (RROs) coordinating across 11 electoral areas in Great Britain, and Northern Ireland. There were risks to the delivery of the poll as local authorities were stretched with this poll so close to the local elections, but we were working with the RROs, through our Elections Coordination and Advisory Board

(ECAB), to mitigate the risks and there was nothing currently to suggest the polls wouldn't be delivered successfully. Craig Westwood updated the Board on our public awareness campaigns. The campaign for the local elections had finished on 12 April and early data on applications showed we had exceeded our targets in both England and Northern Ireland, with final numbers to be confirmed. The team had worked swiftly to put together the campaign for the European Parliamentary election and this was now being rolled out, initially on digital channels, to be followed shortly by television. Craig Westwood said the teams had also put work in place for our post poll reporting. He noted we had been able to up-weight our public opinion survey for the local elections which has enabled us to gain more evidence on the Peterborough recall petition. This would help with our reporting and any recommendations we might want to make. Craig Westwood noted that the voter ID pilots had gone ahead and plans were in place to ensure we gathered as much feedback as we could to inform our reporting. The various polls were also generating a lot of media and public affairs enquiries. There was substantial reactive work underway to deal with these enquiries, but we were also taking a proactive approach to help minimise the number of questions. The Board received an update on preparations in the Regulation Directorate. A decision had been taken early in the year to make regulation guidance available and remind campaigners of the regulatory period should the European Parliamentary election be confirmed. Where it seemed appropriate we were now also arranging meetings with political parties and non-party campaigners to ensure they understood the rules. Dan Adamson said campaign monitoring was well underway, including for the first time use of the new social media tools. Our enforcement team would look to intervene quickly where necessary. We were conscious that there were some high profile new parties and some inexperienced candidates. We were therefore thinking about potential issues and what this might mean for the advice that should be given. Turning to budgets, Kieran Rix noted that in normal circumstances the budget for European Parliament elections would have been around £1.4M over two years, but in the current circumstances, we planned to stay within the £686K agreed in our 2018/19 budget. The Board heard that the Executive Team had looked at workloads, and empowered staff to make suggestions about what work could be stopped or rescheduled to give them the capacity to concentrate on the election related work. They were also thinking about staff resilience and what could be done to help support staff through these polls. The Board discussed the various electoral events in more detail. They requested that once both the recall petition in Peterborough and the petition due to commence shortly in Brecon and Radnorshire had closed, our statutory report not only consider recommendations around the length of time and cost and whether petitions could be used to trial other forms of voting, but also address the potential for a more fundamental review of the current framework. The Board requested a discussion on the findings from the voter ID pilots and any recommendations we might make. The Board noted some of the issues coming up around the European Parliament election, including the registration of EU27 citizens (i.e. citizens from the EU except for the UK), security concerns, and any cancellation of the poll. Actions: That a Board discussion be scheduled on the findings of the voter ID pilots, including any recommendations we might make in our statutory report. That our statutory report on the recall petitions in Peterborough and in Brecon and Radnorshire consider recommendations around the length of time and cost, and whether petitions could be used to trial other forms of voting, and address the potential for a more fundamental review of the current framework. Board effectiveness review (EC 25/19) The Chair introduced the item and said it was important the Board scrutinise themselves and the impact they have had over the last twelve months. He noted that the next review of effectiveness would need to involve an external independent facilitator. Bob Posner said that the paper laid out the responsibilities of the Board, its membership, core values, and code of conduct. The paper analysed two aspects of the Board's role as a non-executive body – supervisory and stewardship – and the types of decisions made by the Board. He noted that in 2018, two-thirds of the Board agenda items were supervisory in nature. Further, two-thirds of Board agenda items gave Commissioners the opportunity to contribute to Commission business. The Chair invited Commissioners to think about the impact of the Board on what was happening in the organisation, the balance between support and challenge of staff, whether Commissioners were confident they were receiving the right information, and whether they were spending enough time on substance as well as due diligence issues. Overall the Board were satisfied there were no fundamental problems. However there were a number of areas Commissioners wanted to come back to at future meetings, including: Assurance on robustness of investigations and other key regulatory processes, including an opportunity for the Chair of the Audit Committee to review a completed investigation How diversity in the makeup of the Board might be more of a focus through future recruitment How to deal with England, including the possibility of a Commissioner with some responsibilities for England, and a consideration of the returning officer leadership structures in England assuming the European Parliamentary election regions would be lost Whether there was a need for the Commission to play a greater leadership role to enhance confidence in the electoral system Commissioners should hear more directly from stakeholders on some issues How to make better use of the knowledge and experience of all Commissioners How to assess the performance of Board Committees The annual effectiveness process for the Board and how a review with external facilitation might be carried out, plus an informal mid-year update Actions: That an item be brought to Board to confirm the actions arising from this discussion on Board effectiveness.

Enforcement Policy Investigations Make an allegation Summary Political parties, campaigners, members associations and elected officials such as MPs have to follow the Political Parties, Referendums and Elections Act (PPERA) when spending money or accepting donations and loans . Overview One of the rules means that they have to report spending, donations and loans above a certain amount to us. If they break the rules, we'll investigate and may take action under our enforcement policy . Where a breach involves a criminal offence, but we can't sanction or it's so serious that our sanctions wouldn't be strong enough, we'll pass investigations on to the police or prosecuting authority to take further action. Our governance arrangements Section 12 of our 2022/23 to 2026/27 corporate plan Foreword This five-year Corporate Plan, for the period 2022/23 to 2026/27, replaces and develops our interim plan put in place after the December 2019 UK general election. The Electoral Commission works independent from governments to promote public confidence in the electoral system, ensuring the integrity of elections and the legitimacy of their results. We aim to deliver our responsibilities impartially, ensuring independence of thinking and decision making that can be trusted. We have UK wide responsibilities, are accountable to the UK Parliament, the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd, and our work is directed to meeting the needs of each of the four parts of the UK. Our statutory responsibilities are integral to the electoral system – whether regulating political finance laws; providing oversight, guidance, or support on the delivery of elections; supporting voters to engage with the democratic process with confidence; or providing evidence and insights to inform future improvement. Working with others, we constantly strive to improve the electoral system for the benefit of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators. Elections in the UK are well-run. Our survey work shows very high levels of public satisfaction in the processes in place for voters to register and cast their votes. We also have one of the most transparent systems of political finance in the world. However, there are pressures on the whole electoral system which need our attention. We will continue to seek to remove barriers that deter people from registering or casting their vote. Alongside our ongoing activities to encourage voter registration and protect against electoral fraud, we will work to retain voter confidence in political campaigning as it evolves. We will support parties and campaigners to comply with the law, while continuing to ensure political finance is transparent. We will support local authorities to meet the significant economic, social and environmental challenges they face in delivering well-run electoral services. We will also support electoral administrators to adapt to the increasingly diverse approach to the way elections are delivered, brought about by devolution and the changing needs of voters. During the period of this plan, we will work with others to secure changes in the law and in the operation of the electoral system that will ensure it is resilient to changes in society. Critical to this will be taking on board advances in digital technology, seeking sustainable solutions and improving the coherence and efficiency of how organisations involved in the electoral system work together. Underpinning the plan is the requirement to provide value for money and maintain a well-run organisation. The plan incorporates a renewed focus on equality, diversity and inclusion, and is designed to encourage staff engagement, development of skills and use of the technology required to support effective ways of working and continuous learning and improvement. We look forward to working constructively with governments, parliaments, parties and campaigners, electoral administrators and other interested groups to maintain voter confidence in our electoral system. Report on the May 2022 local elections in England | Electoral Commission Search Report on the May 2022 local elections in England You are in the England local council elections section Home England local council elections Currently reading: of 4 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the elections Campaigning at the elections Delivering the elections Supporting evidence Summary This report looks at how the May 2022 elections in England were run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held in Northern Ireland , Scotland and Wales . On 5 May elections took place in many areas of England, including in all London boroughs. There were also six local mayoral elections and the South Yorkshire combined authority mayoral election. Overall, people were confident that these elections were well-run and were highly satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. Turnout at these elections was broadly consistent with previous elections, although it remains low. Almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper, but we continue to see a small proportion of postal ballot packs rejected. s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and felt able to get their views across effectively. Voters generally found it easy to access information about the elections, but this did not necessarily translate to them feeling well-informed about the elections and who they could vote for. A notable proportion of candidates told us that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. Robust debate is an essential feature of election campaigns, but this must not lead to threats, abuse or intimidation that discourage candidates from standing for election or campaigning. We will work with the UK's governments and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. The pattern of elections was less complex this year than in May 2021, with fewer combinations of elections and unscheduled elections. However, the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern, with staffing and booking venues posing a significant challenge in some areas. The range and scale of changes to be introduced by the Elections Act adds to this concern, with some significant changes intended to be delivered for the first time in England at the May 2023 local elections. Effective implementation will rely on the detailed secondary legislation being in place in time to allow the necessary preparations to be made. Voting at the elections The experience of voters at the May 2022 elections Most people were confident that these elections were well-run and were highly satisfied with the process of registering to vote, and 96% of voters were satisfied with the process of voting. This is consistent with findings from recent elections. Polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person and almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. Almost everyone who voted by post said that they knew how to complete and return their postal vote, and found the postal voting instructions useful. However, we continue to see a small proportion of postal ballot packs rejected. Overview On 5 May 2022, there were elections for local councillors in many areas of England, including in all London boroughs. There was also a combined authority mayoral election in South Yorkshire and six local authority mayoral elections. A total of 22.4 million people across England were registered to vote in these elections. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run After each election we ask members of the public who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections, which helps us understand if views have changed since the last comparable set of elections. Satisfaction with the registration and voting process remains high. People continue to have high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting. Our research shows that: 79% of people in England were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. This is consistent with the levels of satisfaction reported by people after the most recent comparable elections held in 2018. 96% of voters in England were satisfied with the process of voting. This is an increase from 2018 when 90% of people were satisfied. Older age groups are more likely to say that they are satisfied with the process of registering, while people who say that they have been 'limited a lot' by health or disability over the previous 12 months are slightly less likely to be satisfied with registering and with voting. Almost everyone (97%) who voted in person at a polling station felt safe voting with relevant Covid provisions in place. 1% said they felt fairly unsafe while the remaining 2% said they did not know. Most people were confident that the elections were well-run. More than seven-in-10 (73%) people said they were confident that the elections were well-run. Just under one-in-10 (9%) said they were not confident, and people who didn't vote were more likely to say they were not confident the elections were well-run than voters. When we asked people why they were not confident that the elections were well-run, the most commonly chosen reasons were: there wasn't enough information about the candidates (32%), there wasn't enough information about the elections (25%), I did not see any candidates campaigning / canvassing (25%), media / TV / press coverage was biased (23%). Campaigning was based on incorrect information / made untrue claims (21%). Views about the safety of voting and whether electoral fraud is a problem were also consistent with the most recent comparable elections. In 2022, 81% of people in England said they thought voting was safe from fraud and abuse. When asked if they thought electoral fraud was a problem, 19% of people in England said that they thought it was. This is consistent with the 21% who saw it as a problem after the 2018 elections. Concerns were raised before the elections in some areas that voters' rights to a secret ballot could be compromised. It is vital that voters can cast their vote in secret, and anyone attempting to interfere with how a person votes is breaking the law. We work closely with the police and the electoral community to ensure the secrecy of the ballot. Our guidance for Returning Officers and polling station staff makes clear that voters must go to polling booths individually so that their right to a secret vote is protected. We also have a role in raising public awareness; ahead of every election, in partnership with Crimestoppers and the Cabinet Office, we run the 'Your Vote Is Yours Alone' campaign. This targets areas with historic concerns around electoral integrity to empower people to protect their vote and encourage them to report any concerns. In Tower Hamlets, where specific concerns had been expressed about the risk of electoral fraud, the Returning Officer and the police took a range of additional actions to help ensure the secrecy of the ballot at this year's polls. This included assigning an additional member of staff to each polling station to help direct voters individually to polling booths and police officers being on duty at polling stations throughout the day, so that anyone with concerns about intimidation or fraud was able to raise these with the police. We worked closely with them to provide guidance and advice. A range of communications were sent to voters and campaigners, highlighting that everyone must be able to vote in secret and free from intimidation and undue influence. At all polling stations there were prominent posters displayed both outside of polling stations and at the point of issue of ballot papers to reinforce the message that voters must enter the polling booth alone. On polling day, we visited a selection of polling stations and observed a small number of cases where someone tried to go with a voter into the polling booth. We also saw polling station staff stopping this happening, so that voters could cast their vote in secret. An accredited observer organisation, Democracy Volunteers, has reported that their observers 'saw several challenges to the electoral process' and 'once again these focused around the challenge of family voting, where more than one person attempts to vote together in a polling booth, or affect, direct, or oversee the vote of another', concluding that family voting 'continues to be a challenge, despite the many actions taken by polling staff to attempt to prevent it at these elections.'¹ It is completely unacceptable for anyone's vote to be watched or pressured inside a polling station, but concerns remain in this area. We are committed to tackling any such influence, working in partnership with polling station staff and the police. We will continue to work with the electoral community to identify opportunities to enhance our guidance and training for polling station staff to reinforce the importance of secrecy and the actions that should be taken to address any issues that arise on polling day. Throughout the year, all police forces across the UK send us data about allegations of electoral fraud that they receive and investigate. We will publish the full data in the spring, including the number, type, and outcome of any allegations relating to the May 2022 elections. Turnout at these elections was consistent with previous comparable elections Turnout at these elections (33.6%) was broadly consistent with previous comparable elections, although it remains low compared with some other types of elections. Overall, estimated turnout decreased by one percentage point compared to the last time there were comparable elections for district, metropolitan, unitary councils and London boroughs in 2018. There was a larger decline in turnout in elections in London, with a decrease of 3.4 percentage points. The most common reasons given by people who told us that they didn't vote were: lack of time / too busy / I was busy at work (18%) I'm just not interested in politics / fed up with politics (11%) there was no point in voting because it was obvious who would win / my vote wouldn't have made a difference to the outcome / my vote doesn't count (9%) I was away on 5 May / voting day (8%) I didn't like the candidates / parties / they didn't represent my views (7%) People were confident that they could vote using their preferred method In England, people can choose to vote in one of three ways: they can vote in person at their polling station, by post, or by proxy (asking someone they trust to vote on their behalf). If their situation changes close to an election due to work or disability, people can appoint an emergency proxy up to 5pm on polling day. Ahead of the 2021 elections, the law was changed so that anyone who had to self-isolate close to polling day because they had tested positive for Covid, or had been in close contact to someone who had tested positive, could also appoint an emergency proxy. This change remained in place for the 2022 elections in England. People knew that other options were available if they didn't want to vote in a polling station Most people said that they found it easy to find information on how to vote either in person at a polling station or remotely by post or proxy. Our research showed that: 73% of people said they found it easy to get information about the different methods of voting they could choose from 82% of people who voted in a polling station and 84% of people who voted by post said they found it easy to get information about different methods of voting 10% of postal voters told us that these elections were the first time they had voted by post. The most common reasons for choosing to do so were convenience and being too busy to go to the polling station, with most finding it easy to understand how to apply for their postal vote Voting using their preferred method was possible for most voters The majority of people (80.4%) were eligible to vote in person, while 19.5% were sent a postal vote and 0.1% (20,191) appointed a proxy, of which 1,417 were an emergency proxy. This represents a slight increase in the number choosing a postal vote compared to the last time these elections took place in 2018, but is similar to the proportion who did so at the elections in 2021. Most people who voted were able to use their preferred method: 95% of voters said they were able to use their preferred method of voting, compared to 4% who said they were not voters aged under 34 were slightly less likely than other age groups to have used their preferred method to vote, while voters identifying as Black, Asian and Minority Ethnic were less likely than white voters to have voted using their preferred method. Most people were confident they knew how to vote without making a mistake. Nearly all voters said that they found it easy to fill in their ballot paper or to complete their postal vote, but some votes continue to be rejected and not included in the count. Most voters found filling in the ballot paper very easy. Nearly all voters (97%) said that it was easy to fill in their ballot paper, with three-quarters (76%) saying they found it very easy. Only 1% of voters said that they found it difficult. Data from electoral administrators shows that 0.5% of all ballot papers (approximately 39,500) were rejected and not included in the count. The most common reason for ballot papers to be rejected was because they were unmarked, with this accounting for almost three-quarters (72%) of all rejected ballot papers.

Most people who voted by post were confident they knew how to vote without making a mistake. Almost everyone who voted by post said that they knew how to complete and return their postal vote and found the postal voting instructions useful. Our research showed that: 96% said that they found useful the written instructions included with their postal vote on how to vote and return the vote. 96% said it was easy to complete and return their postal vote, compared to 4% who said it was difficult. Data from electoral administrators shows that, in the metropolitan, London borough, unitary and district elections, 2.8% of returned postal votes (approximately 80,000 votes in total) were rejected and were not able to be included in the count. The most common reason for postal votes being rejected was that the personal identifiers (their signature and/or date of birth) that voters provided on the postal voting statement did not match those that they had previously provided to the Electoral Registration Officer. This is the same as the last time these elections took place. Other reasons for postal votes being rejected included where voters did not provide either or both of their personal identifiers, or where the ballot paper or postal voting statement was missing. The Elections Act includes a new requirement for voters to reapply for a postal vote every three years. This may help to ensure that voters' personal identifiers are up-to-date and accurate, and we will monitor whether this change has an impact on the number of rejected postal votes at future elections. We will also continue to explore ways of improving the electoral system to better meet voters' needs. As part of this, we will consider evidence about whether changes to postal voting documents or processes could help to reduce the number of postal ballot packs that are rejected at future elections.

The experience of campaigning at the May 2022 elections felt that they were able to get their views across to voters, using a range of face-to-face, online and printed campaign methods. Traditional campaigning methods (leafletting and canvassing) were the most popular. A notable proportion of candidates responding to our survey said that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. In most cases this involved verbal or online abuse, and the majority of instances came from members of the public. We will work with the UK's governments and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Although voters generally found it easy to access information about the elections, this did not necessarily translate to them feeling well-informed about the elections and who they could vote for. A perceived lack of information also affected people's confidence that these elections were well-run. Transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online remains important for voters. New transparency requirements are expected to come into force for UK Parliament and local elections from the end of 2023. Campaigning at the elections overview More than 15,000 candidates stood for election to local authorities on 5 May 2022. Three quarters of those candidates stood for either the Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat parties, and 15% stood for the Green Party. Candidates standing for other parties represented 7% of the total. A further 3% of candidates were independents who did not stand for any political party. A total of 37 candidates stood for election as directly-elected mayors across the six local authorities where those positions were also contested. There were six candidates for the South Yorkshire combined authority mayoral election. 2 s were able to engage with voters but some raised concerns about intimidation s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and the majority felt able to get their views across effectively. Our research does, however, find that some campaigners raised concerns about intimidation. s used a variety of methods to communicate with voters At the 2022 elections, people continued to receive information about candidates and parties from a range of different sources, and in a variety of formats. The most common ways people reported seeing information on parties and candidates were: leaflet or flyer, either from a candidate / political party (49%) or another source (23%) word of mouth / mentioned by friends / family / carer (12%) social media (generic posts or adverts which did not seem targeted) (10%) newspapers (10%) posters or billboards (10%) I talked to a candidate / candidates directly (10%) Older age groups (65+) were more likely than the youngest age group (18 to 24) to say that they had seen a leaflet or flyer from a candidate or political party, and to say that they had spoken to a candidate or political party. Younger age groups were more likely to mention seeing information on social media. Findings from our survey of candidates were consistent with what voters reported, with traditional campaigning methods (leafletting and canvassing) being the most popular, specifically: over half of the candidates (51%) told us that their most used campaigning method was leaflets, newsletters or flyers, with 90% of candidates saying this was one of their top three campaigning methods door-to-door canvassing was second most popular, with three-quarters (76%) listing it in their top three methods Social media was the most popular digital campaigning tool, compared with targeted emails, website or in-app advertising or other types of digital campaigning. Around a third (35%) of candidates said social media was their third most used campaigning method, although it was primarily used to support more traditional campaigning methods. Free methods of digital campaigning were more popular than paid-for tools with candidates who responded to our survey. We found that: just under two-thirds of candidates (64%) said they posted on social media about their campaign a third (33%) said they asked supporters to share their posts almost a third (31%) said they emailed their supporters only 16% of respondents said that they paid for adverts on social media Most candidates did not experience problems campaigning, but some raised concerns about abuse and intimidation Just under three-quarters of candidates (74%) responding to our survey said that they felt able to get their views across to voters effectively. While not directly comparable, due to the different elections taking place and the sample not being representative of all candidates who stood at the elections, this is an improvement on 2021 when fewer than half of respondents to the survey said this. Due to the improved public health situation, official restrictions on campaign activities were no longer in place, but Covid did continue to affect campaigners. Three-quarters (76%) of candidates who responded to our survey said that Covid affected at least one aspect of their campaign, with a quarter (26%) of respondents saying that it impacted a lot on their ability to enlist volunteers and get assistance with campaigning. When asked about whether they had experienced some kind of problem with threats, abuse or intimidation, more than half of the candidates (60%) told us that they did not have a problem at all. Our research with candidates did highlight some significant concerns about abuse towards campaigners, specifically: two-fifths of respondents (40%) said they experienced some kind of problem, rating this as a 2 or above on a scale from 1 to 5 just under one in 10 (8%) reported having a serious problem (rated 4 or 5 out of 5) nearly a fifth (18%) witnessed threats, abuse or intimidation towards those campaigning on their behalf of those that said they experienced some kind of abuse, the most common sources were verbal (62%) and online (52%), and most reported receiving it from members of the public (71%) one in 10 (10%) of those who said that they experienced threats or abuse told us that these would discourage them from standing as a candidate again in the future Evidence collected by the Local Government Association has also highlighted the democratic impacts of abuse and intimidation, including the impact on local councillors and candidates' willingness to stand for election. 3 This research also found that there is a growing feeling that abuse and intimidation, particularly online, are becoming normalised. The Elections Act 2022 introduces a new electoral sanction for those found guilty of intimidating candidates, campaigners and elected representatives. Banning someone from standing for elected office, as well as imposing criminal sanctions, such as a prison sentence or fine, will strengthen the deterrent against this intimidating behaviour. Robust debate is an essential feature of election campaigns, but this must not lead to threats, abuse or intimidation that discourage candidates from standing for election or campaigning. Recommendation 1: Urgent action needed to prevent abuse and intimidation Recommendation 1: Urgent action needed to prevent abuse and intimidation Urgent action is needed to tackle and prevent abuse and intimidation of candidates and campaigners at elections. Candidates and campaigners should be able to participate freely in the democratic process, ensuring that voters can hear from a range of voices during elections. Tackling these problems will require coordinated action from a range of partners, including central and local government, police forces, social media companies and political parties and campaigners themselves. We will work with the UK's governments and the wider electoral community to understand what is driving abuse and intimidation and to develop effective responses to protect candidates and campaigners at future elections. People want more information about candidates and campaign material Many voters found it easy to find information about these elections, but this did not necessarily mean that they felt they had enough information. Our research also confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections. Most people find it easy to get information but some do not feel well-informed about candidates Our research after the election found that: just under two-thirds of people (64%) said that they found it easy to find information on what the election was about / for a similar proportion (61%) felt that they found it easy to find information on the candidates and parties running for election Although the majority of people asked said they found it easy to find information, this did not necessarily mean that they felt they had enough information. Our research found that: four in 10 (42%) people agreed that that they had enough information on candidates to make an informed choice, but almost a third

(32%) disagreed younger age groups (18-34) were less likely to agree they had enough information to make an informed decision compared to older age groups (65+) non-voters were more likely to say they did not have enough information to make an informed decision, with 46% of non-voters disagreeing that they had enough information, compared to 26% of voters four in 10 (43%) felt they knew what the local elections were about, but three in ten (30%) did not agree There is also evidence that a perceived lack of information affected people's confidence that these elections were well-run. Our research found that many of those who were not confident the elections were well-run said this was because there wasn't enough information about the candidates (mentioned by 32% of people who were not confident) or about the elections more generally (mentioned by 25%). Transparency about who is producing election campaign material is important to build trust Our research after the elections confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections. We found: two-thirds of people (64%) agreed that it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online half (51%) said they would trust digital campaigning material more if they knew who produced it one-in-three (31%) said that they cannot find out who has produced the political information that they see online The UK Government has introduced legislation that will require most campaigners to include information to identify who has promoted or published their online campaign material in future. This new digital imprint requirement will help voters understand who is targeting them online with information at elections and referendums in future. These changes are expected to come into force from the end of 2023. We will monitor any impact of the new digital imprint requirement on people's levels of confidence in political information online. Candidates were able to access strengthened support to understand and comply with election law We increased the opportunities for candidates and parties to access our support to understand and comply with political finance law both before and after the elections. We continue to recommend that candidate nomination requirements should be proportionate to reduce barriers to standing for election. Increasing opportunities for supporting candidates and parties We provide guidance to candidates and agents to help them understand their obligations under political finance laws and campaign with confidence. As part of our commitment to delivering more proactive support for candidates and parties and ensuring those taking part in elections have the right information, we held pre-election webinars to explain the law. The event for candidates and agents in England was attended by 160 people and the feedback was positive, and we received a number of requests for webinars to be held more regularly. We also held virtual advice surgeries that allowed candidates and agents to book an appointment to speak to one of our expert advisers and discuss specific issues around the spending and donation law. Due to the take up and demand, particularly from new and independent candidates, we offered further advice surgeries after the elections and in advance of the reporting deadlines, to provide support with spending returns. Our approach has been informed and led by the evidence and feedback we received in our most recent survey of the regulated community. We will continue to focus on delivering more bespoke advice and guidance resources so that parties and campaigners can easily understand the political finance law, regardless of their size or experience. Candidate nomination requirements should be proportionate To minimise the travel and personal contact involved in completing nomination forms during the Covid pandemic, the Government legislated to reduce the number of subscribers required by candidates to stand in elections in England in 2021. This change did not remain in place for the May 2022 elections. Our survey of candidates at these elections found that most thought the nomination process was clear and well run, with 84% of respondents agreeing that it was easy to get the number of signatures required to secure their nomination. Despite this, some respondents questioned the purpose of having this requirement at all.

"Having to collect 10 signatures seems pretty pointless, it's high enough to be a task that takes time but not high enough to be a barrier to anyone standing (and I don't want any for local elections!)." "I suffer with disabilities meaning that going outside and getting 10 signatures was hard to do. We only needed 2 signatures last time, however, this has gone back up to 10. My agent had to collect the signatures instead. This was a barrier for me as a disabled person wanting to run for council."

Recommendation 2: Review subscriber requirements for nominating candidates

Recommendation 2: Review subscriber requirements for nominating candidates We continue to recommend that the Government should review whether the range of current subscriber requirements are proportionate for different elected offices, taking into account evidence from this year's elections and conclusions from our Standing for Election review in 2015 . This would help to ensure candidates do not face unnecessary barriers to standing for election, giving voters a more diverse range of views to choose from. We are aware the Government intends to introduce legislation to reduce subscriber requirements for local elections ahead of the next scheduled elections in May 2023.

Delivering the elections The experience of electoral administration at the May 2022 elections The pattern of elections was less complex this year than in May 2021, with electoral administrators facing fewer combinations of elections and unscheduled elections. Our evidence indicates that these elections were relatively more straightforward to manage, with fewer issues emerging. However, the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern, with staffing and booking venues posing a significant challenge in some areas. Early clarity on legislative changes remains essential to allow Returning Officers and their teams sufficient time to plan for elections. The Elections Act makes a range of significant changes to how elections are run, and effective implementation will rely on the detailed secondary legislation being in place in time to allow the necessary preparations to be made. We continue to recommend that legislation is clear six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by Electoral Registration Officers or Returning Officers.

Delivering the elections overview Elections took place in 165 local authorities in England with local elections to district council, metropolitan borough and unitary authorities as well as all 32 London boroughs. There were also six local mayoral elections. The South Yorkshire combined authority mayoral election covered four local authority areas, including two which would not otherwise have had elections. Elections were also held in over 1,000 town and parish councils. There were 167 local authorities that did not have elections this year and, compared to 2019 and 2021, the pattern of elections in England this year was less complex, with fewer combinations of elections and unscheduled elections taking place. Local authority elections teams were responsible for delivering electoral registration, nominations, absent voting, polling stations and the counting of votes for the elections. Our evidence shows that these elections were well-run, and voters and campaigners reported high levels of confidence.

However, underlying concerns relating to capacity and resilience remain, and there were a small number of issues that had an impact in some areas. The capacity and resilience of electoral administration teams remains a significant challenge We received feedback from around a quarter of local authorities after the elections.

This relatively low response rate combined with the comments received from electoral administrators suggests that, in comparison with last year, these elections were more straightforward to manage. But the feedback also shows that elections teams still struggled to recruit staff and find suitable venues for polling stations and the count. Reduced complexity helped administrators to run the elections effectively. Alongside the continued effort and commitment of Returning Officers and electoral administrators, the less complex pattern of elections in England this year, with fewer combined polls, appears to have supported the delivery of well-run elections. There were a small number of minor errors with printed materials, but Returning Officers and their teams worked quickly to mitigate these and we will support them in learning any lessons for future polls. However, in one area there was a more significant issue at the count which had the potential to reduce the confidence of candidates, agents and voters in the count process and therefore the result. In the elections to Barnsley Metropolitan Borough Council, a significant number of postal votes were not included in the final result for one ward, which has led us to conclude that the Returning Officer did not meet elements of the performance standards. The issue had no impact on the overall result. The Returning Officer has since commissioned an independent report on the conduct of the election by the Association of s, to help ensure lessons can be learned ahead of future polls. We are also continuing to work with the Returning Officer to support them as they review their election processes. Despite this broadly positive picture, the capacity and resilience of the electoral system remains a concern. The range and scale of changes to be introduced by the Elections Act adds to this concern, with some significant changes intended to be delivered for the first time in England at the May 2023 local elections. We have previously highlighted concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in the UK, which are not helped by the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We will continue to work in partnership with the electoral community, the UK Government and local authorities to develop and deliver proposals to support resilient electoral services. Alongside this, we continue to call on the Government to set out how it will simplify and modernise election law, building on the comprehensive and well-supported recommendations of the UK's Law Commissions. Some Returning Officers struggled to find enough staff to work on polling day and at the count Recruiting staff to work at the elections remained a problem. This was highlighted by many of the electoral administrators responding to our survey. Administrators highlighted problems around finding experienced polling station staff and a high number of recruits dropping out ahead of polling day. While Covid had less of an impact on the administration of elections this year than last, it still remained a factor, despite many of the restrictions required in 2021 being removed. "We had significant numbers of staff not taking up their positions again and this seems to be an increasing problem. We were lucky in that our neighbouring authority did not have elections and loaned us a number of staff. If they had also had elections we'd have been struggling to fill vacancies. We appointed many more Presiding Officers who had had no experience of working in a polling station than we are usually comfortable with" "Staffing was a big issue this year as we are still feeling the effects of the pandemic. A lot of our staff were taking holidays, had hospital appointments etc. that had previously been postponed. We also had around 30 polling station staff that had tested positive the week of the election and so had to pull out" "The delivery of this election was challenging even though Covid restrictions had been removed, with our main issue this year relating to staffing which is expected to present ongoing challenges in future with Elections Act requirements for example staff additional responsibilities and more staff required to work in polling stations" The scale and pattern of elections taking place this year meant that some electoral administration teams could call on neighbouring local authorities for support. But this is not a sustainable long-term solution, particularly at future England-wide or UK-wide elections. The changes being introduced by the Elections Act have the potential to increase the challenge of recruiting and retaining skilled and trained polling station staff for future elections. This is due to the additional responsibilities that poll clerks and Presiding Officers will need to deliver, such as checking the identification of voters. We have formed a sub-group of the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board (ECAB) to discuss and identify solutions to the staffing, resilience and capacity challenges experienced by Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and their teams. An immediate area of focus for the sub-group will be on addressing the challenges of recruitment of polling station staff. Fewer suitable venues were available for polling stations and the count Booking venues for polling stations and the count is another aspect of managing the elections that administrators highlighted as a continuing challenge. In part, this appears to be an ongoing impact of Covid, as some venues have permanently closed while others have increased hire fees. Comments suggest that the problem of securing appropriate venues is also exacerbated by difficulties with booking school buildings. "Schools are continually a problem, with school administrators fighting to not be used as polling stations. Some schools/headteachers are now being deliberately difficult and uncooperative in an attempt to force the Returning Officer away. Where we have to as a result move to either another building or a temporary mobile station, this is at significantly greater cost to the authority." The ability for administrators to be able to access suitable venues is key to ensuring the smooth delivery of the elections and a positive experience for all voters. The changes being introduced by the Elections Act will place additional demands on electoral administrators, as they will have to make sure polling station venues can be made suitable for disabled voters to support them to vote independently and in secret, as well as having space to allow voters to show their ID in private where required. We will continue to work closely with ECAB to explore options for addressing the challenges of finding suitable venues for polling stations and the count. "We are dealing with an ever-decreasing pool of available polling venues. Schools are down to the minimum and churches and other venues are either closing or becoming too expensive. The number of temporary buildings is likely to increase which is a concern in the light of the additional processes required at polling stations under the Elections Act." Early clarity on legislation is essential to support effective planning Early confirmation of legislative changes allowed Returning Officers to plan with certainty for the elections this year. The Elections Act makes a range of significant changes to how elections are run, and effective implementation will rely on the detailed secondary legislation being in place in time to allow the necessary preparations to be made. Legislative changes were made clear in good time to give Returning Officers the certainty they needed In 2021, owing to the uncertainty created by the public health situation, changes were made to nomination processes and emergency proxy rules shortly before the elections. This created additional challenges and risks to the delivery of those elections. In comparison to last year, feedback from administrators about changes to legislation was more positive. Confirmation of the changes to nomination processes and the extension of changes to the emergency proxy vote rules were communicated in good time. "The confirmation that Covid emergency proxy voting arrangements [were] to be extended for 5th May was received in good time.” “[...] Reversion to 10 signatures on nomination papers and continuation of Covid emergency proxies was communicated in good time. [...]” We continue to recommend that the UK Government ensure that legislative changes are clear six months before they are required to be implemented or complied with by Electoral Registration Officers or Returning Officers in order to enable them to plan effectively. This is especially important given the range and scale of changes to be introduced by the Elections Act. Returning Officers need early clarity to be able to deliver significant changes introduced by the Elections Act

Significant new policies from the Elections Act are expected to be delivered for the first time at next year’s local elections in England, including introducing a requirement for voters to show identification before they can vote at polling stations. These will present new challenges for voters, campaigners and electoral administrators in England. There have been significant delays in the development and delivery of the secondary legislation that will set out the detail of how these changes will operate. Both the Commission and the wider electoral community need to undertake preparatory activity, which cannot be done without this detail. We are committed to supporting the effective implementation of voter ID and the other changes introduced by the Elections Act, but it remains vital that they are delivered in a way which ensures accessibility, security and workability. We know that electoral administrators are concerned about the short time now available before the new provisions are due to come into effect – whether they have scheduled polls in May 2023 or not – and that they will need to start taking steps soon to get ready for them. Given these delays, we are concerned about whether the voter ID requirement can be delivered in a way which is secure, accessible and workable, ahead of the next scheduled elections in May 2023 as planned. We are continuing to develop our plans for how we will support electoral administrators to prepare for and deliver the changes. We published some initial planning guidance in August to highlight key areas of planning that electoral administrators can take forward now, even in the absence of the detail on how the provisions will work. This guidance is based on our current knowledge of UK Government implementation plans.

Recommendation 3: Ensure that the electoral community have sufficient clarity and funding to effectively prepare for Elections Act changes

Electoral administrators need clarity and certainty in order to plan and prepare to deliver well-run elections in advance of the important polls that are scheduled to take place during the next two to three years. The UK Government should work with the electoral community to ensure they have clear and accurate information about how and when changes in the Elections Act are going to be implemented. This includes ensuring legislation is clear at least six months before any new changes are due to be implemented, so that Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and electoral administrators have enough time to prepare. The UK Government should also ensure that the changes in the Elections Act are supported with the necessary funding required for the electoral community to be able to continue to deliver well-run elections.

We will measure how well we realise these improvements over the course of our Corporate Plan using a range of indicators for Wales and across the UK. We will use a mix of quantitative and qualitative measures, using them to drive continuous improvements in our procedures and skills. This will include annual and five-year targets against key measures.

The Australian system operates a continuous roll-update with a compulsory voting/registration process. With regard to modernisation and the electoral roll there have been two key changes to the process that have been implemented: Direct enrolment – this has been changed to an opt-out system Registration – online enrolment has been adopted The AEC have a completeness record of 96.3%. The Federal Direct Enrolment & Update (FDEU) process uses trusted data sources to gather information to identify those who should be enrolled and where circumstances may have changed. In response to a question on data security, the AEC advised that they are able to choose which data sources to use, and can therefore pick the most accurate and trusted sources. The AEC work with the Privacy Commissioner to ensure that best practice is followed in relation to privacy and security. The electoral roll is publicly available in local offices. Australia has a “silent voter” system whereby information is suppressed for vulnerable or sensitive members of the electorate, and the AEC do not share data with other agencies. The discussion touched on: The increase in security concerns and whether, in response to this, the AEC would move away from signature on glass to fingerprint recognition. The AEC advised they were looking for opportunities to improve biometric data and mitigate risks around security. Registration addresses, as the AEC confirmed that in the Australian system only one address can be registered. For those with multiple homes, they have to choose their primary address. Queueing at polling stations is a key issue raised by the Australian electorate and the AEC are delivering a project, including development of an app, to help manage queuing. It was confirmed that the AEC has always been responsible for federal elections. Presentation from Peter Wildman – Scottish Assessors Organisation PeW is the ERO and assessor for Central Scotland. The Scottish Assessors Organisation (SAO) is an independent body answerable to Councils and the Scottish Parliament. There are 15 EROs for Scotland. All 15 EROs are members of the Scottish Assessors Association (SAA) and members of the Electoral Administration Committee (SAA ERC). Discussion focused on: The use of paper-based system and move towards online registration and the importance of education records due to the lower voter age (16) in Scotland. Risks around a single register, such as data reliability, consistency and cyber-crime. Resource pressures on local authorities, across the UK, as experienced EROs and ROs retired. In Scotland, training and support opportunities are identified for EROs and ROs to share knowledge and experience. Informal Board discussion AI reflected on the current landscape, and identified key features of how electoral registration works within the UK and highlighted key points from the presentations: online registration has opened up access; levels of registration correlate with electoral events – higher registration rates occur around national elections. Levels of accuracy have increased since transition towards online registration, and commented that further modernisation is required to support many wider reforms to the electoral system. Currently the policy and legislative responsibility for electoral registration rests with the UK Government, with registration for local elections being the responsibility of the Welsh and Scottish governments. Opportunities for change in the UK context are limited due to lack of parliamentary time and lack of appetite for long-term reform so it is likely that success will be achieved through secondary legislation. The canvass pilots test changes to existing canvass requirements focusing on household notification letters, e-mail, phone and data. Initial findings from the pilots suggest that while most changes trialed are less expensive, they are also less effective than the current canvass. Questions focused on what improvements could be made to the accuracy of data, and TH commented that recommendations that the electoral registers be joined up with other services and EROs would improve the position. We are reviewing the existing public data infrastructure that could be used and to understand how the flow of data works, whilst maintaining the balance of privacy with transparency. Commissioners noted it was important to be futureproof in our approach and identify emerging issues. CB commented on the need to be realistic about what we can achieve alone with online registration. She noted that other Electoral Commissions who have successfully moved to online registration rely on the support from government agencies. It is important that we bear in mind the risks posed by moving online, and keep our thinking proportionate to those. To start with, we should focus on short-term gains like improving accessibility for overseas voters. It was agreed that the Welsh roll out of a national register in 2019 will be a useful case study that will provide lessons for the rest of the UK, even though the scale will be different between Wales and the UK.

New Codes of Practice CB outlined that after writing to the parties, the Commission is interested in hearing the views of the Panel on the proposed Codes of Practice (COP) and would welcome any input or questions at this stage. SM said that the COP deal with the existing schedule and asked whether there is a way can agree and amend the schedules of category spending. CB explained that there are ongoing discussions on this issue but clearly a challenge of available legislative time. BP agreed that it was worth considering and engaging with Cabinet Office. All sides were keen to continue constructive engagement. DA raised the issue of authorisation and reported parties only received correspondence from the Commission five days before the 2017 general election. DB asked if the Codes are going to address authorisation. DB reported the difficulties in authorisation when there is a snap election. DBM outlined there is only so much the COP can address. AW asked if authorisation was a COP issue or need to think of it separately in legislative terms. BP and CB agreed to look at how far the Commission can take guidance. CB suggested using COP to shine a light on authorisation. All sides agreed would be useful to put on agenda for a future meeting. AW asked if there was a compelling case to move away from guidance to COP. CB explained the COP would have stronger status. DBM explained there is a particularly compelling case to make digital campaigning clearer and more transparent. Public awareness preparation, May 2018 local elections CW outlined the Commission's public awareness preparation ahead of the local elections. CW highlighted the new campaigns: 'Got 5?' and 'Your vote is yours alone'. AS asked for an update on the Commission collating data on people moving house and producing standard artwork to target this group. CW explained the Commission is still consulting on this and agreed to keep the Panel informed. AS asked about the Commission's role in relation to voter ID pilots. CW outlined the Commission's role to carry out an independent evaluation and will report before summer recess. DB suggested often the perception of fraud was worse than the reality. DB highlighted the issue when legitimate things are perceived as a problem and there is a false perception you aren't allowed to campaign on polling day. DB asked if the Commission's fraud campaign could go too far and cause people to worry. CW explained the positive tone of 'Your vote is yours alone' and messaging on intimidation and bribery. CB said the campaign messaging is focused on the voter and empowering them to understand and report electoral fraud. Feedback on replacement for integrity roundtables BP explained the rational in trying to refresh arrangements and establish the best way to engage with political parties, electoral administrators and the police. BP suggested more flexible, ad hoc events focusing on particular issue may be a better use of everyone's limited resources than a scheduled meeting every six months with a standing agenda. BP invited feedback from Panel members on what sort of event would be useful. DB said at SPOC seminar the format was particularly valuable and useful in helping to facilitate conversations with ERO officers and can't underestimate future value this has for collaborative working. CB explained the Commission had listened to feedback on having more emphasis on conversations and opportunities to share information but understands the need for different formats at different times. AS agreed. RV said he was struck by size and suggested the need for smaller groups. AS and DA agreed. DA said it was particularly useful to have a case study and a mix of participants round the table as it allowed for different viewpoints on the problem and constructive engagement. DA explained the importance of the networking. CB said this feedback was helpful. CB explained the different options available: workshops, smaller roundtables or specialised training sessions and asked views of the Panel. AS stated the benefit of smaller group discussion. DR outlined personal preference for big table discussions. Commission update report AS thanked the Commission for sending over dates of PFR publication dates for 2018. SM asked what the date would be for the General Election spending returns for the larger parties. SM said it would be useful to have in PDF format. CB agreed to see if possible to send in this format but indicated this might not be possible due to size. DBM explained guidance colleagues at the Commission could help give advice to the Panel on any issues relating to the publication of electoral registers where there are local government boundary changes. Any other business DA raised register of interests and the issue of the fundamental differences between the two reporting mechanisms. DA cited the example of new MPs having to report one year before and outlined if someone was looking at Commission records there could be the automatic assumption something is wrong. DA asked if future correspondence from the Commission on this issue could be more diplomatic and account for different reporting systems. CB said feedback will be taken on board. DA said the overlapping deadlines are hard to manage. AS explained there is the perception parties are huge but this is not the case. AS said between the Commission and the ICO, the regulatory burden is huge and said it would not be uncommon to need to double staff. CB explained the Commission was sympathetic to the pressures outlined and stated the Commission's commitment to not unnecessarily adding further to this. DA raised aggregation and stated DA and DB had come to two different interpretations of the guidance on 62(12). DA said there is a lack of examples in the Electoral Commission guidance to make it clear. CB acknowledged the helpful feedback and offered to direct Commission staff to the Panel to address this issue. DA and DB offered to provide examples. Candidates section Home Campaign spending: Candidates First published: 2 February 2022 Last updated: 27 October 2022 About the data At the May 2021 Senedd election, there were 311 constituency and independent regional candidates who had to submit a spending return, listing details of what they spent during the election campaign. The dataset includes the headline figures for the spending incurred and donations received by candidates at the 2021 Senedd election. We publish these figures to enhance transparency and to provide voters with information on donations to candidates' election campaigns and their spending and to ensure that this information can be seen together in one place. The full individual candidate returns are available for public scrutiny from the relevant Returning Officers for a period of two years after an election. The returns include the total the candidate spent, as well as a breakdown of how much they spent on things like advertising, transport and public meetings. They also include any donations the candidate received above £50 during the regulated period. The data taken from the spending returns reflects what candidates and their agents submitted to Returning Officers in Wales. We publish this information exactly as it appears on the candidate's return so that there is an accurate record of what was reported. Spending limits vary between constituencies. The vast majority of Returning Officers have sent us the returns submitted to them for inclusion in this dataset. Where information is missing, this may be because the Returning Officer didn't send them on to us, or because the candidate didn't submit their return to the Returning Officer. Under the law spending on promoting regional party list candidates counts as party spending, and was therefore reportable by the party in its election spending return. Information about candidate spending data for previous devolved elections is available online in the National Archive. 2021 Senedd Cymru candidate spending Download the data 2021 Senedd Cymru candidate spending

Completeness in Great Britain You are in the Accuracy and completeness of electoral registers section Home Our research Accuracy and completeness of electoral registers On this page Urban/rural Local authority type Length of residence Tenure Age Ethnicity Nationality Gender Disability status Socio-economic group Highest qualification Number of adults in household Attitudes towards registration and voting

Turnout at recent national electoral events First published: 2 September 2019 Last updated: 26 September 2019 Key findings The local government registers in Great Britain were 83% complete, and the parliamentary registers were 85% complete The study found that the main drivers of lower completeness are being younger, recent home movement and whether someone rents their home from a private landlord. These drivers of lower registration are in line with our findings in previous accuracy and completeness studies Other factors associated with lower rates of registration include ethnicity, nationality and attitudes towards registration and voting Overview The parliamentary registers for Great Britain were found to be 85% complete, and the local government registers 83% complete overall. Except where stated, the figures outlined relate to the local government registers as these include the larger proportion of the electorate. Where comparisons made in the text are not statistically significant this is acknowledged. Urban/rural classification In Great Britain there is a slight difference (two percentage points) between levels of completeness in urban and rural areas. Registers in urban areas are now 83% complete (from 84% in 2015), while in rural areas completeness is 85% (86% in 2015). The changes from 2015 are not statistically significant. Local authority type The most notable change in completeness across local authority types has been in London boroughs, where completeness has fallen from 81% in 2015 to 76% in 2018. There has also been a decline in district authorities from 86% in 2015 to 84% in 2018.

Completeness in unitary authorities (83%) has stayed at a similar level to 2015 (84%), while there has been a small increase in completeness for metropolitan boroughs (from 83% to 86%). The lower completeness in London boroughs is likely to be reflective of high population mobility, associated with the large private rented sector in London. Completeness of local government electoral registers by local authority type, 2015 and 2018 Local authority type 2015 2018 District 86% 84% London borough 81% 76% Metropolitan borough 83% 86% Unitary authorities 84% 83% Length of residence Previous research into the registers has found a connection between home movement and completeness. As registration is residence-based, greater mobility is associated with lower levels of completeness, while the longer an individual has been resident at their property, the more likely they are to appear on the electoral register. This pattern continues in the local government registers for Great Britain, with completeness at: 36% (an increase from 27% in 2015) among those who have lived at their address for up to a year 71% among those who have lived at their address for one to two years 84% among those who lived at their address for two to five years 90% for those who have lived at their address between five and 10 years 88% for those who have lived at their address for 10 to 16 years 92% among those who have lived at their address for more than 16 years This pattern is consistent throughout our research. That's why we want to see changes to allow EROs to access national-level public data. This will help them to focus resources on addresses where they know a change has occurred. We also want to see greater integration of electoral registration into other public sector transactions, such as applying for or updating a drivers' licence, in order to encourage voters to update their electoral registration as part of another administrative task associated with moving house.

Tenure Tenure is a variable that has previously been strongly associated with levels of completeness and this research reconfirms that finding. In Great Britain, homeowners are more likely to be registered than people in other types of tenure. There has been a small decline in completeness for those living in households owned outright (from 95% to 91%), and a similar-sized decline for those in households buying their home with a mortgage (from 89% to 86%). Over the same period, completeness for those who rent their homes in the social rented sector has increased. For those who rent their home from a local authority it has risen from 79% to 83%, while those renting from a housing association have seen completeness increase from 78% to 82%. Private renters remain the least likely to have complete register entries and have stayed at the same level recorded in 2015. The lower levels of completeness among private renters is associated with population mobility as private renters tend to move more frequently than those in other tenures. For example, the Housing Survey 2017-18 shows that in England 27% of private renters have lived in their home for less than one year compared to 6% of social renters and 4% of owner occupiers. A similar pattern exists in Scotland and Wales. The 2017 Scottish Household Survey found 35% of residents in the private rented sector have been resident less than a year (6% for owner occupiers and 9% in the social rented sector) and the 2017-18 National Survey of Wales found that 33% of private renters had been resident for less than a year (5% for owner occupiers and 10% for social renters). Completeness by tenure in December 2015 and December 2018 Age Levels of completeness were found to vary by age group, with older groups more likely to be registered. This is a finding that has been consistent throughout our research. In Great Britain, the highest level of completeness is seen for those aged 65+ (94%) and the lowest level is recorded for attainers (16 and 17 year olds, 25%), which has dropped from 45% in 2015. In England and Wales, the age at which citizens become entitled to vote is currently 18, but the electoral registers also include records of 'attainers' - 16 and 17 year olds who will turn 18 within the twelve month period starting on the 1 December after they make their application. In Scotland, the voting age for Scottish Parliamentary and local council elections is 16. This means that all 16 and 17 year olds in Scotland are entitled to be on the local government register and that attainers are 14 and 15 year olds who will turn 16 during the twelve month period starting on the 1 December after they make their application. However, entitlement for the parliamentary register in Scotland has not been affected by the change to the franchise so 16 and 17 year olds are attainers on the parliamentary register. Proposed franchise changes in Wales would mean that those aged 16 and 17 in Wales will have an equivalent entitlement as in Scotland. The number of attainers has fallen significantly over the last few years. Before 2015 attainers could be registered by a parent or guardian via a household canvass form. Individual electoral registration (IER) was introduced in 2014 and from this point attainers (and those of any age registering to vote for the first time) have been required to register themselves, providing 'identifying information', namely date of birth and national insurance number. This information is then verified before a name is added to the register. After the introduction of IER there was a significant decline in the number of attainers on both the parliamentary and local government registers. Our previous analysis in 2016 showed that there was a 40% drop in attainers on the local government registers between February/March 2014 and December 2015. Subsequently, between December 2015 and 2016, the number of attainers increased by 17% for local government registers and 22% for parliamentary registers. However the number of attainers on the electoral registers has yet to return to the same level as seen under household registration. We have previously recommended that the registration of attainers presents an opportunity for the development of a more automatic approach to registration, for example, at the point when individuals receive their National Insurance number (NINO). NINOs are allocated automatically just before eligible people turn 16, and a letter containing details of the NINO are sent to individuals at the address held by HM Revenue and Customs. This information could be shared with EROs, enabling 16 year olds who have been issued with a NINO to be added to electoral registers provided that the ERO is satisfied that the individual is eligible and meets the residence requirements for registration. The falling number of attainers emphasises the importance of exploring such reforms. We believe that reform in this area is important, particularly as proposed changes to the franchise in Wales will allow 16 and 17 year to vote on the same basis as electors of the same age in Scotland. In the interim, we believe that making data sets, such as the pupil database, available to EROs would help them to identify attainers more easily. Number of attainers on the parliamentary and local government registers, December 2013 to December 2018 Register 2013 2014 2015 2016 2017 2018 England Local 387,292 260,715 244,781 293,430 279,388 268,396 Parliamentary 379,284 254,838 239,019 284,522 269,092 257,938 Scotland Local 64,299 39,513 21,343 22,035 20,788 20,232 Parliamentary 63,471 38,963 24,827 41,561 43,357 41,296 Wales Local 18,807 14,223 12,462 13,810 13,001 13,127 Parliamentary 18,595 14,065 12,339 13,651 12,794 12,948 Great Britain Local 470,398 314,451 278,586 329,275 313,177 301,755 Parliamentary 461,350 307,864 276,185 339,734 325,243 312,182 The levels of completeness by age group have remained steady since 2015, with little to no change. The 35-44 age group are closest to the overall average of 83%, on 82%. Above this point all age groups have broadly similar levels of completeness (around 90%), while completeness drops with every age group before it. Completeness for 25-34 year olds is 74%, among 20-24 year olds it is 68%, and it is 66% among 18-19 year olds. Ethnicity Completeness is highest among those from a white ethnic background at 84%. The lowest level of completeness was observed among those from "other" ethnic backgrounds, at 62%. Those from Asian and Black ethnic backgrounds each have a similar level of completeness (76% and 75% respectively), while completeness stands at 69% among those from mixed backgrounds. All of the apparent declines in completeness from 2015 presented below were not statistically significant. This demonstrates that the same patterns of difference in registration by ethnicity persist in 2018. Nationality Findings corroborate previous research which show that registration rates are lower among eligible non-UK nationals than among UK or Irish nationals. UK and Irish citizens remain most likely to have complete electoral register entries, at 86%, which is the same as in 2015. Completeness for Commonwealth nationals is 62% (61% in 2015), while it is 54% for those with EU nationalities (53% in 2015). None of the apparent changes since 2015 are statistically significant. Gender While past studies have noted that women are more likely to be registered than men, in this study we have found no difference by gender. Completeness is 83% for both men and women. Disability status People with a long standing physical condition or disability are more likely to be registered (92%) than those without a disability (82%), or those with a longstanding mental condition or disability (83%). Socio-economic group Levels of completeness are affected by social groupings: 86% for AB households 85% for C1 households 80% for C2 households 80% for DE households Since 2015 there has been a decline in the level of completeness among those in C2 households (from 86%), meaning that this group are as likely to have complete register entries as those from social grades DE. The level of completeness in AB households has fallen from 88% in 2015 while there has been an increase of two percentage points among those in C1 households (from 83%). Highest qualification Those with A Levels, Scottish Highers (81%) or GCSEs (81%) as their highest form of academic qualification are groups least likely to have complete register entries. Completeness is highest among those with degrees, or further qualifications such as BTECs, as well as those with other types of qualifications, or none at all (perhaps related to age). This reflects the pattern observed in 2015, when this question was first asked. Across other qualifications the levels of completeness do not vary much between highest level of attainment. Completeness of local government registers by education in Great Britain, 2015 and 2018

Number of adults in household Completeness among single adult households has risen by four percentage points since 2015, to 86%, making this among the most likely household type to have a complete register entry alongside two-adult households (84%). Completeness for households with six or more adults is 78% (75% in 2015), while for households with between three and five adults it's 81% (83% in 2015). Attitudes towards registration and voting The person we spoke to in each household was also asked some questions around their attitudes to registering to vote and voting itself. While this means it is not a nationally representative sample of the population, the results provide another angle to consider the relationship between registration and attitudes towards elections. As in 2015, completeness is lower among participants with more negative views of registering to vote. Those who agree it is only worth registering to vote to secure better credit references have the lowest level of completeness, at 68%, while completeness stands at 72% among those who say it is not really worth registering to vote at all. While both these groups had the lowest levels in 2015, their order has switched (see figure below). Completeness stands at 79% among those who think people should only register to vote if they care who wins an election and 85% among those who say it is everyone's duty to register to vote. Attitudes towards voting show a similar pattern, with those who feel it's everyone's duty to vote having the highest level of completeness (84%) compared to those who feel it's not worth voting (78%) and those who say people should only vote if they care who wins an election (79%). Turnout at recent national electoral events Although the distance between the December 2018 electoral registers and the most recent national election (the 2017 UK Parliamentary general election) is greater than it was for the December 2015 registers, the same relationship can be observed. Those who reported voting at the most recent UK general election showed higher levels of completeness. In 2015 the level was 92%, and in 2018 it was 88%. Completeness was lower among those who said they did not vote (although eligible to do so), at 72%. Completeness for those who were not eligible to vote (predominantly EU citizens) stood at 50%. The 2016 referendum on the UK's membership of the European Union was notable for its higher turnout compared with the UK general election which preceded it. As this is the first survey of accuracy and completeness since the referendum occurred, we asked a question to understand the relationship between participating in that referendum and the completeness of the registers. It revealed a very similar pattern to participation in the 2017 UK general election, with completeness highest among those who said they voted in the referendum (88%). For those who did not vote, completeness stood at 71%, while among those not eligible the level of completeness was 53%.

For this, data were collected from Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers. This comprised the Form K 'Statement as to Postal Ballot Papers' and an additional data form, specified by the Commission, which included data relating to electoral registration, turnout, absent voting and rejected ballots. Local elections were scheduled in 67 district, 17 unitary and 34 metropolitan authorities on 3 May 2018. There were also local elections in all 32 London Boroughs. There were also city mayoral elections in Hackney, Lewisham, Newham, Tower Hamlets and Watford and combined authority mayoral elections for the Sheffield City Region in Barnsley, Doncaster, Rotherham and Sheffield. In just 3 wards were candidates elected unopposed. Electorate 21.5 million Turnout Ballot box: 34.7% Postal vote: 67.0% In-person: 28.6% Rejected ballots Ballots at the count: 0.4% Postal votes: 2.7% Proxies appointed 23,724 (0.1% of the electorate) 793 emergency proxies Electorate The local government elections gave 21.5 million registered electors the opportunity to vote; 5.2 million in district councils, 10.3 million in unitary and metropolitan authorities and 5.9 million in London Boroughs. A total of 198,003 electors (0.9% of the electorate in contested wards) were added to the electoral register during the weeks leading up to the elections. A total of 351,271 applications to register were received in the weeks leading up to the election. Almost a quarter (24%) of these was recorded as duplicates 1 . In addition, 76,036 individuals applied to register to vote after the registration deadline. 1,325 individuals were recorded as trying to vote on polling day despite not being registered. Votes were cast at 14,381 polling stations as well as by post. Turnout The measure of turnout referred to in this report, 'ballot box turnout', includes all valid votes cast ('valid vote turnout') and votes rejected at the count. Total turnout refers to valid votes cast, votes rejected at the count and those rejected at the postal ballot verification stage before the count. Table 3.1 confirms that only a small fraction of the total votes cast are not valid. There are variations from the overall mean turnout when turnout is examined at the local authority level. The highest turnout was observed across London boroughs and district councils, while turnout was lower across unitary and metropolitan councils. Table 3.2 shows the highest and lowest turnouts across each type of local authority. The highest turnout observed was in Richmond upon Thames where 51.4% of registered electors cast a ballot. The lowest turnout was in Hartlepool where 24.0% cast a ballot. Table 3.2: Turnout 2018 Highest Lowest Districts Districts South Lakeland 47.4% Havant 28.6% Winchester 44.2% Cannock Chase

 was 0.4 %. This compares with 0.6% at the 2014 local elections. The rejection rate at 6 metropolitan council elections was lower than at elections for other types of local authority (0.3% compared with 0.4%). The majority of rejected ballots (64.9%) were rejected due to being unmarked or wholly void for uncertainty. More than a quarter (28.4%) were rejected due to voting for more candidates than allowed. Table 3.3:

 Postal voting The total number of postal votes issued for these elections was 3.6 million, representing 16.7% of all electors with a contested election in their ward.
 This compares with 15.8% at the 2014 local elections. At a local authority level, electors registered for a postal vote ranged from 41.8% in Sunderland to 8.8% in Halton. Postal voting was more common in metropolitan authorities where 18.1 % of the electorate (1.5 million electors) were issued with a postal ballot paper compared with 16.6% in districts, 15.5% in London boroughs and 15.4% in unitary authorities.

 The proportion of postal voters returning their ballot papers always exceeds the turnout among ‘in person’ voters. This year, 67.0% 2 postal electors used their postal vote compared with 28.6% who turned up to vote in person 3 . Postal votes accounted for 31.4% of all votes included at the count. This compares with 29.3% in 2014. Rejected postal ballots

Rejected postal ballots	Postal voting packs (PV)
Postal voting packs (PV)	require voters to provide their signature and date of birth (DOB). These identifiers are then matched against those provided at the time of application. If the signature or date of birth is missing or does not match, the postal vote is rejected and is not included at the count. Since 2014, Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) have been required to notify electors if their postal vote has been rejected and give the reason(s) for rejection. They can also request the elector to provide an up-to-date signature. The total rate of rejection across elections was 2.7%, which represents a decrease from 4.7% in 2014 4 . The overall fall in levels of rejected postal votes suggests that the new policy may be having a positive impact overall. covering envelopes received and 0.5% of all votes cast. The vast majority of postal voters did cast their vote correctly. Proxies and waivers A total of 23,724 electors appointed a proxy (0.1 % of the electorate) for the local government elections. This is consistent with levels in 2014. The number of emergency proxies issued was 793. This is higher than in 2014, 530 emergency proxies were issued. A concession granted under the terms of the EAA 2006 was that postal electors who either had a disability, or were illiterate, or were unable to furnish a consistent signature could apply for a waiver to use their date of birth as their sole identifier. A total of 18,256 waivers were granted, representing 0.5% of postal electors. Mayoral elections Together with the local government elections there were city mayoral elections in Hackney, Lewisham, Newham, Tower Hamlets and Watford. There was also a Combined Authority Mayoral Election for the Sheffield City Region in Barnsley, Doncaster, Rotherham and Sheffield. Details of turnout, rejected ballots and postal voting can be found in Table 6.1.

Sheffield	contained within this report and the accompanying dataset is based on data received from Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers. There remain inconsistencies in the ways in which local authorities record and report information. We continue to notice differences in the coding of information by different electoral management software. For example, customers of one electoral management software supplier consistently report a higher proportion of 'mismatching' than others. Inconsistencies relating to the reasons for and total number of postal vote rejections on the Form K appear to result from the potential for differences in interpretation and treatment. For example, in the treatment of the numbers of covering envelopes and ballot papers returned, covering envelopes may be sent in without the A envelope or postal voting statement enclosed, while the missing document may or may not be sent in a separate covering envelope later, or multiple ballots may be returned in one envelope. When local authorities are contacted about such anomalies they are often unable to provide revised figures or clarify why the data were coded in that way. In practice, we use a calculation of field B6 minus field C18 as a surrogate for the total number of postal votes rejected regardless of whether or not it is the same as recorded in field C19. The different breakdown of reasons for rejection collected on the additional data form does not always match this B6 minus C18 calculation. However, the discrepancies seem less severe and the categories have the advantage of being embedded in software and of having greater 'common sense' meaning. It would seem sensible to consider replacing fields B15-17 on Form K with three other aggregated categories: rejections for mismatching; rejections for missing identifier information; rejections for absent documentation. As it is, field B15 is largely redundant given that almost all authorities now verify 100% of postal vote returns. There is no field that captures the number of postal voting statements received by the Returning Officer or at a polling station before the close of poll. In practice, we use field B6, 'Number of covering envelopes received by the Returning Officer or at a polling station before the close of poll' as a surrogate but we know that, as mentioned, electors can return multiple postal ballots in one envelope or return envelopes without any ballots Appendix B Form K: STATEMENT AS TO POSTAL BALLOT PAPERS REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACTS LOCAL GOVERNMENT ELEC	59.3%	16.2%

Blackburn with Darwen as the number of postal ballots received had not been submitted at time of writing. ■ Back to content at footnote 2 3. There is no statutory field that captures the number of postal voting statements received by the Returning Officer. In practice, we use field B6, 'Number of covering envelopes received by the Returning Officer or at a polling station before the close of poll' as a surrogate but we know that, as mentioned, electors can return multiple postal ballots in one envelope or return envelopes without any ballots. ■ Back to content at footnote 3 4. As figures reported for the postal votes rejected field were inconsistent, we used a calculation of covering envelopes received minus field postal votes included in the count as a surrogate for the total number of postal votes rejected. This approach is consistent with previous years. ■ Back to content at footnote 4 Related content Results and turnout at the May 2017 England local elections View the results and turnout of the 2017 local elections in England Past elections and referendums Read our reports and view data about past elections and referendums Local councils Find out about local councils and how to vote in local council elections. Policy You are in the section Home Currently reading: of 9 - Show page contents On this page About this guidance How enforcement fits into our approach to regulation Our supervisory powers Our investigatory powers Other powers Assessments and investigations The civil sanctions decision-making framework The civil sanctions available to the Commission Appendix About this guidance The Electoral Commission is the independent body which oversees elections and regulates political finance in the United Kingdom. We are accountable to the UK Parliament, the Scottish Parliament, and the Senedd. The Political Parties , Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) requires us to prepare and publish guidance as to the use of our powers to investigate and sanction potential offences and contraventions of PPERA. This Enforcement Policy fulfils that requirement. We are then required to have regard to this published guidance when exercising our enforcement functions. This guidance sets out our enforcement approach, and how we will normally use our supervisory, investigation and sanctioning powers. It also sets out how we assess and investigate potential offences or contraventions of PPERA, and our approach to the forfeiture of funds from impermissible donors. This guidance does not cover our enforcement approach to the controls on information to be included with electronic material (imprints) in the Elections Act 2022. We are required to provide separate guidance, approved by Parliament, for that element of the regime. The content of this Policy (except the Appendix) is a statutory requirement and we are required to consult before making changes. The previous policy is applicable to any offences identified which took place between 5 April 2016 and 1 September 2023, when this policy came into effect.

How enforcement fits into our approach to regulation Proportionate enforcement as part of regulation We aim to ensure an increasingly trusted and transparent system of regulation in political finance, monitoring and securing compliance, promoting understanding amongst those regulated and proactively pursuing potential offences or contraventions of political finance law. To do this we provide proactive or reactive support in order to secure compliance and to give those we regulate a clear understanding of their responsibilities and how to meet them. We will also take enforcement action, including using investigatory powers and sanctions, but only where we are satisfied that it is necessary and proportionate to do so in order to achieve our corporate objective. This means that: where we are satisfied we can resolve a matter and achieve our aim without enforcement action, we will do so where we do take enforcement action, we will do so in a way that is objective, impartial, consistent, effective, proportionate and fair we will seek to conduct enforcement action as quickly as possible and efficiently, and with due regard for those involved we will take the facts of each situation into account

Working with the police, prosecutors, and other regulators The Commission's role as regulator includes monitoring and securing compliance with all the political finance laws in PPERA. However, we may investigate and impose sanctions only in relation to certain offences and contraventions of the law in PPERA. These offences fall into our enforcement remit, which is narrower than our regulatory remit. All PPERA offences are criminal offences and may be investigated by the police. There is a different regime for candidates in elections under the Representation of the People Act 1983. The offences set out in that regime may only be investigated by the police. We cannot investigate or sanction these offences. We have agreements in place with the police and prosecutors in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. Where we become aware of a potential criminal offence within our regulatory role but not our enforcement remit, or which we consider to be so serious that our civil sanctions may not be an adequate response, we may notify the police so that they can consider investigating. It will be a matter for the relevant police force whether or not they decide to investigate. We work with other regulatory bodies and share information with them where we are able to and it is appropriate to do so. We may also notify any relevant authority, including the police, of potential offences we become aware of which sit outside our regulatory remit where we consider it appropriate to do so.

Where a matter under investigation includes an offence or offences where more than one enforcement body has an interest, we will liaise with other regulatory bodies or the police at the earliest possible stage to minimise duplication of investigative work. Police investigations will always take primacy over our civil investigations.

Our supervisory powers are powers we can use where we do not have reasonable grounds to suspect an offence and we are not conducting an investigation. They enable us to monitor and check on those who are regulated under PPERA, such as registered parties or officers of those parties, registered non-party campaigners, registered referendum campaigners, candidates and their agents. The powers extend only to information about the income and expenditure of the person or organisation concerned. These powers support monitoring compliance by regulated organisations and individuals with the requirements set down in law. As part of our statutory role monitoring compliance with these laws, we may need to obtain information from, or visit premises used by, those we regulate. Where appropriate this is done on a voluntary basis and with advance notice. However, Schedule 19 B of PPERA provides us with the power to ensure that information can be obtained where it is necessary for our functions. These are separate from the powers available to us to investigate potential breaches and offences under PPERA.

Disclosure notices

We may issue a disclosure notice requiring a regulated organisation or individual to provide us with specific documents and/or information. These documents or information must be related to the income and expenditure of the organisation or individual, and must be reasonably required by us for the purpose of carrying out our functions. A disclosure notice may be issued, for example, where we need to be certain of ascertaining compliance by a regulated organisation or individual within a particular timeframe, or where there are public interest issues. We may also use this power where a regulated organisation or individual has failed to comply with a request for voluntary cooperation. The disclosure of material can occur in different ways. For the convenience of all concerned we will normally request that material be sent to us for consideration. However, in some circumstances we may examine the material or information to be made available to us on the premises of the regulated organisation or individual. This may be, for example, because we need to review information storage systems on site. It is a criminal offence to fail to comply with a disclosure notice by the deadline set without reasonable excuse. We will consider requests for extensions to deadlines where there are reasonable grounds for the request. It is also a criminal offence to intentionally obstruct us in carrying out our functions in issuing the notice, or to knowingly or recklessly provide false information in purported compliance with a disclosure notice.

Inspection warrants

Where we are unreasonably refused access to documents following a request - including during a voluntary inspection of premises - we may ask a justice of the peace or, in Scotland, a sheriff, to issue an inspection warrant. To obtain a warrant we must be able to show all of the following:

- There are reasonable grounds for believing that there are documents relating to the income and expenditure of the regulated organisation or individual on the premises in question.
- We need to inspect these documents for the purposes of carrying out our (non-investigatory) functions.

We have requested permission to inspect the documents on the premises and it has been unreasonably refused. We may only ask for an inspection warrant when exercising our supervisory functions, as separate powers exist to seek information for our investigatory functions. Failing to comply with the warrant, or otherwise obstructing it or providing false information under it, is a criminal offence. Our investigatory powers Our investigatory powers are set out in Schedule 19B of PPERA and extend to any person – including individuals and organisations. We may use these powers when we have reasonable grounds to suspect an offence or offences under the political finance laws, and we are investigating the matter. Our investigatory powers may be used and enforced in respect of any person who holds relevant documents or information. As a UK regulator, our powers are however limited to the borders of the UK. We are not therefore able to use our investigatory powers in relation to any person outside the UK. We will use these powers where it is appropriate and proportionate to do so, including to ensure the investigation is conducted as quickly and efficiently as possible. Investigation notice We may issue an investigation notice requiring a person to produce documents or provide information or explanation that is reasonably required for the purpose of our investigation into a suspected offence or contravention. The investigation notice will specify the documents, information or explanation that is required, and set out when and where it must be produced. We can issue an investigation notice to any person – either an individual or an organisation – who we consider holds relevant documents or information. This includes the subject of an investigation or a potential witness or other third party. The disclosure of material can occur in different ways. For the convenience of all concerned we will normally request that material be sent to us for consideration. However, in some circumstances we may examine the material or information to be made available to us on the premises of the person. It is a criminal offence to fail to comply with an investigation notice without reasonable excuse, or to intentionally obstruct us in carrying out our functions in issuing the notice. It is also a criminal offence to knowingly or recklessly provide false information in purported compliance with an investigation notice. Any penalty sought for a failure to comply will depend on the circumstances and any mitigating factors. If the recipient of an investigation notice does not possess or have access to the documents or information specified in the investigation notice, they must let us know as quickly as possible. Disclosure order Where an investigation notice is not complied with we will normally seek to enforce it by applying to the High Court or, in Scotland, the Court of Session for a disclosure order. To obtain a disclosure order we must demonstrate that: We have reasonable grounds to suspect a person (whether or not the recipient of the investigation notice) has committed an offence or contravention under PPERA. There are documents, information or explanations that have not been produced in compliance with an investigation notice. Those documents, information or explanations are reasonably required by us for the purpose of investigating the suspected offence or contravention and those documents, information or explanations are in the custody or under the control of the respondent. We may retain documents delivered in accordance with a disclosure order for three months, unless proceedings have commenced in relation to a criminal offence or the documents are relevant to our issuing an initial notice proposing a monetary penalty. In practice, documents will be returned more quickly if they are of no relevance to an investigation. Where documents are retained for the purpose of proceedings against a person, and there is an appeal against the outcome of the proceedings, we will endeavour to return the documents as soon as it is practical after the appeal process ending. We may make copies or records of the information contained in documents provided to us. It is a criminal offence to fail to comply, without reasonable excuse, with a disclosure order. It is also an offence to obstruct us, or knowingly or intentionally provide false information in purported compliance with a disclosure order. Where this occurs we may seek prosecution, or seek to have the disclosure order enforced as contempt of court.

Statutory interview We may require an individual to attend a statutory interview. The individual – who may be the subject of the investigation or a potential witness or other third party holding relevant information – must attend the statutory interview at a specified time and place and must answer any question that we reasonably consider to be relevant to the investigation. Statutory interviews will usually be recorded. The individual may bring another person to the interview, such as a legal representative. However, we may refuse to allow a particular person to accompany the individual if the presence of that person is likely to compromise the integrity of the investigation. It is a criminal offence to fail to comply, without reasonable excuse, with a requirement to attend a statutory interview or answer the questions asked during it. It is also a criminal offence to obstruct us in carrying out our functions this way, or to knowingly or intentionally provide us with false information in purported compliance with the statutory interview. Any penalty sought for a failure to comply will depend on the circumstances and any mitigating factors.

No evidence obtained from a person under these powers is admissible in criminal proceedings against that person, if they are subsequently charged with an offence.

Other powers Stop Notices A stop notice under Schedule 19B of PPERA enables us to order a regulated organisation or individual not to do, or to stop doing, something, even if an offence may not yet have been committed. We can only use a stop notice where we reasonably believe: the activity we are seeking to stop is likely to involve an offence or contravention under PPERA; and the action we are seeking to stop is seriously damaging, or poses a significant risk of seriously damaging, public confidence in the PPERA regime as it relates to the income and expenditure of registered political parties and others. The stop notice will set out the steps the recipient must take to comply with it, as well as the grounds under which it has been made, the consequences for failing to comply and the rights of appeal. The recipient of a stop notice may appeal to a county court or, in Scotland, the sheriff against the decision to serve the notice. It is a criminal offence to fail to comply with a stop notice. Any penalty sought for a failure to comply will depend on the circumstances and any mitigating factors. The recipient of a stop notice should apply to us for a completion certificate to verify their compliance with the notice. We will make a decision within 14 days of receipt of an application as to whether to issue it. We will only issue a completion certificate if we are satisfied that the applicant has complied with the stop notice. The applicant may appeal a decision not to issue a completion certificate within 28 days of being notified of our decision.

Forfeiture One of the key purposes of PPERA is to ensure that the sources of donations are controlled and to prevent unlawful overseas funding of UK politics. PPERA sections 54-57 define ‘permissible’ donors, requires recipients to establish that all donors are permissible and return any funds that are not from permissible donors within 30 days of receipt. It is an offence, for which the Commission can impose civil sanctions, to retain such a donation beyond 30 days after receipt. It is a defence if the recipient can show that: they took all reasonable steps to establish that the donor was permissible; and as a result they believed the donor was permissible We will decide whether to investigate and impose sanctions for that offence in accordance with this policy. In addition to the potential offence and possible sanctions, PPERA also includes ‘forfeiture’ provisions in sections 58-60 which enable the Commission to apply to a court to forfeit funds received from impermissible donors. Recipients must therefore return funds within 30 days unless they have established that the donor is permissible. If the necessary checks are not completed within 30 days, the donation should be returned. As with every area of our regulatory work, we encourage compliance by publishing guidance and providing advice where requested. We apply the following approach in dealing with funds received from impermissible donors and retained beyond 30 days: We will investigate all instances of donations from impermissible donors being retained beyond 30 days – this is to ensure we have all of the relevant facts before taking any decisions. We expect impermissible funds to be returned within 30 days. Where in exceptional circumstances this is not possible, we expect the funds to be retained for as short a time as possible beyond 30 days, minimising any benefit to the recipient, and that the recipient will notify the Commission of any such funds being retained as soon as it becomes aware of them. Where funds have been returned, even outside 30 days, we may seek forfeiture, but we will take into account relevant factors in making our decision such as how long the donation was retained, any benefit to the recipient and whether it was returned as soon as practicable. Where the funds have not been returned, we will apply to court to seek forfeiture unless it is not reasonable, rational or proportionate to do so. We will, wherever possible and appropriate, invite the recipient to voluntarily forfeit such funds before applying to the court, to avoid unnecessary court time and costs for all involved. Where an individual donor was not permissible but was or may have been entitled to appear on an electoral register at the time of the donation, we will consider the appropriate level of voluntary forfeiture accordingly. We will consider separately whether to impose sanctions. In some cases we may seek forfeiture without imposing any sanction, or vice versa.

Assessments

We monitor compliance with the rules in PPERA, and potential offences may be uncovered by that monitoring. We may also receive allegations that the law has been broken, or identify indications of an offence and/or contravention of the law, including through a press report or referral from another regulator. To decide whether to open an investigation, we look at the evidence and circumstances as part of a process called an assessment. The purpose of an assessment

Assessments are a consideration of the issues and evidence to determine whether to investigate, or whether an issue can be dealt with another way such as through the provision of guidance. We may investigate where we have reasonable grounds to suspect that a person has committed an offence or contravened a restriction or requirement under PPERA, and where we are satisfied it is in the public interest to take such action. The assessment process

We check all potential breaches of the PPERA rules to determine if they should be assessed. We will not assess potential issues if they are not within our regulatory remit. We may also decide not to assess an issue if:

- It does not disclose any failure to comply with the PPERA rules
- It is not supported by any credible evidence
- In the case of a complaint, the complainant refuses to provide details of the issue and any supporting evidence in writing
- We have already assessed it and no new evidence has come to light
- We have already taken enforcement action in respect of the issue
- We do not consider it in the public interest or justifies the use of our resources

Assessments may include:

- Reviewing documents provided to us
- Reviewing documents we already have
- Seeking further information or clarification from a complainant
- Making initial inquiries of the subject of the allegation or other persons
- In the case of an assessment initiated by a complaint, we will notify the complainant of the outcome of the assessment as quickly as possible – and within 21 calendar days – after acknowledging receipt of the complaint. A complainant can ask us to review a decision not to open an assessment or investigation. The request must be made within 14 days of notification of the decision.

Investigations

Opening an investigation

If we are satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to suspect an offence or contravention has occurred, we will consider whether to investigate. We will only open an investigation where we consider that investigating the suspected offence or contravention is in the public interest and justifies the use of our resources in this way. Whether or not a matter is in the public interest and justifies the use of our resources will depend on a number of factors. These factors may be different and/or differently weighted depending on the circumstances. We will consider the relevant factors before deciding whether to open an investigation, and may review the continued relevance of the factors during an investigation. A non-exhaustive list is below:

- Our regulatory aims and objectives , and whether an investigation is the most appropriate way to achieve them in the particular case
- Effective and efficient prioritisation in the use of our resources
- The seriousness of the suspected offence or contravention including the magnitude and potential harm caused by it
- The strength of the evidence
- The frequency or duration of the suspected offence or contravention
- The impact, including the deterrence effect, of an investigation and/or any sanction that might be imposed
- The compliance history of the person(s) who may have committed the suspected offence or contravention
- Any steps already taken to rectify the breach

Any relevant circumstances of the individuals involved

Timescales for investigations

The time taken to complete an investigation varies on a case by case basis. Where there is a great deal of evidence to collect and assess, or where the issue relates to a particularly complex area of the law, the investigation may take longer. We manage investigations differently depending on the complexity of the case, volume of evidence involved, or number of potential offences under consideration. We will always gather all relevant evidence we can obtain and record this in a way that ensures it can be disclosed effectively. We recognise that it is important to conclude investigations as quickly as possible. This is both in the public interest and in the interest of justice for those involved. We will therefore ensure a review of any case approaching 12 months in duration, by someone independent of the investigation, to determine whether it remains in the public interest to continue the investigation. However, our first priority is always to conduct a fair and thorough investigation, and this will take priority over speed or duration where the two conflict.

Notifying subjects

We will normally inform the subject of an investigation as soon as possible after the investigation is opened, unless doing so would frustrate the investigation. We will provide details of the matters under investigation and ensure that the subject has the opportunity to respond to them.

Gathering evidence

In order to determine if an offence or contravention under PPERA has occurred, we may need to make enquiries of persons that we believe can provide relevant information. We will ask for documents, information and explanations on a voluntary basis or by using our investigatory powers, as appropriate. We may do this in writing or by phone, or by arranging statutory or voluntary interviews, depending on the circumstances.

Recognising the impact on those involved

We understand that being involved in an investigation, whether as a subject or a witness, can be a stressful and even upsetting experience. We will always treat everyone involved in an investigation with respect, and be mindful of the impact the investigation may have. We will make all reasonable efforts to conduct the investigation in a way that minimises the impact on those involved. We will provide the subject of an investigation on an expected timescale in any situation where there has not been any other communication to the subject for a period of 8 weeks. We will conduct our investigations in a way that recognises diversity and is compliant with equalities and human rights legislation. Where we develop concerns, or are made aware of any concerns over a person's ability to take part for any reason, we will review the position and consider alternative ways to progress.

There are three possible investigations outcomes:

- there is no or insufficient evidence to determine an offence or contravention has been committed we are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that an offence or contravention has been committed we decide, having revisited the factors in paragraph 6.9 above, that it is no longer in the public interest to continue to investigate a suspected offence or contravention.
- Where we are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that an offence or contravention has been committed, we will consider what further action to take. In most cases this will involve deciding whether to impose a sanction. If appropriate we may decide to refer the matter to the police or relevant prosecuting authority at this stage. A number of offences in PPERA include a reference to 'reasonable excuse': where we are satisfied that a reasonable excuse exists for the failure to comply with the requirements no offence is committed. 'Reasonable excuse' is not defined in PPERA but it does not mean any excuse. Whether 'reasonable excuse' is made out in any case depends on the facts and context of each case. It may be made out where the failure to comply occurred due to circumstances beyond the control of the person that may have committed the offence, and which could not reasonably have been anticipated and mitigated by them.

The civil sanctions decision-making framework

When we can sanction

We can impose civil sanctions under Schedule 19C for most, but not all, offences under PPERA. To determine an offence or contravention has been committed, we must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt and only then can we impose a civil sanction. In order to start civil court proceedings for forfeiture the standard of proof that applies is the balance of probabilities.

When we will or will not sanction

We will generally sanction where we consider it appropriate to do so to meet our regulatory aim and objectives, and when it is proportionate and in the public interest to do so. We may decide not to impose a sanction where these conditions have not been met.

The type and/or size of a sanction

Where we decide to sanction, we will consider the appropriate sanction, and in the case of a monetary penalty, the level of that penalty. A number of factors will be considered, which those are and the weight given to each will depend on the circumstances. In general, we will attach greater weight to factors relating to the offence itself and how it occurred, and the nature and compliance history of the person or organisation, than to actions taken after the event. These factors include, but are not limited to, the following (we refer to 'person' in the legal sense, including organisations):

- The seriousness of the offence or contravention
- The harm caused by the offence or contravention
- The extent to which the offence or contravention was inadvertent, reckless, or deliberate
- Any financial gain or other advantage to the person concerned as a result of the offence or contravention
- The frequency or duration of the offence or contravention
- The compliance history of the person concerned
- The level of cooperation with us shown by the person concerned during the investigation
- Any previous written or documented oral advice from us to the person concerned on relevant statutory requirements
- Any deliberateness, dishonesty, deception or misrepresentation by the person concerned when committing the offence or contravention
- The level of insight as to reasons for the offence or contravention or the consequences of it
- Acceptance or otherwise of responsibility for the offence or contravention
- Action taken to eliminate, reduce or rectify the harm resulting from the offence or contravention Action taken to reduce the likelihood of a recurrence of the offence or contravention Whether the matter was voluntarily reported by the person concerned Adherence to any enforcement undertakings agreed with us Substantiated evidence that the person's actions were affected by ill-health Process for imposing a sanction We treat the process for imposing a sanction as confidential, in the same way we treat an investigation. We will not make public information about the process whilst it is ongoing. If we seek to impose a penalty or a compliance or restoration notice, we will follow this process: Issue a notice proposing the sanction Allow a period of time for written representations or objections from the person concerned (only the person to whom the notice is issued has the right to make representations though we may consider representations from others where appropriate) Consider any representations or objections Either close the matter or issue a notice imposing a sanction (either that originally proposed, or a revised sanction) The notice proposing a sanction will always contain details of the proposed sanction and the reasons for it, as well as how written representations or objections can be made and the deadline for doing so. We will provide the evidence relied on (unless we know it is already in the possession of the recipient) in reaching our decision to assist the recipient in making representations. We will also explain the basis for the type of sanction and the level of any penalty proposed. Certain types of notice may contain additional information, which is explained in the next section. When making representations or objections recipients can put forward any information they consider relevant. In particular, if they have not already done so, the recipient may want to put forward any defence to the offence or contravention. They can also make representations on our proposed reasons for a sanction, or the factors we have taken into account when determining the type and size of a sanction. Finally, and separate to those factors, the person concerned may want to comment on their ability to pay a financial penalty and/or the cost to them of any non-financial requirement that might be imposed. We may consider terms for payment where we are satisfied that the level of fine will place a very significant burden on the organisation or individual. This will not however be a factor taken into account as to the level of penalty. Where possible, representations or objections should be accompanied by supporting evidence. In exceptional circumstances we will consider representations that we receive after the legal deadline for them. However, we have no legal power to extend this deadline. Any representations or objections will be considered by a senior officer of the Commission who was not involved in the decision to issue the notice proposing a sanction. Whether representations are made or not, the officer will apply the same decision-making framework. This involves reviewing the case to determine if we remain satisfied that an offence took place and, if so, that the proposed sanction is reasonable and appropriate. If, as a result, we are no longer satisfied that an offence or contravention occurred, the matter will be closed. Otherwise, the senior officer will decide whether to issue a notice imposing a penalty, either reflecting the initial decision or varying it. The civil sanctions available to the Commission Fixed monetary penalties A fixed monetary penalty is a fixed fine of £200. Notice of proposal The notice proposing the penalty will include: The grounds for the proposal to impose the fixed monetary penalty The right to make representations and objections The circumstances in which the Commission may not impose the fixed monetary penalty The period within which liability for the fixed monetary penalty may be discharged, and The period within which representations and objections may be made In addition to the information above the notice of proposal will also explain that the recipient may discharge the penalty by paying the sum of the proposed penalty within 14 days of receiving the notice of proposal, and the matter will be concluded at that stage. It will also set out the circumstances in which we may not impose the penalty. If the recipient does not make payment within 14 days of receiving the notice of proposal, then once the deadline for making representations has passed and any representations have been considered, we will decide whether to issue a notice imposing the penalty.

A fixed monetary penalty cannot be varied after the notice of proposed penalty has been issued. It can only be withdrawn or imposed. Notice imposing penalty The notice imposing the penalty will contain the following information:

- The grounds for imposing the penalty
- How to make payment
- How to appeal the decision to issue the Final Notice
- The deadline for any appeal
- The deadline for making payment (28 days from the date of the Final Notice)
- The deadline and size of late payment charges
- The circumstances when we may instigate civil debt recovery proceedings if the penalty is not paid
- Late payment penalties If a fixed monetary penalty has not been paid within 28 days of service of the final notice, a late payment charge of £50 will be added. If the penalty and late payment charge has not been paid within 56 days of the date of the final notice, the late payment charge will increase to £100.

Right of appeal The recipient may appeal to a county court or, in Scotland, the sheriff against the decision to impose a fixed monetary penalty. Any appeal must be made within 28 days of the date the notice imposing penalty was served.

Convictions Where we have issued a notice of a proposed fixed monetary penalty to a person, criminal proceedings for the offence may not be instituted until the 14 day period for discharging liability has expired. If liability has been discharged, the person cannot be convicted of that offence. Once we have issued a notice imposing the penalty, the person cannot at any time be convicted of the offence that gave rise to the penalty.

Variable monetary penalties A variable monetary penalty is a variable fine that is calculated according to the nature of the offence. It may be used on its own or in combination with a compliance notice and/or a restoration notice. When determining the level of a variable monetary penalty we will take into account the factors set out in paragraph 7.4. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums (Civil Sanctions) Order 2010 makes the maximum variable monetary penalty we can impose in any circumstances £20,000, but this is subject to other limitations that may apply in different parts of the UK.

Notice proposing penalty The notice proposing the penalty will include:

The grounds for the proposal to impose the discretionary requirement

The right to make representations and objections

The circumstances in which the Commission may not impose the discretionary requirement

The period within which representations and objections may be made.

Notice imposing penalty The notice imposing the penalty will contain the following information:

- The grounds for imposing the penalty
- How to make payment
- How to appeal the decision to issue the notice
- The deadline for any appeal
- The deadline for making payment (28 days from the date of the notice imposing the penalty, after which the penalty will increase)
- The circumstances when we may instigate civil debt recovery proceedings or other action if the penalty is not paid
- Late payment penalties If a variable monetary penalty has not been paid within 28 days of service of the notice imposing it, a late payment charge of 25% of the penalty will be added. If the penalty and late payment charge has not been paid within 56 days of the date of the notice, the late payment charge will increase to 50% of the original penalty.

Right of appeal The recipient may appeal to a county court or, in Scotland, the sheriff against the decision to impose the variable monetary penalty. Any appeal must be made within 28 days from the date of service of the notice imposing the penalty.

Convictions Once we have issued a notice imposing a variable monetary penalty, the recipient cannot at any time be convicted of the offence that gave rise to the penalty. Compliance notices A compliance notice sets out action that must be taken by a regulated organisation or individual who has breached the law, so that the breach does not continue or recur. A compliance notice may be used on its own, or in combination with a variable monetary penalty. Notice of proposal Where we propose to issue a compliance notice we will send the person concerned a notice of proposal. This will explain the grounds for imposing the compliance notice, and set out the action we propose to require the person to take. It will also set out how the recipient may make written representations about the decision. Once the deadline for making representations has passed and any representations have been considered, we will decide whether to issue a compliance notice. Compliance notice The notice will contain the following information: The actions and timeframe for their completion The consequences of non-compliance How to appeal the decision to issue the notice The deadline for any appeal Right of appeal The recipient may appeal to a county court or, in Scotland, the sheriff against the decision to impose a compliance notice. Any appeal must be made within 28 days of the date of service of the notice. Monetary penalties for failing to comply with a compliance notice We will impose any penalty for non-compliance by issuing a non-compliance penalty notice. This will set out the grounds for imposing the penalty, the amount, the deadline for payment and the consequences of non-payment. It will also explain how to appeal the decision and the deadline for any appeal (28 days from the date the notice is received). Completion certificate Once the recipient considers they have complied with the terms of the compliance notice, they should notify us in writing and apply for a completion certificate. They will need to provide information demonstrating compliance with the terms of the notice. We will consider an application for a completion certificate within 28 days, provided we have all the information we need to assess whether the terms of the notice have been met. We will confirm our decision in writing and, if appropriate, issue a completion certificate. We may revoke a completion certificate if it was granted on the basis of inaccurate, incomplete or misleading information. If this happens, the compliance notice continues to have effect as if the completion certificate had not been issued. Convictions Where a compliance notice is imposed and a person fails to comply with it, they could be convicted of an offence in respect of the act or omission that led to the notice. Once we have issued a final notice imposing a variable monetary penalty, the person cannot at any time be convicted of the offence that gave rise to the penalty. Restoration notices A restoration notice sets out action that must be taken by a regulated organisation or individual who has breached the law to restore the position, as far as possible, to what it would have been had no breach occurred. A restoration notice may be used on its own, in combination with a variable monetary penalty. Notice of proposal Where we propose to issue a restoration notice we will send the person concerned a notice of proposal. This will explain the grounds for imposing the restoration notice, and set out the action we propose to require the person to take. It will also set out how the recipient may make written representations about the decision to impose the sanction. Once the deadline for making representations has passed and any representations have been considered, we will decide whether to issue a restoration notice. Restoration notice The notice will contain the following information: The actions and timeframe for their completion The consequences of non-compliance How to appeal the decision to issue the notice The deadline for any appeal Right of appeal The recipient may appeal to a county court or, in Scotland, the sheriff against the decision to impose a compliance and/or restoration notice. Any appeal must be made within 28 days of the date of service of the notice. Penalties for failing to comply with a restoration notice We will impose any penalty for non-compliance by issuing a non-compliance penalty notice. This will set out the grounds for imposing the penalty, the amount, the deadline for payment and the consequences of non-payment. It will also explain how to appeal the decision and the deadline for any appeal (28 days from the date the notice is received).

Completion certificate Once the recipient considers they have complied with the terms of the restoration notice, they should notify us in writing and apply for a completion certificate. They will need to provide information demonstrating compliance with the terms of the notice. We will consider an application for a completion certificate within 28 days, provided we have all the information we need to assess whether the terms of the notice have been met. We will confirm our decision in writing and, if appropriate, issue a completion certificate. We may revoke a completion certificate if it was granted on the basis of inaccurate, incomplete or misleading information. If this happens, the compliance or restoration notice continues to have effect as if the completion certificate had not been issued.

Convictions Where a restoration notice is imposed and a person fails to comply with it, they could be convicted of an offence in respect of the act or omission that led to the notice. Once we have issued a final notice imposing a variable monetary penalty, the person cannot at any time be convicted of the offence that gave rise to the penalty.

Enforcement undertakings Where the Commission has reasonable grounds to suspect an offence may have occurred, a regulated organisation or individual may offer to enter into an enforcement undertaking. An enforcement undertaking involves the organisation or individual offering to take action to ensure that any non-compliance does not continue or recur, or that a position is restored as far as possible to what it would have been had the non-compliance not occurred. We will consider carefully all reasonable offers. But we are not obliged to accept an enforcement undertaking, and we will not agree to any until we have a full understanding of the nature and severity of the non-compliance. When considering whether to accept an enforcement undertaking we will take into account the following, non-exhaustive, list of factors:

Whether the matter was voluntarily reported

Whether there was any dishonesty, deception or misrepresentation in the offence or contravention

The cost of a full investigation

The need to deter non-compliance

Any advice given to the regulated organisation or individual on the relevant statutory requirements

The compliance history of the regulated organisation or individual, including whether enforcement undertakings have been given in the past

The likelihood of the proposed enforcement undertakings to prevent further offences or contraventions

The likelihood of the proposed enforcement undertakings to restore the position of those involved to what it would have been had the offence or contravention not taken place

The level of insight shown by the regulated organisation or individual as to why the offence or contravention occurred

Whether any apology or contrition has been expressed for the offence or contravention

Where enforcement undertakings are agreed but not carried out, we may impose a penalty or consider prosecution in respect of the original offence and/or contravention. Depending on the reasons for the failure to carry out the enforcement undertakings, this may be an aggravating factor in any decision as to the level of a penalty.

Appendix: Disclosure of information This appendix does not form part of the statutory guidance, and may be amended without consultation. We recognise that both the public and those we regulate have an interest in how we carry out our statutory monitoring and investigatory role. They also have an interest in knowing that regulated organisations and individuals are complying with the law on party and election finance, and that non-compliance will be dealt with appropriately.

While we are conducting assessments and investigations or imposing sanctions, we must make sure that our processes are fair. We will not disclose any information that might frustrate or undermine this fairness.

Public disclosure of assessments

We will not routinely publicise that any assessment has begun or is ongoing, or when it is concluded. If we are satisfied that it is in the public interest to do so, we may correct or confirm information about an assessment to ensure accurate information is in the public domain. This may include confirming the name of the individual or organisation and the potential offence or contravention being assessed. It may also include confirming the outcome of an assessment. We will notify the subject of the assessment before confirming their identity to anyone else.

Public disclosure of investigations and sanctions

In some circumstances, we may publicly disclose the opening of an investigation, including the subject and its expected scope. This includes, but is not limited to, when the matter has been the subject of public interest or reporting in the press, and by publishing we can advance the accuracy of information. We will not generally comment further while the investigation is ongoing, or provide public updates as to do so may hinder the conduct of the investigation. Once a month, the Commission publishes information on concluded investigations. This includes the subject and offences under investigation, whether an offence or contravention was established, and whether a sanction was issued. We will update the information to show when monetary penalties are paid. In certain instances, we will publish a more detailed investigation report, and/or media statement when a case concludes. When deciding whether to do so, we will take into account relevant factors, including: whether there is significant public interest in the case whether it is a particularly complex case that requires further explanation to the public whether publishing the details would help those we regulate to better understand PPERA requirements if a media statement was issued at the commencement of the investigation

We will notify the subject of the investigation prior to publication. Where appropriate and more commonly with detailed reports, the subject will have the opportunity to check the factual accuracy of the information to be published. Where a sanction imposed by the Commission is subject to an appeal, we will update the information on our website to include the outcome of the appeal. All of the above is subject to any legal restrictions which may affect disclosure. For example, we are prohibited from the disclosure of any information related to a donation received by a Northern Ireland recipient before 1 July 2017, except for the purposes of any criminal or civil proceedings. As a UK public body, we are subject to the Freedom of Information Act 2000 (FOIA). We will consider requests for information about assessments, investigations and sanctions made under the FOIA in accordance with that legislation. For further information see our Freedom of Information page . Annual report on the use of powers and sanctions

Under Schedules 19B and 19C of PPERA we are required to report annually on the use of our supervisory and investigatory powers, and civil sanctions. We include this information in our Annual Report.

Letter: To Twitter about digital campaigning at the EU referendum | Electoral Commission Search Letter: To Twitter about digital campaigning at the EU referendum You are in the Key correspondence section Home Key correspondence On this page Letter summary Read our letter in full First published: 16 November 2017 Last updated: 20 December 2019 Summary of the letter Date: 16 November 2017 To: Mr Nick Pickles, Head of Public Policy and Govt, UK and Israel, Twitter From: Louise Edwards, Head of Regulation Format: Sent by email Full letter Dear Mr Pickles Political campaign finance transparency I write in advance of our meeting on 30 November. We look forward to engaging with Twitter on the important issues arising from digital political campaigning. The Electoral Commission is responsible for regulating and enforcing the rules - set out in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) - that govern political campaign finance in the UK. These rules cover the funding of and spending on campaign activity, and include provisions and offences about acting as an agent for donations, and arrangements to evade the rules on donations. You will be aware of concerns that individuals or organisations from outside the UK, and notably from or on behalf of Russia, may have been campaigning via social media platforms in the June 2016 referendum on the UK's membership of the EU. Further, concerns have been raised that the individuals and funds behind such campaigning, if it occurred, were hidden from those viewing the campaign material. EU referendum campaign activity Campaign activity in the context of the EU Referendum included activities that were intended to, or were otherwise in connection with, promoting or bringing about a particular outcome in the referendum. This included campaign broadcasts, advertising of any kind, unsolicited material sent to voters and market research or other methods of finding out how people intended to vote. Further clarification on what constituted campaign activity was given in our guidance on referendum spending. The referendum was preceded by a regulated period, which ran from 15 April to 23 June 2016. During this period the rules stated campaign activities carried out by referendum campaigners – any individual or entity engaged in campaign activity, whether registered with the Commission or not – could only be financed from permissible donations. This excluded individuals not on the UK or Gibraltar electoral roll and companies not carrying out a business in the UK or Gibraltar. Request for information The Commission's legal duties include taking all reasonable steps to secure compliance with the campaign finance rules (see section 145 of PPERA). In furtherance of this duty, please provide us with the following information: Any evidence you hold of campaign activity conducted via Twitter during the regulated period for the June 2016 EU Referendum (15 April to 23 June 2016) that was funded from Russia. Please provide any such evidence to us by 8 December 2017. In anticipation of this, thank you for your prompt assistance on this important matter. June 2017 UK parliamentary general election Our work in respect of the June general election is ongoing. We may, as part of our assurance work in respect of the election spending returns, wish to contact you at a later date regarding campaign activity on your platform during the general election campaign. Please contact me if you have any questions regarding this request. Results and turnout at the 2016 Police and Crime Commissioner elections | Electoral Commission Search Results and turnout at the 2016 Police and Crime Commissioner elections You are in the Police and Crime Commissioner elections section Home Police and Crime Commissioner elections First published: 11 July 2019 Last updated: 6 August 2019 Download You can download the: full dataset as an XLS full dataset as a CSV (zip file) You can also download our full report , written by Colin Rallings and Michael Thrasher (Elections Centre, Plymouth University, Drake Circus, Plymouth, PL4 8AA). Summary Of the 36 Police and Crime Commissioner (PCC) contests in England, 20 were won by the Conservatives, 13 by Labour and 3 by Independent candidates. In Wales, Labour and Plaid Cymru won two posts each. The electorate for the PCC contests was nearly 33.7 million –31.4 million in England and 2.25 million in Wales. The names of some 3.0% of those on the ‘final’ register were added between December 2015 and 13 March 2016, and a further 1.5% between 13 March and the deadline of 16 April. Nearly 9.2 million votes were cast, making the overall turnout 27.3%. This is much higher than in 2012 but clearly influenced by combining the PCC contests with other elections in both England and Wales. The proportion of ballots rejected at the count (3.4%) was higher than at any other nationwide electoral event in recent years. The large majority of those rejected were deemed either ‘unmarked’ or ‘void for uncertainty’, but in more than a quarter of cases more than one candidate had been chosen in the first preference column. Some 24% of ballots were rejected at the count of second votes. In over 80% of cases this was because voters had failed to record any such second preference. More than 5.5 million postal votes were issued - 16.4% of the entire eligible electorate. In five counting areas more than 30% of the electorate had a postal vote. In England, more than 60% of those with a postal ballot returned it. By way of contrast, however, fewer than 20% of those electors required to vote ‘in person’ did so. The proportion of postal votes rejected or otherwise not included in the count was 4.4% – 4.4% in England and 5% in Wales. Rejection following a mismatch of signature and/or date of birth was more common than rejection for incomplete information. Failing to include either the ballot paper itself or the verification statement or both was the cause of nearly a third of rejections in England but more than a half in Wales. More than one half of one percent of electors with a postal vote were granted a waiver to use their date of birth as their sole identifier. Just 27,500 electors (0.08% of the total) appointed proxies. 3 Summary – combined elections In Wales every elector had the opportunity to vote in both National Assembly and PCC contests. In England 114 local authorities had both council and PCC elections and 169 had PCC contests only. The ballot box turnout was 32.8% in those areas of England with combined local and PCC elections; 20.2% in those places with standalone PCC contests. 4.0% of PCC ballots cast at combined elections were rejected at the count; 2.0% of those at standalone contests. In areas with combined elections 67.2% of postal electors returned their ballots; in PCC only areas 54.7% did so. Of those required to vote ‘in person’ the turnout was 26.6% where local elections were also being held; 14.0% where they were not. Some 5.4% of the ‘votes’ of those returning postal ballots at combined elections were not sent to the count because of documentation errors compared with 3.2% of those where only a PCC election was being held. Board notes: 5 December 2018 session on simplifying and modernising electoral law across the UK | Electoral Commission Search Board notes: 5 December 2018 session on simplifying and modernising electoral law across the UK You are in the Electoral Commission Board section Home How we make decisions Electoral Commission Board First published: 18 July 2019 Last updated: 23 July 2019 Overview Date: 5 December Time: After the board meeting Location: Boothroyd Room, 3 Bunhill Row, London Who was at the meeting Who was at the meeting John Holmes (JH), Chair Anna Carragher (AC) Sarah Chambers (SC) Elan Closs Stephens (ECS) Alasdair Morgan (AM) Rob Vincent (RV) Stephen Gilbert (SG) Alastair Ross (AR) Joan Walley (JW) Claire Bassett (CB), Chief Executive Ailsa Irvine (AI), Director, Electoral Administration Bob Posner (BP), Director, Political Finance and Regulation Craig Westwood (CW), Director, Communications and Research Kieran Rix (KR), Director, Finance and Corporate Services David Meek (DM), Senior Adviser, Governance Tom Hawthorn (TH), Head of Policy Niki Nixon (NN), Head of External Communications David Hampson (DH), Lawyer Laura Mcleod (LM), Public Affairs Manager Petra Crees (PC), Planning, Performance and Governance Manager Notes BP explained that the Commission had called for reform of electoral law since 2003, but this had not been a priority for successive governments. There had been targeted initiatives for change but these had merely tended to add complexity. The underlying framework was not fit for purpose, and the courts were struggling with interpreting the law. It might be that real change would only come in the context of an electoral or political crisis of some kind. A government with a large majority might also be needed to push through major change. TH provided a short introduction to the background paper. Modifying electoral legislation was one of our identified policy priorities. We wanted fewer pieces of legislation, which were better drafted and fit-for-purpose. We also wanted to focus on areas of greatest need, including definitions of offences, and ways to challenge elections. Ideally, a single bill would address the necessary changes, but the current environment was not conducive to this. We wanted to focus on seizing opportunities to promote reform as a good thing, and for people to think that the case for reform had become "irresistible". We would look for opportunities to promote this, but we needed to be careful about timing this well. JH thanked the team for the useful presentation and agreed the chances of achieving significant change before upcoming elections was small. AM noted that addressing only one or two areas would exacerbate the existing problem of complexity. This approach might also give governments the opportunity to feel that they had done enough in the reform area. JH agreed that there was a risk with piecemeal change, but there was also a risk in not taking all opportunities for significant improvements. In any case there were not currently enough advocates for change. SC suggested that future political developments might force people to ask questions about wider constitutional issues, which we might then be able to take advantage of. AR suggested we should work with government officials to build support. We also needed legal organisations to lead the campaign to simplify the statute book. AC agreed that we should not ignore low-hanging fruit if opportunities offered. On the question of advocates, we needed a politician or politicians who made reform their particular passion. We should also not ignore the possibilities of a successful Private Member's Bill at some stage. CB identified two distinct questions; what did we want to happen, and how should we try to make this happen? We needed to be clear about what was necessary to resolve the challenge; did we need a complete overhaul, or could piecemeal changes over time be enough? We should then focus on how it should be handled. JW suggested opportunities for major change only came along very rarely, so we needed to be ready with an ambitious programme when any opportunities did arise. We also needed public awareness to push politicians to act. A Speaker's Lecture could be an opportunity to push for change. SG agreed the law had become too complex, made worse for practitioners when long-established practices appeared to be challenged by the courts. We should work with political parties for major reform. For example we could get the compliance teams in political parties and lawyers in this area together to agree a proper, comprehensive reform proposal. SG also suggested using retired practitioners in the House of Lords to support this. ECS agreed with JW and SG and thanked the team for preparing the paper, but noted the lack of firepower in governments, including the devolved administrations, to push through reforms in this area. Nevertheless political parties were nervous about the digital world, and the implications of it for their work. JH agreed that digital nervousness might help motivate parties to support change. BP noted that government officials were in principle supportive of change but he had concerns about their capacity to deliver significant reform. The Law Commission had done a good job at one stage of identifying and working with advocates for change, for example by organising appropriate conferences and seminars. We could resurrect this approach at some stage, to help generate useful noise, but there was a timing issue – it was probably not appropriate to do this at this time. JH noted again the risk that real change would only happen through a crisis. CB noted that developments could sometimes move very fast. We needed to be prepared with a well-defined solution. CB asked if we wanted to push for campaign finance reform in addition to what the Law Commissioners had recommended. This was the other area where change was certainly needed. Should we push for this now, and suggest the Law Commissions should do work in this area too? But we could not commission the Law Commissions directly ourselves, and would need to persuade the government to do this. ECS noted that the recent disputes had all been in the financial sphere. This was the area most requiring simplification. SG said there would be disagreement between political parties about sources of funding, as there had always been, but there could be areas of agreement too, for example about the party/candidate split. CB said it was not for a regulator alone to say what the law should be in detail; there needed to be a collaborative process. CB said that if there was enthusiasm for more work in this area, for example though a new project, there would be a need for additional capacity in the policy team to undertake this work and the Board would need to indicate whether we should build it into the business plan. JH concluded that the enthusiasm was there for an ambitious approach, including in the area of campaign finance, and the broad case for more resources was accepted. We needed to work on this as a long-term project, without ignoring short-term opportunities that came along. The current Law Commission work needed to be implemented. CB suggested that as part of medium to longer term forward planning a project initiation document could be produced to scope/define the problem, using the Executive Team as a sounding board, before bringing the item back to the Board. A steering group including Board members could be very helpful in this area. This was agreed.

Putting voters first You are in the Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 section

Home Our plans and priorities Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 On this page Raising public awareness Focus on Wales and on Scotland Removing barriers to registering and voting Focus on Northern Ireland and on England Ensuring laws for parties and campaigners are clear and followed Ensuring the electoral system works effectively

First published: 25 April 2022 Last updated: 25 April 2022 Introduction To have a healthy democracy, voters need to be engaged in our electoral process, and confident that elections are free and fair. We will work to increase voter engagement and confidence by: raising public awareness of the electoral process removing barriers to registering and voting ensuring laws for parties and campaigners are clear and followed ensuring the electoral system works effectively Raising public awareness Public awareness of the electoral system – including how to register and vote – is key to voter engagement and confidence. Our research demonstrates that public awareness of how to register and vote is currently high. In February 2021, 93% of those surveyed as part of our annual public opinion tracking survey stated they knew how to register to vote, and 92% were confident they knew how to cast their vote. It is important that we continue to maintain and increase this awareness, and we will continue to refine and deliver effective public awareness activity ahead of elections. We will develop and expand our learning work, producing political literacy resources to help people understand how to get involved in our democracy. And we will ensure the information we provide to voters is accessible and transparent, keeping pace with developments in digital communications, and ensuring our public information services are tailored to voters' needs.

Focus in Wales and Scotland Focus on Scotland: Raising public awareness In Scotland, our public awareness work will include ensuring voters understand the differences between the various voting systems in use for different elections. It also includes supporting voter understanding of the different franchises for UK and Scottish elections. For example, we will work to raise public awareness of the Single Transferable Vote system which will be used for the Scottish Council elections in May 2022, and will ensure people are aware of who is eligible to vote in each election type, through to the next Scottish Parliament election in 2026.

Focus on Wales: Our learning work Following the extension of the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds and foreign nationals resident in Wales, we will continue to undertake public awareness campaigns and work with the wider electoral community and partner organisations. We will work to ensure new voters understand their eligibility and can confidently participate in the 2022 local government elections and 2026 Senedd election. We will also continue to work alongside all relevant partners to promote greater consistency in political education, and increase political knowledge and understanding amongst young people to ensure they can fully engage in our democratic system in Wales. This will include developing the good work already achieved with the publication of education resources and the further development of an education and learning programme in Wales. Removing barriers to registering and voting Our research shows that the current electoral system could be improved to meet the needs of all eligible voters. Results from our 2021 public opinion tracking survey show that people with a disability are more likely to be dissatisfied with the process of voting (10%) than those without a disability (6%).

We already know what many of the barriers people experience are, but we will do further work to identify issues with registering and voting, and will then take action to address them. We will broaden the range of third sector organisations we work with to understand the challenges, and will collaborate with policy makers and other partners to identify solutions. This includes influencing the development of new policies, to ensure additional barriers are not introduced. We will deliver effective targeted voter awareness activities for the groups identified, and will specifically support under-registered groups to engage in the democratic process. We will also continue to explore the feasibility of modernising the voting process itself, aware of the changing needs of voters in our digital age.

Focus of Northern Ireland and England

Focus on Northern Ireland: Reaching people who are unregistered

The 2021 electoral registration canvass in Northern Ireland provided an important opportunity to ensure that everyone's details are up to date and accurate on the electoral roll. Following publication of the revised register in December 2021 we will be able to use up to date data to focus our efforts on reaching out and engaging with those groups who have not registered or are less likely to do so. This work has begun as we prepare for the May 2022 Northern Ireland Assembly election and we will continue to build on it ahead of the local government elections in May 2023. We will also carry out an assessment of the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers in Northern Ireland in December 2022, which will provide us with an updated evidence base to inform the detail of our registration activity.

Focus on England: Supporting local authorities to engage with their residents

We know that local authorities already do a lot of good work to target different groups within their area and encourage them to register, as part of their work to maintain accurate and complete electoral registers. We want to do more to capture the learning from this activity and to share the good practice that exists, helping other local authorities to benefit from practices that have been shown to be effective.

Ensuring laws for parties and campaigners are clear and followed

The legitimacy of elections is dependent on clear laws which are understood and respected by parties and campaigners. We will ensure voters have accessible information about parties and campaigners participating in elections, including transparency on how they are funded and what they spend. We will raise public awareness of the rules on party and campaigner registration, donations, and campaign spending, and will help voters take action if they see something which concerns them. We will continue to maintain the official registers of parties and non-party campaigners, and will seek to remove barriers to campaigning to ensure that voters hear from a wide and diverse range of campaigners. We will improve voter access to our Political Finance Online database by updating and upgrading the search functionality. Where political financial data is incomplete, we will continue to enforce the law to ensure transparency and increased voter confidence in the system. We provide more details on how we will support parties and campaigners to comply with the law in Section 4 of this Corporate Plan.

Ensuring the electoral system works effectively

Key to voter confidence is an electoral system that works effectively. People should be confident elections are well-run, and should trust in the legitimacy of the results. Our 2021 public opinion tracking survey shows that 80% of people are confident that elections are well-run. We will continue to conduct significant research to report on how elections have been run, including detailed understanding of voters' experiences. This will enable us to raise concerns and make evidence-based recommendations where appropriate, with the ultimate aim of maintaining public confidence in the electoral system. We outline our plans to ensure the delivery of free and fair elections in Section 5, including our work to support resilient local electoral services.

Reforming electoral law You are in the section Home Overview Electoral law is out of date. Some of the laws that govern our democracy go back as far as 1872 and don't work for a digital age. These laws are at the heart of trust and confidence in politics. It's vital they're right today and the future. We're calling on the UK's governments to reform electoral law and make it simpler, up-to-date and future proof.

Outdated laws There are currently over 100 pieces of electoral legislation. Every type of election has its own legislation. We have to write hundreds of pages of guidance to explain the rules to candidates, political parties, electoral administrators, and voters. People who run elections may have to refer to multiple documents to make sure they're following the law. This is costly and time consuming.

Electoral law doesn't allow many simple processes to be done online, despite this being what people expect. Latest developments The Elections Act 2022 and its associated secondary legislation have substantially increased the size of the UK's body of electoral law. The UK's Law Commissions have already provided a blueprint for reform of electoral law that's widely supported by people who run, regulate and campaign at elections. The House of Commons Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee (PACAC) also highlighted the clear need for electoral law to be consolidated and simplified . The Committee on Standards in Public Life also support the case for consolidating and simplifying electoral law . The UK's governments should now prioritise the time and resources needed to create meaningful improvement.

Changes we want to see It's time for governments to take this seriously and commit to significant change. We want the UK's governments to modernise these laws. Electoral law that's fit for today and the future will make sure that: elections can be run better and more efficiently candidates, political parties, and voters can easily understand and follow the rules simple actions can be done online, improving services for voters and campaigners and reducing waste it's easy to update as things change we have stronger powers and the right tools to adapt to changes, like regulating spending on new channels Related content A modern electoral register Find out about the changes we want to see to the electoral registration system in the UK Transparent digital campaigning Find out about digital campaigning and the changes we want to see of elections Find out about the accessibility of elections and the changes we want to see Elections Act about the UK Government's Elections Act and what it means for voting and campaigning

Candidates section Home Campaign spending: Candidates First published: 2 February 2022 Last updated: 27 October 2022 About the data At the May 2021 Scottish Parliament election, there were 369 constituency and independent regional candidates who had to submit a spending return, listing details of what they spent during the election campaign. The dataset includes the headline figures for the spending incurred and donations received by candidates at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. We publish these figures to enhance transparency and provide voters with information on donations to candidates' election campaigns and their spending and to ensure that this information can be seen together in one place. The full individual candidate returns are available for public scrutiny from the relevant Returning Officers for a period of two years after an election. The returns include the total the candidate spent, as well as a breakdown of how much they spent on things like advertising, transport and public meetings. They also include any donations the candidate received above £50 during the short campaign. The data taken from the spending returns reflects what candidates and their agents submitted to Returning Officers in Scotland. We publish this information exactly as it appears on the candidate's return so that there is an accurate record of what was reported. Spending limits vary between constituencies. The vast majority of Returning Officers have sent us the returns submitted to them for inclusion in this dataset. Where information is missing, this may be because the Returning Officer didn't send them on to us, or because the candidate didn't submit their return to the Returning Officer. Under the law spending on promoting regional party list candidates counts as party spending,

Report on the May 2022 Scottish council elections | Electoral Commission Search Report on the May 2022 Scottish council elections You are in the Scotland local council elections section Home Scotland local council elections Currently reading: of 4 - Show page contents On this page Voting at the elections Campaigning at the elections Delivering the elections Supporting evidence Summary This report looks at how the May 2022 Scottish council elections were run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held this year in England , Northern Ireland and Wales . On 5 May 2022 elections were held across Scotland's 32 councils. Voters used the Single Transferable Vote (STV) system to elect their councillors, numbering the candidates in order of preference. We found that the vast majority of voters were satisfied with the process of voting and almost all were able to use their preferred method. Polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person. Most voters said they found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. However, while the level of spoilt ballots across Scotland has declined since the 2017 council elections, they increased in some wards and further targeted action is needed to address this. Some voters felt able to get their views across to voters, but many voters said they needed more information on the candidates in order to make an informed choice when they came to vote. Some candidates reported experiences of intimidation and abuse at these elections, which is not acceptable. We will work with the UK's governments, Police Scotland and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. While the elections were well-run the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern. Adequate staffing for polling stations proved a challenge in many areas. We found that Returning Officers took all the necessary steps set out in law to support disabled voters at the poll, and our public opinion research found increased levels of satisfaction amongst disabled voters. The Scottish Government has committed to a public consultation on ideas for future electoral reform in Scotland in the coming months. We hope that our report helps to inform that debate. Voting at the elections The experience of voters at the May 2022 elections The vast majority of voters (97%) were satisfied with the process of voting. This is consistent with findings at recent elections. Almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. Polling station voters felt confident that they could vote safely in person. While the level of spoilt ballots across Scotland has declined since the 2017 council elections, they increased in some wards; further action is needed to address this. Overview On 5 May 2022, elections were held to Scotland's 32 councils. Voters used the Single Transferable Vote (STV) system to elect their councillors, numbering the candidates in order of preference. Six wards out of the 355 across Scotland were uncontested, meaning that the number of candidates nominated was equal to or fewer than the total number of seats available. In these wards no poll went ahead and the nominated candidates were declared elected on polling day. In three of these wards the number of candidates was less than the number of seats available and, following 5 May, by-elections took place to fill the outstanding vacancies. A total of 4,222,332 people were registered to vote at the council elections. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run After each election we ask members of the public who were eligible to vote for their views on voting and elections. This enables us to understand whether there have been changes in the views of voters between comparable sets of elections. People remain satisfied with the registration and voting process People had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and

voting. Our research shows that: nearly all voters (97%) said that they were satisfied with the process of voting. This is consistent with the levels of satisfaction at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election (95%). Levels of satisfaction with the voting process were consistent across all age groups 82% of respondents said they were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. This is a slight fall from the 89% who expressed satisfaction after the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. Of the 10% of respondents who expressed dissatisfaction with the process, the main reason given was that they thought voter registration should be automatic (32%) or that it should be compulsory (23%) the vast majority of Scottish voters (94%) found participating in the election easy, and four out of five (81%) felt casting their vote was secret and that the elections were secure nearly all voters in Scotland (97%) felt safe voting in polling stations with the Covid measures in place Most people were confident the elections were well-run Nearly four in five (77%) people said they were confident the elections were well-run, with one in 10 (10%) saying that they were not confident. People aged 25 to 34 were the most likely to say that they were not confident (14%). When we asked people why they were not confident the elections were well-run, the most commonly given reasons related to a lack of information about candidates or the elections in general. Most people think that voting is safe from fraud Nearly nine in 10 (86%) people think that voting in Scotland is safe from fraud and abuse, which is an increase from the 80% who said so after the 2017 council elections. However, one in five (21%) said that they thought that either a 'lot' or 'a little' electoral fraud had taken place at the 5 May elections. We asked those people who thought fraud had taken place why they thought this, and the most cited reason was the lack of ID requirements when voting (45%). Other reasons given focused on things people had read or heard rather than anything they had directly experienced. Turnout at these elections was broadly consistent with the 2017 council elections Turnout at these elections was 44.8% which was a slight decrease from the turnout in 2017 (46.9%). People who told us that they didn't vote were most likely to say that this was because they did not have time (21%), they had medical or health reasons (11%) or they were not interested in politics (12%). People were confident that they could vote using their preferred method At each election people can vote in person, by post or by proxy (asking someone they trust to vote on their behalf). If a voter's situation changes close to polling day (for work or health reasons) then they may be eligible to appoint an emergency proxy up to 5pm on polling day. Ahead of the 2021 elections, the law was changed so that anyone who had to self-isolate close to polling day because they had tested positive for Covid, or had been in close contact with someone who had tested positive, could also appoint an emergency proxy. This change remained in place for the 2022 elections. In February 2022, the majority of Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) in Scotland wrote out to all households to remind them of who was registered to vote at that address, and whether they had a postal or proxy vote in place. Voting using their preferred method was possible for most people Most people who voted were able to use their preferred method: 78% of people said that they found it easy to get information on the different methods of voting available. nearly all people said they were able to vote using their preferred method with 96% of polling station voters and 94% of postal voters saying they had used their preferred method. Nearly four in 10 votes counted were cast by post Nearly 1 million (976,108) people were registered as postal voters at these elections, amounting to 23% of the electorate. This is a very slight decrease from the 2021 Scottish Parliament election but a substantial increase from the Scottish council elections in 2017 (17.8%). Over three-quarters (76%) of postal

voters cast their vote, amounting to 38.4% of all votes included in the count. The vast majority (97%) of people who voted by post told us that they found it easy to understand what to do, with 96% finding the postal voting instructions useful. Rates of postal vote rejection remain consistent with recent elections. When a postal ballot pack is returned to the Returning Officer (RO), the signature and date of birth are checked against those provided previously. Where these details are missing or do not match, the postal vote is rejected and not included in the count. Data collected from ROs indicates that 18,557 postal votes were not included in the count due to missing or mismatched signatures and/or dates of birth. This amounts to 2.5% of all postal ballots returned. This is comparable to the 2.4% that were rejected at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. We will continue to explore ways of improving the electoral system to meet voters' needs. As part of this, we will consider evidence about whether changes to postal voting documents or processes could help to reduce the number of postal ballot packs that are rejected at future elections. Emergency proxy voting remains an important safeguard to enable people to vote. There were 4,840 proxy voters appointed for these elections, amounting to 0.11% of the electorate. Of these, 550 people were issued with an emergency proxy as a result of medical or work emergency, including 242 for Covid reasons. Some Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) continue to raise concerns that eligibility for an emergency proxy does not extend to carers. This is of particular concern in the Scottish island communities where patients may be transferred to the mainland for medical treatment. In this case the patient would be eligible for an emergency proxy, but not any family member accompanying them. Recommendation 1

We continue to recommend that the Scottish Government work with the electoral community to explore ways to extend the provisions for emergency proxies to cover carers. Voters said that they found the ballot paper easy to fill in but concerns remain about levels of rejection in some wards. Nearly all voters (95%) said that they found the ballot paper easy to fill in, with 4% saying that they found it difficult. People aged 25-34 were the most likely to say that they found the ballot paper difficult to fill in (9%). Rejection rates for ballot papers remain high in some wards. Data from ROs indicates that 1.85% of all ballots were rejected at the count. This is slightly down from the 1.95% which were rejected in 2017. However, there is significant variation in rejection rates both across Scotland and within specific council areas, and in some wards the rejection rates have increased since the last set of council elections in 2017.

Glasgow – Canal Ward	5.64	5.36
West Dunbartonshire – Kilpatrick	4.51	3.71
West Dunbartonshire – Clydebank Central	4.21	3.66

Of those votes that were rejected, the data shows that the majority (64%) were rejected because there was more than one first preference expressed. Our observations at the counts and feedback from campaigners and electoral administrators suggests that these are largely where someone has placed an 'X' or a '1' next to multiple candidates from the same party. The Electoral Commission has previously carried out research which indicated that the wards with the highest levels of rejection were more likely to have higher levels of deprivation and unemployment. However, we also found that these wards were more likely to have more than one candidate standing from a particular party, thereby increasing the risk of voters placing 'Xs' against their preferred party's candidates on the ballot paper. We will repeat our ward level analysis when the new Scottish census data is available in 2023. The Electoral Commission will work with the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB) and Returning Officers to improve voter communications in

polling stations and postal ballot packs to reinforce messaging about how to complete the ballot paper. Further work to identify the wards at risk of a higher rate of rejected ballots will also support the targeting of election communication activity, to help minimise voter errors on the ballot paper. Some prisoners were entitled to register and vote at the elections. The 2022 elections were the second in which prisoners serving a sentence of 12 months or less in a UK prison, who would usually be resident in Scotland, had the right to vote, following the introduction of the Scottish Elections (Franchise and Representation) Act 2020. Data from EROs indicates that 49 eligible prisoners were registered to vote ahead of the council elections in 2022. EROs worked with the Scottish Prison Service (SPS) to ensure that they received notification where any eligible individuals entered the prison system so that they could invite them to register to vote. The Commission also worked with the SPS to develop and circulate a guide for prison staff and a poster to raise awareness amongst prisoners. The Scottish Government is required to review the arrangements for prisoner voting by March 2023. Ahead of this review, we are committed to continuing to work with EROs, the SPS and the EMB to ensure that prisoners who have the right to vote understand how to register and vote, and can access information and support as required. Work continued to support recently enfranchised voters to participate. The Commission continued to work in partnership with the electoral community and Scottish civic society to support young people and qualifying foreign nationals to engage in the elections. To encourage schools to run political education sessions and raise awareness amongst young people, we worked with partners across the education sector to run Welcome to Your Vote week in January 2022. Ahead of the awareness week, the Commission launched new education resources, including lesson plans, a template assembly on the council elections, and short interactive activities. We also delivered information sessions for teachers and care providers working with young people, in partnership with West of Scotland Development Education Centre (WOSDEC) and the Care Inspectorate. The Commission worked with a number of partners to distribute information to qualifying foreign nationals, including consulates, regional equality councils and charities. In collaboration with EROs and civil society organisations, we ran Welcome to Your Vote Day on 10 March, providing communication resources to support partners to raise awareness and running online information events. Civil society organisations which work with a range of under-registered audiences have highlighted a frustration that work to increase registration is only carried out ahead of elections. Whilst we have strong relationships with organisations across the third sector, there is a high level of staff turnover in charities, and a shift towards ongoing engagement work would reduce the need to rebuild relationships ahead of each election. The Electoral Commission will embed work to increase registration amongst under-registered groups outside of election periods. Existing partnerships will be maintained and strengthened through ongoing collaboration, and the Commission will scope opportunities for new partnerships to reach under-registered groups. Campaigning at the elections. The experience of campaigning at the May 2022 elections. The majority of candidates responding to our survey (69%) felt they were able to get their views across to voters, with printed material, social media and door-to-door canvassing the most popular methods. Just over half of voters said they had enough information on who to vote for, but a substantial minority (26%) disagreed. A notable minority of candidates who responded to our survey reported experiences of intimidation and abuse at these elections and action is needed to tackle this. We will work with the UK's governments, Police Scotland and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. While most candidates found election law easy to understand, there was an increased demand for advice and guidance on the law.

Introduction

A total of 2,548 candidates were nominated to contest the 1,226 councillor vacancies at the 2022 council elections. This was broadly equivalent to the numbers standing in 2017 (2,572). There were 357 independent candidates standing at the election and 2,191 candidates representing 26 different political parties (four more parties than in 2017). There were a number of changes to the campaign laws for candidates at these elections which included a requirement to report donations for the first time and the need to include an imprint on any digital candidate campaign material. The Electoral Commission provided guidance for candidates and agents on the laws in force at these elections. To inform our report we carried out research with candidates to understand their experience of standing at the elections, and we also talked to parties about the process. 5 were largely able to engage with voters Just over two-thirds of candidates who responded to the survey (69%) felt that they were able to effectively get their views across to voters. This is a significant increase from the 43% who expressed that view at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election. 5 used a variety of methods to engage with voters Traditional campaigning (namely leaflets and canvassing) remain the most popular campaigning methods compared to any digital method. Our research found that: the most popular campaigning method used by respondents was leaflets/newsletters/flyers. Overall, 90% of respondents put leafletting in their top-three campaigning methods, with just under two-thirds (63%) of respondents citing this as their most used a substantial number of respondents used social media in their campaigns, though it was primarily used to supplement traditional campaigning methods rather than being the primary tool. Two-thirds (68%) put social media in their top-three most used campaigning methods, with one in 10 (12%) saying it was their most used compared to almost a third (31%) who said it was their third most used when asked what digital campaigning methods respondents used, free methods were far more popular than any paid-for campaigning. Almost four in five (78%) respondents put posts on social media about their campaign, and over two-fifths (44%) asked supporters to share their posts. By comparison, the most popular paid-for digital campaigning method was paying for adverts on social media, which was done by 14% of respondents the other popular campaigning method was door-to-door canvassing, which was the most used tactic for just under a fifth (17%) of respondents. Overall, over half (56%) of respondents said that canvassing was in their top three campaigning methods One in five (20%) of candidates who responded to the survey said that the spending limit was too low, largely citing difficulties of reaching voters in large rural wards while remaining within the spending limit. Voters want more information about candidates Just over half (52%) of all voters said they had enough information on candidates to be able to make an informed decision on who to vote for. However, more than a quarter (26%) disagreed. Voters aged 25-34 were most likely to disagree (40%). When asked where they had seen information about candidates and parties, the most cited sources were leaflets or flyers from the candidate or party (61%) or from another source (27%). Political parties and candidates have raised concerns about their ability to provide information to voters and have called for council election candidates to be able to access a freepost delivery as is available at other elections. This proposal has been supported by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities (Cosla). Should this proposal be taken forward for the 2027 Scottish council elections, the Scottish Government will need to ensure there is sufficient time and resource to implement the proposal ahead of the elections. Some candidates reported experiences of intimidation at these elections. While over half (56%) of candidates who responded to the survey said that they did not have a problem with threats, abuse or intimidation, over two in five (44%) experienced some kind of problem (that is, on a scale of '1 to 5', rated their problem with threats, abuse or intimidation as a '2' or above). One in 10 (11%) said that they had a serious problem (rated '4' or '5' out of '5'). There was a difference between the reported experiences of those respondents identifying as either male or female. 1 , with a larger proportion of female respondents reporting problems with threats, abuse or intimidation (64% of male respondents said they did not have a problem with threats, abuse or intimidation, compared to less than half (48%) of female candidates who did not have an issue.) "In person intimidation/threats/abuse only happened when I was campaigning alone. I've decided not to do that in future, however it's frustrating when seeing other (male!) candidates campaigning solo seemingly without such concerns of intimidation." Of those that said they experienced some kind of abuse, the most common sources were verbal (55%) and online (53%). Over four in five of these (84%) said the abuse came from members of the public. Three in 10 (31%) said it was from an anonymous/unknown source, while a further one in 10 (11%) received threats or abuse from other candidates. One in 10 (10%) who experienced threats or abuse said that their experience(s) would discourage them from standing as a candidate in the future.

The vast majority (94%) of candidates who responded to the survey were confident that the Scottish council elections were well run. Almost two-thirds (64%) said they were very confident, and no respondents said they were not confident. The majority of candidates who responded to our survey were satisfied with all aspects of the nomination process: the vast majority (96%) agreed that the rules for becoming a candidate were easy to understand and follow over nine in 10 (94%) agreed that the nomination process was well run 85% of respondents agreed that they found the pre-nomination checks helpful, compared to 1% who disagreed, and 14% who said they neither agreed nor disagreed/didn't know. of those that interacted with their elections teams or needed to access their local authority offices, the majority (87%) were satisfied with their ability to do so

Over nine in 10 (92%) of candidates who responded to the survey attended the count and the majority of those who attended were satisfied with the experience. Of those who attended: nearly nine in 10 agreed that elections staff made it clear what was happening at all stages of the count (86%) and a similar proportion (92%) were satisfied with how efficiently the verification/count processes were run 94% agreed that the count process was transparent 93% were satisfied with when the count took place finally, 89% agreed that electronic counting of ballot papers worked well Candidates were broadly confident that no electoral fraud had taken place

Over nine in 10 (94%) respondents felt that, in general, voting is safe from abuse. Over two-thirds (69%) of respondents thought that it is very safe.

However, only half (51%) believed that no fraud at all took place in elections in their area. A fifth (21%) thought that there was ‘hardly any at all’, 5% said ‘a little’, and almost a quarter (23%) said they didn’t know. Reassuringly, no respondents said that there was ‘a lot’ of fraud. Most candidates understood the campaign spending laws. The majority of respondents to our candidate survey agreed that the law around spending, donations and personal expenses was clear, although the proportions were smaller than those who found the nomination process clear. Three-quarters (76%) agreed that the law on election spending and reporting was clear. 71% found the law on donations and how to check permissibility to be clear. Almost three-quarters (73%) found the law about personal expenses clear. Awareness about expenses related to disability was far lower than self-reported awareness about the general spending and reporting law. Just half (51%) of respondents said that they knew that expenses relating to a candidate’s disability did not count towards the spending limit. Candidates understood the new laws on the requirement for digital imprints on their campaign material but concerns continued to be raised around printed material. Nearly nine out of 10 (88%) respondents agreed that they understood the requirement to include imprints on digital campaign material, compared to 5% who disagreed. A smaller majority (72%) agreed that it was easy to meet these requirements, with almost one in 10 (8%) disagreeing. 70% agreed that digital imprint requirements improve the transparency of digital campaigning, while 7% disagreed and 17% said they neither agreed nor disagreed. The Electoral Commission received a small number of complaints about the lack of imprints on printed election material both from candidates and from political parties and non-party campaigners. Where complaints were received, we followed up with the party or campaigner concerned to remind them of the law and, where relevant, to ask them to bring their candidates into compliance. The Electoral Commission is responsible for investigating potential breaches of law on party and campaigner imprints while Police Scotland is responsible for investigating breaches of candidate imprint law. The Commission will continue to monitor compliance with the law by parties and campaigners and will take action where necessary and proportionate. Candidates and parties have called for the ability to submit spending returns electronically. Currently it is at the Returning Officer’s discretion whether they will accept spending returns electronically. Some political parties have asked for a consistent approach across Scotland in relation to the acceptance of digital spending returns. Our research with candidates found two-thirds (68%) of candidates would prefer to submit their spending returns electronically, compared to 16% who prefer paper spending returns and 17% who said they don’t know.

Recommendation 3 The Scottish Government should consider electronic submission of spending returns as part of their electoral reform agenda. Disabled candidates continue to value the Access to Elected Office Fund. The Access to Elected Office Fund is administered independently by Inclusion Scotland and financed by the Scottish Government. Its purpose is to offer financial assistance to disabled people to stand at elections. The financial assistance can be used to meet the costs of any adaptations needed to ensure a level playing field for disabled candidates.⁵⁴ 11 applicants were supported by the fund, with 48 of them going on to be candidates at the election. Of these, 22 were successfully elected. Our survey with candidates found that: more than half (52%) said they knew about the Access to Elected Office Fund. 11 respondents received support from the Access to Elected Office Fund. Of these, four said they would not have been able to stand if the Fund had not existed. A further five said they did not know whether they would be able to stand for election had the fund not existed. In a few comments, respondents made references to not being quite sure how the Fund worked, even from those who used it There was an increasing demand for advice and guidance from candidates The Electoral Commission and electoral administrators faced an increased demand from candidates for advice and guidance on the nomination process and the spending laws. Particular demands came from independent candidates and those representing smaller and more recently registered political parties. “As you would expect, independent candidates required more support than those standing for political parties, which resulted in an increased number of calls from independent candidates requiring additional information and support” “Smaller parties had poor paperwork, did not engage with the office early in the process, and frequently had to be reminded at deadlines”

Increasing opportunities for supporting candidates and parties The May 2021 Scottish Parliament elections were the first at which the Electoral Commission had a statutory role to provide advice and guidance to candidates and agents (although we had done so at previous elections at the request of the Scottish Government). Following feedback from the electoral community, we offered candidates and parties at these elections an increased range of support to understand and comply with political finance rules both before and after the elections. Alongside our standard advice and guidance support to candidates, we also ran seminars on the candidate laws at political party conferences in Scotland in the run up to the May polls. The Commission also ran an online seminar for candidates in advance of the polls which was attended by 183 candidates and agents. We also delivered virtual advice surgeries that allowed candidates and agents to book an appointment to speak to one of our expert advisers and discuss specific issues around the spending and donation laws. Due to the take up and demand, particularly from new and independent candidates, we offered further advice surgeries after the elections and in advance of the reporting deadlines, to provide support with spending returns. Our approach has been informed and led by the evidence and feedback we received in our most recent survey of the regulated community. We will continue to focus on delivering more bespoke advice and guidance resources so that parties and campaigners can easily understand the political finance laws, regardless of their size or experience. Delivering the elections The experience of electoral administration at the May 2022 elections The elections were well-run with no significant issues arising. However, the resilience of electoral administration teams remains a concern, with staffing polling stations proving challenging in a number of areas. Returning Officers took all the necessary steps to support disabled voters at the poll, and 96% of disabled voters said they were satisfied with their experience of voting. Section introduction Our evidence shows that the May 2022 polls, including electoral registration services, were well-run. Voters and campaigners reported high levels of satisfaction and confidence in both the voting process and the count. However, electoral administrators have reported that diminishing council resources are increasing pressures on the delivery of elections. The capacity of election teams continues to be stretched While Returning Officers and their staff reported fewer challenges than in 2021, at the height of the pandemic, concerns were still raised about their ability to continue to deliver elections with diminishing resources. Many Returning Officers struggled to recruit and retain enough poll staff Many Returning Officers experienced difficulties in recruiting sufficient staff for polling stations. The challenges included recruiting enough people in the first place and then managing levels of ‘call-off’ close to or on polling day. Planning for the council elections was undertaken when Scotland was still subject to Covid prevention measures, although many of these had begun to lift as voters went to the polls. This exacerbated the staffing challenges faced as some long-standing poll-staff were reluctant to work in the context of relaxed public health restrictions, whilst others were keen to take advantage of the easing of restrictions by going on holiday. "We had a number of polling staff call off due to Covid. We had to use all standby staff and some information officers ... to ensure that all posts were covered on day of poll." "Appointment of staff - particularly retention of Presiding Officers and other poll staff was a significant challenge and call offs (not Covid related) soaked up standbys recruited twice before the election. Causes huge administrative burden on small administration team at point of delivery in the last 2 weeks as backtracking to fill posts repeatedly and retrain." "Initial request to staff on our list returned limited availability and as Covid restrictions eased throughout the country, many poll staff – including long standing ones – called off." The Electoral Commission is working with the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB) and the wider electoral community across the UK to discuss and identify solutions to the staffing, resilience and capacity challenges experienced by Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and their teams. An immediate focus is addressing the challenges of recruiting on polling station staff. Further changes to the delivery of elections have the potential to increase pressure on already stretched elections teams unless well managed While Covid was the predominant factor highlighted as affecting the recruitment of staff, Returning Officers have also reported that diminishing council resources more generally are having an effect. This includes making it more difficult to pull in staff from other council departments to support staffing at the polls. Changes to the delivery of UK Parliament elections in Scotland are being introduced through the Elections Act. These have the potential to increase the challenge of recruiting and retaining skilled and experienced polling station staff for future elections, due to the additional responsibilities that Presiding Officers and Poll Clerks will need to deliver, such as checking voter ID. The Scottish Government is also planning to consult on electoral law reform, with any changes expected to take effect in time for the 2026 Scottish Parliament election. It is important that electoral administrators have early clarity about any legislative changes in order that they can plan effectively to deliver them. As a minimum, legislation should be clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented by administrators. Changes to legislation add to the already fragmented and complex sets of rules which must be followed at an election, increasing the risks of mistakes being made and public confidence in election results being undermined. We continue to recommend that both the Scottish and UK Governments commit to simplifying and consolidating electoral law, in line with the recommendations from the UK's Law Commissions. Counts were delivered well across Scotland Due to the complexities of counting the votes and calculating the results at an election which uses the type 2 of the Single Transferable Vote system of voting in place for council elections, all counts in Scotland were conducted electronically. The e-Counting equipment, including the software, is procured nationally by the Scottish Government on behalf of the 32 Returning Officers. As highlighted above, candidates had high levels of satisfaction with the count process. Electoral Commission representatives who attended counts across Scotland did not have any concerns about the delivery or transparency of the counts. Counts were delivered well across Scotland points Some Returning Officers raised concerns about late appointment of staff by the count suppliers A number of Returning Officers noted that, while their counts had gone well overall, the late appointment of supporting technical staff by the supplier had led to some difficulties, as the technical staff then had to familiarise themselves with the count process very close to the event. This had led to initial set up and operational

delivery problems at some counts which, while resolved, had raised concerns amongst those Returning Officers affected. “[They] appeared to lack experience of the system which gave us cause for concern in the run up to the count. While the team was very helpful and positive in their engagement their inability to diagnose problems and their lack of confidence using the system was quite worrying.” The Scottish Government and the EMB are currently carrying out a review of the e-counting project. Once that review has been concluded we would expect that any relevant recommendations are implemented so that Returning Officers can have full confidence in their delivery of future electronic counts. National co-ordination made it easier for people to find information on the election results At previous elections the media had raised concerns about difficulties in accessing reliable results information in real time. This had led broadcasters to send staff to every count venue in Scotland in order to collate results information. Concerns had also been raised by others with an interest in Scottish politics, including voters, about the lack of a central source for all election results. Ahead of the elections, the Electoral Commission worked with the EMB and communications staff from Scotland’s 32 councils to agree a common hashtag and format for the tweeting of each council ward’s results declaration. The EMB also collated the results for all councils and published them on their website, which enabled voters to access all the results in one place. Feedback from broadcasters was positive, and this approach should continue for future elections. The Electoral Management Board continued to support consistency in the delivery of elections The Electoral Management Board (EMB) has statutory responsibility for supporting the delivery of council elections in Scotland, including a power to direct Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers in respect of their duties at these elections. Directions issued by the Convener of the EMB at this election included timings for the dispatch of poll cards and postal votes and also for counts. Electoral administrators and the wider electoral community continue to value the role that the EMB plays in providing support and advice for the delivery of local elections. “Directions of the Convener of EMB invariably helpful and well timed.” “Everything worked well. Directions were helpful without being overly prescriptive or heavy-handed.” ROs improved the support available for disabled voters at these elections The Electoral Commission has a specific legal duty 3 to report on the steps taken by ROs to assist disabled people to vote at the election. To inform our report we asked for information from Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and polling station staff. We also looked at the views of disabled voters who responded to our public opinion research and gathered evidence from disability organisations. ROs improved the support available for disabled voters at these elections points The electoral community worked to improve access for disabled people. Following the 2021 Scottish Parliament elections, where some concerns were raised about Covid measures impacting on disabled people’s access to the poll, 4 work was undertaken to improve the service disabled voters received in polling stations. In January 2022, the Electoral Commission and the EMB ran a briefing event for electoral administrators which included contributions from representatives of disabled people in Scotland outlining some of the barriers faced in accessing voting. Following the event, videos of the contributions from disability organisations at these sessions were disseminated to electoral administrators and were widely used in the training of poll staff. “We used all EC training slides and accessibility at training events and encouraged staff to view videos on how to deal with disabled persons at the poll.” Electoral administrator All Returning Officers who responded to our survey reported having provided the measures required in law to support disabled voters. In 2021 some

sight impaired voters raised concerns about polling staff confidence in supporting voters to use tactile voting devices (TVDs)⁵ in polling stations. At this election no concerns were raised in relation to this, although some electoral administrators highlighted concerns raised by sight impaired voters about the usefulness of the TVD at an election using STV. "We did receive a couple of comments...regarding the use of TVDs – specifically that voters find it harder to use these in elections using STV (i.e using numbers to allocate multiple preferences)." The UK Government's Elections Act makes changes to the way disabled people are supported in the polling station at UK Parliament elections by replacing the prescription of what must be provided, including TVDs, with a requirement for Returning Officers to take all reasonable steps to support disabled voters to vote independently and in secret. This has the potential to improve the range and quality of support available and should speed up the process of providing additional support when a gap is identified, as legislation would no longer be required to allow the use of new technology. The Electoral Commission will provide guidance, developed in consultation with disability organisations and the electoral community, which ROs must have regard to in delivering their duties. It is important that disabled voters receive an equivalent level of support regardless of which election they are voting at in Scotland. The Scottish Government should monitor the impact of this legislation and consider whether similar provisions should be introduced to support the participation of disabled voters at devolved Scottish elections. Disabled voters reported a high rate of satisfaction with the voting process Respondents to our voter survey who defined themselves as disabled or with a long-term health condition were only marginally less satisfied with the process of voting than non-disabled voters: 96% of disabled voters reported satisfaction, compared to 97% of non-disabled voters. Nearly three-quarters (74%) of voters who had a disability or health condition that limited them a lot said they found the help/support from polling station staff useful, compared with 72% of non-disabled voters, and over half (55%) said they found the help/support from polling station staff very useful, compared with 51% of non-disabled voters. Disabled voters also reported finding it easy to get inside their polling station to vote (100%), including 83% who said it was very easy. More work is needed to reach disabled people with information on how to register and vote Respondents to our voter survey who defined themselves as disabled or with a long-term health condition were less likely to say they had enough information on how to cast their vote than respondents who did not consider themselves disabled (61% vs 69%). The Electoral Commission will continue to work in partnership with organisations representing disabled people in Scotland, and the wider electoral community, to address the information needs of disabled voters and to strengthen polling station staff training on accessibility. In depth: delivering the 2019 UK Parliamentary general election | Electoral Commission Search In depth: delivering the 2019 UK Parliamentary general election You are in the UK general elections section Home UK general elections On this page Electoral Registration Officers are under pressure: high volumes of applications at major electoral events Overseas electors again faced challenges when voting The timing of the election brought challenges for Returning Officers Voters continue to have positive views about how the election was run What next? First published: 21 April 2020 Last updated: 21 April 2020 Overview People were very satisfied with the processes of registering to vote and voting at the 2019 general election. They thought that they had enough information about the election, how to register, and how to cast their vote The number of registration applications made before the deadline was significantly higher than at the 2017 general election. 3.85 million people applied to register to vote. 660,000 applied on the last day to register Data from Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) shows that approximately one in three applications was a duplicate, submitted by someone who was already correctly registered. In some areas the data suggests that the proportion of duplicates was even higher The most frequently mentioned concern in feedback from overseas electors was about not receiving their postal vote in time to complete it and send it back More than a third of s who responded to our survey said that they or their teams were struggling with the demands of the role and the extra workload from unplanned electoral events in 2019 Electoral Registration Officers are under pressure: high volumes of applications at major electoral events Register to vote on a mobile Electoral Registration Officers are under pressure: high volumes of applications at major electoral events Public interest in major electoral events is increasingly driving electoral registration applications just before elections. An accessible online registration process means it is easy for people who want to make sure they can take part to submit an application, and to do so close to the deadline. EROs and their teams were under pressure to process large numbers of registration applications during the period before the deadline in November 2019. The number of applications made before the deadline was significantly higher than at the 2017 election. 2017 2019 2.9 million people applied between the Prime Minister's announcement of the election and the registration deadline 3.85 million people applied between MPs voting to approve the election and the registration deadline 612,000 people applied on deadline day 660,000 people applied on deadline day Duplicate applications A large number of duplicate applications added unnecessary pressure for EROs and their teams. EROs and duplicate applications Data from EROs shows that many applications were submitted by people who were already correctly registered: Approximately one in three applications received before the deadline was a duplicate In some areas the proportion of duplicate applications was even higher Only around half of all applications led to an addition to the register We received feedback from 160 EROs, Returning Officers (ROs) or s from across the UK. Nearly half (46%) of those who responded to our survey said that the volume of duplicate applications received during the election caused strain on resources and staff, who had to work significant additional hours to process them in time, alongside processing applications to vote by post and proxy. Feedback from s "The duplicate process is a nightmare throughout the year but during a high profile election it becomes a huge drain on resources." "Number of duplicate applications is unacceptable and creates additional enormous workload for no benefit to the register." Feedback from s EROS and postal votes Additionally, the electoral registration and postal voting application deadlines fell on the same day in Great Britain, after Parliament

changed the law. It passed the Early Parliamentary General Election Act 2019 in November, to make sure the registration deadline was the same across the UK. EROs and electoral administrators told us that they felt additional pressure at this election as they processed both types of application to the same deadline. As a result of these pressures, EROs and their teams found it hard to provide the level of resource needed to process applications. In some cases this meant that voters didn't receive the service they should be able to expect. For example: In Plymouth, the ERO had included 1,451 people in the electoral register who had not completed an individual registration application. They identified and resolved this problem before polling day, but it meant that there was confusion about whether some people were able to vote in the election. There was limited time for the people who were affected then to apply to register correctly before the deadline. The ERO did not fully meet our performance standards In Northern Ireland, the Electoral Office sent letters seeking required additional information from some people who had applied to vote, but some letters included an incorrect deadline for response. The Chief Electoral Officer confirmed that anyone who responded after this point, but before the actual deadline, would have had their registration processed correctly. It was also told us that the large number of registration and absent vote applications had an impact on their capacity to focus on running the election at a critical point. Feedback from an EROs need more support EROs need more support to help them continue to deliver the level of service that people should be able to expect before major electoral events. The UK Government should look at the funding model for future UK Parliamentary elections to ensure EROs can handle large numbers of registration applications. More fundamentally, it should also look at how the online register to vote service and electoral management software systems could be improved to reduce the number and impact of duplicate registration applications. The UK's governments should also explore reforms that would make it easier for people to register or update their details throughout the year, such as integrating applications into other public service contacts, or more automatic forms of registration. This could help reduce the need for people to make new applications immediately before an election. Overseas electors again faced challenges when voting Some British citizens living abroad found it difficult to make sure their votes were able to be counted. Overseas voters found it difficult to vote Votes being counted Overseas voter experience Just over 230,000 people were registered as overseas electors, making up 0.5% of the total UK electorate. Many overseas electors who chose to vote by post had a tight deadline to receive and return their postal ballot papers before polling day: ROs could only begin printing ballot papers after the deadline for nominating candidates on 14 November This left less than four weeks to print and issue postal ballot packs, and for overseas electors to receive, complete and return their ballot papers before polling day People who registered or applied for a postal vote close to the deadline had only two weeks to receive, complete and return their postal vote We received feedback after the election from more than 500 overseas voters. The most frequent problem they mentioned was not receiving their postal vote in time to complete it and send it back. Overseas electors were dependent on the speed of the postal service in the country where they live. Quote from overseas voter "My overseas postal vote arrived the day before the election. This left no time to send it back, and so I was not able to vote despite my desire to." "The ballot arrived Saturday afternoon. I paid $35 for express shipping to get it back to the UK as soon as possible but it was still unlikely to arrive in time (letters normally take around a week). I don't know why it arrived so late." "IT DOES NOT WORK. My post was sent too late to arrive for me to return it, will not reach the UK in time. I have no vote." "My postal vote did not arrive until 5 working days before the election, making it impossible for my vote to be counted." Views from overseas electors Experience of postal and proxy process Some overseas electors also told us that they did not know they could ask someone in the UK to vote on their behalf by post (known as a 'postal proxy'). This could have been more convenient for the proxy voter, rather than having to travel in person to a polling station that could be far from their own home. More than half (53%) of s who responded to our survey said that they had spent significant time dealing with queries from overseas voters who were experiencing issues with postal or proxy votes during the election. We also received large numbers of queries ahead of the election from people living overseas who wanted to know if, and how, they could vote. This was not the first time that we have seen evidence of these problems for overseas electors. We highlighted evidence in our statutory reports on the 2015 and 2017 UK general elections, as well as following the 2016 EU referendum and the 2019 European Parliament election. At the 2019 general election, the Cabinet Office and Royal Mail put in place a system for faster delivery of postal ballot packs to overseas electors. This does appear to have improved the experience for some electors, but there was still not enough time for overseas electors in some countries to return their votes in time for them to be counted. Overseas electors should be able to expect that their vote will be counted. The UK Government should consider innovative new approaches to voting for overseas electors, using evidence from other countries. This could include the ability to download and print postal ballot papers or vote at embassies and consulates. The UK Government plans to increase the number of British citizens living abroad who can register to vote, by removing the current time limit of 15 years since they were last registered to vote in the UK. As more voters will be affected by the issues identified with postal voting, it will be even more important to give overseas electors ways of voting that mean they can be confident their votes will be counted at future UK Parliamentary elections. The timing of the election brought challenges for Returning Officers The timing of the 2019 election was unusual. It was the first general election to be held in December since 1923, and polling day was less than two weeks before Christmas. This brought specific challenges for ROs and their teams. Polling station image Polling station sign Challenges of timing The election process also began while the scheduled annual electoral registration canvass was still being carried out across Great Britain. Electoral administration teams had to complete their legal responsibilities to process canvass forms returned from households and invite new residents to register to vote, at the same time as setting up the administration of the election. Feedback that we received from EROs, ROs or s from across the UK highlighted some common challenges that they faced: Staff working in elections teams faced significant pressure and worked long hours to complete the annual canvass and deliver the election at the same time Some electoral management software systems had problems running election processes alongside the annual canvass ROs found it harder to recruit temporary staff, including polling station and counting staff, for an election held just before Christmas Some venues that ROs normally use for polling stations or for the count were already booked for seasonal events and were not available for this election. Larger volumes of post during the Christmas period saw reported delays in issuing and returning postal votes in some areas. More than a third (38%) of those who responded to our survey said that they or their teams had struggled with the demands of the role and the extra workload from unplanned electoral events in 2019. The early general election in December followed the May 2019 European Parliament elections across the UK which had remained scheduled in law, but had not been expected to take place. Scheduled local government elections also took place in many parts of England and across Northern Ireland in May. Feedback from an electoral administrator The pressure put on electoral administrators is untenable. This was our third all out election in a year, two of which were unscheduled. Our mental health is fragile at best. We are exhausted and completely fed up. Feedback from an Errors We saw evidence of printing errors on poll cards or postal ballot packs that caused confusion for electors in a small number of constituencies. Some ROs explained that they thought that the risk of printing errors was higher at this election because of the tight deadlines for checking proofs, combined with pressure on printer availability and capacity. In Waltham Forest, postal ballot packs were not initially sent to 1,470 postal voters because a data file was not sent to the printers. As soon as the problem was identified the postal votes were issued. Candidates and agents were told about this and information was put on the council's website. However, because some postal voters got their postal vote very close to polling day, they might not have been able to fill it in and send it back in time for it to be counted.

The RO did not fully meet our performance standards. These competing pressures and errors also speak to the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We have already seen similar problems at elections held at other times of the year, particularly when different elections are combined and held on the same day. Feedback from an electoral administrator Very difficult to follow. Disparate and some of later legislation contradicts earlier legislation and not in-keeping with current times and technology Feedback from an Modernising electoral law The Law Commissions of England, Wales and Scotland have now published the final report of their detailed review of electoral law. They have made recommendations to simplify and modernise the law that would help improve how elections are run. The UK's governments need to commit resources and time to reform electoral law, building on these comprehensive and well-supported recommendations. Voters continue to have positive views about how the election was run After each election we carry out research with the public to find out what they thought about taking part in the election. Our voter research Our research found that people were very satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting at the 2019 UK general election: 78% of people were satisfied with the process of registering to vote 93% of people who voted at the election were satisfied with the process of voting More research from voters People also thought they had enough information about the election: 80% of people said that they knew a lot, or a fair amount, about the election 81% of people said they found it easy to access information on what the election was for 88% of people said it was easy to get both information on how to register to vote, and how to cast their vote These are similar to positive levels of satisfaction that we have found at other recent UK-wide elections or referendums. More than two in three people (69% of voters and non-voters) said they were either very or fairly confident the election was well-run (12% said they didn't know). This was similar to the level we found at the 2010 UK general election, but generally lower compared with other UK-wide elections or referendums in recent years, and ten percentage points lower than the 2017 result (where 79% were confident). However, our 2019 survey cannot tell us whether public confidence is returning to levels seen in the past or the start of a more significant decline. A significant minority of people (18%) said that they were not confident the election was well-run. We asked these people to select reasons why they were not confident the election was well-run. The most common reasons related to concerns about campaigning or the media. Some people also selected concerns that related to the way the registration or voting process worked: 28% of those who were not confident the election was well-run said they thought that some people did not have the opportunity to vote or had the opportunity taken away 22% said they were not confident because the election was held at short notice 17% said they were not confident because they thought some people had difficulties registering to vote More than 7 out of 10 of all voters and non-voters (72%) said that they thought voting in general is safe from fraud and abuse. A very small proportion of people said they had direct or second-hand experience of electoral fraud at the election: 2% said that they knew someone who had committed electoral fraud. 1% said that they personally saw someone vote when they were not allowed to. Despite these low percentages, more than a third of people (38%) said they thought that some fraud had taken place at the election. This is consistent with evidence about allegations of electoral fraud at the election. Data from police forces shows that they recorded 156 cases of alleged electoral fraud relating to the election. Of these cases, just over half required no further action following initial inquiries by the police, and one sixth were locally resolved. One third of the reported cases remain under investigation. Table Vision People trust, value and take part in elections Purpose We work to promote public confidence in the electoral system and ensure its integrity. Key benefits Increased trust Increased value Increased participation Strategic objectives Objectives: accessible registration and voting transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance resilient local electoral services fair and effective electoral law a modern and sustainable electoral system Three key factors will help us achieve our objectives: we demonstrate independence and integrity we are a skilled organisation where diversity is valued we are a learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used effectively Values Engaged Authoritative Making an impact Transparent Independent Our purpose We work to promote public confidence in the electoral system and ensure its integrity. Our strategic objectives Our five strategic objectives for the period April 2022 to March 2027 are: 1. Accessible registration and voting Free and fair elections depend on all people who are eligible and want to vote being able to do so. We will work to ensure: increased levels of voter registration, especially amongst groups that currently have difficulty engaging in the process the removal of barriers, especially those that affect people who currently have difficulty trying to cast their vote We will achieve these outcomes by working collaboratively with policy makers and other partners to identify barriers to participation and propose solutions. We will directly support people who have difficulty engaging in the process, with tailored accessible information and learning resources, and targeted public awareness activity. We outline our plans to support accessible registration and voting in Section 3 of this Corporate Plan. 2. Transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance Parties and other campaigners should be able to campaign without facing undue actual or perceived barriers, while we continue to ensure political finance is transparent. This will support voters to hear a range of campaign voices to help them take decisions when voting. We will work to ensure: increased levels of confidence shown by candidates, parties and other campaigners in their ability to understand, apply and comply with the law on campaigning and political finance high levels of compliance with registration, reporting and other political finance laws We will achieve these aims by maintaining the official registers for parties and campaigners, and ensuring political finance data is accessible, transparent and complete. We will provide guidance and support for all types of campaigners and make regulatory decisions which command the confidence of candidates, parties, campaigners, and voters. We outline our plans for transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance in Section 4 of this Corporate Plan. 3. Resilient local electoral services Local electoral services need to be able to respond to increasingly challenging economic, social and environmental pressures. We will support local authorities and electoral administrators to deliver effective, sustainable and resilient electoral services, ensuring that voters receive the service they should be able to expect. We will work to ensure: sustained and consistent high performance in the delivery of well-run elections increased levels of confidence shown by electoral administrators in the resilience of the electoral system We will achieve these aims by setting challenging standards for electoral administrators, and providing guidance and support to ensure they are met. We will work collaboratively with local authorities, national bodies, the Welsh Government and Senedd, and other UK governments and parliaments to build resilience into the electoral system. We outline our plans to ensure resilient local electoral services in Section 5 of this Corporate Plan.

4. Fair and effective electoral law

It is essential for the electoral system that the laws which underpin it are fair, effective and well understood. Electoral law must also keep pace with other developments in our society, harnessing technology and working on a continual process of modernisation. We will work to: support the Welsh Government and Senedd, and other UK governments and parliaments, to reform electoral law to make it less complex reduce the risks and inefficiencies associated with electoral law which impact our electoral system. We will achieve this aim by continuing to research and understand how electoral law could be reformed to help voters, campaigners, electoral administrators, and other organisations. We will also continue to provide expert advice on the practicability and impact of any changes to improve the electoral system. We outline our plans to work towards fair and effective electoral law in Section 6 of this Corporate Plan.

5. A modern and sustainable electoral system

The electoral system needs to be resilient to the challenges that lie in and beyond the period of this plan. It needs to modernise to maintain and improve value for money, transparency, trust and compliance. And, it needs to reduce its environmental impact to be sustainable. We will work to ensure: data and technology are harnessed to meet the needs of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators the changing risks to the election system from the misuse of data and technology are understood and acted upon strong relationships and streamlined working practices with all bodies that are part of the electoral system are developed the Welsh Government, other UK governments and the wider electoral community are supported to adopt a strategy and implementation plan which reduces the environmental impact of our electoral system We will achieve these aims by working with others to explore and implement new ways to use data and technology across the electoral system. We will also continue to monitor, advise and act on the misuse of data and technology. We will develop a strategy and implementation plan which reduces the environmental impact of the electoral system, to include innovative evidence-based solutions. We outline our plans to work towards a modern and sustainable electoral system in Section 7 of this Corporate Plan. We also outline our plans to make our organisation carbon neutral, consistent with governments' targets, in Section 8. Underpinning this work Three key factors will make a difference to how we achieve these strategic objectives:

1. We demonstrate independence and integrity To fulfil its duties, it is essential that an electoral commission remains independent from governments, and acts impartially and with integrity. We will continue to demonstrate how we fulfil this by: taking decisions on the evidence and being transparent about the reasons for them basing our policy positions and recommendations on analysis of evidence effectively communicating our work and views providing responsive services to those we support maintaining effective governance arrangements
2. We are a skilled organisation where diversity is valued We work hard to ensure our people feel part of a diverse, inclusive and supportive workplace. In the next five years we will: implement refreshed working practices to reflect wider changes in our work environment and culture attract, retain and develop the people we need maintain and improve high standards of management, with a focus on developing our people further embed equality, diversity and inclusion in all aspects of our work
3. We are a learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used efficiently We are committed to utilising technology, funding, time and resources to deliver maximum value. We will invest in our systems and in reducing our environmental impact. In the next five years we will: procure and implement value for money technology that improves service delivery as appropriate maintain a sound prudent financial strategy continue to develop techniques to learn from experience, seek continuous improvement and become more efficient and effective develop a corporate environmental strategy that meets policy and legislative requirements Navigation 1. Performance analysis 2021/22: Goal four You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 On this page Key achievements Performance measures Supporting the organisation Impact of Covid-19 Commitment to EDI First published: 1 August 2022 Last updated: 1 August 2022 Goal Four To provide value for money, making best use of our resources and expertise to deliver services that are attuned to what matters most to voters. This goal provides a focus to activities that support the organisation and ensure we have the appropriate skilled people, resources, technology, systems and governance. The aim is to deliver services that are efficient, effective and economical. Key achievements To support our organisation, we: implemented our new accountability arrangements with the Scottish Parliament and Senedd which came into effect on 1 April 2021. reviewed and refreshed how we deliver legal services carried out an all staff survey and used the results to identify areas for the Senior Leadership Group to prioritise for development in line with our corporate plan. Key initiatives include developing a behavioural charter and redeveloping our learning and development approach. completed internal and external consultations on our new Equality Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) strategy, a final version of which is now being produced developed a race equality action plan through the Race at Work Taskforce completed renovations of our working environment to support more flexible ways of working continued to develop our quality assurance approach to help us continuously improve our processes Performance measures Measure Performance Deliver our Ways of Working project to deliver digitally enabled business change to reflect the expectations on a modern employer and ensure the core ICT offering can support those changes. Completed Stakeholder and staff satisfaction with IT tools Not Met / Ongoing 1 Work with the Scottish Parliament and Senedd to implement our new accountability arrangements, including a new funding formula and business plans for Scotland and Wales Completed Implement our new People Strategy Ongoing Maintain high staff engagement scores in the annual staff survey and ensure indicators such as staff turnover are at appropriate levels Staff engagement score: 67% (Civil Service average: 64%) Staff turnover: 14.2% Identify options, costs and benefits of e-procurement and implement a new system accordingly Completed Monitor significant variances on all budgets and, where appropriate, reduce these variances over the five years of our Corporate Plan Completed Deliver a project to examine how well we manage customer enquiries across the whole range of the Commission's work Completed Supporting the organisation In common with all organisations, the Covid-19 pandemic has transformed the way we work and presented major challenges. Our aim throughout has been to maintain staff wellbeing, so we could continue to deliver without interruption for voters and our electoral stakeholders. Returns to the office, as conditions allowed, were managed with care, balancing staff safety and the benefits of in-person collaboration. Responses to the staff survey that took place in autumn 2021 showed that 94% of respondents felt that the Commission effectively responded to the Covid-19 pandemic. Nevertheless, we have learned and documented lessons from our response to the pandemic, and are reviewing our crisis management plans accordingly. Remote working has highlighted the need for substantial investment in our information technology infrastructure to bring it up to date, support hybrid working and provide an efficient and user-friendly working environment. This was the first year of direct accountability to, and funding by, the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd, as alongside our longstanding relationship to the UK Parliament. We have worked closely with officials in all three parliaments in order to make a success of these unique arrangements, and have agreed detailed mechanisms to ensure efficiency and transparency. We have made further progress on equality, diversity and inclusion, although this will remain a key priority as we develop the people strategy to underpin our new corporate plan. Our Race at Work Taskforce continues to ensure that the voices of our black, Asian and minority ethnic staff are heard and provide a force for change. We have consulted on a new Equality, Diversity and Inclusion strategy and enhanced our Equality Impact Assessment process. And we have groups dedicated to supporting staff with bullying and harassment, to supporting those with mental health issues and to promoting dignity and respect at work. Impact of Covid-19 Where government restrictions required, we have continued to work predominantly from home for much of the year. With the lifting of restrictions we started a phased return to the office that builds on our long-standing use of home-working to develop a hybrid approach. We embraced hybrid working in a way that allows us to balance business need and staff wellbeing. There were no significant additional financial costs to complete this work. Commitment to EDI The Commission serves a diverse democracy and is committed to equality, diversity and inclusion. We have taken a number of steps during the year to help us deliver on this commitment: •We have produced a new Equality, Diversity and Inclusion strategy, on which we consulted during winter 2021-22. We are grateful to those who commented and will publish a final version of the strategy during 2022-23; We refreshed our approach to Equality Impact Assessments as part of our ongoing compliance with the Public Sector Equality Duty; We brought in external consultancy to help us raise our awareness and knowledge of EDI issues, and now have a permanent senior lead; We have continued the work of our Race at Work Charter Task Force Report navigation links Previous Next Performance analysis 2021/22: Goal three Wales (devolved) annual report 2021/22 1. Staff survey results and network performance show that IT infrastructure performance has not been satisfactory. We have continued to roll out upgrades across infrastructure, devices and applications in this year, however implementation was delayed due to the impact of Covid-19. We shall evaluate in the coming year ■ Back to content at footnote 1

Report: The regulation of campaigners at the referendum on the UK's membership of the European Union held on 23 June 2016 You are in the EU referendum section Home EU referendum On this page Funding the campaigns and campaign spending Regulation and enforcement Lessons for future referendums Recommendations: Campaign funding Recommendations: Campaign spending Recommendations: Reporting Recommendations: Enforcing the rules Download our full report First published: 13 June 2019 Last updated: 9 August 2019 About the referendum Our first report on the EU referendum, published in September 2016 1 , focused on the administration of the referendum, including the experience of voters and campaigners, the management and delivery of the poll, the regulation of campaigners at the referendum and the provision of information for voters. This second report includes information on the use of our investigatory and sanctioning powers and analyses the funding and spending of those people and organisations that registered to campaign. Where appropriate, we make recommendations to inform the regulation of future referendums based on the information campaigners were required to submit in their spending and donation returns 2 . Funding the campaigns and campaign spending After the EU referendum, registered campaigners were required to submit a campaign spending and donation return to the Commission. The returns included details of the spending that the campaigners incurred campaigning at the referendum and all donations and loans they accepted over £7,500. s were also required to provide a total figure of any donations and loans of £7,500 or below, but over £500. Anything with a value of £500 or less was not counted as a donation or loan for the purpose of the referendum rules. s that are registered political parties were required to submit details of the spending they incurred campaigning at the referendum. They were not, however, required to report donations or loans towards that spending during or after the referendum (unless they are minor parties). The regulatory rules on political parties ensure there are controls on the sources of their funding and transparency of where that funding has come from 3 . The data in this report is taken from the statutory returns submitted by campaigners on the 23 September 2016 and 23 December 2016. Any changes in the campaign finance data resulting from our on-going compliance work will be available on our website. In summary: 123 campaigners registered with the Commission from 1 February 2016 - 63 indicating they supported 'Remain' and 60 supporting the 'Leave' side. Appendix 1 provides a list of the campaigners that registered for each outcome. Registered campaigners reported spending a total of £32,642,158 campaigning at the EU referendum and reported having accepted donations totalling £30,714,106 and loans of £6,071,940. s that registered to campaign for the UK to remain in the EU reported spending £19,309,588. s that registered to campaign for the UK to leave the EU reported spending £13,332,569. The two designated lead campaigners reported total spending of £13,510,049 - The In Campaign Ltd reported spending £6,767,584; and Vote Leave Ltd reported spending £6,742,466. Political parties that registered to campaign at the EU referendum reported spending of £9,030,300. 58 other registered campaigners reported spending of £10,101,809 4 . Out of total reported donations of £30,714,106, the reported donations to those that registered to campaign for the 'Leave' outcome amount to £15,854,432 and for the 'Remain' outcome to £14,859,674; 52% and 48% of total reported donations respectively. More information on campaign funding and spending of the registered campaigners at the EU referendum can be found on our website. Our website also contains charts that allow users to analyse the data 6 . Regulation and enforcement Our regulatory activity during the referendum campaign was aimed at preventing breaches of the campaign spending rules before they occurred. To do this we used a range of regulatory tools, including the provision of an advice service for campaigners and the public as well as monitoring the campaigns to identify and engage with activity that risked breaking the rules. Where appropriate, proportionate and necessary, we took regulatory or enforcement action including investigations leading to sanctions. Further details are given in Chapter 2. We are confident that our regulatory activity during the campaign prevented major breaches of the rules. We are, however, considering a number of issues under our Enforcement Policy following an initial inspection of the spending and donation returns submitted by campaigners. Lessons for future referendums As had been the case at previous referendums held under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA), a number of changes and improvements were made to the regulatory controls specifically for the EU referendum. These changes were made by Parliament through the specific EU Referendum Act 2016 and associated secondary legislation, rather than updating the standard referendum rules set out in PPERA. This means that those changes will not apply for future referendums, unless they are again included in the specific referendum legislation. Overall, the financial controls that applied at the EU referendum worked well and improved on the rules that applied at previous referendums. We did, however, make a number of recommendations intended to improve the regulation and reduce the burdens on campaigners at future referendums in our first report published in September 2016. We have identified further lessons that can be learnt from the information campaigners were required to submit in their spending and donation returns to further refine the legal framework in relation to campaign funding, spending and reporting. These include important recommendations to increase transparency during the months before the referendum by providing that prepoll reporting should apply at all future referendums in the UK, and to help ensure the integrity and effectiveness of the referendum spending rules by clarifying the controls that apply when campaigners incur joint spending. Our ongoing compliance activity may also result in lessons for future financial regulation. We have also restated a number of our previous recommendations. These include that the statutory restrictions on the publication of promotional material by Governments and other publicly funded bodies should be significantly redrafted before any future referendum, and that campaign-related staff costs should be included in the limits on political party election and referendum campaign spending. We have provided below an overview of all the recommendations made in this report, which build on the 15 recommendations made in our first report (these are also repeated here, in appendix 2). Where appropriate, we recommend that certain changes should be incorporated into PPERA so that they apply for all future referendums. Recommendations: Campaign funding Recommendation 1: Loan controls should be incorporated into PPERA. The absence of loan controls in the PPERA referendum rules is a significant gap in the regulation of referendums. The UK Government should bring forward the relevant secondary legislation to introduce loan controls at all future referendums held under the PPERA framework. Recommendation 2: The individuals and bodies eligible to register to campaign at referendums should be the same as the eligible non-party campaigners at elections. The ability of the additional eligible campaigners to donate and lend to other referendum campaigners should also be considered. The list of individuals and bodies eligible to register as a referendum campaigner should be realigned with the list of eligible registered non-party campaigners under PPERA. The ability of the additional eligible campaigners to donate and lend to other referendum campaigners should also be considered. It will be important that any changes to the categories of permissible donors and lenders are clearly defined, particularly in relation to political parties that register to campaign at a referendum.

Recommendation 3: The Government and Parliament should re-visit the permissibility controls on companies. In light of the fact that the PPERA permissibility controls on companies do not fully reflect the recommendations from the Committee on Standards in Public Life, and the implications of the current company permissibility test highlighted by our investigations, the Government and, in due course, Parliament should re-visit the issue of the permissibility controls on companies to ensure that they meet the underlying policy intention of preventing donations and loans from foreign companies. Recommendation 4: The Commission's ability to pay the lead campaigner grant in instalments should be incorporated into PPERA. In order to safeguard public money and to ensure efficient administration of the grant, the Commission's ability to pay the grant available to lead campaigners in instalments should be incorporated into PPERA so that it applies for all future referendums.

Recommendations: Campaign spending
Recommendation 5: The Government and Parliament should take into account the evidence from the EU referendum when considering whether the PPERA referendum spending limits remain appropriate. The Commission does not have a specific statutory role in advising on spending limits at UK-wide referendums held under PPERA. It is nevertheless important that the Government and Parliament take into account the evidence from the EU referendum when considering whether the PPERA referendum spending limits, including the registration threshold, remain appropriate in the context of any future UK-wide referendum. Recommendation 6: Campaign-related staff costs should be included in the limits on political party election and referendum campaign spending. To provide consistency between the controls on referendum campaigners, party campaign staff, candidates and non-party campaigners, as well as close a gap in a large strand of election and referendum campaign spending, campaign-related staff costs should be included in the limits on political party election and referendum campaign spending. Recommendation 7: Joint spending controls should be incorporated into PPERA. To help ensure the integrity and effectiveness of the referendum spending rules, appropriate controls should be incorporated into PPERA to regulate campaigners that engage in joint spending so that they apply for all future referendums. To improve transparency and enforceability, the controls should include a requirement that campaigners must include the names of those they worked with and how much they each spent in their post-referendum spending return. To reduce complexity and allow the Commission to provide clearer advice and guidance to campaigners, the Government and Parliament should clarify what constitutes joint spending for the purposes of regulating referendum campaign expenditure. This should specifically include: Making clear the scope of the legal term 'a plan or other arrangement' Defining what is meant by the fact that referendum expenses must be incurred 'by or on behalf of' those involved in the joint spending, and Exploring whether or not the joint spending rules should explicitly say that regulated expenses should be incurred by every party involved, in order for those rules to apply. In addition to the above clarifications, when the joint spending controls are incorporated into PPERA, the Commission should be given a Statutory Codemaking power to enable us to clarify any further matters should they arise in the future. Recommendation 8: An appropriate level of imprint information should be required on online and electronic referendum campaign material. To ensure that campaigners' identity is clear to voters, an appropriate level of imprint information should be required on online and electronic referendum campaign material. However, before applying such requirements, the Government and Parliament should give careful consideration to the lessons learnt from the drafting and practical application of the imprint rules in the Scottish Independence Referendum Act 2013. We would welcome the opportunity to work with the Government on this.

Recommendations:

Recommendation 9: Pre-poll reporting requirements should be incorporated into PPERA so they apply for all future referendums. To increase transparency during the months before the referendum poll and help encourage campaigners to ensure that they only accept donations from permissible sources, pre-poll reporting requirements should be incorporated into PPERA so they apply for all future referendums. If the referendum legislation is passed but does not immediately come into force, the legislation should provide for the pre-poll reporting requirement to commence as early as possible.

Recommendation 10: s that incur low levels of spending should only be required to submit a ‘nil return’ or declare the amount of spending incurred if below the registration threshold. To provide an appropriate balance between reducing the administrative burdens on campaigners that registered but only incurred low levels of spending, and providing transparency to campaign spending: The requirements for registered campaigners to submit a ‘nil return’ or a declaration that they have spent less than the relevant registration threshold, rather than complete a full spending return, should be incorporated into PPERA so they apply for all future referendums.

Where a campaigner submits a declaration that they have spent less than the relevant registration threshold, they should be required to provide a figure of the total regulated spending incurred.

Recommendation 11: s should be required to include itemised information for pre-registration spending in their return. To improve transparency and reduce a potential incentive to delay registration, registered campaigners that submit a full spending return should be required to include itemised information for all regulated expenditure, including spending incurred before a campaigner registers with the Commission.

Recommendation 12: The return declaration requirements in the EU Referendum Act 2015 should be incorporated into PPERA. To enable campaigners to sign truthfully the return declaration when they have accepted an impermissible donation, the return declaration requirements in the EU Referendum Act 2015 should be incorporated into PPERA so they apply for all future referendums.

Recommendations: Enforcing the rules

Recommendation 13: The Commission’s current fine limit should be reviewed and increased. To ensure that our sanctioning regime provides a strong deterrent to noncompliance, our sanction limit of £20,000 should be reviewed and increased to a level that would act as a suitable deterrent reflecting the level of fines available to other commensurate statutory regulators and financial regulation regimes.

Our response to the Assembly Commission's consultation 'Creating a Parliament for Wales' | Electoral Commission Search Our response to the Assembly Commission's consultation 'Creating a Parliament for Wales' You are in the Our responses to consultations section Home Our responses to consultations On this page Introduction How many Assembly Members does the Assembly need? How should Assembly Members be elected? Who should be allowed to vote in Assembly elections? Who should be able to be an Assembly Member? Should the law relating to electoral administration be rationalised? Should the Assembly have flexibility to decide on its internal arrangements? Appendix First published: 6 April 2018 Last updated: 19 August 0019 Introduction The Commission works to promote public confidence in the democratic process and ensure its integrity by: enabling the delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible; regulating political finance – taking proactive steps to increase transparency, ensure compliance and pursue breaches; using its expertise to make and advocate for changes to our democracy, aiming to improve fairness, transparency and efficiency. This response sets out the Electoral Commission's views on the Assembly Commission's consultation following the recommendations from the Expert Panel on Assembly Electoral Reform and on other reforms to the Assembly's electoral and operational arrangements to make a more accessible and effective legislature. In April 2017 and May 2017 we responded to the Expert Panel's questions on Assembly electoral reform, and our response here builds on these. This consultation takes place in the context of a wider electoral reform agenda in Wales, with changes also having recently being proposed to local government elections by Welsh Government. We expect that the Assembly Commission will work closely with Welsh Government to ensure that any reforms to the Assembly's electoral arrangements are not made in isolation but take into account this wider context. Since last year we have been working with Welsh Government while it has been developing its thinking on electoral reform for local government elections in Wales and were pleased to respond to the Consultation - Electoral Reform in Local Government in Wales that took place in 2017 on this subject. We published our response to this consultation on 9 October 2017. We have indicated our willingness to contribute fully to the modernisation and reform agenda in Wales and will continue to work with Welsh Government and other partners on this important work. We would also like to work in the same way with the Assembly Commission as it develops its own thinking on electoral arrangements for the National Assembly for Wales. Our focus is to ensure that any changes made to modify and reform electoral arrangements are adequately resourced to ensure that they can be implemented in the best interests of voters. We continue to recommend that all legislation should be in place at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners, Returning Officers or Electoral Registration Officers. There are some aspects of this consultation which do not fall within the Electoral Commission's remit and where this is the case, we have not commented in the response. There are also other areas which have not been specifically addressed in this consultation which we would like the Assembly Commission to consider as part of their reform of National Assembly for Wales elections. We have set these out in an appendix to our response. How many Assembly Members does the Assembly need? Question 1: The Expert Panel has concluded that the Assembly needs to have between 80 and 90 Members to carry out its role effectively. Do you agree? Please give reasons for your answer. Question 2: Would changes to the number of Assembly Members result in i) costs, or ii) benefits, for you or your organisation? If so, what would the costs or benefits be? A decision about the number of members required for the Assembly to effectively carry out its business is a significant constitutional issue, and is a matter for the Government and Assembly, not for the Electoral Commission. How should Assembly Members be elected? Question 3: The Expert Panel has outlined three possible electoral systems which could operate effectively in Wales to elect an Assembly of at least 80 Members. Which of these systems would be most appropriate for electing Assembly Members and why? Decisions about which voting system should be used for different elections are significant constitutional issues, and are matters for Governments and Parliaments, not for the Electoral Commission. Our role is to ensure that voters understand the electoral system used so they can cast their vote in the way they intended and that appropriate administrative planning is undertaken by the relevant Returning Officer (RO). In October we responded to the Welsh Government consultation “Electoral Reform in Local Government” on issues regarding the introduction of different electoral systems in local government elections. As stated in our response to that consultation, the potential impact on electors in Wales of a new electoral system could be significant and there may be a real risk of voter confusion, particularly in relation to understanding of how to cast their vote. If the system is changed, the provision of an effective public awareness campaign in Wales ahead of an Assembly election would be required. The Assembly Commission should also consider how Returning Officers and their staff will be able to effectively plan for and resource any electoral change.

The Commission is committed to working with the electoral community in Wales in implementing any new electoral system to ensure a consistent approach to the arrangements and management of elections in Wales through the Wales Electoral Coordination Board. This Board should be the vehicle to effectively plan and manage major electoral change across Wales. Again we reiterate our recommendation that all legislation should be in place at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners, Returning Officers or Electoral Registration Officers. In addition to this, the Commission would need to consider how it supports the election and the resource we would require to do so from the National Assembly for Wales. Areas of activity would likely include: The provision of advice and guidance to Returning Officers and their staff The provision of advice and training for political parties, candidates and agents The organisation and resourcing of a national public awareness campaign ahead of an election. Question 4: Do you agree with the Expert Panel’s recommendation that a change to the electoral system should be used to encourage the election of an Assembly that more accurately reflects the diverse nature of society in Wales? Question 5: If you answered yes to question 4, do you believe that this should be achieved through legislation such as formal gender quotas, or by less formal means such as voluntary measures put in place by political parties? Please give reasons for your answer. If any changes are introduced to encourage an Assembly that more accurately reflects the diverse nature of society in Wales, the Commission would want to help and support ROs in administering such arrangements, and would look to provide guidance to assist them. Question 6: Should people be able to stand for election to the Assembly on the basis of job sharing? Question 7: What, if any, benefits or risks do you see resulting from allowing people to stand for election on the basis of job sharing arrangements? As current legislation does not allow the presenting of two or more candidates for one seat, the NAW would need to introduce primary legislation in order to permit job-share candidates to stand and be elected at any future Assembly elections. If the law was amended to allow candidates to stand for election under a job sharing arrangement, legislation relating to the form of nomination papers and the ballot paper would need to be amended, and a range of technical issues would also need to be addressed. This would include, for example, what would happen if one elected member in a job share partnership decided to stand down. Question 8: If the Assembly adopted either the Single Transferable Vote or Flexible List Proportional Representation for the election of Assembly Members, should Assembly Members be elected on the basis of: 20 constituencies based on pairing the existing 40 Assembly constituencies 17 constituencies based on the existing 22 local authority areas As we have said previously in this response (Q3) and in our response to the Welsh Government consultation “Electoral Reform in Local Government”, decisions about which voting system should be used for different elections and the basis for how Assembly Members are elected are significant constitutional issues, and are matters for Governments and Parliaments. Question 9: Would changes to the Assembly’s electoral system result in i) costs or ii) benefits for your or your organisation? If so, what would the costs or benefits be? Before any election to the National Assembly for Wales, the Commission would run a public awareness campaign to encourage people in Wales to register to vote. If the electoral system to elect Assembly Members changes, then it would be necessary for a separate campaign to be organised that would explain to voters about this and how they can vote in the election. This would require additional funding. Building upon our experience of running a similar campaign in Scotland, informing voters about STV, it is likely that this campaign would include the distribution of an information booklet to each household in Wales about the electoral system, as well as additional advertising. Total costs for a voter registration campaign in Wales are typically around £800,000. This compares to around £1.1million for a voter registration campaign in Scotland. This is based on our experience from 2016. Before the Scottish council elections in 2017, the Commission ran two campaigns – one to encourage people to register to vote and another to educate people about how to vote under the STV system. The total cost for these two campaigns was around £1.2million and this was funded by the Scottish Government. In addition to this, the Commission would need to consider how it supports the administration of a new electoral system. For example: The provision of advice and guidance to Returning Officers and their staff The provision of advice and training political parties, candidates and agents Who should be allowed to vote in Assembly elections? Question 10: The same people should be allowed to vote in National Assembly for Wales elections and in local government elections in Wales. Question 11: What implications would there be if there were differences between who could vote in Assembly elections and who could vote in local government elections in Wales If differences were introduced between the National Assembly for Wales and local government franchises this could cause voter confusion, as well as result in significant administrative challenges and require additional public awareness work. The Commission’s view is that any changes to the franchise should be clear six months before EROs are due to begin any scheduled annual canvass activities to enable all those who are newly eligible to vote to take the steps they need to successfully register and participate in the elections. All this would need to be adequately resourced. Impact of varying franchises Electoral Register Currently Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) have a duty to maintain several registers: a register of parliamentary electors a register of local government electors a register of relevant citizens of the European Union entitled to vote at European Parliamentary elections; and a register of peers living outside the UK who have made a declaration to vote at European Parliamentary elections If there were a difference in who could vote in National Assembly for Wales elections and who could vote in local government elections, additional registers may need to be compiled. Voter confusion Introducing differing franchises for Assembly and local government elections could introduce an element of confusion for voters as they could be unclear which elections they would be entitled to participate in. Public awareness activity Before any election to the National Assembly for Wales, the Commission expects to run a public awareness campaign to encourage people in Wales to register to vote. If any changes were made to the franchise this campaign would need to include specific activity to inform those newly enfranchised of the changes, that they were now eligible to vote and how they could register to enable them to vote. Automatic registration Welsh Government is currently considering changing the franchise for local government elections and also introducing automatic registration for the local government register. One of the proposed changes to the franchise is to allow nonUK nationals resident in Wales to vote in local government elections. Therefore, as nationality would not be a criteria for registration for local elections, it may not be captured as part of the automatic registration process. If the franchise were to differ for National Assembly for Wales elections and nationality determined eligibility to vote, this data may not be available from the local government register. We recommend that the registers and registration process for the National Assembly for Wales and Local Government elections should remain aligned. We therefore suggest that the Assembly Commission works closely with Welsh Government to ensure that any reforms to the Assembly's electoral arrangements are not made in isolation but take into account their plans.

What should be the minimum voting age for Assembly elections? Question 12: What should be the minimum voting age for Assembly elections 16 or 18? The Commission does not take a view on what the minimum voting age should be for Assembly elections. Our response concentrates instead on the practical implications which would need to be considered if such a change was introduced. The Commission's view is that any changes to the franchise should be clear six months before EROs are due to begin any scheduled annual canvass activities to enable all those who are newly eligible to vote to take the steps they need to successfully register and participate in the elections. The Welsh Government have consulted on and is currently considering whether to reduce the minimum voting age for local government elections in Wales to 16. We suggest that the Assembly Commission works closely with Welsh Government to ensure that any reforms to the Assembly's electoral arrangements are not made in isolation but take into account their plans. Public awareness activity Before any election to the National Assembly for Wales, the Commission expects to run a public awareness campaign to encourage people in Wales to register to vote. If the minimum voting age was reduced, the Commission would undertake specific public awareness activities to target 16 and 17 year olds informing them that they are eligible to vote and how they can register to vote. This would likely require two campaigns – one around the first canvass prior to any change if changes were to be introduced and one prior to the election itself. Sixteen and seventeen year olds were able to vote for the first time at the Scottish Independence Referendum in 2014, and have been able to vote in local government and Scottish Parliament elections since May 2016. The Commission has worked with Scottish Government and other partners, such as the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives, the Scottish Assessors Association, the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB), Education Scotland, School Leaders Scotland and the Association of Directors of Education Scotland, to undertake public awareness activities aimed at 16 and 17 year olds. We also produced a political literacy briefing which provided guidance and information sources to schools, colleges, universities and all other organisations who wished to develop political literacy amongst young people. We would want to build upon this approach in Wales if the voting age was lowered. Our experience in Scotland makes clear that it is important that 16 and 17 year olds are engaged and that specific public awareness activity is undertaken. We would seek to work with educational partners and councils in Wales to identify opportunities for supporting ongoing political literacy in schools and encouraging young people to register to vote. Attainers Currently, the minimum voting age stands at 18. This means that 17 year olds and some 16 year olds are entitled to be included on the register as attainers if they will turn 18 during the lifetime of that register. If the minimum voting age is lowered to 16, the register will include 16 and 17 year olds as full electors. Additionally, 15 year olds and some 14 year olds would be entitled to be included on the register as attainers. If this change is implemented you may wish to consider the arrangement in Scotland, where no information on those aged under 16 must be included on any version of the register published or otherwise made available, except in very limited circumstances, for example as part of a criminal investigation or related to the administration of an election. Question 13: Would reducing the minimum voting age for Assembly elections result in i) costs or ii) benefits for you or your organisation?

If so, what would the costs or benefits be? Question 14: Are there any other issues, benefits or risks you would like us to consider in relation to changing the minimum voting age for Assembly elections? Please give reasons for your answer. As set out in our response to the Expert Panel in May 2017 the cost implications of a reduction in the minimum voting age for Assembly elections would be wide ranging. As a guide the following outlines the costs associated with the additional work relating to the enfranchisement of 16/17 year olds in Scotland. From the financial memorandum published with the Scottish Elections (Reduction of voting age) Bill 2015, the total of the costs falling on the Scottish Government was expected to be within the range of £1,115,000 to £1,365,000, across the 2015/16 and 2016/17 financial years. The Commission actually spent £55,000 on user testing and development and design of the forms and £124k carrying out public awareness activity ahead of the referendum.

Should residents in Wales who are not UK nationals be allowed to vote in Assembly elections? Question 15: To what extent do you agree or disagree or disagree with the following statement: All legal residents in Wales should be allowed to vote in Assembly elections, irrespective of their nationality or citizenship. Question 16:

Are there any other issues, risks or benefits you would like us to consider in relation to changing the rights of non-UK nationals legally resident in Wales to vote in Assembly elections? Please give reasons for your answer. The Commission does not take a view on what the minimum voting age should be for Assembly elections. Our response concentrates instead on the practical implications which would need to be considered if such a change was introduced. Nationality requirement The nationality of an individual determines which, if any, elections in the UK a person is entitled to be registered to vote at. Currently if an applicant is unsure of any aspect of their nationality they are advised to contact the Home Office. EROs also have the power to ask an applicant to provide documentary evidence confirming their nationality. If an ERO is in doubt as to whether an applicant or elector is legally resident, they can request checks of a person's immigration status against Home Office records. The Welsh Government has consulted on and is currently considering changing the franchise to allow non-UK nationals resident in Wales to vote at local government elections. If the same changes are not made to the National Assembly franchise this will result in a difference to who could vote in the two sets of elections. This would require EROs to maintain an additional National Assembly for Wales register. The Electoral Commission produces guidance for EROs to maintain the electoral registers. This guidance would be updated in the event of any changes to the franchise. Whichever decision is made, all information and guidance provided to candidates will need to be updated and clearly communicated to them. Public awareness activity Should the National Assembly for Wales decide to implement these suggestions, we would expect to carry out work to ensure effective public awareness among these groups so that they are aware they are able to register to vote and vote and of how to do so. As mentioned previously this would require two campaigns – one around the first canvass prior to the change being introduced and one prior to the election itself. Should prisoners be allowed to vote in Assembly elections? Question 17: To what extent do you agree or disagree or disagree with the following statement: Prisoners released on temporary licence or on home detention curfew should be allowed to vote in Assembly elections, in line with the UK Government's intention for UK elections. Question 18: Are there any other issues, risks or benefits you would like us to consider in relation to changing the rights of prisoners to vote in Assembly elections? Please give reasons for your answer. We take no view on whether prisoners should be entitled to vote or not, nor whether the franchise should be limited to certain prisoners with a specific sentence length. If the decision is made to allow Welsh prisoners to vote then we would expect to be consulted further on how this would be implemented. Some of the issues that would need to be considered are: the eligibility criteria for prisoners to register, bearing in mind that residence is one of the main criteria for registration. For example if prisoners register to vote at the prison address, then this would result in registered prisoners having a disproportionate impact on the electorate in the ward in which the prison is located. Given that prisoners are only present at the prison address as a result of their sentence, an alternative option would be for prisoners to register in respect of a previous or intended address. how Welsh voters imprisoned in prisons would be affected. the method by which prisoners would cast their vote. Setting up polling stations in prisons would be logistically very difficult, for example ensuring that all prisoners were able to be issued with the correct ballot paper for their registered address. It may be easier to restrict prisoners to a system of absent voting. the right to a secret ballot for all prisoners regardless of how they cast their vote. the entitlement to a proxy vote without the need for their application to be attested (as is already the case for overseas and service voters). By nature of being in prison, the voter has a sufficient reason for not being able to attend their polling station. an awareness programme to highlight the process in order to enable prisoners to register to vote and cast their vote. how prisoners could access information about the policies of candidates, parties and other campaigners. Who should be able to be an Assembly Member? Question 19: Should legislation to reform the Assembly's electoral arrangements include provision to implement the recommendations of the Fourth Assembly's Constitutional and Legislative Affairs Committee in relation to disqualification from being an Assembly Member? Are there any other changes which should be made to the disqualification arrangements? In our report Standing for Election, published in January 2015 we recommended that the law in England, Wales and Northern Ireland be changed to make a clear distinction between offices or employment which would prevent someone standing for election, and those which would prevent someone from holding office if elected. In this report we set out a framework of questions which the National Assembly for Wales may find useful as a reference if it decides to review its own rules on disqualification (although it would be up to Assembly to determine how these should apply when reviewing the law). These are: Firstly, is there a real conflict of interest between the appointed post and the elected post? If so, the postholder would have to resign before taking up elected office. Secondly, does the postholder need to have resigned and served out notice by nomination or election, for example: Does the postholder's role require political impartiality during the election campaign? Does the postholder have access to privileged information that would advantage them over other candidates? Could the postholder exert undue influence over electors by virtue of their position? Is the postholder involved in the administration of the election? A reduction in restrictions on potential candidates would also enable wider choice for voters.

Should the law relating to electoral administration be rationalised? Question 20: Should legislation to reform the Assembly's electoral arrangements include provision to implement the following? Please give reasons for your answers. Question 20 (i): The Electoral Commission's recommendations that costs relating to translation between Welsh and English should not count towards expenditure limits for political parties and candidates in relation to Assembly elections as they already are for non-party campaigners. In our report on the 2016 elections to the National Assembly for Wales, we recommended that: Governments with legislative competence over elections within the UK should amend the definitions of political party and candidate spending so that reasonable expenses that can be attributed to an individual's disability are exempt, (as was recently set out in the revised PPERA rules for non-party campaigners). As the PPERA non-party campaigner rules now exempt the costs associated with translating Welsh to English and vice versa, we recommend that equivalent legal provisions should be introduced by the relevant Government into the election rules covering spending by political parties and candidates. The Commission continues to support the view that costs relating to translating campaign material between Welsh and English should be exempt from the spending limits of political parties and candidates at elections, including those to the National Assembly for Wales and we welcome the proposal as set out in this consultation. As noted previously, this exemption already exists for non-party campaigners, and by exempting it from the spending limits of political parties and candidates it would ensure that all barriers are removed from making campaigning at Assembly elections inclusive of all official languages of Wales. The Assembly Commission may want to consider what these costs are – are they purely translation costs or do they include other areas of campaigning material which are impacted by the inclusion of two languages, for example, additional design or printing costs brought about as a result of the provision of bilingual material. When considering the drafting, the Assembly Commission may wish also to consider drawing on wording from the non-party campaigner rules, which has been used at three elections in Wales: This wording exempts "expenses incurred in respect of, or in consequence of, the translation of anything from English into Welsh or from Welsh into English". (Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act, Schedule 8A). The Assembly Commission may also wish to consider whether costs relating to providing bilingual Welsh and English material should be exempted from both the spending limits and reporting requirements, or whether there should continue to be a reporting requirement for such costs. This will partly depend on the policy objectives and overall aims of creating an exemption. Maintaining a requirement to report on any costs associated with translation would provide transparency about the levels of spending on such costs. It would allow monitoring of expenditure levels and continuing visibility of what campaigners spend on the provision of bilingual materials in Welsh and English. This kind of approach is used for some items that are exempted from electoral spending limits, such as for the personal expenses of candidates. In contrast, the Assembly Commission may prefer an approach where the costs cease to be regulated or recorded in any sense, by being exempted from both spending limits and reporting requirements. This kind of approach is used in electoral law for a number of exemptions and exclusions. The Commission set up the Welsh Language Legislation Advisory Group following the 2016 National Assembly for Wales elections. It includes representatives from the Electoral Commission, Welsh Government and Electoral Services Managers and Returning Officers from across Wales. This group could be useful in future as an opportunity to discuss ideas and proposals regarding the Welsh language and its use in elections. The Electoral Commission would welcome the opportunity to work with the Assembly Commission on considering the practical implications of the exemption, so it is in place for the next scheduled Assembly election in 2021.

Question 20 (ii): The Electoral Commission's recommendations that costs relating to an individual's disability should not count towards expenditure limits for political parties and candidates in relation to Assembly elections as they already are for nonparty campaigners. As above, we are pleased that the Assembly are considering implementing our recommendation to amend the definitions of political party and candidate spending, so that reasonable expenses that can be attributed to an individual's disability are exempt, and would welcome the opportunity to have further discussions with the Assembly officials about the practical implications of this recommendation.

Candidates Costs that are reasonably attributable to a candidate's disability are already explicitly exempt from the spending limit of candidates at Scottish Parliament, and Scottish council elections. The legislation for these two elections, have been drafted in different ways, and the Assembly Commission may wish to draw on lessons learned about the practical implications of each approach to drafting when considering the legislative wording they wish to adopt. The Assembly Commission should also consider the implications for regional list candidates if expenses reasonably attributable to a candidate's disability are exempt from the spending limit of constituency candidates and independent regional list candidates. This aim could be achieved by also exempting these expenses from the spending limit of political parties, as regional list candidates are subject to the spending rules for political parties.

Political parties

The Wales Act 2017 devolves the responsibility of political party spending and thereby gives the Assembly Commission the opportunity to align the rules for all types of candidates at an Assembly election, as well as exempting disability related expenses from the spending limit of political parties. There are currently no elections in the UK where disability related expenses are exempt from the spending limit of political parties. In drafting the legislation the Assembly Commission may want to draw on lessons from the exemption of disability related expenses for non-party campaigners. This wording covers both the costs associated with the disability of a campaigner, and also the recipients of the campaign material, hence the legislation refers to expenses that are reasonably attributable to the disability of an "individual", as opposed to the legislation for candidates which refers to the disability of a "candidate".

Considerations

The Assembly Commission should consider the following when deciding on the final drafting of the legislation:

- The level of transparency there should be for the voters about money spent by candidates and political parties, versus the level of privacy there should be about expenses relating to a campaigner's disability. The transparency rules help to reduce the risks of evasion of the spending rules, but appropriate levels of personal privacy are also an important consideration.
- Whether to use wording that has already been tested (for example the wording used in legislation for candidates at Scottish Parliament 1 and local government elections 2 , or the exemption for non-party campaigners 3), or whether to create new wording for an exemption, How a ‘disability’ and a ‘reasonable’ expense’ should be defined in legislation. Whether the exemption should explicitly apply to reasonable costs associated with both a campaigner’s or a voter’s disability – or whether it would be preferable to draft separate exemptions relating to costs incurred as a result of a campaigner’s disability, and to costs incurred to make campaign materials or events accessible to voters. For example, it may encourage campaigners to provide accessible campaign leaflets, events, etc. if the spending rules included an explicit exemption and a reporting requirement for the costs of providing accessible campaigns to voters. Access to Elected Office Funds and other measures to promote greater democratic participation by disabled people Whilst creating legal exemptions in law for costs relating to disability is an important step in encouraging greater democratic participation by disabled people, the Assembly Commission and Welsh Government should consider additional measures to promote greater democratic participation by disabled people. For example, “Access to Elected Office Funds” have been established by the UK and Scottish Governments in 2013 and 2016 respectively, and independent bodies were appointed to allocate funding to a number of prospective candidates. The Funds were intended to cover additional costs related to seeking elected office and arising from a prospective candidate’s disability. The Funds were accompanied by other initiatives to provide opportunities for disabled people to get involved in politics. As part of exploring establishing such a Fund in Wales, it would be necessary to consider how financial support towards costs relating to a campaigner’s disability would be covered by the election spending and donation rules, and whether any legal exemptions should be developed, as was the case for the UK and Scottish Government Funds.

Question 20 (iii): The Law Commissions’ recommendations in relation to the conduct and administration of elections. We strongly support the Law Commissions’ recommendations to simplify, rationalise and consolidate electoral law. The Law Commissions’ recommendations have already been supported by the overwhelming majority of electoral stakeholders. A clearer, better organised and more up to date electoral law that is fit for purpose for elections today would benefit all those involved in the electoral process. This includes the Welsh Government and the National Assembly for Wales (who make the relevant legislation), Electoral Registration Officers and Returning Officers (and their staff), candidates, campaigners and voters. From 1 April, legislative competence to implement the Law Commissions’ recommendations in respect of elections to the National Assembly for Wales and local government elections and referendums in Wales passed to the Assembly. In our 2017 local government election report, we called for the Law Commissions’ recommendations to be implemented in Wales when these powers are devolved. Given the benefits of reform, and the risks of continuing to run elections under the existing law, our view is that these recommendations should be implemented as soon as possible. Some of the law Commissions’ recommendations that relate to Assembly elections can only be implemented by primary legislation (i.e. by way of an Act of the Assembly). Other recommendations can be implemented by the Welsh Ministers using secondary legislation. Welsh Ministers have powers to make secondary legislation regarding Assembly elections under section 13 of the Government of Wales Act (GOWA) 2006 (as substituted by section 5 of the Wales Act 2017). In our view this combination of primary and secondary legislation making powers is likely to be sufficient for the Assembly and the Welsh Ministers respectively to implement the Law Commissions’ recommendations that are relevant to Assembly elections, without the need for the enabling provision that is suggested on page 43 of the consultation document. We would be happy to assist with work to implement the Law Commissions' recommendations for Assembly elections. Should the Assembly have flexibility to decide on its internal arrangements? Question 21: Should the Government of Wales Act 2006 be amended as set out in this consultation document, in order to give the Assembly greater flexibility to determine its own working practices and arrangements through its internal procedures rather than in legislation? The Electoral Commission does not hold a view on this matter. What impact might these proposals have? Question 22: Should the Government of Wales Act 2006 be amended as set out in this consultation document, in order to give the Assembly greater flexibility to determine its own working practices and arrangements through its internal procedures rather than in legislation? Question 23: Would any of the proposals in this paper result in i) costs or ii) benefits for you or your organisation which you have not already outlined in your response to this consultation? If so, what would the costs or benefits be?

Please see previous responses. Appendix Appendix Electoral Registration In our Report on the UK Parliamentary general election held on 8 June 2017 we set out our views on reforming the electoral registration process. We said that want to work with the UK, Scottish and Welsh Governments and EROs across the UK to explore options to enable people to make an application to register to vote when using other online public services including, for example, as part of their driving licence or passport application or tax return submission. to improve opportunities for EROs' access to data from other public service providers – particularly where that data is held by national rather than local providers – to enable them to target their activity at new electors or those who have recently moved. to explore how a more integrated approach to electoral registration could feature greater use of direct registration by EROs, or more automatic enrolment processes (for example, direct enrolment of young people alongside issuing their national insurance number). Improving and modernising the regulatory framework for elections As part of our role to keep electoral law under review, the Commission has made a number of recommendations about improving and modernising the regulatory framework for elections. Following the devolution of powers in the Wales Act 2017, we advise that the Assembly Commission should consider the following changes when legislating for future National Assembly for Wales elections. Transparency of online campaigning Recent years have seen rapid increases in the use of digital and online campaign techniques at elections, including increasingly sophisticated uses of data, more personalised and targeted messaging, and the capacity for campaigners to reach more voters at a lower cost than ever before. Political parties and other campaigners can determine how best to use the campaign techniques available to them and the rules on campaigning should not restrict lawful permitted campaigning. However, our priority is to make sure that the rules are followed and appropriate transparency of campaign spending is maintained in order to ensure voters' confidence in the political finance rules. While spending on online campaigning is subject to regulation in the same way as other, more traditional campaign methods, it does present some specific regulatory challenges. We want to make sure that electoral law appropriately reflects changes in campaigning techniques, and we have made several recommendations for improvements following previous elections. We recommend the following improvements to the current rules for campaigning at National Assembly for Wales elections. Imprints on digital material Online campaign material produced by political parties and non-party campaigners should – like its printed equivalent – be required to include an imprint stating who has published it. This would enable voters to identify who is spending money on trying to influence them at elections. Such a provision was introduced at the Scottish Independence Referendum in 2014, and we would welcome the opportunity to discuss with the Assembly Commission how a similar provision could be introduced for Assembly elections. Reporting of digital and other campaigning Parties, candidates and NPCs at Assembly elections have to report their spending using prescribed categories. Reporting against these categories is not detailed enough to provide a representative picture of what is actually spent on digital campaigning. Voters should be entitled to expect the same transparency about spending by campaigners at elections, regardless of whether that spending relates to online and social media advertising or other more familiar types of political advertising such as leaflets and billboards. The rules should therefore be improved by ensuring that campaigners report more detailed breakdowns of spending, including on different types of advertising such as online and social media promotion. Codes of practice The Electoral Commission is enabled under PPERA to prepare a statutory Code on qualifying expenses for political parties, and under the Representation of the People Act 1983 to make a statutory Code on candidate election expenses. The Code has to be approved by Parliament. We are interested in the possibility of making Codes for future National Assembly for Wales elections. We understand that the power for the Electoral Commission to prepare Codes for the Assembly elections still needs to be clarified as part of the commencement of the Wales Act 2017 and associated transfer of powers. Creating a code for parties and for candidates would allow us to address areas of electoral law where the law currently allows for more than one way of accounting for election spending. The results of the codes will improve transparency and enforceability of the law, and would lead to improved public confidence in the rules on election spending. Spending on staff time for political parties The election spending rules provide insufficient transparency and limits on the money that political parties spend on staffing their election campaigns. The money that is spent on activities such as producing campaign material or market research is regulated. But many of the staffing costs of parties are exempt from the rules, whilst the staffing costs of candidates and NPCs are included. We have recommended that this inconsistency should be addressed in the interests of transparency and ensuring that relevant election spending is controlled by spending limits. Increasing the Commission's regulatory and sanctioning powers Since 2010 we have had investigatory powers and sanctions relating to most of the obligations set out in PPERA for political parties and NPCs. The civil sanctions powers introduced a toolkit of measures that could be used for addressing noncompliance, with criminal prosecution remaining as the sole remedy for the most serious breaches. Our sanctions include compliance notices, fixed monetary penalties of £200 and variable monetary penalties up to a maximum value of £20,000. There is a case for reviewing and significantly increasing the present cap, so that we can impose sanctions proportionate to the amounts of money that major campaigners raise and spend at elections. While the Commission is responsible for enforcing the rules for political parties and non-party campaigners, the police and prosecuting authorities are currently responsible for enforcing the rules for candidates and investigating breaches. We have recommended that our investigative and sanctioning powers should be extended to offences relating to candidate spending and donations at Assembly elections. This change would help ensure compliance with the rules and strengthen voters' trust in the regulatory system. This would also ensure that parties and candidates are subject to the same sanctions if they do not comply with the legislation. Registration of party names and descriptions for use on ballot papers We continue to recommend that where a candidate represents a political party on a ballot paper, it should be clear to voters which party the candidate represents. The legal provisions for registration of party descriptions present risks of confusion for voters and restrict the participation of political parties. We would welcome the opportunity to work with the Assembly Commission to reform the provisions for party names and descriptions. Transparency and accessibility of candidate spending To improve transparency and accessibility of candidate spending returns, we have previously recommended that Returning Officers should be required to publish spending returns online as well as through the existing methods of public inspection. We highlight the Law Commissions' review of Electoral Law which proposes a method for implementing this change through legislation (in recommendation 12-5). The accessibility of elections There should be no barriers to voting for disabled people and everyone should have a right to vote on their own and in secret. Following the June 2017 UK Parliament election, the Electoral Commission asked disabled voters about their experiences of voting at the election and asked them what they would like to see changed to make it easier for them to register to vote and vote at future elections. Our report on these findings, Elections for Everyone 4 , contained the following recommendations for governments to improve the accessibility of elections based on the experiences of disabled voters: Changes to electoral forms: Many people with learning disabilities said they found electoral forms – including registration forms, poll cards and postal voting packs – to be confusing and full of jargon. Other disabled people said that they found it hard to read forms which were not in large print or where there is black text on a white background. The Commission would support a review of statutory electoral forms to ensure that they are as accessible as possible. Widening the range of people able to assist a disabled voter when they vote in a polling station: Some disabled people told us that the rules relating to who could assist them were too restrictive and could make it hard for them to find someone to assist them. The Commission believes that the Welsh Government should review the legislation to provide disabled people with more choice over who assists them. Greater flexibility and choice over methods of voting: Respondents to our survey suggested that there should be a wider range of voting methods in order to ensure that disabled people are able to choose a way of voting which meets their needs. This would include voting in mobile polling stations in hospitals, nursing homes, care homes or those set up in remote areas. In addition to the recommendations aimed at governments, disabled people also highlighted the following as areas for improvement: Information provided by political parties and candidates: Concerns were raised about the lack of accessible campaigning materials and manifestos, particularly in Easy Read format. Respondents called for political parties to make their accessible manifestos available at the same time as they publish their other manifestos and in good time for people to be able to read them before they come to vote. The role of electoral administrators: Disabled voters told us that there needs to be better awareness and understanding amongst election staff and polling station staff of the support available for people to vote independently. This includes the availability of accessible versions of electoral forms and voting aids, such as a tactile voting template. The role of carers and support workers: Disabled voters told us that there needs to be improved information available in care services to educate support workers on the voting rights of disabled people and how they can be supported to vote. The Commission will continue to work with the Welsh Government, disability organisations and the wider electoral community to improve the accessibility of electoral registration and elections. In consultation with accessibility groups we will also review the guidance on accessibility that we provide for Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and their staff.

Last updated: 8 June 2021 Summary The UK's electoral registers are the basis on which people may vote in elections and referendums – they are the practical expression of the franchise and therefore fundamental to democratic participation. The accuracy and completeness of electoral registers are central to the health of our electoral system as a whole. Evidence about the accuracy and completeness of the registers helps provide an indication as to the overall effectiveness of the current system. Our study of the December 2015 Great Britain registers (those published at the end of the transition to Individual Electoral Registration) indicated that the local government registers were 91% accurate and 84% complete, with the parliamentary registers being 91% accurate and 85% complete. These figures meant that an estimated eight million people were missing from the electoral registers. Intro Our research confirms the correlation between certain demographics and lower or higher levels of completeness, with age and mobility still found to be the variables with the strongest impact: the young and those more likely to move home are less likely to be registered. Reform of the annual canvass should help Electoral Registration Officers tackle under-registration by enabling better targeting of resources in areas of greatest need, leading to more effective identification and registration of eligible electors.

However, more far-reaching reforms of the electoral registration system are needed to fully address the challenges of achieving accurate and complete registers. The current system of electoral registration The UK's electoral registers are the basis on which people may vote in elections and referendums – they are the practical expression of the franchise and therefore fundamental to democratic participation. Electoral registers are also used elsewhere in the electoral system – for example, they are used to allocate voters to polling stations and to draw electoral boundaries. For these reasons, the accuracy and completeness of electoral registers are central to the health of our electoral system as a whole. There is no national electoral register for the United Kingdom. A total of 371 separate electoral registers are compiled and maintained by Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) 4 in Great Britain, and one register for Northern Ireland is compiled and maintained by the Chief Electoral Officer. A system of Individual Electoral Registration (IER) has operated in Great Britain since 2014, and a similar system has been used in Northern Ireland since 2002. Individuals are responsible for applying to register to vote individually, and must supply identifying information (namely date of birth and National Insurance number) as part of their application. Their identity is verified using this information before their names can be added to the electoral register. An online registration application service was introduced in Great Britain at the same time as IER in 2014 and in Northern Ireland in 2018. Individuals can apply to register online at any point during the year at the register to vote website , or by completing and returning a paper application form. In either case, although data from registration applications are verified against Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) records, each application is determined locally by individual EROs. Each ERO in Great Britain is still required by law to conduct an annual canvass of all properties in their registration area to audit their electoral register entries and to identify individuals who have moved or were not previously registered. EROs must publish a revised register by 1 December each year, with further updates published on the first working day of each month outside of the canvass period and before elections. In 2006

the annual canvass was abolished in Northern Ireland and replaced with a process of continuous registration (although a complete canvass must be conducted in Northern Ireland at least every 10 years, with the next scheduled for 2020). Since 2006, the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland (EONI) necessarily has relied much more on information from other public authorities to maintain the electoral register. The EONI currently receives data from seven data sources for the purposes of identifying eligible citizens and updating information on the register, including the Business Services Organisation (data received quarterly), General Register Office for Northern Ireland (data received weekly) and DWP (data received annually, and quarterly in the case of people turning 16 in the previous quarter). Challenges in electoral registration Annual canvass of electors In recent years it has become increasingly clear that the traditional household canvass in Great Britain has become less efficient and more expensive for EROs to conduct. The Electoral Commission has highlighted the risk of continuing with the current, largely paper-based and costly approach to the canvass at a time when local authority budgets are tight. We have therefore welcomed the UK, Scottish and Welsh Governments' plans to reform the annual canvass, which should give EROs the tools with which to implement a more data-driven, targeted and efficient approach to canvass activity, focusing their efforts increasingly at those properties which have reported a change in composition. Reform of the annual canvass represents an important first step in modernising the electoral registration system, but there is more that should be done to ensure we have an effective, joined-up and year-round registration process. While successful implementation of canvass reform is a clear priority over the short to medium term, the universal embedding of a more data-driven approach offers considerable scope for reforming the system further. This should aim to reflect people's changing expectations in a digital society by building on the increasing use of data across the public and private sectors to the benefit of citizens and the delivery of efficiencies. Accuracy and completeness of the registers We undertake research to measure the quality of the electoral registers on a periodic basis. Evidence about the accuracy and completeness of the registers helps provide an indication of how effective current methods of maintaining the register are. Our study of the December 2015 Great Britain registers (those published at the end of the transition to IER) indicated that the local government registers were 91% accurate and 84% complete, with the parliamentary registers being 91% accurate and 85% complete. These figures meant that an estimated eight million people in Great Britain were missing from the electoral registers. Our research on the electoral registers in Great Britain confirmed the correlation between certain demographics and lower or higher levels of completeness, with age and mobility still found to be the variables with the strongest impact: the young and those more likely to move home were less likely to be registered. Although evidence suggests that the accuracy of the electoral registers in Great Britain has improved significantly since the introduction of IER (91% accurate as at 1 December 2015, an improvement of four percentage points during the transition to IER), we estimated that there were still between 4-4.5 million inaccurate entries on the local government electoral registers. Our research on the electoral register in Northern Ireland indicated that the local government registers were 87% accurate and 79% complete, while the parliamentary registers were 87% accurate and 81% complete. The study found that the main drivers of completeness were, as in Great Britain, age (with young people aged 18-34 significantly less likely to be registered), recent home movement and whether someone rented their home from a private landlord. The evidence suggests that current methods employed to maintain the registers are not necessarily working as effectively as they could, particularly in relation to capturing traditionally under-registered groups. Canvass reform should help EROs tackle under-registration by enabling targeting of resources in areas of greatest need, leading to more effective identification and registration of eligible electors. However, more far-reaching reforms of the electoral registration system are needed to fully address the challenges of achieving accurate and complete registers. Duplicate registration applications The online registration system currently allows people to submit an application to register even if they are already registered to vote. There is no direct link between the online registration service and the electoral registers, which are each held separately on local databases using a range of different Electoral Management Software (EMS) systems. The different systems cannot currently communicate directly with each other and it is therefore not possible to automatically detect and prevent duplicate applications. Estimates by EROs of the proportion of duplicate applications received ahead of the 2017 UK general election ranged from 30% of the total submitted in some areas to 70% in others. At the 2016 EU referendum, 38% of electoral registration applications made during the campaign were duplicates. EROs have highlighted the significant administrative impact of processing duplicate applications ahead of electoral events. Each individual application must be carefully checked to confirm whether or not they are a duplicate, although some EMS systems used by EROs can help manage this workflow more efficiently. There would be benefit in exploring the extent to which the online registration system could check automatically whether a person was already correctly registered to vote before submitting a new application. Similar facilities are already offered to voters in other comparable democracies, including Australia, New Zealand and the Republic of Ireland. A more joined-up electoral registration system In our report on electoral registration at the 2017 UK Parliamentary general election we argued that it is time for the UK to evolve the current system, which relies solely on electors taking steps to register themselves, to make electoral registration more joined up with other public services. The use of data is already beginning to revolutionise the provision of services across the public and private sectors, to the benefit of citizens and the delivery of efficiencies. There is considerable potential to explore how existing public data could be utilised to support further reform to our voter registration system. In the following chapters we summarise various ways in which the further modernisation of the electoral registration process might be delivered, drawing on the findings of the feasibility studies we conducted over the past year. electoral events, Queen's Speech, and related matters The Chief Executive discussed the preparations that staff had undertaken in response to the vote in Parliament on a proposed UK Parliamentary General Election on 12 December 2019. The Chief Executive noted the preparation work we had undertaken in advance of this election. We had moved into operational mode, with daily meetings to ensure that we were able to deliver our functions in relation to the election. The Chief Executive assured Commissioners that they would be briefed on any developments throughout the campaign.

The Director of Finance and Corporate Services discussed the financial implications of the unscheduled event. We had submitted a request to Her Majesty's Treasury for an advance from the Contingency Fund to deliver our work for the election. We were now able to proceed on staffing and advertising resources needed. Recruitment activity had started to fill the contingency roles that were required. The Chief Executive noted that we had grown our core staffing numbers in the wake of the recent budget, so there were fewer additional staff required, and they weren't needed with the same urgency as in previous instances of unscheduled electoral events. The Director noted that there was essential Information Technology (IT) activity underway, work on which would continue, but disruptive work would be minimised. The Director explained that the Commission would be required to submit a new five year corporate plan in the new Parliament as required by the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act (PPERA), by February 2020. The timing of the election gave a very short period for forming the plan. We were therefore planning to propose this would be a detailed plan for year one and a high-level summary for the subsequent four years. We would then request the opportunity to deliver a new, more considered, corporate plan to the Speaker's Committee later in 2020. The Board would consider for approval the new corporate plan in the coming months. The Head of External Communications explained that we had already briefed our creative and media strategy agencies on our campaign work, and would finalise the media strategy soon. We had also updated all our voter content on our new website, which would go live immediately. The Board heard that we had an agency based in Northern Ireland to run campaigns there, and another agency in Great Britain. These campaigns would be comparable but different, and would be nation-sensitive. We had had initial conversations with large social media companies about voter registration reminders. We had begun to increase our staffing numbers in the public information and press office teams, and both teams had already started to see an increase in enquiries. The team were providing support for the registration campaign. The research team had set up a contract for our post-poll public opinion survey, and work was underway to capture requirements for other key areas of research such as electoral data, candidates' survey, and Returning Officer feedback. The policy team had started the daily internal monitoring process to identify emerging external issues and assign actions throughout the election period. They would also monitor policy announcements from the major parties to identify any commitments that were relevant to the Commission. The Head of Registration and Reporting advised that regulatory guidance would be published as soon as we had certainty over the regulatory timetable. We would also publish guidance that covered pacts for parties, such as where one party stood aside for another. The Board heard that the rules in this area were complex and could vary depending on specific circumstances. We were due to send a regulatory bulletin out to registered parties and registered non-party campaigners. Due to the short timeframe before close of nominations and statutory requirements for consideration of registration applications, we were unable to decide new registration applications in time for the election. We would make this clear on our website. We would continue to register non-party campaigners right up to polling day. We had planned to use our resources flexibly, and would be undertaking real time regulation. Our resources would focus on parties and campaigners where there was greatest risk of non-compliance. As in 2017, we would provide the Police with information on key dates and links to the approved professional practice website. We would continue to provide reactive general advice about potential offences. The Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance provided an update on the guidance we had issued for Returning Officers for administering the polls. We had confirmed the election timetable, following a technical amendment to the election bill which ensured there was the same registration deadline across the UK. We had also shared supplementary guidance around managing unscheduled polls, with a particular focus on the specific circumstances relating to a poll in close proximity to the end of the canvass period and in the winter. We would issue a survey this Friday to get information on how the polls would be managed, which would help us build up a picture of arrangements across the UK and identify any potential issues which we would then follow up. We would continue to use the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board structure that worked well in the European Parliamentary Election. Cabinet Office would be involved in this group, which was important as they were responsible for the funding of the elections. The Director also provided information on key dates in the timetable for a UK Parliamentary General Election. The Chair sought greater clarity on how we would regulate electoral pacts. The Head of Registration and Reporting said this would depend on the individual arrangements, and how money was being spent in each pact. We had raised awareness, and asked such campaigners to contact us so that we might provide bespoke advice to them once we understood their circumstances. Where we saw such pacts, we would be proactive in offering them advice. The Board questioned how we identify third-party campaigners, and how we would know if they had crossed the spending threshold. The Head of Registration and Reporting explained that this would be determined by the monitoring we do, and in some cases requests for information on how much they had spent on such campaigns. The Board discussed the implications of one party spending money on another party's candidate, and who needed to declare such spending. The Chief Executive explained that such spending could fall under two different pieces of legislation (Representation of the People Act and Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act), which had different rules and different levels of allowable spending. The Board sought clarity on the proposed real-time regulatory interventions. The Head of Registration and Reporting explained that this covered a range of different methods, such as directly contacting someone to provide advice and guidance. The Board considered the circumstances under which a stop-notice would be issued by the Chief Executive. We had not had to issue a notice in the past, but the option was available if it was needed. If this was not complied with then it would become a court matter. The Board discussed the risk of regulating digital campaigning. The Board heard that we had put extra resources into this, and these staff would be monitoring online activity and media libraries. The Board was reminded that digital campaign spending was reportable in the same way as other campaign spending. The Board also discussed the activity that would be outside our remit, but would reflect on the Commission, such as a late-in-the-campaign “deep fake” video, which would be circulated before an election and could change the narrative. This would be outside the scope of electoral law. The Board raised concerns about the prospect of foreign interference. The Chief Executive reminded the Board that we had made recommendations on how electoral law should be changed, and none of these changes had yet been implemented. The Chief Executive advised the Board that the Cabinet Office’s Election Cell had been set up and tasked with monitoring security risks around the elections. This was similar to the approach taken by other countries. The Chair advised the Board that we had spoken to the security services about what could be learnt from recent elections around the world. The Electoral Commission had been invited to be a member of this Cell, and we had agreed to take part. This enabled us to assert where the government should not interfere in matters that were more appropriately in our remit. The Election Cell would monitor any foreign interference and deep-fakes, and decide any action to take. The Cell was chaired by the Deputy National Security Adviser. The Board discussed our ability to robustly refute inaccurate accusations and allegations. The Chief Executive noted that our future work could cover digital literacy, including encouraging voters to question sources of information, and the validity of information received. However, we were not in a position to lead in this area at this time. The Chair noted our role as being calm and reassuring. The Board heard that we did proactively rebut falsehoods on social media where possible, but that it could be hard to keep up with the volume. We had the ability to contact the social media company and have the information removed. We had built and maintained good relations with the public policy teams of the major social media companies so we could raise issues with them throughout the campaign period. The Board heard that we were proactive in monitoring developments throughout the election campaign which would assist us in preparing for future policy developments. The Board heard that we had identified the potential impact of a strike at the Royal Mail, and were working to develop an appropriate response. We were in regular contact with the Royal Mail to understand their operating environment. The Board heard that local authorities had been working on securing sufficient polling stations for the General Election over the past few weeks. The Board discussed the political situation in Northern Ireland, including the possibility of an electoral event such as a Northern Ireland-only referendum as part of the Withdrawal Agreement Bill. The Board heard of the preparation that we had undertaken for a potential Assembly Election in early 2020. We had not discussed specific referendums with the government, but there had been general discussions.

These were positive discussions, where we were able to encourage the government to ensure there would be sufficient time to prepare for any referenda. The Board enquired about our approach to involvement in media news programmes about elections. The Board heard that we had been sharing information in areas where there had been discussion on elections, but avoided involvement in political discussions. The Head of External Communications advised that we would shortly be pro-active in media interviews, focused on registration of voters, delivery of the election and compliance with the campaign rules. Discussion on the findings from the winter-tracker research The Head of Research presented the findings of the 2018/19 winter-tracker to the Board. We run this public opinion survey annually, and had been since 2006. The Board heard that the responses were collected online, as had been the case since 2017. The total number of responses was 1,731 from a nationally representative sample. The Board discussed the value of conducting these surveys annually. The Board heard that this information was published and used by the wider electoral community, including academics and think tanks. The three words that respondents used to best describe the Electoral Commission were 'important', 'professional', and 'independent'. The research found that confidence in casting a vote and registering to vote were high. Confidence that elections were well run was more volatile, but this could have been influenced more by external events. Confidence in well-run elections varied by age; with younger people less confident that elections were well run. This would be monitored to determine if it was indicative of a trend.

Satisfaction with the process of voting at elections, the system of registering to vote, and that elections were well run was also variable, and might be influenced by results rather than what was under our control. The research asked those that indicated they were dissatisfied with the system of registration and the process of voting what would improve their satisfaction. Responses included automatic registration and the ability to check online whether a voter was registered or not, and the ability to vote online. The Board questioned whether we should ask all respondents what would improve their voter satisfaction, rather than limiting our data to the respondents who had indicated they were unsatisfied. Some of the areas of concern identified in the research included media bias, low voter turnout at elections, and inadequate regulation of the money political parties spent on their election campaigns. Different age groups had different perceptions of problems, and the research team would continue to monitor these responses to confirm whether these perceptions were linked to particular age groups. The research found low awareness of the way in which parties raised money to pay staff and contest elections, low confidence that spending and funding was transparent, or that voters could easily determine how parties were funded. However, half the respondents believed that authorities would take appropriate action in these areas. Sarah Chambers, Ailsa Irvine, Niki Nixon, and Majella La Praik left the meeting at 12.30pm. Scoping for procurement of external facilitator for 2020 Board effectiveness review The Director of Finance and Corporate Services asked the Board for suggestions on what topics they would like to cover with an external facilitator in February 2020. The Chief Executive suggested assessing the Board's impact or innovation as potential themes for discussion. The Chair suggested a broad look at the Board before assessing specific areas. The Board then discussed what kind of organisation would be best placed to lead this discussion. The Board suggested a more bespoke, tailored service most likely from a smaller organisation would be best. The Board discussed the value in having someone sit in on a Board and Committee meeting to observe how Commissioners interact. This would ensure that the review would cover the way the Board works through its agenda and monitors the wider organisation, while also reviewing the dynamic of interactions. Some Commissioners said they would pass on the name of organisations they had previously worked with on similar reviews. The Chief Executive explained that the scheduled Board meetings would be affected by the General Election. The Board agreed that the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee meeting scheduled for 4 December 2019 would be moved to 22 January 2020. The meeting finished at 12.45pm.

Delivering the elections Supporting Evidence Summary This report looks at how the May 2022 elections in Wales were run, how voters and campaigners found taking part, and what lessons can be learned for the future. We have reported separately on elections held in England , Northern Ireland and Scotland . On 5 May elections took place across the 22 local authority areas in Wales. Overall, people were confident that these elections were well-run and were highly satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. Turnout at these elections was lower than at previous comparable elections, and was lowest for voters under 35 years of age. Further education and engagement is recommended to support newly enfranchised voters to understand and participate in Welsh elections. Almost everyone who voted was able to use their preferred method and found it easy to fill in their ballot paper. s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and felt able to get their views across effectively. Voters generally found it easy to access information about the elections, but this did not necessarily translate to them feeling well-informed about the elections and who they could vote for. A notable proportion of candidates told us that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. While robust political debate is part of a healthy democracy, sometimes things go too far and cross the line into threats, abuse and intimidation. When this happens, it is vital that action is taken against those found guilty of these criminal offences. We will work with Welsh Government, the police and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Finally, the late introduction of legislation making changes to the rules for running the elections brought significant additional challenges for Returning Officers and electoral administrators. All relevant Governments need to consider the impact of legislative changes on the administration of elections and commit to legislation being clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with. Voting at the elections The experience of voters at the May 2022 elections Most people were confident that the elections were well-run and the vast majority were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. Almost all found voting in person at a polling station easy to do. Most voters were able to vote using their preferred method and found the ballot paper easy to fill in. Turnout at these elections was lower than at previous comparable elections, and was lowest amongst voters under 35 years old.
Overview On 5 May 2022, there were local government elections across all 22 authorities in Wales. This was the first time that 16 and 17 year olds and foreign nationals resident in Wales were able to vote in local elections. Four local authorities trialled advanced voting at these elections. We evaluated the pilots, and our report - which was published in August - identified several specific areas to be addressed if a further roll out of advanced voting is considered for future elections. Voters continue to have positive views about how elections are run Satisfaction with the registration and voting process remains high People had high levels of satisfaction with the process of registering to vote and voting. Our research shows that: 81% of people across Wales were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. 95% of people who voted were satisfied with the process of voting. 71% of people said they were confident that the elections were well-run; however, 10% were not confident. These figures are broadly consistent with findings following the most recent comparable elections in 2017 and the 2021 Senedd election. Most voters were able to obtain enough information on the candidates Our research shows that the majority of people could obtain information on the candidates standing for election. We found that: 41% of people said it was fairly easy and 18% said it was very easy to obtain the information they required; 19% said it was fairly difficult and 9% said it was very difficult. 45% of people said that they had enough information about the candidates to make an informed decision when voting, but just over a third (34%) tended to disagree. Turnout at these elections was lower than at previous comparable elections In 2022 there was a decrease of 4% in turnout for the local government elections (38%) compared to 2017 (42%). People were most likely to tell us that they didn't vote because of: lack of time/too busy (18%) not interested/fed up with politics (12%) vote wouldn't have made a difference to the outcome/ doesn't count (11%) medical/health reasons not related to COVID-19 (9%) didn't like the candidates/parties/they didn't represent my views (8%) 94% of people who voted said they were able to use their preferred method of voting (in person, by post or by proxy). This figure was lower amongst in-person voters with a disability or health condition (82%). Most people were confident they knew how to cast their vote Nearly all voters (97%) found the ballot paper easy to fill in, and three in four (74%) found it very easy. However, this figure was lower amongst voters with a disability or health issue (67%). Almost everyone who voted by post said that they knew how to complete and return their postal vote and found the postal voting instructions useful: 97% said it was easy to complete and return their postal vote, compared to 3% saying it was difficult Data from electoral administrators shows that: 3.3% of returned postal votes were rejected. The most common reason for postal votes being rejected was that the personal identifiers (signature and/or date of birth) that voters provided on the postal voting statement did not match those that they had provided previously 0.6% of votes cast were rejected at the count. The most common reason for ballot papers to be rejected at the count was because they were unmarked, with this accounting for almost three-quarters (73%) of all rejected ballot papers Changes to postal voting statements did not reduce the postal vote rejection rate In March 2022, Welsh Government, through the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, requested that a trial group of Returning Officers make a change to the postal voting statement to include an additional "today's date" box. The aim was to reduce the postal vote rejection rate due to errors by an elector in providing their personal identifiers (specifically their date of birth). 13 local authorities (out of 22) made this change to the statement. Rejection rate for postal votes 2017 2022 In the trial areas 2.5% 3.3% Not in the trial areas 3.3% 3.1% In the trial areas where the postal voting statement was modified, there was a 0.8% percentage point increase in the rejection rate compared with the most recent comparable elections in 2017. In non-trial areas, there was a 0.2% percentage point reduction in the rejection rate compared with 2017. There is no pattern evident in the data to indicate why this increase may have occurred. We know from our other research that the majority of people who vote by post do so for most elections, so may have become used to using the unmodified version of the form. Welsh Government should consider the available data carefully in making any decision to legislate for permanent changes to the statement. We will also continue to explore ways of improving the electoral system to meet voters' needs. As part of this, we (working alongside the Wales Electoral Coordination Board) will consider evidence about whether changes to postal voting documents or processes could help to reduce the number of postal ballot packs that are rejected at future elections. Further education and engagement is recommended to support new voters to understand and participate in Welsh elections. The Local Government and Elections Wales Act 2021 extended the voting franchise for Welsh local government elections to 16 and 17 year olds and qualifying foreign citizens. To ensure new voters understood this change and knew how to register, we worked with the Welsh Government and partners across Wales to encourage registration and educate new voters about their vote. The Welcome to Your Vote campaign ran for a second time. Ahead of the elections we re-ran our 'Welcome to Your Vote' paid voter registration campaign, targeted at newly enfranchised 16-17 year olds, alongside our 'Got 5?' campaign targeting the whole electorate. Alongside the campaigns, we held awareness raising events including 'Welcome to Your Vote Week' and 'Welcome to Your Vote Day' targeted at each of the newly enfranchised groups. During the campaign period, a total of 38,438 people in Wales applied to register to vote, including 3,596 16-17 year olds and 663 qualifying foreign citizens. 1 The most applications were from citizens of Hong Kong, USA, Turkey and the Philippines. 2 We worked with partners to reach under-registered groups. Alongside our work to encourage newly enfranchised groups to register, we worked with partner organisations to explain the democratic process to other groups who are typically under-registered or disengaged. Our partners included the British Deaf Association Wales, Mencap Cymru, Welsh Women's Aid, Llamau and Gypsies and Travellers Wales. Ahead of the elections, the Welsh Government provided funding to local authorities to recruit Electoral Registration Support Officers, to help improve registration rates among newly enfranchised and under-registered groups. We worked closely with these officers via the Wales Electoral Coordination Board communications sub-group and the Welsh Government registration partnership. This additional resource was welcomed by local authorities and was crucial in delivering key areas of work to local target groups, especially young people. The strongly held opinion of those local authorities that we talked to was that this resource should continue to be made available to ensure that the foundations already laid are built upon and this important work can continue.

Participation by young people is less than in other age groups. Our research shows a clear difference in turnout amongst those under the age of 35 compared to all other older age groups. Approximately 1 in 5 (12,338) newly enfranchised 16-17 year olds registered to vote ahead of this election. 3 More focus on political education is needed. Ahead of the elections, we developed our democratic education work to help young people understand how to get involved in the democratic process. We published updates to our resources for educators, all linked to the current Welsh curriculum. We partnered with The Democracy Box and have been working with the project's young co-creators and focus group participants aged 16-26 to gain feedback on our resources for young people. Feedback from young people and partners involved in our education work has consistently shown: a lack of understanding as to how to participate in our democratic process; a lack of motivation to engage in elections due to insufficient knowledge about candidates, parties and the process in general. Our Public Opinion Tracker 2022 research (carried out in February 2022) also found that: 77% of parents think it's important that children learn the basics about politics, voting and democracy at school; more parents think the information their children get around politics, voting and democracy at school is insufficient (31%) than sufficient (22%). The Democracy Box's Youth Voice evaluation report recommended that: "Democratic education should start young and be embedded into the curriculum, but continue as young people go on to do different things in different places in both formal and informal education settings and beyond." The New Curriculum for Wales aims to support learners to become 'ethical, informed citizens who understand and exercise their human and democratic responsibilities and rights.' There is therefore an opportunity for democratic awareness to be woven consistently through education, rather than being a standalone topic during an election. We will continue to build on the work already delivered by engaging further with young people and educators across Wales, and with the Welsh Government, to identify more themes and topics our resources can address and to provide teacher training. We will work closely with the Welsh Government to ensure our resources can effectively support the delivery of democratic education in schools through the new curriculum. Recommendation 1 Recommendation 1 Welsh Government should consider continuing to provide an additional resource to local authorities to increase registration rates and support participation amongst newly enfranchised and under-registered groups, building upon the work carried out by the Electoral Registration Support Officers. Campaigning at the elections The experience of campaigning at the May 2022 elections s communicated with voters using a number of methods, including printed material, face-to-face and digital campaigning. The majority of candidates felt they were able to get their views across to voters. Traditional campaigning methods (leafletting and canvassing) were the most popular. Transparency around who is responsible for producing online and digital campaign material remains important to voters. Late legislation relating to the nomination forms caused some confusion for candidates, particularly around the declaration of party affiliation. A notable proportion of candidates responding to our survey said that they experienced some form of abuse or intimidation. In most cases this involved verbal or online abuse, and the majority of instances came from members of the public. We also received reports of poor candidate behaviour from the police. We will work with Welsh Government and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation, and to ensure this issue is addressed as a matter of urgency. Overview Over 3000 candidates stood at the local elections in Wales, representing 24 political parties as well as 711 independent candidates. Of the 1,233 seats available, 74 candidates were elected without a contest. s were able to engage with voters but some raised concerns about the continued impact of Covid s engaged with voters in a range of ways ahead of the elections and the majority felt able to get their views across effectively. s used a variety of methods to communicate with voters At the 2022 elections, voters reported receiving information from candidates in a variety of different ways including: leaflet from a candidate (56%) leaflet from another source (individual or organisation supporting a candidate) (27%) door-to-door canvassing (15%), which was higher in rural areas (23%) word of mouth (15%) untargeted social media posts (14%) advert on social media (12%) Candidates responding to our survey told us that more traditional campaigning methods were used at these elections: 83% put leafletting in their top three campaigning methods, with 45% of respondents saying it was their most used method. Door-to-door canvassing was also popular, with 30% saying it was their most common approach a substantial number of respondents used social media in their campaigns, though it was primarily to supplement traditional methods, rather than being the main tool. 55% put social media in their top three methods of campaigning, with 8% saying it was their most used method, compared to 40% saying it was their third most used when asked about digital campaigning, free methods were far more popular than any paid-for digital methods. 56% of respondents put posts on social media, and 25% asked supporters to share their posts. The most popular paid-for digital campaigning was adverts on social media, although this was utilised by just 7% of respondents around a third (30%) of respondents said they did not use any digital campaigning Covid continued to have an impact on campaigning Our research showed that Covid continued to have some impact on campaigning. According to candidates who responded to our survey, 65% felt that they were able to effectively get their views across to voters, while 9% disagreed. However, the majority of candidates reported that Covid affected their campaigns in some way, specifically: 60% said that Covid impacted their ability to enlist volunteers 'a lot' or 'a little', and over half (55%) said that fewer opportunities for face-to-face campaigning impacted their campaign to some degree 45% said that concerns about their own health impacted their campaign in some way People want to know who is responsible for producing campaign material Our research confirmed that people continue to value transparency about who is responsible for political campaign activity online at elections. Transparency about who is producing election campaign material is important to build trust We found that: three in five adults in Wales say it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online almost half of respondents (49%) said they would trust digital campaign material more if they knew who produced it 40% feel that they cannot currently trust the political information that is available online, whereas only 14% said the information online was trustworthy The UK Government has introduced legislation that will require most campaigners to include information to identify themselves as part of their online campaign material. This new digital imprint requirement will help voters understand who is paying to target them online at future elections and referendums. We will monitor any impact of these new requirements on people's levels of confidence in political information online. Recommendation 2 Recommendation 2 We continue to recommend that Welsh Government ensures that a digital imprint regime is in place in advance of the next set of scheduled elections in Wales. Late legislation caused confusion for some candidates standing for election Two issues have been identified where late legislative changes made ahead of these elections affected candidates. Changes to the nomination process caused confusion The first change was a declaration of party affiliation, where candidates must now declare whether they have been a member of another political party within the 12 months leading up to the day on which the notice of election is published. This caused confusion for some candidates, who either failed to complete this section or completed it incorrectly. This issue is covered in further detail in the Delivering the elections section of this report. The second change related to the use of joint descriptions on the ballot paper. The new legislation permitted two parties to use a joint description on the ballot paper which must include the full registered names of both parties involved. The law for Senedd elections and other UK-wide elections is different, and allows for the use of joint descriptions that are registered with the Electoral Commission and which identify the parties involved but don't necessarily include the full registered party names. At the local government elections, these registered joint descriptions were not permitted under the new legislation. Recommendation 3 Recommendation 3 Welsh Government should review the legislation around joint descriptions ahead of the next scheduled local elections, to allow for registered joint descriptions to be used on the ballot paper, in line with the position for Senedd elections and other elections across the UK. We provided support to candidates throughout the election process We attended candidate sessions at party conferences and stand-alone virtual events, to provide candidates and agents with information on the rules for the elections from the nomination process through to the reporting of campaign spending. We also arranged a bespoke virtual session for independent candidates, and attended local authority briefing sessions to ensure that we were able to provide as much support as possible prior to the nomination period and through to polling day. Increasing opportunities for supporting candidates and parties. We also introduced virtual post-poll advice surgeries for candidates and agents who wanted to ask specific questions. These sessions were popular and the feedback has been positive. Feedback included: almost three quarters of candidates (73%) agreed that the law on election spending and reporting was clear. A fifth (20%) either said they didn't know or neither agreed nor disagreed, and 7% disagreed just under two thirds (64%) agreed that the law on donations and how to check permissibility was clear, compared to 6% who disagreed. 69% found the law about personal expenses clear, while 6% disagreed. Threats, abuse and intimidation continue to be an issue during elections. 3 in 5 candidates who responded to our survey (60%) said that they did not have a problem with threats, abuse or intimidation; however, 40% experienced some kind of problem and 8% experienced a serious problem. Our research found that: of those that said they experienced some kind of abuse, the most common sources were verbal (69%) and online (46%) over two thirds (69%) said the abuse they experienced came from members of the public. Almost 2 in 5 (39%) said they received abuse from other candidates, while 15% received threats or abuse from campaigners or volunteers. 16% witnessed threats or intimidation towards those campaigning on their behalf of those who experienced or witnessed abuse, 15% said they reported it to the police, and almost a fifth who experienced threats or abuse said that their experience would discourage them from standing in the future. We have received information from the four police Single Points of Contact (SPOCs) in Wales regarding issues experienced during the election period. In general, it was reported that some candidate behaviour was poor, particularly on social media. The police have said that: "The behaviour shown by some candidates at the local elections in May was completely unacceptable." The SPOCs have proposed that they, on behalf of the police forces in Wales, create some guidance for candidates and campaigners on expectations around behaviour during an election period, and that this should be provided to all candidates as part of the nomination process. This new guidance would sit alongside the resources already available on the College of Policing website relating to candidates, and the Code of Conduct for campaigners. We will work with the relevant police forces and SPOCs in the development and support of this material. We will work with Welsh Government and the wider electoral community to make sure we understand what is driving candidate abuse and intimidation and to develop effective responses to protect candidates and campaigners at future elections.

Delivering the elections

The experience of electoral administration at the May 2022 elections

The elections were well run across Wales, but issues with the capacity and resilience of elections teams, coupled with the high recent turnover of Returning Officers created challenges. The late introduction of legislation making changes to the rules for running the elections, brought additional challenges for Returning Officers and administrators. This could be avoided if all legislation relating to electoral events is clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with.

Overview

Local authority elections teams were responsible for managing electoral registration, candidate nominations, absent voting, polling stations and the counting of votes. Our evidence shows that the May 2022 polls were well-run, and voters and campaigners reported high levels of satisfaction and confidence. For Returning Officers and electoral administrators, however, these elections presented significant challenges, with one notable issue being the lack of time available to plan as a result of the late introduction of new legislation. There also remain underlying issues relating to the capacity and resilience of election teams. These challenges were felt most strongly in local authorities where capacity was more limited, or in some cases where there had been a recent change of Returning Officer or Electoral Services Manager. However, with considerable diligence and effort, together with support from the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, local authorities were able to deliver the polls successfully, albeit under pressurised circumstances. The timing of legislative changes meant Returning Officers lacked the certainty they needed to plan. The Welsh Government undertook a review during the summer of 2021, which resulted in the introduction of legislation providing a new set of rules for the local government elections in May 2022. The Local Elections (Principal Areas) (Wales) Rules 2021 and The Local Elections (Communities) (Wales) Rules 2022 came into force on 14 December 2021. The changes in the rules meant, that for the first time, candidates: did not require the signatures of supporters (apart from one witness) could choose not to have their home address shown on the ballot paper had to disclose previous party membership (within the last 12 months) could submit their nomination electronically Changes were also made to the disqualification criteria which meant that you could stand as a candidate at a local authority election if you were a paid officer or employee of that local authority, but had to resign your post if elected. In March 2022 the new rules were amended by The Local Elections (Miscellaneous and Consequential Amendments) (Wales) Regulations 2022. These amendments were made partially in response to comments received during the short period of consultation on the substantive rules, but also to add provisions that were necessary to support the advance voting pilots in four local authority areas. 4 The late introduction of the new rules created challenges for administrators in preparing for the elections, as well as for us in producing guidance and resources to support them. The key impact was on the nomination forms, which we could not make available until 18 February when the amending legislation had been laid. Electoral administrators who responded to our survey said they found that the introduction of legislation so close to the elections made it difficult for them to plan effectively. Specifically, they reported that the lateness of nomination forms impacted on the availability of guidance and the briefings they could offer for candidates. "Legislation was too late for the local elections. Our candidate briefings started in January and legislation came through late December. How are we supposed to encourage candidates to come forward and stand for election when we don't know the rules and processes well enough in advance particularly given the potential scale of changes that were being proposed?" - Returning Officers need early clarity to be able to deliver significant changes introduced by new legislation Returning Officers need early clarity to be able to deliver significant changes introduced by new legislation Significant reform is expected in Wales over the coming years, which will present new challenges for electoral practitioners in Wales. This includes new policies expected to be introduced by Welsh Government as well as changes arising from the UK Government's Elections Act 2022. Governments need to ensure there is effective planning, management and communication with the electoral community around new legislation and avoid significant delays and short notice changes. Recommendation 4 Recommendation 4 We once again urge Welsh Government to ensure that all legislation relating to electoral events is clear (either by Royal Assent to primary legislation, or by laying secondary legislation for approval by the Senedd) at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with. We also call on the UK Government to ensure the legislation is clear at least six months before any changes in the Elections Act 2022 are going to be implemented so that Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and electoral administrators have enough time to prepare. Failure to do this creates significant risks to the delivery of well-run polls and public confidence in elections. It means that electoral administrators are put under intense pressure, with the successful delivery of elections then relying on their goodwill to work additional hours during the pre-election period, which is not sustainable. It also impacts directly on candidates and agents, who have less time to familiarise themselves with the process. Resilience and capacity in election teams remains a significant challenge In previous reports we have highlighted our concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in Wales. The high turnover of Returning Officers continues and increases the risks to the delivery of well-run polls. The support provided by the Wales Electoral Coordination Board through its events and mentorship scheme was appreciated by new Returning Officers. "The personal support I received from my mentor and other experienced Returning Officers in my region was extremely useful. I also found the support from the Wales Electoral Coordination Board very useful, particularly for making me aware of the critical issues across Wales, and offering solutions." Returning Officers and electoral administrators who responded to our survey said the resilience of electoral services was still an issue, but that these elections were more straightforward to manage compared with the challenge of delivering the Senedd election in 2021. There was an issue in Denbighshire where a printing error was made in the instructions on how to vote, which were sent out to 16,000 postal voters. When the problem was identified, action was taken to contact those voters affected to provide them with the correct instructions. While the number of voters who received incorrect instructions was significant, the number of postal ballot papers re-issued because of the error was small (15). We recognise the pressures faced by Returning Officers and their teams, particularly where officers are new and inexperienced. It is important, however, that voters, candidates and political parties can have confidence in the election process and that the election material they receive is accurate. Following the polls, the Returning Officer in Denbighshire and his team have reviewed how the error had occurred and their processes for dealing with it, and have made a commitment to improving processes in the future. We have also provided advice to the Returning Officer and his staff to support them in improving their proofing processes for future elections. Returning Officers struggled to recruit enough staff to work in the polling station Recruiting staff to work at the elections in some areas was a problem. Two thirds of administrators who responded to our survey said that recruiting enough suitable staff for polling stations was an issue. In certain cases, administrators reported having to recruit Presiding Officers with limited or no experience of the role in order to ensure polling stations could be staffed appropriately. Also, administrators highlighted that a number of people who had previously undertaken the Presiding Officer role had said they were no longer interested in doing so. Administrators also said they believe this will continue to be an issue, limiting the number of experienced people who will be available to work at each set of polls. The Electoral Commission will continue to work with the Wales Electoral Coordination Board and the wider electoral community across the UK to discuss and identify solutions to the staffing, resilience and capacity challenges experienced by Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and their teams as well as in recruiting sufficient polling station staff. Effective planning and support helped Returning Officers to deliver the elections The Wales Electoral Coordination Board played an important role supporting Returning Officers and electoral administrators and promoting consistency As at previous recent elections, the Wales Electoral Coordination Board played an important coordination role for these elections, supporting local authorities by holding all-Wales briefing events for Returning Officers and Electoral Services Managers in the autumn of 2021 and spring of 2022. The Board, which was established in 2017, operates on a voluntary basis to co-ordinate the planning for all-Wales electoral events and activity related to electoral modernisation and reform. As well as this, the Board supports collaboration between Regional and Local Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and key partners in Wales. Those who responded to our survey said they felt that the Board's role was sometimes confusing and that communication could be improved. If the Board was made statutory, as recommended in our reports on elections in Wales in 2017 and 2021, we believe this would begin to address these concerns.

National agreement was reached on holding the count the day after the poll rather than overnight. The Wales Electoral Coordination Board had early discussions about the timing of the count, and sought consensus from across Wales. In January 2022, with the support of the main political parties, the Board recommended to all Returning Officers in Wales that the count should take place on the day after polling day and not overnight. This recommendation was implemented across Wales. Similar to feedback received at the Senedd election in 2021, we heard from administrators that daytime counting was a success, and was appreciated by candidates and election staff. It made staffing the count easier and was reported to have improved the overall atmosphere.

Welsh Government should strengthen the Wales Electoral Coordination Board and place it on a statutory footing, which will enable it to play an enhanced role in the delivery of future elections and electoral reforms in Wales. New nomination forms and electronic submission processes made the process easier for candidates but created administrative challenges. New legislation changed the nomination forms for the local elections, and candidates were also able to submit them to Returning Officers electronically for the first time. Legislative changes to the nomination forms caused confusion and created extra work for administrators. While the nominations process generally ran smoothly and provided candidates with different ways to submit their nomination papers, feedback from electoral administrators highlighted issues with the nomination forms and the electronic process for submission. For example: the processing of electronic nominations forms added to the workload at a point when time is limited many candidates submitted nomination forms electronically very close to the deadline making it difficult for any issues to be addressed. The forms were felt to be repetitive and not straightforward to complete. “Online applications were a double-edge sword. It made it relatively easy for candidates to submit papers at a time of their choosing and removed the need for them to come into the office to hand them in. At a time when we are extremely busy with nominations, minor errors on the form that could be corrected in seconds in the office, could take a couple of days to resolve via emails.” Through the Wales Electoral Coordination Board, work is currently underway to identify improvements to the nominations process that could be introduced for future elections.

Statement of party affiliation

The new rules also made changes to the nomination forms requiring candidates to provide a statement confirming whether they had been a member of any registered political party during the period of 12 months ending with the day when the notice of election was published (defined as ‘the relevant period’) and, if so, to provide details of this membership. At the end of March 2022, administrators expressed to us that there was confusion around the information they needed to transfer from the nomination forms to the statement of persons nominated, which they would then make publicly available. If the legislation had been in place earlier, and more time given to consultation with those affected by the changes, this issue may have been avoided. To address the confusion, we issued supplementary guidance to Returning Officers and Electoral Services Managers advising them to only extract and include information from the statement of party membership relating to the relevant period. We also advised Returning Officers and Electoral Services Managers to remind candidates and agents, during the informal check stage, of the specific circumstances under which they needed to include details on their statement of party membership. We are working with Welsh Government to minimise the potential for misunderstanding in future and will consider further additions to our guidance to provide additional clarity. This could include providing updates on topical items within the quarterly Chief Executive's update report and scheduling items on Board away days. Resolved: That the Board discussed and reviewed the Forward Plan of Board business for 2022/23, with pending topical items to be scheduled in. Chief Executive updates (Oral) Introduction from the new Chief Executive The Chief Executive, Shaun McNally, addressed the meeting by thanking the Board Chair and the leadership team for welcoming him into the organisation and providing an insight into the functions of the Commission through induction meetings. The Board noted that the Chief Executive's initial focus was on listening, including getting to know the Board, its challenges and focus across the organisation. The Board welcomed the Chief Executive and looked forward to a collaborative working partnership. Update on current activities including the Elections Bill The Director, Communications, Policy and Research provided an update on activity relating to the Elections Bill. The Board noted that there had been broad engagement with peers during the House of Lords' consideration of the legislation, from overview briefing meetings through to direct advice relating to amendments. It was noted that Commission briefing and advice had been widely welcomed, and its impact visible from the debates. Work on the secondary legislation was now beginning; and under the chair of the Director, Regulation, the Commission has strengthened its internal project governance to prepare for this next, complex phase of work. The Board noted that preparation for implementation was already beginning on those measures the successful implementation of which would require work to begin now to be able to meet expected timetables for commencement. Resolved: That the Board noted the updates. Annual review of governance Commissioner skills and linked Commissioners (EC 103/22) The General Counsel introduced the report, providing data from the survey taken in December 2021, on Commissioners' skills levels, experience and interest in key areas of the Commission. The Board discussed areas of the Commission where Board members could be brought into discussions where there was a need for expertise and where there are critical issues arising. The Board further discussed the nature of having linked commissioners to assist with the oversight of progressing Corporate Plan objectives. It would be important to manage the risk that a particular area was no longer visible in Board meeting discussions, due to a Member having a link to it. The Board welcomed the report and thanked the General Counsel for a useful and necessary paper. Resolved: That the Board noted the results of the skills audit and insights into the Board. Resolved: That the Board agreed Commissioners Joan Walley and Sarah Chambers be Linked Commissioners for public awareness work. We will be developing and implementing the campaign on voter ID and this is where the input of Commissioners would be helpful. (Putting voters first (CP Objective 3)). Resolved: That the Board agreed Commissioners Stephen Gilbert and Alasdair Morgan be Linked Commissioners for the Commission's IT upgrade, which is a significant project being planned and would benefit from Commissioners experiences. (A Modern and sustainable electoral system and Underpinning work (CP Objective 7 & 8)). The Board discussed the importance of outcomes and being able to understand the impact of EROs' activities and of our work to support and challenge them. Further work to improve data and how we use it, as well as closer links to our wider research and electoral registration modernisation work, would aim to deliver improvements in these areas. The Board noted that a report on the 2021 registers and performance would be published following the May elections. Resolved: That the Board noted the content and progress made in using the framework to support and challenge EROs with planning for and delivering well-run electoral registration services across Great Britain. Update on elections (Oral) The Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance and Director, Communications, Policy and Research provided a presentation on the following headline topics: Elections taking place across the UK in May 2022 The policy and legislation framework for polls in England, Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales Flexible voting pilot schemes in Wales Delivery of our election support activity on: Guidance, advice and support Party registration Monitoring, research and reporting Public awareness and voter information Election information and polling station finder Web and social media content Media engagement The Board held discussions on the pilot schemes and how these were selected, security and younger voter turnout, as well as on preparations for voting in Tower Hamlets, public health issues and Covid-19 protocols, postal voting and Royal Mail. Resolved: That the Board noted the content within the presentation. Annual declaration of interests (EC 107/22) Resolved: That the Board noted the declaration of interests of Commissioners and the Executive Team and for these to be published on the Commission's website.

Elections Act On this page Changes Our role First published: 5 July 2021 Last updated: 2 February 2023 Summary From November 2023 campaigners will need to include imprints on their digital political campaign material. Changes Imprints are details that need to appear on political or election-related material to show who has produced and paid for the material. They need to include the name and address of the promoter and any person on behalf of whom the material is being published. From November 2023, campaigners will be required to include imprints on their digital political campaign material. This means that many types of digital material such as social media adverts, tweets and posts, will require an imprint. This is the same requirement as for physical campaign material, like leaflets and letters. Digital imprint rules are already in place for some elections and referendums in Scotland. Material requiring an imprint includes: social media posts website material adverts in online newspapers videos images direct messages on Whatsapp It is also required on audio material such as adverts in podcasts or streams. The rules will apply all year round, not just in the run up to an election, and will apply to anyone paying to place political adverts online. An ordinary member of the public will not need to include an imprint on any organic digital material. Our role We are currently responsible for enforcing the law for imprints on printed election material for parties and non-party campaigners. Candidates are also required to add imprints to printed election material, and these laws are enforced by the police. We will now have a similar responsibility for imprints on digital material. We will also produce, for approval by Parliament, statutory guidance for parties and campaigners on the digital imprints requirements. This is for parties, non-party campaigners, candidates, future candidates, elected officeholders and recall petition campaigners.

This work focuses on two areas at the heart of a healthy democracy: ensuring transparency and good regulation. Key achievements To ensure transparency, we: published annual accounts from registered parties, information about donations and loans, and details of campaign spending, which parties and others are required to report to us registered political parties and other campaigners and published details in online registers continued reviewing party descriptions, to ensure that voters can identify the party for which candidates are standing continued developing a new online portal for party registration and finance, which we aim to launch in 2021 and will improve how parties and campaigners register and deliver financial returns scrutinised advertising transparency proposals from social media companies including Facebook, Google, Twitter and Snapchat, to ensure they provided improved transparency about digital campaign activity at elections in 2019 To support good regulation we: provided advice and guidance to support parties, candidates and campaigners to comply with the rules took action and imposed sanctions when the political finance rules were broken defended legal challenges to our enforcement decisions developed new codes of practice for parties and candidates continued pressing for law changes to strengthen our investigatory and sanctioning powers – including increasing the maximum fine we are able to impose for breaches of PPERA from the current level of £20,000 worked with the National Assembly for Wales to review their Standing Orders and ensure they have a robust plan to develop new rules and guidance for the elections in 2021 and to bring dual reporting to an end

Performance measures Measures Performance We publish routine financial returns from parties and campaigners, including statements of accounts, within 30 working days of receiving them (target 100%) 100% Achieved We check a minimum of 25% of all financial returns for accuracy and compliance each year 57.7% 1 Achieved We publish 100% of guidance products on time with no substantive errors 100% Achieved We provide accurate advice within five to 20 days of receipt of the request, depending on the complexity of the advice (target 90%) 94% Achieved We notify applicants of the outcome of their registration applications within 30 days of a complete application 75% of the time 86.2% Achieved We conduct timely and proportionate investigations of which 90% are completed within 180 days 84.3% 2 Achieved We issue 90% of final notices setting out our sanctions within 21 days of the deadline for representations. We publish the outcome of all our investigations 87.5% 3 Achieved We make timely regulatory recommendations that reflect the principles guiding our approach to effective regulatory framework 100% Achieved Ensuring transparency Throughout the year, we focussed on delivering the responsibilities we are accountable for to the UK's parliaments. We maintained the registers of political parties, ensuring only parties meeting the legal tests are on the register, and we continued reviewing descriptions to help voters identify the party for which candidates are standing. We faced two instances of campaigners seeking, via the court, to have their spending returns removed from our online database. One campaigner withdrew their court application and the court refused the other application. Good regulation Leading up to the UK Parliamentary general election, we registered a record number of non-party campaigners. We also developed our approach to campaign monitoring to be more proactive and quickly identify and intervene when issues came up. This stopped them from escalating and prevented campaigners from breaking the rules. We will continue to focus on this. We continued to use our investigation and sanctioning powers to identify and respond to non-compliance and deter future non-compliance. We imposed fines of £25k and £40k respectively, on two registered parties for multiple failures. The courts heard three appeals against penalties in 2019. One was withdrawn, one refused and one upheld. This brings the total number of appeals against sanctions we have imposed to five, of which the courts have upheld one. The appeals have provided helpful case law and we have learned from each case to improve our enforcement approach. For a number of years we have recommended that the UK's governments should change laws to strengthen our investigatory and sanctioning powers. This year we saw such changes in Scotland, where the Scottish Parliament, through the Referendums (Scotland) Act, increased the level of fines available to us (from £20,000 to £500,000); gave us wider powers to obtain information outside of formal investigations; and established rules to require imprints on digital campaign material. Changes to the voting system for mayoral and PCC elections | Electoral Commission

Changes Our role First published: 21 March 2022 Last updated: 2 February 2023 Summary

From May 2023, the voting system at mayoral elections in England and Police and Crime Commissioner elections in England and Wales use the first past the post system.

Changes Mayoral elections and Police and Crime Commissioner elections previously used the Supplementary Vote (SV) system, where voters could choose a first and second choice vote. Now, voters will choose a single candidate on the ballot paper. This is the same system as UK Parliamentary elections and local elections in England. Our role To support electoral administrators, we will update our guidance on these elections to reflect the change to the voting system. We will consider what activity is needed to raise awareness of the change in voting system and ensure voters and the electoral community understand it. It will be particularly important to avoid voter confusion if multiple elections are taking place using different voting systems.

Report: How the 2016 GLA elections were run | Electoral Commission Search Report: How the 2016 GLA elections were run You are in the Greater London Authority (GLA) elections section Home Greater London Authority (GLA) elections On this page About the elections Registration and turnout The voter experience The administration of the poll Standing for election and campaigning Looking ahead Recommendations: Legislation Recommendations: Communication Recommendations: Access for accredited observers Recommendations: Advisor with recent elections experience on GLRO's team Recommendations: E-counting Recommendations: Candidates Recommendations: Campaigning Download our full report First published: 20 June 2019 Last updated: 9 August 2019 About the elections On 5 May 2016 elections were held in London to elect the Mayor of London, 14 Constituency members and 11 London-wide Members of the London Assembly. There were also Police and Crime Commissioner (PCC) elections held across 40 police force areas in England and Wales (but not in London or Greater Manchester) and also elections to local authorities across parts of England, and mayoral elections in Bristol. This report looks specifically at the administration of the Greater London Authority (GLA) elections, which included the contests for the Mayor of London and London Assembly. Registration and turnout A total of 5.74 million people were registered to vote in the GLA elections on 5 May 2016. Overall turnout at the elections, including votes rejected at the count, was 46.1% This was an increase of 7.3 percentage points from the 2012 elections, when turnout was 38.8%. 1 858,634 voters - 15% of the electorate - were issued with postal ballot papers for these elections. This is 0.9 percentage points higher than the 14.1% of the electorate issued with postal ballot papers in 2012. Turnout amongst postal voters was 68.4%, broadly similar to postal voter turnout in 2012, and equivalent to 22.1% of the total votes cast. 2.60 million valid votes were cast at the elections. 1.9% (49,871) of ballot papers were rejected at the count, which was similar to the percentage of ballot papers rejected in 2012. A total of 22,728 returned postal ballot papers (3.7%) were rejected or not included in the count, a decrease on the 4.6% recorded in 2012. The voter experience Overall, the evidence from our public opinion research suggests that the large majority of voters were confident that the election was well-run and were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and the process of voting, regardless of how they cast their vote whether in person at a polling station or by post. Voters felt well informed about the GLA elections with 82% of those who took part in our research indicating that they knew 'a fair amount' or a 'great deal' about the election, a 10 percentage point improvement on views expressed in 2012. Voters also found it easy to access information on casting their vote and information about candidates standing. The administration of the poll Overall, our view is that the GLA elections were well run. People were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and with the process of voting, regardless of how they cast their vote, whether in person at a polling station or by post. However, serious problems in Barnet, where incomplete registers of electors were provided to polling stations, and issues at the results collation centre at City Hall, where software problems affected the collation of vote totals for the London Mayoral candidates, greatly overshadowed the good work undertaken in planning and delivering the poll. Standing for election and campaigning Our post-election survey of candidates suggests that the majority of candidates (66%) agree that the rules on spending and donations are clear. However, access to information about London Mayoral candidates' and London Assembly candidates' spending and donations could be improved by making candidates' election returns available for viewing online. Looking ahead Any decision taken about the combination of polls in May 2020 must be informed by extensive consultation between relevant Government departments, elected bodies, political parties, administrators and voters to ensure that the interests of voters are put first. For the GLA elections, specific consideration must be given to the added complications introduced by the potential combination of electronic and manual counting. Recommendations: Legislation Recommendation 1: The role of Borough Returning Officer be recognised in the legal framework for future GLA elections The roles of the Greater London Returning Officer (GLRO) and Constituency Returning Officer (CRO) are defined in the statutory framework. Borough Returning Officers (BROs) in each London Borough and the City of London supported the GLRO and CROs in running certain functions of the elections, including the administration of polling stations within each local authority area, and the issue and receipt of postal votes. However, the role of BRO is not recognised in legislation and there have been occasions at previous elections where communications between CROs and BROs have not been as straightforward as they should be, with some BROs calling for clarification of the roles. The Commission recommended (in response to the draft GLA elections rules in August 2007 and again following the 2008 and 2012 elections) that the role of BRO be recognised in the legal framework for the GLA elections in 2016. However, the government did not amend the rules to reflect this. Although this lack of recognition did not seem to cause significant problems at the 2016 elections, the Commission again recommends that the role of BRO be recognised in the legal framework for future GLA elections.

Recommendation 2: Providing an online registration status check Providing a way for electors to check their registration status at the beginning of the online registration application process would reduce the action required by voters to keep their register entry up to date, and would also reduce the impact on EROs of processing duplicate applications. The UK Government should develop an online service to allow people to check whether they are already correctly registered to vote before they complete a new application to register . Any such service would need to carefully manage and protect voters' personal information. Recommendation 3: Ensuring legislation is clear in good time before elections We continue to recommend that Governments with legislative competence over elections within the UK should manage the development and approval of legislation so that it is clear (either by Royal Assent to primary legislation, or by laying secondary legislation for approval by Parliament) at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners or electoral administrators. All governments should normally be able to plan to ensure that legislation for elections is clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with. If a government has not been able to ensure that legislation is clear by this point, it should table a formal statement in the relevant legislature explaining why it has not, and setting out its assessment of the likely impact of the late confirmation of legislation for voters, campaigners and electoral administrators. Recommendations: Communication Recommendation 4: Improved communication with those attending the count centres through announcements and better use of progress screens Our observation at the count centres was that there was little or no use of announcements to explain to attendees what was happening. Outside of the formal announcements made at the beginning and end of the process, there was also limited interaction between CROs and their staff with those observing. The screens used to show progress scrolled too quickly between the different contests and it would have been better to have separate screens for each contest. The GLRO should ensure that there are co-ordinated communication arrangements at the count venues to supplement the individual constituency count arrangements. Use of display screens should be reviewed, particularly scrolling speeds, to ensure that data is communicated in a way that allows candidates, agents and observers to fully understand the progress of the count. Recommendation 5: More timely and regular communication with those attending the count collation hub Due to a problem with the software used for e-counting, a discrepancy was discovered between the figures allocated to Mayoral candidates and the total number of ballot papers counted (and rejected) in each of the 14 constituencies. This error was first observed at approximately 4.30pm although there was no communication from the GLRO to advise the candidates, agents, observers and media that there was a problem, or of the effect the problem might have on any expected result declaration time, until 9.45pm. The GLRO should ensure that communication with candidates, agents and observers about the progress of the count collation process is clear and transparent, and provides proper and regular assurance at all times throughout the proceedings.

Recommendations: Access for accredited observers Recommendation 6: Ensure access to all areas of the count collation hub for Electoral Commission representatives and improved access for accredited observers Electoral Commission representatives at the count collation hub were initially denied access to areas where key decisions were being made following the discovery of a discrepancy between the figures allocated to Mayoral candidates and the total number of ballot papers counted (and rejected) in each of the 14 constituencies. While we had some oversight of the count collation hub where data from the count venues was being received, we were initially prevented from gaining access to the area where the GLRO and his team of advisors were situated. Although access was later granted – and the Commission representatives subsequently played a key role in supporting the GLRO through to the declaration of the result – there was a risk to the transparency of the election process. The GLRO must ensure that the Electoral Commission representatives are never denied access to any part of the count or any part of the electoral process, including access to the GLRO and his advisors. Consideration should also be given to providing candidates, agents and accredited observers better access to observe proceedings at the count collation hub.

Recommendations: Advisor with recent elections experience on GLRO's team

Recommendation 7: The GLRO should make arrangements to have an advisor with recent elections experience on his team The GLA core management team, including the GLRO, suffered by not having an experienced senior elections practitioner as part of the team at the count hub. This became especially apparent when the problem with the e-counting software arose. While there was expert legal advice available, the focus of deliberations and decision making of the core team was led almost exclusively by legal considerations to the exclusion of proper count management practice, and in particular to the communication of information to candidates and agents. The GLRO should ensure that he has, as a member of his core team, someone at a senior level who has recent and practical experience of delivering election counts and who can provide balanced practical advice and an overview of the management of the count process and the expectations of candidates, agents and observers. Recommendations:

E-counting Recommendation 8: Further consideration should be given to the effectiveness, value for money and risks of using e-counting systems This is the fifth set of Mayor of London and London Assembly elections that have used an e-counting system. In our report on the 2012 elections, we recommended that the cost benefit analysis that was carried out prior to letting the contract for e-counting in 2012 should be updated and published which was done. We again recommend that this analysis which should include a robust and detailed consideration of counting by hand is updated and published for comment by summer 2017. Given that elections currently scheduled for 2020 would entail a mixture of manual and electronic counting the Commission would welcome the opportunity to contribute to the analysis. The GLA's Election Review Panel is conducting a review of all aspects of the Mayor of London and London Assembly elections and for the e-counting part of this review we recommend that consideration is given to the risks arising from the technical and specialist nature of e-counting systems by asking the following questions: How much of the technical detail of the e-counting system does the GLRO personally need to understand? Who else in the GLRO's direct team is responsible for understanding and managing the operation of the e-counting system? How much control did the GLRO actually have over the e-counting system? How comfortable would the GLRO be with a similar degree of understanding and control for future elections? What was the overall risk assessment made by the GLRO about using the ecounting system? Was this risk anticipated, were the controls appropriate and applied effectively? Has this changed the GLRO's overall risk assessment about the use of e-counting in future elections? Recommendations: Candidates Recommendation 9: To remove all requirements in electoral law for candidates to pay a deposit before their names are allowed to be included on the ballot paper Our evidence continues to suggest that deposits represent a significant financial hurdle for independent candidates and candidates from smaller parties and the ability to pay a deposit is not a relevant or appropriate criterion for determining access to the ballot paper. We continue to recommend that there should be no deposit requirement for candidates or political parties at all UK elections, as we consider that the ability to pay a deposit is not a relevant or appropriate criterion for determining access to the ballot paper.

Recommendation 10: Access to the electoral register for Independent Candidates We continue to recommend that the law is changed to allow all candidates to get earlier access to the register for electoral purposes. This would particularly enable independent candidates to campaign on a more equal basis with candidates from political parties. Recommendations: Campaigning Recommendation 11: Publication of candidate spending returns To improve transparency and accessibility of candidate spending returns, we have previously recommended that Returning Officers should be required to publish spending returns online as well as through the existing methods of public inspection. We recommend that spending returns of London Mayoral candidates and London Assembly candidates should be published online in future. We support recommendation 12-5 of the Law Commissions' review of Electoral Law which proposes a method for implementing this change through legislation. 2 Recommendation 12: Registration of party names and descriptions for use on ballot papers We continue to recommend that where a candidate represents a political party on a ballot paper, it should be clear to voters which party the candidate represents. The legal provisions for registration of party descriptions present risks of confusion for voters and restrict the participation of political parties. The Governments of the UK should work with the Electoral Commission to reform the provisions on party descriptions. Recommendation 13: Improve transparency of non-party campaign spending at London Mayoral and London Assembly contests We recommend that the UK Government improve the rules on non-party campaign spending at London Mayoral and London Assembly contests before the next elections expected in 2020, including introducing greater transparency about who is campaigning and how much they are spending. Recommendations: Combination of polls in 2020 Recommendation 14: Analysis and consultation on the risks of holding polls on the same day The next Mayor of London and London Assembly elections are scheduled to take place on the same day as the next scheduled UK Parliamentary General Election. Elsewhere in England, there are scheduled PCC elections and local government elections, which include local council elections, directly elected local authority mayoral elections and combined authority mayoral elections. In Wales, there are PCC elections scheduled. In our view, this potential combination of polls presents significant risks which need to be mitigated in order to give voters, campaigners and Returning Officers confidence that the elections can be well-run. In London, specifically: There will be two sets of elections, incorporating three methods of voting and four ballot papers: the UK Parliamentary contest uses the 'first-past-the-post' system; the Mayor of London contest uses the supplementary vote system; the Constituency London Assembly Member contest uses the 'first-past-the-post' system; and the London-wide Assembly Member contest uses the closed list system which is a form of proportional representation. Clear and tailored information for voters on how to cast their vote will be essential to minimise confusion - for example, if the Mayoral and London Assembly ballot papers are counted electronically voters would be advised not to fold the ballot papers, while for the UKPGE the papers should be folded. The voting areas for the two sets of elections are different: In London, the Parliamentary elections are currently based on 73 Westminster constituencies (with draft proposals to reduce this number to 68 in 2018) which in some cases are and will be non-coterminous with the 33 London Boroughs. The Mayor of London and London Assembly elections are organised across 14 GLA constituencies (which themselves are combinations of London Boroughs). These differences may cause voter confusion and will also present challenges for political parties campaigning in both sets of elections and for those administering them. The timing of the counts and the counting system used in each election will need to be considered alongside expected levels of voter turnout: If ecounting is used in 2020 for the Mayor of London and London Assembly elections with a manual count for the UK Parliamentary election, consideration will need to be given to logistics of each count and the timing, particularly in the event of high turnout. Although counting can commence for the UK Parliamentary election before verification for all elections is completed , the verification of the ballot papers for all four contests will need to be completed before the UK Parliamentary election result can be declared. It is difficult to envisage how a combination of voting enabling manual and electronic counting for the respective polls could be delivered to allow an e-counting process which incorporates verification and counting simultaneously and enable the UK Parliamentary votes to be verified and counted manually on the night of the poll. It is a requirement at a UK Parliamentary general election for the Returning Officer to take reasonable steps to begin counting the votes within four hours of the close of poll. The UK Government should immediately begin the necessary analysis and consultation on the risks of holding these polls on the same day, including giving consideration to the potential for changing the date of elections currently scheduled to be held in May 2020, so that they do not coincide with the next scheduled UK Parliamentary general election which will be held on Thursday 7 May 2020. The Government should publish its assessment and any proposals for change by September 2017, to allow sufficient time to make any changes to legislation which might be required, and to allow Returning Officers, suppliers, campaigners and the Commission time to prepare. Any change to the date of scheduled elections would be a significant proposal, and must be informed by appropriate consultation with political parties, the Electoral Commission, relevant Government departments, elected bodies, administrators and voters themselves to ensure that the interests of voters are put first. Impact on security | Electoral Commission Search Impact on security

You are in the May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 24 July 2019 Last updated: 24 July 2019 Impact on security There is very limited evidence from the May 2018 pilot schemes about whether the identification requirement had a direct impact on the security of election procedures. In particular, it is not possible to evaluate whether the requirements actually prevented attempts to commit electoral fraud at elections. Overall findings from the pilot schemes In the areas where the pilot schemes took place, the local police forces have told us that there were no complaints about electoral fraud at polling stations for the May 2018 elections. However, it is not possible to assess whether the identification requirement prevented any actual attempts to commit impersonation fraud. In other areas where elections took place in May 2018 there were three complaints about electoral fraud taking place at polling stations. The police forces for those areas told us that they have investigated two of these cases but they did not need to take any further action. They are still investigating the other case. There is no direct evidence to suggest that this difference was because of the identification requirements in areas where pilot schemes took place. However, the pilot scheme requirements did introduce new identification checks where there have previously been no checks. Because of this, we can conclude that the pilot scheme requirements are likely to have had some positive impact on reducing the potential for electoral fraud by impersonation at polling stations. We cannot make any assessment from the available data about the nature or extent of this impact, however. Nor can we make any assessment from the data from these pilot schemes about whether there was any difference in the impact on security between the different requirements in each of the pilot scheme areas. Beyond the pilots: the impact on security at future elections Further pilot schemes may not help to provide more robust evidence about the impact of an identification requirement on the security of future elections. This is because it is not possible to evaluate whether the requirements actually prevented attempts to commit electoral fraud at elections. However, more work should be carried out before any further pilot schemes to further assess the relative security of different approaches to checking the identity of voters. It would be particularly useful to gather more evidence on the levels of assurance about someone's identity provided by different types of documents. For example, the security of different types of identification documents needs to be balanced against the availability of those forms of identification. This balance should be considered further before future pilot schemes and any decision to implement a voter identification requirement in Great Britain. Minutes of the last meeting and matters arising The minutes of the previous meeting held on 29 September 2020 were approved subject to the following corrections suggested by Scott Martin: Paragraph 3.6 was amended to reflect that Martin McKeown confirmed the guidance would be in the existing .pdf style. A reference was added to reflect that Andy O'Neill had confirmed that the Electoral Commission had never refused a S.10 request to give advice to a government. Preparations for the Scottish Parliamentary Election 2021 Scottish General Election (Coronavirus) Bill and other legislation relating to Scottish Parliamentary election 2021 Maria McCann (MMcC) reported on progress of the Scottish General Election (Coronavirus) Bill and the Scottish Parliament Election Amendment Order. She summarised the contents of the draft Bill and advised that the Scottish Parliament Standards, Procedures and Public Appointments Committee had held an evidence session on the draft Bill on 19 November. The Electoral Management Board (EMB), Association for s and the Electoral Commission (EC) had given evidence. The PPP asked questions in relation to the main provisions contained within the draft Bill and their impact on preparations for the May polls. Scott Martin (SM) noted the impact of moving the deadline for absent voting applications and the importance of ensuring that administrators were resourced to handle applications. He questioned the impact of moving the dissolution date for party spending limits in the long and short campaigns and wondered if it would be possible to change the date to allow an additional week in the long campaign. Public attitudes to voting in the context of Covid-19 Sarah Mackie (SMA) advised that the Commission had undertaken further research of public attitudes to voting under Covid-19. This followed similar research undertaken in August. The results would be shared with the PPP in the next week but she confirmed that the research had largely confirmed the findings of the earlier research undertaken in August. The Commission would reflect on how to incorporate the findings in to its approach to public awareness for the May polls. She agreed to share the resources that had been produced to assist local authorities with key messaging. The Commission would continue to discuss the approach to awareness raising with key stakeholders including ROs and EROs. Observations from Council by-elections Martin McKeown (MMcK) provided a summary of the findings and key lessons learned from the Commission's observations from the recent by-elections held in Scotland under coronavirus restrictions. He advised that the intention was to produce and publish a report by the end of the year. The PPP discussed the key findings and the implications arising for the May polls. The following points were raised and discussed. MS noted the late communication of the decision to postpone the North Lanarkshire by-elections close to the day of poll SM asked if the Commission intended to repeat the public opinion research. SMA advised that there were no specific plans to do so. She agreed to provide the PPP with data arising from the Commission's winter tracker. SMA confirmed that the Commission would be producing a household booklet. She undertook to confirm details of Phase II of the Electoral Commission public awareness campaign at the January PPP. Mathew Edmonds (ME) noted that it would be harder to campaign with voters more apprehensive about going to the polling station than normal. In respect of the postal vote application deadline of April 6, he wondered whether people might not really start paying attention to an election when it was still a month away. SMA noted that the household booklet had to carry a number of messages, including around how to complete the ballot papers along with electoral registration and different methods of voting and voters were more likely to act on messaging closer to the poll. However, other methods would also be used to disseminate earlier information on postal voting. PW observed that evidence from the Independence Referendum when demand for postal votes increased by 2.6%; 1% in the months ahead, but 1.6% in the final weeks. The Clackmannanshire by-election had shown a very minor increase in postal votes and the Electoral Commission survey results were clear in that where people were encouraged to vote by post, there followed an increase in numbers of postal vote applications. Clear communication about the electoral timetable to voters early on was essential. Chris Highcock (CH) reported the pattern of voting in polling places during the Edinburgh by-election had been different from normal; with more people working from home there was less reason for people to attend early, so there had not been the same early morning rush from people on the way to work at 7:00 am SM said the current proposal to change the date of poll card issue would force postal vote applications into a smaller number of days as poll card issue was the point when voters applied for a postal vote. AON said the Electoral Commission household leaflet would be issued in time to flag up the postal vote deadline. Guidance update MMcK provided an update on the preparation and publication of guidance for administrators and campaigners in advance of the May polls, including new guidance on digital imprints. He advised that the Director of Regulation would be circulating her Regulation Bulletin to campaigners shortly. Guidance would be published before the Christmas break. This included the new guidance on imprints. Clara Cole (CC) advised that the Regulatory Support team was working hard to get guidance out in a timely manner and would like to engage with campaigners to identify what further supports were needed. Arising from the report, SM and MC both commented on the importance to parties of getting sight of the imprints guidance as soon as possible in order for them to ensure consistency of interpretation and compliance within their organisations. MMcK advised he would circulate the guidance as soon as it had been signed off and

published. He offered to meet with parties to discuss the guidance once it was published. The PPP agreed that MMcK (a) confirm to parties when guidance had been published and (b) meet with parties thereafter as required. Scottish Government update A report on current legislative developments had been circulated. The PPP agreed to note the report. Scotland Office/Cabinet Office update A report from the Scotland Office / Cabinet Office had been circulated. The PPP agreed (a) to note that report; (b) that any issues arising from the report be highlighted to Lindsey Hamilton. Scottish Boundary Commissions update Isabel Drummond-Murray (ID-M) provided an update on (a) the outcomes from the LGBCs reviews of electoral arrangements in Argyll and Bute, North Ayrshire and Highland council areas; (b) the final recommendations arising from the reviews of the Scottish parliament constituencies of Glasgow and Central Scotland to Ministers in March 2020; and (c) the work programme arising from the Parliamentary Constituencies Bill. Royal Mail update Rachel Winham (RW) noted the increased demand for postal votes and confirmed that Royal Mail were currently putting plans in place for the May polls, including arrangements for delivering and collecting postal ballots. CH suggested the matter could be discussed through the EMB and agreed to arrange a meeting to discuss. PW suggested that the EC be invited to attend. The PPP agreed that CH arrange a meeting to discuss the issue. EMB update CH and PW provided updates on (a) Council by elections; (b) planned directions by the Convener for the May polls; (c) plans for a joint event with the EC for Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers in advance of the polls; (d) implementation of the extension of the franchise to qualifying foreign nationals. Arising from discussion, MS noted the directions would be helpful in promoting consistency for voters. PW asked that parties use the absent voter list to check whether voters were already postal voters or, as has occurred in the past, where the person had died. Paul Moat (PM) said they had met with resistance from ERO staff against processing data and had a lot of chasing up to get information out of them. PW said he had a meeting with EROs on 3 December and would flag up that they should respond quickly to these requests. The PPP agreed that PW raise PM's point with EROs and otherwise noted the report. Electoral Commission update MMcK and CHe provided updates on (a) new education resources for young people aged 14-18 (in formal and informal education) which were now live on the Commission's website; (b) the submission of draft Codes of Practice on Spending at Scottish Parliamentary elections to Scottish Ministers for approval; and (c) discussions that had taken place with EROs relating to the progress of the annual canvass and the imminent publication of a report on progress. Arising from discussion SM asked if the Commission had taken any external legal advice on the developments of the Codes. MMcK agreed to clarify. The PPP agreed that MMcK (a) clarify the position with regard to external advice taken on the draft Codes of Practice; and (b) circulate a copy of the report on the annual canvass once published. 2. Impact on voters: experience | Electoral Commission Search

2. Impact on voters: experience You are in the May 2019 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2019 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 12 July 2019 Last updated: 12 July 2019 Contents Overview Our findings Impact on voters: experience Impact on voters: confidence Impact on security Impact of administration of the polls Background to our evaluation Key findings Nearly everyone in these pilots who went to their polling station to vote was able to show ID without difficulty, as in 2018. Out of all those who went to their polling station, the proportion who couldn't show ID and who did not return to vote ranged from 0.03% to 0.7%. Some groups of people may find it harder than others to show ID, particularly photo ID. This includes people with accessibility challenges as well as other less frequent voters who did not attempt to vote on 2 May but are more likely to do so at a UK general election. Impact on voters on 2 May The number of people who were not able to show ID Nearly everyone who came to their polling station and wanted to vote in each of the pilots was able to show the right identification and be issued with a ballot paper. Some people did, initially, go to their polling station without the right identification and could not be issued with a ballot paper. Many of these people came back later with the right identification. The proportion of people who did not return ranged from 0.03% of all polling station voters in one local authority to 0.7% in two other areas. We cannot speculate or draw any conclusions about the reasons why these people did not return, because it was not possible for polling station staff to collect information from them. Number of people who were not able to show ID Mixed model pilots Number of people initially refused ballot paper Number of people who didn't return with ID People who didn't return, as percentage of those who voted in the polling station Braintree 203 73 0.3% Broxtowe 231 69 0.3% Craven 129 49 0.7% Derby 514 256 0.6% North Kesteven 145 68 0.4% Poll card pilots Number of people initially refused ballot paper Number of people who didn't return with ID People who didn't return, as percentage of those who voted in the polling station Mid Sussex 15 8 0.03% NW Leicestershire 266 61 0.4% Watford 94-209 33-51 0.2% Photo ID only pilots Number of people initially refused ballot paper Number of people who didn't return with ID People who didn't return, as percentage of those who voted in the polling station Pendle 284 101 0.7% Woking 87 22 0.1% For the photo and mixed ID pilot models, the average proportion not issued with a ballot paper was the same at 0.4%. The poll card model saw a smaller proportion not being able to vote at 0.2%. Polling station staff were not asked to collect demographic data about the people who did not come back, owing to the practical challenges involved in carrying out that data collection exercise. That means we have no direct evidence to tell us whether people from particular backgrounds were more likely than others to find it hard to show ID. However, it is possible to look at the numbers not issued with a ballot paper at a ward level within each pilot, compared with demographic data for the ward. Derby, Pendle, Watford and Woking are the only pilots with sufficient diversity in ethnic background to allow for this analysis. Having made this assessment, there is no clear picture across these pilots but we do see noteworthy findings in some areas: In Derby there is a strong correlation between the proportion of each ward's population from an Asian background and the number of people not issued with a ballot paper. In Pendle there is a weak correlation between the proportion of each ward's population from an Asian background and the number initially arriving at a polling station with no ID or the wrong ID. In the 2019 data we do not see any such correlation in Woking and Watford, although in the 2018 pilot in Watford there was a strong relationship between the proportion of Asian residents and the number not issued with a ballot paper. The evidence is therefore mixed and it is important to be clear that this correlation analysis does not definitively suggest that Asian voters were disproportionately affected by the requirement to show ID. However, this does emphasise the importance of ensuring that the ID requirements are suitable for all and that any public awareness activities are genuinely effective across all communities.

Impact on voters on 2 May: accordions Awareness of the ID requirement:

voters In line with this data, we found that most of those who voted in the pilots knew that they would need to show ID to be able to vote. Our public opinion research after the election found that 85% of people who voted at a polling station said they were aware beforehand that they would have to show ID. However, some groups of polling station voters were less likely to say that they knew they would need to show ID. Awareness was lower among first time voters (73%) compared to people who had voted before (87%), and among 35-54 year olds (80%) compared to those aged 55+ (89%). Awareness was consistent across the photo and mixed ID pilots and lower in the poll card pilots. However, as with the 2018 pilot scheme, we think this is not due to poor public awareness in the poll card pilots but because of respondents' interpretation of the question we asked – some people may not see needing to take a poll card as the same as needing to 'show some identification in order to vote'. The types of identification that voters showed In addition to those in the photo ID pilots, nearly nine in ten voters in the mixed ID pilots also chose to use a type of photo ID – most commonly their photo driving licence. Nearly six out of ten voters across both the photo and mixed ID pilots showed their photo driving licence, which was similar to the proportion in the three photo ID only and mixed model pilots in 2018. The vast majority of voters in the poll card pilots chose to show their poll card. A small proportion of people showed their photo driving licence (5%) or passport instead (1%).

Most frequently shown 2 nd most frequently shown 3 rd most frequently shown Photo ID only pilots Photo driving licence (62%) Passport (25%) Travel pass (11%) Mixed model pilots Photo driving licence (55%) Passport (19%) Travel pass (14%) Poll card pilots Poll card (93%) Photo driving licence (5%) Passport (1%) Roughly 10% of voters in the mixed ID pilots used non-photo ID. Of these, the majority of people used a combination of their poll card and a bank card. A small number of people did apply for these locally issued IDs in the two photo pilots and in two of the mixed ID pilots: 70 people in Pendle (63 voters showed it in the polling station) 24 people in Woking (37 voters showed it in the polling station, which included some issued in the 2018 pilot) Two people in Broxtowe (one shown in the polling station) One person in Braintree (none shown in the polling station) All of the pilots allowed voters to show their identification in private (for example, because they were registered to vote anonymously or if they normally cover their face for religious reasons).

Electoral Commission staff who were observing across the pilot scheme areas saw that this arrangement was in place in almost all of the polling stations they visited. The arrangements in place varied between polling stations with some planning to use a separate room while others had a screen, curtain or purposely designed polling booth that voters could go behind. Almost all of the polling stations that Commission staff observed had at least one female member of staff who would be able to view ID of female voters in private. From our observations on polling day, we are only aware of this facility being used by a small number of electors in Derby and Pendle. We therefore cannot draw any firm conclusions about how this process would work in practice across Great Britain. However, if the requirement to show ID to vote is introduced, it is important that the needs of these electors are considered alongside the administrative implications for Returning Officers of providing appropriate facilities and staffing arrangements to allow voters to show their ID in private in polling stations. Turnout Year-on-year turnout comparisons are difficult owing to the local government electoral cycle. For example five of the pilots have not held local elections since 2015, when they were held in combination with a UK general election. This means we cannot usefully look at differences by pilot model. For the pilots with comparable figures, turnout was down by 2-6 percentage points compared to the 2018 elections. For Watford and Woking, both in the second year of piloting voter ID, turnout was lower than in their 2018 pilot and the previous elections in 2016. In two of the other pilots (Craven and Pendle) turnout was also down on 2018 and 2016. However, in Derby, while 2019 turnout was lower than in 2018 it was higher compared to 2016. Overall, across England, local election turnout in 2019 was around two percentage points lower compared to 2018. As in our evaluation of the 2018 pilots, it is not possible to draw a clear connection between the pilot scheme and any changes in turnout. Limited data is available and where it is available, the pattern is not consistent. We also know that turnout is volatile and dependent on a number of factors. Why people didn't vote and impact on the likelihood of voting As well as assessing the impact on those that tried to vote on 2 May, we have also looked for evidence of whether a voter ID requirement could deter electors from voting. We used our public opinion survey to ask non-voters why they did not vote. The main reasons given were in line with previous surveys (too busy - 30%, away on holiday - 9%, forgot - 6%). However, 1% of people who didn't vote in the pilots said it was because they didn't have the right ID and less than 1% said it was because they disagreed with the requirement. The limitations of sample-based surveying mean that we do not have enough responses from specific groups of people or within specific pilot models to be able to report experiences or views across those groups. This is because the samples are designed to provide data that is representative of areas as a whole. This means that for some demographic groups, that are small relative to the overall population, the number of people surveyed can be too few to analyse. We also asked respondents whether the requirement to show ID made them more or less likely to vote. Most people in the pilot scheme said it made no difference or made them more likely to vote (90%). However, a notable minority said it made them less likely to vote (3%), that they didn't have ID (1%) or that they didn't know (6%). Non-voters on 2 May were more likely than voters to say that they would be negatively affected or that they were unsure. Implications for accessibility and equality Our evaluation has also considered whether the identification requirements might have disproportionately affected particular groups of people. We asked 165 national and local organisations, including those representing people with protected characteristics under the Equality Act 2010, to provide us with evidence of how the pilots affected the specific groups they represent. A total of 29 organisations responded, with 16 providing more detailed feedback. None of the organisations that contacted us provided any direct evidence about people who were unable to vote in the pilot scheme because they couldn't show ID. However, almost all of them gave us more general views and raised concerns about the possible impact of an ID requirement for the people they represent. Building on our evaluation of the 2018 pilot scheme, these have increased our understanding about the specific challenges that some groups of people might face. Key themes from the responses were: Charities representing people with learning disabilities, the BAME, LGBT+, gypsy and traveller communities and people without a fixed address raised general concerns that some of the people they represent are already less likely to register and vote, and they are also less likely to have ID. Many of the responses highlighted existing difficulties their users face in accessing services requiring proof of identity, including barriers faced by people who don't have easy access to the internet. People without a fixed address would be less likely to have forms of non-photo ID such as utility bills. A transgender or non-binary person's ID may not reflect their gender expression or identity. People with learning disabilities would need accessible information to ensure they knew about an ID requirement and were able to access ID. The cost, inconvenience and time required to obtain ID may be prohibitive for some people.

Impact on potential voters: beyond the pilots

These findings raise questions about the effects of an ID requirement at future elections, where previous research suggests that the demographic profile of likely voters is different (e.g. local election voters tend to be, on average, older).

Impact on potential voters: beyond the pilots: accordions

Varying levels of awareness

Returning Officers in the pilot schemes ran public information campaigns before the elections and we know these raised overall levels of awareness; people knew more about the need to show ID by May 2019, compared with earlier in the year. In January 2019, 17% of people said they had seen or heard something about the requirement, increasing to 45% in May 2019. Our research did find variations in levels of awareness, however, particularly among those who did not vote. For example, 57% of voters told us they had heard something compared to 31% of non-voters. This pattern is then also reflected by demographic groups where one is more likely to have voted, for example: Those aged 55+ were more likely to have heard something – 54% compared to 31% of 18-34s. White respondents were more likely to have heard something than BAME respondents – 46% compared to 27%. These findings tell us something about the potential for a negative impact at other polls with higher turnout. If there were to be a disproportionate impact on particular groups of voters this could also have a negative impact on public confidence; we know that problems at elections can affect voters' and non-voters' overall perceptions of the poll. Of course, it is possible that groups reporting lower levels of awareness in relation to the 2 May elections, where they were less likely to vote, would have higher levels of awareness around an election in which they intended to vote, such as a UK general election. However, we cannot assume that would happen automatically. It is likely to depend, to some extent, on the nature of the public awareness activities used. These findings on awareness therefore emphasise the importance of ensuring that public awareness activities around any national rollout are genuinely effective across all communities and groups, particularly more infrequent voters. Year-on-year turnout comparisons are difficult owing to the local government electoral cycle. For example five of the pilots have not held local elections since 2015, when they were held in combination with a UK general election. This means we cannot usefully look at differences by pilot model.

Ease of showing ID

When we ask about how easy people think it would be to show ID, if it was required at future polls, we see similar results. Most people (91%) say that they would find it easy to show ID if they had to; however: Voters were more likely to say it would be easy (95%), compared to 88% for non-voters. Those aged below 34 were slightly less likely to say they would find it easy than their older counterparts (84% compared to 93% for 35-44s and 94% for those aged 55+). BAME respondents were less likely to say it would be easy compared to white electors (87% compared to 92%).

The process to challenge a sitting MP: review of the 2019 recall petitions |
Electoral Commission Search The process to challenge a sitting MP: review of the 2019 recall petitions You are in the Recall petitions section Home Recall petitions Recall petitions by numbers: Brecon and Radnorshire Recall petitions by numbers: Peterborough On this page Summary Our recommendations Signing the recall petitions Transparency and secrecy Running the recall petition Background First published: 10 October 2019 Last updated: 10 October 2019 Summary
There have been two petitions during 2019 to recall the MPs for the constituencies of Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire . Both Petition Officers (POs) delivered all their duties as required under the Recall Act 2015 and provided a high standard of service. There were no significant problems which affected people eligible to sign or wishing to campaign. Only one recall petition had been held before, in 2018 in the North Antrim constituency . The experiences of these three recall petitions have provided us with valuable evidence about how the existing petition rules work in practice, in different parts of the UK types of constituencies political contexts.
There are some areas where applying electoral rules to a process which is not an election has led to administrative challenges and issues with transparency and secrecy, and we have made recommendations for changes to the rules and processes for running future recall petitions. Our recommendations Recommendations for the UK Government The UK Government should now review the policy and legislation for recall petitions to identify changes that would improve the experience for electors and the administration of future petitions. The Government should: Identify the appropriate length for a reduced petition period of less than six weeks. This should start by considering whether a four-week period would be sufficient. Review the scope of who can observe the process in signing places to extend transparency and scrutiny, while ensuring that secrecy is maintained for people signing the petition. Review the recall petition regulations for Northern Ireland to ensure there is appropriate access to inspect the marked register if there are concerns about fraud at future recall petitions. Consider whether eligible electors should be given the chance to complete an equivalent to the signing sheet to indicate that they oppose the petition. Set out more clearly what time signing places should close on the final day of the petition period and the deadline for receipt of postal signing papers, and when and how the Speaker should be notified of the petition result. Keep the rules for donations and spending by campaigners under review as more experience is gained at future recall petitions, to ensure there is appropriate oversight and regulation of campaigner spending. Recommendations for Petition Officers and Returning Officers We also recommend that Petition Officers and Returning Officers should review their plans for running future recall petitions: Petition Officers for future recall petitions should ensure they offer some extended opening hours for people to sign the petition, beyond the minimum hours of 9am to 5pm. Returning Officers should review their contingency planning to include arrangements for delivering any recall petitions which could potentially take place in their constituencies, particularly to identify possible locations for signing places. Signing the recall petitions In both Peterborough and in Brecon and Radnorshire more than 10% of the people eligible to sign the recall petition had done so by the end of the six-week signing period. This meant that the sitting MPs would be recalled and a by-election would be held to fill the vacant seat in each constituency. Chart 1: Percentage of eligible people who signed the recall petitions in Brecon and Radnorshire and Peterborough Signing the recall petitions Length of the signing period Data provided by both Petition Officers (POs) shows that the majority of people who decided to sign the petitions did so early in the six-week signing period: In Peterborough 79% of all those who went to a signing place or returned a postal signing sheet (22% of all those eligible to sign) did so within the first two weeks of the signing period In Brecon and Radnorshire 70% of all those who went to a signing place or returned a postal signing sheet (14% of all those eligible to sign) did so within the first two weeks of the signing period

In both constituencies the number of people signing the petition each week began to reduce after the first two weeks of the signing period, and the threshold had been reached. However the full duration of the petition process had to take place before the outcome could be counted and announced. Chart 2: Proportion of eligible people who had signed the petitions during the signing period Postal signing sheets People could also choose to sign the petition by post. Many of the signatures recorded in both constituencies were from people who had completed and returned postal signing sheets to the PO. This included a significant proportion that were returned within the first two weeks of the signing period. Table 1: Number of postal signing sheets issued and returned Peterborough Brecon and Radnorshire Total number of postal signing sheets issued 13,395 (19% of all those eligible to sign the petition) 8,795 (17% of all those eligible to sign the petition) Number of postal signing sheets returned during first two weeks of signing period 6,914 (45% of all signing sheets recorded during first two weeks) 3,288 (46% of all signing sheets recorded during first two weeks) Total number of postal signing sheets returned by the end of the signing period 7,848 (41% of all signing sheets recorded during the signing period) 3,790 (37% of all signing sheets recorded during the signing period) Everyone who had previously applied to vote by post at UK Parliamentary elections in these constituencies was automatically sent a postal signing sheet at the beginning of the signing period. This meant that a significant proportion of people in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire received a postal signing sheet without having to make a new application to express their view by post. By contrast, in Northern Ireland postal voting is only available at elections to people who can provide a reason why they cannot be reasonably expected to go to their polling station. Only 4% of people eligible to sign in North Antrim were sent a postal signing sheet. We have not been made aware of any significant problems with the process for signing by post. Almost everyone in our public opinion survey in Peterborough who said they signed by post felt it was easy to do so, including over two-thirds who said it was very easy. Views on the length of the signing period Some people who were involved in the petitions felt that the signing periods were too long, and could possibly be shortened. Their feedback highlighted concerns that: Providing signing locations and staff for a six-week period was a significant public expense, and managing the petition was an additional burden on local authority resources and capacity. Public interest in the petition reduced significantly over the course of the six-week period. Some staff in signing places reported that they had been quiet during most days of the recall petition. Our research with the public in Peterborough found that more than two thirds (69%) of people felt that there was enough time during the signing period, while one in five (21%) felt the period was too long. People who didn't sign the petition were much less likely to say they felt the period was too long (9%, compared with 30% of those who did sign) and were slightly more likely to say the period was too short. Evidence from the recall petitions in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire suggests that there is scope to reduce the length of the signing period without significantly reducing access for those people who want to sign. We recommend that the UK Government should review the rules for recall petitions to identify the appropriate length for a reduced petition period of less than six weeks. This should start by considering whether a four-week period would be sufficient. Signing places and opening hours POs can designate up to 10 signing places for a recall petition, which must be open from 9am to 5pm on Monday to Friday, for a total of six weeks. POs can also choose to offer additional, extended opening hours. The decisions taken by the POs in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire on signing places and opening hours are set out in Table 2.

	Peterborough	Brecon and Radnorshire
Number of signing places	10	6
Extended opening hours	Opened at 7am on Tuesdays. Closed 10pm on Thursdays	Opened at 8am on Tuesdays. Closed 8pm on Wednesdays
Number of people signing during extended opening hours	1,410 (7% of the total)	483 (5% of the total)
Views on signing places and opening hours	The POs in both Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire said that the length of the signing period made it harder for them to find suitable venues for signing places which were available for the full six-week period. They also only had a relatively short timeframe, 10 working days, to do this. Both found that they were unable to use venues that had been tried and tested as polling stations at elections, because they had already been booked during the signing period. Data from POs about when people signed the petition (shown in Table 2 above) shows that a significant number of people took advantage of the extended opening hours offered by the PO to sign the petitions. We recommend that POs for future recall petitions should ensure they offer some extended opening hours beyond the minimum hours of 9am to 5pm.	The POs in both Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire said that the length of the signing period made it harder for them to find suitable venues for signing places which were available for the full six-week period. They also only had a relatively short timeframe, 10 working days, to do this. Both found that they were unable to use venues that had been tried and tested as polling stations at elections, because they had already been booked during the signing period. Data from POs about when people signed the petition (shown in Table 2 above) shows that a significant number of people took advantage of the extended opening hours offered by the PO to sign the petitions. We recommend that POs for future recall petitions should ensure they offer some extended opening hours beyond the minimum hours of 9am to 5pm.
On 10 May 2019 we received a copy of a letter sent to the PO from Glyn Mathias (a former Electoral Commissioner) and Sir Paul Silk (former parliamentary official) who were both eligible to sign the petition in Brecon and Radnorshire. The letter set out their concerns about the administration of the recall petition. These concerns primarily related to the number of signing places that had been allocated, the location of two of the signing places within council office buildings rather than being located in the centre of town, and the opening times of the signing places. We did not find any evidence to substantiate this claim. While the PO in Brecon and Radnorshire met the obligations to provide signing places under the Recall Act 2015, we suggest that for future recall petitions POs should consult with the Electoral Commission about the number of signing places and their suggested locations as part of their planning process. The PO and her staff suggested it would be useful for all Returning Officers as part of their contingency planning process to carry out a review of their arrangements to include planning for potential recall petitions which could take place in their local authority. This would mean they would be able to refer to their contingency planning documents if a recall petition was held. They suggested a useful starting point could be polling station reviews that occur every five years. We recommend that Returning Officers should review their contingency planning to include arrangements for delivering any recall petitions which could potentially take place in their constituencies, particularly to identify possible locations for signing places. If the overall length of the signing period is also reduced, this would also help POs to find suitable available venues to use as signing places for the full duration of the signing period. POs should make sure that there are enough to mean that there is a site close enough to be easily accessible for all electors. Our research in Peterborough asked what people thought about the signing places. Overall, as shown in Chart 3, around two-thirds of all people surveyed indicated they thought it was easy to get to their allocated signing place. A majority of those who said they had signed the petition in person also indicated that the building was appropriate for use as a signing place and that it was accessible.	Chart 3: Views on accessing signing places in Peterborough Transparency and secrecy

ensure that people who are entitled to sign a recall petition feel able to express their views freely, while also having confidence that petition processes are well-run and that any allegations of fraud can be investigated. Restrictions on transparency and secrecy are more significant for a recall petition, compared with an election, because it is obvious what position someone signing a petition is taking: they have made an active choice in favour of the proposal to recall the current MP. By contrast, polling station observation or inspection of the marked register after an election shows only that a ballot paper was issued to an individual elector, and does not indicate whether they cast a vote for a particular candidate or party. There are some areas of the petition process, discussed below, that could be clarified for POs, electors and the public more widely to ensure that the appropriate levels of secrecy and transparency are in place. The UK Government should review the law in these areas. The Government could also consider whether all eligible electors should be given the chance to complete an equivalent to the signing sheet to indicate they oppose it. This could reduce the risk of compromising secrecy for individuals, particularly if access to independent observation of the process in signing places were to be extended. Transparency and secrecy Observing the recall petition Unlike at elections, only Electoral Commission representatives can observe all parts of the recall petition signing process during the whole six-week period. For both petitions, Electoral Commission representatives observed the petition process in signing places (including days with extended opening hours), the daily process for verifying the number of signing papers completed that day, and the final count. Individuals who are accredited under the Electoral Commission's electoral observation scheme are only able to attend the final counting of signatures, while accredited organisations are not entitled to observe any stage of the process. No accredited individual observers attended the counts. Limiting observation in this way helps to ensure secrecy for those signing a recall petition, and also prevents others from estimating whether the 10% threshold has been reached before the end of the petition period. However, it does also mean that transparency and scrutiny of the signing process are limited. We recommend that the UK Government should review the scope of who can observe the process in signing places to extend transparency and scrutiny, while ensuring that secrecy is maintained for people signing the petition. Secrecy of the petition and access to the marked register The petition regulations provide some secrecy protections for people signing the petition. POs should take into account the need for privacy when allocating signing places in their constituency. During the petition period it is also an offence to publish a statement that could indicate if an individual has signed the petition or not, or to publish any forecasts about the result of the petition. After the conclusion of a recall petition in Great Britain, a marked copy of the electoral register (showing who had signed the petition) may be made available by the Electoral Registration Officer (ERO) for public inspection on request. The ERO is only required to make those documents available in response to a request for inspection if they are satisfied that fraud may have taken place at the petition. These secrecy measures are intended to limit the scope for undue influence and pressure on people to sign or not sign a petition, while maintaining protections against fraud. We are not aware of any complaints about the secrecy of the signing places, intimidation or fraudulent signing during either of the petitions. Our research in Peterborough found: only 6% of people who said that they had signed the petition in person indicated that there was not enough privacy inside the signing places 17% of people who said that they had signed the petition in person indicated that there was not enough privacy around the signing places almost two-thirds of people agreed that signing with a signature was sufficiently anonymous around half agreed that the process meant that they could sign in secret In Northern Ireland there is no provision in the legislation to allow the marked register to be inspected in cases of suspected fraud, or for the PO to supply it to the police, the Electoral Commission or anyone who requested it. We recommend that the UK Government should review the recall petition regulations for Northern Ireland to ensure there is appropriate access to inspect the marked register if there are well-founded concerns about fraud at future recall petitions. Running the recall petition In both constituencies the petitions were well-run. Most people in Peterborough said they were confident that the petition was well-run (87%), with almost all of those who actually signed the petition saying they were confident (96%). However, both POs faced practical challenges in running the petitions in their constituencies. These were increased, in the areas outlined below, by a lack of clarity in some areas of the legislation, POs having to take on new responsibilities and difficulties in POs having to use electoral management software to run a petition which is not the same as an election. POs were also faced with planning and delivering other electoral events which impacted on resourcing the petitions. Running the recall petition Closing the recall petition and announcing the result Under the Recall Act there is a requirement for the PO, or assigned member of staff, to verify the number of signing papers completed during each day of the petition period. However the Recall Act lacks clarity in relation to the final count and does not set out: what time signing places should close on the last day the deadline for receiving postal signing papers; or timings for the count (except that it should take place “as soon as reasonably practicable after the end of the signing period”). As a result, the POs in Peterborough and Brecon and Radnorshire took different decisions about the deadline for returning postal signing papers and started counting at different times, which were both different from the decision made by the PO in North Antrim. Table 3: Comparison of arrangements for closing the petition and count start times

Peterborough Brecon and Radnorshire North Antrim Signing places closed 5pm on Wednesday 1 May 5pm on Thursday 20 June 5pm on Wednesday 19 September Deadline for returning postal signing papers 5pm on Wednesday 1 May Midnight on Thursday 20 June Midnight on Wednesday 19 September Count started Straight after the signing places closed at 5pm 9am on Friday 21 June 0.01am on Thursday 20 September There is no evidence that these different approaches had an impact on the running of the count, and feedback from our representatives at the counts was that they worked well. However, to ensure a more consistent experience for those wishing to sign at future recall petitions, the legislation should specify what time signing places should close on the final day of the petition period and the deadline for receipt of postal signing papers. Once the signing papers have been counted, the PO must notify the Speaker of the House of Commons of the result before an announcement is made. However there is no provision in law as to how this should happen and in what form the notification should be made. The POs in all three constituencies agreed with the Speaker in advance that they would send an email, and once this was acknowledged they could then publish the result. We recommend that the UK Government should review the recall petition legislation to set out more clearly when and how the Speaker should be notified. Registering campaigners At elections and referendums, the Electoral Commission is responsible for registering political parties and non-party campaigners wishing to spend over a certain amount. At recall petitions, uniquely, the registration of campaigners is undertaken by POs. People or organisations wishing to campaign for or against the recall petition, and intending to spend over £500, must notify the PO that they want to be a registered campaigner. POs must also receive donation and spending returns from registered campaigners within 30 days of the end of the regulated period of the recall petition. A total of eight people and organisations registered to campaign during the petitions. They submitted donation and spending returns to the POs after the petitions. At time of publication reported donations and spending had not been received for one individual and one trade union in Peterborough. Table 4: Registered campaigners and value of reported donations and spending Peterborough Brecon and Radnorshire Registered campaigners Two political parties, two Trades Unions and one individual Three political parties Spending £6,988.79 £13,365.87 Donations £3,212.11 £10,324.50 These spending returns are made available for public inspection by the PO and copies sent to us, but there is no provision for returns to be scrutinised by a statutory agency. This differs from the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act (PPERA) rules for elections and referendums, where it is required for the Commission to receive spending returns from political parties and campaigners so we can check that these comply with the law. However, the Recall Act appears to have been based on the Representation of the People Act (RPA) requirements for candidates at UKPGE who are required to send their spending returns to the RO and not directly to us. The lack of statutory scrutiny of donation and spending returns means that there could be significant spending on activity intended to influence electors at future recall petitions that is not fully monitored to check that campaigners have complied with the law. We recommend that the UK Government should keep the rules for donations and spending by campaigners under review as more experience is gained at future recall petitions, to ensure there is appropriate oversight and regulation of campaigner spending. Other challenges to running the recall petitions The use of electoral management software (EMS) is an established part of running electoral events. Using it for a recall petition, which despite having many of the same processes is not an election, was not straightforward for POs and their staff. The EMS systems used by the POs did not provide templates for recall petition paperwork, and were not able to run two events with different timetables in parallel. This was more challenging as both signing periods overlapped with other electoral events – the 2 May local government election in Peterborough and the European Parliamentary election in Brecon and Radnorshire held on 23 May. Although recall petitions may not frequently overlap with other electoral events in future, it would assist POs if EMS providers were able to develop their systems to manage multiple events on different timetables and to produce templates for use in recall petitions. Background Why did the petitions take place? The Recall of MPs Act 2015 introduced a process where a sitting MP can lose their seat in the House of Commons if there is a successful petition to recall them. All those in the relevant constituency who are eligible to vote at a UK Parliamentary election can sign. They can choose to do so in person, by post or by appointing a proxy. Over 10% must do so for the MP to be recalled. The Commission is required to publish a report, following the petition. This process was first used in 2018, when a petition in North Antrim to recall Ian Paisley MP was unsuccessful. We published our report on the North Antrim petition in November 2018. There have been two more recall petitions in 2019. The first was in Peterborough following Fiona Onasanya MP's conviction on 19 December 2018 on charges of perverting the course of justice. On 29 January 2019, Ms Onasanya was sentenced to three months in prison. Her appeal against the conviction was rejected by the Court of Appeal on 5 March, and the Speaker of the House of Commons gave notice to the Returning Officer in Peterborough that a recall petition was to take place. The petition took place between 19 March and 1 May. The second was in

Brecon and Radnorshire. This was a result of Chris Davies MP's conviction on 23 April 2019 of having made a false expenses claim relating to setting up his constituency office after the 2015 UK Parliamentary General Election. On 24 April, the Speaker of the House of Commons notified the Returning Officer in Powys that a recall petition was to take place. The petition took place between 9 May and 20 June. Roles and responsibilities The constituency's Returning Officer, acting in the role of Petition Officer, is responsible for opening and running a recall petition. Their role includes setting the opening date of the petition, which must be no later than 10 days, or as soon as reasonably practical, after the notification from the Speaker of the House of Commons. They must also publish a register of people eligible to sign the petition and notify them that the petition is taking place. A total of 69,673 people in Peterborough and 53,032 in Brecon and Radnorshire were able to sign the petition. People were notified by letter why the petition was taking place, what the outcome would be, how they could sign and information about their allocated signing place. In Peterborough, our public opinion survey found that almost three quarters of people could remember receiving a letter telling them that a recall petition was going to take place. During a recall petition, local police forces have a role investigating any breaches of the rules set out in the Recall Act and to enforce compliance with the law. The Commission provides advice and guidance to help people to understand the rules. We can also seek forfeiture of impermissible donations, if necessary, by court order. Feedback from people in Peterborough Due to its proximity to the May 2019 local elections, we were able to extend our post-election public opinion research to cover the recall petition in Peterborough. This allowed us to increase our understanding of people's awareness and perceptions of the Peterborough recall petition. Research agency BMG conducted 159 telephone interviews between 3 and 23 May 2019, with a sample of people who would be eligible to vote at a UK Parliamentary general election in Peterborough. Quotas were set on age and gender to ensure that the respondents were as representative as possible of the population of the area. Data are weighted to correct any demographic differences between the interviewed sample and known population profile from the census population data. Looking ahead to 2020/21 and using our resources to support the delivery of our goals | Electoral Commission Search Looking ahead to 2020/21 and using our resources to support the delivery of our goals You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2019/20 On this page Looking ahead to 2020/21 Using our resources to support the delivery of our goals Our environmental impact Using our financial resources efficiently First published: 30 June 2020 Last updated: 17 August 2020 Looking ahead to 2020/21 One of our challenges for the year ahead is to ensure local authorities can continue delivering well-run elections. We supported the UK Government's decision to postpone the polls scheduled for May 2020, due to the Covid-19 pandemic. There are significant challenges to delivering the combination of polls now scheduled for May 2021. We are working with the UK's governments and supporting local authorities, to ensure they can deliver the polls successfully, safely and in line with relevant guidelines. There is already pressure on local authority resources because of outdated and complex legislation. There are more than 50 Acts and 170 Statutory Instruments relating to the delivery of elections. This leads to real costs, consequences and risks for voters, candidates and campaigners, regulators and governments. Proposals from the UK's Law Commissions provide a well-researched basis for further work. In 2020-21, we will continue calling on the UK's governments and parliaments to take these forward. While annual canvass reforms in Great Britain are welcome, governments need to do more to modernise the registration system. The existence of more than 370 separate registers that do not communicate with each other leaves the system vulnerable, while voters being unable to check online whether they are already registered leads to duplicate applications before every election. In the coming year, we will continue to encourage the UK's governments to commit to making registration more automated and connected to address these challenges. The nature of political campaigning continues to change, with parties spending a greater portion of their advertising budgets on digital advertising. In response to these changes, we need the right powers and tools to continue regulating political finance effectively. In 2020-21, we will work with all concerned to encourage compliance and we will run a new campaign to help voters understand digital campaigning rules. We welcome the Committee for Standards in Public Life (CSPL) review of electoral regulation in the UK. The nature of political campaigning has significantly changed, as has the public's expectations since the UK Parliament wrote the rules 20 years ago. We will be ready to provide CSPL and others with information and advice to help deliver outcomes and recommendations that best enable people to continue recognising the UK as a leading and robust democracy. Whilst acknowledging the likely continuing impact of the Covid-19 pandemic, our 2020-21 work programme includes: continuing with our transition towards providing our guidance in a new modern, more accessible format working with partners on improving the accessibility of elections so that everyone has equal access to election information and processes supporting the UK's governments' annual canvass reforms supporting the 2021 canvass in Northern Ireland developing a strategy to support increased resilience in the delivery of electoral services at a local level publishing new performance standards for EROs engaging with the Scottish and Welsh governments' policy and legislative agendas for changes to the franchise for their elections reviewing our compliance with our Welsh language obligations, to a standard the Welsh Language Commissioner is satisfied with completing a review of political parties' and campaigners' registered descriptions to make sure only those meeting the legal tests are included delivering a new political finance online system to support parties and campaigners to deliver their financial

We value the positive and constructive relationship we have with colleagues and work hard to maintain it. Our staff engagement group meets on a regular basis to seek input from colleagues on emerging issues and help to maintain good relations with staff. We also actively encourage staff involvement as part of the day-to-day process of line management, and we share information on current and prospective developments widely and regularly. To support this, we have a recognition agreement with the Public and Commercial Services Union. We completed our latest staff survey in March 2020 and 86% of employees responded. Our employee engagement score was 72% (up from 65% in 2018-19). Our scores compared most positively to the Civil Service benchmark in areas such as our people agreeing that: we took action after the previous survey they feel a strong personal attachment to our organisation and its work they would recommend the Electoral Commission as a place to work The areas where we compared least positively to the Civil Service benchmark and we need to improve on include people agreeing that: there are opportunities for them to progress in their careers at the Electoral Commission they have the IT systems and equipment they need to do their jobs effectively we are committed to creating a diverse and inclusive workplace Equal opportunities and diversity We are committed to the principle of equality of opportunity and the value of diversity. Our single equality scheme sets out our duties and commitments across the whole of the UK and includes an action plan that we update annually. The scheme reflects the public sector equality duty, which prohibits discrimination on the grounds of age, disability, gender reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, pregnancy and maternity, race, religion or belief, sex and sexual orientation. We have designed our scheme to ensure: that everyone who is eligible is able to participate in the democratic process, by identifying barriers, making recommendations and working with others to remove them that we embed equality and diversity in all our work, treat all customers fairly and with respect, and are transparent in the decisions we make equality of opportunity for everyone and that all staff are treated fairly and with respect We completed equality impact assessments on relevant policies and procedures throughout 2019-20. The equality impact assessments support a commitment to evidence-based policy making. In addition to arrangements for consultation and monitoring, the assessment process helps to develop effective policies that meet the needs of people in respect to any protected characteristics. Our staff group on equality, diversity and inclusion met regularly and supported our activities in these areas. Our latest staff survey includes questions about equality, diversity and inclusion. Results showed that an area of concern for our staff is that our organisation does not reflect the diversity of the people we serve, and they do not think we are doing enough to show our commitment to creating a diverse and inclusive workplace. We will start to address these concerns as we embed a new people strategy in 2020, which includes work to review and improve our recruitment and selection procedures. Occupational health and safety We review our health and safety policy annually. We also have procedures, guidance and risk assessments in place to cover our core activities. A health and safety group oversees our arrangements. They meet regularly and report to our senior leadership group. However, primary responsibility for health and safety sits with people managers. We initiate independent health and safety audits of our premises each year, which involves inspecting working environments and reviewing safety management systems. These audits tell us if our arrangements are suitable and highlight any improvements we need to make. Findings from audits completed in 2019-20 were generally satisfactory and arrangements were compliant with legislation and best practice. Our environmental impact Our environmental impact We recognise that delivering our activities has an impact on the environment and we continue to work towards minimising this impact. The following information summarises our use of energy and water, and the production and disposal of waste material. We lease office space in four cities from a combination of public and private sector property owners. We do not have direct control of utility supplier and waste disposal targets and management at our premises. For a number of our offices, the property owner manages energy and water consumption as well as waste disposal and recovers costs through a consolidated service charge. This report includes consumption and waste disposal data from the London office only, which is our largest property and the base for the majority of our staff. Offices in Edinburgh, Cardiff and Belfast have relocated to smaller, more environmentally efficient premises in the last 10 years. The lease on our London office ends in 2020. After reviewing our accommodation options, we have decided to renew the lease. Other initiatives are in place, in order to help minimise environmental impact. Since 2011-12, we have: reduced printed resources provided to electoral administrators and other groups, focusing on electronic provision wherever possible encouraged the use of video and teleconferencing to avoid unnecessary travel with consequential CO₂ emissions operated recycling facilities in all our offices upgraded to more energy efficient information communication technology equipment Summary (London office) Area: greenhouse gas emissions 2019-20 Actual 1 2019-20 Target * 2018-19 2017-18 CO₂e in tonnes Not available 211 187 235 Area: estate energy 2019-20 Actual 1 2019-20 Target * 2018-19 2017-18 Consumption (kWh) Not available 661,061 639,526 682,595 Expenditure Not available Not available Not available Not available Area: estate waste 2019-20 Actual 1 2019-20 Target * 2018-19 2017-18 Amount (tonnes) Not available 9.84 10.00 9.67 Expenditure Not available £1,111 £1,227 £994 Area: estate water 2019-20 Actual 1 2019-20 Target * 2018-19 2017-18 Consumption Not available 795 m³ 742 m³ 847 m³ Expenditure Not available Not available Not available Not available *The annual target shown is calculated as an average of the previous two years. efficiently Using our financial resources efficiently In 2019-20, the resource initially made available to us by the UK Parliament was £19.4m for voted activity. We received non-voted funding of £200k to pay Commissioners' fees. In January 2020, £2.8m was added to our resource to fund expenditure on the 2019 UK Parliamentary general election, and our Annually Managed Expenditure (AME) budget was increased by £285k to manage the risk of variations in legal provision. This augmented our net cash requirements by £3m. In achieving our objectives, we have used £20.0m worth of resources for the whole year. This was out of the available sum of £22.2m approved by the UK Parliament in our Supplementary Estimate (HC 64) for the net resource requirement. The graphic below summarises our financial performance on the 'voted' element of our budget. Financial performance 2019-20 Our financial performance follows our strategic performance, being dominated by a shifting electoral timetable.

For the year 2019-20: our staff costs represent 47% of our expenditure, which is the same as 2018-19 our operating costs rose from 28% to 36% of our allocated budget due to additional public awareness work for the European Parliamentary elections and the UK Parliamentary general election we saw a similar spend for EU referendum operating costs, which represent the costs of litigation defended net of costs received during the year our capital expenditure had a slight increase from 4.3% to 4.5% We report our underspend on the Treasury's usual measure ("R-DEL excluding depreciation") as this reflects in-year operational decisions. In 2019-20 this was £1.5m against the voted budget of £20.3m (7.4%). This was predominantly due to unused contingency and other savings in delivering the unscheduled UK Parliamentary general election. The cancellation, in March 2020 of the May 2020 polls, by the UK Government also caused the deferral of significant costs into 2020-21, increasing the underspend in this year. Excluding these exceptional factors, the underspend was £0.369m (1.8%), meeting our corporate objective. However due to these exceptional factors we have chosen to report that objective as unmet within our performance report. The underspend is comprised of: £599k underspend on the UK Parliamentary general election £589k in reduced campaign spending due to the cancellation of the May 2020 elections £96k in reduced staffing costs £76k of unexpected income from the Senedd and Scottish

Parliament. £103k as a combination of smaller underspends £33k of unclaimed policy development grant Other £235k in depreciation due to reduced capital spend £415k in provisions due to lower than expected legal costs £111k in capital projects The £21k underspend against non-voted funding is due to lower than expected costs for Commissioners. Our income in our accounts relates to charges for registering political parties and work completed for the Senedd and Scottish Parliament. We collect fines raised against political parties and individuals for failure to comply with the rules on party and election finance and then surrender these to the Consolidated Fund as required by law. The penalties due was £232,980 in 2019-20 received by 31 March 2020 and surrendered to the Consolidated Fund. In addition to monitoring performance against budgets, we also managed within our cash limits set by Parliament. We required cash amounting to £20.2m in 2019-20 to finance our voted activities, which was £1.5m less than the sum of £21.7m approved by the UK Parliament in our Supplementary Estimate. The reconciliation of net resources outturn to net cash requirement provides a reconciliation from our outturn to the net cash we required in-year. The Statement of Cash Flows shows that the cash balance as at 31 March 2020 was £197k. The Statement of Financial Position as at 31 March 2019 shows negative taxpayers' equity of £0.4m due to outstanding invoices accrued for. Supplier payments Although we are independent of government, we aim to comply with the Prompt Payment Code that operates across the public sector. The target is to pay undisputed invoices within 30 days. In 2019-20, we paid 81.6% of invoices (99.9% in 2018-19) within 30 days. The reduction was due to a required change in process for purchase orders, which is now in place meaning we anticipate performance now increasing again. Freedom of Information, complaints and parliamentary questions We are committed to the principles of openness and transparency in public life and acknowledge the duty to provide information to the public. In 2019-20, we received 287 Freedom of Information (FOI) requests, a significant increase on the 224 we received in the previous year. We responded to 59.4% of these within the 20 working days statutory timeframe (against a target of 90%) due to an increased number of large and complex requests during the electoral events. The proportion of large, complex and repeated requests has also increased compared to previous years. We responded to 13 FOI internal review requests, 4.5% of the total requests answered. The Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) notified us of six complaints, one related to a subject access request and five related to FOI requests; this is less than 2% of the total FOI requests answered in 2019-20. We received 20 subject access requests, compared to five in 2018-19. We responded to all of these promptly. We received one complaint and this is pending closure from the ICO. We also received six requests for erasure under the General Data Protection Regulation/Data Protection Act 2018. The holding of the European Parliamentary elections and UK Parliamentary general election contributed to most of the increase in the volume of requests we received in 2019-20. We handled 51 complaints, compared to 37 in 2018-19. We upheld three complaints and partially upheld a further three. These complaints were mainly due to administrative errors and delays in responding to queries. We received 11 requests for review. While none of these reviews changed the original outcome of the complaint, they did enable further explanation and assistance. The Parliamentary Ombudsman is considering one complaint and we are awaiting the outcome of that. In addition, we received correspondence from 709 members of the public complaining about difficulties in being able to vote due to the Brexit-related short lead in notice to the European Parliamentary elections. We responded to 49 parliamentary questions during 2019-20, including questions about digital campaigning, electoral fraud, the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers and the effectiveness of electoral law. Bridget Phillipson MP, a member of the Speaker's Committee, was our spokesperson in the UK Parliament and answered questions on our behalf. Supply estimate for 2020-21 Our supply estimate for 2020-21 (HC303) provides for a net resource requirement of £21.9m. The Speaker's Committee approved this on 29 April 2020. There is no reason to believe that future approvals will not be forthcoming. We plan to use these resources to continue delivering our four goals around the delivery of elections, the regulation of political finance, the use of our expertise to improve democratic processes and the best use of our resources.

This report looks specifically at the administration of the elections to the National Assembly for Wales. These elections were combined with the Police and Crime Commissioner elections in Wales, and in Ogmore a UK Parliamentary by-election was held on the same day. Whilst there were some issues, which the report will look at in greater detail, overall, our assessment is that the National Assembly for Wales' elections were well-run with few problems. Voters were generally satisfied with the process of voter registration and of voting whether in person at a polling station or by post or proxy. Registration and turnout A total of 2.246 million people were registered to vote in the National Assembly for Wales elections on 5 May 2016. This was fewer than in 2011 and fractionally lower than in 2007. Over 1.02 million voted in the elections. Overall turnout at the elections was 45.6% in the constituency election and 45.4% in the regional election. The highest turnout was 56.8% in Cardiff North and the lowest 34.6% in Alyn and Deeside. This is the second highest recorded turnout at elections to the National Assembly for Wales. By comparison, turnout at the Scottish Parliamentary election was 55.6% and at the election to the Northern Ireland Assembly was 54.9%. Section 2.13 shows turnout for all the polls held on 5 May. In total, 17.6% of the electorate had a postal vote for this election. This compares to 17.0% in 2011, 12.2% in 2007 and 6.9% in 2003. 73.9% of postal votes in the constituency election and 73.8% of postal votes in the regional election were returned. Postal votes accounted for 27.6% of votes cast in the constituency election and 27.5% of votes in the regional election. The administration of the poll The National Assembly elections in Wales were held over 40 constituencies, which mirror UK Parliamentary constituencies, and five electoral regions, those being: North Wales Mid and West Wales South Wales West South Wales Central South Wales East The voter experience Our public opinion research suggests that most voters believed the elections were well-run and were satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting. There remains a low level of awareness on how the registration process works however. Most notably, more than one in three (35%) people believe you are automatically registered if you are of voting age and almost one in three (27%) say you can register to vote until the day before the election. In terms of the election itself, the majority of respondents said that they knew a great or a fair amount about these elections with 81% agreeing that they had enough information on how to cast their vote. Political parties and candidates Table 1: Candidates and parties that took part in the 2016 elections as compared to 2011 2011 2016 Constituency candidates 176 248 Political Parties on regional lists 13 17 Independent candidates on regional lists 1 2 From the numbers of candidates and regional lists nominated by political parties, the following trends are apparent: Once again, the Welsh Labour Party, Welsh Conservative and Unionist Party, Plaid Cymru, and the Welsh Liberal Democrats, nominated candidates in all 40 Assembly constituencies and all five electoral regions. The UK Independence Party (UKIP) stood candidates in 38 of the 40 constituencies, and in all five regions, compared to 2011 where they did not nominate any constituency candidates. The Welsh Green Party, Abolish the Welsh Assembly Party, and Freedom to Choose, nominated candidates in constituency and/or regional elections, but not in every constituency or region. A total of 12 parties nominated constituency candidates, and 17 parties contested regional seats. In addition, eight constituencies and two regions were contested by independent candidates. Our post-election survey of candidates suggests that the majority of candidates agreed that it was easy to find out what to do to become a candidate, and nearly half agreed that the rules on spending and donations are clear. Recommendations: Legislation Recommendation 1: Timely and accurate legislation in Welsh and English To ensure greater accuracy, we recommend that a wider discussion is had on the most effective way to check draft regulations for elections in Wales before they are laid leading to establishing a user group to consider any Welsh language regulations during the drafting period. The group should include, but not be limited to, Electoral Commission staff, and representatives of the Wales electoral community. We would also re-emphasise that all legislation relating to electoral events, including funding legislation is clear (either by Royal Assent to primary legislation, or by laying secondary legislation for approval by the Assembly / Parliament) at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with— this would include accurate and timely prescribed forms in both English and Welsh. Any delay to the publication of Welsh language forms puts elections teams and voters in Wales at a significant disadvantage and can pose a risk to the relevant election. Recommendations: Wales Delivery Group Recommendation 2: Wales Delivery Group A permanent Wales Delivery Group should continue to meet in order to further improve and streamline planning for future electoral events, and to provide opportunities for discussing key areas of common concern. The Commission will draft terms of reference and seek views from all key partners, with this work beginning by the end of 2016. Recommendation 3: Colour of the ballot paper For future elections the Wales Delivery Group should consider the colour of the ballot papers to be used for each election and issue an appropriate recommendation, thus providing ROs and their staff with clarity from an early stage. Recommendation 4: Regional and cross-authority working Working on a regional level represents a significant challenge for Regional Returning Officers, Constituency Returning Officers and electoral administrators and it is important that there are strong communication networks and systems in place to facilitate the planning process. For future regional elections we will facilitate discussion, through the Wales Delivery Group, on how Returning Officers and electoral administrators could work on a cross-authority basis to improve decision making and operational effectiveness. Recommendations: Candidacy Recommendation 5: Commencement of candidacy The relevant Government should ensure that the date of publication of notice of election should fall on the same day as the dissolution of the Assembly, to avoid a period of time where spending is not regulated. Recommendations: Campaign costs Recommendation 6: Costs relating to an individual's disability and translation from Welsh to English and vice versa Governments with legislative competence over elections within the UK should amend the definitions of political party and candidate spending so that reasonable expenses that can be attributed to an individual's disability are exempt, (as was recently set out in the revised Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 rules for non-party campaigners). As the PPERA non-party campaigner rules now exempt the costs associated with translating Welsh to and vice versa, we recommend that equivalent legal provisions should be introduced by the relevant Government/s into the election rules covering campaign spending by political parties and candidates. Recommendations: Party registration Recommendation 7: Registration of party names and descriptions for use on ballot papers We continue to recommend that where a candidate represents a political party on a ballot paper, it should be clear to voters which party the candidate represents. The legal provisions for registration of party descriptions present risks of confusion for voters and restrict the participation of political parties. The Welsh Government and other Governments of the UK should work with the Electoral Commission to reform the provisions on party descriptions. Recommendations: Candidate spending Recommendation 8: Transparency and accessibility of candidate spending To improve transparency and accessibility of candidate spending returns, we have previously recommended that Returning Officers should be required to publish spending returns online as well as through the existing methods of public inspection. We support recommendation 12-5 of the Law Commissions' review 12 of Electoral Law which proposes a method for implementing this change through legislation.¹ Recommendations: The Commission's powers Recommendation 9: Extending investigative and sanctioning powers We continue to recommend extending our investigative and sanctioning powers at major elections for offences relating to candidate spending and donations, including at National Assembly for Wales elections. It will be important for Governments and Parliaments across the UK to work together on introducing the Commission's new powers for different sets of elections. Recommendations: Social media Recommendation 10: Reporting use of social media at future elections We will give further consideration to how campaigners should report spend on social media at future elections. As spend in this area grows, there is the potential for less transparency if expenditure on social media is not easily identifiable within the spending returns, because social media is not a specific reporting category. This will need to be considered as part of reviewing all of the expenditure reporting categories to ensure that they remain proportionate and relevant to future trends in campaigning. In case any of these changes would need to be implemented through legislation, we recommend that the UK Government and Welsh Government and legislatures should consider the timing needed for implementing changes before the next major elections.² Recommendations: Electoral registration Recommendation 11: Providing an online registration status check Providing a way for electors to check their registration status at the beginning of the online registration application process would reduce the action required by voters to keep their register entry up to date, and would also reduce the impact on EROs of processing duplicate applications. The UK Government should develop an online service to allow people to check whether they are already correctly registered to vote before they complete a new application to register. Any such service would need to carefully manage and protect voters' personal information. Download our full report 2016 National Assembly for Wales election report 1. Declarations of interest There were no new declarations of interest. Minutes of the previous Board Meeting (EC 1/21) Resolved: That the minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 2 December 2020 be approved. Update on elections (Oral) The Board received an oral update from the Chief Executive, Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance, Director, Communications, Policy and Research and Director, Regulation. It was noted that work had continued relating to legislation from the three governments and in supporting electoral administrators with preparing for the polls. The Board noted that a management information survey was carried out to collect a range of information and data on how polls are being organised locally. The Commission does this every year and the survey has been expanded this year to cover some of the impacts of the coronavirus pandemic on planning. This will help us to understand how things are progressing in each local area and to build up a more complete picture of the arrangements that are being put in place and of the challenges and issues that are being reported. We have engaged with software and print suppliers through the Cabinet Office's suppliers group. For print suppliers in particular, the number of polls and complexity of combination are the main source of their challenges, increased by the ongoing impacts of the pandemic and the potential impacts on staff availability and production space and capacity. There had also been discussion about the costs and practical challenges of developing capacity to enable them to respond to an increase in levels of postal voters arising close to the polls. We continue to engage with Royal Mail on their preparations for the polls, and they have confirmed that election mail will be treated as a priority. The Director, Communications, Policy and Research provided an update on research with voters which continued to indicate a clear desire among many for polling station voting, while also capturing a likely increase in the desire to vote by post. There had been ongoing public awareness and information activity, which continues according to plans, with additional activity scheduled to support voter engagement in the polls under Covid-safe conditions. The Director, Regulation updated Commissioners on the use of monitoring data and other sources of intelligence gathering that would guide campaigners to stay within the law. She updated also on an ongoing survey to understand the impact of Covid restrictions on campaign plans for the elections. The Board raised the issue of concerns around the security of postal votes. It was noted that guidance on security seals exists and awareness of the safeguards that are in place would be raised. Resolved: That the oral update be noted. Business planning 2021/22 (EC 2/21) The Board received the report, noting a draft outline closely based on previous business plans for the final draft. The Board discussed areas of the plan that needed to be more robust, looking at how we positioned ourselves outwardly and how we measured productivity during the pandemic. The Board noted that a fully developed draft would be brought to the February Board meeting. Resolved: That the proposed approach be approved. Update on Board Effectiveness review: proposed action plan (EC 3/21) The Board received the report on the proposed action plan for the Board, Audit Committee and Remuneration and Human Resources Committee following a review carried out by Advance Boardroom Excellence (ABE). The Board noted the administratively focussed nature of the consultant recommendations as opposed to focussing on a more strategic approach. The Board discussed the wider scope of the skills matrix in that it should reflect more broadly on succession planning for new Commissioners to include younger age ranges, experience of information technology and diversity. The Board thanked Commissioners Joan Walley and Sarah Chambers as well as the Head of Projects for working on this plan. Action: That the Executive Team should do some preparatory work with Commissioners on the thematic findings in the report to provide a basis for discussion with the new Chair. Resolved: That the actions and timescales outlined in the Board effectiveness action plan be agreed. Resolved: That the Executive Team should do some preparatory work with Commissioners on the thematic findings in the report to provide a basis for discussion with the new Chair.

Resolved: That the rejection of specific recommendations as detailed in the Board effectiveness action plan be approved. Resolved: That the Audit Committee would now be titled the Audit and Risk Committee. Developing the effectiveness of the Commission Board (EC 4/21) The Board received the report noting the potential governance changes to develop Commissioner non-executive contribution to the oversight and support of the Commission's work. The Board discussed more linked up working with external stakeholders across the regions of England in particular for better understanding on key issues, along with working collaboratively with the Executive Team. It was noted that this was helpful thinking for the future and planning such work on future agendas. Resolved: That the report be noted. Resolved: That an item be added to the Board effectiveness review action plan for consideration later in 2021 by the new Chair of the Commission with the Board. Resolved: That pending the arrival of a new Chair of the Commission, the Board nominate a lead Commissioner contact for each of the Directors in the intervening period. Casework and the Committee on Standards in Public Life (Oral) The Board received a presentation from the Director, Regulation and Head of Monitoring and Enforcement on the following key headlines: RoadTrip2015 BeLeave The Committee on Standards in Public Life (CSPL) – Conservative and Unionist Party submission The Board welcomed the presentation and noted the insight it gave to how learning was incorporated into the Commission's regulatory approach. Resolved: That the presentation be noted.

Horizon scanning (EC 5/21) The Board received a report on work developed in the last year, with the aim of giving the Commission additional intelligence on how emerging trends and developments might challenge current policy and practice in relation to elections. The Board welcomed the progress on this area of work, and that this will enable input into the Board's forward looking strategic planning and risk management. It asked that social, economic, and attitudinal developments be given appropriate weight in the further development of the approach. Resolved: That the report be noted.

Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (RemCo) (EC 6/21) The RemCo Chair gave a brief update of the last Committee meeting on 2 December 2020, covering the following: Feedback from staff session People strategy Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) work Pay benchmarking exercise Resolved: That the Committee Chair approved minutes of the Committee meeting held on 2 December 2020 and oral update be noted.

Audit Committee (EC 7/21) The Audit Committee Chair had no further updates since the last update received at Board on 2 December 2020. Resolved: That the Committee Chair approved minutes of the Committee meeting held on 1 December 2020 be noted.

Chief Executive's update (EC 8/21) The Chief Executive introduced the report, drawing attention to the Bullying and Harassment report released in December 2020, the impact of the coronavirus pandemic on the work of the Commission, and Commissioner recruitment. The Board thanked the Chief Executive and teams for a comprehensive update. Resolved: That the report be noted.

Commission Board action tracker (EC 9/21) Action: Deep dive financial risk item to stay open until a date has been allocated and the Forward plan of Board business updated to reflect this. Resolved: That the Commission Board action tracker with the above caveat be noted.

Forward plan of Board business (EC 10/21) Commissioners asked that a discussion of means of ensuring that the Board had contact with sections of the electorate which were not reflected in its composition should be scheduled for later in the year.

Action: A discussion of means of ensuring that the Board had contact with sections of the electorate which were not reflected in its composition be included onto the Forward plan of Board business. Resolved: That the Forward plan of Board business be noted.

Report: How the May 2014 elections were run | Electoral Commission Search Report: How the May 2014 elections were run You are in the European Parliamentary elections section Home European Parliamentary elections On this page About this report and our role About the elections The Commission's role in encouraging voter registration Key facts and figures Download our full report First published: 20 June 2019 Last updated: 30 July 2019 About this report This report provides our assessment of how well the May 2014 European Parliamentary elections and the local government elections in England and Northern Ireland, were run. Our analysis reflects the experience of voters, based on public opinion research; electoral data; and feedback provided by Regional and Local Returning Officers and candidates and agents. It provides a forward look to future elections, highlighting the issues which the Commission considers need to be addressed to make sure that the interests of voters continue to be put first at future elections. About the elections On 22 May 2014 elections were held for the United Kingdom's 72 members of the European Parliament, for local councillors in approximately one third of local authority areas and for the 11 new councils in Northern Ireland. There were also elections for directly-elected Mayors in five local authorities (Hackney, Lewisham, Newham, Tower Hamlets, and Watford), one local referendum on proposals to introduce a directly elected mayoral system in Copeland (Cumbria) and neighbourhood planning referendums in Much Wenlock (Shropshire), Woburn Sands (Milton Keynes), and Strumpshaw (Norfolk). The voting system, number of candidates and parties standing and the number of seats contested at the elections on 22 May Election Voting system Number of candidates/parties Number of seats contested European Parliamentary elections – Great Britain Closed-list proportional representation 31 parties 70 European Parliamentary elections – Northern Ireland Single transferable vote 10 parties 3 Local government elections - England 'First-past-the-post' majoritarian c. 17,000 c. 2,400 Local government elections – Northern Ireland Single transferable vote 905 464 Mayoral elections Supplementary vote preferential 34 5 Neighbourhood planning referendum Majoritarian n/a n/a The highest number of parties standing in the European election was 17 in London. Roles and responsibilities for managing and delivering the elections For the European Parliamentary elections, a Regional Returning Officer (RRO) is appointed for each of the European electoral regions. The Deputy Prime Minister, as Lord President of the Council, was responsible in law for appointing RROs for each of the 11 electoral regions in Great Britain, while in Northern Ireland the Chief Electoral Officer (CEO) fulfils the responsibility of Returning Officer at all elections, including RRO for the European Parliamentary elections. RROs have overall responsibility for the conduct of the European Parliamentary election within their electoral region. The running of the European Parliamentary election at a local level in Great Britain is the responsibility of Local Returning Officers (LROs). RROs can direct LROs to undertake certain functions and LROs have a duty to comply with such directions Where the polls for more than one election are combined the Returning Officer responsible for running the local government election will take on the majority of the functions of the LRO at the European Parliamentary election At local council elections in Northern Ireland each council has its own Deputy Returning Officer (DRO). Normally this is the Chief Executive but on this occasion a DRO was appointed prior to the elections for each of the 11 new council areas. The Commission sets, monitors and reports on performance standards for ROs in Great Britain. Building on the lessons we have learned from monitoring the performance of ROs over the last five years and taking account of the feedback we have received, we published a new performance standards framework in November 2013. The May 2014 polls were the first at which we applied this framework, which was designed to support ROs in delivering a consistent high-quality service for voters and those standing for election. The new framework reflects what we and the UK Electoral Advisory Board agree that ROs need to do to prepare for and deliver well-run elections. The standards focus on the key outcomes from the perspective of voters and those who want to stand for election, and in particular whether ROs are taking the necessary steps to deliver the following outcomes: Voters are able to vote easily and know that their vote will be counted in the way they intended. It is easy for people who want to stand for election to find out how to get involved, what the rules are, and what they have to do to comply with these rules, and they can have confidence in the management of the process and the result. The standards cover the range of activities carried out by ROs in preparing for and delivering well-run elections including, for example, setting up and staffing polling stations, and delivering timely and accurate verification and count processes. A sample of 20% of ROs were selected for detailed monitoring at the May 2014 polls. The selection of this sample was principally risk-based, taking into account factors such as the experience of the RO and any previous issues as well as any other available information. The selection of the risk-based sample was made in consultation with the RROs. Additionally, the sample for monitoring included a random selection of ROs to mitigate the risks which could arise from only monitoring a known sample of ROs. Also, for the first time, we also monitored the performance of all RROs in carrying out their role in co-ordinating and managing the delivery of the polls. As for previous elections we provided guidance, tools and templates to support ROs in planning for and delivering the elections. The Cabinet Office established the Elections Policy Coordination Group (EPCG) to enable RROs to come together to: shape the legislative framework share and identify good practice discuss issues of common concern. The Cabinet Office should evaluate how this group worked in practice, and consider, what if any, role it might have for ensuring the effective coordination of the 2015 elections. The Commission's Elections, Referendum and Registration Working Group (ERRWG) continued to be a valuable forum for informing our approach to guidance and standards, and for discussions on practical issues relating to the delivery and coordination of the polls. Prior to the elections we identified 16 local authority areas where there could be a higher risk of allegations of electoral fraud. We worked closely with the relevant EROs and ROs, as well as the local police in the lead up to the election period to ensure that: The risk of electoral fraud had been robustly assessed locally. Appropriate preventative measures were in place in advance of the polls. Local elections staff and the police were equipped to respond quickly to any allegations of criminal activity. Our monitoring before and during the election period meant that we were confident that ROs and police forces in all 16 areas had appropriate plans in place to minimise the risk of electoral fraud and to respond effectively to any cases of alleged electoral fraud which might be reported. Some ROs sought to agree local codes and protocols with campaigners, although not all local parties and campaigners agreed to sign up to them. We will continue to share information about good practice that has been adopted with other ROs and EROs to help them plan for future elections. The Commission's role in encouraging voter registration Ahead of the elections we ran a UK-wide media campaign which aimed to increase public awareness of the need to register to vote by 6 May in order to take part in the elections. In Great Britain, our campaign ran from 1 April-5 May on TV, radio and online. In Northern Ireland our campaign ran from 14-30 April on TV, radio, online, press and outdoor (posters and billboards) As British citizens living overseas are eligible to vote in the European Parliamentary elections, we ran an online registration campaign aimed at British expatriates in the top 10-20 countries with a high British expatriate population. The campaign ran from 24 February - 18 April in non-European countries and until 27 April in Europe. We also created radio fillers (non-date specific radio adverts) for expatriate radio stations, and worked in partnership with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, expatriate groups such as Votes for Expat Brits, and parties' overseas networks. We supplied template PR materials to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) and asked them to distribute these via consulates and embassies to gain media coverage in countries with the highest numbers of British expatriates. Many consulates and embassies used these materials, which resulted in a number of pieces of coverage to support the campaign. In addition, we held an Overseas Registration Day on 26 February 2014. This was used as a hook for media releases. It was highlighted by our partners, and generated numerous pieces of coverage, both domestically and overseas. To support Overseas Registration Day Greg Clark MP (Minister of State, Cities and Constitution) also recorded a video message to expatriates urging them to register to vote ahead of the 22 May 2014 elections. In Northern Ireland we also ran a 'voter information' media campaign to remind voters to take their photographic ID with them to the polling station and to inform them that the Single Transferable Vote voting system would be used for both the local government and European elections. Our campaign ran from 7-22 May on radio, online, press and outdoor (posters and billboards). As with previous campaigns, all advertising across the UK directed people to the Commission's www.aboutmyvote.co.uk website where they could download registration forms and find out further information about the elections taking place in their area. We also set up a telephone helpline for the public awareness campaign period, allowing people to call for more information or to request a registration form. In Great Britain, 207,8157 registration forms were downloaded from our website, which exceeded both the number in 2009 (131,194) and our target of 140,000 forms. In Northern Ireland, 6,059 registration forms were downloaded from our website. This was lower than 2009 (7,007) and also fell short of our target of 10,000 forms. This may be due to our campaign going live shortly after the autumn 2013 canvass, which had seen an increase in registration levels. Due to their dispersed nature and the lack of reliable data on their numbers, British expatriates are a particularly difficult audience to target. This year we did a number of things differently for this aspect of the campaign, including working more closely with partners and holding an Overseas Registration Day. We achieved a total of 7,079 overseas registration form downloads from our website, which exceeded the number of forms downloaded during the campaigns undertaken prior to the European Parliamentary elections in 2009 (5,566) but fell well short of our target of 25,000 forms. Although we were disappointed not to hit our target, we recognise that expatriates at these elections may have chosen to register to vote in their EU countries of residence. For example, according to official figures from Spain, 82,000 out of 336,586 foreigners registered to vote ahead of the European elections were British nationals. Despite not hitting our target for this element of campaign, we did receive a very positive reaction to our adverts, with over 87,000 clicks on our online advertising being recorded during the course of the campaign. It is possible that many of these individuals felt the process of downloading, printing - and then having another British passport holder countersign - the form was too onerous a task. The introduction of online registration will make this process a great deal more straightforward in future. We will be reviewing our approach and looking to build on successes as we plan for the

UK Parliamentary general election. We intend to again set a stretching target and will report on the impact that online registration has had on this audience in our report following the general election. To evaluate the effectiveness of our UK-wide registration campaign, we carried out tracking research in two stages – before the campaign launched and just after the campaign ended. In Northern Ireland, we also carried out tracking research after the ‘voter information’ campaign. In both cases, we met our target of reaching 60-70% of the target population. Sixty nine per cent of the population in Great Britain, and 78% of the population in Northern Ireland, reported seeing at least one element of our registration campaign. We also met our target of 95-98% of people in Northern Ireland knowing they needed to bring ID with them to the polling station: 95% of the population were aware of the requirement to take a valid form of photographic ID with them to vote. Bite the Ballot held a “National Voter Registration Day” on 5 February. To support this, we provided them with a link to the public awareness resources on our website. Key facts and figures Registration and turnout 46.55 million people were eligible to vote in the European Parliamentary elections and 21.7 million and 1.2 million in the local government elections in England and Northern Ireland respectively. Turnout at the elections on 22 May Election Number of ballot papers included in the count Turnout European Parliamentary elections (UK) 16.54 million 35.6 Local government elections - England 7.95 million 36.0 Local government elections – Northern Ireland 638,332 51.3 The chart below shows the variation in turnout since the 2010 UK Parliamentary General election. Turnout at the European Parliamentary election was similar in 2014 to that in 2009. Turnout at elections between 2009 and 2014 At the European Parliamentary elections, 11.5 million people in Great Britain and 12.1 million people across the UK cast their vote in their local polling station, accounting for 70% of all votes cast. This represents a turnout of 30% in Great Britain and 30.5% in the UK. Postal votes were issued to around 6.65 million electors (16% of the eligible electorate in the UK) with a turnout rate of 69.5% among postal voters. The majority of these were issued across Great Britain where postal voting is available on demand: England, 16%, Scotland, 15.9%, Wales 16.9%. By comparison, 1.5% of the electorate were issued with a postal vote in Northern Ireland. For the European Parliamentary elections approximately 51,690 electors were appointed as a proxy for another elector, representing 0.1% of the total electorate. 1,013 were emergency proxies (Great Britain). For the local government elections in England there were approximately 19,500 proxy voters and 430 emergency proxy voters. 70 were proxies appointed as a result of medical emergencies for the local government elections in 2013. Campaigning at the elections First published: 8 October 2019 Last updated: 8 October 2019 Overview On 23 May 2019 people across the UK voted in elections to the European Parliament, which had remained scheduled in law, but had not been expected to take place. For people in Northern Ireland and parts of England, this poll closely followed scheduled local elections which took place on 2 May. Trusted election results rely on public confidence in the administration of the polls. Our research with the public shows that a majority of people were confident the May 2019 elections were well-run, and most voters were satisfied with the voting process. But overall levels of confidence about the European Parliamentary elections and the local government elections in England were lower than at other recent elections.

Summary The impact on confidence in the elections Among issues which impacted on people's confidence in the elections, most notable and regrettable were the issues experienced by some citizens of other EU member states living in the UK who wanted to vote in the European Parliament elections in the UK. We highlighted similar difficulties to government after the 2014 European Parliamentary elections and made recommendations for change. It is unacceptable that people eligible to vote should be frustrated from doing so, and deeply regrettable that this was not acted on and resolved by the UK government. Any changes to the process would have required the Government to introduce legislation, but the law was not changed ahead of the 2019 election. The difficulties were also exacerbated by government not confirming the position on these elections proceeding until very late in the lead up to May 2019, which meant that Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) had not sent declaration forms to EU citizens in the months before the election, as would usually have been the case. Overseas electors also contacted us during and after the European Parliamentary elections to express concern that they had been unable to return postal votes in time to be counted. This is not a new issue and again the UK government has not addressed this problem by making changes in the law, so effectively denying numbers of UK citizens overseas who are entitled to vote a reasonably practical way to actually vote. We will continue to urge the Government to introduce new approaches to improving access to the voting process for overseas electors, as has been readily and successfully done in other comparable democracies.

Digital campaigning Voters continued to receive information about election campaigns from a range of sources, and social media and other online campaigns were a significant source of information for voters at the May 2019 elections. The larger social media platforms took steps to improve transparency about political advertising for their users. Governments in the UK need to now make swift progress on legislation that would require campaigners to include imprints on their digital campaign material to show who has distributed it. We also want social media companies to continue to develop their political ad policies and libraries, and ensure they have them in place for the next set of national elections or any further referendums in the UK. This also requires us to have new electoral regulatory rules to ensure proper oversight and controls.

Electoral law needs to be updated Many of the issues highlighted in our report are not new, and we have said for some time that the failure of governments and parliaments to properly maintain and update electoral law, and to address pressure on local authorities, has built up significant risks for well-run elections. The 2019 elections illustrate that electoral law is increasingly complex and outdated, and presents real risks for voters, candidates and campaigners, and electoral administrators. The difficulties experienced by some EU citizens in the UK and British citizens living abroad at the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections have again shown the impact on elections of governments not acting on recommendations to prioritise the interests of voters. Delivering well-run elections Effective electoral administration that supports voter confidence depends on good planning and management by EROs and Returning Officers (ROs). While ROs and EROs will always need to be prepared to respond to unanticipated political developments, governments should also ensure that their decisions support effective contingency planning. We will continue to strongly emphasise the need for governments to ensure there is clarity about the legal framework for elections at least six months before EROs and ROs need to deliver statutory processes. Given all of this, it is an immense credit to the ROs and other electoral staff across the country that they achieved what they did in the circumstances: largely well-run elections in the face of substantial challenges. We will continue to work with the electoral community to explore what more can be done within the current framework to address the challenges around resilience and capacity in local electoral services. The experience of voters Confidence that the elections were well-run Trusted election results rely on public confidence in the administration of the polls. Our research with the public after elections aims to understand levels of confidence in how well elections are run, and how satisfied people are with the current voting process. When asked as part of our research, most people said they were confident that the May 2019 elections were well-run. A slightly smaller proportion of people (62%) said they were confident the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections were well-run, compared to just under two thirds (64%) of people in England who said they thought the local government elections were well-run. In Northern Ireland three quarters of people said they thought the local government elections there were well-run. Across all elections, people who voted were more likely to say they were confident that the elections were well-run than those who didn't vote. Levels of confidence were lower following the May 2019 elections than in previous years, including when elections have been called at short notice (for example, the Northern Ireland Assembly and UK Parliamentary general elections in 2017). Chart 1: Confidence that elections were well-run, 2014-19 More than a fifth (22%) of people we asked said they were not confident the European Parliamentary elections were well-run. The most common reason given (mentioned by 57% of those who said they were not confident the elections were well-run) was that 'some people did not have the opportunity to vote/had the opportunity taken away'. Only 7% of people mentioned this in relation to the local elections, and 16% in relation to the Northern Ireland local elections. Around two-fifths of people (42%) who were not confident the European Parliamentary elections were well-run also mentioned that 'some people had difficulties registering to vote'. Again, this was less commonly mentioned in relation to the local elections in England and Northern Ireland, by only 7% of people who were not confident the elections were well-run. Most people who voted in the May 2019 elections also said that they were satisfied with the process of voting: 85% of voters at the European Parliamentary elections 91% of voters at the local elections in England 95% of voters at the local elections in Northern Ireland The reasons voters gave for not being satisfied were the same as why they were not confident that the elections were well run. Registration and voting by citizens of other EU countries Citizens of EU Member States living in the UK can choose to cast their vote at the European Parliamentary elections here, rather than the elections in the state where they hold citizenship. If they prefer to cast their vote here, they first need to be on the register to vote at local government elections in the UK, and they also have to complete and submit an additional declaration (citizens of the Republic of Ireland, Cyprus and Malta do not need to complete this declaration). This in order to specify that they will not be voting in the same election in another country. In the weeks leading up to the May 2019 election, significant concerns were raised by and on behalf of some EU citizens in the UK, who said that they had experienced difficulty submitting their declaration before the legal deadline on 7 May 2019. Ultimately, this meant that some people who were entitled to vote and wanted to vote in the European Parliament elections in the UK were unable to do so. This is unacceptable in a modern democracy. Many of them rightly felt frustrated, disappointed that, and angry that they were unable to vote. We have collated information from the concerns raised with us by EU citizens and others before polling day, on polling day itself and in the days thereafter, as well as data provided by EROs. We have published a more detailed analysis of this evidence separately. In summary, the feedback and comments we received from EU citizens, their families and elected representatives highlighted three main areas of concern: that they had not been aware of the need to complete an additional declaration as well as an application to register to vote that they had not been able to submit a declaration in time before the deadline set in law that they thought they had submitted a declaration in time, but were still not included on the electoral register and were not able to vote. It is not possible to conclusively verify the numerical estimates of those affected. This is because there are no comprehensive data sources available to us or any other body that would tell us how many voters wanted to register and were unable to do so, or tell us how many attended a polling station on 23 May but were not able to be issued with a ballot paper. Data provided by Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) after the election shows that in the weeks leading up to the deadline more than 400,000 EU citizens submitted a declaration that was received and processed. This meant that they were able to vote in the UK at the 2019 European Parliament elections. In total, around 450,000 were registered to vote in these European Parliament elections as a result of returning a declaration (UC1 form). This represents just over a fifth of citizens of other EU Member States who had been included in the May 2019 local government register. Approximately four in five EU citizens (1.7 million) who had previously registered to vote did not submit an additional declaration in time to be registered to vote at the European Parliament elections in the UK. Some of these people may have wanted to vote in the UK but were not able to submit the declaration in time before the deadline, although we have no data that allows us to assess how many were in this position. Equally, it is not possible to assess how many of these people opted to vote in the EU Member State where they held citizenship, or actively decided not to vote in the election at all. This was not the first time that these types of issues had arisen at European Parliamentary elections in the UK. Our report on the 2014 European Parliament elections highlighted that citizens of other EU member states had raised similar concerns about the registration and declaration process for those elections. We said then that the UK Government needed to work with the Commission, electoral administrators, and groups representing EU citizens to find solutions in good time before the next European Parliamentary elections. Any changes to the process would have required the Government to introduce legislation, but the law was not changed ahead of the 2019 election. The UK Government indicated in February 2015 that it planned further discussions with us and other stakeholders on the registration process for EU citizens, but no such discussions were held. Immediately following the

May 2015 UK Parliamentary general election the Government introduced legislation to hold a referendum on the UK's membership of the EU, and the result of the June 2016 referendum meant that it was widely expected that European Parliamentary elections would no longer take place in the UK. The difficulties that we had identified in 2014 were exacerbated by the circumstances leading up to the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. Given that the UK had been expected to leave the European Union on 29 March 2019, the UK Government had made clear its position that the UK would not be required to take part in the 2019 European Parliamentary elections. In the event, that proved to be wrong, and government had not properly contingency planned for these scheduled elections having to proceed. One direct and harmful impact was that EROs were not in a position to send declaration forms to EU citizens who were already registered as local government electors after the annual electoral registration canvass in December 2018, as they had usually done before European Parliamentary elections in previous years. On 29 March 2019, we wrote to Cabinet Minister David Lidington highlighting the ongoing uncertainty about whether the European Parliamentary elections would be held in the UK, and on the need for assurances to Returning Officers that they would be reimbursed for any reasonable spending on contingency preparations. It was not until 8 April that the Government made the legislation confirming that polling day for the European Parliamentary elections in the UK would be 23 May 2019. EROs were then in a position to commit resources to begin sending declaration forms to EU citizens who were already registered as local government electors, including using email where they held addresses. Many EROs faced significant logistical challenges, however, given that electoral administrators and their printing and despatch suppliers in many areas of England and across Northern Ireland were also delivering the scheduled early May local government elections. The experience of EU citizens at the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections in the UK illustrates the impact of making significant decisions about elections without thinking through all the possible contingencies and making sure the interests of voters are always put first. By not taking steps to proactively identify alternative solutions soon after the 2014 election, and then simply assuming there was no chance of European elections happening again, the UK Government missed the opportunity to legislate for improvements to the process for future elections. Moreover, while the political circumstances leading up to the 2019 elections were exceptional, the continued uncertainty about whether the election would go ahead meant that EU citizens received less timely information about what they needed to do to be able to vote than in previous years. More widely, our research with the public suggests that the experience of EU citizens may have had an impact on overall levels of confidence in the 2019 European Parliamentary elections in the UK. Public confidence could again be harmed if significant decisions about whether or how elections will take place are made so close to polling day in future. Effective electoral administration that supports voter confidence depends on good planning and management by EROs and ROs. While they will always need to be prepared to respond to unanticipated political developments – such as an early UK Parliamentary general election, for example – governments should ensure that their decisions support effective contingency planning. We will continue to strongly emphasise the need for governments to ensure there is clarity about the legal framework for elections at least six months before EROs and ROs need to deliver statutory processes. Voting by British citizens living abroad British citizens living abroad were entitled to vote in the European Parliamentary elections, and more than 16,000 British citizens applied and were registered ahead of the May 2019 elections. Overseas electors were not entitled to vote in the local government elections in England and Northern Ireland. Overseas electors contacted us during and after the election to express concern that they had been unable to return postal votes in time to be counted. We reported on the same concerns from overseas electors after the 2015 and 2017 UK Parliamentary general elections and the 2016 EU referendum. There is only a limited period for postal ballot packs to be sent by post, received by overseas electors and returned before the end of polling day. Returning Officers cannot print ballot papers until after the end of the period for nominating parties and candidates, which closed just under a month before polling day for the European Parliamentary elections. To minimise the impact of these challenges, our guidance recommends that Returning Officers should issue postal ballot packs to overseas electors as early as practicable in the election timetable. However, Returning Officers still need time to secure printers and to ensure that ballot papers and postal vote packs are checked for accuracy, which impacts on how quickly they can despatch postal votes. We also recommend that they should use an international business response licence for return envelopes to help ensure postal votes can be returned as quickly as possible from outside the UK. Returning Officers also told us that there were specific pressures at the 2019 election which meant it was even harder to ensure overseas electors received their postal ballot packs in time to return them before the close of poll. Late confirmation that the election would be held meant that Returning Officers had much less time than usual to plan and arrange postal ballot pack print and delivery contracts. Also, Returning Officers in many parts of England and in Northern Ireland were involved in delivering scheduled local government elections at the same time. Additionally, postal services outside the UK are not always reliable enough for all overseas electors to receive and return their postal votes in time to be counted. Without action by the Government to identify and legislate for realistic alternatives, Returning Officers will continue to be faced with these challenges, and overseas electors will face these problems again at the next UK Parliamentary election. Now that ROs are routinely using international business response licence for the return of overseas postal votes, the UK Government, Returning Officers and the Electoral Commission should work with Royal Mail to explore whether there are any other options to help ensure that postal votes are sent out as quickly as possible to addresses outside the UK, within the constraints of the current legislative framework. The Government has previously indicated that it intends to extend the right to vote in UK Parliamentary elections to all British citizens abroad, rather than to just those who have lived in the UK in the last 15 years. As part of any future legislation on overseas electors, we will continue to urge the Government to consider new approaches to improving access to the voting process. This could include voting at embassies and consulates, or the ability to download and print postal ballot papers. Both of these means are successfully used in other comparable democracies enabling overseas electors to readily and efficiently vote. Delivering the elections – the experience of electoral administrators While most people were confident that the May 2019 elections were well-run, and were satisfied with the voting process, we identified problems which could have had an impact on people's confidence in the elections. These issues must, however, be considered in the context that elections continue to be run against a challenging resource backdrop. Both financial pressures and a decreasing availability of expertise in the sector, with skilled administrators leaving the profession and not always able to be replaced, mean that the risks to the successful delivery of elections continue to increase. Administrators are reliant on a relatively small pool of specialist software and print management suppliers, which can also impact on their ability to ensure that voters receive a high quality service. Furthermore, for these elections, until 1 April 2019 there was no guarantee from the UK Government that any reasonable spending on contingency preparations would be reimbursed for the European Parliamentary elections. This had a significant impact on the ability of administrators to make necessary preparations and effective contingency plans for these elections. Where administrators were also facing local elections in early May, this meant that a lot of activity for the two different polls needed to be carried out at the same time, significantly stretching already thin resources. Fundamentally, the evidence below further illustrates that current electoral law is increasingly complex, outdated and not fit for purpose, and contributes to issues which impact directly on voters, candidates and campaigners. Fundamental electoral reform is needed to ensure elections can be administered more efficiently, and that voters and candidates can have a better experience of the electoral process. In the meantime, we will continue to work with the electoral community – including with the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers, the Society of Local Authority Lawyers & Administrators in Scotland, the Association of s, the Scottish Assessors Association and the Electoral Management Board for Scotland – to look at what more we can all do to address the immediate challenges of capacity and resilience within local authority electoral services. Delivering the elections – the experience of electoral administrators Preparing to deliver the elections We asked electoral administrators to tell us about their own experiences of delivering the elections and the practical difficulties they faced. Administrators told us that the late confirmation of the European Parliamentary elections, coupled with the overlapping timetables with the scheduled local government elections, presented difficulties in booking places to be used as polling stations and count venues and securing polling station staff. Some staff were no longer available as they had not anticipated being needed to work. Many suppliers and printers were also at full capacity which meant that administrators had little flexibility to control the timing of the printing of poll cards and postal ballot packs to ensure the earliest possible delivery to electors. The impact of this was particularly notable in Northern Ireland where the deadline to apply for an absent vote for the European Parliamentary elections fell on polling day for the local elections. This put additional pressure on electoral staff and caused confusion for voters. Given the volume of stationery which had to be printed for the local elections, the Chief Electoral Officer (CEO) was unable to print and issue poll cards until after the absent voting deadlines. This had an adverse impact on voters in Northern Ireland as they received this important information too late to apply for an absent vote. Contingency preparations in Northern Ireland In Great Britain, as independent statutory office holders who are typically also senior officers within local authorities, most RROs and ROs had sufficient flexibility to begin some appropriate contingency planning before it was formally confirmed that the European Parliamentary elections would take place. However, the structure of electoral management in Northern Ireland is different in that the CEO is directly appointed by and reports to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. In this context, we believe the CEO was restricted in what contingency arrangements she could put in place to manage the potential risks for voters caused by this lack of clarity. In 2011, we recommended that the UK Government should consult stakeholders in Northern Ireland on the accountability arrangements in place for the CEO's decision making. Although the context is different than in 2011, in our view this supports the continued importance of undertaking such a review. The nomination process In February

2019, ahead of the May elections, the law was changed to allow candidates at local government elections in England to choose not to have their home address printed on the statement of persons nominated and the ballot papers. We welcomed these changes, which should help to reduce the risk of abuse and intimidation of local election candidates and their families; however, candidates and ROs would have benefited from this new legislation being in place earlier. At the 2 May 2019 local elections in England, ROs told us that some candidates and agents found it difficult to understand the new nominations process, and found it harder to accurately complete the forms they needed to in order to stand for election. If the legislation had been in place earlier, there would have been more time available for the development and testing of the new nomination pack before it needed to be made available, and to provide updated guidance and template briefings sooner, which would have better supported electoral administrators and candidates to fully understand the new process. This reinforces the importance of legislation being clear six months before it needs to be complied with. We accept that the nomination packs we made available could be improved, and we are taking active steps to do so ahead of the next scheduled local elections, and will work with administrators and parties in doing this. Additionally, some candidates did not realise that their address would appear on the statutory notice of election agents if they nominated themselves as their own election agent and did not specify a different address. This would also be the case if the candidate did not appoint someone to be their agent, in which case they would automatically become the agent. Although the new rules helped candidates to protect their home address by not including it on ballot papers – where the information is not essential to enable voters to identify candidates – there are still some circumstances in which details of an address need to be made publicly available. As election agents are responsible for ensuring candidates comply with election law, details of a physical address are necessary so that any legal notices can be delivered. Removing addresses from the notice of election agents could make it harder to monitor and enforce the law. At the local government elections in England, we are aware of two instances where a candidate's address was published on the Statement of Persons Nominated when it should have been withheld. This could have compromised a candidate's safety if this was the reason why they did not want their address made public. As a result, these ROs¹ were assessed as not fully meeting our performance standards. Equivalent changes were not made for the local government elections in Northern Ireland. When nominations opened, a high profile councillor, who has a restraining order in place to protect her, announced that she would not be contesting the election because her home address would appear on the ballot paper. We welcome the Northern Ireland Office's commitment to change the law on this issue. Errors in delivering the election During the weeks leading up to polling day for the local government elections in England we became aware of several errors on election materials in a small number of local authorities. These included: errors on postal ballot papers (for example, missing off the name of a candidate) postal ballot packs sent with incorrect instructions about completing the ballot paper incorrect details on poll cards that were sent to electors Errors like these have the potential to cause confusion for voters, and may have meant that some voters were unable to have their votes counted in the way they intended. Although the ROs in all cases responded quickly to mitigate the impact of these errors, such issues can affect people's confidence in well run elections and their satisfaction with the voting process. As a result, a total of five ROs² were assessed as not fully meeting our performance standards. Errors at election counts It is important that voters, candidates and political parties have confidence in the accuracy of the election counting process. We became aware of mistakes made in counting and totalling the number of votes in three local government elections in England in May 2019. In one local authority, a spreadsheet error in the calculation of votes meant that the wrong number of votes were allocated to some candidates in one ward. In the second and third authority, the RO declared the wrong candidate elected. The ROs accepted that they had made errors, but the law does not allow ROs to recount ballot papers or correct errors once they have declared a result. Election petitions were lodged in two to challenge the results of the elections, both of these have been upheld. All of these ROs 3 were assessed as not fully meeting our performance standards. We continue to recommend that electoral law reform is required to simplify the legal process for challenging elections, particularly so that mistakes made by ROs can be rectified more quickly without recourse to the election petition process.

Appropriate campaigns that communicate effectively with voters are central to well-run elections and referendums. When campaigners clearly explain their policies and political views, voters are better able to exercise their right to vote in a meaningful and informed way. Our research with the public after the May 2019 elections asked people if they had enough information about the candidates and parties standing for election. After the European Parliamentary elections 49% of people said they had enough information, but 44% said they would have liked more. These figures were similar in relation to the local elections in England, but lower than those saying they had enough information for the local elections in Northern Ireland (64%). We also asked people where they got their information from. Of those who said they saw information, the most common source across all the May elections was a leaflet or flyer from a candidate/political party. Other sources of information, including social media, are shown below.

Table 1: Most common sources of information about candidates and parties standing for election

Transparency about election material online s are increasingly making use of digital campaign tools to influence voters during elections, including using social media and other online advertising tools. Evidence from our research with the public highlighted above shows use of social media and other online platforms as sources of information about the candidates and political parties standing in elections. Labelling and imprints for online election material Facebook, Twitter and Google all launched new advert labelling or 'Paid for by' disclaimers for some political advertising on their platforms and channels during the European Parliamentary election campaign. These new 'Paid for by' disclaimers increased transparency about who was spending money to influence voters at the European Parliamentary elections. But these disclaimers were not the same as the imprint (a short piece of text on election material that identifies who is behind it) that is required by law for printed election material, because they did not include the name and address of the campaigner. Currently, imprints are a legal requirement for any printed election material, but there are no legal requirements for digital material. We are pleased that the UK Government has committed to implementing an imprint requirement for digital election material, and to publish legislative proposals by the end of this year. The social media companies' initiatives at the European elections have demonstrated that it is possible to add extra labelling to adverts on their platforms. They show that it should be possible for digital platforms and channels to facilitate campaigners to put imprints on digital election material if campaigners are legally required to include them in future. New imprint rules for digital election material should cover all non-printed election campaign material, not just social media advertising. They should also cover search and website advertising, campaigners' websites and emails, and any other form of online campaigning even if it is not paid-for advertising. There should be an exemption to make clear that they would not apply to individual citizens who are not 'campaigning' but only expressing personal opinions about elections or referendums online. Social media companies' advert libraries and reports Facebook, Google and Twitter voluntarily published advert libraries which contained the election advertising that ran on their platforms and channels ahead of the May 2019 European Parliamentary election. Facebook and Google published reports on the contents of their libraries. The reports listed who was campaigning, and gave summary information about how many adverts campaigners had taken out and how much they had spent. The libraries and reports helped us identify who was paying to advertise on these platforms, meaning we could advise campaigners during the campaign and giving us a new source of information to support our checks on reported spending after the poll. The ad libraries are now a way voters and others can get information about who viewed the adverts, but they do not yet provide meaningful information about how adverts were targeted. For example, they provide breakdowns of the very wide geographical areas targeted, such as England, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland, but not to the more detailed level of the specific constituencies targeted. The libraries will give more useful transparency if the companies increase the amount of information that they publish about targeting of advertising. Social media companies that operate in the UK should continue to develop their ad policies and libraries, and ensure that they have them in place for the next set of national level elections or any future referendums in the UK, and thereafter. It should be legally required for social media companies and other platforms that provide advertising services to run these kinds of libraries and reports, which could be enforced as appropriate, possibly through the Government's proposed Online Harms regulator. This would ensure voters can access a consistent level of information about election or referendum advertising across different platforms online. Social media companies' advertising policies Facebook, Google and Twitter all adopted policies for political advertising that ran on their platforms and channels during the European Parliamentary election campaign. But those policies did not completely align with the definitions in electoral law. Where their policies did not do this for the May 2019 European Parliamentary elections, some platforms failed to label certain types of campaigning, such as issue based campaigns, paid for by non-party campaigners. For future elections, social media companies should ensure that their election advertising policies fit the definitions of election campaigning in electoral law. This may need to become a legal requirement. Registering political parties at the European Parliamentary elections Late confirmation that the European Parliamentary elections would go ahead in the UK also meant there was not much time for new political parties to register or for existing parties to update their party identifiers before nominations opened. This was exacerbated by applications for the local elections already being processed. As a result of the late confirmation of the European Parliamentary elections proceeding, some parties were not able to register and stand candidates at the European Parliamentary elections. Parties and campaigners deliver their reports of election spending after the poll. We will publish these as soon as possible after they are delivered. More information This report We have a statutory duty to report on the administration of the European Parliamentary election held in the UK in May 2019. We have also highlighted issues from the local government elections that were held in some parts of England earlier in May 2019. We separately wrote to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to highlight issues from the local government elections that were held across Northern Ireland on 2 May 2019. We have also produced a report on our enquiry into the registration process for citizens of other Member States of the EU in relation to European Parliamentary elections and the experience of some citizens of other EU Member States at the 2019 election, which has informed the conclusions in this report. The May elections On 2 May 2019 elections were held for 248 local councils in England, and all 11 local councils in Northern Ireland. There were also elections for five directly elected local authority Mayors, in Bedford, Mansfield, Leicester, Copeland and Middlesbrough, and an election for the Mayor of the North of Tyne Combined Authority. The electorate for local government elections in England was 27.9 million and approximately 9 million votes were cast. The overall turnout was 32.8%. Postal votes were issued to around 4.6 million electors in England and 2.9 million postal votes were included in the count. In Northern Ireland, where postal voting is not available on demand, 15,464 postal votes were issued. The European Parliamentary elections took place in the UK on 23 May, with voters choosing 73 MEPs in 12 electoral regions. A total of 46.5 million people were registered to vote in the European Parliamentary elections on 23 May 2019. Some 17.3 million votes were included in the count, representing an overall turnout of 37.2%. ■ Local

JH welcomed the new Commissioners, noting their observer status, pending the confirmation of their appointments, and asked staff to introduce themselves. Declarations of interest No new declarations of interest were made at the meeting. New Commissioners' declarations would need to be recorded at the first meeting following Royal Assent. Minutes of the Commission Board meeting of 19 September 2018 The minutes of the Commission Board meeting on 19 September were approved and the record of the Commission informal day of 24 October was noted.

Project overview CB introduced the paper, explaining that the Commission started working on a project basis to help broaden the work of the Commission and make progress on the outcomes of the Strategic Review. CS explained that larger projects were managed using the Programme and Project Management framework, while smaller projects were managed through operational plans. The Executive Team signed off all projects. Larger projects had assigned project managers. AI discussed the projects aimed at supporting free and fair elections and referendums. On the project to modernise the electoral observer scheme, she noted that feedback on the consultation on suggested improvements had been positive. She expected the updated Code of Practice to be laid before the UK and Scottish Parliaments before the end of the year, in line with the project plan. AI also updated on the delivering modern guidance project. While current guidance was well respected, it was not easy to navigate or maintain. The project would make the Commission's guidance more straightforward to use and update. The first tranche of guidance in the new format would be published on the new website in June 2019, with further roll-outs to follow through to 2020. On the Returning Officer/Electoral Registration Officer engagement and good practice project, AI explained that this was focused both on how we worked internally and how we worked with the electoral community to support them to deliver electoral services. This work would over time be embedded into normal business delivery. AI explained that we had also been working on modernising electoral registration through a project. This had explored the feasibility of various recommendations to improve registration such as integrating it into other public service transactions. Good progress had been made. RV expressed an interest in how we made the most of local authorities' knowledge and experience to ensure the Commission knew what was happening nationally. He suggested that a review of the challenges, risks and issues around frontline delivery, in the light of continuing very tight resources, be considered at a future Board meeting. BP discussed projects underway to support trusted and transparent regulation. We continued to push for an update to primary legislation, but while waiting for this we had produced draft codes of practice, and had consulted on the proposed changes with political parties. All the major political parties had responded to this consultation. BP noted the ICT system for political finance transparency required updating. 10 years ago our system was world leading, but it was now out of date. We had worked closely with political parties on the features of a new system. SC asked about the transition between the current system and the proposed new system. BP confirmed that this was a key risk that we were managing, for example by moving data into the new system in tranches. He also confirmed that stakeholders across the UK would test the system before the formal launch. BP recalled that the Commission was also looking at developing its role as a prosecutor. We would focus initially on prosecutions for process offences such as failure to provide information. We had been building up our skill-base and resources internally to support this change. The next step was to consult with political parties and other stakeholders on this proposal. BP noted proposed improvements to delivery of party statements of accounts, party descriptions, and regulatory casework. We would be looking to standardise statements of account by making statutory regulations, so that comparisons across parties could be made more easily. There would be a cost to parties associated with this change, but implementation would start with the larger parties and there would be a long lead-in period. We expected to begin consultations with political parties on all this in late 2019. BP advised that we no longer register party descriptions that did not clearly identify the party and were just slogans. CW provided an update on the work to support our third goal, and our role as an independent, respected centre of expertise. He noted that our website was hard to navigate, not mobile device friendly, or fully accessible. We were redeveloping the site to address these issues, with the launch planned for June 2019. This was so far on time and on budget. CW also explained the project aimed at improving democratic engagement, which was the most 'blue sky' of all, noting that the outcome of this work would be brought back to Board in the spring. ECS noted the importance of getting 16 year olds engaged and registered in Wales and the importance of engaging them in a pilot project. On tackling electoral fraud, CW noted that this incorporated the evaluation of the UK Government's voter ID pilots plus our wider response to fraud prevention. KR provided an update on our work ensuring we delivered value for money. He noted that the Ways of Working project was not just about the possibility of a new building but was also looking at culture and working practices, technology utilisation, and the working environment. The project on accountability to the devolved administrations was moving forward well. ECS acknowledged the amount of work and consultation that had gone into the projects, and noted the substantial changes that had already been achieved. RV supported this but also questioned how we could ensure consistent commissioner engagement in the areas of work covered by the projects. CB agreed that commissioner involvement had been valuable. SC noted the importance of keeping projects under review and moving the work into normal business at the right moments. AC noted that the move to project working had been a significant culture change for many staff, and needed to be watched. JH also thanked everyone for their work and requested a further update on project work in a year's time, alongside the more regular quarterly reports. (Stephen Gilbert (SG) joined the meeting at this point.) Agreed: That a future informal Board meeting would focus on a review of the challenges, risks and issues around frontline delivery. That an update on work to improve democratic engagement would be provided in Spring 2019. That there would be a further update on the progress of the projects in a year's time. 2019/20 Draft Budget and Business Plan CB introduced the item, and noted that the commissioners were being included earlier in this process than previously to get their steer on the proposed overall approach. The Commission had an ambitious outlook for the future, rather than just trying to do more with less resources. We had up to now found capacity to do project work within existing budgets, but we now had challenges in what more we could achieve without extra resources. The idea was therefore to ask for a little more money to meet the demands on us resulting from changes in the environment in which we operated and new responsibilities since the development of the Corporate Plan. For example the amount of contingency planning we had to do had gone up a good deal, as had the resources needed to deal with rising FOI demands. 5.2 DB confirmed that this was the second annual plan to deliver the five year Corporate Plan and that our four goals remained current and valid. Originally spending for 2019/20 had been planned to be the lowest of the five years at £16.2 million, but some assumptions had now changed, for example about likely pay rises, in line with what was happening elsewhere in the public sector, and there were new needs for both capital and current spending. If all these new activities were included the budget would be around £18.5 million, which was higher than the original projection, but not much different from 2018/19. CB confirmed that the Board would have a more detailed discussion on the Budget at the February meeting. This discussion was to explain the proposed new initiatives. DB reported that the new initiatives were additions to existing projects or new activity and that they broadly fell into two groups – building regulatory compliance and responding to government-led change. BP discussed options to build regulatory compliance. Existing litigation would flow through to the next financial year and had significant cost implications. Building internal legal capacity would cut our external spend in this area. We also needed to invest in the financial reporting side, how we audited political parties, our skills base on the digital side, and compliance accounting. We were not anticipating more major investigatory activity but this could not be excluded. There were also proposals to upgrade the casework management system. A little extra money could also be needed for research to support improving transparency in Northern Ireland. All this could cost around an extra £800,000. ECS questioned how we would respond to no extra funding in this area; CB confirmed that this would require reprioritisation. However she suggested that there was an important opportunity to broaden our agenda to respond to additional demand. AM asked about contingency and legal funding. CB explained that at the time of writing the corporate plan we could not have anticipated the amount of litigation currently underway. AI provided an overview of proposed new initiatives responding to Government led change. Some of these built on existing planned work, such as canvass reform; others related to ensuring we could respond appropriately to Scottish and Welsh Government-led electoral reform, including through additional policy support. CW noted the need for qualitative research on the projects that we were doing, such as canvass reform and evaluating the ID pilots. CW also updated the Board on consultation on ballot paper design in Scotland, a cost-neutral piece of work (because we would be reimbursed by the Scottish government) that nevertheless had capacity implications. KR noted that the Ways of Working project and the IT improvements also involved additional cost. AM asked whether the Board would see projected figures for future financial years. CB noted that we needed to re-profile the forward years' budget figures. AC said it would be helpful to see the projected figures, and a cost-benefit analysis, such as savings from bringing resources inhouse. SC strongly supported the more ambitious approach, and recommended the case for increases should focus on the need to respond to new technology opportunities and risks. AC and RV agreed with the proposed initiatives. RV suggested the Commission should note the degree of financial discipline it had applied, and the discipline of focusing on different projects. We needed to articulate clearly that we were discerning in what we chose to push. JH strongly supported the proposed more ambitious approach, and noted that we were not talking about substantial sums of money compared with the importance of the issues involved. BP noted that we could well be asked if we were seeking sufficient funding, rather than being challenged about asking for too much. CB commented that we should not go even bigger, as we would need to increase our management capacity, but we did need to ensure we communicated our ambitions effectively. Agreed, That the paper was noted and the overall approach was agreed. The Board looked forward to seeing the figures in due course. Chief Executive's update CB explained the purpose of these updates for the new commissioners. JH invited each director to comment on issues in their area. AI highlighted our response to the three governments' consultation on canvass reform, which had been published on 30 November. CB noted our need to be in a robust place to be ready for any future unscheduled poll, including a future referendum. We had a list of legislative reforms we would like in this area, which we had broken down to what was needed and what was aspirational. There were also contingency plans in place for UK Parliamentary and Northern Ireland Assembly elections in the coming months. LE updated on the investigative efforts arising from the EU referendum campaigns, and the 2017 UK general election, which were both near completion. We would then move on to working with the political parties on compliance to try to ensure similar issues did not arise in future. LF updated on current legal proceedings. AC asked about the plans to use Instagram influencers as part of the voter registration campaign. CW advised that we approached this with caution, using the same robust process as we did when we engaged celebrities and voice actors, in order to ensure impartiality. RV asked for an update on Northern Ireland Assembly elections. AC explained that the legislation allowed for a further 5 months postponement to required elections if progress on restoring power-sharing had been made. If there were still no progress, there would need to be an election, possibly in autumn 2019. There would be a review of the donation transparency regime in 2019, but the government would probably want a focus on forward transparency, rather than retrospective transparency. Agreed, That the paper was noted. Q2 Performance and finance report AM asked about the 7% underspend in Quarter 2. CB accepted that the report could be worded better to more accurately reflect the situation. AM also asked about the challenge of publishing routine financial returns from parties and campaigners within 30 working days of receiving them. BP reported that we were not meeting our targets due to the volume of smaller party accounts and the redirection of resources to meet increasing demand for key investigations. BP explained that this capacity issue would be resolved with an updated online system. JH thanked the team for their efforts in preparing the Q2 report and continuing to improve the format. Agreed, That the paper was noted Forward plan of board business 2018/19 Agreed, That the paper was noted. Action tracker Agreed, That the paper was noted. Chair and Chief Executive's meeting and meetings in devolved legislatures Agreed, That the paper was noted. Conclusion of the meeting The formal meeting of the Board closed. There was then an informal session on simplifying and modernising electoral law across the UK. At the conclusion of the meeting, the Chair expressed his warm gratitude, and that of the Commission as a whole, for the commitment, integrity and enthusiasm of the departing Chief Executive, CB, and wished her well for the future. He noted that CB had moved the Commission a long way in a good direction in her time, and left the Commission in a strong place for the future.

Meeting wash-up (commissioners only) The meeting ended at 14.00.

Summary The elections were fought on the basis of revised constituency and electoral region boundaries. As a consequence, constituency electorates were more equal in size than previously. The number of constituency candidates declined to 321 – the smallest number in a Scottish Parliament election to date. Twenty-one parties or groups were represented in the regional lists together with 11 individuals. The SNP won 53 of the 73 constituency seats with 45.4 per cent of the votes. Labour was second (15 seats, 31.7 per cent of votes) followed by the Conservatives (3 seats and 13.9 per cent of votes) and the Liberal Democrats (2 seats and 7.9 per cent of votes). When the list seats were added, the SNP had an overall majority of 69 out of 129 seats. Labour had 37, the Conservatives 15, Liberal Democrats 5, Green Party 2 and an Independent 1. Turnout at 50.6 per cent was slightly down on the 2007 figure (53.9 per cent). In the 2007 election a single ballot sheet was used for both constituency and list elections and large numbers of votes were consequently rejected. In 2011, two separate ballot papers were re-introduced and rejected votes returned to minuscule proportions - 0.42 per cent of constituency ballots and 0.34 per cent of list ballots. Across Scotland, 558,202 postal ballots were issued amounting to 14.1 per cent of the electorate. This is the largest proportion to date. Almost 77 per cent of postal ballots issued were returned. Of these, 5.8 per cent were excluded from the counts because of failures relating to personal identifiers or non-inclusion of either a ballot or statement in the envelope. The electoral community worked collaboratively to plan for and deliver the poll. The planning for and delivery of the 2021 Scottish Parliament election took place against the shifting background of the Covid-19 pandemic. Considerable preparatory work was undertaken, with the aim of ensuring that voters were able to participate confidently in the election using their preferred method of voting wherever possible. During the summer and early autumn of 2020, the Electoral Commission worked with and consulted electoral administrators, political parties and governments across Great Britain (GB) to identify a shared set of high-level objectives for delivering successful elections in the current public health environment. These objectives were used to: assess and test policy options and implementation approaches; identify and manage significant risks to successful delivery of the elections; inform research, analysis and reporting on the polls. The Scottish Government and Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB) supported the objectives, which were published in October 2020. Eight local government by-elections took place across Scotland in October and November 2020 – the first statutory polls to take place anywhere in the UK since the onset of the pandemic. In the spring and summer of 2020 the EMB, with input from the Electoral Commission and Public Health Scotland, developed guidance for Returning Officers to deliver these polls with the safety of voters, campaigners, and poll staff the priority concern. The Electoral Commission reported on the by-elections to ensure that learning could be taken forward and considered in the planning for the May 2021 elections across GB and reflected in our guidance to Returning Officers and polling staff. In order to anticipate and plan for any potential changes to voter behaviour at the May Scottish Parliament election, the Electoral Commission carried out public opinion research with voters to assess their attitudes to voting in the context of Covid-19. This research, carried out in August 2020 and repeated in November 2020 and February 2021, found that voting in a polling place remained the preferred option amongst a majority of voters. However, the results also indicated a likely increase in the proportion of voters opting to use a postal vote at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election compared to previous polls. The findings from this research were shared with the Scottish Government and electoral administrators to inform their planning for the poll, and also published for wider interest. Through the summer and autumn of 2020, the Scottish Government developed electoral legislation which aimed to enable the Scottish Parliament election to adapt to a range of potential Covid-19 scenarios. The development of the legislation was informed by a series of round table discussions between Ministers, The Electoral Commission, EMB, Scottish Assessors Association (SAA) and representatives of other parties in the Scottish Parliament. The resulting Scottish General Election (Coronavirus) Act was passed on 23 December 2020 and included provisions to bring forward the postal voting deadline; to enable postponement of the poll in certain circumstances; and to give Ministers powers to specify an all-postal election or polling station voting over multiple days. Voters were engaged in the election and were able to vote using their preferred method. Considerable work was undertaken by Electoral Registration Officers, Returning Officers, and the Electoral Commission in the run up to the election to raise awareness amongst voters of the measures in place to protect them from the risk of Covid-19. This included social media activity, work with national and local press and broadcasters and direct communications to voters. In October 2020, the Commission produced a set of resources focusing on voting options, including posters, social media posts and template messaging. The messaging on these resources encouraged voters to start thinking about their preferred voting option early and reassured them that voting in person would be a safe experience. Of those Returning Officers who completed our post-poll survey, 90% said that they used these resources locally. In February 2021, Electoral Registration Officers wrote to all households to inform them of who was registered to vote at that address, and whether they were registered for a postal or proxy vote. The letter included information on the safety measures planned for polling stations and how to apply for an absent vote. This write out was funded by the Scottish Government. During the same period we also worked with the Chief Medical Officer to issue a letter to all shielders advising them on how to apply for an absent vote.

were voters deterred and voter turnout Voters do not appear to have been deterred from taking part in the election Turnout at the election suggests that the pandemic did not deter significant numbers of potential voters from participating as turnout at the poll was 63.5% for both constituency and regional votes – the highest turnout at any Scottish Parliament election. This was an 8% point increase on turnout at the previous Scottish Parliament election in 2016. Turnout at Scottish Parliament elections (constituency votes) 1999 56% 2003 50% 2007 54% 2011 51% 2016 56% 2021 64% Among those who said they did not vote at the election, the most common reasons given included illness (14%); that voting took too long (11%); that they don't trust politicians (10%); lack of information (7%); that you should be able to vote over a few days (6%) and that there was not enough information/media coverage (5%). People were confident that they could vote using their preferred method Among those who voted on 6 May, the vast majority (94%) said that this was by their preferred voting method, with 5% saying that they did not vote via their preferred method. Nearly all voters (95%) said they were satisfied with the process of voting in the 6 May elections, with three in five (61%) saying they were very satisfied. Just 4% of voters said they were dissatisfied. People who voted in person felt safe to do so A number of safety measures were put in place in polling places to ensure the safety of voters. These measures, in line with our guidance for electoral administrators , were informed by the learnings from the local government by-elections which had taken place during the pandemic and by advice from Public Health Scotland. Measures included: one way systems in polling places face coverings hand sanitisation for voters, along with regular cleaning of equipment single use pencils for voters The significant majority of polling place voters (97%) told us that they had felt safe to vote at the polling place. Just 2% said that they had felt unsafe. Those aged 55 or over were more likely to say that they felt voting was 'very safe' compared to those aged 16-54 (77% vs 61%). On polling day queues were reported at a small number of polling places as a result of the safety measures in place. Where queues did occur before the close of poll, anyone still in the queue at 10pm was still able to be issued with a ballot paper. Of those polling station voters in 2021, who also usually vote in person, more than half (55%) said that voting took about the same time as usual despite the increased safety measures. However, nearly two-fifths (39%) said that it took longer (although 5% said it was quicker). Electoral administrators reported that the safety measures worked well for voters: We were very happy with the way our staff managed a very challenging situation and we received no complaints from electors about the strict procedures which were in place at polling stations. Layouts in polling places were agreed with our Protective Services Team to ensure the safety of staff and voters. Some queueing due to physical distancing, but not a problem. Additional staff were in multi station places to assist voters. Returning Officers appointed additional staff to the polling place in order to provide information for voters. Almost four in five electors (79%) who voted in person said that the help and support available from polling station staff was useful with half (49%) describing it as 'very useful'. People who didn't want to go to a polling station had options for voting remotely. People who didn't want to vote in person could apply to cast their vote by post or appoint someone to vote on their behalf, known as a proxy. Postal voting is available on demand at elections in the UK and the deadline for application is usually 11 working days before the poll. Due to concerns about a potential surge in last minute postal vote applications as a result of Covid-19, the Scottish Government brought forward the deadline to 21 working days before the election. This was to ensure that any increase in applications could be processed in sufficient time so that postal votes could be issued to everyone who had requested one. The February write out to voters by Electoral Registration Officers, coupled with the Chief Medical Officer's letter to shielders in early 2021 highlighted the earlier deadline for voters. The Scottish Assessors Association (SAA), which represents Electoral Registration Officers, also carried out a TV advertising campaign to raise awareness of the different options for voting and the earlier postal vote deadline. Legislation proposed by the Scottish Government was passed by the Scottish Parliament to enable anyone who was self-isolating as a result of Covid-19, to apply for an emergency proxy vote up until 5pm on polling day. Nearly one-third of all votes counted were cast by post. Postal voters at elections in Scotland 1,014,745 voters were registered for a postal vote for the 2021 Scottish Parliament election, amounting to 24% of the electorate. This is an increase of 288,190 postal voters on the 2016 Scottish Parliament election (a 40% increase). Nearly nine in 10 (87%) of postal voters returned their postal vote, meaning that nearly one-third (32%) of all votes counted were postal votes. Postal voters at elections in Scotland 2016 Scottish Parliament election 17.7% 2017 Local government election 17.8% 2017 UK General election 19.4% 2019 UK General election 18.1% 2021 Scottish Parliament election 23.7% A third (34%) of electors who voted by post say that this election was the first time they voted by post, while two thirds (66%) say they have voted by post at previous elections. Two-thirds (66%) of younger postal voters (aged 16-34) voted by post for the first time, compared to just three in 10 (28%) 35-54 postal voters and a quarter (26%) of postal voters aged 55+. Of those electors who were first-time postal voters, approaching half (46%) say that they voted by post because they did not want to go to the polling station because of Covid-19-related safety concerns, while a third (33%) cited convenience as a reason. A quarter (24%) say that their local authority informed them they could register for a postal vote, prompting them to vote by post for the first time, while one in 10 say that advertising from the Electoral Commission (12%) informed them they could register for a postal vote. Of the first-time postal voters, nine in 10 (91%) said that it was easy to understand what to do in order to return their postal vote application, including nearly three in five (57%) who said it was very easy. Just one in 10 (9%) said it was difficult. Postal voters knew what they needed to do to return the postal ballot paper. Of all postal voters, an overwhelming majority (93%) said it was easy to understand what was needed in order to complete and return their postal vote, including two-thirds (63%) who said it was very easy. 7% said it was difficult. First time voters were more likely to have said that it was difficult to understand what was needed in order to complete and return their postal vote, compared to repeat voters (28% vs. 3%). Among all postal voters in Scotland, an overwhelming majority (95%) said that the written instructions on the ballot paper were useful, including two-thirds (64%) who said they were very useful. 4% said they were not useful. Rates of postal vote rejections did not rise significantly, even with the numbers of new postal voters. When a postal ballot pack is returned to the Returning Officer, the signature and date of birth (known as the personal identifiers) provided on the postal vote statement (PVS) are checked against those previously provided by the elector. Where either or both the signature and date of birth are missing or do not match, the postal vote is rejected and is not included in the count. This is a security measure to ensure that the ballot paper has been returned by the elector it was sent to. Data provided by Returning Officers shows that 21,327 of returned postal votes were not included in the count after the required checks on voters' personal identifiers. The percentage of all returned postal votes not included in the count (2.4%) is lower than at the 2016 Scottish Parliament election, where 3.3% of postal votes were not included at the count. Reason for postal votes not included in the count

Postal voting statement unreturned 0.5%	Ballot paper not returned 0.3%
Mismatched signature and date of birth 0.1%	Mismatched date of birth 0.4%
Mismatched signature 0.6%	Missing signature and date of birth 0.3%
Missing date of birth 0.1%	Missing signature 0.2%

While the percentage of postal votes not included in the count continues to fall it remains a matter of concern that some postal votes do not get included in the count because voters do not complete the PVS correctly. The Electoral Commission will continue to work with ROs and EROs to support voter understanding of how to complete and return their postal ballot pack correctly so that it can be counted. The postal vote stationery used by ROs and EROs plays an important role in aiding voter understanding with the application and voting process, and they should continue to review the information they provide to make sure it is as clear and helpful as it can be to voters. EROs successfully encouraged early postal vote applications The Scottish Government legislated to bring forward the deadline for new postal vote applications for this election to 21 working days before the poll, instead of the usual 11 working days. In practice, this meant that the deadline to apply was 6 April 2021 instead of 20 April 2021. The deadline was moved due to concerns that the pandemic may drive a significant increase in postal vote applications for this election. In the event of a surge of postal ballot applications close to the usual deadline for the poll (11 working days before polling day) EROs were concerned about whether they would be able to process the applications in time for the postal votes to be issued. Any delays would have risked postal voters not being able to receive and return their postal ballots in time for them to be counted. The Scottish Government also provided additional funding to EROs to manage any additional demands for processing absent vote applications. Feedback from EROs indicates that the February write out to voters played a key role in encouraging earlier applications both to register to vote and for absent votes, which helped to avoid a peak of applications close to the deadline. Data from EROs indicates that 4,072 applications for postal votes were received between 6 April and 20 April which would have been eligible to be processed for the poll had the deadline not been brought forward. Recommendation 1 Recommendation 1 The February write out to voters by EROs was successful in helping to avoid a late surge in postal vote applications and also had the wider benefit of improving the completeness and accuracy of the electoral register ahead of the election. We therefore support equivalent activity being undertaken ahead of future major polls. This activity was funded by the Scottish Government on this occasion and we expect that it would need to be similarly resourced in future years if EROs are to be able to carry out it out effectively and consistently across Scotland. Voters were still able to vote by proxy if they had to self-isolate All voters were entitled to apply for a proxy vote if they are unable to attend the polling place on polling day. This enabled someone they trust to vote on their behalf. Voters whose situation changed close to the election due to work or disability could appoint an emergency proxy up to 5pm on polling day to vote on their behalf. The Scottish Government extended the eligibility for an emergency proxy vote so that anyone testing positive for COVID-19 close to polling day, or having to self-isolate due to someone close to them testing positive, could apply for an emergency proxy. 9,472 voters had a proxy at this election which counted for 0.2% of all voters. This is a similar level to the 2016 Scottish Parliament election where 9,887 (0.2%) of voters had a proxy in place. 14% of all proxies in 2021 were appointed using the emergency proxy provisions, and 8% of all proxies were for COVID-19 reasons. The provision of an emergency proxy for COVID-19 reasons was therefore an important backstop for ensuring that people were still able to participate in the poll. Some EROs continue to raise concerns that eligibility for emergency proxy does not extend to carers. The practical implication of this is that where a voter has to travel for medical treatment (for example, from the islands to the mainland), they are eligible for an emergency proxy but anyone accompanying them is not.

Recommendation 2 Recommendation 2 Legislation introduced for these elections to allow emergency proxy votes for anyone who tested positive for COVID-19 or had to self-isolate helped to provide a safeguard for anyone whose circumstances changed close to the polls and ensure that they were not prevented from participating. Although the provision was not widely relied upon in practice, it was nevertheless an important safeguard to make sure that no one lost their ability to vote. We recommend that the Scottish Government should ensure this option continues to be available if people are required to self-isolate as part of the public health response to COVID-19. We continue to recommend that the Scottish Government consider ways to extend the provisions for emergency proxy to carers. Voters found it easy to access information on how to take part in the election. The Electoral Commission ran a public awareness campaign ahead of the election which included information on how to register to vote, the safety measures in place for voting in the context of COVID-19 and information on alternative ways of voting for those who did not want to attend the polling station.

This included a voter information booklet sent to all households in the week commencing 22 March 2021. EROs and ROs also ran local voter information campaigns. The Commission also worked with a number of partner organisations including Scottish Care, RNIB, Sight Scotland and Guide Dogs for the Blind to distribute COVID-19 tailored information to those who may be particularly impacted by the pandemic and any changes to the way of voting. Nearly all respondents to our public opinion survey said that it was easy to find information about the election, including: Ease of finding information about the election 85% What the Scottish Parliament is/do 87% How to register to vote 88% How to cast their vote 91% The Electoral community and civil society worked to support newly enfranchised voters to register and vote. The Scottish Elections (Franchise and Representation) Act 2020 extended the franchise for Scottish Parliament and local government elections to include all qualifying foreign nationals (those who are resident in Scotland and have permission to enter or remain in the UK, or who do not need such permission). 16 and 17 year olds had the right to vote extended to them ahead of the 2016 Scottish Parliament election. The Commission ran a new voter registration campaign targeted at the newly or more recently enfranchised. ‘Welcome to your vote’ ran in summer 2020 and again in March 2021, alongside our ‘Got 5?’ registration campaign. The ‘Welcome to your vote’ campaign targeted all potentially eligible Scottish voters, but was more heavily weighted towards known under-registered groups including private renters and those aged under 35. During the campaign period (9 March to 19 April) there were a total of 127,866 applications to register to vote, including 6,913 16-17 year olds and 3,091 qualifying foreign citizens. The foreign nationalities with the most applications were USA, Syria, China and Turkey. Newly enfranchised voters information The Commission worked with a range partners to provide voter information for qualifying foreign nationals The Commission worked with a number of partners to distribute information to qualifying foreign nationals, including consulates, regional equality councils and other organisations that support foreign nationals in Scotland. Working with the Scottish Refugee Council, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and local authority resettlement officers, the Commission developed and promoted a set of political literacy resources for refugee communities. The resources, which were created for professionals and community based groups working with New Scots, were launched at an online event attended by 100 people. The Scottish Refugee Council used the resources to deliver 19 online sessions for New Scots in the lead up to the election. The New Scots community in Scotland is very diverse and the Commission's ability to reach relevant communities is highly dependent on working through partner organisations who provide face to face support for these communities at the grass roots level. However, some community based organisations, representing refugees or other migrant groups, raised concerns with the Commission about the capacity of their organisations to continue to support this area of work without additional resourcing. New processes were put in place to support eligible prisoners to vote The Scottish Elections (Franchise and Representation) Act 2020 also extended the right of prisoners serving a sentence of 12 months or less in a UK prison, who would usually be resident in Scotland, to vote at Scottish Parliament and local government elections. The Commission worked with Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) in Scotland to develop a set of prisoner voter application forms, including registration and absent vote forms which could be distributed by the Scottish Prison Service (SPS). EROs also developed protocols with the SPS to ensure that they received notification where any eligible voters entered the prison system so that they could invite them to register to vote. Voting information for prisoners was also circulated by the SPS through all prisons ahead of the election. In partnership with Citizens Advice Scotland, the Commission also developed a guide for professionals working with prisoners, which was distributed to their network of member bureaux. Data from EROs indicates that 38 eligible prisoners were registered to vote for the Scottish Parliament election in 2021. We understand that COVID-19 had a significant impact on prisons in Scotland, including the turnover of short-term prisoners. However, it is important to ensure that those who have the right to vote are fully aware of their options for registration and voting and that processes are in place to support this. There is a legislative requirement for the Scottish Government to review the arrangements for prisoner voting after the May 2022 local government elections. In the interim, we will work with the Scottish Prison Service and any other relevant partners to explore opportunities to provide political literacy education for prisoners. Efforts to reach young people in school continued despite the pandemic To support young people's engagement in democracy the Commission published a new set of online resources to educate young people about their vote and the democratic process. The tools, designed for use in classrooms and with youth groups across Scotland, aimed to help young people who were voting for the first time. We also provided resources and support for those tasked with teaching political literacy. We worked with our partners to promote and gain feedback on the resources and they were also shared by Education Scotland and the Scottish Parliament Education Service. Working with Education Scotland, the Scottish Parliament Education Service, Association of Directors of Education in Scotland and other education partners, we ran 'Welcome to Your Vote' week in February 2021, to encourage schools to deliver voter registration sessions for their students. The pandemic meant a lack of face-to-face opportunities to engage with new voters directly in schools, community groups or youth clubs and to get their direct feedback on our resources. However, ahead of the election we worked with the Scottish Parliament Education Service, Education Scotland, West of Scotland Education Service and other partners to trial virtual sessions with educators to support them to use the materials in a classroom setting (whether virtual or face-to-face). These sessions were attended by 140 educators in total. Looking ahead we want to build on this work by engaging further with young people and educators across Scotland to identify more themes and topics our resources can address. We plan to expand the reach and impact of our education work ahead of the local government elections in 2022 and Scottish Parliament election in 2026. We will work with education and youth organisations in Scotland to deliver this.

16 and 17 year olds registered to vote and were more likely to report confidence in voting than 18-25 year olds (77,809). 16 and 17 year olds were registered to vote at the election. In general, the 16-17 year old age group reported higher levels of confidence in accessing information about the election than 18-24 year olds. Three-quarters (75%) of 16-17 year olds said that they had enough information on candidates and parties to make an informed decision on who to vote for, compared to 62% of 18-24 year olds. They were also more likely to report finding it easy to participate in the election than 18-24 year olds (80% vs 68%).

ROs took steps to assist disabled voters at the election but further improvements can be made. The Scottish Elections (Reform) Act 2020 places a duty on the Electoral Commission to report on the steps taken by ROs to assist disabled people to vote at the election. To inform our report we asked all Returning Officers to tell us about: provisions within the polling places and for postal voting to support disabled voters; training of polling station staff; outreach work with disability groups; any other steps they took to support disabled voters. We also looked at the views of disabled voters who responded to our public opinion research; evidence gathered by disability organisations; and views from people who had worked at polling stations. Returning Officers provided a range of support for disabled polling station voters and postal voters. Returning Officers are required by law to put in place a range of measures to support disabled voters. These include:

Large print sample ballot papers, both handheld and for display; Tactile template voting device (TVD) for blind and visually impaired voters; Assistance to disabled voters in marking their ballot paper for them where requested (whether by the Presiding Officer or by a companion); large print versions of postal voting pack contents on request; and helpline numbers for postal voters requiring assistance. These provisions are important as they help to ensure a consistent, minimum level of support for disabled voters. However, we have become aware of some issues with how these were delivered in practice, which we will continue to work with individual local authorities to understand and address. For example, one Returning Officer reported being unable to secure large print sample ballot papers due to problems with their print suppliers, and they reported providing magnifying sheets in polling stations instead. Also, there was a notable increase in the number of parties and individual candidates contesting the 2021 Scottish Parliament election in comparison to 2016, which created difficulties for some ROs in supplying a TVD which could accommodate the longer ballot paper. We also heard anecdotal evidence from blind and visually impaired voters about tactile voting devices being sellotaped together to accommodate the longer ballot paper. Our research has also shown us many examples of Returning Officers providing additional support beyond that prescribed in law, such as: magnifying glasses / sheets; induction loops allowing voters to use their own aids.

such as electronic readers or phone magnifying devices training contact centre staff to answer questions about accessibility of voting providing additional seating in polling stations for those with mobility issues Local authorities also reported conducting Equality Impact Assessments ahead of the election to ensure that designated polling places were as accessible as possible. This included ensuring that there was provision for: disabled parking access ramps to the building, where necessary low level ballot booths and ballot boxes Returning Officers reported carrying out training for all staff which included accessibility considerations Returning Officers largely reported using our materials to train their polling staff, including the Polling Station Handbook , and polling station accessibility checklist . They also reported using materials from disability organisations during their training sessions for polling station staff to further enhance their awareness of the needs of disabled voters. This included videos from RNIB and Mencap. Disabled voters were less satisfied with the process of voting than non-disabled voters Respondents to our voter survey who defined themselves as disabled or with a long term health condition were slightly less likely to be satisfied with the process of voting than non-disabled voters with 93% of disabled voters reporting satisfaction, compared to 96% of non-disabled voters. However, disabled voters were more likely to value the assistance from staff in polling places: 83% of disabled voters said they found the help/support from polling station staff useful, compared with 77% of non-disabled voters. Disabled voters also reported finding it easy to get inside their polling station to vote (97%), including 70% who said it was very easy. 3% of in person voters said it was difficult. However, disabled people were less likely to have said that it was easy to vote by post and complete their ballot paper. 87% of disabled voters said it was easy to complete and return their postal vote, whereas 97% of non-disabled voters said it was easy. The proportion of disabled voters who found it easy to find their chosen party/candidate on the regional ballot was lower than amongst non-disabled voters (89% vs 94%). These findings were supported by organisations representing disabled people who found that some of their members and service users experienced particular challenges in relation to the accessibility of the voting process. They reported feedback from disabled voters about polling staff being unaware of the measures that should have been in place to support disabled voters.

When I arrived, they had no idea where the template was and had to go round the whole hall to find one. Then when I was assisted by one of the staff in the booth she told me she had never used them before so she would have to have a look and see how to do it. I asked them if they had the tactile voting device and the large print ballot paper, it took them ages to find it and when they came back they could only find the tactile voting device and couldn't find the large print ballot paper. They also had never used the tactile voting device before so they weren't sure how to set it up properly so they ended up having to mark my ballot for me meaning I couldn't actually vote in private. ROs have reported facing challenges in recruiting experienced polling station staff in the specific circumstances of this election, and it is possible that these challenges impacted on the level of customer service that some disabled voters experienced. Both the Scottish and UK Governments are considering options for improving accessibility at elections, including utilising new technologies. However, well trained and customer focused polling staff continue to be the key to supporting disabled people to vote confidently and independently.

Recommendation 3 Recommendation 3 Ahead of the 2022 council elections, the Electoral Management Board (EMB) should work with the electoral community and disability organisations to strengthen accessibility training for polling staff. This includes learning from and sharing the good practice of ROs who took additional steps to support disabled voters, above those prescribed in law. The Electoral Commission will continue to provide guidance and resources to support this area of work. We will report on progress after the 2022 Scottish council elections. Campaigning at the elections s had confidence that the election was well run but many felt restricted in their ability to campaign as a result of Covid-19 s were still able to communicate with voters face-to-face, online and through printed material, even though restrictions remained in place during the campaign. Voters reported that they had enough information to decide who to vote for. s largely understood and were able to comply with the new rules for imprints on digital campaign material. However, further measures need to be put in place to compel information from digital platforms in the event of campaigners' non-compliance with the rules. Overview Ahead of the election, the Scottish Government worked with the electoral community and political parties to agree the framework for the Scottish General Election (Coronavirus) Act 2021, taking account of the agreed objectives for well-run elections in the current public health context. This included a series of roundtable meetings involving Ministers, representatives of other political parties in the Scottish Parliament, the Electoral Commission, EMB for Scotland and the Scottish Assessors Association. This collaborative approach ensured that, in the main, there was cross party support for the measures in the Act. In March 2021, the Scottish Government published guidance for campaigners on the public health restrictions in place which would restrict aspects of campaigning, including leafletting and door-to-door canvassing. The approach in the guidance was developed in consultation with the political parties represented in the Scottish Parliament. This guidance was updated during the campaign to reflect the relaxation of public health restrictions. In line with public health guidance, leafletting was able to commence on 15 March and face to face canvassing from 12 April. Parties and candidates did not appear to be deterred from participating in the poll A total of 357 candidates stood for election in the 73 Scottish Parliament constituencies, an average of 4.9 per seat. The number of constituency candidates represents an increase from the 313 candidates who stood in 2016. Constituency candidates at Scotland Parliament elections 1999 338 2003 406 2007 334 2011 321 2016 313 2021 357 The 2021 election saw an increase in the number of parties and independent (non-party) candidates standing in constituencies. 16 parties stood candidates in the constituencies compared with 10 in 2016. Similarly the number of independent candidates standing in constituencies rose from seven in 2016 to 15 in 2021. A total of 24 parties and 12 individual candidates stood for the 56 seats across the eight electoral regions. The number of parties was up from the regional total of 16 in 2016. Changes to nomination processes to minimise public health risks were welcomed and candidates agreed the process was well-run In order to appear on the ballot paper at an election, candidates and parties must submit nomination forms to the relevant Constituency Returning Officer (or Regional Returning Officer) at the election. While the law still required completed nomination forms to be submitted by hand, these changes were made elsewhere in the process to minimise risks to those involved: candidate and agent briefings were often held using video conferencing informal checking of nomination forms prior to submission was more frequently offered using email arrangements for the safe hand delivery of nomination forms ensuring physical distancing measures were in place Nine in 10 candidates (90%) who responded to our survey agreed that the nominations process was well-run. Having the option of sending nomination papers electronically for checking first was a great help prior to lodging the papers. Most of our candidates took the option of electronic payment of the deposit which also helped the process go as smoothly as it could". Electoral administrator Returning Officers used digital platforms to run briefing events for candidates and agents ahead of the poll. Feedback from Returning Officers indicates that these online sessions were better utilised than the 'traditional' face to face meetings which are normally offered at elections. Some had confidence that the election was well run but many felt restricted in their ability to campaign as a result of Covid-19. Nearly nine in 10 (88%) of respondents to our candidate survey were confident that the election was well-run. However, some candidates reported that they felt restricted in their ability to campaign as a result of Covid-19 and the public health restrictions on campaigning which were in place until 12 April. While 43% of respondents agreed that they were able to get their message across to voters, the same proportion disagreed. Those who disagreed were most likely to cite Covid-19 as the reason. Our research showed that: over four in five (86%) of candidates said that the reduced opportunities for face to face campaigning as a result of the pandemic affected their campaigning 'a lot' concerns for the health of others involved (e.g. family, volunteers, and voters) was more likely to impact campaigning than personal health concerns. 55% of candidates said that concerns for the health of others affected their campaign a lot, compared to just 25% who said concerns for their own health impacted it a lot I feel like we missed out on the opportunity to hear from the public - it took a bit of creativity for me to campaign well and get my message across but it was do-able. I missed out on hearing directly from voters though. The restrictions severely hampered our ability to have face to face dialogue with voters, not just door to door but street stalls and invited events. The lack of clarity around the changing of rules compared to those in society at large and timeline for loosening restrictions made it difficult to plan campaign activities. Most voters felt that they had enough information on campaigners to decide who to vote for. Over three-quarters of people (76%) agreed they had enough information on candidates/parties to make an informed decision on who to vote for. However, this was slightly down from the 80% who agreed with this statement following the 2016 Scottish Parliament election. People reported that the most common way of them seeing information on parties or candidates were via printed material (leaflet or flyer). The most commonly reported sources of information were: Sources of information On a leaflet or flyer, either from a candidate/political party (57%) Party leaders debate on TV (29%) In newspapers (26%) On news websites (22%) On social media (19%) Posters or billboards (19%) By word of mouth (19%) Four in five people (84%) recalled receiving a leaflet from a candidate/party at their home in the run up to the election. The 2021 Scottish elections were the first time that digital imprints rules applied for any UK election. The 2021 Scottish elections saw the introduction of a requirement for imprints on digital campaign material for the first time in any election in the UK. An imprint includes details showing who has produced and paid for the material. The new rules apply at both Scottish Parliament and council elections. They build on the approach adopted during the Scottish independence referendum in 2014, and the rules set out in the Referendums (Scotland) Act 2020. The rules apply to all material that promotes electoral success of a candidate, group of candidates, party or parties, whether it is paid for or not. The rules contain 'personal opinion' exemptions so as not to capture the general public under the regime. As this was the first election at which the rules applied – and the rules were introduced very shortly before the poll, limiting opportunities to promote awareness of them – it is too early to reach any firm conclusions on how successful they were. This is particularly the case in regard to ascertaining the usefulness of the rules in tracking digital campaign spending as spending returns are not due for all campaigners until November this year. However, we have set out some initial findings below. Digital Campaigning and Imprints information Our monitoring found that campaigners engaged with the new digital imprint rules across multiple platforms with different approaches Ahead of and during the campaign period, the Electoral Commission provided advice and guidance to campaigners on the digital imprint rules, to support them to comply. During the campaign period, we monitored how campaigners included imprints on their digital campaign materials. We found that different kinds of approaches were used by candidates, political parties and non-party campaigners across different kinds of platforms and social media in order to comply with the regime. The different approaches were often determined by the platform they were using to promote their message. The success of these different approaches proved that it is possible and campaigners can find a variety of methods to include an accessible explanation of who they are on digital campaign materials. Most people noticed who digital material was promoted for, but not necessarily who was promoting it Following the 2021 Scottish Parliament election, we asked voters about their experiences of digital campaign material. Seven in 10 (71%) respondents to our public opinion research agreed that it is important for them to know who has produced the political information they see online and three in five (60%) agreed they would trust digital campaigning material more if they knew who produced it. Nearly three in five (56%) respondents said that they noticed who the material was being promoted for (the candidate or party) on the digital campaign material they saw in the run up to the Scottish Parliament election. However, only a third (34%) said that they noticed the promoter (the person/group/organisation which arranges for the advert to appear). 16-34 year olds were significantly more likely than those aged 35-54 and 55+ to have said that they noticed the promoter (52% vs. 31% and 24%, respectively) of election campaign materials and who it was being promoted for (63% vs. 54% and 52%, respectively). Most candidates and parties understood and complied with the new rules Nearly nine in 10 (87%) of respondents to our candidate survey said that they understood the requirement to include imprints on digital campaign materials and 76% agreed that it was easy to meet the requirement. Nearly three-quarters (72%) agreed that digital imprints would improve the transparency of digital campaigning. Our monitoring found that most political parties, candidates and campaigners complied with the rules and were able to add an imprint to their campaign material on different digital platforms. Where we found evidence of non-compliance amongst parties and their candidates we were able to contact the political party and ask them to come into compliance. However, there were a number of non-party campaigners who did not include an imprint on their digital material. As with the imprint rules on printed materials, it is often difficult to trace the source of some of this material and contact those responsible. We engaged with digital platforms around the new rules Ahead of the campaign period, the Commission met with representatives of the major social media companies and digital platforms. None of the platforms made adaptations in light of the new rules, and said they felt campaigners could include imprints within existing functionality for sharing content or placing adverts. It was difficult to identify and contact some campaigners We also asked the platforms if they were able to assist us in contacting campaigners or advertisers whose material did not include an imprint. They told us that they could only assist with contacting platform users if we were formally investigating. This has highlighted the gap in the rules that there aren't any informal routes for us to obtain information should we need to look into non-compliance without taking the step of opening a formal investigation. There are two different methods that could provide useful ways to address this gap. The Scottish Parliament has legislated for a power for the Commission to obtain information for compliance and regulatory purposes in the Referendums (Scotland) Act 2020. The UK Government, as part of its Elections Bill, has also considered this gap. It has proposed a duty for people and companies to provide us with information to look into compliance issues with the digital imprints regime. Recommendation 4 The Scottish Government should ensure that the digital imprint legislation for Scottish Parliament and local government elections includes a power for the Electoral Commission to obtain information from social media companies. This will enable us to support compliance with the rules. Regulators strengthened collaboration during the election period Following recent elections in the UK, concerns have been raised by politicians and civil society groups about how easy it is for voters to assess the veracity of any campaign arguments they see online. For the May 2021 elections, we worked with our regulator partners (including the Information Commissioner's Office and the Office for Statistics Regulation) to run a UK-wide online public awareness campaign and encourage voters to find more information from a new section of our website. The campaign aimed to encourage people to think more carefully about political campaign adverts they see online, and it provided information about which regulators or other organisations they could contact if they had concerns. Evaluation of the campaign showed that over 7.6 million people saw our adverts on websites and social media platforms. The number of people who clicked through to find more information from the adverts was encouraging, and provides a good foundation for further awareness-raising activity at future elections. A group of representatives from six regulators met regularly throughout the election period to share issues. This initiative built on a regulators' forum that we have coordinated since 2016. Regular discussions during the campaign period allowed the regulators to develop a greater understanding of their roles in helping to support public confidence in elections. We will continue to work with other regulators during election periods to strengthen this type of collaboration for future polls. The Commission processed a high volume of applications for party names and identifiers ahead of the poll The Electoral Commission has a key statutory role for registering political parties in the UK. Political parties must register party identifiers with the Commission for use on ballot papers. These are names, descriptions, and emblems. The rules are in place to help make ballot papers clear and easy to use. It's important that voters can look at the ballot paper and cast their vote with confidence. Parties applying to be registered on the GB register of political parties also select which parts of GB they want to be registered to contest elections in. Parties can choose all or any combination of England, Scotland, and Wales. There is a separate register for parties in Northern Ireland. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) sets out criteria that applicant parties or new party identifiers must meet in order to be placed on the register of political parties. Where an application meets those tests, the Commission must register the party and their identifiers. All applications to register new party descriptions are subject to assessments against the criteria set out in law, with all proposed identifiers put on our website for public comment. To allow time for this assessment process, in October 2020 we advised all parties that we would guarantee a decision in time for the elections on applications to change their details or descriptions, provided these were properly submitted to us by 31 January 2021. Applications were assessed on a 'first come' basis. The Commission's party registration processes ensured that decisions were taken fairly and properly Some political parties contesting the Scottish Parliament election applied for new party descriptions after 31 January, leaving in some instances insufficient time for us to process and take a decision on their applications before the close of nominations. One party challenged this by means of a judicial review. The courts dismissed the challenge. The Commission will continue to work with parties to ensure they are aware of the process and the timescales involved in applications for new party identity marks. The Commission applied the legal tests for party identifiers Following the election some voters in Scotland raised concerns about the inclusion on the ballot paper of an emblem prominently using the word ‘green’ that was not for the Scottish Green Party. A small number expressed concern that they had been confused by another party using this word in its identifiers. There is a legal test related to the likelihood of a voter confusing the emblem for one party with another party. The law requires the Commission to refuse an emblem if in our opinion it is likely such confusion would result. The legal test rests on whether confusion is ‘likely’, which is a higher threshold than it being ‘possible’. We remain satisfied that the emblem was not likely to confuse as a result of the prominent inclusion of the word ‘green’, as otherwise it was significantly visually distinct from the emblem of any other party. The concerns raised about this emblem also questioned whether the emblem accurately reflected the party’s policies. This is not a legal criterion for approval of an emblem. Delivering the elections This poll was well-run, notwithstanding the significant challenges presented by the pandemic, including the difficulties for Returning Officers and electoral administrators to find and train staff to work on polling day. The experience of this poll has again highlighted concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures, which are coupled with the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We will work in partnership with the EMB, the wider electoral community, Scottish Government and local authorities to develop and deliver proposals to support resilient electoral services for future elections. Electoral administrators delivered a well-run poll despite the uncertainty While the Scottish General Election (Coronavirus) Act was not passed until 23 December 2020, discussions around the measures in the Bill had been ongoing with the electoral community since the summer of 2020. This helped to ensure that Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers were aware of the likely changes to processes for the election in advance of the legislation being made. The Act did contain a provision for the poll to be postponed at relatively short notice in the event of adverse changes to the public health context. While this was an understandable precaution in the circumstances, it did impact on electoral administrators. Over four-fifths (83%) of electoral administrators responding to our survey said that uncertainty about whether the elections would go ahead made it difficult to plan for the poll. Nearly nine in 10 people in Scotland (85%) said that they were confident the election was well-run. Less than one in 10 said they were not confident (7%). The significant majority of voters (95%) said that they were satisfied with the process for voting, with 61% saying they were very satisfied. The vast majority of candidates that responded to our survey (88%) said the elections were well-run and a similar proportion (87%) were satisfied with the Covid-19 measures in the polling places. Electoral administrators faced particular challenges at this election because of Covid-19 It is clear that Covid-19 caused problems for electoral administrators, increasing their workload, causing uncertainty, and creating challenges with recruiting sufficient numbers of polling staff. Without doubt this was the most challenging election I have ever been involved in. The amount of additional work required to conduct the poll safely should not be underestimated and the fact that the polls seem to have gone ahead without incident across the UK is testament to the amount of hard work and effort put in by election teams.” When asked how Covid-19 restrictions had impacted on their work: All respondents (100%) said that the restrictions had made their job more difficult and that their workload had increased because of the restrictions during this election.

Just under half (42%) said that they were concerned for their own health because of Covid-19 COVID had a massive impact on polling place preparation in terms of risk and space assessing, provision of PPE, screens etc. and deep cleaning/water testing of premises which hadn't been used over the past 14 months or so. The initial uncertainty delayed planning at the outset, which was theoretical for a while before it turned into practice. Electoral administrators faced particular challenges at this election because of Covid-19 Electoral administrators struggled to recruit experienced polling station staff Three-quarters (75%) of respondents to our electoral administrators' survey reported difficulties in recruiting polling station staff for the election. With levels of lock down still in place, many staff wished to follow government advice and 'stay at home' so recruiting polling staff was difficult, leading to a hugely inexperienced cohort of staff manning polling stations. Even once polling station staff had been appointed, administrators told us that there were high levels of drop out due to Covid-19 which had to be managed at short notice. While there were no issues initially with staff recruitment we had high number of call offs than normal in some cases due to staff being required to self-isolate and making sure we had sufficient reserves to cover these was challenging. Polling station staff appointments had approximately a 25% turnover with people shielding or not comfortable to work.” We asked administrators whether they had sought to recruit poll staff from new areas in order to supplement their usual pool of staff. Half (50%) of those who responded on this question said that they had used the Civil Service, 30% had used local students and one-fifth (20%) had approached private companies. Administrators also told us that they had made use of furloughed council leisure staff and exam invigilators. In this challenging context Returning Officers worked to appoint additional staff to manage the additional impacts of Covid-19 We had very few issues on polling day. The additional polling clerk (COVID marshal) role worked well. We increased our numbers of polling station inspectors and had polling information officers and COVID marshalls deployed for multiple polling stations. Having polling information officers and polling marshals for multiple polling stations were good and a way forward if budget allows. Where Commission representatives observed polling places with the additional ‘information officer’ staff in place, we found it worked well for voters by improving the flow of voters through the polling station and also helped to identify any voters with additional support needs who could then be offered tailored support for their journey through the polling place. Elections teams updated their count procedures to maintain transparency while minimising risks for count staff and candidates Returning Officers put in place new ways of providing transparency and enabling scrutiny of count processes Overall, electoral administrators in Scotland seemed to have less difficulties in preparing for the count than they did in setting up polling stations: Only 17% of administrators responding to our survey said they had difficulties recruiting count staff. This is far less than the 75% who had difficulties in recruiting polling staff. The impact of Covid-19, and the resultant public health advice around physical distancing, created challenges for administrators in enabling the same level of access to the count for candidate and party counting agents as at previous elections. Half (50%) of administrators who answered our survey either strongly agreed or agreed that the Covid-19 restrictions made it difficult for candidates and agents to observe at the count. There was some negative feedback about agents and press limitations on numbers attending, whilst it was accepted as necessary was not welcomed in terms of their experience of the process. As a result of COVID the number of attendees at our count venue was greatly reduced but we were still able to accommodate parties in terms of counting agents and to allow some sampling. Candidates and agents, whilst acknowledging COVID was an issue, continued to want things to be done as they always had been. This was particularly evident with the numbers who were permitted (due to COVID and the size of the building) to attend. We had some robust challenges to our numbers. The majority of candidates that responded to our survey (80%) told us they were satisfied with the efficiency of the count and verification processes. A similar proportion (81%) told us that staff made it clear what was happening at all stages of the count. However, candidates were less satisfied with their ability to observe and scrutinise the count with just over half (52%) agreeing that it was possible to do so effectively (and 39% of candidate respondents disagreed with this statement). Very difficult to observe effectively due to distancing, especially at sorting stage when there was almost no chance of seeing whether the ballots were going into the correct piles/boxes. Covid measures included one direction path around the counting tables, but over an entire gym hall this meant it was impossible to move back to see and sample other ballot boxes being opened from neighbouring tables processing relevant polling stations. To do so meant walking all the way around the perimeter of the hall, by which time it would be too late. The distance of the screens from the table, combined with use of pencil made ballot papers mostly impossible to see at a distance. Most people witnessing the count gave up trying to see ballots. The process was not always clear and consistent with some officers using trays and others not. Electoral Commission representatives observing at counts saw examples of the use of large screens and technology for the adjudication of doubtful ballots. This generally involved projecting images of the ballots in question on to large screens so that candidates were able to see the doubtful ballot papers and have the opportunity to challenge the Returning Officer on their adjudication decision. Recommendation 5 Candidate and agent confidence in an election result is dependent on a transparent count. All aspects of the verification and count should be carried out in clear view of all those entitled to attend. Sufficient numbers of counting agents need be allocated to effectively scrutinise the process. The arrangements for the counts at this election were exceptional due to the impact of Covid-19. The EMB has been working to improve the consistency of arrangements for transparent counts across Scotland, including the allocation of counting agents, and this work should continue ahead of future polls. The electoral community should also consider what learning can be taken from the counts at this poll, including any to build on the use of technology at counts to improve scrutiny for future polls, and continue to ensure transparency for those entitled to attend in-person. Pressure on electoral administration capacity is building (not related to Covid-19) Electoral administrators continue to be dependent on a small marketplace of expert suppliers of electoral management software and specialist election print services. Although many electoral administrators were satisfied with the support provided by their suppliers, others experienced problems. For example, there were some instances of delays to supplier delivery of materials, with some Returning Officers not getting the ballot papers they expected and needed on time, and some not delivered until very close to polling day. As well as introducing additional risk by reducing the time available to deal with any issues with delivered material before the opening of polls, the delays meant that administrators needed to invest significant time and energy into managing issues with their printers at a crucial time in the election timetable. While the supplier delays had some impact on the despatch of postal vote packs to voters in some areas, the impact on the polls as a whole should polling station papers not have been produced and delivered on time would have been significant. This illustrates the very real risk to the effective delivery of future polls as a result of the continued reliance of administrators on such a limited number of specialist suppliers of electoral services.

We have repeatedly highlighted concerns about the resilience and capacity of electoral administration structures in the UK, which are coupled with the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We will work in partnership with the electoral community, governments, and local authorities to develop and deliver proposals to support resilient electoral services for the future. The EMB for Scotland has begun planning to mitigate supplier capacity risks ahead of the 2022 local government elections. This is a particularly important piece of work as the e-counting of the elections will see a single supplier tasked with the printing of all local authority ballot papers. Through the Electoral Advisory and Coordination Board, which includes the EMB, senior Returning Officers, electoral administration professional bodies and officials from all governments, we will establish a programme of activity to gather evidence about the challenges facing electoral administration teams and identify solutions to address them. The EMB continues to support consistency and improvement

The EMB for Scotland has now been provided for in statute for 10 years for local government elections, and has more recently – as a result of the Scottish Elections (Reform) Act 2020 – had its remit extended to Scottish Parliament elections. This statutory basis enables the Convener of the EMB to issue directions to Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers in respect of their duties in the delivery of a Scottish Parliament election. Directions issued by the Convener at the 2021 election included: colour of ballot paper date of dispatch of poll cards and postal votes count timing numbers of voters allocated to polling stations

The first set of directions were issued on 21 December 2020 and additional directions were issued on 3 February. In general, most respondents to our electoral administrator survey welcomed the support of the EMB. The directions from the EMB convener were helpful as they introduced consistency across the country. On a positive note the EMB in Scotland was incredibly helpful, supportive and forthcoming with proactive information. Directions are helpful and provide consistency, but also the pre-consultation on the directions help so that you had insight on what is coming.

Recommendation 7

The EMB should now consider how to develop its capacity to offer further support to the electoral administration community in Scotland. This should include considering resourcing and legal status in respect to overseeing contracts, such as for the e-counting contract for local government elections. This will help to ensure that all aspects of the delivery of the polls remain under the control and oversight of independent electoral officers who are accountable for the delivery of the elections. The Electoral Commission and Scottish Government should work with the EMB to support its development and to ensure effective alignment of responsibilities and activities across the different organisations.

The group discussed the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) which will be live in 2018. The ICO noted that their website has a '12 steps to get ready' guidance document and also a microsite with more information. Action: Commission to send a link to the PPP with details of the microsite and the guidance document. The group also discussed that it would be useful for another meeting with the ICO to take place at the September 2017 PPP meeting in preparedness for 2018. Action: Commission to organise meeting. Minutes, and actions of the meeting and matters arising (ECPPP 06/09/2016) The minutes from 06/09/2016 were agreed. It was noted that the Commission's Head of Guidance was not at this PPP meeting to discuss Commission guidance. BP noted that the role was vacant but that hopefully a new Head of Guidance will be in place for the next meeting. BP also gave apologies on behalf of the Chief Executive who could not attend this PPP meeting Assessment process for party descriptions BP referred to the Commission Update Report and that the Commission has been considering how candidates standing for a party are described on election ballot papers and that it should be clear to voters which party the candidate represents. BP noted that in recent years there had been an increasing trend where smaller parties were registering descriptions and it was not clear who the party was. BP informed the group that there was little chance that the UK Government would have parliamentary time to make legislative changes to the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act 2000. This is why the Commission is considering implementing a proposed clarification of the definition of a 'party description' subject to the Electoral Commission Board approving the approach at its February 2017 meeting. Any changes would come into effect after the May 2017 polls. SM commented that regarding the Scottish Parliamentary elections ballot papers, a process took place following the Gould Report, which has meant that the party name has to appear on Scottish Parliamentary elections papers. SM added that an approach may be to look at ballot paper legislation and that it's more likely that the UK Government could find time for a change to secondary legislation rather than primary legislation. DB sought clarification that if the party has to be identifiable from a description, the Welsh version would also be included. BP confirmed that was correct and also noted that for local government and UK parliament constituency elections in Scotland, the party name does not have to appear on ballot papers. BP reminded the group that the Commission would communicate any changes after its Board meeting in February. PEF Online redevelopment plans BP informed the group that funding had been identified to do scoping work on improvements to PEF Online. The redevelopment should be done hand-in-hand with the main users and that all members of the PPP had a chance to influence the redevelopment of PEF Online. BP also informed the group that there was an opportunity for members of the PPP to be 'super users' and to be a part of the Commission's project board overseeing the redevelopment. It was agreed that SM and DB would act as 'super users' on behalf of the PPP. Commission structural changes update BP explained the make-up of the Commission's 'Party Finance Regulation' (PFR) department and its 'Electoral Administration and Guidance' (EAG) department. BP noted that this included an important change bringing all of its guidance functions into one team. BP noted that changes to the organisational charts on the Commission's website should be made early in the New Year. Commission update report BP noted that regarding item 6 – 'Regulations and Codes of Practice' the Commission would be making some proposals that would be consulted on to the PPP represented parties to enable welcome suggestions to ensure workability. BP singled out the standardisation of accounts where spending and / or expenditure is over £250,000 would be subject to regulations. Members of the PPP raised the issue that in one year an accounting unit may have exceeded that income, for example via a legacy, but then may not ever again exceed that threshold. BP noted that it is possible that the regulations could have some flexibility to them to take into account specific factors relevant for one set of accounts. AS asked if the Commission had had any contact with the Charity Commission who have a process for volunteers to help them meet legal requirements. BP said he would check whether the Commission had liaised with the Charity Commission. BP also noted that the Commission would in 2017 consult PPP represented parties with more details regarding the standardisation of accounts. BP noted that regarding item 7 – 'Principles for the political finance framework' that the Commission was building on the work done in 2011 by the Committee on Standards in Public. This item was just to keep the PPP informed. AOB BP raised the issue of Policy Development Grant (PDG) audits. BP said that whilst the Commission was prepared to conduct audits for the 2016 / 17 allocation, from 2017 / 18, parties would be responsible for conducting their own audits of their PDG spending, through their appointed external accountants / auditors. The parties did have an option to do this for 2016 / 17 if they chose. DA asked if this could be done as part of the changes to Statement of Accounts which need to be audited if they have income / expenditure over £250,000. AS asked if the audits had to be done for the financial year or for the calendar year. BP said that timing for when the audits need to be conducted was driven by the secondary legislation, so it was an issue for the Cabinet Office. Accordingly, it may therefore be possible that a change could align the PDG audit with the Statement of Accounts audits. BP said that the Commission would write to the PPP represented parties with more information about PDG audits. JS asked about an Ofcom consultation proposing to remove the description of 'larger parties'. CW confirmed that the Commission had not yet responded to the consultation. Action: KA to send a copy of Commission response to the Ofcom consultation and share Ofcom contact so members of the PPP can send their own submission if they choose too. Looking ahead to 2022/23 You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2021/22 On this page Summary The Commission's objectives for 2022/23 – 2026/27 Three key factors will help us achieve our objectives: Looking ahead First published: 20 July 2022 Last updated: 1 August 2022 Summary Looking forward to 2022/23 our focus will be on beginning to deliver on the ambitions in our new corporate plan. Our Corporate Plan 2022/23 – 2026/27 , which we laid in the UK Parliament and Scottish Parliament in April 2022, and the related Corporate Plan for Wales, establish our strategic objectives for the period. The Commission's objectives for 2022/23 – 2026/27 1. Accessible registration and voting We will work to ensure: increased levels of voter registration, especially amongst groups that currently have difficulty engaging in the process; the removal of barriers, especially those that affect people who currently have difficulty trying to cast their vote. 2. Transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance We will work to ensure: increased levels of confidence shown by candidates, parties and other campaigners in their ability to understand, apply and comply with the law on campaigning and political finance; high levels of compliance with registration, reporting and other political finance laws. 3. Resilient local electoral services We will work to ensure: sustained and consistent high performance in the delivery of well-run elections; increased levels of confidence shown by electoral administrators in the resilience of the electoral system 4. Fair and effective electoral law We will work to: support governments and parliaments to reform electoral law to make it less complex; reduce the risks and inefficiencies associated with electoral law which impact our electoral system. 5. A modern and sustainable electoral system We will work to ensure: data and technology are harnessed to meet the needs of voters, campaigners and electoral administrators; the changing risks to the election system from the misuse of data and technology are understood and acted upon; strong relationships and streamlined working practices with all bodies that are part of the electoral system are developed; governments and the wider electoral community are supported to adopt a strategy and implementation plan which reduces the environmental impact of our electoral system. Three key factors will help us achieve our objectives: 1. We demonstrate independence and integrity We will continue to demonstrate how we fulfil this by: taking decisions on the evidence and being transparent about the reasons for them; basing our policy positions and recommendations on analysis of evidence; effectively communicating our work and views; providing responsive services to those we support; maintaining effective governance arrangements 2. We are a skilled organisation where diversity is valued We will: implement refreshed working practices to reflect wider changes in our work environment and culture; attract, retain and develop the people we need; maintain and improve high standards of management, with a focus on developing our people; further embed equality, diversity and inclusion in all aspects of our work 3. We are a learning organisation where improvement is continuous and resources are used effectively We will: procure and implement value for money technology that improves service delivery as appropriate; maintain a sound prudent financial strategy; continue to develop techniques to learn from experience, seek continuous improvement and become more efficient and effective; develop a corporate environmental strategy that meets policy and legislative requirements. Looking ahead For 2022/23, we highlight the following key risks, challenges and opportunities: Our immediate priority is the delivery of the May 2022 polls, including the Northern Ireland assembly elections and early voting pilots in Wales. We will report on the conduct of the elections in the autumn of 2022. The UK Government's Elections Bill received Royal Assent on 28 April 2022, making wide-ranging changes to how elections are run, the way people vote, campaigning, and political spending and funding. This initiates a substantial programme of work for across our functions. We will work closely with the UK government, electoral administrators and other stakeholders in developing and delivering our implementation plans. Timescales for implementing the required changes will be set by the UK government and are likely to be challenging for both for us and for the wider electoral community. We are working to ensure the risks are understood and to do what we can to mitigate them, with dedicated resources, specific project, and risk management in place to support the successful delivery of our own activity. We have ambitious plans for investing in technology, upgrading our infrastructure and delivering the new Political Finance Online system to the first users. Updating our internal infrastructure will be a key priority for the first part of year, improving efficient working practices and providing a solid basis to set a new digital strategy consistent with our ambitions for the Commission and modern elections. Refreshing our working practices and culture. Priorities for 2022/23 will include substantially developing our approach to diversity and inclusion, upgrading our learning and development, and improving recruitment and induction processes. To support our financial strategy and deliver value for money we also plan to improve financial forecasting and budgeting. Cabinet Office consultation: The Wales Act 2017 (Consequential and Saving Provisions) Regulations 2018 | Electoral Commission Search Cabinet

Office consultation: The Wales Act 2017 (Consequential and Saving Provisions) Regulations 2018 You are in the Our responses to consultations section Home Our responses to consultations On this page Introduction Digital Service Police and Crime Commissioner (PCC) elections Welsh Assembly Elections First published: 1 February 2018 Last updated: 19 August 2018 Introduction The Electoral Commission has been formally consulted on the above draft regulations that the Cabinet Office proposes to make under powers in the Wales Act 2017. We understand that proposed regulations will make consequential amendments and saving provision in respect of certain pieces of electoral legislation. These provisions are required as a result of the provisions in the Wales Act (sections 3 and Schedule 1 and 2, and sections 5 to 8 of the Act) that devolve powers in relation to Welsh Assembly and local government elections in Wales, and in particular the devolution of the franchise for local government elections and the registration of electors for local government in Wales. The Welsh Language Legislation Advisory Group has been asked to respond separately on the Welsh language aspects of the proposed draft regulations. The Commission's response to each of the areas covered in the regulations is set out below.

Digital Service We have no comments to make on the amendments that are proposed to regulation 26 of the Representation of the People Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/341) (applications for registration) to make consequential provision in connection with the reservation of the digital service.

Police and Crime Commissioner (PCC) elections We understand the reasons for changing the way the PCC franchise is expressed, as a consequence of the devolution of the franchise for local government elections in Wales. We feel, however, that the proposed definition of the "register of electors" at a PCC election in Wales is too lengthy and complicated and thought should be given to making it more easily understandable and to avoid confusion by electoral administrators.

Welsh Assembly Elections We are pleased that the proposed draft regulations provide clarity that the existing National Assembly for Wales (Representation of the People) Order 2007 that sets out the rules for the conduct of the Welsh Assembly Elections will continue to be in force after the provisions of the Wales Act take effect. We note that this is with the exception of provisions for the combination of polls at Welsh Assembly and local government elections in Wales, as the combination of an ordinary local government election and an ordinary general election of members of the National Assembly for Wales will be reserved under changes made by the Wales Act.

Inclusion Scotland - Update on Access to Politics Charter EY provided an overview of the Access to Politics Charter that was launched at the Scottish Parliament on 14 June 2018 and was signed up to by leaders and representatives of all five of the political parties represented in the Scottish Parliament. Following the launch, Inclusion Scotland wrote to the five parties seeking information on what practical steps they had undertaken to take forward the 8 commitments contained in the Charter which aim to address barriers that prevent disabled persons actively participating in politics – including standing for election. EY provided an update on progress to date. Overall, the results were positive with each party engaging with the Charter and taking steps to recognise and improve their policies and practices for disabled members. Whilst recognising the good work undertaken to date, EY stressed that more could be done and offered to work with political parties and others to push for more representation and involvement from the disabled community. Minutes of 8 February 2019 The minutes from the previous meeting were approved. There were no actions arising from the meeting. European Parliamentary Elections The PPP discussed the delivery of the European Parliamentary Elections (EPEs) in Scotland. The following issues were raised: Need for consistent timings on issue of key information to candidates and agents; Issues around the experience of EU citizens in trying to vote in the UK; Need for making key forms available online in editable formats; Possible voter confusions arising from national elections and local by elections occurring in the same timeframe; Issues around how overseas electors cast their votes; Inability of count agents to undertake sampling when ballot papers are faced down. Perceived lack of facilities for parties during the count collation process in Edinburgh. Police arrangements for dealing with issues during the poll and tone of advice on candidate and campaigner safety; Need for closer liaison between Police and party central offices in the run up to, and during, electoral events; Impact of lower campaign spending limits in Scotland; Need to consider arrangements for publicising location of polling places on a national basis.

Noted. Electoral Management Board (EMB) update CH advised that the Regional Returning Officer (RRO) for the Scotland Electoral Region, Kenneth Lawrie of Falkirk Council, had overall responsibility for the delivery of the EPEs, assisted by local ROs across Scotland. The EMB took on a coordinating role and assisted the RRO to deliver the poll and collate the result. CH provided an overview of the role played by the EMB during the elections. Overall the EPEs were delivered successfully but there are always learning points. The short timeframe of the EPEs provided particular problems around staffing. The EMB continues to be aware of the need to strengthen the resilience of the electoral community in Scotland e.g. through mentoring of Returning officers. CH advised the EMB intended to hold a post event review in early July where lessons for future events will be discussed. He agreed to raise the issues discussed under the previous item of business as appropriate. Police Scotland update POC provided the PPP with an overview of the arrangements put in place by Police Scotland during the European Parliamentary elections to co-ordinate responses to any issues around disorder or electoral integrity across Scotland. In particular he highlighted the role of the Divisional SPOCs in liaising with Returning Officers and their teams.

Police Scotland also work closely with the EMB and the Electoral Commission to ensure that SPOCs are trained in their specific roles. The PPP discussed the need for clarity on how party activists and others could timeously report issues of concern to the Police during elections and the response they should reasonably expect from Police Scotland. Noted. Scottish Government update MMcC and RW provided the PPP with progress reports in respect of (i) the forthcoming Franchise and Electoral Reform Bills; (ii) preparations for canvass reform in Scotland; (iii) ballot order testing to be undertaken by The Electoral Commission; and (iv) the Referendums (Scotland) Bill. It was agreed that the PPP be kept informed of future developments in these areas as appropriate. Scotland Office update MMcK advised that the Scotland Office would not be represented at the meeting but had produced a written report. He agreed to circulate the report following the meeting. Noted. Scottish Boundary Commission update IDM provided the PPP with updates on (i) a judicial challenge to the Boundary Commission for Northern Ireland's proposals for new constituencies; (ii) recruitment of new Boundary Commissioners for Scotland; (iii) progress of Island Council reviews; and (iv) administrative reviews. Noted. Electoral Commission update The PPP was provided with information on the following areas: Response to Inquiry on Electoral Law Reform MMcK advised that the UK Parliament's Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee had launched an inquiry examining the case for a comprehensive review of electoral law. The Commission had responded to the call for evidence and a copy of the response was tabled. The response supported the need for simplified and modernised electoral law and confirmed the Commission's willingness to work with Governments and legislatures to achieve that aim. MMcC stressed the importance of involving the Scottish Law Commission in any future work to simplify and modernise electoral law. Ballot Order Testing AON confirmed that the Commission had been invited by Scottish Government to undertake research to find solutions to the "list order effect" for Scottish Council elections. He provided an overview of the approach being taken to test two alternatives – order by lot and A-Z, Z-A ordering. Ipsos Mori were engaged to carry out testing with electors and fieldwork would be carried out over summer. The Commission would also be consulting with key stakeholders, including political parties, with a report produced by September. Codes of Practice RMcD provided an update on the work being undertaken to produce two Codes of Practice: one on candidate election spending and one on Party spending. The codes were prepared primarily in relation to UK Parliamentary elections. The codes had been re-drafted following the formal consultation that ran in autumn 2018. Copies of these were shared with the PPP. The Codes would now be finalised, following a roundtable with representatives of the Westminster PPP earlier in the week. The Commission was working to develop similar Codes of Practice for devolved elections in Scotland and Wales. You are in the Party panels section Home How we make decisions Party panels First published: 6 November 2020 Last updated: 3 February 2021 Meeting overview Date: 1 October 2019 Time: 9:30am Location: Boardroom, Ormeau Business Park, Belfast Date of next scheduled meeting: 28 January 2020 Who was at the meeting Who was at the meeting Alliance Party: Sharon Lowry DUP: Lee Reynolds Green Party: Kate Barry Sinn Féin: Gary Fleming and Seamus Drumm SDLP: Catherine Matthews UUP: Barbara Knox The Electoral Commission: Anna Carragher, Commissioner Cahir Hughes, Head of Electoral Commission NI Roisin McDaid, Senior Officer (Political Parties Liaison) Craig Westwood, Director of Communications, Policy and Research Laura Palts McCarthy, Senior Public Affairs Officer Electoral Office for Northern Ireland: Virginia McVea, Chief Electoral Officer for Ireland Welcome and introductions The Chair, Anna Carragher, welcomed everyone to the meeting and round table introductions were made. Anna congratulated Cahir on his new role and updated the panel on other Commission staffing changes. Notes of previous meeting on 11 June 2019 The panel agreed the notes of the previous meeting. There were no matters arising. Issues raised by the political parties No items had been raised by the parties in advance of the meeting. Electoral Commission updates Anna commented on the current political environment and said that the Commission had contingency plans in place for any unscheduled poll. Electoral Commission assessment on May 2019 local government elections Cahir told the panel that on 8 July we wrote to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland giving our assessment that the local elections in Northern Ireland had been well run, with feedback from voters and observers being positive. A copy of the letter was provided. The Commission identified a number of minor legislative issues that we have highlighted to the Government. These included issues relating to home addresses on ballot papers, the management of the count and polling scheme reviews. In response the Government has already consulted with us on draft legislation to remove the requirement for home addresses to be on ballot paper and other minor issues. Commission response to draft legislation Cahir updated the panel on draft legislation that the Commission had responded to the Government on: Representation of the People (Electronic Communications and Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Regulations 2020 In August we responded to draft legislation for the canvass, welcoming the opportunity it would give voters to respond to a canvass online for the first time in Northern Ireland. Overall we were content with the draft legislation, although we are waiting on a further draft of the Regulations from the NIO. The Local Elections (Northern Ireland) (Amendment) Order 2020 We have also responded to a draft Order from the NIO that makes some amendments to local government elections. Most notably this brings local government elections into line with other elections by removing the requirement for a candidate to have their home address published. It also addresses the issue relating to the use of capital letters for a candidate's name on the ballot paper. We have welcomed the amendments made by the Order. Report on the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers On 26 September we published our latest assessment on the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers in Northern Ireland. A copy of the report was provided. Cahir highlighted the headline figures from the report. Private renters remain the least likely to have up to date register entries (38%) compared to people who owned their houses outright (88%). Registration levels are also low among young people aged 18-34, with only 51% correctly registered, compared to 94% for people aged 65 and over. The 2018 figures show a return to the levels of accuracy and completeness recorded in 2012. The last Northern Ireland canvass was in 2013, with the next one scheduled for 2020. The Commission has renewed calls for modernisation of the electoral registration system in Northern Ireland, recommending that public data could be better used to help keep the electoral register accurate and complete throughout the year. Modernising electoral registration feasibility studies Craig updated the panel on the feasibility studies the Commission published in July. The studies explored how the system could be modernised further to make it easier for people to register to vote and for Electoral Registration Officers to maintain accurate and complete electoral registers. Craig said that our studies provided an evidence base for any future policy. Anna added that compared to NI, it is a more complex picture in GB with 381 separate registers. Gary said that they have serious concerns about the register but they support automatic registration of attainers when they get their national insurance number. Lee made the point of being careful with data and that people have the right not to participate. Anna acknowledged the point but added that people should be registered even if they choose not to vote. Craig mentioned the debate about automatic or automated registration. Update from Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland The CEO welcomed Cahir to his new role and thanked the Commission for its accuracy and completeness report. There are now 1.3m people on the register which is one of the highest levels it's been at. From 1 January to 1 October 2019 there were 21,849 paper applications and 117,089 online applications. The mid-year estimate for attainers is at 50%. EONI is looking at different data options to analyse registration levels and target outreach. Working with property services' data, EONI should be able to identify streets with the lowest levels of registration. The CEO would welcome opportunities to work with the Commission and parties on more raising more targeted public awareness. The CEO is also considering how to contact attainers and an option is to use a C2K network which would allow contact with every pupil on the network. Working with CCEA the EONI is planning to provide lesson plan materials for 11-14, 14-16 and 16+ to support electoral registration. The CEO is working with Start 360 to reach those not in education or training. EONI is working with RQIA to improve engagement with care home residents and to develop care home standards that would support this. There was a discussion about the difficulties of getting access to care home residents and how this needs to be balanced with the pressures and priorities of care homes and families. This led to a discussion around access to apartment blocks and their residents' turnout rate. Anna asked if more could be done to improve and modernise access to electoral ID for attainers and the elderly. The CEO said that a legislative change is needed but highlighted some options that could modernise the process. This included using photos on the C2K network for young people. However GDPR legislation would have to be carefully considered alongside this. These are longer term projects and might need pilots to test if they work in practice. The CEO suggested working with the Commission given its experience of the ID pilots in Great Britain The polling station review is due to be published on or before 1 December. The CEO will confirm with parties when it will be published. The CEO will arrange a meeting with the panel to discuss how data sources could be more effectively used to manage the electoral register. Electoral Commission updates – recent Commission publications Codes of Practice on election spending Roisin updated panel members on the Codes of Practice. In July we submitted two codes of practice on election spending to the Minister for Constitution. One on candidate and one on party spending. The Minister now needs to decide whether to make any amendments to the codes before laying them before parliament to approve. The draft codes and our report on the responses to the consultation process were circulated to members in July and are available on our website. The codes, if enacted will apply to elections to Westminster, Northern Ireland Assembly and Councils in Northern Ireland. These codes would also apply at local government elections in Northern Ireland where the regulated period was combined with the regulated period for another election If you have any questions about the codes, please contact Roisin. Political finance – statutory return deadlines Parties were reminded of the following deadlines: Donation and loan returns for 1 July 2019 – 30 September 2019 (Q3 2019) must be submitted by 30 October 2019. Donation and loan returns for 1 October 2019 – 31 December 2019 (Q4 2019) must be submitted by 30 January 2020. Lee raised concerns about advice received regarding the reporting of loans. Roisin said that we can meet to discuss any individual concerns. AOB – none raised Proposed 2020 meeting dates Tuesday 28 January Tuesday 24 March Tuesday 9 June Tuesday 6 October

Transparency in digital campaigning: response to Cabinet Office technical consultation on digital imprints You are in the Transparent digital campaigning section Home Transparent digital campaigning On this page Overview Approach to answering consultation questions Proposal 1: Extension of regime Proposal 2: Material subject to the regime Proposal 3: Details on the imprint Proposal 4: Location of the imprint Proposal 5: Appearance of the imprint Proposal 6: Re-publishing of election material Proposal 7: Territoriality Section 8: Enforcement Section 9: Regulatory costs and benefits to business First published: 1 October 2020 Last updated: 14 October 2020 Overview The UK Government's technical proposals for a new digital imprint requirement will deliver an important increase in transparency for voters, campaigners and regulators. There has been significant growth in digital campaigning at elections and referendums, but campaigners still do not have to identify themselves as the source of that material. These proposals will help to close this gap in transparency, and should help to improve public confidence in digital campaigns at future elections and referendums in the UK. Our response to this consultation draws on our experience of supporting campaigners to comply with the current imprint rules for printed election or referendum material since 2000, and our more recent experience of working with digital platform providers to help improve transparency for users of their services. In the majority of cases we support the proposals, and have set out detail on our reasoning. There are two main areas where we have identified concerns: The proposed rules would mean that unregistered non-party campaigners would not need to include imprints on campaign material that they had not paid to promote. This would leave a gap of material, potentially involving significant production costs and having considerable reach and impact with voters, with no ability to identify who was responsible for producing it. Under these proposals, campaigners would not have to include the imprint as a permanent part of the campaign material if it is not reasonably practicable. The benefits of improved transparency would be reduced if campaigners were allowed to choose to locate the imprint elsewhere (for example in a profile or bio) and there risks being no incentive to include the imprint on the material itself. We note that the consultation invites views about expanding the scope of a digital imprints regime to cover wider forms of political advertising. We agree that it is a timely moment to ask this question and our response sets out some initial considerations. Further consideration can be contributed as the policy develops, including on the scope of political material under consideration by the Government and the problems that any future proposals would be intended to address. Cabinet Office digital imprints consultation Cabinet Office's proposals and questions are published in Transparency in digital campaigning: technical consultation on digital imprints, 2020 We have grouped together our answers to some questions. Where asked for a view, we have used the 5 point Likert scale as requested in the consultation document: Strongly agree, Agree, Neither agree nor disagree, Disagree, Strongly disagree. Proposal 1: Extension of regime Questions 1 and 2: Extending imprints to digital election material Questions 1 and 2: Do you agree or disagree with this proposal for the extension of the imprints regime to digital election material? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. We strongly agree with this proposal. We have previously drawn attention to the significant implications of a lack of transparency in digital campaigning. As the consultation acknowledges, data from election and referendum spending returns show a significant growth in digital campaigning in the last decade. While digital communication can be transformative in engaging the voter with campaigning messages, our research with the public has found evidence that significant public concerns about the transparency risks overshadowing the benefits. In our survey after the 2019 UK Parliamentary general election 1 we found that: Nearly three quarters of people (72%) agreed that it was important for them to know who produced the political information they see online Less than a third (29%) agreed that they can find out who has produced the political information they see online Nearly half (46%) agreed that they were concerned about why and how political ads were targeted at them. Although the majority of more established registered political parties and campaigners follow our guidance to include some form of identifying information on their digital material, there is no legal obligation at present to do so. This means that material can be published and promoted to influence voters without the campaigner ever having to identify themselves as the source. The UK Government's proposals will help to close this gap in transparency. The UK Government has also said that it intends to legislate so that all printed election material in Northern Ireland will need an imprint. We strongly support this proposal, as it would address a longstanding anomaly and will ensure greater consistency in the imprint rules. This change would mean that voters in Northern Ireland would be able to see who is responsible for all election or referendum campaign material that is produced by candidates, parties or other campaigners. Questions 3 and 4: Improving the transparency of digital election material Questions 3 and 4: Do you agree or disagree that this regime will improve the transparency of digital election material? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. We agree that this regime will improve transparency about the source of most digital campaign material aimed at voters in the UK. However, it will not cover all digital material, and we set out our concerns about the proposal to exclude some material in our response to questions 11 to 14. Questions 5 and 6: The main benefits of the digital imprints proposal Questions 5 and 6: What do you consider to be the main benefits of the digital imprints proposal? Do you have any other comments on proposal 1? The main benefit of the proposal is that voters, other campaigners and those responsible for enforcing electoral law will be able to more easily identify who is spending money on campaigning at elections and referendums. We believe that this will help to improve public confidence in campaigning. We also welcome the proposal that the regime should be broad enough to cover all relevant digital technologies and communication channels and able to keep pace with technological change. Proposal 2: Material subject to the regime Questions 7 and 8: Extending the regime Questions 7 and 8: Do you agree or disagree that the regime should be extended to registered political parties, registered third party campaigners, candidates, holders of elected office and registered referendum campaigners - both paid and unpaid (or 'organic') material? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. We agree that the requirement should be extended to election or referendum material produced by the specified individuals and organisations. These campaigners are responsible for the majority of the digital campaign material that voters see during elections and referendum campaigns. We also agree that it should cover material that is produced and distributed through paid or unpaid means by these groups of campaigners. As formally recognised participants in an election or referendum, these campaigners should have to identify themselves as the source of all of their campaign material regardless of whether they have paid to advertise or promote it. Making this change will reassure the public that these campaigners are not able to run unofficial 'stealth' campaigns (alongside their official campaigns) without the law requiring them to identify themselves as the source of that material. We describe an example of recent public concerns about this possibility in our response to question 12.

Questions 9 and 10: Extending the regime to prospective office holders Questions 9 and 10: Do you agree or disagree that the regime should be extended to prospective office holders (both paid and unpaid, or ‘organic’, material)? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. We agree that the imprints regime should apply to “prospective office holders”. This would mean that the requirement would apply to candidates, people intending to stand as candidates, and also to other campaigners who share campaign material about these people. It would help voters to have additional transparency outside a formal campaigning period. There are complexities to defining when someone is legally regarded as being a prospective candidate for the purpose of the imprint rules. Currently, candidacy is linked to other events in an election timetable, such as when a Parliament dissolves or when a notice of election is published. It can be relevant whether a person has self-declared or been declared by their agent as intending to stand. There are also rules on pre-candidacy spending which apply for several months before UK and Scottish Parliamentary general elections; these concepts could be considered when developing a definition of a prospective office holder. Question 11: Extending the regime to unregistered campaigners Question 11: Do you agree or disagree that the regime should be extended to unregistered third party campaigners promoting paid material only? We disagree. We support the proposal that unregistered non-party campaigners should be required to include an imprint on campaign material. However, we recommend that this should apply to any election or referendum campaign material that promotes an outcome, regardless of whether a campaigner has paid to promote or advertise it. We have several interrelated concerns about the implications of limiting the scope as proposed. These concerns relate to the impact on voters of campaigns that are designed to be shared ‘organically’ or ‘virally’ by supporters, and the impact of algorithms. Under this proposal: Unregistered campaigners could coordinate unpaid ‘organic’ campaigns without identifying themselves as the original source of the campaign material. Material could be shared widely through organised networks of a campaigner’s supporters, without anyone paying to promote or advertise it. Social media platforms’ algorithms could boost distribution to a potentially large number of people, who would have no way to identify the source of that material. Existing registered campaigners could run unofficial organic campaigns without revealing that they were ultimately responsible for them – although this would not comply with the imprint requirement, the arrangements could be difficult to trace or prove. An unregistered campaigner could spend significant amounts of money producing campaign material but would not be required to include an imprint on the material if they hadn’t paid to distribute it – if we or the police had concerns that a registration threshold or spending limit might have been breached, it may not be possible to contact the campaigner to find out these production costs. Question 12: Explaining our response about unregistered campaigners Question 12: Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. We saw some of these kinds of issues at the 2019 UK Parliamentary General Election. Members of the public raised concerns with us about digital adverts and other unpaid material published by non-party campaigners which people suspected were front organisations for a political party. However, these were independent campaigners and had no connection with any registered party. An imprint requirement would have shown clearly that a political party was not the source of the material. At the time of the election, Facebook, Google and Snapchat had put in place their own policies to require political adverts to be labelled with information about their source. Facebook also required labelling on some ‘profile pages’ belonging to organisations. Some of the labels were useful, but others only contained a campaign slogan rather than meaningful information about who paid for an advert or was responsible for the content. This led to members of the public raising concerns with us about who was responsible for this material. The UK Government’s proposals for future elections would go some way to addressing these concerns because adverts would have to include an imprint, but other content such as profile pages would not. These kinds of gaps in digital imprint rules are likely to reduce the positive impact that these changes have on public confidence in campaigns. There are particular risks if campaign material includes misleading or controversial material with no way for voters or regulators to identify who is responsible for it. Gaps in transparency rules could also be exploited by malicious actors who know how to ‘game’ social media platforms’ algorithms and seek to influence voters anonymously. These issues should be considered further as the Government’s proposals are developed.

Nevertheless, the regime proposed by the Government will represent a significant step forward. It will ensure greater transparency about the source of the majority of digital campaign material that previously would not have been required to include an imprint.

Questions 13 and 14: Distinction between paid and unpaid material

Questions 13 and 14: Do you agree or disagree with the distinction made in this proposal between paid and unpaid material? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here.

We disagree. Both kinds of material involve design and production costs, which may be regulated campaign spending under election law. The difference is that ‘paid material’ has also involved the payment of a distribution fee by a campaigner (including paying to target distribution of the advert to particular users). Applying the digital imprint regime to both kinds of material from registered and unregistered campaigners would give voters a key part of the information they need to assess the credibility of campaign information. It is important that the public, other campaigners and regulators can all find out who is behind both paid and unpaid campaign material – they are both intended to influence the perceptions and choices of voters. It is particularly important that material that has been specifically designed to gain authenticity through organic or viral sharing is clearly labelled with its source so voters can assess its credibility.

Public focus group research we published in 2018² showed that participants did not always readily identify material about political or social issues as being linked to a campaign, and that using humorous graphics or video clips made these materials more engaging. We recognise that the UK Government has proposed this distinction between paid and unpaid material for specific reasons. The consultation paper proposes that members of the public expressing their personal political views in a private capacity should not be required to include an imprint. We agree with this aim, and a regime that does not apply to unpaid material by unregistered campaigners is one way to achieve this. The Scottish Government has recently published legislation which adopts a different approach for digital imprints at Scottish Parliament and local council elections. These requirements will cover both paid and unpaid material by registered and unregistered campaigners, and will include an exemption for individuals expressing their personal opinion. This builds on the experience of the 2014 Scottish Independence Referendum, when imprints were required on digital materials. We will report on the experience of regulating this requirement at the May 2021 elections.

Question 15 and 16: Expanding the regime beyond election material

Question 15 and 16: Do you agree or disagree that the regime should be expanded beyond what is considered election material (as set out in this proposal), to wider online political advertising? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. We recognise that a wider regime covering online political advertising could support the aims of transparency and voter confidence, and agree that it is a timely moment to ask this question. Political campaigning can have a wide variety of aims, including supporting and opposing political objectives or supporting and opposing political parties. Election campaigning is a sub-set within political campaigning. Election law covers campaigns that are intended to promote or prejudice the success of an individual or group of parties or candidates an election, and campaigns that promote an outcome in a referendum. The well-established and clearly defined requirements in election law for printed campaign materials to include an imprint should provide a solid basis for extending the regime to digital election or referendum materials. In contrast, there is currently limited regulation of other forms of political material and advertising in the UK. We would welcome contributing to discussion and consideration about the scope and impact of such a change, in the event the Government decides to progress development of this policy, and to defining the harm the policy change would seek to address. We can contribute expertise from regulating the election and referendum imprint rules to any consideration of regulating other forms of political advertising. It would be important to adopt a clear definition of political advertising so that the requirement is clear and workable for all parties, including advertisers and host companies of advertising, as well as from a regulatory perspective.

Questions 17, 18 and 19: Applying digital imprint rules to all forms of elections and referendums

Questions 17, 18 and 19: Do you agree or disagree that the digital imprints rules should apply to all forms of elections and referendums (beyond those already listed in the proposal and excluding devolved elections and referendums)? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. Do you have any other comments on proposal 2? We agree with the principle that voters at any election or referendum should be able to understand the source of the material which is trying to influence how they vote. We recognise that enforcing a digital imprint requirement for local elections such as parish council elections could present additional challenges (given the large number of candidates that can be nominated in these elections, for example). Enforcement of the law for these elections would be the responsibility of local police forces.

Proposal 3: Details on the imprint

Questions 20, 21 and 22: Details contained within the imprint

Questions 20, 21 and 22: Do you agree or disagree with the proposal on the details to be contained within the imprint i.e. the name and address of the promoter of the material and the name and address of any person on behalf of whom the material is being published? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. Do you have any other comments on proposal 3? We strongly agree with the Government that requiring this information will support the dual policy aims of the digital imprints regime. It will provide transparency for voters about who is trying to influence their vote. It will also help the police and the Commission to enforce the spending rules. Requiring the name of the promoter and any person on behalf of whom the material is being published means that campaigners cannot simply include a campaign slogan which cannot be traced to an individual. Requiring an address means that we or the police can contact campaigners if there is a need to look into anomalies or concerns with the spending rules or other relevant law, such as defamation law. An address will also help demonstrate that a campaigner is based in the UK and reduce perceptions of foreign interference. We recognise that some candidates or campaigners who do not have an office address may not want to include their home address on campaign materials. In these cases, a PO Box or mailbox address may still enable us and the police to correspond with a campaigner or serve legal papers, provided it is a genuine address of theirs. Proposal 4: Location of the imprint Questions 23 and 24: Location of imprints Questions 23 and 24: Do you agree or disagree with the proposal for the location of the imprint - that the imprint must be located as part of the material where it is practical to do so and where it is not practical, must be accessible from the material? We agree that the imprint must be part of the campaign material itself so the public can easily identify who is responsible for it. However, we disagree with the proposal that this will only apply where it is reasonably practical to do so, and where it isn't, the imprint can be located elsewhere. A 'reasonable practicability' provision like this could mean that: s could remove or alter the imprint from a 'bio', 'profile' page or a website, at any time. Transparency would be reduced and campaigners would be more difficult to trace after the event. Fewer people would see the imprint because some users will be less willing to click on a hyperlink, for example because of the risk of downloading malicious software. s could exploit loopholes, and those responsible for enforcing the law would face uncertainty about what is reasonably practicable in many different individual scenarios. If such an approach is included, it should be drafted very tightly to ensure that the concept of 'reasonable practicability' only applies in exceptional circumstances. The proposal in the consultation document would not incentivise a campaigner to include the imprint on the material itself. It would allow the imprint to be included in different places away from the campaign material, based on the campaigner's own judgment about what was practicable. The final proposals should seek to strengthen the onus on campaigners to take steps to include an imprint in the graphics of their material, or to use a platform that offers a clear method to add an imprint alongside an advert or other material published. This kind of approach would act as an incentive for tech companies to continue to make changes to their platforms to facilitate campaigners to include imprints on the material itself, as some have successfully done with voluntary measures to add labels to political adverts.

Questions 25 and 26: Digital platforms and facilitating digital imprints Questions 25 and 26: How do you think digital platforms can facilitate campaigners to include imprints? Do you have any other comments on proposal 4? In recent years, some of the major digital platforms have required those running political advertising on their platforms and channels to include 'disclaimers' on those adverts. The disclaimer is like an imprint which provides basic information about the source of political adverts. These initiatives have been a positive step in providing information to the public and are a clear demonstration that digital imprint rules could work in future on these platforms and channels. As mentioned under Q12, the information provided in these disclaimers has varied considerably. We think more consistent guidance from the platforms, backed by new legal requirements, would facilitate campaigners to include imprints and help avoid confusion over who is responsible for campaign material. In their voluntary efforts, the companies have devised their own solutions to facilitate political advertisers to include the necessary information about themselves in their disclaimers. Such initiatives include creating new fields in posts for the information. We support these approaches and would look to assist digital platforms with building on their existing experience to develop additional solutions that allow people to view a full imprint as part of the message itself. Proposal 5: Appearance of the imprint Questions 27 and 28: How imprints should look Questions 27 and 28: Do you agree or disagree with the proposal for what the imprint should look like - permanent, embedded and visible/audible, clearly readable/legible/audible and replicable? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. We strongly agree that the imprint should be: a permanent and embedded part of the campaign material itself; clearly readable, legible or audible regardless of the platform or device (e.g. mobile or laptop) it is being accessed on; and replicable when re-shared, and must not distort when re-published or shared. This would mitigate the risk that transparency could be inadvertently reduced, even where campaigners may claim to have complied with the requirement when originally publishing or promoting the material. Information about the source of campaign material should be accessible to the public, and available before and after an election or referendum. Many people, including journalists, academics, regulators and enforcement bodies, may need to access material and verify its source after the event.

Questions 29 and 30: How digital platforms can support campaigners to comply

Questions 29 and 30: What would campaigners need from digital platforms in order to comply with the rules? Do you have any other comments on proposal 5? Digital platforms should provide campaigners with the tools and functionality they need to easily add a full imprint onto all their campaign material. We would support technical solutions that facilitate campaigners to include full imprints on campaign material.

Proposal 6: Re-publishing of election material

Questions 31, 32 and 33: The republishing or 'sharing' of material

Questions 31, 32 and 33: Do you agree or disagree with the proposal for the re-publishing or 'sharing' of material? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. Do you have any other comments on proposal 6? We agree with this proposal, which would address a potential loophole in the new rules and deter campaigners from publishing or recirculating campaign material without an imprint. It will ensure that where campaigners alter other people's digital material to promote their own campaigns and then republish it, they will have to include their own imprints (provided they are in scope of the new rules). They won't be able to claim their own imprint isn't necessary because the original material already has another campaigner's imprint, or because the rules don't require an imprint on the original material. It will also mean that if a registered campaigner republishes another person's or an unregistered campaigner's (unaltered) unpaid material, they will have to put their own imprint on the material. They won't be able to claim their own imprint is not necessary because the original publisher wasn't in scope of the rules.

Proposal 7: Territoriality

Questions 34, 35 and 36: Do you agree or disagree with the proposal that the regime will apply to all election material regardless of where it has been promoted from? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. Do you have any other comments on proposal 7? We agree with the principle that all election and referendum material that appears before UK voters should have an imprint, whether the material originates in the UK or abroad. If the imprint rules don't apply to material that originates overseas, this creates an obvious loophole. The consultation document notes the challenges of enforcing UK law on campaigners outside the UK who are targeting UK voters. It also proposes a 'notice and take down' rule which would give limited responsibilities to digital platforms that host material. Digital platforms will have to remove content without an imprint expeditiously once they are made aware of it. Platforms would commit an offence and could be fined if they fail to do so. While there will be practical questions to work through with Government, police and digital platforms, we agree that the 'notice and take down' proposal seems to provide a practical way of helping to remove non-compliant material and limiting its impact on voters. We recognise that platforms based in the UK or which have subsidiaries here may be more likely to comply, whilst platforms without a UK presence may refuse to comply with requests to take down material. Enforcing the law on foreign-based platforms may pose the same enforcement challenges as enforcing it on campaigners overseas. However, it is encouraging that we have heard from election regulators in other countries like Australia and Canada with digital imprint regimes that the major digital platforms have cooperated with their enforcement of the rules. We also found that overseas organisations, including international companies and state bodies, have cooperated with us as the UK regulator and complied with UK law at major electoral events.

Section 8: Enforcement Questions 37 and 38: The role of enforcement bodies Questions 37 and 38: Do you agree or disagree that the relevant authorities are in a position to effectively enforce digital imprints? Please provide any further detail to explain your response here. It is important for voter confidence that campaigners understand and comply with the new digital imprint requirements, and that voters see non-compliance being addressed swiftly by the enforcement bodies. We partially agree that we are in a position to effectively enforce the digital imprint regime as set out in these proposals. We have previously highlighted concerns about the limits of our existing powers to obtain information as part of delivering our regulatory responsibilities. As the consultation paper sets out, the police are responsible for enforcing the rules covering campaigning for a particular candidate standing in a particular electoral area. We are responsible for regulating the rules covering campaigning for one or more political parties or groups of candidates, and campaigning at referendums. The majority of campaigners comply with the current imprint regime for printed material, and we expect that the same would be true with the digital imprint requirement; we will therefore be able to focus our regulatory activity on a minority of cases. We do not want our approach to implementing the new digital imprints regime to rely solely on using our formal investigation powers, particularly where allegations may involve an inadvertent error by a campaigner and especially in a new regime. Consistent with our approach to regulating all other aspects of the regime, we would seek to secure compliance through support, guidance, swift and early intervention to bring campaigners into line with the rules and, only if necessary, enforcement. To ensure that we are able to effectively ensure compliance at the earliest opportunity we would want to gather information about potential issues quickly, in order to determine what if any regulatory action is appropriate. For example, where we identify material without an imprint we would want to be able to contact the campaigner immediately and give them the opportunity to amend or remove the material to comply with the law. This would mean we could resolve the matter without the need to consider opening an investigation, which would often be a more effective and proportionate approach to securing compliance with the law. But we can only take this course of action where we are able to identify and contact the campaigner. We have existing powers to obtain information from registered political parties or non-party campaigners to secure compliance with the law, separate from our powers to gather evidence for the purpose of an investigation. However these powers do not extend to third parties such as digital platforms, advertising suppliers or unregistered campaigners themselves. Currently, we can only require information from suppliers or unregistered campaigners if we have reasonable grounds to suspect an offence has been committed and open an investigation. We will aim to make agreements on a platform by platform basis for them to share information about non-compliant campaigners with us. This would specifically include information that we would need to identify and contact campaigners responsible for producing material that should include an imprint, or companies advertising the material on their platforms. However, we would be reliant on those companies to provide us with information on a voluntary basis, which could reduce our ability to act quickly or proportionately. To ensure that we are able to effectively secure compliance with the requirements, we would therefore welcome clear powers in the legislation for digital imprints that would enable us to obtain information from suppliers of advertising services and unregistered campaigners outside of an investigation. Powers to obtain information from third parties (such as digital platforms) would assist many aspects of our regulatory work, but this change would be particularly important in the context of new digital imprints rules. As mentioned above, the Government is proposing to apply a ‘notice and take down’ rule (which is briefly described in paragraphs 26 and 27 of the consultation document). It will be based on the UK’s existing liability regime for digital platforms. They will be required to remove material without an imprint once they are made aware of it. The rule will cover content originating in the UK as well as from abroad. We support the idea of making it clear what digital platforms providers’ responsibilities are for dealing with material that doesn’t include an imprint, and would welcome further information about how it would work in practice. We note that this means the proposed regime would have two different routes to securing compliance. Non-compliant material could be removed by a digital platform under the ‘notice and take down’ rule. Alternatively, a campaigner could be investigated for publishing non-compliant material by us or the police. In some instances, both routes could be followed. However, if we are not able to obtain contact details or other information necessary to investigate campaigners, then the regime will rely more heavily on digital platforms taking down non-compliant material, which could have a low deterrent effect against future breaches of the law.

Questions 39, 40 and 41: Extending civil sanctioning powers Questions 39, 40 and 41: Do you agree or disagree that civil sanctioning powers should be extended for use in relation to offences committed concerning election material in support of candidates? Please provide any further detail to explain your response We agree. We support the use of civil sanctions as a proportionate alternative tool to criminal prosecution for dealing with imprint offences. We are experienced in using a civil sanctioning regime for offences under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA). We have long recommended that an equivalent civil sanctions approach should be put in place for some candidate offences in the RPA 1983. For administrative or careless breaches of the rules, criminal investigation is a disproportionate step; a civil sanctions regime would be a more proportionate way of dealing with such breaches. The civil sanctions for offences under PPERA were designed to be an alternative to criminal prosecution and has been successful in delivering transparency of political finance. This experience will be valuable in designing a civil sanctions powers to use in relation to offences committed concerning election material in support of candidates. Section 9. Regulatory costs and benefits to business We note that the consultation document seeks views from businesses, political parties and the third sector to estimate the cost of compliance with the new regime. The resulting insight will help the Government when designing the rules, as well as helping the police and the Electoral Commission to enforce the rules when they are in place.

Report: Scottish Independence Referendum | Electoral Commission Search Report: Scottish Independence Referendum You are in the Scottish Independence referendum section Home Scottish Independence referendum On this page About this report Who was responsible for what The referendum result Key issues and lessons learnt Early legislation Extending the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds Standalone poll Scotland's future electoral structures Regulating the campaigns Recommendations: Future referendum legislation Recommendations: Recommendations: Campaign regulation Recommendations for the future conduct of the referendums and elections Download our full report First published: 17 March 2015 Last updated: 17 March 2015 About this report On 18 September 2014, the people of Scotland voted in a referendum on whether Scotland should be an independent country. In the months leading up to the day of poll Scotland was energised by the debate and the voters engaged in the discussion around the referendum question. The question asked, to which voters were required to vote either yes or no, was: Should Scotland be an independent country? This is a report to the Scottish Parliament fulfilling our statutory duty to report to the Parliament, under the provisions of the Scottish Independence Referendum Act 2013 (SIRA), on the conduct of the referendum. It reviews the experience of voters, the referendum campaign and the delivery of the referendum as well as how the Electoral Commission carried out its functions under SIRA. We also report on the expenditure which we incurred in carrying out our functions. We will publish a further report on campaign spending in 2015 after the registered campaigners who spent more than £250,000 have submitted their spending returns in March 2015. The report is informed by many sources of information and focuses on the administration of the referendum. It reflects the experience of voters based on public opinion research, as well as electoral data provided by the Chief Counting Officer (CCO), Counting Officers (COs) and Electoral Registration Officers (EROs). It also reflects the feedback and views we received from campaigners, those responsible for delivering the referendum poll, as well as other participants and observers in what was Scotland's biggest electoral event ever. The referendum was well-run by the CCO and her CO and ERO colleagues because of careful planning (in part possible because of existing administrative structures in Scotland), sufficient resourcing and careful delivery of the administrative process through much hard work by all those involved. Who was responsible for what The "Edinburgh Agreement" 1 was signed between the Scottish and UK Governments on 15 October 2012. Under the Agreement, the respective Governments agreed to work together to ensure that a referendum on independence for Scotland would take place. An Order 2 was subsequently made in both the Scottish and UK Parliaments under Section 30 of the Scotland Act 1998, enabling the Scottish Parliament to legislate for the referendum. SIRA, the Act subsequently passed by the Scottish Parliament, provided for the roles undertaken by the various bodies in Scotland, with regard to the referendum, to be slightly different to a referendum run under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA). SIRA gave the following roles which are outlined below. The Chief Counting Officer SIRA required Scottish Ministers to appoint the Convener of the Electoral Management Board for Scotland (EMB), Mary Pitcaithly, as CCO for the referendum. She appointed Sue Bruce, Chief Executive of The City of Edinburgh Council, as Deputy Chief Counting Officer. The CCO also appointed COs for each of the 32 local government areas in Scotland, who in turn were entitled to appoint deputies to carry out some or all of their functions as appropriate. The CCO was responsible for: The proper and effective conduct of the referendum, including the conduct of the poll and the counting of votes. The appointment of COs for each of the 32 local government areas. The provision of guidance and, where appropriate, direction to COs and EROs on the exercise of their functions. Encouraging participation in the referendum. Certifying the overall outcome of the referendum in Scotland. The Electoral Commission The Electoral Commission was responsible for: Advising, registering and regulating campaigners in the referendum where appropriate, including in relation to campaign spending and donations. Assessing applications from campaign groups wishing to be appointed as the designated organisation campaigning for each referendum outcome. Promoting public awareness in relation to the referendum. Administering an accreditation scheme for individuals and organisations wishing to act as observers at key proceedings in relation to the referendum, including the preparation of a Code of Practice specific to the event. Reporting on the conduct of the referendum Advising on the referendum question and campaign spending limits, before SIRA was introduced into the Scottish Parliament The referendum result Voting in the referendum commenced in late August 2014 with the dispatch of postal votes prior to polling day on 18 September 2014. Levels of voting were high and steady throughout polling day, with many polling staff experiencing queues at the door when voting opened at 7am, such was the engagement of the electorate keen to express their preference on the referendum question. The atmosphere in polling places was reported by police, staff and observers to be good natured throughout the day. There were some reports of incidents during the campaign and on polling day but the prospect of a widespread air of intimidation, which had been raised prior to polling day, did not materialise. The count commenced shortly after the close of poll at 10pm on 18 September and continued throughout the night. The result was declared by the CCO at approximately 9am on 19 September 2014. There were 3,623,344 (representing 84.6% of the electorate) votes counted 2,001,926 people (55.25% of all voters) voted No 1,617,989 people, (44.65% of all voters) voted Yes Some key statistics 4,283,938 registered voters for the referendum 109,593 16 and 17 year olds registered 796,835 (18.6%) postal voters 3,429 (0.1%) ballots rejected at the referendum count 5,579 polling stations within 2,608 polling places Maximum 800 electors per polling station 42 campaign groups or individuals registered with the Commission (21 campaigning for a Yes vote and 21 for a No vote) 2.5 million EC Voting Guides delivered to Scottish households Scottish Independence Referendum - Electoral data Key issues and lessons learnt This report contains recommendations for the conduct of any future referendum legislated for by the Scottish Parliament on any issue. Although we are not aware of any such future plans, we consider it proper that the lessons learnt from this event are brought to the attention of the Parliament so they can be recorded and considered in the future. Some of the lessons learnt are of course also relevant to future elections for which the Parliament is responsible and they should be considered in that light. There are also lessons that are relevant to legislation for future referendums and elections, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK. Where appropriate these lessons are directed at the other legislatures across the UK, including the UK Parliament. Early legislation Following the May 2011 referendums on additional powers for the National Assembly for Wales and the Parliamentary Voting System for the House of Commons, we recommended that, for future referendums, detailed rules should be in force at least 28 weeks in advance of polling day (or by 6 March 2014 in the case of the Scottish Independence Referendum). SIRA and the Scottish Independence Referendum (Franchise) Act 2013 (the Franchise Act) were commenced on 18 December 2013 and 8 August 2013 respectively, giving clarity to all. For the Commission this meant we could provide guidance on the campaign rules nearly nine months ahead of the poll, as opposed to three months which was the case for both

2011 referendums. The CCO also had additional time to develop and provide guidance and direction on matters relating to registration and the conduct of the poll. The benefit of this additional time was passed on to campaigners, EROs and COs in preparing for their respective roles at the referendum. They were able to engage constructively with the legislative process and had time to develop an understanding of the relevant guidance and rules, before they came into force. EROs and COs benefitted from sufficient time to put robust plans in place for the delivery of their responsibilities under the legislation, from targeted public awareness activity to the booking of polling places and the training of staff. While the provisions relating to many aspects of the referendum were commenced some nine months before the event, those relating to the franchise, contained in the franchise Act, were not. The provisions which allowed for the compiling of the Register of Young Voters were not commenced until two months before the start of the canvass of 16 and 17 year olds. In addition, similar timing considerations are also relevant when developing a public awareness strategy and political literacy initiatives, both at the national and local level, when introducing votes for 16 and 17 year olds. We believe that the experience of legislating for the Scottish Independence Referendum provides, in the main, a model for the future development of referendum and electoral legislation. Sufficient time was allowed by the Scottish Government to consult on the proposed legislation, followed by the Scottish Parliament having sufficient time to properly scrutinise proposals and legislate, with Royal Assent for the primary pieces of legislation being in place nine months before 18 September. We recommend that in planning for any future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, governments should aim to ensure that legislation (including any secondary legislation) is clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners, the Chief Counting Officer, Counting Officers or Electoral Registration Officers. This would mean that: Legislation for any changes to the franchise for a referendum should be clear at least six months before EROs are due to begin any scheduled annual canvass activities. Legislation for the regulation of referendum campaigners should be clear at least six months before the start of the regulated referendum period. Legislation relating to the conduct of a referendum poll, including secondary legislation such as Fees and Charges Orders, should be clear at least six months before polling day. Extending the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds The Commission's view was, and remains, that decisions about the franchise are for the relevant Parliament to decide. Our focus in the referendum was ensuring that, as the franchise had been extended to 16 and 17 year olds, they were able to participate fully, including being registered to vote. As noted above, the Franchise Act did not receive Royal Assent until two months before the start of the canvass of 16 and 17 year olds. While we were aware that the Scottish Government was talking with Scotland's EROs in order to ensure the legislation was capable of being implemented in a timely manner, we would, however, have expected the legislation to be in force at least six months before the annual canvass to give EROs sufficient time to plan and effectively implement the changes. This will also help public awareness and political literacy initiatives, both at the national and local level, when introducing votes for 16 and 17 year olds. We therefore recommend that, when any policy maker or legislator is considering future legislation for referendums or elections with a franchise including 16 and 17 year olds, they consider the need to ensure legislation concerning the extension of the franchise is commenced six months prior to the beginning of the canvass in order to allow administrators to plan for the canvass and public awareness activities, including political literacy initiatives. Standalone poll The “Edinburgh Agreement” required that no other referendum legislated for by the Scottish Parliament could be held on the same day as the referendum on independence for Scotland. The circumstances of the referendum and the campaigning tactics adopted by campaigners meant that a number of different political parties worked together to campaign for the same outcome. Both lead campaigners attracted various political parties to their cause and a large number of people who were not associated with any political party. Lots of non-party campaign groups were also established, some of whom were registered with the Commission whilst others were not. Cross-party campaigning at referendums provides a coordinated message to voters and helps them to make an informed decision. However, had an election campaign been taking place at the same time as the referendum campaign, some parties might have been working together in one contest, whilst campaigning against each other in the other. This has the potential to be confusing for voters and to place parties in a campaign context within which it would be extremely difficult to operate. Given the intense level of campaigning in the referendum and the focus of campaigners and voters on a single issue, we believe that if an election had been held on the same day, this could have led to voter confusion. We recommend any government introducing legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should also publish at the same time its assessment of the implications of holding other polls on the same day. This will enable legislatures (including the Scottish Parliament and the UK Parliament) to consider the relative benefits and risks of the proposal as they scrutinise the referendum Bill.

Scotland’s future electoral structures Since its establishment in 2008, the EMB has supported successfully the delivery of several elections and the 2011 Referendum on Parliamentary Voting Systems. Although the EMB did not have a statutory role in the referendum on independence for Scotland, its Convener was appointed under SIRA as CCO for the referendum and it played an integral role in providing advice and support to the CCO to ensure the proper and effective conduct of the poll. The current legislative and administrative structures for electoral matters in Scotland are part-reserved and part-devolved. Although we have recommended that the statutory role of the EMB be expanded to include elections to the Scottish, UK and European Parliaments, to date this has not happened. It remains the case that its only statutory role relates to local government elections, though it continues to undertake roles in parliamentary elections on a non-statutory basis. The EMB has again demonstrated the added-value it brings to electoral events in Scotland and is recognised by stakeholders throughout the electoral community as providing effective leadership as it seeks to develop consistency of approach. In our view, the future statutory electoral framework for Scotland should include the EMB as it supports the provision of efficient and effective electoral administrative processes in the interests of the voter.

Following the referendum, the Smith Commission on further devolution of powers to the Scottish Parliament was established and presented its proposals, referred to as ‘the Smith Commission Agreement’, on 27 November 2014. This proposed that the Scottish Parliament be given powers over how its members are elected, together with powers to extend the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds, allowing them to vote in the 2016 Scottish Parliamentary elections. The Parliament would also be given additional powers in relation to local government elections. While ‘the Smith Commission Agreement’ envisages that the Electoral Commission will continue to operate on a UK-wide basis, it proposes that the Scottish Parliament will have competence over the functions of the Electoral Commission in relation to Scottish Parliamentary elections and local government elections in Scotland. The Electoral Commission would report to the UK Parliament in relation to UK and European Parliamentary elections and to the Scottish Parliament for Scottish Parliamentary and local government elections. The Commission has written to both the Scottish and UK Governments offering our assistance as they take forward the work needed to produce draft clauses implementing these proposals. Given the continuing development of the EMB and the need to secure its long-term funding and statutory arrangements, the Electoral Commission believes that 'the Smith Commission Agreement' presents an opportunity to secure the future restructuring of electoral matters in Scotland with the EMB playing an important role, delivering services which are in the interests of the voter. We recommend that the EMB's statutory remit is extended to Scottish, UK and European Parliamentary elections and that the Convener is given a power of direction at these elections. We also recommend that the long-term funding and legal status of the EMB be secured and clarified so that it can undertake fully the tasks it was envisioned it would carry out when the idea of the Board was recommended and accepted by governments in 2008. In making the above recommendations, the Commission would re-state its comment in the 2008 report 'Electoral Administration in Scotland' that it recognises that, as the EMB develops, this would impact upon our work. We said we would review our work in that light, which we continue to do. Regulating the campaigns SIRA contained a number of changes to the rules that applied at the 2011 referendums on increased powers for the National Assembly for Wales and the UK-wide referendum on UK Parliamentary Voting Systems. These changes were intended to clarify aspects of the regulatory controls, reduce burdens on those that wished to campaign, and ensure that voters had access to information to enable them to make an informed decision when they cast their vote. Overall, we believe that the regulatory controls that applied at the referendum worked well. There are, however, lessons that can be learnt for further refinement of the legal framework and for government spending during the referendum period.

Recommendations:

Future referendum legislation

Recommendation 1: Timing of legislation for future referendums

When considering proposals for any future referendum on any issue, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, governments should ensure that the timetable for developing and introducing all legislation provides sufficient opportunity for legislatures (including the Scottish Parliament and the UK Parliament where appropriate) to properly scrutinise those proposals, including considering the Electoral Commission's advice about the wording of the proposed referendum question. Governments should also acknowledge the importance of allowing sufficient time for campaigners, the Chief Counting Officer and Counting Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and the Electoral Commission to prepare for their respective roles in any referendum. In particular, legislation should be clear in sufficient time to allow robust and detailed guidance to be developed and provided to campaigners, Electoral Registration Officers or Counting Officers. We recommend that in planning for any future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, governments should aim to ensure that legislation (including any secondary legislation) is clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners, the Chief Counting Officer, Counting Officers or Electoral Registration Officers. This would mean that: Legislation for any changes to the franchise for a referendum should be clear at least six months before EROs are due to begin any scheduled annual canvass activities. Legislation for the regulation of referendum campaigners should be clear at least six months before the start of the regulated referendum period. Legislation relating to the conduct of a referendum poll, including secondary legislation such as Fees and Charges Orders, should be clear at least six months before polling day. Recommendation 2: Extending the franchise to 16 and 17 year olds We recommend that, when any policy maker or legislator is considering future legislation for referendums or elections with a franchise including 16 and 17 year olds, they consider the need to ensure legislation concerning the extension of the franchise is commenced six months prior to the beginning of the canvass in order to allow administrators to plan, both for the canvass and for related public awareness activities, including political literacy initiatives. Recommendation 3: Timing of polling day for future referendums We have previously recommended that any proposals to hold a referendum poll on the same day as the poll for other electoral events should be considered on a case-by-case basis and this remains our view. The priority in considering any such proposals has always been that voters and campaigners should be able to understand and easily participate in all of the polls, and that those responsible for running the polls are able to do so effectively. Governments and legislatures should take into account the anticipated level of public interest and potential for cross-party campaigning when considering proposals for the timing of any future referendum. Where significant cross-party campaigning for a future high-profile referendum is likely (such as, for example, a referendum on the UK's membership of the European Union), we would not expect the poll to be held on the same day as another set of polls. This would help ensure voters and campaigners are able to easily participate in the referendum and minimise the risk of voter confusion. Any government introducing legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should also publish at the same time its assessment of the implications of holding other polls on the same day. This will enable legislatures (including the Scottish Parliament and the UK Parliament) to consider the relative benefits and risks of the proposal as they scrutinise the referendum Bill. Recommendations:

Recommendation 4: Public awareness activity undertaken by the CCO and COs The public awareness activity undertaken by the CCO and COs benefitted voters through the provision of timely and localised information about their vote. In order to enable the CCO and COs to undertake activity to promote voter registration and voter information, and following a Commission recommendation from the 2011 referendums, the referendum legislation specifically exempted the CCO and COs from the ban on public bodies producing information relating to the referendum in the last 28 days leading to polling day. This exemption had important benefits for voters and we recommend that it be applied at any future referendums. Recommendation 5: on count procedures The Commission and others involved in the provision of public information regarding referendums and elections in Scotland and the rest of the UK need to address the issue of how we make the public more aware of count procedures. Recommendation 6: Issuing ballot papers to voters queuing at polling stations Legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but elsewhere in the UK, should ensure that eligible electors who are in the queue at their polling station at the close of poll are issued with a ballot paper and allowed to vote. Recommendations:

Campaign regulation

Recommendation 7: Eligibility to register as a referendum campaigner and donate The legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should ensure that the list of individuals and bodies eligible to register as a referendum campaigner and to donate to other campaigners is extended to mirror the list of eligible registered non-party campaigners under PPERA.

Recommendation 8: Responsible person The legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should ensure that the same person is not able to be the responsible person for more than one registered campaigner; and, in addition that: the person named as the responsible person is required to sign the application for registration as a campaigner, and for non-PPERA referendums, s.25 PPERA is replicated so that a political party's campaigns officer can take on the Treasurer's role of responsible person. Recommendation 9: Grounds for rejecting applications to register as a referendum campaigner The legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should ensure that the Commission is not required to accept a declaration for registration as a referendum campaigner if the campaigner proposes a registered name which: Would be the same as that of a permitted participant which is already registered. Is obscene or offensive. Includes words the publication of which would be likely to amount to the commission of an offence. Includes any prohibited word or expression. Recommendation 10: Approach to designation We would welcome the opportunity to work with relevant governments, not only in Scotland but also in other parts of the UK, when they are considering the legislation for future referendums, to consider the implications of enabling the Commission to designate one side of the referendum debate rather than requiring designation to be on both sides or not at all (as is required under PPERA). Recommendation 11: Early designation and the length of the referendum period The legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should ensure that designation is able to take place shortly before, rather than during the first six weeks of, the referendum period. We also recommend that consideration be given to the benefits of early designation when setting the legislative timetable. If circumstances mean that the legislative timetable is such that early designation is not possible, then our 2011 recommendation to extend the length of the referendum period to at least 16 weeks should be adopted. This would go some way to giving designated lead campaign groups more time to plan and use the benefits available. Recommendation 12: Pre-poll reporting The legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should ensure that pre-poll reporting of donations and loans over £7,500 received by registered campaigners (except political parties) for referendum purposes is again included as a reporting requirement. Recommendation 13: Grants to designated lead campaigners It is important that relevant governments, not only in Scotland but also those in other parts of the UK, give careful consideration to the principles of 'core funding' raised by the Committee on Standards in Public Life in its 1998 report when considering whether a publicly funded grant should be made available. For future non-PPERA referendums, relevant governments, not only in Scotland but also those in other parts of the UK, should be aware that the Commission may wish to comment on whether a grant should be available to designated lead campaigners. Recommendation 14: Imprints We continue to recommend that there should be proportionate imprint requirements on non-printed material at referendums and elections across the UK. However, we would welcome the opportunity to work with relevant governments, not only in Scotland but also in other parts of the UK, when they are considering future legislation for referendums, to ensure that the imprint rules strike the right balance between ensuring there is transparency about who is campaigning and proportionate and modern regulatory requirements. Recommendation 15: Restrictions on the publication of promotional material by central and local government Relevant governments, not only in Scotland but also those in other parts of the UK, should publicly commit to and refrain from, in practise, any paid advertising, including the delivery of booklets to households, which promotes a particular referendum outcome for the full duration of the referendum period. We agree in principle that a period of 28-days is an adequate duration for the restrictions on the publication of other promotional material by central and local government. However, to mitigate the risks of the relatively short period, it is important that relevant governments give careful consideration to the impact on the campaign and voters' trust in the rules of any referendum related information they publish before the restrictions come into force. It is also important that there is a clear explanation of the rules and how to comply with them for relevant public bodies to follow during that period. Recommendation 16:

Regulating campaign arguments We invite relevant governments, not only in Scotland but also those in other parts of the UK to restate for each future referendum that a role in regulating the campaign arguments is inappropriate for the Commission, or any other organisation tasked with regulating the referendum. Recommendations: Future conduct of the referendums and elections

Recommendation 17: Use of the mini-count approach to the verification and counting of votes Breaking down the verification and counting of votes into areas smaller than the total electoral or referendum area is a particularly effective method in achieving an accurate, timeous result with clear audit trails. Consequently, COs and returning officers in Scotland and elsewhere in the UK should consider utilising this approach when planning their verification and count at future electoral events.

Recommendation 18: National recounts The key factor in delivering a single national result for future any referendums is that high quality counts are undertaken in each counting area, so that confidence and trust in the overall result is achieved, as was the case at the independence referendum. We do not believe that it would be necessary for legislation for any future referendum on any issue, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, to provide powers for the Chief Counting Officer to direct national recounts to be carried out across all counting areas. Legislatures scrutinising future referendum legislation will want to consider the powers provided to Counting Officers for recounts at the local counting area level.

Recommendation 19: Prohibition on appointment of staff previously involved in campaigning The legislation for future referendums, not only in Scotland but also those held across or in other parts of the UK, should ensure that the prohibition on COs appointing people as polling station staff who have been involved in the campaigns for either outcome in the referendum, is extended to explicitly cover people employed by the CO at the verification and counting of votes.

Recommendation 20: Appointment of counting agents Limitations on the number of counting agents who can be appointed at count centres mean that in some circumstances agents of any given registered campaigner may be unable to properly scrutinise the conduct of the counting of votes. Although a restriction on the number of counting agents who can be appointed is necessary for logistical reasons it may be that changes are required to the way in which the representation of each referendum outcome is calculated. For example, it may be that a system which prioritises the appointment of an appropriate number of counting agents acting on behalf of the designated lead campaigners would be more effective. During the course of the referendum the Commission drew the attention of both lead campaigners and several other campaign organisations to the limitations on numbers of counting agents to ensure they were aware of a potential issue before it arose. For future referendum legislation in Scotland and elsewhere legislators may wish to consider if large numbers of registered campaigners are anticipated.

Recommendation 21: Instructions to voters on the folding of ballot papers and the Unique Identifying Number SIRA required and the guidance issued by the CCO highlighted the requirement of polling station staff to inform voters to fold the ballot paper after they had made their mark and then show the Unique Identifying Number to the Presiding Officer before placing the ballot paper in the box. Counting Officers and Returning Officers at future referendums and elections in Scotland and elsewhere in the UK should ensure that at training sessions for polling station staff the requirements for how the ballots are to be presented prior to their deposit in the ballot box are emphasised to staff. Recommendation 22: The future of the Electoral Management Board for Scotland Given the continuing development of the EMB and the need to secure its long-term funding and statutory arrangements, the Smith Commission Agreement presents an opportunity to secure the future re-structuring of electoral matters in Scotland with the EMB playing an important role, delivering services which are in the interests of the voter. We would therefore recommend: That the EMB's statutory remit is extended to all parliamentary elections and that the Convener is given a power of direction at these elections. The long term funding and legal status of the EMB must also be secured and clarified so that it can undertake fully the tasks it was envisioned it would carry out when the idea of a Board was recommended and accepted by governments in 2008. Recommendation 23: Integrity administrative issues: a single point of contact The Commission, while recognising the complexity of having many more police forces across the whole of the UK and their independence in operational terms, recommends that for future referendums at the UK level, Police Scotland, the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Police Service of Northern Ireland explore the possibility of establishing a single command structure to co-ordinate where necessary at UK level. Although established on an interim, non-statutory basis in November 2008, the EMB was not created in a statutory sense until given roles in Scotland's local government elections by the Local Electoral Administration (Scotland) Act 2011, which gave the Board "the general function of co-ordinating the administration of local government elections in Scotland." Its overall aim is to promote a consistent approach to electoral administration across Scotland with the interests of voters at the fore. Members of the Board are Returning Officers (Counting Officers for the referendum), their Deputies and Electoral Registration Officers and it is led by a Convener who is currently appointed by Scottish Ministers. It is advised by various professional electoral bodies, both the UK and Scottish Governments and the Electoral Commission. ■ Back to content at footnote 3 Related content Our advice on the proposed Scottish independence referendum question Read our advice on the proposed Scottish independence referendum question Donations and loans reported by campaigners at the Scottish referendum View donations and loans reported by campaigners at the Scottish referendum Campaign spending at the Scottish referendum View data about campaign spending at the Scottish independence referendum Report: Regulation of campaigners at the independence referendum held on 18 September 2014 Read our report about regulation at the Scottish independence referendum

Commissioners Code of Conduct for Electoral Commissioners On this page Introduction

Definitions Responsibilities Identifying, investigating and responding to fraud and bribery Administration First published: 6 March 2023 Last updated: 19 June 2023

Introduction The Commission requires all staff, at all times, to act honestly and with integrity. This includes safeguarding the public resources for which they are responsible and any other resources that fall within the Commission's responsibility.

The Commission has zero tolerance for fraud and bribery and is committed to ensuring that its systems and practices reduce the risk of fraud occurring. In addition, cases of actual or suspected fraud will be vigorously and promptly investigated and appropriate action will be taken. The purpose of this policy is to:

Set out staff responsibilities (as an individual and/or a manager) with regard to the prevention and detection of fraud;

Describe the procedures for notifying and investigating any allegations of fraud or bribery; and,

Provide advice and procedure for notifying any knowledge or suspicion of money laundering Audience

The policy applies to any fraud or suspected fraud, or any bribery or suspected bribery, involving employees in their work for the Commission, and in their dealings with stakeholders, consultants, vendors, contractors, outside agencies doing business with employees of such agencies, and/or any other parties with a business relationship with the Commission.

It also addresses how the Commission will collaborate with other public bodies in their efforts to tackle fraud or bribery. For the avoidance of doubt, issues of fraud or bribery in bodies regulated by the Commission or identified as a result of the Commission's regulatory work are addressed in the Commission's regulatory policies.

Definitions Fraud The Fraud Act 2006, which came into effect on 15 January 2007, creates a general offence of fraud with three ways of committing it: Fraud by false representation; Fraud by failing to disclose information; Fraud by abuse of position.

It also created new offences: Obtaining services dishonestly Possessing, making and supplying articles for use in frauds; Fraudulent trading applicable to non-corporate traders. For practical purposes fraud may be defined as the use of deception with the intention of obtaining an advantage, causing loss to another party or exposing another to a risk of loss. Actions which constitute fraud include: Any dishonest or fraudulent act; Forgery or alteration of any document or account belonging to the document; Misappropriation of funds, securities, supplies, or other assets;

Commission; Forgery or alteration of a cheque, bank draft, or any other financial

Impropriety in the handling or reporting of money or financial transactions;

Profiteering as a result of insider knowledge of the Commission's activities, possibly by making unauthorised use of information not yet released; Disclosing confidential and proprietary information to outside parties; Disclosing to other persons activities engaged in or contemplated by the Commission; Accepting or seeking anything of material value from contractors, vendors or persons providing services/materials to the Commission; Destruction, removal or inappropriate use of records, furniture, fixtures, and equipment; and/or Any similar or related inappropriate conduct. It is difficult and perhaps inadvisable to be prescriptive as to where these issues might affect the Commission. There are always new and unforeseen ways of using organisations in such operations. However, some examples of areas where the risk of fraud may be more likely to arise are: Making false claims for overtime, flexi-time, travel and subsistence claims; Falsification and duplication of invoices in order to generate a false payment; Misappropriation of grant funds; Unauthorised use of purchasing systems in order to misappropriate goods or use services for personal gain; Short deliveries of goods or services may be accepted as a result of collusion; Acceptance of unsolicited goods or expanded orders as a result fraudulent acceptance of attractions such as free gifts (see also clause 3.1 of the Code of Conduct on the Hospitality and Gifts Register); Misuse of procurement or credit cards; A contractor could be selected as a result of favouritism or who does not offer best value for money; Payments made for work not carried out as a result of collusion between the contractor and official; Theft or unauthorised use of assets; Theft of sensitive/restricted documentation or information. Money Laundering Money laundering is a specific form of fraud which is dealt with under specific laws. Money laundering is the process whereby criminals attempt to give the impression that money that they have is actually legally theirs and, therefore, they are legitimately able to spend it. If something is purchased with this money then it can either be used or sold and those proceeds of sale appear to be legitimate. Money laundering may involve: The physical disposal of cash proceeds derived from illegal activity; Creating complex layers of financial transactions to conceal the source of funds; Legitimising the proceeds of crime by returning them into the system as proper business funds. Offences, duties and responsibilities are contained in the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 as amended and related regulations. You are personally required, by law, to report any knowledge or suspicion of money laundering. Do not confront the person with your suspicions. There are criminal offences around Money Laundering, particularly if you disclose information that enables a suspect to conceal evidence and prejudices an investigation. It is very important, therefore, that if you have suspicions you keep these to yourself and in the first instance, report your suspicions to the Commission's General Counsel who is the Commission's Money Laundering Reporting Officer. General Counsel will inform appropriate senior managers, including the Chief Executive, internal and external auditors. This will enable initial consideration to be given to the matter. General Counsel will, if there are appropriate grounds report the matter to the relevant investigating authorities. Bribery The Bribery Act 2010 sets out offences that include: Bribing another person Being bribed Holding an organization to account if a person associated with the organization bribes another person. Having adequate procedures in place to prevent bribery is a defence to this offence. Bribery will occur in circumstances involving: The offering, giving, solicitation or the acceptance of any inducement or reward (whether financial or otherwise); To or from a person or company, wherever they are situated and whether they are a public official or body or private person or company; By any individual employee, Board Member or Commissioner, acting on the Commission's behalf; Which is intended to amount to or bring about improper performance of a relevant function or activity of the person or company; A relevant function will be: any function of a public nature; any activity connected with a business (including a trade or profession); any activity performed in the course of a person's employment; or any activity performed by or on behalf of a body of persons (whether corporate or unincorporate). Improper performance will occur where there has been a breach of a relevant expectation – i.e. the expectation that the function or activity will be performed in good faith, impartially and in a certain manner by the person who is in a position of trust. The Commission could therefore be affected by the bribing of others by its employees, or through its own officials being bribed by others.

Responsibilities

Staff responsibilities

Every member of staff is responsible for:

Acting with propriety in the use of resources and the handling and use of public funds whether they are involved with cash or payments systems, receipts or dealing with suppliers; Conducting themselves in accordance with the Commission's Code of Conduct and any other policies specifying staff behaviour ; Being alert to the possibility that unusual events or transactions could be indicators of fraud; Reporting details immediately through the appropriate channel if they suspect that a fraud has been committed or see any suspicious acts or events; and Cooperating fully with whoever is conducting internal checks or reviews or fraud investigations.

Manager responsibilities In addition to their responsibilities as staff members, all managers must be familiar with the types of improprieties that might occur within their area of responsibility, and be alert for any indication of irregularity.

Managers must also be alert for fraud and bribery across the Commission. This requires knowledge of the business as a whole, as well as specialist knowledge of their area of responsibility. Management at all levels within the Commission is responsible for the prevention and detection of fraud and bribery. In particular, they are responsible for: Identifying the risks to which systems, operations and procedures are exposed; Developing and maintaining effective controls to prevent and detect fraud; and Ensuring that controls are being complied with. Accounting

Officer's responsibilities The Accounting Officer, who is the Commission's Chief Executive, is responsible for establishing and maintaining a sound system of internal control that supports the achievement of departmental policies, aims and objectives.

The system of internal control is designed to respond to and manage the whole range of risks that a department faces. The system of internal control is based on an on-going process designed to identify the principal risks, to evaluate the nature and extent of those risks and to manage them effectively. Managing the risks of fraud and bribery will be seen in the context of the management of this wider range of risks.

The Commission's Accounting Officer has a responsibility to act in the wider interest of the Exchequer as well as specifically for the Commission. The Commission supports the Accounting Officer in this by providing all lawful support to other bodies' anti-fraud and anti-bribery efforts, both pro-actively where irregularity against another body is suspected and reactively when suspected irregularity is raised with the Commission by another body.

Internal Audit's responsibilities Internal Audit is responsible for: Delivering an annual opinion to the Accounting Officer on the adequacy of the system of internal controls, including arrangements for managing the risk of fraud and bribery; Assisting in the deterrence and prevention of irregularity by examining and evaluating the effectiveness of control commensurate with the extent of the potential exposure / risk in the various segments of the Commission's operations; Examining and advising upon the adequacy of arrangements by management to review and identify the possibility of fraud as a business risk; and Assisting those conducting internal fraud investigations.

External Audit responsibilities External Audit is responsible for: Conducting financial audit work in accordance with audit procedures that are designed to consider fraud; Carrying out targeted value for money studies that may identify and assess fraud risk, and raise awareness of control and system weaknesses; Considering regularity of expenditure with specific attention to risk of fraud and mitigation measures; and Taking appropriate action in response to disclosures under the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 i.e. whistle blowing.

Identifying, investigating and responding to fraud and bribery Procedures for:

Political Contributions Charitable Donations and Sponsorships Facilitation Payments Gifts, Hospitality and Travel Expenses Possible signs of impropriety Circumstances might lead you to suspect that a fraud may be planned or be taking place. You should then report the matter and put any planned transaction on hold. The sorts of questions you should be asking yourself include: Who are you dealing with? Where do they reside or work? What is their job (if relevant)? Are you unsure of any of these? You need to check to your satisfaction. Have you met the person with whom you are dealing? Be very cautious about persons acting for unknown third parties; get details of those third parties and make contact with them. Look out for the unusual, e.g. where there is a difference between the identity of the person with whom you are dealing and the details of an account or a difference between the account holder and the signatory or someone agreeing to a lesser sum too easily. Look out for what appears (without explanation) to be a loss-making activity, for example an uneconomic tender for work or an unrealistic price being paid for something. Managers and all other staff should also be alerted to any warning signs that might indicate that fraud is taking place within the Commission. These may include: staff under stress without a high workload; staff always working late without obvious explanation; staff reluctance to take leave; refusal of promotion; unexplained wealth; sudden change of lifestyle; new staff resigning quickly; close relationships with suppliers / contractors; suppliers / contractors who insist on dealing with one particular member of staff. Of course, many of these signs may have other causes and it is therefore important that any suspicions are investigated appropriately. Reporting fraud and bribery If you discover or suspect fraud or bribery you should, in the first instance, report your suspicions to your line manager. If such action would be inappropriate, your concerns should be reported to one of the following persons: General Counsel; or Internal Auditor. Alternatively, you may remain anonymous by telephoning the National Audit Office whistle blowing number (Tel 020 7798 7999). You should be careful not to reveal your suspicions to other people within or outside the Commission (except under whistleblowing arrangements), unless requested to do so by the person investigating. If you ask to have your identify protected and kept confidential, it will not be disclosed without your consent. If the situation arises where we are not able to resolve the concern without revealing your identify (e.g. evidence is needed at court) the Commission will discuss with you whether and how it can proceed. Investigating fraud and bribery Investigations into alleged bribery will as appropriate be taken forward by the police and/or consistent with the Commission's investigation procedure for fraud and bribery. Responding to fraud and bribery Where appropriate the Commission will respond to instances of fraud or bribery involving its staff in accordance with its disciplinary policy. The Commission will take appropriate steps, including legal action if necessary, to recover any losses arising from or related to fraud or bribery. This may include action against third parties involved in the bribery or whose negligent actions contributed to the bribery. Where instances of fraud or bribery affecting the Commission are identified (including 'near miss' instances) the Director, Finance and Corporate Services and General Counsel will undertake proportionate lessons learned exercises (supported by internal audit as appropriate) to ensure controls are appropriate. Administration Links to Risk Management Risks of fraud and bribery must be appropriately assessed by managers for their areas in line with this policy and included in risk registers where material. This should be reviewed in line with the Commission's risk management policies. Related Policies The Commission has a range of policies and procedures that deal with behaviour at work including: Code of Conduct; Whistleblowing Policy; Grievance Policy; Disciplinary Policy. This policy should be read in conjunction with the above policies and the relevant procedure followed where it is appropriate. If you are unsure which procedure may be appropriate HR will be able to advise. Equalities Impact Assessment This policy is based on a statutory requirement to prevent fraud and or bribery corrupting anyone in public office. It applies to all staff and it is not considered to have any adverse impact on anyone with the protected characteristics or anyone protected under Section 75 in Northern Ireland. As this is a statutory requirement for all public sector staff regardless of grade, area of work location, part time or full time etc, it has to be upheld regardless of protected or other characteristic. However, in all policies and statutory frameworks, managers should be mindful of any vexatious or malicious allegations and equally monitor if this is disproportionately brought against any particular groups of staff.

Consultation Executive Team, Auditors. Dissemination and communication plan Executive Team, Senior Leadership Team, Legal Team, all EC staff, Auditors. This policy should also be published on the staff intranet. Review This policy should be reviewed every 2 years. If there has been an incidence of fraud or bribery, a review should be undertaken to assess the effectiveness of this policy. Our report on the UK Government's draft statutory instrument to reform the annual canvass | Electoral Commission Search Our report on the UK Government's draft statutory instrument to reform the annual canvass You are in the Our responses to consultations section Home Our responses to consultations First published: 12 July 2019 Last updated: 25 July 2019 Introduction This response sets out our views on the UK Government's draft statutory instrument to amend the process for conducting the annual canvass of electors. We have assessed: whether the current annual canvass system meets its objective of identifying people who should be added to the register, and identifying deletions from the register the extent to which the objective of the canvass would be met if the order proposed by the UK Government was brought into force the merits of alternative ways of meeting the objective of the canvass Summary We welcome the UK Government's proposals for reform of the annual canvass process and see these as an important first step in modernising electoral registration. We have assessed the canvass reform proposals against the objective of the canvass, which is to identify eligible electors who should be added to the register and necessary deletions from the register. The canvass reform proposals should result in greater efficiency, allowing Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) to focus their increasingly limited resources on areas of greatest need thereby better meeting the objective of the canvass. However, the success of canvass reform is highly dependent on new data-sharing mechanisms and careful planning and implementation activities being completed in good time ahead of the start of the 2020 annual canvass, which will commence from July 2020. Beyond the changes proposed in the draft regulations, additional reforms could further improve the efficiency of the electoral registration process. These include: enhanced digital data sharing between organisations holding public data and EROs; automated and automatic registration; and the integration of electoral registration into other public service transactions. We have conducted feasibility studies on each of these reforms and would welcome the opportunity to discuss the findings with the Government and other interested groups.

The canvass process now In recent decades there have been significant changes to key aspects of the electoral registration system, notably, the introduction of year-round rolling registration in 2001, and individual electoral registration and online registration in 2014. These changes have meant that the annual canvass is no longer the only way for EROs to identify new electors or changes of address. Under the current rigid statutory requirements for the canvass, EROs have to carry out the same steps in order to obtain a response from every address, even if there has been no change in the people living there who are eligible to be registered. This means that EROs are unable to focus their resources in areas of greatest need, and a disproportionate amount of resource is required to be directed at canvass activity which does not identify eligible electors who should be added to the register or necessary deletions from the register. We do not believe that the current system is meeting the objective of the canvass as well as it should, nor do we believe the model is sustainable in the short to medium term. The current process is characterised by inefficiency, with a disproportionate amount of resource required to be directed to activity which is delivering declining results. The canvass process now: accordions How we made our assessment As part of our report we are required to assess whether the current system meets the objective of the canvass, which is to identify eligible electors who should be added to the register and necessary deletions from the register. We have used three types of evidence to do this: Evidence about the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers. This provides an indication of how effective current electoral registration processes, including the annual canvass, have been in maintaining the registers. Evidence about the extent to which the annual canvass remains the principal mechanism by which the electoral registers are maintained. Evidence about whether the annual canvass in its current form is fit for purpose, particularly given its inflexibility and resource pressures within local government. The current annual canvass system The annual canvass is essentially an information gathering exercise on potential additions and deletions to the register and is a key tool in helping to maintain the accuracy and completeness of the registers. Historically, the annual canvass was the primary mechanism by which EROs have sought to find out the names and addresses of people who are entitled to be registered but are not registered, or who are registered but are not entitled. In recent decades, there have been major changes to key aspects of the electoral registration system which have had an impact on how the registers are maintained. These changes include rolling registration (introduced in 2001 to allow people to register at any time throughout the year); and individual electoral registration and online registration in 2014. These changes mean that the annual canvass is no longer the only way for EROs to identify new electors or changes of address. During the annual canvass, EROs are required to send a canvass form (Household Enquiry Form (HEF)) to every property in their area. The HEF asks those resident to state whether there have been any changes in the composition of the household. This information is used to identify where people are missing from the register who may need to be invited to apply to register, or where individuals may have moved and their eligibility to remain on the register needs to be considered.

The current legislation also requires EROs to issue two written reminders and carry out at least one visit to any non-responding properties. The annual canvass is not a registration exercise on its own as any potential eligible electors returned in a HEF must apply to register individually before they can be added to the register.

Accuracy and completeness of the registers We undertake research to measure the quality of the electoral registers on a periodic basis. Evidence about the accuracy and completeness of the registers helps provide an indication of how effective current methods of maintaining the register are. Our study of the December 2015 Great Britain registers (those published at the end of the transition to IER) indicated that the local government registers were 91% accurate and 84% complete, with the parliamentary registers being 91% accurate and 85% complete. These figures meant that an estimated 8 million people were missing from the electoral registers. Our research on the electoral registers in Great Britain confirms the correlation between certain demographics and lower or higher levels of completeness, with age and mobility still found to be the variables with the strongest impact: the young and those more likely to move home are less likely to be registered. Our December 2015 study found: A clear connection between home movement and completeness: as the register is a property-based database, greater mobility is associated with lower levels of completeness while the longer an individual has been resident at their property, the more likely they are to appear on the electoral register. The highest level of completeness was for those aged 65+ (96%) with the lowest level recorded for attainers (16 and 17 year olds, 45%). There was also a decline in completeness among those aged under 45. The fall among 18-19 year olds, 25-34 year olds and 35-44 year olds was statistically significant. Although evidence suggests that the accuracy of the electoral registers has improved significantly since the introduction of IER (91% accurate as at 1 December 2015, an improvement of four percentage points during the transition to IER), we estimated that there were still between 4 and 4.5 million inaccurate entries on the local government electoral registers. Evidence about the accuracy and completeness of the registers suggests that current methods employed to maintain the registers, including the annual canvass, are not necessarily working as effectively as they could, particularly in relation to capturing traditionally under-registered groups. One advantage of canvass reform is that it could help EROs tackle under-registration by enabling better targeting of resources in areas of greatest need, leading to more effective identification and registration of eligible electors.

However, while we believe canvass reform is a positive step, more far-reaching reforms of the electoral registration system will be required to fully address the challenges of achieving accurate and complete registers. This point is expanded on further in section 'other ways for EROs to get the information they need' of this report. Registration outside the canvass period Information about the patterns of electoral registration activity can provide further insight into the effectiveness of the annual canvass, particularly when we compare the latter to other methods of maintaining the register. An increasing number of citizens are registering outside the canvass period. The UK's governments' joint policy statement noted that 'in 2016 there were twice as many additions to the register outside the canvass period than during the canvass, signalling that the canvass itself is becoming less important in registering eligible electors'. Our own analysis published in 2017 showed that the number of applications appears to be related to the proximity of high-profile electoral events. For example, more than 2.9 million applications to register to vote were made between the Prime Minister's announcement on 18 April 2017 of her intent to hold a general election and the deadline for applications on 22 May. More than 96% of these applications were made using the online service. EROs are required to draw on their local annual budgets to deal with the impact of such unplanned national electoral events. The increasing link between electoral registration and electoral events means that the following annual canvass is less likely to identify eligible electors who should be added to the register, which undermines the achievement of an integral part of the objective of the canvass. In addition, EROs have little flexibility to reflect this in their canvassing methods, resulting in inefficiencies.

Some form of contact at a household level is likely, at least in the short to medium term, to remain a key method by which EROs audit their registers, review the accuracy of their records and initiate steps to remove redundant entries, particularly in years where there are no major polls. However, the changing patterns of registration activity mean that a review of the annual canvass is timely. This should also include an examination of the balance of funding and resources for EROs between election-specific activities and the annual canvass of properties. In a digital age, as modernising our elections moves forward there is real opportunity to achieve more fundamental improvements to the system. These should focus on the benefits and costs of more joined-up, data-driven, year-round registration solutions, including an appraisal of the place and format of the annual canvass in such a system.

Inflexibility of the annual canvass The previous section highlights one of the main problems with the current canvass process: its inflexibility. Although the objective of the canvass is to identify potential additions to and deletions from the electoral register, most people (on average 88% of residents across Great Britain) do not move address in any given year. Despite this EROs are legally required, from 1 July each year, to send every household in their area a HEF which says who is registered at that address and asks for changes to be indicated where necessary. When they do not receive a response to that initial form they must send two postal reminders and carry out a household visit in order to encourage a response. This means that, depending on when or if a household responds, they can be contacted up to four times during the canvass. This is not a particularly efficient use of public money and strengthens the case for developing other ways to establish whether any changes are likely to have occurred in respect of any particular property. Resource challenges Responses to our management information survey issued to EROs in early October 2017 revealed that a number of EROs were facing resource challenges in relation to the canvass, which resulted in problems recruiting and retaining sufficient canvassers. There were also several instances where EROs, in an attempt to seek a more cost effective approach to the canvass, appear to have adopted practices which were not strictly in accordance with the legal requirements of issuing and following up HEFs. The current 'one-size-fits-all' approach is not flexible enough to accommodate the differing requirements of individuals, types of properties or resource pressures within local authorities, nor does it enable process and technological innovations to be explored and utilised. This further undermines the effectiveness of the current approach. The proposed canvass process The new canvass process should allow EROs in Great Britain to focus their resources in areas of greatest need, and better meet the objective of the canvass than the current system. Giving EROs access to robust national-level data about the resident population will help them to identify addresses where there is likely to have been a change in the people who are eligible to be registered to vote. The proposed process will reduce the cost of the activity required for properties where there has been no change of residents; EROs will be able to focus their efforts at addresses where there has been change. These changes are highly dependent on new data sharing mechanisms, which need careful implementation in good time ahead of the start of the 2020 annual canvass, which will commence from July 2020. The proposed canvass process: accordions Developing the reformed canvass model A number of alternative canvassing models were piloted in 2016 and 2017. The pilots were set up by Cabinet Office and individual EROs, and we undertook an evaluation of them. Our evaluation highlighted the potential to make better use of data to improve the efficiency of canvassing, particularly by reducing the follow-up work necessary with data-matched households and delivering cost savings. Based on the evidence from the pilots, the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments concluded that a hybrid model, taking the successful elements of each of the models and refining certain processes, was the best way forward. This model is provided for in the draft regulations and require EROs first to perform a data match step, which will determine whether to follow a new lighter touch canvass process or the modified full canvass process for a specific property. The idea is that the canvass process will be streamlined for those properties which are likely to have not changed household composition, allowing the ERO to target their resources to where responses and updates to the electoral register are required. There is also an exemptions process for certain types of properties less suited to traditional canvassing methods – for example, care homes, Houses in Multiple Occupation and student halls of residence – which allows the ERO to seek information on residents in a different way. We are required to assess whether the reformed canvass process as proposed would meet the objective of the canvass to identify eligible electors who should be added to the register and necessary deletions from the register. In order to answer this question we have focused on the following areas: Annual canvass data matching exercise Modified full canvass process Canvass communications and form design Effective planning and implementation Potential benefits of the data match step The draft regulations require EROs first to undertake a prescribed data match step, the results of which will determine whether EROs follow a 'light touch' process or the modified full canvass process. The data match step should enable EROs to identify households which are likely not to have changed composition, providing an indication that any additions or deletions are not likely to be required for those properties. This will allow a more efficient way of identifying households where a change in composition is likely to have occurred and where the full canvass process would be necessary. To that extent, data matching should still enable the objective of the canvass to be met, but more efficiently insofar as the processes followed would be more proportionate to the likelihood of change having occurred within a particular household. The new lighter touch canvass process will reduce the cost of the activity required for properties where there has been no change of residents – EROs will be able to focus their efforts at addresses where there has been change. Conditions of successful data matching There are several factors that will be important for the success of data matching. The first concerns whether the datasets to be used for data matching will be of sufficient quality to allow EROs to make robust decisions about which process to follow for each property in their area. The draft regulations require entries on the electoral register to be matched against a national dataset; this will be the Department for Work and Pensions' Customer Information System (DWP CIS). The joint policy statement refers to the DWP CIS dataset being on average 95.4% accurate, making reference to the results of a data matching pilot scheme from 2012. The statement explains that the DWP CIS "is also acknowledged as one of the most comprehensive datasets in the country, covering virtually all those aged 16 years and above. Following discussions with DWP there is no reason to believe this accuracy rate has decreased, indeed it is more likely that the accuracy has probably increased". This suggests that the DWP CIS is a comprehensive and largely accurate dataset, providing some assurance that its use should not lead to poorly targeted canvassing of properties. The evaluation of 'confirmation' (i.e. the data matching of names and addresses on the electoral register against the DWP CIS to support of the transition to IER) found that 79% of electors matched against DWP records. This suggests that the dataset has good overall coverage and should provide a cost-effective basis for canvass reform. Other reliable national data sources may become available in the future, which could potentially improve the effectiveness of the data match step and pave the way for further registration reform. However, the draft regulations are not future proofed in this way and we would therefore recommend that they be amended accordingly. The explanatory memorandum to the draft regulations refers to EROs being able to take into account 'any other information or local data sources they hold as part of the data match step'. This information may be taken into account in an ERO's decision to put a property down the light touch process. We understand that the intention is that EROs will be able to access local data using Regulation 23, 35 or 35A powers, but would recommend that in the interests of clarity these powers are referred to explicitly in the draft regulations. More fundamentally, it is essential that only good quality, accurate, locally-held data should be used when matching electoral registration records ahead of the annual canvass. The draft regulations do not specify the types of factors that EROs should take into account when deciding whether to use specific local datasets. Clear guidance will therefore be required to support EROs with identifying and using data sets appropriately.

Continued importance of full canvassing The draft regulations provide for the full annual canvass process to be conducted in cases where the data match indicates there has been a change in household composition. We agree that the initial contact with properties subject to the full canvass process should be by sending a paper form to the property. Where an ERO believes there may have been some change in occupancy, it would not be logical to send an electronic contact to an individual who is currently registered at the property. We agree that EROs should continue to be required to make several contacts with these properties, to ensure that they obtain the information they need to either identify changes in residents, or confirm that there has in fact been no change. We also support the introduction of some discretion for EROs to vary the way that follow-up contacts are made, allowing EROs to target their resources based on an assessment of what will work best. Our evaluation of the annual canvass pilots in 2017 showed that using different contact methods could result in higher response rates than when the same approach was made repeatedly. The retention of the full canvass process in cases where data matching has indicated a change in household composition will be essential in enabling EROs to continue to meet the objective of the canvass to identify eligible electors who should be added to the register and necessary deletions from the register. Canvass communications and form design The draft regulations place a duty on the Electoral Commission to design three types of written paper canvass communications: a paper communication for use during the light touch canvass (Canvass Communication A); a canvass form to be used for the modified full canvass process (Canvass Form); and a paper communication alternative to the Canvass Form for use during the full canvass process (Canvass Communication B). We note that Canvass Communication B has no prescribed content. We welcome the flexibility and scope for innovation that this provides and will work closely with EROs and Electoral Management Software (EMS) suppliers to ensure this is an effective alternative communication to the Canvass Form. We will also undertake user testing to ensure that this communication is easy for citizens to understand and complete.

Effective planning and implementation The changes provided for in the draft regulations are highly dependent on new data matching mechanisms. Coordinated and timely development and testing of the digital elements of the reforms will be essential if the changes are to be implemented in good time for the start of the 2020 annual canvass, which will commence from July 2020. It is clear that the window of opportunity for implementing the proposals is small and there is little room for slippage. We understand that digital work is underway in a number of key areas, including with EMS suppliers, DWP, Cabinet Office and the IER digital service, to develop the necessary infrastructure to support canvass reform. This work will require effective communication between partners and close management attention to ensure the key elements of canvass reform are delivered on schedule. Changes to EMS systems and the IER digital service to support both national and local data matching will be crucial, as will a robust training needs assessment to identify the precise requirements of EROs and their teams. EROs will also need access to reliable management information, via their EMS systems, to help them understand the impact of their activities during the reformed annual canvass. The canvass reform legislation should be clear at least six months before the commencement of the 2020 canvass (i.e. regulations should be made by Parliament by the end of December 2019). This will enable EROs to plan effectively for the changes, and provide adequate time for the user testing and translating of forms and materials, as well as the provision of revised guidance for EROs. Any delays to the making of the legislation will increase the risks around timely and effective implementation of the proposals. The UK's governments will also need to consider how these important changes will be delivered alongside other significant electoral registration and franchise reforms that are currently being considered by governments and legislatures. These include allowing all British citizens overseas to register to vote at UK Parliament elections, allowing 16 and 17 year-olds to vote at Welsh elections, and extending the franchise in Scottish elections to citizens of all nationalities legally resident in Scotland.

Other ways for EROs to get the information they need Beyond the changes proposed in the draft regulations, there are further reforms which would help EROs to better meet the objective of the canvass in future. The UK's governments should build on the use of DWP data at the start of the annual canvass, and explore additional ways to improve the accuracy and completeness of electoral registers. They should learn from the ways other countries use data to compile and maintain electoral registers. EROs could use robust data from other public organisations throughout the year to identify people who are not currently registered. Taking steps to encourage registration applications throughout the year would improve the match with DWP data at the start of the canvass. This reform could be taken further by introducing systems of automated or automatic registration. The electoral registration process should also be more widely integrated into other public service transactions. This would enable simultaneous voter registration applications alongside accessing other public services, and offer further potential benefits in relation to improved accuracy and completeness of the registers. We have carried out feasibility studies to show how these changes could be implemented in the UK. We will publish these in summer 2019, and look forward to discussing the findings with governments and other interested groups.

Other ways for EROs to get the information they need: accordions

Continuing reform and modernisation Reform of the annual canvass represents an important step to modernise the electoral registration system, but there is more that should be done to ensure we have an effective, joined-up and year-round registration process. We want the UK's governments to develop longer-term plans for electoral registration reform that build on the canvass reform proposals. Successful implementation and integration of canvass reform into business as usual practices in the electoral registration system is the clear priority over the short to medium term. However, the universal embedding of a more data-driven approach to managing the annual canvass offers considerable scope for reforming the system further. This should aim to reflect people's changing expectations in a digital society by building on the increasing use of data across the public and private sectors to the benefit of citizens and the delivery of efficiencies. The goal is an electoral registration system that is more joined-up with other public services, making registering to vote even simpler for the public and more efficient for EROs. This must include exploring the potential for integrating applications into other public service transactions, and making better use of national data to identify new electors or home movers. In addition, automatic registration methods should be explored further, drawing on other countries' experiences.

Feasibility studies To help inform the debate about continuing reform and modernisation, we recently completed a series of feasibility studies on the following reforms:

- Better use of public data by EROs EROs can currently access data held locally by local authorities and others to help identify potential electors and manage their electoral registers. We wanted to explore the potential benefits for voters and EROs of enabling access to non-local public data. This could be particularly useful in helping to identify people who have changed address and updated their details with other public services, for example when they have applied for a driving licence or passport.
- Direct or automatic enrolment processes Building on the better use of public data study, we examined options for increasing the level of automation within the electoral registration system. We explored the feasibility of introducing systems of:
 - automatic registration – where citizens would be added to the electoral register, or their address updated, without them being required to take any further steps at all;
 - automated registration – where reliable data would serve as the basis of an individual's electoral registration application, but the individual would still be required to take some further, affirmative steps before being added to the register. Integrating electoral registration into other public service transactions We examined the extent to which the electoral registration process could enable simultaneous voter registration applications alongside accessing other public services. Better identification and management of duplicate registration applications We also considered a number of potential ways in which duplicate applications might be better identified and managed within the system to understand how such reforms could be implemented in the UK and inform the debate. Importantly, we found that these reforms are feasible from a technical perspective and could be implemented without radically altering the structure of the electoral registration system in the UK. In particular, technology already employed by the IER Digital Service could form the building blocks for these reforms. EROs would require access to a wider range of national data sources, including transactional data held by organisations including DVLA, HM Passport Office, HMRC and those within the education sector to help identify, target and potentially register citizens. The potential benefits of these reforms include: Improving the accuracy and completeness of the registers by giving EROs additional tools with which to identify and potentially register new eligible citizens, including under-registered groups; and helping ensure electoral registration entries are kept up-to-date Opening up additional registration channels to improve accessibility of the electoral registration system Improving the ability to detect and prevent fraud, and provide the necessary basis for any move towards different ways of voting in the future Reducing the overall costs of electoral registration further through more efficient processes We intend to publish the findings of the feasibility studies this summer and would welcome the opportunity to discuss them with governments and other interested groups. Context More information on our response We welcome the proposals to reform the annual electoral registration canvass in Great Britain and the opportunity to comment more specifically on the UK Government's draft Representation of the People (Annual Canvass) (Amendment) Regulations 2019. The Cabinet Office launched the formal consultation with the Electoral Commission on 27 March 2019. We were subsequently sent an updated version of the draft regulations on 21 May 2019 and our comments set out in this report reflect our review of that later version. The Scottish Government and Welsh Government are bringing forward their own regulations in order to apply these reforms to the local government registers in Scotland and Wales, with the aim of ensuring that the respective regulations are as consistent as possible, thereby reducing the risk of confusion for Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) and electors. We are currently being consulted on the draft Representation of the People (Annual Canvass) (Scotland) Regulations 2019 and expect to be consulted imminently on the Welsh legislation. Section 8 of the Electoral Registration and Administration Act 2013 requires the Commission to prepare a report assessing: Whether the current system meets the objective of the canvass to identify eligible electors who should be added to the register and necessary deletions from the register The extent to which the objective of the canvass would be met if the order made under Section 7 of the Electoral Registration and Administration Act 2013 was brought into force The merits of alternative ways of meeting the objective of the canvass We have welcomed early dialogue with Cabinet Office officials on the technical detail of the draft regulations. During the consultation period we received comments on the canvass reform proposals and draft regulations from the Association of s (AEA) and the Scottish Assessors' Association (SAA). We have taken these into account in developing our response. The comments set out in this report also build on our November 2018 response to the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments' joint policy statement on proposals for reform of the annual canvass. Attitudes to voter registration research report You are in the Our research section Home Our research On this page Public attitudes to registering to vote Participants were positive towards the routes to registration Enablers to registration Barriers to registration Motivational mindsets Methodology Objectives Download the full report First published: 24 March 2023 Last updated: 24 March 2023 Public attitudes to registering to vote Public attitudes to registering to vote This qualitative research looks at public attitudes to registering to vote, with a particular focus on barriers to registration faced by people who are eligible to vote in the UK. There were a total of 133 interviews. 93 were 30-minute pre-recruited and 40 were 20-minute hall-test depth interviews, exploring attitudes across a range of different groups. The interviews focused on awareness about the process of registering to vote and enablers and barriers to registration. Participants were positive towards the routes to registration Participants who were registered to vote were more likely to recall receiving information about registering and recall the registration process than their unregistered counterparts. Letters were a primary prompt for participants, reminding them to register to vote and to provide information about the registration process. This was particularly the case among registered participants. Registered participants recalled the process of registering as simple, and unregistered participants assumed the process would be easy. Overall, participants were positive towards the routes to registration and reported that they would go online if they wanted to find more information about registering to vote.

Enablers to registration The primary enabler and motivation for registering was having your say and being able to vote. Participation in the democratic process emerged as important across both registered and unregistered participants. Social norming played a prominent role with participants often echoing behaviours and views of family and friends. Influencers in educational settings were often noted as promoting registration and voting amongst younger people. Individual benefits, such as improvements to credit ratings, were appealing as they were considered practical and tangible. Data collection via voter registration for local councils and the Government was generally understood to be beneficial but held limited motivational impact.

Barriers to registration Three groups of barriers to registration were identified: mindset towards voting knowledge barriers practical barriers Participants with mindset barriers included those who expressed apathy (disinterest in voting) and disillusionment (distrust in the political system and politics). Where a mindset barrier existed, this was a primary barrier to registration. Knowledge barriers included a lack of awareness of eligibility, lack of knowledge and confidence to make an informed vote, lack of understanding of the registration process and incorrect assumptions about registration status. Practical barriers focused on a lack of urgency or priority to register to vote. Other practical barriers included concerns about required documentation, privacy of personal information and the time it would take to register.

Motivational mindsets Application of the COM-B behavioural framework highlights that the primary barrier or enabler to registration is motivational. The research has observed three motivational mindsets which act as the primary building block in registration behaviour. Two of these are barrier mindsets and include disillusionment in the political system or politicians, and apathy towards voting. The third is an enabling mindset focusing on engagement in having your say or voice heard. The research suggests that there are a range of motivational, capability-based and opportunity-based hooks which could encourage registration across these mindsets.

Methodology A total of 133 depth interviews were carried out across pre-recruited and hall-test depth interviews. This sample size was developed to allow the research to engage and explore attitudes amongst different groups that had been identified as less likely to be registered to vote in previous Electoral Commission research . These groups included: Younger people aged under 34 years. Whilst there was a focus on this age group, the research also included a sample of those aged 35+ years to ensure inclusion from those across age groups Recent movers (those who had moved home within the last two years) People from an ethnic minority background. The research included at least five depth interviews with participants from each of the following backgrounds: Indian, Pakistani, Bangladeshi, Black African and Black Caribbean Private renters A sample plan was developed to focus on these groups and include both registered and unregistered participants. This enabled the research to explore both reasons for registration and barriers to registration. Participants for the pre-recruited depth interviews were recruited from across England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. The hall tests took place in Wolverhampton and Leeds. Both locations include constituencies with a low turn-out in the 2019 General Election and were therefore identified as areas that may have lower levels of registration. Given the scope and timeframe for this study, registration status for each individual was based on self-reported registration status. Screening questions were developed to gather as close to an accurate report of registration status as possible. This included questions about ways in which people had registered, any receipt of a poll card and participation in voting. Objectives This research set out to explore attitudes towards registration amongst the public. Specifically, the research sought to explore: Barriers to registration. Understanding why people are not registered to vote and what could encourage unregistered people to register. Enablers to registration. Understanding why people are registered to vote. Awareness around registration. Understanding current knowledge levels around how to register and any misconceptions about the process of registering. First published: 7 January 2020 Last updated: 7 January 2020 Introduction December 2019 This response sets out the Electoral Commission's views on the Local Government and Elections (Wales) Bill. We have responded to the provisions in this Bill that are directly relevant to our work, and have also highlighted aspects of electoral law reform that we have previously recommended which do not appear in the Bill. We have previously set out our views on many of the issues that have now been included in the Bill in our response to the Welsh Government consultation on Local Government Electoral Reform in October 2017. We continue to recommend that all legislation should be clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with. This includes both this Bill and any secondary legislation that is subsequently required to specify the detail of how any provisions will work in practice. The timetable for this legislation will therefore need careful consideration given those provisions which are expected to be in place ahead of the local government elections in Wales in May 2022. The introduction of this Bill takes place in the context of a wider electoral reform agenda in Wales with changes about to be enacted for the National Assembly for Wales/Senedd elections. We expect that Welsh Government will continue to work closely with the Assembly Commission to ensure that any reforms to electoral arrangements for local government elections in Wales are not made in isolation but take into account this wider context. The provisions in this Bill address a number of concerns that we have highlighted in recent years about the delivery of elections. This is welcome. Nevertheless, electoral law remains fragmented and outdated. We strongly support the recommendations made by the UK's Law Commissions which aim to consolidate, simplify and modernise the many existing sources of electoral law. Further to this Bill, we urge Welsh Government to take their recommendations forward and to consolidate and wherever possible simplify the rules for National Assembly and local government elections. Key points Key points All primary and secondary legislation needed to change the franchise for the local government elections scheduled for May 2022 should be clear six months before Electoral Registration Officers are due to begin annual canvass activities in summer 2021 to enable all those who are newly eligible to vote to be able to register and participate in the elections. Welsh Government should commit to providing adequate resources to Returning Officers, Electoral Registration Officers and local authorities to ensure that any changes to the electoral process as a result of the provisions in the Bill can be implemented in the best interests of voters. Any divergence in the franchise for different sets of elections, using the Parliamentary register and the Local Government register will introduce the possibility of confusion for voters, candidates and campaigners, as well as administrative challenges. Similarly, a potential divergence in the electoral system across Wales for local government elections could cause significant confusion among voters and any public awareness work to address this will be challenging. The Wales Electoral Coordination Board should be consulted on any proposals relating to electoral matters included in the Bill and should play a full part in the effective implementation of any new changes. Extension of right to vote in local government elections We provided a detailed response on the proposed extension to the franchise in our responses to consultations in April 2017 and in October 2017 . In these we made clear that the Commission does not take a view on the principle of extending the franchise. This is because the Commission believes it is for the Welsh Government and, ultimately, the National Assembly for Wales to decide on the franchise for local government elections in Wales. However, as we explained, there are a number of practical implications which would need to be considered if a change to the franchise was introduced to include votes for 16 and 17 year olds and qualifying foreign citizens: Welsh Government should ensure that all primary and secondary legislation is clear six months before EROs are due to begin annual canvass activities in July 2021 (i.e. by January 2021). This would enable all those who are newly eligible to vote to register and participate in the 2022 local government elections in Wales. We will then need to update our advice and guidance for EROs in advance of the annual canvass in 2021 and for Returning Officers (ROs) ahead of the election in 2022, to reflect any changes to the franchise. We would also need to allow time for user testing of forms so that they are finalised and available for EROs to use six months before the election. Welsh Government should make sure that any changes are adequately resourced to ensure that they can be implemented effectively and efficiently in the best interests of voters in Wales. The proposed franchise changes would mean that the electoral register for Welsh elections would be very different to the register for Parliamentary elections. This could present challenges for voters who may not understand why they can vote in some elections and not others and to electoral administrators in administering two separate registers. The Commission stands ready to work with the Welsh Government and the wider electoral community to ensure a smooth transition if the franchise is changed. We have experience in supporting franchise changes from Scotland and would be happy to discuss further the approach we took to encourage registration among 14 to 17 year olds and how we could apply this learning to Wales. Duty to promote awareness and provide assistance We welcome the duty in the Bill for principal councils to promote awareness among young people about the new arrangements for registering to vote in local government elections in Wales. However, consideration should be given to apply this duty to EROs instead of, or as well as, the principal council. This is because, the ERO is appointed by the county or county borough council and has an independent statutory role under Section 9A of the Representation of the People Act 1983 (RPA) to take all necessary steps to comply with their duty to maintain the electoral register, and to ensure, as far as is reasonably practicable, that all those eligible are registered in it. We run public awareness campaigns ahead of each set of elections to encourage voter registration. If the franchise is extended we would undertake targeted public awareness activities aimed specifically at these new electors informing them that they are eligible to vote and how they can register. We intend to run two campaigns – one around the annual canvass in 2021 and another in advance of the election in 2022. We are currently working with Welsh Government and other organisations such as the Assembly Commission and Electoral Reform Society, to create potential new educational resources for delivery by schools aimed at young people which would be used as part of our awareness work. Voting systems for elections to principal councils The introduction of two different voting systems As set out in our previous response , decisions about which voting system(s) should be used for local government elections in Wales is a significant constitutional issue and is a matter for Welsh Government.

However, allowing local authorities to decide which electoral system to use in their own area could increase the risk of voter confusion, particularly in relation to voter understanding of how to cast their vote, as well as raising administrative risks and challenges - for example, in terms of introducing new procedures for managing the count and providing adequate training for staff. This type of divergence would also raise significant challenges for candidates, agents, parties and other campaigners. If this type of change were to be implemented, the Commission itself would be required to: publish two sets of guidance for electoral administrators in Wales so that ROs know how to run a local government election under both first past the post (FPTP) and the Single Transferable Vote (STV) system publish two sets of advice and guidance for political parties, candidates and agents and non-party campaigners, one for each voting system potentially run separate public awareness campaigns ahead of scheduled local government elections, one focussing on a FPTP system and another on STV Managing an effective public awareness campaign in Wales ahead of one set of local government elections which implements two different electoral systems is likely to be a major challenge. Ensuring voters only saw or heard or were able to identify the information that is relevant to their voting system would be problematic, even with targeted digital advertising. The risk of voter confusion would therefore be high. If different voting systems were used for local government elections across Wales, this would make national planning and consistency very challenging. There is strong support in Wales for consistency and co-operation in the interest of delivering efficient and trusted electoral processes.

The Wales Electoral Coordination Board was established to encourage consistency in the management of elections and electoral registration across Wales. Welsh Government officials are formal advisors to the Board and Ministers have also attended meetings.

We recommended in 2017 that the Welsh Government should consider how the role of the Board could be developed in the medium to long term to support Welsh Government's overarching electoral modernisation programme. This might include, for example, considering if the Board should become a statutory group, as is the case in Scotland.

Resolutions to exercise the power to change the voting system We welcome Section 9 of the Bill which would ensure sufficient time – at least 17 months – for the Electoral Commission, ROs and campaigners to prepare, and to inform voters, about any change in voting system ahead of future elections. Initial review by the Local Democracy and Boundary Commission Paragraph 4(1) of Schedule 1 to the Bill would give Welsh Ministers the power to direct when the Local Democracy and Boundary Commission should submit their final review report. When considering a date for this report, Welsh Ministers should ensure that it allows sufficient time for any Order setting out any new ward arrangements to be made so that electoral administrators can complete the annual canvass and publish the revised register of electors reflecting the new boundaries in the year before the first elections at which those boundaries would apply. Rules about the conduct of local elections in Wales Welsh Ministers should be required to consult the Electoral Commission on regulations containing rules made under the new Section 36A of the Representation of the People Act 1983 (RPA) in the same way that they would be required to for rules under the current Section 36 of the RPA. This will enable us to provide the Assembly/Senedd with independent, expert advice on the workability of the legislation. Electoral cycles Extension of power to change ordinary day of local elections in Wales Section 17 of the Bill would introduce a new power for Welsh Ministers to change the ordinary day of local government elections in Wales by amending Section 37ZA of the RPA. Section 37ZA currently constrains the power for Welsh Ministers to change the day of local elections in Wales by requiring that the Order to change the date is made no later than 1 February in the year before the year it is due to take effect. There is no similar time constraint in the new power that would be added by Section 17 of this Bill. This could mean that the date of a local election is changed at short notice, which could have a negative impact on voters, campaigners and electoral administrators. The Bill should include a similar time constraint to that in section 37ZA to allow sufficient time for candidates, parties and electoral administrators to plan for the election. Section 37ZA, as amended by the Bill, sets out that Welsh Ministers are required to consult 'such other persons' as they consider appropriate before making an Order to change the day of the local government election. This should be extended to specifically include the Electoral Commission, to ensure that Ministers and the Assembly/Senedd have access to independent expert advice about the potential implications of any change.

Registration of local government electors

Registration of local government electors without an application

We welcome the inclusion in the Bill of provisions that would allow EROs to register a local government elector without an application, if they are satisfied that they are entitled to be registered. Reforms of this nature could help improve levels of completeness among some of the specific under-registered groups (for example, young people) identified in our recently published study of the accuracy and completeness of the electoral registers . Earlier this year we published the findings from a series of feasibility studies we conducted exploring how electoral registration reforms could be delivered, to help inform the debate about registration reform.

These studies looked at the potential for giving EROs access to data from other public service providers; integration of electoral registration into other public service transactions; and automatic or more automated forms of registration.

Importantly, the work we conducted found that most of the reforms were feasible from a technical perspective and could be implemented without radically altering the structure of the electoral registration system in the UK. We expect the practical details of how a system of automatic registration would work in Wales to be set out in secondary legislation and look forward to working with Welsh Government and EROs to ensure that the proposals are workable and will help to improve accuracy and completeness. Important factors to consider in developing any scheme will include: the challenges and issues involved in making these changes for the local government register without equivalent changes to the parliamentary register; knowing when someone is already on the register; whether the chosen dataset would provide sufficient information to register a person automatically, or if a combination of datasets might be necessary; and the technical infrastructure required to support the reforms. We stand ready to further explore these and other relevant issues with Welsh Ministers and Welsh Government officials, building on the work we have already completed on automatic registration.

Database of electoral registration information

Regulations to provide for a database of electoral registration information

Section 18 of the Bill would give Welsh Ministers a power to establish an all-Wales database of electoral registration information. We understand that the purpose of this would be to enable the piloting and development of further reforms to the electoral process, and to improve the efficiency of information sharing between EROs and ROs.

As part of our feasibility studies on electoral registration modernisation we considered whether a centralised register, or system of joined-up electoral registers, would offer any additional benefits for electoral registration or electoral reform more broadly. We concluded that a greater degree of centralisation could offer real benefits, particularly in terms of simplifying the infrastructure needed to support reform. In addition, the combination of unique identifiers and some form of joined-up registers allowing EROs to compare information about entries across a number of registers could reduce the risk of some electors voting more than once at a relevant election. Reforms along these lines could also enable us to know how many people are actually registered twice (legally) and additionally provide the potential basis for any move towards different ways of voting in the future. However, we also noted that these potential benefits need to be balanced against the implications of further centralisation on the structure of electoral registration in the UK, including the potential loss of local knowledge about under-registered groups; and the security risks around the management of personal data. We welcome further modernisation of electoral registration, and these benefits and potential risks will need to be considered and appropriately addressed as Welsh Government develops detailed proposals. We stand ready to work with Welsh Government should it decide to take this forward and would expect to be consulted before any regulations are made.

Qualification for membership of a local authority

We note that the Bill amends the eligibility criteria for candidates at local government elections to allow a citizen of any country to stand for election, subject to other existing criteria, such as age and residence. We welcome the proposed provision in the Bill that provides that council officers and employees, other than those holding politically restricted posts, will be entitled to stand for election to their own council. This reflects the approach that we recommended in our 2015 report “ Standing for Election ”, that the law in England, Wales and Northern Ireland be changed to make a clear distinction between offices or employment which would prevent someone from standing for election, and those which would prevent someone from holding office if elected. It is important that potential candidates wanting to stand for election can find out easily if they might be disqualified. We continue to recommend that all legislation should be clear at least six months before it is required to be implemented or complied with by campaigners, ROs and EROs. We will amend our guidance for candidates and agents (and the equivalent guidance for EROs and ROs), and make available the nomination forms which are prescribed in legislation, including the consent to nomination declaration.

Election pilot schemes

Welsh Ministers’ discretion to introduce election pilot scheme

We welcome the initiative being taken by the Welsh Government to provide for election pilot schemes that would test options for changing local government electoral processes in Wales. The Bill should include a duty for the Electoral Commission to evaluate any pilot scheme run at a local government election in Wales, in line with the equivalent duty for pilot schemes at local elections in England or Scotland. This will enable an independent and evidence based assessment of the success or otherwise of the scheme in facilitating and encouraging voting. The Welsh Government should ensure that any pilot schemes are rigorously designed to ensure they are capable of providing robust evidence to support any future changes to the current electoral system in Wales. Welsh Ministers should be required to consult the Commission about the design of any pilot scheme and the framework for evaluation. Guidance about election pilot schemes

Section 27 of the Bill would give Welsh Ministers powers to issue guidance to local authorities or EROs in relation to pilot schemes. It is not clear what kind of guidance Ministers might consider issuing, and how it would relate to the Commission’s existing statutory role to provide guidance to EROs and ROs. There are no equivalent powers for UK Government Ministers in relation to pilot schemes at local government elections in England. We would like to discuss this further with Welsh Government to ensure that this proposed government guidance provision would meet a need that it is appropriate for government to lead on. As matters stand, we have substantive concern if guidance on the running of a poll were to be issued to EROs or ROs by Ministers, rather than by an independent body such as the Commission. Expenditure of Returning Officers Meeting expenditure of Returning Officers (Section 28) Section 28 of the Bill seeks to clarify that ROs cannot claim personal fees in respect of their services during the conduct of a local government elections. We recognise the central role that ROs play in the democratic process. They are critical to delivering well-run elections and referendums which produce results in which voters and campaigners can have confidence. We continue to support the important principle that ROs should be independent from both local and national governments when delivering their statutory electoral administration duties. This is necessary to avoid any perception of bias and to promote public confidence and trust in the process. A payment to ROs of some description denotes the different role. It is therefore important to be clear that ROs are not employed by councils when they deliver official election or referendum duties. They are independent statutory officeholders and they are accountable to the courts for the delivery of their official duties. Any changes to the current management framework for the delivery of local government elections in Wales, including to the current arrangements for funding elections and payments to ROs for their services, must not weaken the independence and accountability of those responsible for delivering polls. Removing personal fees for ROs may in practice risk reducing their independence, and there is also potential for impartiality to be damaged if their only payment for carrying out election duties is through their contract of employment by the local authority which appointed them to their substantive role. It is also important that an appropriate person with the right skill set should carry out the role of Returning Officer and should be remunerated accordingly. Removing any personal fee may discourage experienced and capable senior officers from agreeing to undertake this important but sensitive role. The Explanatory Notes to the Bill indicate that the personal fee is also proposed to be removed for National Assembly for Wales elections when a Returning Officers' Charges Order is next made. We will ask the Assembly Commission to take into consideration our view set out above. Additional considerations There are aspects of electoral law reform that we have previously recommended which do not appear in the Bill. We believe that the Bill should be amended to incorporate the changes, or that they should be addressed in subsequent secondary legislation. We outline these recommendations below. Digital imprints Online campaign material produced by candidates, political parties and non-party campaigners should – like its printed equivalent – be required to include an imprint stating who has published it. This would enable voters to identify who is spending money on trying to influence them at elections. It would also assist the police and prosecutors to more effectively ensure compliance with the spending rules by identifying the source of campaign material. We encourage Welsh Government to amend this Bill to make it a legal requirement for candidates and campaigners at local elections to put imprints on their online campaign material to ensure this gap in transparency is closed. This would also be consistent with emerging new electoral legislation in another part of the UK i.e. Scotland. Exemption for disability expenses Disabled candidates standing in local elections in England, Scotland and Northern Ireland benefit from an exemption which means that expenses relating to their disability do not count towards their spending limits for those elections. Wales is now the only part of the UK where disabled candidates do not benefit from a disability related exemption. Creating an exclusion for expenses related to the needs of disabled candidates will create a more level playing field between candidates, and will make standing for election more accessible for disabled candidates. We therefore recommend that the Bill be amended to create such an exemption for local elections (and we believe this should also be the case for National Assembly for Wales elections), and would welcome the opportunity to work with Welsh Government on this. Exemption for translation costs We support the view that the costs of translating campaign material between Welsh and English should be exempt from the spending limits for candidates at local government elections (and National Assembly for Wales elections). This exemption would ensure that campaigning at local elections is inclusive of all official languages of Wales. We therefore recommend that the Bill be amended to include a translation exemption. Publication of candidate spending returns online The public can view copies of candidate spending returns by visiting the office of the Returning Officer. There would be greater transparency of election spending if candidate spending returns were published online. The UK's Law Commissions have previously recommended that secondary legislation should prescribe in detail the process for Returning Officers to publicise and make available for inspection of spending returns (including non-receipt of a return), paving the way for publication online. We agree with this recommendation and believe it should be taken forward for Welsh local government elections (and indeed for National Assembly for Wales elections). We encourage the Welsh Government to amend the Bill to make publication online a legal requirement. Prisoner voting We understand that Welsh Government is considering introducing an amendment at Stage 2 in relation to prisoner voting. In January 2019 we provided a response to an inquiry by the Equality, Local Government and Communities Committee into voting rights for prisoners. We take no view on whether prisoners should be entitled to vote or not, but have addressed the practical implications should prisoners in Wales be given the right to vote. There were no apologies. Declarations of interest There were no new declarations of interest. Minutes of items of electronic business (EC 64/20) Resolved: That the Commission Board minutes of items of electronic business from 15 June 2020 be approved. Modernising voting (EC 65/20) Peter Wolf from International IDEA introduced a discussion about how the coronavirus pandemic had influenced electoral processes across the world, giving examples of where elections had been held and in some cases postponed, and different methods used to mitigate the consequences of the pandemic.

The Board discussed how public debate on online voting might be affected by the coronavirus situation. Internationally, support for increased use of existing channels including early voting, postal or proxy voting had gained more traction than demand for online voting. Trust in new voting mechanisms was often related to the existing levels of trust in the electoral process. There was international experience of different methods for voting being used for different sections of the population, for example for overseas voters. Commissioners asked how campaigning had changed in elections held elsewhere in the pandemic. The answer appeared to be that online campaigning had increased. The Board discussed how counts had been undertaken in other countries and the relative prevalence of electronic and manual methods. The Board discussed the current context of the coronavirus pandemic in the UK. It was unlikely that large scale changes to electoral processes would be made for the May 2021 elections, given the capacity of local authorities and governments' appetite for new legislation. Nevertheless elections needed to be conducted safely, and to be seen as such. A lot of work was needed on the problems which might arise. The First Minister of Wales had convened an Elections Planning Group with a view to securing the smooth running of the Senedd 2021 election in national or local lockdowns. Any legislation would need to be brought before the Senedd in late September or early October. Commissioners noted for example that difficult issues might arise in ensuring that people quarantined and in local lockdowns were able to vote. Postal voting was likely to have a key role and risks would need to be managed around the anticipated greater volume of postal voters. If there were to be an increase in postal voting this would also mean that campaigning would be continuing after some people had already voted, to a greater degree than usual. The Board discussed whether postal voting should be encouraged at an early point, and also whether proxy voting could be publicised further. Postal voting was recognised as a delicate political issue. There might be a risk of perception of greater degrees of fraud with postal voting, which would need to be managed. The Board discussed the proposed modernising voting research project. This project would involve gathering qualitative data about opinions on modernising the voting process. It would be an opportunity to develop the Commission's base of knowledge and understanding. The Board discussed the role of new technology. The Commission should be at the forefront of thinking around modernisation. Younger generations needed to believe the electoral process was relevant and credible. At the same time, we needed to be clear about what problem the introduction of new technology was designed to solve. The research should help to identify specific issues or concerns particular groups might have and to update the current evidence base. Commissioners discussed the importance of good qualitative research, bringing in the views of voters and not just experts. The specific approach would be shaped with the research agency chosen, through and following the tender process. Resolved: That the proposed approach to, and outline scope of, a project to explore options for modernising voting be agreed. Public awareness plans for elections in May 2021 (EC 66/20) The Board considered the plan and budget for voter registration campaigns in May 2021. The Director of Communications, Policy and Research introduced the item. May 2021 elections would be a complex set of polls and include newly enfranchised groups in Scotland and Wales. The steer from Commissioners in a previous discussion had been to focus more than in the past on registering known under-registered groups. This strategy set the framework for the project. It was important for the Commission to be driven by evidence of under-registration, and to avoid any risk of being perceived to focus on groups who might be thought to have particular voting preferences. There would need to be clear evidence that an impact had been made and specified ways of measuring success and value for money. The aim was to make progress towards levelling up registration across demographic groups, focussing on the known under registered, but also to drive the maximum number of new registrations. This twin strategy had been signed off by the Speaker's Committee through the corporate plan approval process. However there was room for greater clarity about the respective importance of these objectives and the degree to which they could be addressed simultaneously. Commissioners discussed increasing public information activity owing to the expected high percentage of postal voting. A key aspect of this work would be through local authority partnerships. Commissioners discussed whether partners could in some cases be supported with funding, which was currently not in the plans though within the Commission's statutory powers. The Commission had stepped back from a past practice of funding partnerships. and instead provided communication resources openly for use by any organisation that wanted to encourage people to register to vote. The outcome of further discussions would inform the strategy. Action: The Director of Communications, Policy and Research to provide the Board with a further paper on the policy strategy for voter registration campaigns. Resolved: That the plan and budget for voter registration campaigns in May 2021 be otherwise approved. Chief Executive's update (EC 67/20) The Board noted the update on operations and matters arising. Commissioners discussed the Intelligence and Security Committee's report into Russian activity in the UK. They noted the broad recommendation that the Commission should have more powers to deal with foreign money. The report highlighted a gap in whose role it was to ensure security of elections, and freedom from foreign interference. One obvious answer was increased cooperation between the various bodies with responsibilities in this area. Some of the report's comments on the role of the Commission were inaccurate. This would be brought up with the Chair of the Committee. Meanwhile there was more work to be done in raising the Commission's profile and being clear about our role. The Chief Executive noted recent meetings with the Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee and Chloe Smith MP, Minister for Constitutional Affairs. An electoral integrity bill was expected to be brought forward by the UK Government in 2021. This would be discussed further with the Board as information became available. There should be time and opportunity to influence the Bill's development. Other issues raised included: devolved accountability budget submissions; the complaint to the Welsh Language Commission; and the Section 10 request from the Scottish Government for advice and assistance relating to public opinion research on voters' attitudes to voting channels for the May 2021 elections as a result of coronavirus. The Chief Executive also introduced the risk matrix. Resolved: That the update on operations and matters arising, including the update on devolved accountability, be noted. Business items taken via electronic means since the previous Board meeting The Board discussed the timelines of electronic business items, and which matters should be addressed in this way.

scope and approach Using public data sources to improve electoral registration in the UK Integrating electoral registration into public service transactions Better detection and management of duplicate registration applications Electoral registration reform and degrees of centralisation Appendix tables Modernising electoral registration The UK's electoral registers are the basis on which people may vote in elections and referendums – they are the practical expression of the franchise and therefore fundamental to democratic participation. Their accuracy and completeness are central to the health of our electoral system as a whole. The use of data is already beginning to revolutionise the provision of services across the public and private sectors, to the benefit of citizens and the delivery of efficiencies. There is great potential to explore how existing public data could be used to further improve our electoral registration system, and the benefits this could provide for voters. Plans to reform the annual canvass are a step in the right direction, but there is more that should be done to ensure we have a joined-up and year-round registration process, making it easier for people to register to vote and for Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) to maintain accurate and complete electoral registers. We want the UK's governments to explore more fundamental changes to the UK's electoral registration framework, including making it more joined up with other public services. That means exploring: the potential for giving EROs access to data from other public service providers; automatic or more automated forms of registration; and integration of electoral registration into other public service transactions. Feasibility studies To help inform the debate about registration reform, we have carried out studies to explore how electoral registration can be modernised in practice. The feasibility studies covered four key areas of reform:

Feasibility studies Better use of public data EROs can currently access data held locally by local authorities and other local sources to help identify potential electors and manage their electoral registers. We wanted to explore the potential benefits of enabling access to national-level public data, to identify people who have changed address and updated their details with other public services, for example when they have applied for a driving licence or passport. Direct or automatic enrolment processes We examined options for increasing the level of automation within the electoral registration system: automated registration, where reliable data would serve as the basis of an individual's electoral registration application, but citizens would still be required to take some steps to complete the process; and automatic registration, where citizens would be added to the electoral register, or their address updated, without them being required to take any active steps.

Integrating electoral registration into other public service transactions We examined the extent to which electoral registration applications could be made simultaneously as part of or alongside accessing other public services. This would increase the number of channels available to citizens and improve the accessibility of the process. Better identification and management of duplicate registration applications

We also considered a number of ways in which duplicate registration applications might be better identified and managed within the system. We wanted to understand the extent to which reforms could reduce the administrative impact of processing duplicate applications and help voters check whether they were already registered to vote. Key findings Importantly, we found that all the reforms were feasible from a technical and operational perspective and could be implemented without radically altering the structure of the electoral registration system in the UK. In particular, technology already employed by the UK Government's Individual Electoral Registration (IER) Digital Service could form the building blocks for the majority of the reforms. This system already links all local authorities with a central service capable of verifying people against the Department for Work and Pensions' customer information system (DWP CIS) as part of the registration application process. The IER digital service also links and coordinates sharing data between the register to vote website (allowing people to apply online), DWP CIS (facilitating verification of applications) and the systems which are used locally to manage the 372 separate electoral registers in the UK. We found that this could be further developed to act as a conduit, receiving recent transactional data from new and reliable data sources. This data would then be passed on to the relevant EROs, who could then use it to target potential electors. The further development of the IER digital service could pave the way for systems of automated or automatic registration to be implemented, or for a more integrated electoral registration process, whereby the citizen would be given the option of registering to vote at the end of another online transaction, e.g. when applying for a passport or driving licence. To improve the identification and management of duplicate registration applications, we have concluded that all solutions would involve the creation of a unique identifier for each elector. This would enable the identification of duplicates either within local registers, or across registers, depending on the particular solution implemented. The feasibility studies also highlighted a number of challenges that would need to be addressed before steps were taken to implement any of the reforms. These include the importance of undertaking detailed testing of potential new data sources (which would require a legal gateway) in order to determine whether the options would deliver beneficial and cost-effective results. The reforms also raise broader public policy questions about data sharing, data protection and the limits of state intervention (particularly in relation to automatic registration) that require wider debate.

Pilot area evaluations | Electoral Commission Search Pilot

area evaluations You are in the May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2018 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 25 July 2019 Last updated: 29 July 2019 Intro This page contains evaluations of the individual schemes in each local authority holding a pilot. Local authorities holding pilot schemes Bromley In the Bromley voter identification pilot, voters were required to show one form of photographic identification or two forms of non-photographic identification (one of which needed to include the full registered address of the elector) in order to be given a ballot paper. We found that: The majority of voters were able to meet the identification requirements upon arriving at the polling station. However, some electors did not have the required ID available when they came to vote on 3 May. The majority later returned and were able to cast a vote. There is no evidence that the ID requirement significantly deterred electors from voting. In our public opinion survey only one respondent told us that they had not voted as a result of the ID requirement. Also, turnout at the 2018 polls was similar to the comparable elections in 2014. We cannot draw firm conclusions about whether the ID requirement had a disproportionate impact on particular groups of people, for example those with a learning or physical disability. While we have seen no evidence that specific groups struggled with the ID requirement it is challenging to gather evidence in this area as relatively small groups of people could have been affected in different ways.. The delivery of this pilot was manageable for the Returning Officer and their staff and there is nothing in their experience of the pilot to suggest that Bromley would face significant issues with the administration of a similar ID requirement in the future. Additional staffing and training were in place for the pilot. However the Returning Officer has indicated that the extra staff would not necessarily be required to deliver this type of ID requirement at future local elections. Public attitudes to electoral fraud improved from before to after the pilot. More people said that electoral fraud is not a problem in Bromley in May 2018 than did so in January 2018. However, we cannot definitively link this change to the pilot. Our findings suggest that the 2018 local elections in Bromley were not significantly affected by the voter ID pilot in either its impact on voters or on the administration of the poll. However, it is important to be cautious when drawing conclusions from this pilot about the impact of any wider application of voter ID. Gosport The voter identification pilot scheme in Gosport required voters to produce one form of photographic identification or two forms of non-photographic identification (one of which must have shown the full registered address of the elector) or an electoral identity letter in order to meet the requirements to vote. Our evaluation of the scheme found that: The majority of voters were able to meet the identification requirements upon arriving at the polling station. However, some electors did not have the required ID available when they came to vote on 3 May. The majority later returned and were able to cast a vote. There is no evidence that the ID requirement significantly deterred electors from voting. In our public opinion surveys two non-voters told us that ID was the reason they had not voted. Also, turnout at the 2018 polls was similar to the comparable elections in 2016. It is possible that some electors were deterred from voting, believing correctly or incorrectly that they did not have ID, but this seems unlikely to apply to significant numbers. We cannot draw firm conclusions about whether the ID requirement had a disproportionate impact on particular groups of people, for example those with a learning or physical disability. While we have seen no evidence that specific groups struggled with the ID requirement, it is challenging to gather evidence in this area as relatively small groups of people could have been affected in different ways. The delivery of this pilot was manageable for the Returning Officer and their staff and there is nothing in their experience of the pilot to suggest that Gosport would face significant issues with the administration of a similar ID requirement in the future. Additional staffing and training were in place for the pilot. However, the Returning Officer has indicated that the extra staff would not be required to deliver this type of ID requirement at future local elections or those polls with higher turnout. Public attitudes to electoral fraud did not significantly change from before to after the pilot. Slightly more people said they think electoral fraud is a problem in Gosport in May 2018 than did so in January 2018. Our findings suggest that the 2018 local elections in Gosport were not significantly affected by the voter ID pilot in either its impact on voters or on the administration of the poll. However, it is important to be cautious when drawing conclusions from this pilot about the impact of any wider application of voter ID.

Swindon The voter identification pilot scheme in Swindon required voters to produce their poll card in order to meet the requirement to vote. The poll card contained a QR code which was scanned in the polling station. If a voter did not bring their poll card they could show photo ID (from a specified list) or have their identity ‘attested’ by another elector (with ID) registered at the same polling station. Our evaluation of the scheme found that: The majority of voters were able to meet the identification requirements upon arriving at the polling station. However, some electors did not have the required ID available when they came to vote on 3 May. The majority later returned and were able to cast a vote. There is no evidence that the ID requirement deterred electors from voting. In our public opinion surveys no non-voter told us that ID was the reason they had not voted. Also, turnout at the 2018 polls was higher than the comparable elections in 2016. It is possible that some electors were deterred from voting, believing correctly or incorrectly that they did not have ID, but this seems unlikely to apply to significant numbers. We cannot draw firm conclusions about whether the ID requirement had a disproportionate impact on particular groups of people, for example those with a learning or physical disability. While we have seen no evidence that specific groups struggled with the ID requirement it is challenging to gather evidence in this area as relatively small groups of people could have been affected in different ways. The delivery of this pilot was manageable for the Returning Officer and their staff and, aside from the IT element, there is nothing in their experience of the pilot to suggest that Swindon would face significant issues with the administration of a similar ID requirement in the future. While the IT worked well on 3 May the development and set up was a significant demand on time and resource. Public attitudes to electoral fraud did not significantly change from before to after the pilot. The same proportion of people said they think electoral fraud is a problem in Swindon in May 2018 as did so in January 2018. Our findings suggest that the 2018 local elections in Swindon were not significantly affected by the voter ID pilot in either its impact on voters or on the administration of the poll. However, it is important to be cautious when drawing conclusions from this pilot about the impact of any wider application of voter ID.

Watford The voter identification pilot scheme in Watford required voters to produce their poll card in order to meet the requirement to vote. The poll card contained a QR code which was scanned in the polling station. If a voter did not bring their poll card they could show photo ID (from a specified list) or a valid debit/credit card. Our evaluation of the scheme found that: The majority of voters were able to meet the identification requirements upon arriving at the polling station. However, some electors did not have the required ID available when they came to vote on 3 May. The majority later returned and were able to cast a vote. There is no evidence that the ID requirement deterred electors from voting. In our public opinion survey no non-voter in Watford told us that ID was the reason they had not voted. 2018 turnout was higher than the comparable elections in 2016. It is possible that some electors were deterred from voting, believing correctly or incorrectly that they did not have ID, but this seems unlikely to apply to significant numbers. We cannot draw firm conclusions about whether the ID requirement had a disproportionate impact on particular groups of people, for example those with a learning or physical disability. While we have seen no evidence that specific groups struggled with the ID requirement it is challenging to gather evidence in this area as relatively small groups of people could have been affected in different ways. A disproportionate number of those unable to show ID on 3 May were from electoral wards with higher proportions of people with an Asian background. However, this does not mean that electors from the Asian community were more likely to be affected by the ID requirement. The delivery of this pilot was manageable for the Returning Officer and their staff and, aside from the IT element, there is nothing in their experience of the pilot to suggest that Watford would face significant issues with the administration of a similar ID requirement in the future. While the IT worked well on 3 May the development and set up was a significant demand on time and resource. Some public attitudes to electoral fraud improved from before to after the pilot. Fewer people said they thought electoral fraud was a problem in May 2018 than in January 2018. However, we cannot definitively link this change to the pilot. Our findings suggest that the 2018 local elections in Watford were not significantly affected by the voter ID pilot in either its impact on voters or on the administration of the poll. However, it is important to be cautious when drawing conclusions from this pilot about the impact of any wider application of voter ID.

The voter identification pilot scheme in Woking required voters to produce one form of photographic identification or a Local Elector Card in order to meet the requirements to vote. Our evaluation of the scheme found that: The majority of voters were able to meet the identification requirements upon arriving at the polling station. However, some electors did not have the required ID available when they came to vote on 3 May. The majority later returned and were able to cast a vote. There is no evidence that the ID requirement significantly deterred electors from voting. In our public opinion surveys one non-voter told us that ID was the reason they had not voted. Also, turnout at the 2018 polls was similar to the comparable elections in 2014. It is possible that some electors were deterred from voting, believing correctly or incorrectly that they did not have ID, but this seems unlikely to apply to significant numbers. We cannot draw firm conclusions about whether the ID requirement had a disproportionate impact on particular groups of people, for example those with a learning or physical disability. While we have seen no evidence that specific groups struggled with the ID requirement it is challenging to gather evidence in this area as relatively small groups of people could have been affected in different ways.

The delivery of this pilot was manageable for the Returning Officer and their staff and there is nothing in their experience of the pilot to suggest that Woking would face significant issues with the administration of a similar ID requirement in the future. Some additional staffing and training were in place for the pilot. However the Returning Officer has indicated that the extra staff would not necessarily be required to deliver this type of ID requirement at future local elections. Some public attitudes to electoral fraud improved from before to after the pilot . Fewer people said they felt electoral fraud is a problem in Woking in May 2018 than did so in January 2018. However, we cannot definitively link this change to the pilot. Our findings suggest that the 2018 local elections in Watford were not significantly affected by the voter ID pilot in either its impact on voters or on the administration of the poll. However, it is important to be cautious when drawing conclusions from this pilot about the impact of any wider application of voter ID.

Postal and proxy voting pilot schemes At the May 2018 elections the Returning Officers (ROs) for Peterborough, Slough and Tower Hamlets ran pilot schemes focused on postal voting. The ROs sent information to postal voters about how to protect their vote. They then contacted a sample of postal voters, who had been sent postal voting packs, to check that they had applied for them. In Peterborough and Tower Hamlets, they also contacted a sample of postal voters, whose postal ballot had been returned, to check that they had completed and returned their own vote. Peterborough also ran a pilot scheme to require proxy voters at polling stations to show identification before issuing them with a ballot paper.

Postal and proxy voting pilot schemes Impact of the pilot schemes The pilots were well delivered by the three ROs but we have not been able to draw firm conclusions on the impact of these pilot schemes. This was partly because in some cases there was no relevant data from before the pilots to compare against, and also because we were not able to tell what would have happened this year without the pilot schemes.

Impact of the leaflet for postal voters There is no clear evidence about the impact of the leaflet for postal voters, although it is reasonable to conclude that well-designed and carefully worded information is likely to help encourage people to report evidence about electoral fraud.

Impact of the follow-up contact with postal voters Postal voters welcomed the follow-up contact from the RO and the telephone activity was largely manageable with some additional staff. However, the household visit approach, as used in Peterborough, required more resources than the RO would normally be able to commit around a poll. There is no clear evidence about the impact on allegations of fraud and public confidence, although it may have provided reassurance to some voters. The follow-up contact provided the ROs with additional information about potential cases of electoral fraud. While they could use this information to raise specific concerns with the police, the activity did not directly lead to any allegations being referred to the police at these elections. Finally, the pilot allowed for the cancellation of postal votes where the elector said they did not want a postal vote or claimed that they had not completed a returned postal vote. The ROs did not need to make significant use of this power (one postal vote was cancelled for this reason in Peterborough) but it is logical that they should have this option available to them as part of any follow up activity with postal voters.

Impact of the identification requirement for proxy voters The identification requirement for proxy voters was administratively manageable, and there is limited evidence of a negative impact on voters. Peterborough believe there may have been some effect in deterring fraudulent proxy activity as the number of proxies was notably lower than in recent polls. However, it is not possible to draw a clear conclusion from the information available.

Impact on allegations of fraud We have looked at data from police forces about allegations of electoral fraud in these three areas. They received a very small number of allegations about postal voting at the May 2018 elections. We cannot draw any firm conclusions from this limited data, particularly because we cannot know what would have happened in these areas without the pilot scheme procedures.

3. Impact on voters: confidence You are in the May 2019 voter identification pilot schemes section Home Our research Voter identification pilots May 2019 voter identification pilot schemes First published: 12 July 2019 Last updated: 12 July 2019 Contents Overview Our findings Impact on voters: experience Impact on voters: confidence Impact on security Impact of administration of the polls Background to our evaluation Key findings Evidence from the pilot scheme indicates that there was a headline increase in voter confidence and in perceptions of the safety of voting in the pilots. We do not see the same change in non-pilot areas with May elections. However, we should be cautious in drawing clear conclusions about what the impact on confidence of a Great Britain-wide scheme (based on any of these models) would be. This is partly because the ten pilots are not representative of Great Britain as a whole and partly because the changes in attitude are not consistent within each pilot model. People who voted in polling stations in the pilot scheme, and therefore experienced the process of showing identification, were more confident in the security of the voting system than non-voters in those areas. Overall perceptions of electoral fraud People in the pilot scheme were significantly less likely to say that fraud took place at the elections than those in other areas with elections in England in May 2019. How much electoral fraud or abuse, if any, do you think took place at the 2 May elections? Perceptions of electoral fraud at 2 May elections. Figures may not equal 100% due to rounding. However, this is only a snapshot of opinion and we have also considered how opinions may have changed before and after 2 May in both pilots and those areas with elections but no pilots. We asked respondents to say how much of a problem they think electoral fraud is on a scale of 1-5 (with 1 being not a problem and 5 being a serious problem). In the pilot scheme there was a notable increase in the proportion of respondents saying that electoral fraud is not a problem between January and May 2019 (30% compared with 39%). This change was not seen in non-pilot areas, where the number of people who thought that electoral fraud is not a problem remained relatively stable at 27% pre-poll and 26% post-poll. The clearest increase was in the photo only pilot model (moving from 13% to 32% saying it was not a problem) and in the mixed model (13% to 27%), while in the poll card model the change was more polarised with increases in both those saying it is not a problem and those saying it is a serious problem. However, we should be cautious in drawing clear conclusions about how the experience of a specific pilot model may have affected levels of confidence. Although this data appears to present a clear pattern, the changes between before and after polling day are not always consistent across the individual pilots. This is particularly the case for the mixed model. For example: In the photo model, in both Pendle and Woking there were increases in the proportion of people after polling day saying fraud is not a problem, and a decrease in those saying that it is. The change was significantly more pronounced in Woking. In the mixed model, we only have data for four of the five pilots (because Craven joined the pilot scheme too late to be included in the January public opinion fieldwork). In two pilots (Braintree and North Kesteven) there was an increase after polling day in the proportion saying 'not a problem' and a decrease in 'a problem'. However, in the other two pilots (Broxtowe and Derby) the results were closer to the poll card pilot (a polarisation to each end of the scale). In the poll card model, one pilot (Mid Sussex) showed no change in attitudes at all after polling day. Data for the two other pilots showed, to varying levels, a polarisation of attitudes towards either end of the 1-5 scale. The data does not help us to explain why we see these variations across pilots. We cannot know if we have seen genuine effects from the pilot models, or if the shifts are due to particular issues or concerns in each individual pilot. Voting in a polling station We asked respondents how safe from fraud and abuse they thought it was to vote at a polling station. Overall, in the pilot scheme, the proportion of people saying it is safe did not change significantly between January and May 2019. However, the strength of confidence increased slightly between January and May; the proportion of people saying it was very safe increased from 48% to 55%. This change varied in scale across the individual pilots but was seen to some extent in all but two (Derby and Mid Sussex). Respondents living in non-pilot areas were less likely to say that voting in a polling station was very safe (39%). Our research also found that people who voted in the pilots, and therefore experienced showing their identification, were more likely to say voting in a polling station was very safe from fraud and abuse than those who didn't vote (61% compared with 50%). Confidence in the voting system We asked respondents if the requirement to show identification at the polling station made them more or less confident in the security of the voting system. Across all pilot models the majority of respondents said it would make them more confident or make no difference, although the balance between the two varied by model. In the poll card model, a majority (57%) said that an identification requirement would make them more confident in the security of the voting system, in the mixed model, results were evenly split (46% each) and in the photo only model the majority said it would make no difference (51%). However, in each case a substantial proportion felt it would improve their confidence in the security of the system. Did the requirement for voters to show identification at the polling station make you more or less confident in the security of the voting system, or did it make no difference? Levels of confidence in the security of the voting system as a result of the ID requirement. Report navigation links Previous Next 2. Impact on voters: experience 4. elections – Key messages for post-poll report(s) and potential policy implications AI gave a presentation on post-poll reports and potential policy implications. There were scheduled local government elections in England only. These encompassed 150 local authorities and 5 local directly-elected mayors. There was an election for a Combined Authority Mayor in Sheffield and Voter Identification pilot schemes took place in 5 authorities. There were only a small number of performance issues identified and polls were well-run in both Plymouth and Newcastle-under-Lyme, further to issues at the June 2017 UKPGE. There was a steady level of electoral administration queries throughout the election period. Key messages from the May 2018 polls were: Overall the elections were well-run, with no significant problems which affected voters or campaigners While ROs and administrators had delivered well-run polls this time, this did not mean that the pressures on the electoral system we had identified previously had gone away. AI reminded the Board that there was no statutory duty to publish a report on local government elections, and invited them to consider how we should respond. EH presented an overview of campaign activity in the run-up to the poll. This had been the first use of our “Got 5?” registration campaign and we had exceeded our ambitious target for applications to register. We had also set high targets for the numbers of additions to the register, and would be able to report more fully on these once we had gathered more data by the summer. For the first time we ran a brand uplift study with Facebook. We saw an 11 percentage point difference in ad recall between the test and control groups. As this was the first time we had run a study like this we didn't know what a good result was, however Facebook have told us this is really good and we exceeded the benchmark for government campaigns. We had had a relatively low level of public enquiries in the six weeks leading up to the poll, with only a smaller number of enquiries (18 in total) about the voter ID pilots. TH and PT gave some initial perspectives on the pilots. We had deployed over 20 EC representatives as observers across the 5 pilot areas on polling day. They had observed processes operating reasonably smoothly, including where new technology had been used. Feedback suggested that the majority of voters had appeared to be aware of the need to bring ID, although EC representatives did observe some voters being turned away. It was noted that these observations ran counter to some of the negative media coverage both before and after polling day. JEH noted that a report from Democracy Volunteers on the local election and Pilots had been issued. AI acknowledged that this had been an interesting report that would be considered in future evaluation, but noted that the methodology they used was not known, which raised risks that their findings were overstated. JH asked for an update on issues raised about the poll at London Borough of Tower Hamlets by Peter Golds, Leader of the Conservative Group. AI noted that the Chief Executive and RO for Tower Hamlets, Will Tuckley, had responded in a detailed letter that overall the administration of the polls and count had gone well and had been much improved from the position in 2014, at the last local elections. This corresponded with our observers' experiences. However there had been one or two unfortunate mistakes, including around Councillor Golds' own result. Next steps on the ID pilots would be to analyse detailed data, in order to fulfil our statutory responsibility to evaluate and report back on them. We aimed to compile a high-level report containing conclusions about what needed to happen next and a statutory assessment of schemes and data and publish this before the summer parliamentary recess. It was noted that there would be a debate in Parliament on 6 June 2018, called by Ellie Reeves MP, whose constituency was in one of the Pilot areas, before the report was ready.

Agreed: That: There would be no separate report on the local elections overall. A more detailed report on the ID pilots would be prepared for the June Board. A high-level report containing conclusions about what needed to happen next and a statutory assessment of schemes and data would be published before the summer parliamentary recess. Corporate Governance Update Each annex of the proposals before the Board was discussed separately. The change to the quoracy of board as proposed in Annex A was AGREED. This will be incorporated into Standing Orders in the Corporate Governance

Framework. Changes proposed to the Complaints procedure as shown in Annexes B and C were introduced in the context of the recent complaints being investigated by Liz Butler, appointed as an independent investigator. CB would share the report with the Board when it had been finalised. JEH asked for clarification on the process following the delivery of future reports to the responsible person. KR indicated that given the variability of the complaints possible, the guidance had been deliberately left open. CB reminded the board that the Speaker's Committee of the House of Commons remained the ultimate authority. AC discussed an issue she had faced in a different board, suggesting that it was important that the procedures were as clear as possible, including for any circumstance where there could be a dispute between Chair and Chief Executive. CB clarified that internal complaints would be treated as grievances, whereas external complaints would follow the complaints procedure. JH questioned whether the use of the chair of the Audit committee would be considered to be sufficiently independent; CB noted that it was good practice to attempt to internally resolve issues, and that if no internal resolution could be found, one next step would be to raise it with the Ombudsman. SC noted that the paper as drafted did not detail the duties of the EC to the complainant re response times. SB noted the need to demonstrate that measures taken were reasonable and proportionate, and suggested that if the Audit committee chair was to have this investigative responsibility, it ought to be included in the job description. AM proposed a redraft which modified the clause on the use of the Nolan principles. SB noted that the issue of grievance against a Scottish Commissioner had to be clarified in terms of ultimate responsibility. JEH asked if annex C would be public; KR explained it was currently for internal use but they were considering publishing a version of it. It was agreed that a redrafted version of the annexes would be submitted to the board. BP explained that with regards to Annex D, the Board would be kept informed on referrals to police. Annex D was AGREED. A general discussion on governance then followed, with ECS noting that regular reviews of 'soundness of the internal decision making' should include checking resourcing within the EC to undertake the work. RV noted that there was a question around which processes the board should scrutinise. It was agreed this should be an item on a future agenda board, with the possibility that in the first instance the scrutiny should be on enforcement. Codes of Practice BP introduced the paper and invited detailed comments from commissioners on drafting in due course. This was the first time codes of practice, rather than guidance, had been drafted by the EC. In the wake of the 2015 election, the decision had been taken in order to be as clear as possible on some issues, including the distinctions between candidate and party spending. BP noted that a case before the Supreme Court on the date of the Board, around which there were reporting restrictions, had the potential to alter substantially the previous interpretation of PPERA in some areas. The EC was participating in the hearing as a kind of expert witness. The hope was that the Supreme Court's decision would be available before the summer recess. ECS asked whether, if the interpretation changed dramatically, the EC would have to repay previously issued fines. BP said previous cases would not be affected. DB noted that the portions of the code most likely to be affected were highlighted in the draft. The codes were written to make explicit that digital spending should always be included. Significant discussion had already taken place with stakeholders, including officials in Scotland and Wales. The current plan was to go to external consultation with e.g. political parties in September 2018. KE outlined the risks and mitigations: given the uncertainty around the Supreme Court case, they proposed to consult first on the parts of the codes unaffected. KE also noted the risk of another snap UKPGE which would push back the timeline for finishing the codes from 2020, and also push back the date where they could be used first. DH proposed a ‘red team’ reading of the codes to make them more robust, which was agreed. The issue of separate codes of practice for Scotland and Wales was discussed, as Commissioners suggested the drafts as presented were likely to be unfit for those purposes. The issue of current campaign spending levels was also discussed, including the balance between party and candidate spending. KE indicated that spending rules could be changed in secondary legislation if necessary. RV raised the issue of non-party campaigners. CB said that a decision had been taken to prioritise the current draft Codes, but a draft Code for non-party campaigners was likely to follow in due course. Meanwhile work was continuing to reassure eg the voluntary sector that their fears about the socalled chilling effect of current legislation were exaggerated. The board agreed that work on the Codes of Practice should continue. Key messages for the 2017 - 18 Annual Report KR introduced the paper. 3 key messages were being proposed: The Commission had responded quickly and effectively to the announcement of the unscheduled UK Parliamentary General Election which followed on rapidly from local government elections in England, Scotland and Wales, whilst managing to deliver our business as usual work and minimise the impact on our project delivery. We had taken a proactive approach in our regulatory activities, undertaking a wide range of investigatory activity primarily on investigations relating to the UKPGE and EU referendum. This complex work had continued alongside our regular regulatory work. 2017-18 had been the first financial year since we undertook our strategic review of our priorities and activities. Despite the additional pressures faced by the organisation, we had still managed to progress this ambitious programme of work. CB noted that it had been a very full year and that the organisation had largely been able to step up and respond. Next year we would build in more time for discussion and review in advance of the themes for the Annual Report. Commissioners commented briefly on these themes, while suggesting that they needed significantly more work for when the draft came to the Board at the next meeting. It was generally agreed among Commissioners that communications in the annual report should be accessible, in plain language, include infographics and be ‘digital first.’ It was also highlighted that context should be included (threats to democracy, maintenance of voter confidence in the face of this) and that the EC demands for more powers should be included in this messaging. It was agreed that National Democracy Week (first week of July) would a good context in which to speak about the work of the EC. Chief Executive’s Update for April 2018 CB set the context of the preceding few weeks, which had included the local elections, the appearance before the DCMS select committee and the announcement of the Leave.EU investigation. The Board recognised the hard work of the Communications and legal teams in all this work. CB also noted that the Commission had been busy internally with end-year financial work. BP and LE updated the Board on the status of current investigations. AC updated the board as to NI-specific issues, including the recent ‘incinerator ruling’ which determined that civil servants were unable to take decisions, and the ramifications of that on decision-making while the NI Assembly was not meeting. She also highlighted the upcoming Irish Republic referendum on abortion, and the decision taken by the Irish Government to prevent external Facebook ads in that context. AM asked for an update on a recent data breach involving the Scotland in Union party. CB explained that the issue had been an unfortunate and unexpected redaction failure, for technical reasons, and that a solution had been found to prevent this recurring. We had used social media to communicate and minimise the impact of the leak. Stakeholder management had also been part of the response, contacting the people whose data had been released to apologize. KR noted the ICO had asked clarifying questions but their investigation was still ongoing. We were also in touch with Adobe about the failure of their software in this case. Annual Review of Risk Register Noted. Quarter 4 Finance and Performance Report and achievements against 2017-18 Corporate Plan KR noted in his introduction that the numbers included in this report were still subject to audit and not final. JEH noted that a superficial reading of some of the target numbers could give the impression that some had been badly missed, when in reality we had largely achieved against ambitious targets. It was also hard to measure a lot of what the Commission did, which was qualitative and not subject to numerical targets. KR acknowledged the problems with setting ambitious targets, but stressed the importance of not simply reducing targets to match performance. Rather we should adjust the messaging/ reporting appropriately to reflect the reality. KR would incorporate this thinking into the review he was undertaking into internal and external reporting for the following performance year. AM asked for clarity on the level of inaccuracies in financial returns submitted by parties to the EC, which CB confirmed was quite high. BP indicated that the project to update the PEF IT system would help resolve some of these issues, together with clarifying the guidance. AC noted that the indicators that measured how we ensured an increasingly trusted and transparent system of regulation in political finance, overseeing compliance, promoting understanding amongst those regulated and proactively pursuing breaches, had showed a slight decline since 2016. JH asked for clarification on income, and KR indicated that future reporting would make this clearer. RV wondered whether some of the underspend could be turned towards more research activity, for which the Commission otherwise had limited resources. It was noted that the Board would be returning to the issue of research capacity and priorities in the coming months.

Minutes of Audit Committee Meeting, 20 March 2018

This item was circulated for information. Noted. Forward Plan of Board business 2018-19 The issue of the subject for the next Commissioner Day was noted. RV expressed his support for a session on the future of voting. The question of whether to have a board meeting in July was raised. The decision on whether to go ahead, or substitute a telephone briefing as in 2017, would be considered at the Chair and Chief Executive's next Governance meeting, for report back at the June Board. Action-tracker It was decided to amend the first action to clarify the action as scheduling a further Board effectiveness session, with a likely date in early 2019. Chair's and Chief Executive's meetings, and meetings in devolved legislatures JEH reported that he had paid one of his regular visits to the Speaker of the House of Commons, who had been very supportive in general of the work of the Commission, despite recent criticism from some quarters. We take the risk of electoral fraud very seriously. Throughout the year, all police forces across the UK send us data about allegations of electoral fraud that they receive and investigate. Every year we report on the number, type, and outcome of these allegations, so that you can understand what's happened and how cases are resolved. Overview In the past 5 years, there is no evidence of large-scale electoral fraud. Of the 1,386 cases of alleged electoral fraud reported to police between 2018 and 2022, 9 led to convictions and the police issued 6 cautions. Most cases either resulted in the police taking no further action or were locally resolved by the police issuing words of advice. Related content Donations and loans Find out about

Enabling activity: Independence and integrity You are in the Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 section Home Our plans and priorities Annual Report and Accounts 2022/23 On this page What we are working to achieve Work done to achieve this aim Performance indicators Ongoing and future work First published: 4 July 2023 Last updated: 27 September 2023 What we are working to achieve The electoral system depends on the Electoral Commission being an independent non-partisan body, and we therefore hold ourselves to high standards of integrity. We work hard to ensure we are respected for our expertise, and that our advice and decision making are free from bias. Given our unique role, our integrity needs to be clear and demonstrable. We demonstrate our independence and integrity by: taking decisions on the evidence and being transparent about the reasons for them basing our policy positions and recommendations on analysis of evidence effectively communicating our work and views providing responsive services to those we support seek to maintain effective governance arrangements. Work done to achieve this aim We published information on closed regulatory investigations on a monthly basis, providing transparency on our findings and any potential sanctions. We reviewed our Enforcement Policy, which we refer to when running an investigation. We sought views to ensure the policy is as clear and helpful as possible so that our approach to enforcement is transparent and can be easily understood. We took an evidence-based approach when developing our consultation response to the UK Government's Strategy and Policy Statement. The response highlighted that the introduction of such a mechanism – by which a government can guide the work of an electoral commission – is inconsistent with our role as an independent regulator and the body that oversees free and fair elections. We provided parliamentarians with briefings to support their consideration of the Elections Bill as it passed through Parliament. Our education resources are designed to be an independent source of material and information for educators to help them teach the issue of politics, without having to stray into politics. We responded to queries from members of the public, parliamentarians, administrators, and regulated community, providing information and advice on the electoral system and democratic participation. We received 89 freedom of information (FOI) requests. We aim to respond to 90% of requests within the 20 working days statutory timeframe, and this year we responded to 97.7% within that timeframe. We were asked to conduct internal reviews into five FOI of our responses during the year, and all of these were responded to within agreed timeframes. We received three subject access requests and 10 requests for erasure under the UKGDPR, all of which were responded to within the statutory response time frame of one calendar month. We handled 28 complaints, compared to 96 in 2021/22. Of these, three were still under consideration at the end of the year. Of those completed, 17 were not upheld, two were partially upheld, two were fully upheld, two were closed due to no clarification being received from the complainant, and two were withdrawn. We use our complaints process as a chance to learn, and opportunities for continuous improvement were fed back to the relevant teams. We received one request for review by the Chief Executive. While this review did not change the original outcome of the complaint, it did enable further explanation and assistance. Our dedicated public information service responded to 11,829 public enquiries during the year, received by phone, post and email. Through this service, we answered questions on a range of topics, including voter ID, voter registration and postal voting. We also responded to over 14,800 queries received via social media. We responded to 51 parliamentary questions at Westminster during 2022/23, including questions on voter ID – both on our campaign and the policy itself

– unincorporated associations, donations to political parties and the proposed Strategy and Policy Statement. Chris Matheson MP and Cat Smith MP, members of the Speaker's Committee, were our spokespeople in the UK Parliament and answered questions on our behalf during the year. Performance indicators Indicator Target 2022-23 Timely responses to social media enquiries 100% 100% Timely responses to public enquiries via calls, letters and emails 100% 99.69% Timely responses to valid Subject Access Requests 100% 100% Timely responses to valid Freedom of Information requests 90% 97.7% Ongoing and future work Election reports following the May 2023 elections will outline any recommendations we think are necessary to improve the system for voters, administrators, and campaigners. We will continue to provide accurate and impartial information, guidance and advice to our stakeholders. As we prepare for the UK Government's likely introduction of a Strategy and Policy Statement for the Commission, the Commission's commitment to independent decision-making remains firm. Letter to Mr Clive Betts MP regarding collection of data on numbers turned away outside polling station due to lack of voter ID | Electoral Commission Search Letter to Mr Clive Betts MP regarding collection of data on numbers turned away outside polling station due to lack of voter ID You are in the Key correspondence section Home Key correspondence First published: 27 April 2023 Last updated: 27 April 2023 Summary of letter Date: 27 April 2023 To: Mr Clive Betts MP - Chair of the Levelling up, Housing and Communities Committee From: John Pullinger, Chair Format: Sent by email Full letter Dear Mr Betts Thank you for your letter of 26 April in relation to the data the Commission will be collecting following the local elections on 4 May. I fully understand the Committee's concern that an accurate assessment will be able to be made of the impact on voters of this first deployment of the photographic ID requirement. The Elections Act and the Voter Identification Regulations 2022 require polling station staff to collect data on the people that cannot be issued with a ballot paper because they were unable to provide an accepted form of ID. This includes data on people who are turned away and later return to the polling station with accepted ID. Legally, this information can only be recorded by a poll clerk or presiding officer when a voter requests a ballot paper at the issuing desk, and cannot be gathered by a greeter at the entrance. However, it is clear that the presence of a greeter at a polling station – while helpful in supporting the smooth administration of polling station voting – is likely to affect the data recorded at the desk. For this reason, the legislation also requires the Electoral Registration Officer for each local authority to separate data for polling stations with and without greeters when submitting data after the polls. The Elections Act 2022 and resulting statutory instrument specify what data should be collected, and require Electoral Registration Officers to provide this data to the Government and the Commission. The Commission will be collecting this data – for those stations with and without greeters – and will share it with the Government as we receive it. We are not asking Electoral Registration Officers to also collect data via greeters, in addition to their legal requirements. This is because the process of collecting the data, for example using tally charts, risks providing inaccurate data in an inconsistent way. Practically, it also does not allow for the accurate recording of voters who might return to polling stations with the correct ID having been previously turned away. This can only be accurately recorded at the desk where the elector numbers of individual voters are held. While we know that some potential voters will be turned away by greeters, others will be deterred earlier in their journey or earlier on polling day, and despite the very best efforts would remain beyond the reach of any practical data collection exercise. It has therefore never been the case that an accurate, specific number of people impacted could be defined. However, the Commission is experienced at using wider survey work to supplement quantitative data to assess the overall impact of changes to elections. In our reporting on the elections, the Commission will make an assessment of the wider impact of the ID requirements using other types of research; importantly this will include public opinion surveying across England, asking about people's experiences of voting or trying to vote on 4 May. We will also, as we do each year, survey electoral administrators, campaigners and electoral observers. We will publish our initial findings in June before our more detailed survey results are published in our post-poll report in September. Yours sincerely, John Pullinger Chair

At the publication of the 2020 annual registers, there were 46,906,270 entries on the parliamentary registers in the UK. This was a decrease of 168,578 (0.4%) from the annual registers of 2019, which themselves had showed an increase of 2.8% from the previous year. This decrease from the 2019 to 2020 registers is likely to be as a result of the 2019 UK general election driving up applications ahead of the publication of the 2019 registers, coupled with lower levels of registration activity in 2020 likely linked to the fact that no elections were held due to the coronavirus pandemic. While COVID-19 presented particular challenges for EROs and their teams, the first reformed canvass in Great Britain was largely successful and the use of national and local data matching allowed EROs to target their resources towards those households where changes were needed.

The electoral registers At the publication of the 2020 annual registers, there were 46,906,270 entries on the parliamentary registers and 49,063,707 entries on the local government registers in the United Kingdom. The total number of parliamentary entries decreased by 168,578 (0.4%) from the annual registers of 2019, which themselves had shown an increase of 2.8% from the previous year. The table below shows the change in each part of the UK between the annual registers of 2019 and 2020:

Area	2019	2020	% change
England	39,476,140	39,298,264	-0.5%

Northern Ireland	1,296,307	1,290,937	-0.4%
United Kingdom	47,074,848	46,906,270	-0.4%

The total number of entries on the local government registers decreased by 90,059 (0.2%) from 2019. The change in number of local government register entries varied across the UK. The largest decrease was observed in the East Midlands (1.4%), while Scotland recorded an increase (of 1.0%) compared to the annual registers of 2019. However, it should be noted that the majority of EROs in Scotland published their 2019 annual registers in November. This meant that the registers did not include those who registered in the lead up to the 26 November 2019 registration deadline for the UK general election. The table below presents the local government register size from 2019 to 2020 and shows the percentage change for different parts of the UK:

Generally, changes in the number of registered electors in an area can be explained by the following:

- A change in the size of the population who are entitled to vote. This can happen due to international migration, internal migration, young people becoming old enough to vote and deaths of people currently on the register.
- A change in the proportion of the eligible population who actually register to vote. This could happen as a result of changed approaches to canvassing by EROs, national and local voter registration campaigns, a recent election or increased public interest in the political landscape.
- A change in the definition of eligibility. For example, in 2020 the right to vote was extended to all foreign nationals with leave to remain in Scotland and Wales for local government and Scottish Parliament/Senedd elections. The right to vote was also extended to 16 and 17 year olds for the same elections in Wales in 2020. Comparisons to March 2020 registers The ONS published statistics in relation to the electoral registers as of 2 March 2020. These were produced to support the parliamentary constituency boundary review due to conclude in July 2023. As noted above, Scotland stands out as the only nation to record an increase in registrations from December 2019 to December 2020. However, when compared to the registers for March 2020 (which include registrations in the lead up to the 2019 UKPGE), the figures for Scotland are in line with the other nations.

Other register statistics Attainers Electoral registers include people who will reach the age of 18 in England and 16 in Scotland and Wales, and will therefore become able to vote (dependent on the franchise for each election), during the lifetime of the register. This group is referred to as attainers. Overall, the number of attainers on both parliamentary and local government registers continues to fall. Attainers on the parliamentary registers in Great Britain saw a fall of 21.0%. There was a fall of 18.0% on the local government registers. The overall decrease in attainers is driven by the change in England, with a significant decrease in the numbers registered on both the parliamentary and local government registers (25.9% and 26.1% respectively). This is likely, at least in part, to be the result of previous attainers now being of voting age and there being less registration activity during 2020 due to the postponement of the May 2020 local elections in England. However, we cannot rule out that at least some of this change relates to the reformed canvass and we will continue to keep this under review in order to further understand and mitigate the decline. The number of registered attainers increased in both Scotland and Wales. Scotland saw a small increase on the parliamentary registers (0.9%) and the number more than doubled on the local government registers (103.1%). This is likely linked to registration activity among voters aged younger than 16 who would then be eligible to vote by the time of the May 2021 Scottish Parliament election. In Wales, there were also significant increases on both the parliamentary (11.6%) and local government registers (11.2%) in Wales. Again, these increases are likely to be linked to registration activity among younger voters in preparation for being able to vote at the May 2021 Senedd election, where 16 and 17 year olds were eligible to vote for the first time.

16 and 17 year olds (Scotland and Wales) The voting age is lower for some elections in Scotland and Wales (Scottish Parliament, Senedd and local council elections) than for elections in England. The change in Scotland was introduced in 2015 and in Wales the change was made in 2020. Figures in this section relate to the annual registers published on conclusion of the 2020 canvass (i.e. between December 2020 and February 2021). The data does not therefore include anyone who registered in the run up to the May 2021 elections in Scotland and Wales. In Scotland, at the publication of the annual register in 2020, there were a total of 73,272 16 and 17 year olds on the local government register. The table below shows the trend in the numbers registered since this change was introduced. Number of electors aged 16/17 on the local government register for Scotland, 2015 to 2020 registers in 2020, there were a total of 15,457 16 and 17 year olds on the local government register. Data on the numbers of 16 and 17 year olds registered for the May 2021 elections will be published alongside the Commission's reports on the polls.

Overseas electors A UK citizen living abroad who has been registered to vote in the UK in the past 15 years can apply to be an overseas voter. They are required to renew their registration every 12 months. The total number of overseas electors on the 2020 registers in Great Britain was 184,982. Number of overseas electors on the UK in 2019 and, due to the need to renew registration every 12 months, is likely to be largely driven by the absence of electoral events at which these electors could vote.

Anonymous electors The number of anonymous electoral register entries on the parliamentary registers in Great Britain decreased from 3,546 to 3,374 from 2019 to 2020. Anonymous registration is available for people meeting certain requirements, whose safety, or the safety of someone in the same household, is at risk. People registered anonymously appear on the electoral register without their name and address. Number of anonymous electors on UK parliamentary registers figures, we also analyse information relating to activities undertaken by Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) in Great Britain during the annual canvass period. There is no equivalent annual canvass in Northern Ireland. The canvass must commence between 1 July and 30 November, but EROs do not necessarily need to complete all canvass activity within this period. The 2020 canvass was the first to take place under a new model which incorporates data matching between the electoral registers and a combination of national and local data at the outset of the process. This data matching informs the ERO which properties are likely to have an unchanged household composition, to enable them to target their canvass activity accordingly. The ERO will then follow one of three routes for each property: Route 1: This route is for properties where the registered electors match with other data and are assumed to have no change in household composition. The ERO will contact Route 1 households to invite them to provide information on any changes which have occurred, but where there are no changes, the household is not required to respond. Route 2: This route is for properties where the current registered electors did not all match with other data and are assumed to have had a change in household composition which would require an update to be made to the electoral register. These households are required to respond to requests for information whether they do in fact need to report a change or not. Route 3: This route is available for those properties where the ERO thinks they can most effectively and efficiently obtain information on residents through a single ‘responsible person’ acting on behalf of all residents. Examples of these property types are care homes and student halls of residence. Should the ERO be unable to successfully obtain information about the property from a ‘responsible person’ they will need to canvass these property types using the Route 2 process. The sections below broadly follow a logical course through the canvass – starting with the allocation of households to the different routes, moving on to look at the responses received from households, and then the applications received from individuals. Finally we consider data on the effect of the electoral registration activity – changes to the registers (i.e. additions to and deletions from). Data collection Following the publication of the annual registers the Commission requests data from EROs for each local authority area, along with information on their canvass process. The analysis and results in this section are based on the responses we received from EROs. In total, we received responses for 366 local authority areas across Great Britain. Households allocated to each route Overall At the beginning of the canvass, all registers are matched against Department for Work and Pensions data and EROs then use the results to help them allocate properties to routes (as explained above). Following this national data matching exercise, our data shows that 19.5 million properties were allocated to Route 1 and 9.3 million to Route 2. In addition, EROs have the discretion to carry out data matching using local datasets such as Council Tax in order to aid with the process of allocating properties to routes. The majority of EROs carried out local data matching, with Council Tax being the most popular dataset used and respondents citing that this data was the most easily usable and accurate. The next most popular piece of data was housing benefit data. The local data matching step had a significant impact on the total figures for route allocations as shown in the table below.

	Route Number	allocated by national data matching	Number allocated after local data matching	Change (%)	Route 1	19.5 million	21.4 million	+10%	Route 2	9.3 million	7.5 million	-19%	Route 3	N/A	277,000
N/1	The proportion of properties allocated to Route 2 (26% after the local data matching stage) is broadly in line with that predicted in the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments’ statement of policy for canvass reform, which anticipated that around a quarter of properties would have to go down the Route 2 process nationally. Whilst we are aware of some EROs successfully using a range of local data for data matching, we also received feedback during, and following, the 2020 annual canvass, indicating that other datasets were more difficult to access. In response to this, we have undertaken work to expand our guidance on local data matching ahead of the 2021 canvass. We have included additional guidance on the ERO’s power to obtain data, and have also highlighted some practical considerations for how to work with other teams in local authorities to access data. Additionally, over the course of this year’s canvass, we plan to work with EROs to identify examples of good practice that we can share to support other EROs with effectively accessing and using a variety of local data sources.	& Variation in route allocation	Generally speaking, the allocation of properties down each route suggests a relatively stable picture across the nations of Great Britain. Within England the allocations were similar across regions although, perhaps unsurprisingly, London recorded the lowest proportion of Route 1 allocations (66.4%). This reflects the greater degree of population movement in London, with more properties failing to match with existing data and being allocated to Route 2 in order to pick up changes in household composition. The table below shows the proportion of properties allocated across each route for each region:	Proportion of properties in each route, by nation and region	Area	Route 1	Route 2	Route 3	England

73.4% 25.7% 0.9% North East 78.9% 20.8% 0.3% North West 73.4% 25.9% 0.8% Yorkshire and the Humber 73.2% 25.4% 1.4% East Midlands 74.9% 23.8% 1.3% West Midlands 73.4% 25.3% 1.4% East of England 76.9% 22.5% 0.6% London 66.4% 32.6% 1.0% South East 73.4% 25.9% 0.7% South West 75.8% 23.7% 0.5% Scotland 72.1% 26.6% 1.3% Wales 75.1% 23.7% 1.2% Great Britain 73.3% 25.7% 1.0% Household response rates The reforms to the canvass were designed to allow EROs to ensure their resources could be directed at households where changes needed to be made to the registers. In previous years, because all households were required to be chased for a response, even where there were no changes to report, significant effort and resource was being expended on households where the composition had not changed, with no benefit to the quality of the registers. In the 2020 canvass, around 8.8 million responses were received from households across all canvass routes. This compares to 23.8 million responses to Household Enquiry Forms at the 2019 canvass. This lower overall response suggests that the increasing targeting of activity in the reformed canvass was successful in reducing unnecessary response. Also, as anticipated in the UK's governments' canvass reform policy, there was a significantly higher response rate from those households in Route 2, where data matching had indicated a greater likelihood of a change in residents, compared to Route 1 (66% compared to 18%). Route 2 is also the route where EROs are required to chase for a response, by sending reminders and by trying different contact methods. While this balance of responses between Routes 1 and 2 is positive, it is important to note that although all households in Route 2 are required to respond, more than one third did not, meaning details for these households have not been updated when the data matching suggests updates were required. This will be an area to continue to monitor in future canvasses, and EROs and the Commission will be able to use the new ERO performance standards framework to support an analysis of the data to help understand and, where appropriate, address the reasons for this. The level of response for Route 2 varied significantly, as shown in the table below, with Scotland reporting the lowest response for Route 2 at 50% and England the highest at 67%. Within England, the North East was the region with the lowest response rate to both Route 1 and Route 2. Response rate for each route, by region and nation, 2020 Area Route 1 Route 2 England 18.5% 67.4% North East 7.4% 59.3% North West 13.5% 61.8% Yorkshire and the Humber 14.6% 70.5% East Midlands 16.4% 72.5% West Midlands 19.5% 69.3% East of England 17.6% 72.3% London 19.6% 59.7% South East 25.7% 71.5% South West 23.1% 72.4% Scotland 14.9% 50.0% Wales 14.9% 63.6% Great Britain 18.0% 65.5% Types of household response Households that respond to the canvass can record a major change (e.g. showing a potential new elector is resident), a minor change (e.g. amending the name of an existing elector) or no change (i.e. confirming existing details). A total of 2.6 million households who responded during the 2020 canvass reported a major change in their registration details. This represented 30% of all 8.8 million responses received across each route. These major changes were distributed by route as follows: Route 1 major changes: 791,720 (30%) Route 2 major changes: 1,801,283 (69%) Route 3 major changes: 26,835 (1%) This again shows that overall those properties in Route 2 that were identified by data matching as most likely to need changes to residents' registration details, reported the largest proportion of changes during the canvass. However, nearly a third of the major changes reported came from properties allocated to Route 1 and where the data had indicated no change was needed. It is important to bear in mind that, of all the households allocated to Route 1 (21.4 million), the proportion reporting a major change (791,000) is small (around 4%). However, these figures do highlight that the matching process does not accurately identify all properties where changes will be needed. We will use the new ERO performance standards to support our work with EROs throughout the 2021 canvass to understand further the scale and impact of this. A further 6.1 million households reported no or minor changes to their registration details, representing 70% of households who responded. In order for this data to be more useful in future, we will work with electoral management software (EMS) providers to split this category up into no change and minor changes. Individual applications Canvassing activity with properties does not directly result in registrations. For example, where a household reports that a potential new elector is resident that individual still needs to submit an application to become registered.

In the year to the publication of the annual register in 2020, a total of 5.3 million applications to register to vote were received. Of these applications, 2.8 million (53%) were received during the canvass period. The annual volume of applications tells us about whether the registers are picking up expected levels of change in the population. While the number of applications in 2020 (5.3 million) was much lower than in 2019 (7.5 million) it was in line with 2018 (5.3 million). The lower level of registration activity in 2020 is likely linked to the fact that no elections were held after being postponed due to the coronavirus pandemic. In 2018 there were no high profile national polls, with elections held in only some local authority areas in England. The proportion of applications in the canvass, compared to the rest of the year, tells us something about the relative effectiveness of the canvass itself in driving new registrations. In 2020, the proportion of applications during the canvass (53%) was lower than in 2019 (66%) and 2018 (62%), but much higher than in 2017 (37%). The position of 2020 relative to 2019 is likely explained by the 2019 UKPGE registration period taking place during the canvass in 2019, driving up applications. In 2017, the UK general election took place in June, which had the effect of driving applications outside the canvass period. The lower proportion of applications in 2020 compared to 2018 could be, at least in part, the result of a reduction in personal canvassing in 2020. At this stage it is not possible to disentangle the extent to which that reduction can be attributed to pandemic restrictions compared to the reformed canvass process. We will therefore continue to monitor this data in future years.

Change on the registers: additions and deletions Data on additions to, and deletions from, the registers provides a good understanding of whether registration activity is keeping pace with population change. Data relating to additions and deletions form a core part of the new performance standards to support EROs with measuring and monitoring the impact of their registration activities. Changes to the registers are generated from several sources. For example, once applications have been received and processed, EROs are required to add new eligible electors; EROs can also use data gathered from households and other existing data sources to identify records relating to home movers and those who have died, which they will need to take steps to remove. As population mobility varies across the country, so does the scale of the challenge of maintaining the accuracy and completeness of electoral registers faced by EROs. There were a total of 4.7 million additions to the registers and 4.9 million deletions from the registers in the year from publication of the 2019 annual registers to the publication of the annual registers for 2020. This represents 10% of the registers being added and 10% removed over the year. The number of additions in 2020 (4.7 million) was lower than that recorded in 2019 (6.3 million). The number of additions recorded in the canvass period (2.7 million) was also lower than in 2019 (3.9 million). However, this is again likely to be linked to elections - 2019 saw three sets of electoral events, including a UKPGE where much of the registration activity was during the canvass period, while 2020 had no polls due to COVID-19. The number of deletions in 2020 (4.9 million) was very similar to that recorded in 2019 (4.9 million). The number of deletions during the canvass period in 2020 (3.1 million) was also very similar to 2019 (3.0 million). The proportion of additions and deletions across routes is largely in line with expectations, with more changes being picked up within the Route 2 households. Although as with the level of household major changes, which are directly related to additions and deletions, the data highlights that just over one third of the changes made to the registers were within households where the data matching did not suggest any change was needed. It is not possible from a single year of data to judge if this will continue to be a feature of the reformed canvass and, if so, what the longer term impact of it would be. This is an area we will continue to monitor.

Background

There is no national electoral register for the United Kingdom. A total of 368 separate electoral registers are compiled and maintained by Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) in Great Britain, and one register for Northern Ireland is compiled and maintained by the Chief Electoral Officer. Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) are required to maintain two electoral registers: Parliamentary register – used for UK Parliamentary elections Local government register – used for Scottish Parliamentary, Senedd, Northern Ireland Assembly, local government and Police and Crime Commissioner elections

The electoral register is a property based database, with register entries linked to a property. This means that the quality of its information is affected by ongoing population change and EROs need to add and delete records for home-movers, electors who have died and newly eligible electors. New registers are published annually and reviewed most months. In Great Britain, there is a process of auditing the register annually before a revised version is published, which is known as the annual canvass. Each ERO is required by law to conduct an annual canvass of all properties in their area to confirm their electoral register entries and to identify electors who have moved or were not previously registered. The annual canvass of 2020 was the first conducted since reforms to the process were introduced. This new model means that responses are not required from households that have been identified, through matching with national and local databases, as having had no recent change in composition. The new canvass model aims to allow EROs in Great Britain to better target their resources to households where updates to the electoral register are likely to be required. The data and analysis presented in this report is from data that the Electoral Commission collects from EROs following the end of the annual canvass. Typically, annual registers are published by the 1 December each year. In order to take account of the impact of the pandemic, this year EROs could publish their annual register up to the 1 February 2021. However, for simplicity, the registers are referred to as the 2020 annual registers throughout. Update CSPL Review of Electoral Regulation Mairaid highlighted that in June, the Committee on Standards in Public Life launched a review of the regulatory framework on electoral finance, enforced by the Commission, the police and the courts. The Electoral Commission circulated a link to the consultation to a range of NI stakeholders, including the parties, at the time, inviting them to submit a response if they wished to do so. In the Electoral Commission's consultation response, it is made clear the current regulatory framework broadly works well to support public confidence in the integrity of elections and referendums in the UK. We noted there are generally high levels of compliance with the law, and the framework has been updated over time. However, the response sets The Electoral Commission's suggested priorities for reform that are designed to deliver greater transparency, reflect new ways of campaigning, and provide sufficient deterrents to those tempted to breach electoral law. Mairaid advised that The Electoral Commission has recommended greater alignment between the party and candidate regulatory framework, to ensure the system is fairer and more proportionate for candidates and frees up police and court time.

PACAC Inquiry Mairaid advised that there is an ongoing inquiry from Public Administration and Constitutional Affairs Committee (PACAC) into the role of The Electoral Commission. This will examine public and political confidence in the Electoral Commission and will be looking at its powers, remit, and functions. There is currently a call for evidence out which closes on 16 November 2020, and a link to the Call for Evidence would be circulated after the meeting. UK Government digital imprints consultation The Commission has welcomed the UK Government's consultation on digital imprints. We have previously recommended extending imprint requirements to digital election and referendum material. The consultation provides an opportunity to deliver real change for voters and give them a better understanding of who is trying to reach them online. The consultation seeks views on the technical scope of the new digital imprints regime and closes on 4 November 2020. We will be submitting a response, and would encourage parties to respond to the consultation too. Online party conferences and events guidance We understand that some political parties will be holding digital conferences and other meetings which would otherwise have been held in person as a result of the Covid-19 pandemic. In response to this we have prepared some FAQs on our website to address how these events interact with the PPERA party funding rules. The rules on payments made in connection with digital conferences and events are treated in the same way as physical conferences and events under PPERA. We have also considered how the rules apply to advertisements at these online events and digital conference stands which parties may wish to sell. Upcoming reporting dates for political parties 30 October 2020 - Deadline for submitting Quarter 3 2020 (1 July 2020– 30 September 2020) donations and loans report 28 October 2020 -Statements of Accounts for parties and accounting units with income and expenditure over £250,000 will be published. AoB Thanks and best wishes were passed onto Anna Carragher as this was her last meeting as Chair as she steps down from the Northern Ireland Commissioner role. Cahir advised that recruitment is ongoing for a new Northern Ireland Commissioner. The closing date for these applications is 14 October 2020. The House of Commons Speaker's Committee is planning on interviewing for this in early November. Recruitment is also about to commence for a new Chair of the Electoral Commission. The Speaker's Committee is also carrying out recruitment for a new Smaller Parties Commissioner. Proposed meeting dates 2021 Tuesday 19 January Tuesday 9 March Tuesday 8 June Tuesday 12 October

Report: 2018 recall petition in North Antrim | Electoral Commission Search Report: 2018 recall petition in North Antrim You are in the Recall petitions section Home Recall petitions On this page Summary How the recall petition was run Transparency and secrecy Further recommendations for change First published: 5 November 2018 Last updated: 29 July 2019 Overview From 8 August to 19 September 2018, electors in the constituency of North Antrim were able to take part in the first ever recall petition in the UK. This report covers how the petition was run and makes some recommendations for future recall petitions. Summary The North Antrim recall petition was the first to take place across the UK since the Recall of MPs Act was introduced in 2015. It was the first time the legislation was tested and has provided an opportunity to look at lessons to be learnt and improvements that could be made for any future recall petition in the UK. Our report is based on feedback from those who administered the petition and those who campaigned during the petition period, as well as our own observations. This highlighted a number of issues which would merit further consideration by the UK Government. However, it should be acknowledged that these are based on the experience of running only one recall petition, and different issues could arise if a recall petition were to take place in any other constituency in the UK. Findings and recommendations Overall we found that the Petition Officer successfully delivered all of her duties as required under the Act. There were no significant problems in the delivery of the recall petition which affected voters or any individuals or organisations wishing to campaign. We recognise that the decision to use only three signing places was the subject of much debate and criticism. However, we have found no evidence that an increased number of signing places would have contributed to a different result at the end of the recall petition. Feedback from those who worked and campaigned at the recall petition was that the six week signing period was too long. Concerns were also raised as to whether there was enough awareness amongst electors on how they could participate. In light of this we have recommended that the UK Government should: Consider whether a signing period of six weeks is appropriate and whether this should be changed for future recall petitions. Consider how electors can get information about the recall petition and how they can take part in it if they so wish. We have also asked the Government to explore what more can be done to improve transparency in the delivery of recall petitions whilst also ensuring that electors can have confidence in the integrity and secrecy of a petition How the recall petition was run Background On 26 July MPs voted to suspend Ian Paisley MP for North Antrim for 30 sitting days. This was in response to a report by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards, which found that Mr Paisley had committed multiple breaches of the Code of Conduct for MPs in relation to two family holidays paid for by the Sri Lankan government. The Recall of MPs Act 2015 introduced a process where a sitting MP can lose their seat in the House of Commons if there is a successful petition to recall them. One of the conditions to trigger a recall petition is if an MP is barred from sitting in the House for 10 or more sitting days. As required under the Act, the Speaker of the House of Commons wrote to the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland, in her role as Petition Officer, to notify her that a recall petition should be opened in the constituency of North Antrim for a period of six weeks. The report We are required to publish a report on any recall petition after the end of the recall petition period. For this report we have gathered information from the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland; Electoral Commission representatives who observed at the signing places, verification and count; staff who worked at the signing places; and political parties and campaigners. Although we did not carry out research with the public we have taken into account any

comments made by electors to the Electoral Office, staff at the signing places and ourselves about their experience of signing the petition. The North Antrim recall petition was the first to take place across the UK and the first time the legislation was tested. It has provided an opportunity to look at lessons to be learnt and improvements that could be made for any future recall petition in the UK. However, it is important to bear in mind the unique political circumstances that can exist in any one constituency when considering what a recall petition might look like elsewhere in the UK. How the recall petition was run Roles and responsibilities The Petition Officer is the same person as the Returning Officer in a constituency. As the constituency where the petition took place was in Northern Ireland the Petition Officer was the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland. Her role was to: open a recall petition oversee the administration of the petition, including publishing a register of electors who can sign the petition and notifying those electors of the petition declare the result, including notifying the Speaker of the House of Commons receive donation and spending returns and make them available for public inspection We also has a number of roles in the recall petition process. This includes providing advice and guidance to help people running and taking part in the petition understand the rules. We can also seek forfeiture of impermissible donations, if necessary by court order. The police also have a role in recall petitions to investigate breaches of the rules set out in the Recall Act and to enforce compliance with the law.

Setting up the recall petition Notification of the recall petition Under the Recall Act the Petition Officer is required to designate a day for the petition to open no later than 10 days, or as soon as reasonably practical, after notification from the Speaker of the House of Commons. Within this time the Petition Officer was required to publish a register of electors who could sign the petition and notify them that the petition was taking place. The notification letter gave the elector information about: why the petition was taking place what would happen if the petition was successful and unsuccessful - either that a by-election would be held, or Ian Paisley MP would continue in his role how someone could sign the petition the address and a map of their designated signing place (including opening times) how to apply to sign by post or proxy the need to bring electoral ID (as required in Northern Ireland). A total of 75,428 electors were eligible to sign the petition at their allocated signing venue, or by applying to sign by post or proxy. There was little opportunity to allow for any new applications to register to be made given the requirement for a petition to be opened within 10 days of the notification being received from the Speaker. All of these requirements placed a considerable administrative burden on the Petition Officer and the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland, particularly as many senior staff were absent in the normally quieter summer months. Despite this, the Petition Officer successfully met all her statutory requirements within the required timeframes. The register was published on 3 August, notifications were sent to all electors on 6 and 7 August and the petition opened on 8 August. Signing places Under the Recall Act, the Petition Officer can designate up to 10 signing places where people can sign the petition. Signing places must be open for the six weeks of the recall petition on Monday to Friday between the hours of 9am and 5pm. However, the Petition Officer has discretion to extend these hours. The Petition Officer decided to use three places located in the main towns of the constituency – Ballymena, Ballymoney and Ballycastle. This meant that no elector would have to travel more than 15 minutes to get to their designated signing venue. Unlike elections in Northern Ireland, applications to vote by post or proxy could be made without having to provide a valid reason. This offered greater flexibility in how someone could sign the petition. The decision to only use three signing places was met with opposition by a number of political parties. They highlighted that there were 53 polling places used in the constituency during the last election and that the decision to use only three places greatly reduced accessibility for electors, particularly for those living outside of the main towns. The Petition Officer did receive some complaints from electors about the choice of places, but we received no complaints from electors about their allocated signing place. It is difficult to judge what impact using more than three places for the recall petition would have had on electors in the constituency. We have seen no evidence that an increased number of signing places would have contributed to a different result at the end of the recall petition. The use of more places would have required additional staff and put extra pressure on the Petition Officer and her staff throughout the duration of the recall petition. We have no evidence that an increased number of signing places would have contributed to a different result at the end of the recall petition, but this needs to be considered in the context of an individual constituency, and balanced against the length of the signing period and the hours in which the signing places are open. Electors had six weeks in which to sign the petition at their designated venue and could also sign by post or appoint a proxy on demand. This is a significant factor to consider when compared to all other electoral events in Northern Ireland where electors are required to give a valid reason as to why they cannot attend their polling station in person. Opening hours of the recall petition Signing places were open Monday to Friday, 9am to 5pm, for a period of six weeks. There was criticism from some political parties that the signing hours were a barrier for people working traditional full time working hours and therefore unable to sign the petition at their designated signing place. Comparisons were made with polling stations which are open from 7am to 10pm at elections and therefore recognise and facilitate the work and life commitments of many voters. To address this concern, the Petition Officer extended the opening hours of the signing places to 9pm on two evenings. However, this decision was only confirmed after electors were notified of their signing venue and opening hours of 9am to 5pm. The Petition Officer used media and social media in the constituency to highlight the extended hours and the deadline for postal and proxy applications but it is hard to assess what impact, if any, this may have had. However, the feedback from the Petition Officer suggests there was a small increase in the number of electors who signed on these days compared to other days. The six week signing period Commission representatives observed proceedings on 11 days during the six week period, including the two evenings when signing hours were extended. Our representatives spoke to petition staff at each of the signing places and watched as electors signed the petition. Overall, the feedback was that the signing places were quiet during most days of the recall petition. Overall feedback received from petition staff and those who campaigned at the recall petition was that the six week period was too long. The Petition Officer told us that at the start and the end of the six week period turnout was considerably higher than on some other days in the middle weeks, and on some days it was very low. On the first day of the recall petition there was significant media interest and queues at some of the signing places but it became quieter after that at each of the signing places. A number of alternative suggestions were proposed by petition staff and campaigners on how long a recall petition should last. These ranged from two to four weeks with longer opening hours and the availability of weekend signings. It was also suggested that the petition could be signed on one day as is the case with elections and referendums. It was suggested that reducing the length of the recall petition period would increase accessibility to the overall process for electors. While there may be merit in some of these suggestions, further consideration would be needed on the wider implications of any such change. For example, longer opening hours could make the petition more accessible to people wanting to sign in person, but would have an impact for those running the petition, particularly in terms of staffing and resourcing. The UK Government should consider whether a signing period of six weeks is appropriate and whether this should be changed for future recall petitions.

Absent votes In total 3,233 postal signing papers were issued at the recall petition. Approximately 1,000 postal signing papers were not returned. A total of 10 electors chose to appoint a proxy. At the 2017 UK parliamentary general election, where electors were not allowed to have a postal vote on demand, 1,163 postal votes were issued in North Antrim, and 1,048 were returned. Overall the postal and proxy application process worked well and no significant issues emerged. The Petition Officer also asked Royal Mail to do a sweep of their sorting offices as the deadline approached to ensure that any postal signing papers could be included in the final count. A total of 12 signing papers were found during this sweep. As previously outlined, the fact that electors could apply for a postal signing paper 'on demand' during the six week period increased the accessibility of the recall petition as it offered electors choice via an alternative way to sign the petition if they were working, away from home, or were unable or who did not want to go to their designated signing place.

Verification of signing papers There is a requirement, under the Recall Act, for daily verification of signing papers to take place during a recall petition. This required the breaking of the seal of each ballot box and verifying the number of each signing paper within it. This process could be carried out by the Petition Officer or the Petition Clerk in each of the signing places. To maintain the security and integrity of the recall petition, the Petition Officer decided to complete the daily verification of the ballot boxes at the Belfast headquarters of the Electoral Office for Northern Ireland. This meant that the boxes were collected, delivered and returned each day between Belfast and the three signing places. The boxes were stored securely in Belfast each night.

Although this process worked well in practice, we think it lacked transparency. This is because the Recall Act makes no provision for observers and/or campaigners to observe this part of proceedings. The Petition Officer shared our concerns about the lack of transparency and therefore requested that Commission representatives attend every daily verification of the signing papers. We take a risk based approach to observing electoral events and did not believe attending every verification was necessary as we were satisfied with how the process was being conducted by the Petition Officer. However, Commission representatives were able to observe and attended verification on 15 evenings and were content with the processes put in place to manage the daily verification and how it was completed. Although we were satisfied with the processes put in place to manage the verification of signing papers at this recall petition, it is clear that more access to independent observation of this process would be beneficial to ensure confidence in its integrity. The UK Government should give careful consideration to how access to the recall petition proceedings can be enhanced so as to improve transparency.

The count The counting of signing papers commenced at 00:01 on Thursday 20 September. Although signing places closed at 5pm the previous day there was no provision within the Recall Act for when the count should start. The law was also unclear about the deadline for the receipt of postal signing papers. For this reason, the Petition Officer decided to commence the count after midnight to allow for any additional postal signing papers to be received. Commission staff attended the count and saw that, overall, the count process worked well. Sufficient count staff were put in place and the overall management of the count was professional. The count was completed in approximately one hour and the Petition Officer notified the Speaker of the House of Commons of the result immediately. It was unclear from the provisions of the Act as to how the Speaker should be notified, but the Petition Officer had agreed in advance to email his office and await a reply. Once this was received the Petition Officer published the result and notified the media. In total, 9.4% of eligible electors signed the petition. This meant that the petition was unsuccessful and no by-election was triggered. Ian Paisley MP therefore kept his seat. Overall awareness of the recall petition In the absence of public opinion research or direct contact with electors it is difficult to gauge public opinion on the administration of the recall petition. Given the time constraints, and that this was a local issue within one constituency, we did not conduct any public opinion research as we would at major electoral events. However, the evidence available to us from our observations and feedback from campaigners and petition staff suggests that there may not have been a strong awareness amongst electors of the recall petition throughout the whole six week period. As expected, there was significant and intense interest in the run-up to and start of the petition by the media. However, this quickly diminished within a few days. Campaigning by the two registered campaigners was relatively low key and the sitting MP, Ian Paisley, did not actively campaign in the petition. A number of political parties told us that they felt there was an overall lack of public awareness of the recall petition. They argued that, as this was different from an election, many of those who could sign the petition were unaware of how the process was run or how they could participate. It was suggested to us by one political party that some electors only realised the petition was over when the result was announced in the media. One political party also highlighted to us that, although much was made of the increased availability of postal and proxy signing, many electors did not know what 'on demand' applications meant or how they could apply for one. It is not possible to know if this had any impact at the North Antrim recall petition, and there is no evidence available to suggest it would have changed the result. However, it is important to emphasise that a recall petition is different from an election. At an election promoting awareness and encouraging participation are possible without appearing to favour any particular candidate or party. This is not the case with a recall petition where there is a significant risk that actively encouraging participation could be seen as taking a side and could therefore potentially undermine the integrity of the recall petition. It may be the case that when the Recall Act was introduced there was an expectation that campaigners themselves would raise awareness of the recall petition and how electors could take part. However the general lack of campaigning in North Antrim may have contributed to a lack of awareness of a new process being run for the first time. Government and Petition Officers at future recall petitions should consider further ways of how electors can get information about the recall petition and how they can take part in it if they so wish. Any changes to how a recall petition is promoted should be clearly set out in legislation with clearly defined instructions on the actions a Petition Officer should take. Transparency and secrecy Concerns were raised at an early stage of the recall petition by some campaigners about a 'lack of secrecy' which may have stopped some electors from signing the petition. This was because when an elector entered a room at a signing place it was clear that their intention was to sign the petition to unseat their MP and trigger a by-election. The feedback we received from petition staff was that this seemed odd when compared to an electoral event where the

Petition Officers at future recall petitions should take into account the need for privacy when allocating signing places within their constituency. Transparency and Secrecy Access to the marked register The wording on the official petition notice sent to electors stated that the marked register would be available for public inspection after the petition if there was suspected fraud. However, there is no actual provision in the legislation that would have allowed the marked register in North Antrim to be made available for public inspection, or for it to be supplied to the police, the Electoral Commission or anyone who requested it. The Petition Officer made clear that her intention was that the marked register would not be available at all for public inspection. This is different from Great Britain, where there is provision in the legislation for the marked register to be made available for inspection after a recall petition in the event of potential fraud. It is not clear whether this was a deliberate policy difference or an accidental omission in the legislation, but it does raise questions about the secrecy of the recall petition. At elections the marked register is made available to political parties to assist in campaigning at future elections. Although it indicates that an elector did vote, it in no way shows how the elector voted. This is not the case with the marked register at a recall petition which would show that someone had signed the petition with the intention of unseating their MP. We recommend that the UK Government review the purpose and workings of the provision to access the marked register ahead of any future recall petition in order to ensure the appropriate balance is struck between maintaining secrecy and challenging fraud. Observing the recall petition Independent observation is an important part of any democratic process. For over a decade we have accredited hundreds of electoral observers who have attended and observed the electoral process in action. However, under the current legislation, the opportunity to observe proceedings at a recall petition is limited only to Commission representatives: Electoral Commissioners and staff of the Electoral Commission. Individuals and organisations accredited as electoral observers are not entitled to observe any proceedings within a signing place, the issue and receipt of postal signing papers, or verification of the signing papers. Accredited individual electoral observers can attend the counting of signatures, but those nominated by an accredited organisation cannot. It may be the case that this was a deliberate policy decision to ensure the secrecy of the recall petition and to prevent individuals or organisations from working out if the 10% threshold had been reached before the end of the petition period. We received no queries from accredited observers who wished to attend proceedings at the recall petition and only one accredited individual observer attended the count. It would be helpful for future recall petitions for the UK Government to clarify its rationale for limiting observation of the process and to consider if anything further can be done to enhance transparency and confidence in the recall petition process. Integrity of the recall petition Despite concerns around transparency, we are satisfied that the integrity of this recall petition was maintained throughout. We received no complaints regarding allegations of fraud and saw no evidence of fraud during the six week signing period. Further recommendations for change Throughout the duration of the recall petition, the Commission and the Petition Officer identified a number of inconsistencies and omissions in the legislation. This may be expected given that this is the first time that the legislation has been tested. While many of these are minor, they can create an additional administrative burden and a lack of clarity that could impact on the successful delivery of a recall petition. The UK Government should consider opportunities that are available to make amendments ahead of any future recall petition. We have addressed some of these changes in our report, including access to the marked register and observation of proceedings, but draw particular attention to the following: Further recommendations for change Close of the recall petition Although the legislation states that signing places must be open at least from 9am to 5pm, there is no clear provision for what time the recall petition should close on the final day. This needs to be addressed as currently postal signing papers can still be returned on the final day up until 11.59 as there is no deadline for the receipt of postal signing papers. The lack of certainty around timing meant that the count did not commence until 00:01 on Thursday 20 September when the Petition Officer was satisfied the petition was closed. Notifying the speaker The Petition Officer must notify the Speaker of the House of Commons of the result before an announcement is made. However, there is no provision in law as to how this should happen and in what form the notification should be made. There is an expectation for instant news amongst the public, and clarity on this process would assist the Petition Officer in their planning process. There is also no provision to notify the MP who is subject to the recall petition of the result. Consideration should be given to addressing this issue ahead of any future recall petition. Appointing a Deputy Petition Officer There is currently no provision to allow for the Petition Officer to appoint a Deputy to act on their behalf. During daily verification of ballot boxes only the Petition Officer or Petition Clerk at a signing venue can break the seal. At the North Antrim recall petition this meant that the Petition Officer was required to be present every evening for the daily verification for the entire six week period. This created an unnecessary burden on the Petition Officer and the UK Government should consider enabling the Petition Officer to appoint a Deputy to assist them in delivering their duties. Prohibition on the publication of exit polls Under the current rules for a recall petition, it is forbidden to publish a statement that could indicate if an individual has signed the petition or not. It also prohibits publication of any forecasts on the result of the petition. This provision caused concern and confusion among campaigners, the media and the public. As currently drafted it appears that anyone who makes any statement on turnout or about individuals who sign the petition would be guilty of an offence. This could be punishable by a fine or imprisonment of up to six months. For example, two elected representatives were spoken to by the Police for making remarks online that gave some suggestion as to what turnout may have been at points during the recall petition process. Although the original intention may have been to maintain secrecy of the recall petition it is not clearly defined as to how this should be done in practice. As such it would be beneficial if more clarity and guidance on this provision was put in place ahead of any future recall petitions. You are in the Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 section Home Our plans and priorities Corporate plan 2022/23 to 2026/27 First published: 25 April 2022 Last updated: 25 April 2022 Overview We are led by a Board of Commissioners, who set the strategic direction and are responsible for our work. The Board is made up of ten Commissioners, one of whom is the Chair. Three of the Commissioners are appointed to represent Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales respectively. These Commissioners provide advice and support in relation to these nations of the UK. They also advise on the impact of our work and are consulted by the Commission Board on matters in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. Four of the Commissioners are nominated by the leaders of political parties: one by the party with the largest number of MPs in the UK Parliament, two more by the second and third largest parties respectively, and one by the other political parties with two or more MPs elected to and having taken their seats in the UK Parliament. The remaining two Commissioners have no specific brief, which enables them to bring their expertise and experience to work areas for the Commission as the need arises. All Commissioners are appointed by Her Majesty the Queen, on a motion of Parliament. As part of the Corporate Framework the Board has two sub-committees: the Audit and Risk Committee and the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee. Both are chaired by Commissioners. Alongside the Board of Commissioners, we also consult regularly with the UK Parliamentary Parties' Panel, and equivalent Panels for Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. These were set up to allow political parties to give us feedback about matters affecting them. We also consult with other advisory groups. The Chief Executive is the Accounting Officer. We are accountable to the UK Parliament, the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd.

Investigations On this page Overview Summary Background on Momentum Non-party campaigners Members association Our investigation Further information Offences committed as a non-party campaigner Offences committed as a members association Further information on legislation First published: 6 March 2019 Last updated: 6 March 2019 Overview We have investigated Momentum for failing to comply with political finance laws, both as a members association and when campaigning in the 2017 general election. We concluded that Momentum committed offences, and we have fined them £16,700. Non-party campaigners are essential for a healthy democracy. But just as crucial is that after a poll, voters can see complete and accurate spending returns. This is the biggest fine that we have to date levied on a non-party campaigner for the submission of an inaccurate spending return. It reflects Momentum's repeated revisions to their spending return, poor record keeping and failure to follow our advice prior to the election. It is incumbent on non-party campaigners and members associations to invest properly in having the right processes and staff to meet their obligations. Summary Momentum was a non-party campaigner in the 2017 general election. Afterwards, as required, it submitted a report of its election spending by the required deadline. However, the report was not accurate and Momentum subsequently delivered four further versions after the deadline, each of which reported different amounts of donations and spending. We opened an investigation on 16 November 2017 to determine whether Momentum broke political finance laws – set out in the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act (PPERA) 2000 – when it delivered the inaccurate report. While investigating, we found evidence that Momentum may have committed further offences, this time in its capacity as a members association, in 2016 and 2017. We expanded the investigation accordingly. We have concluded that Momentum committed a number of offences, and we have imposed fines totalling £16,700. The offences spanned 2016 and 2017. This is the biggest fine that we have imposed on a non-party campaigner for the submission of an inaccurate spending return to date. Offences as a non-party campaigner We have determined that Puru Miah, the then responsible person for Momentum as a recognised non-party campaigner at the 2017 general election, committed: one offence under section 98(4)(b) PPERA of failing, without reasonable excuse, to submit a post poll donation report that was complete and accurate. The return omitted £22,958.46 of reportable donations. We have fined Momentum £2,700 for this offence one offence under section 98(4)(b) PPERA of failing, without reasonable excuse, to provide all required invoices with the spending return. We have fined Momentum £250 for this offence one offence under section 98(4)(b) PPERA of failing, without reasonable excuse, to submit a spending report that was complete and accurate. We have fined Momentum £12,150 for this offence one offence under section 99(1) PPERA of failing to provide the required declaration to accompany the post poll donations report. We have fined Momentum £250 for this offence Offences as a members association We have determined that: Michael Chessum, the then responsible person for Momentum as a members association, and Momentum itself, committed an offence each under paragraph 12(1)(b) of Schedule 7 of PPERA. Mr Chessum failed to report a donation of £10,000 within 30 days of accepting it. The donation was received on 21 July 2016 but not reported to us until 19 January 2019. We have fined Momentum £900 for this offence Mohammed Afridi, the then responsible person for Momentum as a members association, and Momentum itself, committed an offence each under paragraph 12(1)(b) of Schedule 7 PPERA. Mr Afridi failed to report a donation of £8,000 within 30 days of accepting

it. The donation was received on 3 May 2017 but not reported to us until 17 July 2018. We have fined Momentum £450 for this offence Momentum Momentum was founded in 2015. In February 2016, the National Steering Committee met and agreed a membership structure, and in January 2017, Momentum introduced a constitution which states that Momentum activists must also be or become members of the Labour Party. Momentum campaigned in support of the Labour Party in the UK Parliamentary General Election (UKPGE) held on 8 June 2017. The Labour Party did not authorise Momentum to spend in excess of the limits for targeted spending. Non-party campaigners Non-party campaigners are individuals and organisations that campaign in the run up to elections but do not stand as political parties or candidates. Under PPERA, there are rules on what non-party campaigners can spend on regulated campaign activity in the run-up to elections. Non-party campaigners which intended to spend in excess of £20,000 in England or £10,000 in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland at the UKPGE held on 8 June 2017 were required to register with us. PPERA sets out the limits on controlled expenditure for non-party campaigners. These limits are lower for non-party campaigners that wish to undertake 'targeted spending', if they do not have the authorisation of the political party that they are promoting. This is spending intended to influence people to vote for one particular registered political party or any of its candidates. The limits are: £31,980 in England £3,540 in Scotland £2,400 in Wales £1,080 in Northern Ireland If the political party that is being promoted provides its authorisation, the non-party campaigner is entitled to spend up to the limit authorised by the political party. Any spending by that non-party campaigner up to that limit would count towards the party's national spending limit. Following the 2017 general election, registered non-party campaigners which spent less than £250,000 were required to submit their post poll returns detailing expenditure and donations no later than 8 September 2017. PPERA requires that the post poll return must include certain information, including: a statement of all payments made in respect of controlled expenditure incurred by or on behalf of the non-party campaigner during the relevant period in the relevant part or parts of the UK a statement of relevant donations received by the non-party campaigner in respect of the relevant election which complies with the reporting requirements the return must be accompanied by all invoices or receipts relating to payments in excess of £200 It is an offence in each instance for the responsible person to, without reasonable excuse, deliver a return which does not comply with these requirements. For a non-party campaigner, a relevant donation is one made to them for the purpose of meeting controlled expenditure incurred by or on behalf of that third party. When the return is delivered to us, it must be accompanied by declarations signed by the person responsible for expenditure and donations. The declaration for donations confirms that: all relevant donations recorded in the return are from permissible donors no other relevant donations have been accepted in respect of the relevant election during the regulated period The responsible person commits an offence if they fail to provide the declaration. Members association A members association is not a political party. It is an organisation made up wholly or mainly of members of a single registered political party. The responsible person for a members association is either the treasurer, if there is one, or the person who is notified to us as the responsible person. Members associations which accept donations in excess of £7,500 that are provided to support their political activities must report these within 30 days of acceptance. Failure to report such donations to us within the time required, without reasonable excuse, is an offence by the members association and by the responsible person. Our investigation We investigated whether Momentum had broken campaign finance laws after we received a non-compliant spending and donation report following the general election. While investigating, we found evidence that Momentum may have committed further offences, this time in its capacity as a members association in 2016 and 2017. We expanded the investigation accordingly. Background to the investigation On 8 September 2017, Momentum delivered its spending return for the 2017 general election. We identified a number of issues with the return. We corresponded with Momentum, during the course of which Momentum delivered two updated spending reports, on 10 November 2017 and 13 November 2017, and an updated donations report also on 13 November 2017. As a result, we reasonably suspected that the original return was wrong. We opened an investigation on 16 November 2017, examining: issues with Momentum's reporting of donations and spending missing invoices a missing declaration whether Momentum's spending may have exceeded the legal limits We obtained evidence suggesting that Momentum may have failed to report donations received as a members association, and expanded the scope of the investigation to review this as well. We also sought to obtain a full and correct record of its election spending. Further information Evidence During the investigation we obtained evidence from: Momentum Mr Miah the registered trade union, Transport Salaried Staffs Association (TSSA) Mr Afidi and Mr Chessum The evidence we looked at included: a third version of the spending report provided by Momentum on 22 January 2018 advice we provided to Momentum before the general election explanations from Momentum Momentum's financial records including: bank and PayPal statements payroll information credit card statements invoices transaction reports internal Momentum documents including: internal reports meeting minutes and agendas internal correspondence and guidance internal financial reporting documentation correspondence between Momentum and TSSA internal TSSA emails provided by TSSA Working with Momentum Momentum did not cooperate fully during the investigation. Momentum provided some but not all requested information and explanation, but also repeatedly queried the basis for our investigation and the information we requested. Some explanations were contradicted by later explanations and the evidence. Our need to make repeated requests for clarification, as well as a significant number of extensions requested and granted to Momentum to respond, significantly added to the length and complexity of the investigation. Mr Miah offered to provide a further version of the return and the outstanding information we had requested. We invited him, on the basis that information would be provided, and he agreed, to attend a voluntary interview to provide explanation. The interview was to take place in October 2018, but Mr Miah did not provide the information and further version of the return he had previously agreed to give us. We did not therefore proceed with the interview. We were satisfied at that time that we had given Momentum and Mr Miah sufficient opportunity to explain the regulated expenditure at the general election and to provide any explanation they wished us to consider. We decided to conclude the investigation in November 2018 as we did not consider it proportionate or in the public interest to pursue the investigation further, based on: the number of offences that we were satisfied were proven beyond reasonable doubt Mr Miah and Momentum's failure to provide the outstanding information and explanations the time and resource spent on the investigation to date Our determinations In November 2018, we were satisfied there was sufficient evidence to make initial determinations on the offences under investigation. We issued a statutory notice to Momentum under Schedule 19C of PPERA setting out our initial determinations and proposing penalties. The notice invited Momentum to make representations within the statutory 28 day period. On 17 January 2019, Momentum delivered its representations in respect of the proposed penalties. An outstanding donation report from 2016 and a partial post poll report detailing an outstanding donation were also provided at this time. We considered these carefully before making a final determination on offences and penalties. We issued our final determinations and penalties to Momentum on 4 March 2019. Offences committed as a non-party campaigner Mr Miah committed four offences in respect of the post poll reporting of expenditure and donations following the general election. Momentum and the relevant responsible persons committed offences for failing to report donations received by Momentum in its capacity as a members association during 2016 and 2017. Incomplete spending return Mr Miah gave us a general election spending return on behalf of Momentum that was incomplete, as it: failed to provide an accurate statement of payments made failed to provide all required invoices or receipts omitted donations failed to provide a required declaration to accompany the donations report We did not find an offence in respect of incurring expenditure in excess of country limits. Statement of payments made Statement of payments made The spending return did not comply with the requirement to provide an accurate statement of all payments incurred by or on behalf of Momentum in respect of controlled expenditure. The statement of payments submitted to us was incorrect because: UK-wide spending was attributed to Northern Ireland despite the Labour Party standing no candidates there a number of payments were missed from all versions of the return that Momentum submitted a number of reported items did not match the contemporaneous financial records of Momentum a large number of items, including salaries, were split between regulated and unregulated expenditure, using a different formula to split them in each version of the return we received. In all cases, a number of the formulae were incorrect and in direct contradiction to our advice and guidance The overall amendments made to the statement of payments in each version of the report were: 8 September 2017: Momentum listed spending of £40,186.92 in their statement of payments made. But the form stated the total was £32,316.57 as a large number of figures were given as negative amounts or miscalculated totals 10 November 2017: Momentum amended 29 lines of spending and declared £36,033.37 in their statement of payments made 10 November 2017: a further 13 lines of expenditure were amended bringing the amount declared on their statement of payments to £34,917.06 22 January 2018: Momentum submitted a further statement of payments which amended 43 lines of expenditure, in some cases reinstating previously removed amounts which declared a total of £32,591.14 These refer only to the statement of payments made and do not include notional expenditure which is reported elsewhere in the return but which does count towards the spending limits. Other inaccuracies in the statement of payments made Northern Ireland Each return Momentum provided to us had apportioned UK wide expenditure to Northern Ireland. The Labour Party did not stand candidates in Northern Ireland, and so no controlled expenditure can be attributed to it. This expenditure should have been apportioned across England, Scotland and Wales where the Labour Party did stand candidates. Items that didn't match the financial records The reported salaries of two press officers who worked on the Stoke and Copeland by-elections did not match any salaries paid during that period according to Momentum's internal records. Momentum failed to provide the names of those press officers so that we could reconcile the figures. Items not included in the return Our analysis of Momentum's financial records indicated that spending totalling at least £1,075.06 was missing from the return. The figure may in fact be higher, because we are not satisfied that salary costs included in this amount are correct. Spending split between regulated and non-regulated expenditure Momentum amended various formulae used to calculate reportable elements of larger payments, for example, in relation to a text messaging service. Momentum was unable to provide records from the time of the campaign period to explain the way it split salaries for staff between regulated spending (which forms a significant proportion of their reported expenditure) and non-regulated spending. In the case of the apportionment of staff time to campaigning emails sent to both members (not reportable) and non-members (reportable), Momentum used a formula contrary to the one we advised, which gave a significantly lower attribution to regulated spending than would have been the case had it followed our advice. There are other issues regarding the apportionment of spending, including staff salaries and smaller items, in which an incorrect apportionment formula was applied contrary to our guidance. Momentum was unable to provide any documentation from the time of the campaign which would have allowed us to correctly apportion the spending, due to a failure to keep and maintain records from that time.

Conclusions

We are satisfied that the report of regulated payments made for the 2017 general election submitted to us by Momentum was inaccurate in numerous ways. The failure to keep and maintain proper records of the split of expenditure between regulated and unregulated expenditure mean that we are still not satisfied that either we or Momentum have an accurate record of regulated expenditure by Momentum at the 2017 general election.

Omitted invoice

Mr Miah failed to comply with the requirement to provide all required invoices or receipts with Momentum's spending return. An invoice for a payment to Facebook of £492.41, incurred on 30 May 2017 and paid on 3 June 2017, was not included. Mr Miah said that the omission was due to human error and inadequate systems.

Omitted donations

Momentum was required to include a donations report as part of the post poll return. On 8 September 2017 Mr Miah stated that Momentum had received no donations in excess of £7,500 and had received £7,300 of donation in excess of £500 (but less than £7,500). The amount received was amended to £7,500 by Mr Miah on 13 November. However the donations report did not include a further five cash donations with a combined value of £12,620, and one non-cash donation of £10,338.46.

Omitted cash and non cash donations

Omitted cash donations

During the investigation, Momentum confirmed that the cash donations were not reported to us in the post poll report as required. All cash donations were reported in an amended post poll return on 17 July 2018.

Omitted non-cash donation

Momentum received a non-cash donation in the form of office space from the registered union the Transport Salaried Staff Association (TSSA) with a value of £10,338.46 on 27 April 2017. Mr Afidi, Momentum's secretary as a non-party campaigner at the time, appears to have attempted to report it to us on 16 May 2017 in a pre-poll report, but did not complete the submission. The pre-poll reporting period did not begin until 3 May 2017 and this donation was received on 27 April 2017, so it did not need to be reported during the pre-poll reporting period.

However, Momentum then failed to report this donation in the post poll report. Momentum told us that this donation was not made for the purposes of the general election. However, we saw evidence to the contrary, including internal Momentum documentation citing the donation as provided following the announcement of the general election. We also saw correspondence between Momentum and TSSA in which a senior representative of Momentum requested the use of the ground floor of Walkden House "for the duration of the general election campaign". Momentum reported this donation on 19 January 2019.

Declaration accompanying donations report (spending return)

When Mr Miah delivered the report of donations that formed part of Momentum's general election spending return he was required to sign a declaration that confirmed that the donations reported in the return were from permissible donors and that no other relevant donations had been accepted. He did not do this. On 13 November 2017 Mr Miah provided an amended report, this time using our correct form, with a signed declaration. Spending limits Spending limits The spending limits in each nation for Momentum at the 2017 general election (excluding Northern Ireland where there were no Labour candidates) were: £31,980 in England £3,540 in Scotland £2,400 in Wales £37,920 in total Momentum's original return disclosed spending that exceeded country limits. However, Momentum's subsequent amendments had the effect of reducing the reported spending but still reported an excess above the limit of expenditure in Wales. We have not found evidence that Mr Miah committed an offence of incurring controlled expenditure in excess of the limit set out in Schedule 10 PPERA where he knew or ought reasonably to have known that the spending would exceed that limit, which is an offence under section 94E(2) PPERA. We found some evidence indicating spending in excess of the limits. However, we were unable to make a finding of an offence as the information Momentum provided, and which we believe they hold, was not adequate to provide a reliable record of their controlled spending. Offences committed as a members association Momentum was, and is, a members association as defined by PPERA. Mr Michael Chessum volunteered to be treasurer of Momentum, and appointed as treasurer shortly after February 2016. He was thus its responsible person under electoral law. On 17 February 2017 Mohammed Afzadi became the responsible person. Sanction decision Sanction decision We took our findings and Momentum's representations on these offences into account, and issued a penalty of: £2,700 for the failure, without reasonable excuse, to report all donations in the spending return £250 for the failure, without reasonable excuse, to provide an invoice with the spending return £12,150 for the failure, without reasonable excuse, to provide a complete spending return £250 for the failure to provide the required declaration to accompany the post-poll donations report £900 for the failure, without reasonable excuse, to report a £10,000 donation from TSSA £450 for the failure, without reasonable excuse, to report a £8,000 donation from TSSA £10,000 cash donation from Transport Salaried Staffs Association £10,000 cash donation from Transport Salaried Staffs Association Momentum received and accepted a cash donation from the Transport Salaried Staffs Association (TSSA) on 21 July 2016. Mr Chessum and Momentum were therefore required to deliver a report of this donation to us by 21 August 2016. This donation from TSSA was reported to us on 17 January 2019, almost two and a half years after it was received and accepted, and following an investigation and the issuing of the notice of proposed sanctions to Momentum. Momentum stated that there was confusion amongst its staff as to whether this donation was reportable. The donation was accepted by Momentum, and Mr Chessum was, as a matter of fact, the responsible person at the time, even signing a report relating to another donation on 15 July 2016. Had the evidence supported the statement that half the donation was intended for a separate organisation, Momentum and Mr Chessum would still have been required to report the £5,000 as it would have aggregated with other amounts received from TSSA. Mr Chessum and Momentum both committed an offence in failing, without reasonable excuse, to deliver a report of that donation of £10,000 to us within 30 days of it being accepted. £8,000 cash donation from Transport Salaried Staffs Association £8,000 cash donation from Transport Salaried Staffs Association Mohammed Afzadi became the responsible person for Momentum, as a members association, on 17 February 2017. Momentum received a cash donation of £8,000, also from the TSSA, on 3 May 2017. On 16 May 2017, Mr Afzadi tried to report this donation under the pre-poll reporting requirements for the 2017 general election, using our online reporting system. But not all of the required information was provided, and he failed to complete the submission. In any event, the donation was not reportable under those requirements and needed to be reported as made to a members association. Mr Afidi and Momentum gave us conflicting accounts about this donation including that the organisation and Mr Afidi were unaware of receiving this donation. However, we are satisfied on the evidence that Mr Afidi was made aware of the donation prior to 16 May 2017. This was clear in a number of internal Momentum documents from the time, as well as his own unsuccessful attempt at reporting the donation in a pre-poll return. The donation was reported on 17 July 2018. Mr Afidi and Momentum both committed an offence in failing, without reasonable excuse, to deliver a report of that donation to us within 30 days of it being accepted. The Board noted with sadness that over the New Year our colleague Mark Nicholls, a Senior Advisor in the Regulatory Support Team, passed away following a short illness. Mark first joined the Commission in 2007 as Senior Political Parties Liaison Officer in the Scotland team. He was already well known to his colleagues through his work with the Scottish Executive on e-counting for the 2007 Scottish elections and developed good relationships with political parties across Scotland. Mark was an integral part of the Scotland team until the end of 2010, when he went off to work in electoral registration, showing his continued interest in and commitment to all things 'democracy'. The relationships Mark built across the electoral community, including but not limited to the Commission, over his career were strong, and for many he was a friend as well as a colleague. As well as being highly expert and professional, he was always warm and friendly and had a fantastic sense of humour. Everyone he worked with across the Commission have good memories and stories of their time working with him. Mark will be very much missed. The Board welcomed the Regional Teams who outlined their work, explaining that they were one of two parts of the Support and Improvement team, with their focus being on supporting and challenging 311 local authorities across the 9 regions of England. The Board noted that the Regional Managers were the first point of contact with a range of stakeholders including Returning Officers across England. Members of the team explained how they were proactive in their engagement and how they use the performance standards frameworks to inform and frame their interactions with local authorities. The Board thanked the team for their time and updates.

Declarations of interests The Board noted an updated declarations of interests from: Commissioner Alex Attwood: Declaration of financial interest: undertaking research on general policing issues which come before the Northern Ireland Policing Board (NIPB) and its committees in connection with the role of a member of the NIPB. Member of the Electoral Commission for Ireland ("An Coimisiún") The Board noted that Commissioners, the Executive Team and Independent Advisers declarations of interests were recently updated, and that these registers would be published on the external website shortly.

Minutes (EC 167/23) Resolved: That the Board agreed the minutes of the Board meeting 23 November 2022, subject to minor amendments. Matters arising: That the Board noted that the Director, Regulation would circulate information to the Independent Adviser to the Audit and Risk Committee, regarding the closed project to redevelop Political Finance Online. Commission Board action tracker (EC 168/23) The Board requested that the open actions include detail as to progress on each item. The Board noted that the note covering actions with progress, taken at the Belfast Board Away Day, was still to be circulated to commissioners and attendees for information. The Board requested that the 'Write Off' report be periodically circulated for information to commissioners. Resolved: That the Board noted the progress against actions. Chief Executive's update (EC 169/23) The Chief Executive reported that the team was undertaking engagement work with a range of Parliamentary Committees, including in relation to the Strategy and Policy Statement (SPS). Engagement has also been undertaken with non-party campaigners. The Director, Regulation reported to the Board that consultations arising from Elections Act provisions have proceeded well, with strong engagement from stakeholders. A consultation on statutory guidance for digital imprints closed before Christmas, and a consultation on a Code of Practice for third party campaigners closes on 20 January 2023. Reports will be drafted following the consultations. The Director, Regulation reported that both projects are on track for delivery to the Department of Levelling Up and Housing officials in the agreed timeframes. The Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance updated the Board on progress with the implementation of voter ID and the new accessibility provisions which come into effect from the May 2023 elections, and in preparations for the subsequent tranches of changes arising from the Elections Act 2022. On devolved electoral reform and the Welsh and Scottish Government consultations, the first has been responded to and work is being undertaken on developing a response to the second for a mid-March deadline. The Director of Communications, Policy and Research provided the Board an update on the voter ID campaign, which was launched the previous Monday, including on the advertising channels being used and the civil society partnership activity to reach key at risk demographic groups. The Board welcomed the quality of the materials published and the initial response to the campaign. The Board noted that the Commission was cautious in engaging with influencers due to risks around past and future political activity of the individual.

The Board noted that there were a range of online post forums used which provided opportunities to engage. The Board welcomed the extension to include Commissioners' engagement in the meetings of note section in the Chief Executive's update and requested that further detail be provided. The Board noted the continued concern regarding the SPS and that the Executive Team was in regular contact with officials in the relevant Government Department. The Board further noted that the Chair has stated the position of the Commission in writing. Resolved: That the Board agreed that Chris Ruane be the linked Commissioner for electoral registration. Resolved: That the Board noted the Chief Executive's report. Forward Plan of Board business

2022/23 and 2023/24 (EC 170/23) Resolved: That the Board noted the Forward Plan of Board business 2022/23 and 2023/24. Board effectiveness review 2022/23(EC 171/23) The Board noted responses from members of the Board to the questionnaire to internally assess the effectiveness of the Board. The responses indicated that there were strengths in oversight and strategic functions. It also identified opportunities to up skill in the areas of risk as well as opportunities for Commissioners to use their current skills to assist the work of the Commission. Members of the Board welcomed opportunities to discuss issues in a semi formal forum, such as the pre meeting Commissioners' dinner which could be developed. As part of the process to articulate the 'one team' theme, the Board explored opportunities for Commissioners to work more closely with staff. The Board noted that the effectiveness review was an internal Board exercise and that the views of the Executive Team and staff were not sought regarding the effectiveness of the Board on this occasion. The Board noted that there would be a full external review in the next financial year which would undertake a 360 degree analysis of the effectiveness of the Board. Resolved: That the Board noted the report and agreed to the proposed recommendations and actions arising from the Board effectiveness review 2022/23. Main Estimate 2023/24 budgets(EC172/23) The Director, Finance and Corporate Services introduced this item reporting to the Board that although the Board and the Executive Team agreed the Main Estimate 2023/24 in September 2022 to enable submission to the Senedd and Scottish Parliament, for audit purposes there was a requirement for the Board to formally agree the Main Estimate 2023/24 for submission to the Speaker's Committee. Resolved: That the Board formally agreed the Main Estimate 2023/24. Board skills matrix and succession planning (EC 173/23) The General Counsel introduced this item reporting to the Board that there had been a shift in the skills matrix demonstrating a greater knowledge and interest in a range of areas from the previous survey undertaken. However, the skills matrix survey also identified a knowledge and interest gap in the areas of audit and risk. The Board discussed whether the skills matrix had identified and measured the right skills. The Board noted that as the induction process was developed, Commissioners should obtain a more in depth understanding of the Commission. Resolved: That the Board noted the results of the skills matrix audit. Improvements to registration and voting: increasing resilience and participation (EC 174/23) The Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance and the Policy Manager reported to the Board on the work being undertaken to develop feasibility studies of advance voting, mobile voting, voting anywhere and voting hubs. The Board noted that the team were thinking creatively to identify potential options for modernising the voting experience. The Board discussed that there were certain groups who were underrepresented on the electoral register, such as young people and recent movers. The team reported that there were discussions being undertaken with agencies such as the Driver and Vehicle Licencing Agency, to refresh our understanding of how data sharing could work to support improvements to electoral registration. The Board further explored the potential benefits of automatic registration and noted that this was an area that the Welsh Government was already actively considering. The Board noted that in addition to the resilience of voting processes, the transparency of how these work, including in relation to the counting of votes, is another important consideration. Resolved: That the Board should be recirculated the 2019 paper on modernising the electoral process and provided with a copy of the Welsh Government White Paper on electoral reform. Resolved: That the Board noted the update on progress with the project. Embedding and advancing equality, diversity and inclusion in the Electoral Commission (EC 175/23) The General Counsel introduced the paper with the Independent Adviser to the Commission Board on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI). The Chair thanked the Independent Adviser to the Commission Board on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion for his work on the paper. The Board noted that the objective of the paper was to provide added value to the EDI discussions within the Commission. The Board agreed that the report was insightful and welcomed that it was recommendation focused.

Resolved: That the Board supported the recommendations in the report. Resolved: That the Board considered and agreed to appoint a group led by the Chief Executive and the Independent Adviser to the Commission Board on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion plus three other Commissioners to develop the recommendations and ensure delivery.

CW confirmed the PPP minutes for the past five years were now available on the Commission's website. SM asked about the status of the proposed PPP meeting with commissioner representatives in December. CW explained the Commission remained content to proceed with the proposed meeting in December, but that it remained the case that PPP members were expected to confirm that they would be able to send senior representatives, noting that only the Conservative Party Treasurer had confirmed. SG and NV agreed their party treasurers would attend. CW agreed to work on the basis that all parties would be represented at chair and/or treasurers level, alongside PPP members, and that the Commission would put together a proposed agenda for the meeting and circulate for approval. NV asked if the Liberal Democrats Campaigns Director could attend the PPP meetings as it had been possible to do so in the past. CW agreed to pick up the request outside the meeting so it could be considered. AS suggested it would be helpful if an Association of s representative attended the PPP meetings once a year. Other attendees agreed that the June meeting, after May local elections, would be most suitable. CW agreed to explore this proposal. Consultation on the Commission's Enforcement policy LE explained the Commission planned to consult on a new Enforcement Policy, including introducing a new section on decisions to prosecute.

She stated the Commission is confident this could deter offences from being committed, such as by parties that persistently ignore the regulatory regime, or campaigners who do not intend to be part of the regulatory regime for long and do not have a long term incentive to comply. LE explained that in the few cases where such parties and campaigners break the law, they disrupt the level playing field for voters and for other parties and campaigners. GD asked if the new Enforcement policy would apply at referendums; LE confirmed that it would. LE offered PPP members the opportunity to meet once the consultation opens. SM asked if the consultation on prosecutions covered England, Wales and Northern Ireland only; LE confirmed the Commission did not have the power to prosecute in Scotland but the consultation was open to all to respond. AW asked if the parties could raise other issues within the consultation; LE confirmed the Commission is happy to receive wider comments as part of parties' feedback. Accuracy and Completeness 2018: report CW explained the Commission's next accuracy and completeness study will be published in the coming month. He explained the meanings of both accuracy, 'there are no false entries on the electoral registers'. And completeness, 'every person who is entitled to have an entry on an electoral register is registered'. Commission Update Report CW highlighted the publication of feasibility studies, conducted to explore options to modernise electoral registration in the UK, noting the interest in the studies from parties and campaigning groups. AS asked if GDPR issues had been considered; CW confirmed this had come up. AW asked if the voter registration site could include an upfront statement that outlined to voters that parties had access to their data; CW stated this might be possible but would need to be explored with the Cabinet Office. AS suggested a common data format be established, between registers. Regarding policy development grants, CW explained the Commission is currently reviewing the scheme to make recommendations to the Secretary of State ahead of the 2020-21 allocation in March. He outlined the two current issues which needed to be addressed: the eligibility of the Independent Group for Change, and the impact of the UK's exit from the EU. AS asked if members had to be elected in the party name to qualify for the grants; LE confirmed this was not the case, noting the example of UKIP eligibility as a result of a defection prior to the 2015 general election. SM suggested the formula should be reviewed more fully if the Independent Group for Change would qualify for the same money as the other major parties. He also recommended that the legislation be changed so as not to have to include the names of eligible parties; CW confirmed this had been proposed to the Cabinet Office but not taken forward at the current time. AW asked for an update on the PFR Online project. LE outlined the project team is currently in major development phase and the project is well advanced on the registration side. AW reiterated the PPP's preference for this to be launched at the start of their financial (i.e. calendar) year and asked if 2020 was going to be viable. LE offered to send a more granular timetable to PPP. AS asked if technical issues are going to be accounted for when considering imposing penalties. LE confirmed if it was a technical issue that was be a reasonable excuse, the Commission would not penalise. CW raised the background paper and asked if the PPP were content with new format of not including updates in the paper on substantive agenda items. SM highlighted he would prefer to have agenda items included in the paper as this is helpful when paperwork is shared with the SNP's Chief Executive. AS asked if publication dates could be added into the paper. LE agreed to include indicative dates, noting that dates can be subject to change. Any other business GD asked about the status of the Commission's guidance for parties and campaigners at a UK parliamentary general election. LE confirmed that, should an election be called, the Commission's guidance be published quickly. SM asked if the Commission is thinking of adding anything new; LE confirmed that nothing substantive would be added. She noted that the Commission would reopen its phone lines advice service for parties, candidates and campaigners. GD highlighted he already had contact from many candidates and agents. AS, AW and GD asked to be notified when any new guidance is published. LE agreed and suggested parties send over any questions they had in the interim. AS suggested it would be helpful for a summary page to be inserted at the front of the Commission's guidance that includes key dates, formulas for calculating spend and deadlines for reporting, noting that he would send a sample of an internally prepared document. LE agreed to explore the possibility of this. LE explained the Commission will shortly begin its review of the registered descriptions on the registers of political parties in Great Britain. She explained affected parties would receive a letter. Parties are given 10 working days to submit representations before a final decision is taken. AW raised the PPP felt a gap due to the officials no longer attending the electoral integrity roundtables. He highlighted it was a useful forum for SPOC engagement. SM noted in the past the PPP received a case update before meetings. LE and CW offered to take this away and report back.

Commission action Status To circulate proposed agenda for 3 December meeting, with party chairs/and or treasurers, alongside commissioner representatives. Ongoing: proposed new meeting date to be identified To invite a representative from the Association of s to attend the PPP meeting once a year, preferably the June meeting. Ongoing: Update to be provided at meeting Provide a timetable on PFR online project.

Completed: Email with timetable received from Majella La Praik. Provide an update on the modern guidance project Completed: Circulated with minutes To include publication dates in the background paper. Completed: included in February meeting's background paper To notify the PPP when any new guidance is published, should an election be called. Completed To consider the Commission's role in PPP engagement with police SPOCs on electoral integrity Ongoing: update to be provided at meeting

Add: Annex D was agreed at paragraph 5.15. Otherwise the minutes were agreed as a true record of proceedings and approved. ID Pilot Evaluation Findings (presentation) CW introduced the presentation, setting out the history of the Commission's previous work in this area and recommendations to the UK Government. Given the Commission's statutory role in evaluating the pilots, the Commission had not been involved in the pilots or engaged in public debate about them. The evaluation included discussions with the Cabinet Office, interested MPs and organisations such as Mencap and RNIB. Ongoing engagement had helped to provide reassurance about our independence and also our ability to effectively evaluate the pilots. PT presented the findings of the evaluation of the ID pilots, highlighting the impact on voters, polling administration, security and confidence in the poll. The headline results showed that a small percentage of voters' desire or capacity to vote was impacted. There was no evidence of an impact on specific groups such as younger voters or those with disabilities. It was difficult to gather evidence relating to these groups as there were only small sample sizes. The impact of the pilot on administration of the polls had not been significant. Where specialist IT was used it had worked well but was resource intensive to set up. A short discussion followed on cost. The team said the report would include some information on proportional cost increases as a result of the pilot. No conclusions on the impact of the pilot on the actual security of the poll could be drawn. There was an impact on the confidence expressed by voters, but this was complicated, inconsistent across the pilots and seemed to depend, at least in part, on local conditions. TH presented the conclusions and next steps. The pilots were well run but did not provide enough evidence to conclusively test the impact of voter ID schemes. Some issues included the unrepresentative nature of the localities chosen and the fact that local election turnout was usually lower than some other polls. In terms of next steps, it was expected that more pilots would be undertaken, over a wider range of locations. Future evaluations would have resource implications for the Commission. A general discussion followed. Commissioners felt that the Commission should make recommendations about the need to stage pilots in areas with a greater demographic range, though without prescribing specific localities. It was noted that the Government had a manifesto commitment to roll out voter ID by 2022. Audit Committee Annual Report SB presented the report, explaining that it had been a challenging year due to ill health of the chair, but the Committee had remained effective. The Commission had had substantial assurance from its internal auditors. The tabled papers updated the position on audit of the final accounts, following the 26 June Committee meeting. The NAO were proposing an unqualified opinion on the Commission's accounts. CB noted that the internal auditors were positive about the Commission's internal control environment, describing it as one of the best they had seen for bodies of our size. BP sought clarification on paragraph 3.3 – the increase in cost for internal audit – which was explained as being due to additional work. KR noted that the whistleblower policy elaborated in paragraph 5.14 had been updated. This was due to the particular circumstances facing the Audit Committee with the absence of the chair. He also noted that it would be updated in due course to reflect the new escalation route following the recruitment of a new independent advisor. AC asked for clarification on the priority recommendations in paragraph 3.5. It was explained that these were recommendations which were in progress and not necessarily outstanding. More detail on these recommendations was considered by the Audit Committee and could be made available to the Board. JEH commended the work of the Committee and noted that interviews for the independent advisor would take place on 10 July. He had written to the out-going Independent advisor to thank him for his work, and would convey the thanks of the Board overall as well. The report was noted. Remuneration and HR Committee annual report RV introduced the paper, drawing attention to the fact that the departure of the Head of HR in the middle of the year had been disruptive. Notwithstanding this, the team had succeeded in staying focused on the basics of the HR function, while putting more strategic issues to one side as a temporary measure. A successor was now due in post shortly, allowing renewed focus on these strategic issues later this year. There was a short discussion on the staff survey and the progress made to effect cultural change. Given the intense scrutiny the Commission was currently facing and the pressures of work, this was important. Many changes had been embedded culturally at the level of the Heads, and work was underway to take this to other staff. A further discussion followed around the mechanisms by which these changes were being produced in practice. KR outlined the developments around training and continual support to staff to have performance management discussions. CB also explained the mechanisms for staff to take personal responsibility. She identified project based work, personal objectives and the values work being undertaken, as the practical tools being used by the Commission. RV commended the HR team, noting particularly that the basics were well advanced, and thanked CB and the Executive Team for their commitment. The report was noted. Annual review of complaints PW introduced the paper, noting that there had been an increase in the number of complaints on the previous year, and the forecast was for this to continue. Complaints were obviously affected by electoral events and press attention. The workload around complaints was unpredictable but manageable. Resources were available but mitigating action to reduce the number of complaints handled was also taking place. Also noted was the close relationship between FOI/Subject Access requests, enquiries and complaints. ECS enquired about the escalation of very serious complaints. It was noted that this would be the role of the independent adviser to the audit committee upon appointment, if deemed necessary. It was also noted that patterns in reports ought to be looked into, for instance where complainants cited vagueness of guidance. This report was an opportunity to be aware of such factors. The board noted the contents of the report by the former independent Chair of the audit committee into complaints against certain Commissioners, and the Annual Review of Complaints. Adoption of 2017-18 resource accounts and annual report KR introduced the report. It had been discussed at Audit Committee, where it was noted that the NAO's report had identified some technical issues to be addressed but nothing to stop the Board from adopting the accounts. KR noted that the aim was for the Accounting Officer to sign the accounts the following day. KR explained that the main outstanding point had been the audit reports from some parties for policy development grants, which had now been received. Some EU referendum costs were also outstanding but these had not been materially misstated. There were minor process issues on journaling and accruals at year end, but these would be resolved going forward, with clear training for relevant staff. Estimating the Commission's dilapidations provision had been an area of focus for the audit. After discussion the NAO had accepted that uncertainty over the correct estimate would be addressed at the point of the Supplementary Estimate during the current year. This would also be relevant to the upcoming end of lease terms for Bunhill Row. It was noted that the report had been subject to minor textual amendments by the Audit Committee. JEH identified unclear wording around the underspend on page 26 of the report, which would be amended to clarify the figures. BP noted that the point on financial fraud identified on page 62 should indicate that the funds had been recovered. The report and accounts were approved. Draft Business Plan 2018/19 and review of Performance Measures KR introduced the paper noting that it had been an unusual year as the Commission had released a 5 year corporate plan and a 1 year business plan. The Executive Team were working on integrating the business plan with the project plans. In the quarterly reporting, the metrics would line up against the business plan goals. CB elaborated that the Corporate Plan was designed to lead to longer term milestones, and the Business Plan represented an effort to identify what was measurable in the work of the Commission. Commissioners generally appreciated the measures produced, and understood the difficulty of using quantitative measures to report on areas of work where quality was more important.. Work in this area would continue. JRH left the meeting at 12.07pm. RV noted that the people strategy point on page 18 should be written with the internal audience of the Commission in mind, and that he would support a separate workforce focused goal in future years. AM noted that ongoing work on the EU Referendum could be seen to be taking a long time, and invited RP to consider whether more resources would make a difference in future situations. It was also noted that the 6 month delay in campaigners providing spending reports could be seen as unnecessarily long in the digital age. SB left the meeting at 12.16 pm. Chief Executive's Update for May 2018 CB introduced the paper, highlighting the corporate plan, ongoing litigation, the work around communications, the use of plain , for example in the report on digital campaigning, and the work of the devolved offices. AI explained that the report on the annual canvass pilots from 2017 was due to be published the following day. The evaluation had found that none of the models that were tested were implementable as they had been run. Data led canvassing had the most potential as a strategy going forward and the team would be working with Cabinet Office on next steps in this area. RP noted that our work on the 2017 UKPGE financial returns showed that some of the major parties had not fully complied with the rules, for example on authorising all spending, but, given the unexpected nature of the election and the short time between announcement and polls, we were mindful of taking a proportionate regulatory approach. A number of other investigations were progressing or at advanced stages. There was a short discussion on the previous delegation of authority from Board to Chief Executive on referrals to police. RP clarified that referrals happen when we had reasonable suspicion of criminal offences, but there could be variations in the process and handling of such referrals. RV asked for clarification on the ID5 project and CB explained the project had been overtaken by work with the National Cyber Security Centre. JEH asked for an update at a future Board on the progress on the new Commission website. Forward Plan of Board business 2018-19 The plan was noted. Action tracker for May The tracker was noted. Chair's and Chief Executive's meetings, and meetings in devolved legislatures The report was noted.

Research Kieran Rix, Director, Finance and Corporate Services, Acting Accounting

Officer Louise Edwards, Director, Regulation David Bailey, Head of Strategic Planning

and Performance Petra Crees, Planning, Performance and Governance Manager, acting as Board Secretary Welcome The Chair welcomed everyone and thanked them for coming. It was noted that the Chief Executive was on leave. Whilst unable to attend, he had been fully briefed. Presentation and discussion – 2019 UKPGE Preparedness and funding The Chair began the meeting by setting out the governance procedures under which the meeting had been called. He clarified that it had been called under the urgency procedure, meaning the Commissioners were being consulted by the acting Accounting

Officer on the action to be taken, and this would then be reported at the September

Commission Board. At that time the Board would be asked to endorse formally any decisions taken, and consider whether further action was required. The Chair advised that the Commission was faced with the possibility of an early United Kingdom

Parliamentary General Election (UKPGE) and it was necessary to ensure that the Commission was prepared and had the funding to fulfil its obligations in the event of an UKPGE being announced. The Commissioners heard from each of the members of the Executive Team, who provided details on the readiness of their teams and the contingency arrangements that were already in place ahead of any announcement. Normal contingency planning for a UKPGE meant that plans had already been reviewed and updated regularly and had ensured that we were confident, though not complacent, in our preparedness. Guidance had already been prepared for electoral administrators, political parties and campaigners and was either available now, or ready to be finalised and published as soon as the date of any poll was confirmed. In response to a question, the Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance advised that while there would undoubtedly be challenges, there were no specific concerns about the ability of local authorities to deliver a UKPGE in October. She added that it was intended to make use of the Electoral Coordination and Advisory Board (ECAB) and the network of Regional Returning Officers, even though they had no formal role in a UKPGE. The Director of Regulation confirmed that our state of readiness on the regulatory side was also good. She noted that should a UKPGE be called with only six weeks' notice or less, there would be no time to register new political parties.

Commissioners were assured by the Director of Regulation routine monitoring of campaign activity continued, and we continued to proactively work with parties to promote compliance. We continued to engage with the Cabinet Office and security agencies as appropriate. A Commissioner asked whether the Commission had provided a response to the public consultation on a draft Code of Practice on the use of personal data in political campaigning, recently published by the Information

Commissioners Office (ICO). The Director of Communications, Policy and Research

advised that we were planning to respond. Action: The Director of Communications, Policy and Research to circulate to Commissioners after the meeting a link to the ICO's consultation on a draft Code of Practice. The Director for Communications, Policy and Research advised that the approach to the voter registration campaign would be similar to that used for the recent EPE, which had been proven to be successful. Television advertising would be supplemented by digital advertising targeting the known under-registered groups. The maximum budget for the campaign itself would be just over £1.4 million, comparable to the spending in 2017, though the actual amount would depend upon the campaign period. As usual there would be a lot of work with partners, including working through government agencies. Plans to integrate our Your Vote Matters website with the new corporate website would continue but contingency plans were in place should there be any unforeseen issues. Assurances were given by the Executive Team that additional staffing resources required had been identified, including staff to handle additional demand from public enquiries, complaints and Freedom of Information (FOI) requests, as well as from parties and campaigners. The Director for Finance and Corporate Services advised the Commissioners that, following discussions with the Clerk to the Speaker's Committee, there would be insufficient parliamentary time to access the additional funding required to deliver a UKPGE in October through a Supplementary Estimate. The alternative was to use the Contingency Fund process run by the HM Treasury. This would be initiated once a UKPGE was inevitable and a statement had been provided to the House of Commons. There would then need to be a Supplementary Estimate through the Speaker's Committee in due course. The Commissioners were advised that the budget requirement to deliver a UKPGE was approximately £2.4 - £2.5m in 2019/20, which was broadly comparable to the budget required for the previous poll in 2017. Provision for legal costs had not been included but it was confirmed that there was a small contingency in the 2019/20 budget and costs were more likely to be incurred in the 2020/21 financial year. There would also be a need for a new Corporate Plan after any election, and there would need to be a discussion about how ambitious we should be with the development of the plan if there were little time to prepare it. A Commissioner asked that the public awareness and external communications budget figure be broken down to reflect the campaign spend and the separate spend on additional communications activity. Another Commissioner requested greater assurance that our own registration campaign spend offered good value for public money. The Director of Communications, Policy and Research provided reassurances for the current proposed campaign but noted that it would be possible to look at this in greater detail for future electoral events. Action: A deep dive session on the public value of campaign spend to be scheduled for a future Commission Board. Elan Closs Stephens left the meeting at 3.00pm. It was agreed that, following this consultation with Commissioners, the acting Accounting Officer, the Director for Finance and Corporate Services, would initiate the Contingency Funding process should a UKPGE be announced prior to the September Commission Board meeting. If this action were taken it would be formally reported at that Commission Board meeting. Action: Report to the next Commission Board the note of this meeting of Electoral Commissioners. The meeting finished at 3.10pm.

CW confirmed the PPP minutes for the past five years were now available on the Commission's website. SM asked about the status of the proposed PPP meeting with commissioner representatives in December. CW explained the Commission remained content to proceed with the proposed meeting in December, but that it remained the case that PPP members were expected to confirm that they would be able to send senior representatives, noting that only the Conservative Party Treasurer had confirmed. SG and NV agreed their party treasurers would attend. CW agreed to work on the basis that all parties would be represented at chair and/or treasurers level, alongside PPP members, and that the Commission would put together a proposed agenda for the meeting and circulate for approval. NV asked if the Liberal Democrats Campaigns Director could attend the PPP meetings as it had been possible to do so in the past. CW agreed to pick up the request outside the meeting so it could be considered. AS suggested it would be helpful if an Association of s representative attended the PPP meetings once a year. Other attendees agreed that the June meeting, after May local elections, would be most suitable. CW agreed to explore this proposal. Consultation on the Commission's Enforcement policy LE explained the Commission planned to consult on a new Enforcement Policy, including introducing a new section on decisions to prosecute.

She stated the Commission is confident this could deter offences from being committed, such as by parties that persistently ignore the regulatory regime, or campaigners who do not intend to be part of the regulatory regime for long and do not have a long term incentive to comply. LE explained that in the few cases where such parties and campaigners break the law, they disrupt the level playing field for voters and for other parties and campaigners. GD asked if the new Enforcement policy would apply at referendums; LE confirmed that it would. LE offered PPP members the opportunity to meet once the consultation opens. SM asked if the consultation on prosecutions covered England, Wales and Northern Ireland only; LE confirmed the Commission did not have the power to prosecute in Scotland but the consultation was open to all to respond. AW asked if the parties could raise other issues within the consultation; LE confirmed the Commission is happy to receive wider comments as part of parties' feedback. Accuracy and Completeness 2018: report CW explained the Commission's next accuracy and completeness study will be published in the coming month. He explained the meanings of both accuracy, 'there are no false entries on the electoral registers'. And completeness, 'every person who is entitled to have an entry on an electoral register is registered'. Commission Update Report CW highlighted the publication of feasibility studies, conducted to explore options to modernise electoral registration in the UK, noting the interest in the studies from parties and campaigning groups. AS asked if GDPR issues had been considered; CW confirmed this had come up. AW asked if the voter registration site could include an upfront statement that outlined to voters that parties had access to their data; CW stated this might be possible but would need to be explored with the Cabinet Office. AS suggested a common data format be established, between registers. Regarding policy development grants, CW explained the Commission is currently reviewing the scheme to make recommendations to the Secretary of State ahead of the 2020-21 allocation in March. He outlined the two current issues which needed to be addressed: the eligibility of the Independent Group for Change, and the impact of the UK's exit from the EU. AS asked if members had to be elected in the party name to qualify for the grants; LE confirmed this was not the case, noting the example of UKIP eligibility as a result of a defection prior to the 2015 general election. SM suggested the formula should be reviewed more fully if the Independent Group for Change would qualify for the same money as the other major parties. He also recommended that the legislation be changed so as not to have to include the names of eligible parties; CW confirmed this had been proposed to the Cabinet Office but not taken forward at the current time. AW asked for an update on the PFR Online project. LE outlined the project team is currently in major development phase and the project is well advanced on the registration side. AW reiterated the PPP's preference for this to be launched at the start of their financial (i.e. calendar) year and asked if 2020 was going to be viable. LE offered to send a more granular timetable to PPP. AS asked if technical issues are going to be accounted for when considering imposing penalties. LE confirmed if it was a technical issue that was be a reasonable excuse, the Commission would not penalise. CW raised the background paper and asked if the PPP were content with new format of not including updates in the paper on substantive agenda items. SM highlighted he would prefer to have agenda items included in the paper as this is helpful when paperwork is shared with the SNP's Chief Executive. AS asked if publication dates could be added into the paper. LE agreed to include indicative dates, noting that dates can be subject to change. Any other business GD asked about the status of the Commission's guidance for parties and campaigners at a UK parliamentary general election. LE confirmed that, should an election be called, the Commission's guidance be published quickly. SM asked if the Commission is thinking of adding anything new; LE confirmed that nothing substantive would be added. She noted that the Commission would reopen its phone lines advice service for parties, candidates and campaigners. GD highlighted he already had contact from many candidates and agents. AS, AW and GD asked to be notified when any new guidance is published. LE agreed and suggested parties send over any questions they had in the interim. AS suggested it would be helpful for a summary page to be inserted at the front of the Commission's guidance that includes key dates, formulas for calculating spend and deadlines for reporting, noting that he would send a sample of an internally prepared document. LE agreed to explore the possibility of this. LE explained the Commission will shortly begin its review of the registered descriptions on the registers of political parties in Great Britain. She explained affected parties would receive a letter. Parties are given 10 working days to submit representations before a final decision is taken. AW raised the PPP felt a gap due to the officials no longer attending the electoral integrity roundtables. He highlighted it was a useful forum for SPOC engagement. SM noted in the past the PPP received a case update before meetings. LE and CW offered to take this away and report back.

Commission action Status To circulate proposed agenda for 3 December meeting, with party chairs/and or treasurers, alongside commissioner representatives. Ongoing: proposed new meeting date to be identified To invite a representative from the Association of s to attend the PPP meeting once a year, preferably the June meeting. Ongoing: Update to be provided at meeting Provide a timetable on PFR online project.

Completed: Email with timetable received from Majella La Praik. Provide an update on the modern guidance project Completed: Circulated with minutes To include publication dates in the background paper. Completed: included in February meeting's background paper To notify the PPP when any new guidance is published, should an election be called. Completed To consider the Commission's role in PPP engagement with police SPOCs on electoral integrity Ongoing: update to be provided at meeting

Report: Political finance regulation at the June 2017 UK general election | Electoral Commission Search Report: Political finance regulation at the June 2017 UK general election You are in the UK general elections section Home UK general elections On this page Regulating the election Looking ahead: Regulation at future elections Download our full report Download the candidate spending data First published: 19 June 2019 Last updated: 6 April 2020 What the report includes This report identifies specific issues that emerged during the June 2017 UK Parliamentary general election campaign and highlights the proactive work we undertook to ensure that candidates, political parties and non-party campaigners were informed of, and complied with, the rules. Regulating the election Having an early and unexpected election presented practical challenges for parties and other campaigners, but we were able to work constructively with many of them. For the most part, we are pleased to observe that parties and other campaigners intended to, and did, comply with election spending and funding rules. We will monitor the pending returns that are due in later this year to check that this was indeed the case.

Digital campaigning Candidates, political parties and non-party campaigners made significant use of digital campaigning in this election. This provides new opportunities for campaigners to engage voters. But there are also risks to transparency and confidence for voters, for example, relating to the use of enhanced direct targeting techniques, including 'bots', and there is room to improve election law in this area. Looking ahead: Regulation at future elections We are ready to work with the UK's governments and legislatures to bring about the changes that are needed to provide further transparency about spending on digital and online campaigns. We repeat our previous recommendations that campaigners should be required to provide imprints on digital and online campaign material, and that staffing costs for all types of campaigners should be regulated. These changes would increase transparency for voters about who is seeking to influence their vote during election campaigns, and what techniques are being used. We also repeat our calls for having more robust powers in place to deal with breaches of the rules and that our investigative and sanctioning powers at major elections should be extended to include offences relating to candidate spending and donations. Most campaigners follow the rules, but failures to comply can reduce transparency for voters and confidence that an election was well run. It is therefore important that when breaches do occur they are dealt with robustly and effectively. The time has come for these changes to be implemented by the UK's governments and legislatures, ahead of the next national elections in 2021 and 2022. of 6 - Show page contents On this page About this Code What is a non-party campaigner? What is non-party campaigning? What type of spending is controlled expenditure? What are the donation controls? Annexes About this Code Background This Code of Practice has been issued by the Secretary of State under section 100B of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 ('PPERA'). The draft Code was prepared by the Electoral Commission (the 'Commission') in accordance with sections 100A and 100B PPERA following consultation with interested persons and bodies including the Speaker's Committee and the Levelling Up, Housing and Communities Committee. The report on the consultation process can be found on the Commission's website. A draft was approved by the Secretary of State and laid before the UK Parliament in accordance with section 100B PPERA. The Commission must have regard to this Code when exercising its functions under Part 6 PPERA and may revise it from time to time in accordance with section 100A(3) PPERA. Elections covered by this Code
This Code applies to UK Parliamentary general elections (UKPGE) and Northern Ireland Assembly elections 1 . It does not apply to elections to the Senedd or Scottish Parliament unless the regulated period (the period when the spending laws apply) for either of those elections overlaps with the regulated period for a UKPGE (a 'combined regulated period'). Purpose of this Code This Code explains the operation of the expenditure controls in Part 6 PPERA for third parties during the regulated period for a UKPGE or Northern Ireland Assembly election or a combined regulated period. The Commission and this Code calls third parties 'non party campaigners'. In particular, this Code sets out: what a non-party campaigner is what non-party campaigning is the kinds of expenses which are qualifying expenses the circumstances in which expenses are or are not to be regarded as incurred for the purpose of promoting or procuring electoral success the kinds of expenditure which will be dealt with as notional controlled expenditure or donations the circumstances which will be regarded as joint campaigning the operation of the rules on targeted controlled expenditure the recording and reporting requirements (including for combined regulated periods). This Code and other guidance published by the Commission This Code is statutory guidance.
This Code is different from other types of guidance that the Commission publishes because it has been approved by Parliament. The Commission also publishes non-statutory guidance about expenses incurred by non-party campaigners and publishes up to date guidance about what elections are being held and which laws apply on its website. Where this Code or any related guidance says that something must be done, this means that it is a requirement in either primary or secondary legislation.
Offences and defence Section 100A(5) PPERA provides a defence for a non-party campaigner charged with an offence under Part 6 PPERA. It is a defence for a nonparty campaigner to show that they complied with this Code in determining whether their campaign activity was regulated 2 . What are the consequences of breaching this Code? Breaches of the laws explained in this Code may lead to an offence being committed by the non-party campaigner, the responsible person or the individual spending the money. Committing an offence may result in a fine or prosecution. What is a non-party campaigner? Some individuals and organisations that are not registered political parties campaign for or against political parties or candidates or on issues around elections, without standing candidates themselves. In electoral law, these individuals and organisations are defined as third parties. The Commission calls them non-party campaigners. There are laws that non-party campaigners must follow on campaign spending, donations, and reporting. Many individuals and organisations campaign in the run up to elections and meet the definition of a non-party campaigner but are not covered by the regulatory regime. Who is covered by the law The laws on spending and donations apply to non-party campaigners who spend more than £700 on regulated campaign activity. Non-party campaigners intending to spend more than £10,000 on regulated campaign activity must submit a notification to the Commission following which they will appear on the register of notifications 3 . Only certain types of entities can submit a notification to the Commission. Registered non-party campaigners and the responsible person Once a non-party campaigner appears on the register of notifications, they are referred to as 'registered non-party campaigners'. When a non-party campaigner registers with the Commission, they must appoint a 'responsible person'. The responsible person is legally responsible for compliance with the laws in PPERA 4 . If an individual registers as a non-party campaigner, they are automatically the responsible person. Non-UK individuals and organisations Individuals and organisations that are not based in the UK or are not on a UK electoral register are not permitted to spend more than £700 on regulated campaign activity 5 . A non-party campaigner can only spend more than £700 on regulated campaign activity if they are: listed in section 88(2) PPERA as eligible to give a notification to the Commission or an unincorporated association with the requisite UK connection 6 . An unincorporated association has 'the requisite UK connection' if it consists of two or more persons, all of whom are registered overseas electors 7 . What is non-party campaigning? The non-party campaigning laws only apply to regulated campaign activity. Not all non-party campaign activities are regulated. Activities that may be regulated The following activities are regulated if they occur in relation to a general campaign during a regulated period and meet the purpose test: press conferences or other media events organised by the non-party campaigner transport in connection with publicising the campaign The following activities will only be regulated if they occur during the regulated period, meet the purpose test and are also made available to the public: production or publication of campaign material canvassing and market research public rallies and events 8 There are three elements that must all be considered when determining whether an activity is regulated campaign activity: the regulated period the purpose test whether the activity is made available to the public Regulated period Spending by non-party campaigners is regulated in the period before a UKPGE and Northern Ireland Assembly elections. This is defined in PPERA as the 'relevant period' but is commonly known as the 'regulated period'. UK Parliamentary general elections The regulated period for non-party campaigners at a UKPGE is the 365 day period leading up to and including polling day 9 . An election to the UK Parliament may be called at any time during the maximum five-year Parliamentary term. Where the period of time between the announcement of an election and polling day is shorter than the length of the regulated period, the regulated period will still run for 365 days. The regulated period will be applied retrospectively and will cover a period before the election was announced. Where a second UKPGE is held within 365 days of the previous election, the second regulated period will start on the day after the first polling day and will run up to and including the second polling day 10 . Northern Ireland Assembly elections The regulated period for non-party campaigners at a Northern Ireland Assembly general election is the four months immediately before polling day. In the event of an extraordinary election, the regulated period starts on the day on which the extraordinary poll is announced 11 . Senedd and Scottish Parliamentary elections The regulated period for a Senedd or Scottish Parliamentary election may be relevant if it overlaps with the regulated period for a UKPGE. Where the two regulated periods overlap, a combined regulated period applies to the relevant part of the UK. This Code applies to combined regulated periods. Spending by non-party campaigners in the relevant part of the UK is regulated for the whole of the combined regulated period.

Purpose test Spending on campaign activities by non-party campaigners is only regulated if it can reasonably be regarded as intended to promote or procure the electoral success of: one or more political parties political parties or candidates who support or do not support particular policies or another particular category of candidates 12 by influencing voters at an upcoming election to vote in a particular way. This is commonly known as the ‘purpose test’. The purpose test must be applied at the time, or in the event of a retrospective regulated period as if at the time, the activity takes place. There are a number of factors that will help to determine whether an activity can be reasonably regarded as intended to influence voters to vote in a particular way at an upcoming election: A campaign that involves a call to action to voters to vote in a particular way at an upcoming election is likely to be regarded as promoting electoral success for a particular party or category of candidates and so meet the purpose test. The call to action may be explicit, or implicit. A campaign that explicitly promotes particular parties or candidates, or implicitly promotes certain political parties or candidates over others, is likely to meet the purpose test. A campaign that is positive or negative towards a political party or parties, a category of candidates or a policy closely and publicly associated with a party or category of candidate is likely to be regarded as intending to influence voters to vote in a particular way and so meet the purpose test. A campaign that is intended to change political parties’ or candidates’ views on a policy or issue may meet the purpose test if the policy or issue is so closely or publicly linked to a party, parties or category of candidates, that it is reasonable to regard the campaign as intending to influence voters to vote in a particular way. An activity can achieve other aims as well as being intended to influence how people vote. However, when determining whether an activity meets the purpose test, it is immaterial whether that activity can be reasonably regarded as intended to achieve another purpose or purposes as well 13 . Retrospective regulated period Where a regulated period is applied retrospectively, any pre-announcement activity will only be regulated if, at the time it was carried out, it could reasonably be regarded as intending to influence voters to vote in a particular way at a relevant election 14 . The following are relevant elections: UK parliamentary elections elections to the Scottish Parliament elections to the Senedd elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly elections of police and crime commissioners local government elections local elections in Northern Ireland If there are no upcoming elections, an ongoing campaign on a particular issue is unlikely to be reasonably regarded as intending to influence voters to vote in a particular way. See section on campaign activity before an election is announced. Public activities and material not publicly available ‘Public’ has no statutory definition and should be given its normal meaning. Activities or material that are made available for anyone to hear or see will be regulated campaign activity. Where access to those activities or material is restricted by the non-party campaigner to members or known supporters, this will not be regulated. Public activities that are regulated The following activities will only be regulated if they take place during the regulated period and meet the purpose test: canvassing and market research of the public public rallies and events Campaign material that is regulated Campaign material that meets the purpose test and take place during a regulated period will only be regarded as regulated campaign activity if the material is made available to the public, or a section of the public 15 . This is sometimes referred to as the public test. Whether the material is made publicly available is determined by who has access to that material. Campaign material that is not regulated Where access to campaign material is limited in such a way that the general public would not be able to access that material, this is not regulated campaign activity. This applies regardless of the means by which the material is distributed . Where access to campaign material is restricted by the non-party campaigner, those activities will not be regulated. For example, where access is restricted to members, or supporters, this will not be regulated. Campaign material that is made available exclusively to individuals who have chosen to receive information from the non-party campaigner, will not be regulated. What are the notification and reporting requirements? Notification threshold Non-party campaigners intending to spend more than £10,000 on regulated campaign activity in the period before a UKPGE or a Northern Ireland Assembly election must notify the Commission 16 . Eligible non-party campaigners Only individuals or organisations described in s.88(2) PPERA are eligible to submit a notification to the Commission. Organisations are prohibited from registering as both a non-party campaigner and a political party 17 . Non-party campaigners are not permitted to spend more than £700 on regulated campaign activity unless they are: eligible to give a notification to the Commission by virtue of s.88(2) PPERA, or an unincorporated association with the requisite UK connection 18 . A non-party campaigner that is permitted to spend more than £700 on regulated campaign activity may spend up to £10,000 across the UK without notifying the Commission 19 . Before spending more than £10,000 on regulated campaign activity across the UK, a non-party campaigner must submit a notification to the Commission 20 . Reporting thresholds Registered non-party campaigners who spend more than: £20,000 in England, or £10,000 in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland must record and report their spending and donations 21 . These are known as the reporting thresholds. They are defined as the 'lower tier spending limits' in PPERA. At the time of notification, non-party campaigners may choose to notify the Commission that they do not intend to spend more than the reporting thresholds 22 . Registered non-party campaigners who include such a notification are not required to report their spending or donations as long as their spending does not exceed the reporting thresholds. They are still subject to the law on permissibility of donations. Once a non-party campaigner is registered, they may change their notification in relation to the reporting thresholds if their spending intentions change following registration. It is an offence to incur controlled expenditure in excess of the reporting thresholds if the non-party campaigner has notified the Commission that they would not spend more than those limits 23 . Maximum spending limit for non-party campaigners There are spending limits that restrict the total amount a non-party campaigner can spend on regulated campaign activity during a regulated period. These spending limits vary depending on the particular election and are set out in Schedule 10 PPERA. Reporting requirements All registered non-party campaigners must comply with the laws on spending and accepting donations. Only registered non-party campaigners who meet the reporting threshold must report their spending and donations. Spending up to £250,000 Registered non-party campaigners who meet the reporting threshold and who spend up to £250,000 must submit a spending return that details their spending on regulated campaign activity and any donations received during the regulated period 24 . The spending return must be submitted to the Commission within three months of the end of the relevant regulated period. More than £250,000 Registered non-party campaigners who spend more than £250,000 on regulated campaign activity must submit a spending return that details their spending on regulated campaign activity and any donations received during the regulated period. In addition, the spending return must be accompanied by an auditors' report 25 . The spending return accompanied by an auditors' report must be submitted to the Commission within six months of the end of the relevant regulated period. Reporting donations Registered non-party campaigners who are required to submit a spending return must include any donations received during the regulated period 26 . See section on donations. UK parliamentary general elections Where a UK parliamentary term enters its fourth year, registered non-party campaigners who meet the reporting threshold, must submit quarterly donation reports to the Commission 27 . The quarterly report must include details of all reportable donations. If a non-party campaigner has not received any reportable donations during the relevant reporting period, no quarterly report is required 28 . In the period between the dissolution of Parliament for a general election and polling day, registered non-party campaigners must also submit weekly donation reports to the Commission 29 . The weekly donation report must include details of any relevant donations received with a value of more than £7,500 (a 'substantial donation') 30 . If a registered non-party campaigner does not receive any substantial donations during the relevant reporting period, no weekly report is required 31 . Weekly reports are not required by registered non-party campaigners who do not meet the reporting threshold. Statement of accounts A registered non-party campaigner who meets the reporting threshold at a UKPGE, must prepare a statement of accounts for the regulated period unless: the non-party campaigner is an individual the non-party campaigner has prepared a statement of accounts for another legal purpose that covers the regulated period 32 What type of spending is controlled expenditure? Controlled expenditure is any spending incurred in respect of regulated campaign activity.

Schedule 8A PPERA sets out the list of qualifying expenses that fall within the regulatory regime. General guidance Campaign activity before an election is announced A long running campaign on a particular issue that was carried out before an election was announced is unlikely to be reasonably regarded as intending to influence voters to vote in a particular way at an upcoming election if there is no regulated period. If a long running campaign continues unchanged once the election is announced, it is unlikely to be considered regulated campaign activity. If activity around a long running campaign increases or is altered in the run up to an election in a way that could be reasonably regarded as intending to influence voters to vote in a particular way, it may be considered regulated campaign activity. From the point the campaign is considered regulated campaign activity, the costs associated with that campaign are likely to be controlled expenditure and must be treated as such. A campaign may still be considered regulated campaign activity where it is intended to achieve another purpose other than influencing voters if the campaign can be reasonably regarded as intending to influence voters to vote in a particular way at an upcoming election.

Re-using items paid for and used at a previous election Non-party campaigners may re-use items from previous elections. Spending on items that were paid for and used at a previous election and were reported in full in a previous spending return do not need to be reported again in the spending return for the same non-party campaigner at the current election if they are used again without alteration. All new costs relating to their re-use, including storage, cleaning, or the cost of altering the items must appear in the spending return. Apportionment of items for subsequent elections Items that have been paid for and used during a regulated period cannot be apportioned or reported solely on the basis that they will be used again during a subsequent regulated period. The full value of the spending must be reported in the spending return. Unused items Items that have been paid for by a non-party campaigner, but have not been used during the regulated period, do not need to be reported in the spending return. Items paid for prior to the commencement of the regulated period Where spending was incurred prior to the start of a regulated period on items that are used during the regulated period, the spending on those items must be reported in the spending return. Items provided free of charge or at a discount Where any items are provided free of charge or at a discount, the appropriate amount must be reported in the spending return as notional spending and/or a donation. Apportioning spending Where spending on an item or activity was incurred partly in connection with regulated campaign activity and partly in connection with non-regulated activity, the amount that must be reported is the proportion that reasonably reflects the amount spent in connection with the regulated campaign activity. Only the regulated campaign spending must be reported in the spending return. VAT Spending must be reported inclusive of VAT where applicable, even where VAT can be recovered. Overheads Overheads that are directly attributable to campaign activity must be reported. The amount that must be included in the spending return is the proportion that reasonably reflects usage during the campaign. The proportion that reasonably reflects usage is generally the cost that is incurred over and above the usual costs in a given period. Where an apportionment of overheads is necessary, an aggregated figure for each overhead is sufficient to meet the reporting obligations. Overheads include items such as: office space electricity bills the provision of phone lines and internet access mobile phones the provision of office equipment of any kind The cost of water, gas and council tax are not costs that fall to be reported as they are not sufficiently closely connected to the regulated activity. Staff costs Staff costs that are directly attributable to regulated activity must be reported. Where staff costs can only be partially attributed to regulated activity, the costs must be apportioned and only the portion attributed to regulated activity must be included in the spending return. Where an apportionment of a staff member's time is necessary, an aggregated figure for all staff time attributed to regulated activity is sufficient to meet the reporting obligations. The childcare costs of staff members are not expenses that fall to be reported as they are not sufficiently closely connected to the regulated activity 33 . Excluded items Any spending on campaign activity that falls to be reported in the spending return of a candidate or in the spending return of a registered political party, must not be reported in the spending return of a non-party campaigner. Schedule 8A Schedule 8A PPERA lists the qualifying expenses that fall within the regulatory regime. Expenses that fall outside the regulatory regime PPERA specifically excludes the following expenses from the reporting requirements: expenses incurred in respect of the publication of any matter relating to an election, other than an advertisement: in a newspaper or periodical as a broadcast made by the British Broadcasting Corporation or by Sianel Pedwar Cymru or as a programme included in any service licensed under Part 1 or 3 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 or Part 1 or 2 of the Broadcasting Act 1996 expenses incurred in respect of, or in consequence of, the translation of anything from into Welsh or from Welsh into reasonable personal expenses incurred by an individual in travelling or in providing for the individual's accommodation or other personal needs reasonable expenses that are reasonably attributable to an individual's disability expenses incurred in respect of the provision of an individual's own services provided voluntarily in the individual's own time and free of charge 34 Expenses that fall within the regulatory regime PPERA specifically lists the following expenses as falling within the regulatory regime: the production or publication of material which is made available to the public at large or any section of the public (in whatever form and by whatever means) canvassing, or market research seeking views or information from, members of the public press conferences, or other media events, organised by or on behalf of the non-party campaigner transport (by any means) of persons to any place or places with a view to obtaining publicity expenses in respect of the transport of such persons include the costs of hiring a particular means of transport public rallies or other public events, other than: annual conferences of the non-party campaigner any public procession or protest meeting, within the meaning of the Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998, in respect of which notice is given in accordance with section 6 or 7 of that Act (advance notice of public processions or related protest meetings) Expenses in respect of such events include costs incurred in connection with the attendance of persons at such events, the hire of premises for the purposes of such events or the provision of goods, services or facilities at them. But expenses in respect of such events do not include costs incurred in providing for the protection of persons or property. Annex A sets out a non-exhaustive list of the kinds of expenses that do, or do not, fall within the meaning of qualifying expenses. What is targeted expenditure? Regulated campaign spending by all registered non-party campaigners during the regulated period for a UKPGE that is aimed at promoting the electoral success of one particular registered political party or any of its candidates is called targeted spending 35 . Campaign activity that names a political party or its candidates in a way that can be regarded as intended to influence voters to vote for only that political party will count as targeted spending. A campaign on a particular issue that is so closely and publicly linked to one particular political party that it is synonymous with that party is likely to be considered targeted spending. A negative campaign aimed at influencing voters not to vote for a particular political party or any of its candidates is not targeted spending.

Targeted spending will count towards the overall spending limit for a non-party campaigner and is subject to the general laws on regulated campaign activity. Donations to registered political parties Donations to a registered political party do not fall within the definition of targeted spending. Spending limits All registered non-party campaigners are limited in how much targeted spending they can incur. The limits depend on whether or not the relevant political party has authorised the spending. Unauthorised spending Non-party campaigners can incur targeted spending up to the targeted spending limits without authorisation from the relevant political party. The targeted spending limits are set out in s.94D PPERA.

All targeted spending counts towards the total spending limit for a non-party campaigner. Any spending in excess of the targeted spending limits must be authorised by the relevant registered political party. Authorised spending A registered political party may authorise a non-party campaigner to incur targeted spending. A non-party campaigner must not exceed the amount authorised. Authorisation by a registered political party: must be in writing must be signed by either the treasurer or the deputy treasurer of the party must specify the parts of the UK in which the targeted spending may be incurred may set a limit on the amount of targeted spending authorised 36 The registered political party must give a copy of the written authorisation to the Commission. The authorisation has no effect until a copy has been given to the Commission 37 . All targeted spending counts towards the total spending limit for a non-party campaigner. Any targeted spending in excess of the targeted spending limit up to the amount authorised by the relevant political party will also count towards the registered political party's campaign expenditure 38 . Withdrawal of authorisation Authorisation may be withdrawn by the registered political party at any time. The withdrawal must be in writing and signed by the treasurer or deputy treasurer of the party.³⁹ The withdrawal of authorisation has no effect until the registered political party has given a copy to the Commission.⁴⁰

Effect of withdrawal of authorisation A non-party campaigner must not incur any additional targeted spending above the targeted spending limit if the relevant political party withdraws its authorisation. When authorisation is withdrawn, no retrospective offence will have been committed by the non-party campaigner in relation to targeted spending incurred in accordance with the authorisation that was in effect at the time.

What is notional expenditure? Non-party campaigners may sometimes use property, services or facilities in their campaign that they did not have to spend money on, because the item or the services were provided as a benefit in kind, for free, or at a non-commercial discount. This is called 'notional spending'. Discounts Non-commercial discounts Non-commercial discounts are special discounts given to the non-party campaigner. This includes any special rates which are not available on the open market. When this happens, the full commercial value of the item or the services will count towards the spending limit and must be reported in the spending return.

Commercial discounts Commercial discounts are those available to other similar customers, such as discounts for bulk orders or seasonal reductions. These are not treated as notional spending.

Notional spending Items or services used by or on behalf of a non-party campaigner will be treated as notional spending if:

- they are transferred or provided free of charge or at a discount of more than 10% for the use or benefit of the non-party campaigner
- the difference in value between the commercial rate and what is paid by the non-party campaigner is over £200
- they are made use of by or on behalf of the non-party campaigner and if the expenses had been incurred by or on behalf of the non-party campaigner in respect of that use, they would have been controlled expenditure.⁴¹

The items or services are only used on behalf of the non-party campaigner if that use is directed, authorised or encouraged by the non-party campaigner or the responsible person.⁴² The value of the notional spending is the difference between the total value of what was transferred or provided and the amount that was paid, if anything. The non-party campaigner must record both: the value of the notional spending and the total amount that was paid.

Items or services will not be treated as notional spending if:

- received at a discount of 10% or less
- or the value of the discount is £200 or less

Value of notional spending Where an item is treated as notional spending, an 'appropriate amount' must be reported by the non-party campaigner as controlled expenditure. The appropriate amount is the proportion that is reasonably attributable to the use of the item, of either:

- its market value (where it is transferred free of charge)
- or the value of the discount

The value of the notional spending is the difference in value between the commercial rate for an item or service and the price that was actually paid by the non-party campaigner.

Donations The goods, services or facilities must be provided or transferred to the non-party campaigner to be treated as notional spending. This means that any notional spending will also be a donation to the non-party campaigner. The difference in value between the commercial rate and the price paid, if any, must be dealt with in accordance with the laws on donations to non-party campaigners and may need to be reported to the Commission.

Working with registered political parties Non-party campaigners may also work with a registered political party, and provide goods, services or facilities free of charge or at a non-commercial discount. If the registered political party use the goods, services or facilities during their campaign, this should be treated as notional spending on behalf of the political party. It must be reported by the registered political party and will count towards the party's spending limit. It will not count towards the non-party campaigner's spending limit and must not be recorded in the spending return for the non-party campaigner. What is joint campaigning? Working with other non-party campaigners Non-party campaigners may decide to work together on a campaign. The rules on joint campaigning apply to registered and un-registered non-party campaigners. A non-party campaigner takes part in joint campaigning where they: enter into a plan or other arrangement with one or more other non-party campaigners all non-party campaigners involved intend to incur controlled expenditure in pursuance of that plan or arrangement one or more of the non-party campaigners involved incurs controlled expenditure in pursuance of the plan or arrangement and that plan or arrangement can reasonably be regarded as intending to achieve a common purpose. All of the spending on the joint campaign counts towards the spending limit of each of the non-party campaigners involved in the joint campaign. What is joint campaigning There must be more than one non-party campaigner Forming a new organisation that constitutes a group of other organisations and then spending money is not joint campaigning. An existing umbrella organisation that makes decisions about their campaign activity independently will not be joint campaigning unless they enter into a plan or arrangement with another non-party campaigner in which they both intend to incur controlled expenditure. There must be an agreed understanding that controlled expenditure will be incurred to achieve the common purpose If there is no intention to incur expenditure there is no joint campaigning. For example, if it is agreed that all activity will be carried out by volunteers no spending will be incurred and there will be no joint campaigning. There must be an agreed understanding as to the scope and purpose of the campaign Non-party campaigners who happen to campaign about similar or related issues are not joint campaigners. There must be an agreed understanding between the non-party campaigners that each of them will incur controlled expenditure to achieve the common purpose All controlled expenditure incurred in pursuance of the plan or arrangement will fall within the joint campaigning rules. Joint campaigning is not simply transferring or lending items to another campaigner or providing money to another campaigner This must be treated as notional spending or a donation and dealt with in accordance with the appropriate rules. Even if one of the non-party campaigners involved in the plan or arrangement does not incur their share of agreed expenditure, any expenditure incurred will still be joint campaigning and must be reported by all non-party campaigners involved.

Examples of joint campaigning A and campaigner B agree to run a campaign encouraging voters to vote for candidates who support a particular issue. Both campaigner A and campaigner B intend to incur controlled expenditure as part of the campaign. A and campaigner B both incur expenditure on the joint campaign. This is joint campaigning, and the spending should be treated as such. A and campaigner B agree to run a campaign encouraging voters to vote for a particular political party. Both intend to incur controlled expenditure as part of the joint campaign. A incurs expenditure on the joint campaign, but campaigner B never spends their intended share. This is joint campaigning, and the spending should be treated as such by both campaigner A and campaigner B. A and campaigner B agree to run a campaign encouraging voters to vote for a particular political party. Both intend to incur controlled expenditure as part of the joint campaign. Neither campaigner ends up incurring any controlled expenditure on the joint campaign. No joint campaigning has taken place. Activities that are joint campaigning Non-party campaigners who engage in the following, non-exhaustive list of activities are likely to be joint campaigners: A joint advertising campaign, whether digital, electronic or via other means, involving joint leaflets or joint events. A co-ordinated campaign; for example where it is agreed which areas are to be covered, which issues raised or which voters targeted. Joint working where one party can veto or must approve another party's material. Activities that are not joint campaigning Non-party campaigners who engage in the following, non-exhaustive list of activities are unlikely to be joint campaigners: Endorsing another campaign by allowing your logo/brand to be used without any financial commitment or further involvement. Adding your signature to a letter alongside other non-party campaigners without any financial commitment. Speaking freely at an event organised by another non-party campaigner without any financial commitment. Holding discussions about areas of common interest without coordinating campaign activity. What are the donation controls? All registered non-party campaigners must comply with the donation controls in Schedule 11 PPERA that set out who can donate to non-party campaigners. Registered non-party campaigners that do not meet the reporting threshold must check whether the donation is from a permissible source, but they are not subject to the donation reporting requirements. Donations covered by the laws The laws on donations only apply to donations that are given to registered non-party campaigners, specifically towards their spending on regulated campaign activity. The laws do not cover money that is received for the organisation's general purposes. For the purposes of donations to non-party campaigners, a donation is: money, goods, property or services 43 given for the purpose of regulated campaign activity 44 and with a value of more than £500 45 Anything with a value of £500 or less is not a donation for the purposes PPERA. Who can donate to a non-party campaigner Non-party campaigners can only accept donations from individuals or organisations that are based in the UK 46 . The list of permissible sources is set out in s.54(2) PPERA. Non-party campaigners must not accept donations from a registered political party 47 . Non-monetary donations Non-party campaigners must put a value on any non-monetary donation. The value of a donation is the difference between the value of what is received, and the amount, if any, that the non-party campaigner pays for it 48 . Items that are received for free or at a non-commercial discount, where the difference in the commercial value and what was actually paid for it is more than £500, is a donation for the purposes of PPERA. When a non-party campaigner receives a donation of more than £500, they must promptly check whether the donation is from a permissible source. Non-party campaigners have 30 days in which to decide whether they can accept the donation 49 . A donation that cannot be identified as being from a permissible source must be returned within the 30 day period. Non-party campaigners must keep records of the donations that are received, as well as donations that have been returned. These details must be included when the donation is reported to the Commission. Annex A This Annex sets out a non-exhaustive list of the kinds of expenses that do, or do not, fall within the meaning of 'qualifying expenses' in Schedule 8A PPERA (that may be regarded as 'controlled expenditure' within the meaning of section 85(2)). Expenses fall within the meaning of qualifying expenses if they are expenses incurred in respect of any of the matters set out in paragraph 1 of Schedule 8A. Schedule 8A, paragraph 1(1) The production or publication of material which is made available to the public at large or any section of the public (in whatever form and by whatever means). This paragraph includes: Services, equipment, facilities or premises provided by others This includes the cost of use, or hire, of any: agency, individual or organisation services provided by any agency, individual or organisation premises or facilities equipment that is used to: prepare, produce or publish material which is made available to the public at large or any section of the public For example, the hire of a photographer and premises to produce images for use in advertising material. Specific costs in connection with producing or disseminating digital or electronic advertising material This includes the cost of any software, of any kind, for use on any device to: design and produce advertising material in-house disseminate or facilitate dissemination of advertising material whether that material is distributed digitally, electronically or via other means. For example, a licencing fee for a software application for use on a device. It also includes any cost attributable to increasing the visibility of content by any means. For example, the purchase of a more prominent position on a page within a search engine. It includes the cost of preparing, producing or facilitating the production of advertising material for: download and use by others posting on and promoting material via any kind of social media channel or platform For example, the costs of producing advertising material promoting the campaign that is posted to a page on a social media channel encouraging followers to share it. It includes the cost of accessing, purchasing, developing and maintaining any digital or other network which: facilitates distribution or dissemination of material by any means promotes or increases the visibility of material by any means For example, the purchase of digital identities to make material appear as if it has been seen and approved by a high number of users on a social media platform. Conservative Party: Andrew Stedman (AS) Megan Tucker (MT) Labour: John Stolliday (JS)

Jordan Hall (JH) Liberal Democrats: David Allworthy (DA) Darren Briddock (DB)

Scottish National Party: Scott Martin (SM) Electoral Commission: Craig Westwood, Director of Communications & Research (CW) Ailsa Irvine, Director of Electoral Administration and Guidance (AI) Bob Posner, Director of Political Finance and Regulation & Legal Counsel (BP) Carol Sweetenham, Head of Guidance and Strategy, (CS)

Alasdair Morgan, Electoral Commissioner (AM) Cary Mitchell, Communications Officer (CM) Minutes of the last meeting and actions arising (ECPPP 04/07/2017) DA suggested as Information Commissioner's Office (ICO) was unable to attend as per action agreed at last meeting, the Panel would set up a separate meeting with the ICO as soon as possible. BP agreed a representative of the Electoral Commission should attend and thanked the Panel for their invite. AS asked that the minutes be amended to show the action on post-election regulation assurance meetings with parties is incomplete or ongoing. Meetings had been arranged but later cancelled and as a result the parties had not received the expected guidance. DA said the content of the questions they received covered unexpected areas which meant involving members of staff from other teams in the party. BP apologised for any confusion or inconvenience caused and said that as a new process the format is still being worked out and the Commission appreciates any feedback. DB pointed out there is no longer enough time to meet with the Commission. BP confirmed the original intent agreed at previous meetings for the process remains the same but the approach has evolved. The minutes from 21/02/2017 were agreed subject to amendments. Delivering modern guidance project DA asked for an update on the delivering modern guidance project. AI explained that decisions would be taken early in the New Year about moving to web-based digital guidance. AI thanked members of the Panel for taking part in one-to-one discussions and providing feedback to the project team. JS thanked AI and CS for holding productive discussions on the process, and DA agreed. All sides were keen to continue constructive engagement. PFR

Online update CS reported that the Commission had received six good quality bids in the procurement process through the Government's digital market place to update the PFR Online system. The Commission would shortlist later that week before moving to the second stage of procurement. CS offered to send the Panel copies of draft headline requirements for the second stage of the procurement process, and would be keen to receive any feedback the Panel may have. The Commission was planning to have a supplier in place by the end of March 2018. AS said he would be happy to look at the draft and he was pleased with the Commission's approach so far. DB agreed the conversations had with the project team have been useful. CS said she was grateful for the input to the initial requirements gathering. DB asked whether sprints would be weekly or on some other basis. CS said the suppliers would set out their proposed process; her preferred approach was for fortnightly sprints. AS and DB agreed. Both sides agreed on the need for constructive engagement with the project through the user group. Standing for office in 2017 report CW introduced findings of the report, highlighting that some of the recommendations around the demographics of candidates and the need to make sure elections are open to all would affect parties. CW asked whether any issues raised surprised the Panel and whether they had anything they wished to take forward. BP said recommendations in the report are challenging to take forward but that it is important to find a way to improve on these issues. DA raised the intimidation of candidates and noted that prior to the June 2017 general election the focus was on the potential for physical attacks after the murder of Jo Cox, while the focus now seems to be on social media harassment. DB agreed that candidates were more likely to be harassed than face physical violence. JS suggested the next SPOC conference could cover intimidation. DA agreed, saying usual focus at the conferences is on electoral offences rather than civil offenses that occur in relation to elections but not usually counted as 'electoral'. DB said it was particularly useful that the report recommended allowing all candidates to keep home addresses private as current requirement at some elections to make addresses public deters people from standing. BP reminded the Panel that some of the recommendations would require legislation. Election integrity preparation for elections in 2018 AI reminded the Panel that May 2018 will see local elections across parts of England, including a series of pilots looking at voter ID and postal voting. Ahead of these elections, the Commission is looking at electoral fraud as part of its risk assessment work, taking into account available data and information which may indicate a higher risk of fraud – for example, the closeness of the contest and past allegations of fraud. AI said this work will help identify areas where closer liaison with Returning Officers (ROs) is needed. AI also indicated that the Commission is keen to be able to escalate local issues to the national parties where needed as has been the case at recent elections, and proposed discussing any electoral fraud concerns or issues in more detail in the New Year with the Panel, either collectively or individually. DB said guidance for ROs on running postal vote counts should be updated. He said in many areas postal vote agents from the parties are kept so far away from the counting and scanning of ballot packs that they cannot do their job of confirming that the process is being conducted correctly. AI suggested a reminder could be sent to ROs through the Commission's Electoral Administration Bulletin about the role party agents have in the process. DB suggested that agents being kept away from the process increases a perception that fraud is or could be occurring, while pointing out that the perception of fraud is worse than the actual number incidents of fraud. AI requested that parties contact the Commission at the point any issues arise so that follow up with local authorities can be carried out in a timely way. DB asked for a list of the areas involved in pilots in May so local campaigners can be informed and local campaign material can also include information for voters on what to expect. AI responded that Gosport, Bromley, Woking and Watford have been announced as taking part in voter ID pilots and Tower Hamlets is expected to host a postal voting pilot but Cabinet Office is best placed to provide further information Recent investigation announcements DA asked for an update on recent investigations and whether the outcomes could result in recommendations for changes in the rules. BP reminded the Panel that it was inappropriate for the Commission to comment on ongoing investigations. He noted the work being undertaken will influence the Commission's thinking going forward and if a decision is made that rules should be changed as a result the Panel's views would be important. JS raised social media campaigning and its important role as a communication and campaigning tool. BP responded that campaigning is an important part of our democracy and should continue on social media. He said the Commission will work with the Panel on this issue as thinking evolves and that it is important to remember the ICO's role in digital campaigning regulation. AS asked whether the Commission expects to conclude its investigations by the middle of 2018. BP said the time taken to conclude investigations cannot be predicted but the Commission will gain experience through ongoing regulatory work and may have recommendations based on that experience next year. SM asked about working together rules for referendums and whether there were plans to clarify or reform them. BP suggested it may be that Parliament needs to clarify the rules in legislation. SM asked whether the Commission would be responding to the UCL Commission on Referendums. BP explained that the Commission is in contact with them and would be providing them with reference information. Commission update report DA asked about the Plymouth election report and AS asked whether the Commission has done work to assess the resourcing of ROs and EROs. AI said there is clearly a challenge in this area, with experienced people leaving elections along with a general pressure on local authority resources, and the Commission is starting a piece of work with SOLACE and the AEA looking at how to address this risk. DA raised the elections for everyone report. AI said the Commission is particularly proud of the work in this area, drawing on the actual experiences of voters with disabilities. Before the June election there was a lot of interest in accessibility of elections and it was right that the report looked at it in detail. DA raised the PFR report and agreed it is an anomaly the Commission has powers to regulate party finance but not candidates' which is for the police. Any other business The Panel agreed the next meeting would be held on 20 February 2018, chaired by the Conservatives. Subsequent meetings in 2018 will be on Tuesday 5 June 2018 (SNP chair); Tuesday 4 September 2018 (Labour chair); Tuesday 4 December 2018 (Lib Dems chair). SM asked for a list of future publication dates for PFR reporting. Actions Action Owner Status Circulate draft 2nd stage procurement requirements document. Vincent. The Board welcomed the Human Resources Team who provided an outline of their work. The Board noted the level of support provided by the Human Resources Team to Commission staff. The Board thanked the Human Resources Team for their time and update. Declarations of Interests The Board noted the following updated entries of declarations of interests since the February 2023 Board meeting: Chief Executive:

Shaun McNally: Association of Chief Executives: Board Member Commissioner: Katy Radford: Police Service Northern Ireland: External Reference Group member Commissioner: Katy Radford: British Council: Member of the Board of Trustees Minutes
(EC 183/23) Resolved: That the Board agreed the minutes of the Board meeting of 17 February 2023. Commission Board action tracker (EC 184/23) Resolved: That the Board noted the progress against actions requested by the Board. Chief Executive's update (EC 185/23) The Chief Executive, with other members of the Executive Team, reported to the Board regarding the work of the Commission. The Director, Communications, Policy and Research provided an update on communications activity ahead of the May 2023 polls, in particular on progress with the public awareness campaign on voter ID.
The Board noted that the campaign is progressing well, with data indicating awareness levels of 63% at the end of February 2023, up from 22% in December 2022. The Board noted that following a proposal from the UK Government Minister, the Speaker's Committee had increased the Commission's financial estimate for FY2023/24 to allow for additional spending on voter ID awareness-raising. The Board noted the report from the Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance as to preparations for the May polls, which included confirmation that hard copies of the updated Polling

Station Handbook had been issued as planned, concluding the proactive guidance activity of the Commission. There was currently significant engagement underway with local authorities, largely at this stage reactive in response to queries. The Board also noted that there had been a huge increase in public enquiries coming into the Commission. The Board noted that the Regulatory Support Team and the Northern Ireland Office were hosting webinars and advice surgeries for candidates and agents. Areas to be covered included guidance around intimidation of candidates. The Board noted the arrangements for Commission representatives observing the May polls and the proposed approach for post-poll reporting. Commissioners were invited to express interest in being paired with Commission staff to observe the polls. Resolved: That the Board noted the Chief Executive's update on operations and matters arising. Commission Strategic Direction (EC 186//23) The Board noted the positive discussion about the scale of the Commission's ambition at the February 2023 Board event in Chorley. The Chief Executive presented his paper and slides, explaining the impact of implementing the Elections Act 2022 on the capacity of the organisation. Given that impact, the Board noted that the priority must be for the Commission to ensure that statutory obligations are undertaken, particularly in supporting the delivery of elections. The Board further noted that a commitment had been made for the resource envelope on core activities for the Commission be no higher in real terms at the end of the current Corporate Plan cycle than it was at the beginning. The Board noted that the recommended method for it to undertake a forward look at corporate planning was through the lens of thematic reviews by strategic objective. The Board further noted that the resulting Corporate Plan, which would follow a UK Parliamentary general election, would need to take account of the outcome of that election, given the Commission's role in implementing any reforms. Resolved : That the Board noted the report and agreed to hold thematic reviews to co-create and develop the strategic objectives, including underpinning factors such as EDI, as well as looking at strategic risks over the next 12-18 months. Resolved : That the Board agreed to hold a one day event in July 2023 to continue to develop Commission Strategic Direction. Commissioners should be invited to co-create the agenda and content for thematic reviews. Priority policy recommendations (EC 187/23) The Director, Communications, Policy and Research and Head of Policy introduced the report outlining recent progress towards achieving priority policy recommendations and setting out a recommended approach for the next 18 months. The Head of Policy reported that in reviewing the proposed priority policy recommendations, the team had taken into account the potential impact changes would have on voters, administrators, and parties and campaigners; the potential to achieve progress; and the mechanism for delivering change. The Board agreed the proposed prioritisation, including noting that highlighted in the report were areas of recommendations that were not proposed to be included as priorities for proactive communication. Members noted the ongoing importance of reform in the area of digital campaigning, and that it would be important to add updated recommendations as these are refreshed during the next period. Resolved: That the Board noted and agreed the update on the priority policy recommendations. Annual review of governance (EC188/23) The General Counsel introduced the item, reporting to the Board that the amendments to the documentation were illustrated through tracked changes. The Board noted that further guidance had been provided regarding conflicts of interests which reflected discussions with Commissioners. Members of the Board requested some changes to clauses 14, 15 and 16 of the Annex to Appendix 8 Electoral Commission decision-making - Managing legal and reputational risks. The Board agreed amendments to the Terms of Reference, including the name change to the Audit and Risk Assurance Committee (ARAC). The Board agreed not to expand committee numbers, and Commissioners were to be encouraged to attend meetings to observe. Clarification was provided in the Terms of Reference that the Independent Adviser, in attendance at ARAC, would not assume the role of Chair in their absence. The Board agreed that the membership terms for ARAC should be amended to allow for the Chair to sit for longer than six years in total. The Board agreed with the recommendation from the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee meeting the day before for an uplift of the day and half day fee rate for the Independent Advisers, in line with the uplift for Commissioners' fees. Resolved: That the Board agreed that the Audit and Risk Committee (ARC) be renamed to Audit and Risk Assurance Committee (ARAC). Resolved: That the Board agreed amendments to enable an extension to the length of office of ARAC Chair and that in the absence of the Chair the Independent Adviser to the Committee would not assume the Chair for meetings of the ARAC. Resolved: That the Board agreed the amendments to the Corporate Governance Framework to reflect the legal duties of Commissioners as set out in PPERA subject to amendments to the ARAC terms of reference on membership terms and to the conflicts of interest guidance in the Commissioner Code of Conduct. The Board agreed for the redraft to be signed off by the Chair prior to publication. Resolved: That the Board agreed an uplift in the Independent Adviser fees in line with commissioners. We have included summary financial information within the performance report. This is consistent with the financial statements, where more detail is available. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPEREA) established the Electoral Commission. We are independent of government and political parties and directly accountable to the UK, Scottish and Welsh Parliaments. We have prepared our 2021/22 Annual Report and Accounts in accordance with an accounts direction, set out on page 139, issued by HM Treasury under paragraph 17(2) of Schedule 1 PPERA. We have prepared the powers and sanctions report on page 54 in accordance with paragraph 15 Schedule 19(b) and paragraph 27 Schedule 19(c) PPERA. Preface and forward Preface This year's elections marked 12 months since I joined the Commission as Chair, and went out in my first week to visit polling stations and observe first-hand the hard work that everyone in the electoral community does to deliver elections across the UK. I saw for myself the huge efforts that went into delivering Covid-safe elections last year, and gained insight into the work of the Commission, and the people we work with and support. Since that first week, I have continued to get out and meet members of the electoral community. I have heard from party treasurers and chairs, members of the UK's governments and parliaments, Returning Officers and electoral administrators and many others engaged in making our democracy function well. Emerging from these discussions are three key things people want to see from the Commission: high performance, cooperation and independence. We have been able to build these areas into our new five-year corporate plan, ensuring that our work over the next five years will meet the needs of all those we support. High performance is, of course, critical if we want to continue to command trust and confidence. We have developed stretching targets and an ambitious set of performance indicators to ensure, not only that the Commission delivers to a high standard, but that the wider system meets the needs of voters and everyone else involved in elections. We will measure public satisfaction with voting and voter registration, the timeliness of our enforcement work and the provision of guidance, and public perceptions of fraud and abuse. To achieve our targets, we need to work closely with other organisations, including local authorities, the police, parties and campaigners. We have a programme of support for electoral administrators and local authorities to assist them to deliver effective, resilient and consistent local electoral services. We also have a new support strategy for our regulated community to help parties and campaigners comply with electoral law and to ensure voters have transparency over the money given to and spent by these groups. As ever, the Commission's independence underpins this work. It is essential that we remain independent and free to take impartial decisions, informed by evidence. We will carefully consider the implications of the UK Government's Strategy and Policy Statement, due to be published later this year, and share our views via the scheduled consultation. Performance, cooperation and independence will be particularly important as the Commission implements the UK Government's Elections Act and the electoral agendas for Scotland and Wales over the coming years. Alongside the electoral community, we will be working to deliver significant changes for voters, administrators and campaigners. We will continue to advise on timeframes, resources and impact to ensure the changes can be delivered as intended. Delivering the corporate plan and implementing the Elections Act will require a resilient and skilled team. I have been pleased to welcome to the Commission Shaun McNally CBE, our new Chief Executive, who together with our Senior Leadership Team is already making great progress on this work. I would also like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Bob Posner, our retiring Chief Executive, who has been a calm, approachable and supportive leader over many years of service to the Commission. John Pullinger CB, Chair Foreward Having recently joined the Commission as Chief Executive, I have been pleased to see the excellent work the Commission has undertaken to promote public confidence in the democratic process and ensure its integrity. This annual report sets out in detail the organisation's progress against its four strategic objectives, but there are a number of achievements worth highlighting. May 2021 saw a particularly complex set of polls take place across Great Britain, including elections to the Scottish Parliament, Senedd and London Assembly, with some contests postponed from May 2020. The additional challenge of the coronavirus pandemic brought uncertainty and changes for voters, campaigners and administrators who were required to observe public health guidance while participating. Commission colleagues worked with public health bodies and the electoral community to support all those involved, providing detailed guidance to campaigners and administrators and running public awareness campaigns to help voters understand their voting options. I was pleased to see that more than a million people registered to vote during the period of the Commission's voter registration campaign, 'Got 5?', and our research found that there was no decline in turnout, despite the pandemic. Changes put in place by the UK's governments, the Commission and electoral administrators helped support and reassure voters and campaigners. People were confident that they could vote safely at the elections, the overwhelming majority were able to vote using their preferred method, and overall, candidates and campaigners were able to put their case to voters face-to-face, online and through printed material. Shortly before the polls, Commission research found that public confidence in the running of elections hit a ten-year high. Eighty per cent of respondents said they were confident that elections in the UK are well run, and 86% were satisfied with the process of voting and registering to vote. This is a great outcome and something we must continue to build on. As well as overseeing elections, the Commission is also responsible for overseeing compliance and promoting a good understanding of the rules among the regulated community. Last year, colleagues carried out research with our regulated community to understand the challenges they face, and the kind of support and assistance they want from us in the future. We want to work with campaigners to deliver more proactive support and engagement, helping them to get ahead of any potential compliance issues. We have set up a new team dedicated to developing, testing and implementing a selection of new support tools. The team contacted a wide range of organisations and individuals from across the regulated community, including political parties large and small, non-party campaigners, and elected representatives. We heard back from nearly 350 people from across the UK who have provided us with information that will help us design a regulatory support strategy around their needs. This will help ensure we continue to enjoy high levels of compliance, which further supports voter confidence in our electoral system. Another key focus for the Commission over the last year has been the UK Government's Elections Act, the most significant piece of electoral legislation in nearly 20 years. The Commission spent much of the last year providing independent, evidence-based advice to parliamentarians to support their consideration of the Bill's measures. Having now received Royal Assent, the Elections Act brings considerable changes for those delivering, participating and campaigning in elections in the UK. Our focus and that of our partners now turns to implementation, and ensuring all those involved in our democratic processes have time to understand and prepare for the new measures. Work on this has already begun and will be a significant priority for the years ahead. Plans are underway for a public awareness campaign to support new voter ID requirements, and our teams are looking carefully at how we can reflect the new legislation in our guidance. Finally, the last year has seen important changes to the Commission's funding and accountability arrangements. The Scottish Parliament and Senedd now fund the direct costs of delivering Commission functions. These arrangements have now been in place for a full year, bringing increased accountability and transparency for the Commission. You will notice these arrangements reflected throughout this document, both in the Commission's accounts and in the two devolved sections of the report. The work of the last year puts us in a strong position for the year to come. We have a new Corporate Plan, which sets ambitious objectives for the next five-year period. It will drive our work with the wider electoral community, with voters, campaigners, administrators, partners and the UK's governments to strengthen further trust in the electoral system. It will also drive collaboration and improvement within the Commission. In order to support our stakeholders, we need to support our staff. We will refresh our learning and development offering and invest in technology to ensure everyone has the skills, tools and support they need to deliver. Internal innovation will equip us to keep pace with external innovation. With new electoral legislation from the UK Government and ambitious reform agendas in both Scotland and Wales, there is a lot of change on the horizon. We are well placed to support the electoral community through these changes, and to make the case for any further reforms our system might need to ensure voters and campaigners can continue to participate with confidence.

Our role

The Electoral Commission is the independent body which oversees elections and regulates political finance in the United Kingdom. . Our vision and goals

Our vision is to be a world-class public sector organisation – innovative, delivering great value and getting right what matters most to voters and legislators. In 2021/22 we worked towards achieving four goals:

- To enable the continued delivery of free and fair elections and referendums, focusing on the needs of electors and addressing the changing environment to ensure every vote remains secure and accessible
- To ensure an increasingly trusted and transparent system of regulation in political finance, overseeing compliance, promoting understanding amongst those regulated and proactively pursuing breaches
- To be an independent and respected centre of expertise, using knowledge and insight to further the transparency, fairness and efficiency of our democratic system, and help adapt it to the modern, digital age
- To provide value for money, making best use of our resources and expertise to deliver services that are attuned to what matters most to voters.

This goal underpins and supports all of our work

From 2022/23 we have updated our vision and strategic objectives in our Corporate Plan . As an organisation, we will work to promote public confidence in the electoral system and ensure its integrity. Our vision will be to ensure people trust, value and take part in elections. We plan to achieve this vision by delivering these five strategic objectives:

- Accessible registration and voting
- Transparent political campaigning and compliant political finance
- Resilient local electoral services
- Fair and effective

electoral law A modern and sustainable electoral system Our role across the UK We deliver for voters across all parts of the UK, with Electoral Commission offices in Belfast, Cardiff, Edinburgh and London. We work closely with the UK and devolved governments and, since April 2021, we now have accountabilities to the UK Parliament, the Scottish Parliament and the Senedd, and are funded by each of these for the work undertaken on elections under their devolved or retained powers. Our Governance Section includes more detail on our accountability arrangements and, from page 31, sets out specific reports in relation to our work for the Scottish Parliament and Senedd. Our 2021/22 year at a glance April to June 2021 We supported the successful delivery of the complex set of polls in May 2021, including those elections deferred from May 2020 due to COVID-19. Over one million people registered to vote in Great Britain during the period of our 'Got 5' voter registration campaign. Our 'Your Vote is Yours Alone' campaign raised awareness among voters of their rights and produced a suite of resources, for local authorities and other organisations to use to spread the message. We achieved an 87% response rate in our Pulse staff survey. This is 8 percentage points higher than the pulse survey in November 2020, and 1 percentage point higher than the last full 'all staff' survey in March 2020. John Pullinger started as Chair of the Electoral Commission. From 1 April the Electoral Commission became accountable to, and funded by, the Scottish Parliament and Senedd for devolved functions and elections. 64% of the public surveyed said they were satisfied with our public information service. July to September 2021 We supported the electoral registration canvass across Great Britain and in Northern Ireland, providing advice and support to Electoral Registration Officers and running a new public awareness campaign in Northern Ireland. We published three evaluation reports on the May 2021 elections, concluding the elections had been well-run despite the challenging circumstances. The Committee on Standards in Public Life published a report on the regulation of election finance, recommending important changes to the Commission's role and powers. The Elections Bill was published and introduced in the UK Parliament. We worked with officials to provide advice and expertise as required. We issued our regulatory support survey, to support us to understand our stakeholders' needs better. Dr Katy Radford was appointed as Commissioner for Northern Ireland. October to December 2021 We published guidance for electoral administrators, parties and campaigners in advance of the May 2022 elections. We published research looking at public attitudes to voting processes and the information available around elections. We published the campaign spending returns of political parties and registered non-party campaigners that spent £250,000 or less campaigning at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election or Senedd election. We submitted our first Wales Corporate Plan and estimate to the Llywydd's Committee and our first estimate to the Scottish Parliament Corporate Body. We consulted in Great Britain and in Northern Ireland on a new equality, diversity and inclusion strategy and on a refreshed approach to Equality Impact Assessments. January to March 2022 We published the campaign spending returns of political parties that spent over £250,000 campaigning at the 2021 Scottish Parliament election or Senedd election. We published our report on the 2021 Northern Ireland electoral registration canvass. We ran our first virtual pre-election seminar in Northern Ireland for candidates and agents contesting the May 2022 Assembly election. To support Returning Officers and Electoral Registration Officers in advance of the May 2022 elections, we held joint briefing events with the Electoral Management Board for Scotland and Wales Electoral Coordination Board We ran 'Welcome to your vote week' in Scotland and Wales in partnership with education bodies and youth groups, to provide information on registering and voting to 15-17 year olds. We launched a day of activity to target newly enfranchised foreign nationals in Scotland and Wales with information about registration and voting. presented in this study further supports our position, first set out in 2015, that the electoral registration system in Great Britain requires modernisation to provide the best possible opportunity for ensuring that as many people as possible are correctly registered. This research confirms that age and mobility continue to be the strongest variables associated with lower levels of completeness. Plans to reform the annual canvass starting in 2020 are an important first step, enabling EROs to focus resources on households that have changed composition, but there is more that could and should be done to modernise registration processes in Great Britain. Our vision of a modern electoral register is one which: Uses trusted public data to keep itself accurate and complete throughout the year without relying solely on action by individuals; and Makes it as easy as possible for electors to ensure their own registration record is accurate and complete, particularly ahead of elections and referendums. Earlier this year we published the findings from a series of feasibility studies exploring how electoral registration reforms could be delivered, to help inform the debate about registration reform. These studies looked at the potential for giving EROs access to data from other public service providers; integration of electoral registration into other public service transactions; and automatic or more automated forms of registration. The options explored in the studies could help address some of the specific challenges highlighted in this research. For example: For people who have recently changed address, including those who move more frequently, registering to vote may not always be an immediate priority. Regular access to reliable data from a wider range of public services about people who have recently updated their address details would allow EROs to make contact directly with them at their new address to encourage them to register to vote. Integrating electoral registration applications into other public service transactions could make it easier for individuals to keep their registration details up to date and accurate.

This could be particularly effective for those who have moved recently and who are in the process of updating their details with other agencies and public bodies. Making better use of existing public data sources could also help to improve levels of completeness among some of the specific under-registered groups identified in this study. Data from the education sector – such as information held by the Education and Skills Funding Agency Learning Records Service, which collects data relating to learners in England, Wales and Northern Ireland registering for relevant post-14 qualifications, and the Scottish Qualifications Authority – could help EROs identify attainers and other young people. Also, data from the Department for Work and Pensions could potentially be used by EROs to register young people to vote automatically when they are allocated their National Insurance number ahead of their 16th birthday. Our feasibility studies found that these reforms were feasible from a technical and operational perspective and could be implemented without radically altering the structure of the electoral registration system in the UK. While reforms of this nature undoubtedly raise important questions about data sharing, data protection and the implications of automatic registration, they offer considerable potential to address the challenges of achieving accurate and complete registers in Great Britain. We want to encourage a wider debate on the potential benefits of further modernisation and electoral registration reform and look forward to

imprint Requirements for the imprint Sharing and republishing material Enforcement of the regime Key terms About this guidance The guidance has been prepared by the Electoral Commission, and laid before Parliament, in accordance with section 54 of the Elections Act 2022. It applies throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The purpose of this guidance is to: explain the operation of Part 6 of the Act, concerned with information that is to be included with digital material and how to comply with its requirements explain how the Electoral Commission and the police will undertake their enforcement functions where there is a breach or suspected breach of Part 6 of the Act. Where the guidance says that something must be done, this means that it is a requirement in either primary or secondary legislation.

The guidance uses 'you' to mean both the promoter of the material, and anyone else on whose behalf it has been published. This is because it is the promoter and/or anyone on whose behalf material has been published who commit an offence under section 48 of the Elections Act 2022 if material is published contrary to Part 6 of the Act. Key terms are explained throughout the guidance, and also provided in an alphabetical list at the end of the document. The Electoral Commission and the police must have regard to this guidance when exercising their functions under Part 6 of the Act. The Electoral Commission may propose revisions to this guidance from time to time in accordance with the Act or when directed to do so by the Secretary of State. The examples used in this guidance relate to functionality on digital platforms as of May 2023. The general principles set out in the guidance continue to apply in the event that functionality changes, or new platforms emerge. Introduction When certain campaign material is published, it must contain specific details to show who is responsible for publishing it. These details are known as an 'imprint'. The imprint helps to ensure there is transparency for voters about who is campaigning. There are already UK-wide laws requiring imprints on printed election, referendum and recall petition material, and on digital election material used at Scottish devolved elections. For these laws, please see the Electoral Commission's non-statutory guidance . Under the Elections Act 2022, the law requires imprints on some kinds of electronic material. This guidance refers to electronic material as 'digital material'. Examples of the types of digital material that need an imprint are explained in the guidance. The digital imprint requirements do not apply to digital material published prior to the commencement of Part 6 of the Act. However if that material is republished once the Act has been commenced, the republished material will become subject to the requirements. What is digital material? An imprint may be required on any digital material, provided the material meets the criteria which are set out in the following sections. Digital material is material in electronic form that consists of or includes text, moving images, still images, speech or music. It does not include telephone calls or SMS messages. It can apply to material published in messaging services which do not use SMS, such as WhatsApp or Signal. The requirement to include an imprint only applies to digital material that is published, which means made available to the public or any section of the public. For example, it would not apply to a private messaging group between friends, or an email sent out by a party only to its members. If material is made available in the UK, then the digital imprint rules will apply, no matter where the content is published from, or where the promoter is. For example, you could be outside the UK, but publish material on a digital platform making it available to a section of the public in the UK.

Imprints may be required on published material including (though this is not an exhaustive list): Pop-up ads Social media posts Any advert that appears in any website, search engine result, app or social media platform Adverts on internet radio or other audio streaming platforms such as Spotify Adverts on digital TV streaming services Adverts in podcasts Adverts in online newspapers Messages on WhatsApp, Signal or Telegram MMS messages Websites Images Videos Electronic billboards Definitions of material in scope of the regime may also be updated by secondary legislation to allow for emerging technology. What sort of material requires an imprint? There are two different sets of criteria which determine if your digital material requires an imprint under the Elections Act 2022. The first applies to paid adverts. The second applies to any other material. This guidance refers to material that is not a paid advert as 'organic material'. If you have paid for the material to be published as an advert, then it must have an imprint if it is 'political material'. This requirement applies to anyone publishing political material as a paid advert. If you have not paid for the material to be published as an advert, then it is organic material. Organic material must have an imprint if it is election material, referendum material or recall petition material, and it is published by or on behalf of a relevant entity, such as a candidate or registered political party.

There are also exceptions for some kinds of material under the Elections Act. This guidance refers to these as exemptions. All these concepts are explained in more detail in the following sections. Imprints are important for transparency in campaigning. It is therefore good practice to include an imprint on all digital material that relates to elections, referendums or recall petitions, even if the material does not require one by law. Paid adverts If you have paid for digital material to be published as an advert, then it must have an imprint if it is 'political material'. This requirement applies to anyone placing a paid advert.

Payment includes payments of any kind – for example 'pay-per-click' and 'pay-per-impression' advertising. Payment is not limited to just money. It can also include benefits in kind, for example goods or services being provided for free or at a discount by the promoter to the digital platform hosting the advert. It does not include payments as part of the costs of creating, setting up, operating or maintaining the material. It is limited to payments made specifically to the service provider or platform hosting the adverts for the publication of those adverts. If the service provider hosting the advert (for example, a digital platform or electronic billboard advertiser) has not been paid for the material to be published on the platform, then the material is not a paid advert. Example For example, if you employ a digital agency to pay social media platforms for placing adverts on their platforms, then these are paid adverts because the agency is paying the platforms for the adverts to be published. By contrast, if you employ a digital agency to publish digital material on their own social media channels, then these are not paid adverts, because the platforms on which the material is published are not being paid. The fact that the agency is being paid does not make the material a paid advert. Similarly, if you pay an influencer or ambassador to post material on their own social media channels, then these are not paid adverts, because the platforms on which the material is published are not being paid for the material to be published. This is the case even if the posts are classed as adverts for the purposes of other legislation. Paid adverts2 Not all payments to the service provider hosting the material will mean the material is a paid advert – only those made to the service provider specifically for the material to be published as an advert. Example For example, if you pay a social media company for a certain type of account (e.g. the paid Twitter Blue account), this does not make all your posts paid adverts. By contrast, if you pay a social media company to increase the reach of a post by publishing it as an advert (e.g. boosting a post), then this will be a paid advert.

Organic material may still require an imprint – see the section ‘Organic material’.

Political material Political material is material whose sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to give support to or withhold support from: one or more political parties a particular candidate or a particular future candidate (in their capacity as such) a particular elected office-holder (in their capacity as such) political parties, candidates, future candidates or elected office-holders that are linked by their support for or opposition to particular policies, or by holding particular opinions

other categories of candidates, future candidates or elected office-holders that are not based on policies or opinions – for example, candidates who went to a state school, or MPs who grew up in their constituency the holding of a referendum, or a

material whose sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to give support to a political party. Political material whose sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to give support to a particular candidate. Political material whose sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to withhold support from a particular elected office-holder. Political material whose sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to withhold support from a particular elected office-holder. Political material whose sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to give support to or withhold support from a category of candidates linked by something other than their support for a policy. Political material whose sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to give support to the outcome of a referendum. Material can be political material at any time, not just in election or referendum periods. For example, you could pay for a digital advert promoting a party or elected office-holder at any time, without it being related to an electoral event. Paid adverts only need an imprint if their sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as one of those on the list above. Example For example, a sponsored Facebook post of a comedian doing a routine criticising a government minister would not usually need an imprint, because the primary purpose of the clip is usually reasonably regarded as being to promote the comedian. Paid adverts4 If an organisation publishes digital material, the sole or primary purpose of any given piece of material will not always be the same as the overall purpose of the organisation. It will be a matter of fact in each case whether the sole or primary purpose of any particular piece of material can reasonably be regarded as being one of those in the list above. In particular, where the primary purpose of a specific piece of material is to do with a campaign issue itself and not any of those on the list above, then it will not be political material. Example For example, suppose a campaigning organisation in 2023 has as its main objective to bring back the death penalty. It runs three sets of paid adverts. The first criticises a political party which is opposed to the death penalty. The primary purpose of this material can reasonably be regarded as to influence the public to withhold support from the party. Therefore it requires an imprint. The second argues for holding a referendum on reinstating the death penalty. The primary purpose of this material can reasonably be regarded as to influence the public to give support to the holding of a referendum. Therefore it requires an imprint. The third advert lists a number of positive predictions about the effects of reinstating the death penalty. The primary purpose of this material can reasonably be regarded as to influence the public to support the death penalty. Therefore it does not require an imprint. Although the organisation has an overarching primary organisational purpose, the different pieces of digital material it publishes have distinct primary purposes. This means that some of the material requires an imprint and some does not, depending on the facts.

Paid adverts⁵ Political material relating to referendums A paid advert will be political material if its sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence the public, or any section of the public, to give support to or withhold support from the holding of, or a particular outcome of, any kind of referendum in the UK, such as: a UK-wide referendum a referendum held in England, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland, or any combination of those a Senedd referendum a local authority governance referendum a local government referendum a local poll a council tax increases referendum a parish poll a Neighbourhood Planning referendum Any paid digital advert that supports an outcome in a referendum that is being held must have an imprint. Any paid digital advert that promotes an outcome in a potential future referendum must have an imprint, even if that referendum has not yet been called or legislated for. Example For example, there is speculation about a referendum being held on an issue, but it has not yet been officially called or legislated for. If a campaigner places a paid advert saying 'VOTE YES' to the particular issue, this could be reasonably regarded as influencing the public to support a particular outcome (Yes) in a future referendum. Therefore it would require an imprint.

Paid adverts⁶ Any paid digital advert that expressly advocates the holding of a new referendum must have an imprint. It does not matter if the referendum is unlikely to be held – the imprint requirements still apply.

Example For example, a paid digital advert calling for a referendum on an independent North of England would require an imprint.

Paid adverts⁷ Paid adverts relating only to referendums held in the past will not be political material under the referendum part of the definition.

Example For example, a paid advert marking the anniversary of the 1998 referendum in Northern Ireland which endorsed the Good Friday Agreement would not need an imprint.

Paid adverts⁸ Some paid digital adverts may relate to: the subject matter of a past referendum the consequences of the outcome of a referendum the implementation of a referendum result Since in these cases the referendum is over, this material will only require an imprint if it meets one of the other criteria for political material.

Example For example, a paid advert published after a referendum saying 'RESPECT THE RESULT' could not be reasonably regarded as intended to influence the public to give support to the winning outcome in the referendum, because the referendum is already over. However, depending on the context and the material, it may be political material for another reason. For example, it might be reasonably regarded as intended to influence the public to give support to a particular party or category of elected office-holders who have particular views on how to implement the result, or to withhold support for the holding of a second referendum. Organic material If you have not paid for the digital material to be published as an advert – for example, you just posted it on your own social media – then it is organic material. Organic material must include an imprint if it is both: published by or on behalf of a relevant entity any of: election material referendum material recall petition material These concepts are explained below. Relevant entities The relevant entities are: a registered party a registered non-party campaigner a candidate or future candidate an elected office-holder a registered referendum campaigner a registered recall petition campaigner If someone is not a relevant entity, and they publish organic material on their own behalf, then the material does not require an imprint. Organic material published by or on behalf of a relevant entity must include an imprint, even if they have not paid for it to be published, if it is any of: election material referendum material recall petition material Unlike in relation to paid adverts, the three kinds of organic material which require an imprint are all related to specific electoral events. Organic material is therefore more likely to need an imprint during the campaigns leading up to these events. Election material Election material is material whose purpose can reasonably be regarded as intending to promote or procure electoral success for: one or more political parties a candidate or future candidate political parties, candidates, or future candidates that are linked by their support for or opposition to particular policies, or by holding particular opinions other categories of candidates or future candidates that are not based on policies or opinions – for example, candidates or future candidates who went to a state school, or independent candidates (who do not stand for a political party) any combination of the above It includes material that is reasonably regarded as intended to influence voters to vote for or against one of the entities listed above – for example it includes both a positive campaign about a party's policies, and a negative campaign criticising a rival party's policies. If material meets any of these criteria, it will be election material even if the material can reasonably be regarded as intended to achieve other purposes as well. There is more detail on this point in the section about non-party campaigners. Organic digital material which is election material and is published by or on behalf of a relevant entity must include an imprint. The following are examples of organic material that constitute election material: Election material which can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence voters to vote against a political party. Election material which can reasonably be regarded as intending to promote or procure electoral success for a candidate. Election material which can reasonably be regarded as intending to promote or procure electoral success for a category of candidates that are linked by their support for a policy. Election material which can reasonably be regarded as intending to promote or procure electoral success for a category of candidates that are linked by something other than a policy. Referendum material Referendum material is material that wholly or mainly relates to a PPERA referendum, and which is published during the referendum period. This means that in the rules for organic material, referendum material only relates to a referendum that is being held – unlike in the rules for paid adverts, which can also apply to material concerned with referendums that may not happen. A PPERA referendum is a referendum held under Part 7 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, including: a UK-wide referendum a referendum held in one or more of England, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland (but not including a Senedd referendum) The rules for organic material do not apply to material relating to any other type of referendum, for example: Senedd referendum local government referendum local authority governance referendum local poll council tax increases referendum parish poll Neighbourhood Planning referendum Organic digital material that is referendum material and is published by or on behalf of a relevant entity must include an imprint. Recall petition material Recall petition material is material whose purpose can reasonably be regarded as intending to promote or procure the success or failure of a recall petition. Organic digital material that is recall petition material and is published by or on behalf of a relevant entity must include an imprint. Exemptions The following types of material do not need to carry an imprint because they are specifically exempted: Material, other than an advert, published on a website or app which is primarily for journalism Any party political broadcast or referendum campaign broadcast Certain shared material which still includes the original imprint. See ‘Sharing and republishing material’ for more details Material published on a website or app which is primarily for journalism Material, other than an advert, which is published on a website or mobile app whose primary purpose (or one of whose primary purposes) is journalism does not need to include an imprint. This exemption does not apply to adverts, regardless of whether the platform has been paid to publish the advert or not. Websites or apps which have journalism as one of their primary purposes can include for example: Online newspapers or news channels Newspaper apps Online radio stations Party political broadcast or referendum campaign broadcast Digital imprints are not required on any party political broadcast or referendum campaign broadcast included by a broadcaster in its broadcasting services. A “broadcaster” means: the holder of a licence under the Broadcasting Act 1990 or 1996, the British Broadcasting Corporation, or Sianel Pedwar Cymru. A ‘referendum campaign broadcast’ means any broadcast whose purpose (or main purpose) is or may reasonably be assumed to be to further any campaign conducted with a view to promoting or procuring a particular outcome in relation to any question asked in a referendum to which Part 7 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 applies, or otherwise to promote or procure any such outcome. If a party publishes the same material on a digital platform, for example on their website, then this will not be a party political broadcast and so will not be exempt. Candidates and future candidates If you are a candidate or a future candidate, you must include an imprint on any material that meets the criteria set out in the previous sections. For example, although this is not an exhaustive list, both for paid adverts and for organic material, an imprint will be required on any material that: promotes your candidacy criticises another candidate promotes your political party (if you have one) in the election criticises another political party in the election Becoming a future candidate You become a future candidate when you announce your intention to stand in the next election, or someone else announces it on your behalf. For example, your party may have issued a press release when you were selected, or you might have mentioned your intention at a residents’ meeting. This means that it is possible to be a future candidate for a long time before the election. As soon as your intention to stand is declared, you are a future candidate, and therefore you are a relevant entity who will be required to include imprints on organic material if it is election material, referendum material or recall petition material. You will stop being a future candidate if you withdraw your declaration of intention to stand, or when you become a candidate. If you are a future candidate, you will become a candidate on the last date for publication of notice of election, or for parliamentary general elections, on the date Parliament is dissolved. Even before you are a candidate or future candidate, you will still need to include an imprint on a digital paid advert if it is political material. Political parties It is good practice for political parties to include an imprint on all of their digital material. Organic material A political party that is registered with the Electoral Commission is one of the relevant entities. This means that a registered party must include an imprint on any organic material that is either election material, referendum material or recall petition material. In particular, although this is not an exhaustive list, a party must include an imprint on any organic material which: promotes the party or any of its candidates or future candidates at an election criticises another party or any of its candidates or future candidates at an election promotes an outcome in a PPERA referendum – even if the party is not registered with the Electoral Commission as a referendum campaigner promotes an outcome in a recall petition – even if the party is not registered as a recall petition campaigner with the Petition Officer Paid adverts Like anyone else, a political party must include an imprint on any paid advert which is political material. In particular, although this is not an exhaustive list, this includes any digital paid advert, published at any time, which can reasonably be regarded as having the sole or primary purpose of influencing the public: to support the party or any of its candidates, future candidates or elected office-holders to withhold support from another party or any of its candidates, future candidates or elected office-holders to support or withhold support from the holding of a referendum to support or withhold support from an outcome in a referendum that is happening, even if the party is not registered with the Electoral Commission as a referendum campaigner to support or withhold support from an outcome in a recall petition – even if the party is not registered as a recall petition campaigner with the Petition Officer Non-party campaigners Non-party campaigners are individuals and organisations who campaign around elections without standing candidates themselves. s being able to get their messages to voters is a fundamental part of the democratic process, and it is important that voters hear from a wide and diverse variety of campaigners. Non-party campaigners who spend over a certain amount on campaigning at elections must register with the Electoral Commission. Unlike a political party, where a lot of their material is likely to require an imprint, if you are a non-party campaigner that campaigns on an issue, you may find that only some of your material requires an imprint. You should consider whether an imprint is required for each piece of material, according to the facts. Imprints are important for transparency in campaigning. It is therefore good practice to include an imprint on all digital material that relates to elections, referendums and recall petitions, even if the material does not need to include one by law. If a campaigner includes an imprint on their material, that does not mean that the material requires one by law. The campaigner may well simply be including one as best practice for transparency. The following sections give guidance on the two types of material that may require an imprint. Paid adverts – all campaigners If you pay a digital platform to publish a digital advert, you will need to determine if the advert is ‘political material’. Your advert will be political material if its sole or primary purpose can reasonably be regarded as one of the purposes on the list. If you are a non-party campaigner campaigning on an issue, the primary purpose of your overall campaign is likely to be based on that issue. However, what matters for whether your digital advert is political material is not your organisation’s overall aim, but whether the sole or primary purpose of a particular paid advert is a purpose that makes the advert political material (see paid adverts section for examples on this point and the definition of political material). If you are a registered charity, and you follow charity law and guidance from the relevant charity regulator, your material is unlikely to have a sole or primary purpose on the list, because many of the sorts of campaigns that have those purposes are prohibited. For example, charities must remain independent of party politics and must not support a political party or candidate, or create a perception of support as a result of their actions or participation. This may also apply to other organisations who have limits on their political activities, for example in their constitution. Organic material – registered campaigners If you are a non-party campaigner registered with the Electoral Commission, then as well as for paid adverts, you must also include an imprint on organic material – including anything you post on social media – if it is election material, referendum material or recall petition material. Election material is very similar to material which meets the ‘purpose test’ for regulated non-party campaigner spending (see the Commission’s spending guidance for more information). If you have determined that your digital material meets the purpose test, then it will also need to carry an imprint. The primary intention of your material may not be to influence voters. For example, you might publish material with one or more of the following intentions: raising awareness of an issue influencing political parties to adopt a policy in their manifestos campaigning for or against government legislation providing information to voters encouraging people to register to vote encouraging people to vote, but not for anyone in particular Material that can reasonably be regarded as having one of these intentions will not be election material unless it can also reasonably be regarded as having the intention to influence voters to vote for or against certain parties, candidates or future candidates. Even if your primary intention is something else, your material will still be election material if it can reasonably be regarded as intended to influence voters to vote for or against certain parties, candidates or future candidates. For example, suppose your intention is to influence political parties to adopt a policy. If you go about this by publishing material promoting parties and candidates who have already adopted the policy, then this will be election material because the purpose of your material can reasonably be regarded as being to influence voters to support those parties and candidates.

Election material which can reasonably be regarded as intended to promote a party on the basis of its support for an issue. If issues-based material cannot reasonably be regarded as intended to influence voters to vote for certain parties, candidates or future candidates, then it is not election material. Campaign material which is not election material (but which carries an imprint as best practice). More examples are included below.

Example Before any election is announced, an animal welfare organisation publishes a tweet-thread explaining what it regards as mistreatment of animals in captivity. As well as setting out problems, it argues that one of the causes is government policy and underfunding. It does not mention elections, candidates or political parties. This is not election material and does not require an imprint. Although the material is critical of the government, it is not reasonably regarded as intended to influence voters in an election.

Example Two months before a UK Parliamentary general election, the animal welfare organisation, that is registered with the Electoral Commission, retweets, without commenting on it, a news article reporting that the party of government has announced they will legalise fox hunting if they are re-elected. This is not election material. This is merely sharing information, and the organisation would be expected to share any news relevant to their work. No imprint is required.

Example Once all the main parties have launched their manifestos in advance of a UK Parliamentary general election, the registered non-party campaigner compares their manifesto pledges on fox hunting. They create a graphic comparing the parties’ positions on the issue, giving marks out of ten and saying which party has the best policies. They then publish the graphic on their own social media channels. Because the campaigner has compared the parties and said which is better in this context, they have effectively promoted some over others. The graphic is therefore reasonably regarded as promoting those parties the campaigner considers to have better policies, so is election material. An imprint is required on the material. Example During the referendum period for a PPERA referendum, a registered non-party campaigner publishes a blog post on their website setting out what they see as the consequences of each outcome for their service users. This requires an imprint. For organic material which is published during the referendum period, it does not matter whether or not the material promotes an outcome in the referendum – it only needs to wholly or mainly relate to the referendum. Non-party campaigners² Organic material – unregistered campaigners If you are a non-party campaigner who is not registered with the Electoral Commission, then you do not need to include an imprint on any organic digital material you publish on your own behalf.

Unregistered non-party campaigners who only publish material on their own behalf will only need to include an imprint on paid adverts. What information must you include in the imprint? You must include the name and address of: the promoter any person on behalf of whom the material is being published (and who is not the promoter) You must use a postal address where you can be contacted. It can be an office or business address, or a home address. You can also use a PO Box address, or other mailbox service. The imprint must be in text form, unless it is included as a part of solely audio material. In this case, the imprint must be included as audio material. The imprint must be legible, or in the case of audio material, audible, no matter what device is used to access the information. In order to comply with the law, you must ensure that a written imprint is on screen for long enough that it can be read.

Similarly, an audio imprint must be read at a speed at which it can be heard and understood. If digital material which requires an imprint is published without one, the promoter and anyone on whose behalf it has been published may be liable for an offence under section 48 of the Elections Act 2022. The promoter and anyone on whose behalf the material is being published The promoter is whoever has caused the material to be published. Both the promoter and any person on behalf of whom the material is being published may be an individual or an organisation. If the material is published by an organisation, then the promoter is the organisation itself. The details of an individual are not required. Example For example, if an employee of a registered non-party campaigner publishes material for the campaigner in the course of their role as an employee, then it is the non-party campaigner itself who is the promoter and whose details must be provided. What information² The imprint must include the details of both the promoter and anyone else on whose behalf the material has been published. This means that your own details will not always be enough to meet the imprint requirements, depending on your particular situation. Example For example, if an agent publishes material on behalf of their candidate, then the imprint must include both the details of the agent, as promoter, and of the candidate on whose behalf the material has been published. For another example, suppose someone is an agent for a candidate, and also publishes material as part of their role volunteering for a political party. Some of the material they promote will be on behalf of the candidate, and so need to include the agent's details as promoter, and the candidate's details as the other person on whose behalf the material has been published. Some of it will be for the party, and so need the details of the party instead. What information³ Material could be published on someone's behalf for a number of reasons, including: the role someone plays in a campaign – for example, an agent may publish material on behalf of their candidate, making the agent the promoter. They are paying for a service – for example, a social media influencer may publish their own organic material on behalf of the political party that has engaged them to do so, making the influencer the promoter. They are part of a wider group involved in publishing the material – for example, a non-party campaigner may publish material on behalf of a coalition of non-party campaigners, making that non-party campaigner the promoter. If you are being paid to publish the material, the material must include an imprint which includes the details of whoever is paying you. This is because, depending on the facts, either they are the promoter, or you are publishing the material on their behalf. If you are an organisation that receives donations for your general operations, this does not mean that material you publish is published on behalf of your donors. If a staff member or volunteer publishes their own material of their own accord, in their personal capacity on their own social media accounts, this will not count as being done on behalf of their organisation. For material published by or on behalf of a party which promotes more than one of the party's candidates or future candidates, the imprint does not need to include the details of every individual candidate or future candidate. You can instead include the party's details in the imprint. Where must the imprint appear? The imprint must be included as a part of the material, unless it is not reasonably practicable to do so. Whether it is reasonably practicable to include the imprint as part of the material depends on the technical capability of the platform on which the material is published. It does not depend on, for example, whether including an imprint will affect: your preferences about the design or appearance of the material how effective you think the material will be how much time it will take to publish the material If the imprint is included as a part of the material, it must be included in such a way that if the material is shared as it is, the imprint will still be a part of it. Example For example, if the material is a picture and contains an imprint, then if the picture is shared unaltered, the imprint will still appear. Where must the imprint appear?2 If it is not reasonably practicable to include the imprint as a part of the material, then the imprint must appear somewhere directly accessible from the material. In practice, this means it can be reached via a direct link, usually one click or equivalent, where both the link and the imprint are easy for a voter to locate. If the imprint appears somewhere directly accessible from the material, it must be included in such a way that if the material is shared as it is, the imprint will still be accessible from the shared material. Example For example, if the material is a tweet, and the imprint is included in your Twitter bio, then if the material is retweeted, the imprint in your bio will still be accessible from the retweet. Where must the imprint appear?3 This means that you must not delete the imprint from your bio for as long as an imprint is required and the material remains published. If you were to delete the imprint, then it would no longer be accessible if your material is shared. Similarly, you cannot include your imprint somewhere which would not be accessible by those who can view the material itself. Example For example, the imprint cannot be behind a firewall or otherwise protected area of the internet, if that would mean that voters would see the shared material but would not have the necessary permission to view the imprint itself. Where must the imprint appear?4 Beyond these requirements, the original promoter of the material is not liable for any imprint offences that are due to the material being shared by other people later on. The liability is on the people republishing the material – see Sharing and republishing . If the imprint is included somewhere directly accessible from the material, it must be clear that the imprint relates to the material. For example, it would not be acceptable to publish a list of different imprints in one location, directly accessible from lots of different material, without it being clear which imprint relates to which material. The next sections give some detailed guidance on particular types or categories of digital material, and on what is typically reasonably practicable.

Social media

Usually, the material on social media will be the whole social media post. You must include the imprint in the post itself, unless it is not reasonably practicable.

Example For example, for paid adverts , it will usually be reasonably practicable to include the imprint as a part of the material – you can include the imprint in the content of the advert, or in the disclaimer text which appears at the top of the advert. Where must the imprint appear?⁵ On some digital platforms, the design of the platform, such as there being a character limit on posts, may mean that it is not reasonably practicable to include the imprint as a part of the post. In this case, you must display a legible imprint somewhere directly accessible from the post. The imprint must be directly accessible from the post no matter what device is used. There are a number of different ways that you can do this.

Example For example, , it may often not be reasonably practicable to include the imprint in the post itself because of a character limit. If this is the case, your imprint can be included on your profile, for example underneath your name, or as a pinned post or tweet. Alternatively the imprint can be included somewhere else that you directly link to from your post, for example on your own website.

Where must the imprint appear?⁶ Candidate imprint as a pinned tweet, where the candidate is their own agent. Candidate imprint in social media profile. Usually the ‘About’ section of a profile on a digital platform is not directly accessible from a post, because the hyperlink to the profile does not directly take you to that section. In this case, the ‘About’ section will only be directly accessible from a post if you add your own direct link to the ‘About’ section into the post. If material requires an imprint, you must ensure it is published on a platform that enables you either to include the imprint as part of the material or, if not reasonably practicable, somewhere directly accessible from the material. If a platform has such limited functionality that you cannot do either, then material that requires an imprint must not be published on that platform. If you publish material that requires an imprint on a platform that has limited functionality, you must include the imprint no matter what the limitations of that platform are. For example, TikTok has an 80-character bio, you cannot include links in a caption, and pinned posts are not available to all users. The best way to avoid these limitations is to include the imprint within the content of your TikTok video itself.

Videos, images and cartoons A video or image can still be required to display an imprint even if it contains no text. If your material is a video or image, it will usually be reasonably practicable to include the imprint in the video or image, especially if you have created it yourself. If this is not reasonably practicable, for example if the material is a very small image, you must include the imprint somewhere directly accessible from it. If your material is a social media post which contains a video or image, then it will usually be reasonably practicable to include the imprint as a part of the post. Where it is reasonably practicable to include the imprint as part of the post, the best way to do this is to include it in the content of the video or image itself. This is because if it is shared, the imprint is more likely to remain a part of the material. This means that voters will see the original imprint as it is shared, which provides the most effective transparency. It is also less likely that people sharing the material will be required to include their own imprint when they share it. Further detail is included in the section Sharing and republishing . Alternatively, you can include the imprint somewhere else in the post. For example when uploading a video to YouTube, you can include the imprint in the video's description. Websites Where the digital material is a website or webpage, it will usually be reasonably practicable to include the imprint on the relevant webpage. For example, it could be displayed in the footer. Where the material is just a part of the webpage, for example a social media post embedded in the page, then the imprint must be included as a part of the material unless it is not reasonably practicable. If it is not reasonably practicable, then it can appear somewhere directly accessible from the material – for example, somewhere else on the same webpage, such as the footer, or somewhere hyperlinked from the material. Example For example, if your material is a Google search advertisement, the character limit of the description may not be sufficient to contain the information required by the imprint in the material itself. In this case, you can include the imprint somewhere directly accessible from the Google search advertisement, such as the page that the advert links to. Where must the imprint appear?⁷ Audio material On solely audio material, the imprint must be included as a part of the material. For example, you could include someone reading out the imprint at the end. The imprint must be audible. The imprint must be read at a speed at which it can be heard and understood. For how long does material need an imprint? In all cases, digital material must include an imprint for as long as both: the imprint is required by the law the material remains published Material remains published for as long as it is being made available to the public or a section of the public. For example, if a post remains available on your social media channels, then it remains published. Organic material For organic material, the imprint is required on material published by a relevant entity for as long as the published material remains any of: election material referendum material recall petition material Because these types of material are all related to a particular electoral event, in many cases the imprint will stop being required once that event is over. For example, a video saying 'Vote NO on 10 May' in relation to an upcoming referendum will cease to be referendum material after 10 May when the referendum is over. Paid adverts For a paid advert, an imprint is required for as long as the material remains political material. How long the material remains political material will depend on who or what your material is reasonably regarded as intended to influence public support for or against. If the material is linked to a particular electoral event or electoral cycle, then it will have a natural end point. For example: a future candidate could decide not to stand a candidate ceases to be a candidate after polling day an elected office-holder ceases to be an elected office-holder when their term ends support for or against a particular outcome in a referendum cannot be influenced after polling day Some political material will not have such a clear end point. For example, material promoting support for or against a political party could continue doing that for as long as the party exists. Sharing and republishing material When you share material to the public or a section of the public, including on social media, this is a type of publication. In the legislation, this is referred to as 'republishing'. The law on imprints therefore also applies to material that you share – for example, using the 'retweet' function , the 'Share' button , the 'duet' function on TikTok, or forwarding an email. This also applies when you share material that was first published before the law on digital imprints was in force. However, if you share material that has already been published with a correct imprint and you do not materially alter the material, then you do not need to include a new imprint with your own details. The original imprint will suffice. In this guidance we refer to this as the 'sharing exemption'. Materially altering the material includes: changing it in such a way as to change the meaning of the material removing the imprint (if it originally appeared as a part of the material) sharing it in such a way that the imprint ceases to be accessible from the material (if it originally appeared somewhere directly accessible from the material) If you share digital material that has already been published, but you materially alter that material, and it still requires an imprint in its new form then you must include your own imprint, even if the original material had an imprint. If you do not, you may be committing an offence. When material is republished, the duty to include an imprint falls on the person republishing the material (and anyone else on whose behalf they are republishing it). The duty does not fall on the promoter of the original material which is now being republished. The promoter of the original material only has a duty to make sure that it is possible for the original material to be shared without losing either: the imprint (if it is included as part of the material) access to the imprint (if it is included somewhere directly accessible from the material) In all cases, but especially if a promoter encourages the sharing of their material, it is good practice to include the imprint somewhere where it will be most easily retained if the material is shared. If the post contains an image or video, this will usually be in the content of the image or video itself. If you are a member of the public sharing material, you will usually not need to include an imprint. This is because if you are not a relevant entity, and you are not publishing on behalf of one, you do not need to include an imprint with any organic material. Examples of sharing material The following tables show different examples of 'chains' by which material is shared. Each table begins with the same piece of digital material, but in each table it is then republished in a number of different ways. Chain of sharing organic material where the imprint is included as a part of the material: Example Does it require a new imprint? Why? What they did A political party tweets an image criticising a rival party's election manifesto Yes. It is election material and promoted by a party. The party includes their imprint in the image itself. The image is retweeted by one of the party's MPs. No. It is election material and has been shared by an elected office-holder, but it is exempt under the sharing exemption. It has been shared without being materially altered and the party's original imprint is still a part of the material. The MP does not include their own imprint. A future candidate retweets their colleague's retweet. No. The sharing exemption still applies – the material is not materially altered and the original party imprint is still a part of the material, so no further imprint is required. The future candidate does not include their own imprint. Chain of sharing organic material where the imprint is originally in the material but is removed during the republication. Example Does it require a new imprint? Why? What they did A political party tweets an image criticising a rival party's election manifesto Yes. It is election material and promoted by a party. The party includes their imprint in the image itself. A registered non-party campaigner screenshots the image and turns it into a Facebook post. They crop the image so that the imprint no longer appears. Yes. By removing the imprint, they have materially altered the material. This means the sharing exemption does not apply. Because it is election material, and they are a registered campaigner, it requires the campaigner's imprint under the rules for organic material. The registered campaigner does not include an imprint, and so commits an offence. A candidate shared the altered image using the 'Share' button . Yes. The sharing exemption does not apply, because the campaigner in the previous example did not include an imprint. The candidate must include their own imprint. It is reasonably practicable to include it in the post, so the candidate includes it above the image. A member of the public shares the same altered image using the 'Share'

button . No. Because it is not a paid advert, the imprint rules for organic material only apply to relevant entities. Members of the public who are not a relevant entity, and are not publishing on behalf of one, do not need to include an imprint on organic material, regardless of whether they are publishing it originally or sharing it. No imprint is required, so the member of the public does not include one. Chain of sharing organic material where the imprint is included somewhere directly accessible from the material: Example Does it require a new imprint? Why? What they did A political party tweets an image criticising a rival party's election manifesto. Yes. It is election material and promoted by a party. The party includes their imprint in the image itself. An MP from a rival party republishes the original image using the 'Quote Tweet' function . They add a lengthy comment which is critical of the material and the party which originally tweeted the image. Yes. The MP has shared the material but turned it into election material intended to influence voters to vote against the original party. Because the meaning has been changed, the material has been materially altered. This means that the sharing exemption does not apply. The MP's tweet is a new piece of material which requires an imprint in its own right. In this case, because the MP has used up a lot of the character limit with their comment, it is not reasonably practicable to include the imprint as a part of the tweet. The MP therefore adds their own imprint underneath their name in their Twitter bio. This is directly accessible from the tweet because the tweet contains a hyperlink to the bio internal to the platform's functionality. A future candidate retweets the MP's tweet. No. The future candidate's tweet still contains a hyperlink with a direct link to the MP's Twitter bio. The imprint is therefore still accessible from the shared material. The future candidate does not include their own imprint. An elected mayor screenshots the future candidate's retweet and includes it as part of a TikTok video. Yes. Because of the way the image has been republished, there is no longer a hyperlink to the MP's profile, where the original imprint appears. The imprint is no longer accessible from the mayor's republished material, so the exemption does not apply. The future candidate therefore includes their own imprint at the start of the video. A candidate shares the mayor's video by using the stitch feature on TikTok. A section from the end of the mayor's video appears at the start of the candidate's video. Yes. Because the section of the earlier video that is included does not contain the mayor's imprint, the material has been materially altered. The sharing exemption does not apply. The candidate therefore includes an imprint in their video. Examples where organic material is republished and turned into a paid advert: Example Does it require a new imprint? Why? What they did A political party tweets an image criticising a rival party's election manifesto. Yes. It is election material and done by a party. The party includes their imprint in the image itself. A campaigner pays Facebook to 'boost' the party's post, thereby turning it into a paid advert. No. This is now a paid advert, and it is political material. However, the imprint is a part of the original post and is retained. The material has not been materially altered. The sharing exemption applies and the campaigner does not need to include their own imprint. The campaigner does not include an imprint. A member of the public creates and publishes a meme criticising a political party and some of their elected office-holders. They do not pay for it to be published as an advert. No. If material is not published as a paid advert, then an imprint is only required if it is published by or on behalf of a relevant entity. A member of the public is neither one of the relevant entities, nor publishing on behalf of one, and so does not need to display an imprint on organic material. The member of the public does not include an imprint. The campaigner pays Facebook to 'boost' the meme, thereby turning it into a paid advert.

Yes. The original meme did not require an imprint because it was not a paid advert and was not posted by a political entity. However, by 'boosting' the post, the campaigner has turned it into a paid advert, and it is now political material. Since the original post did not contain an imprint, the campaigner must include their own details in the advert. The campaigner includes their imprint in the 'disclaimer' section of the advert.

Offences and defences

If digital material which requires an imprint is published without one, then both the promoter of the material anyone else on whose behalf the material is published may commit an offence under section 48(1) of the Elections Act. It is a defence for a person charged with this offence to prove any of the following: that the failure to comply was due to circumstances beyond their control, and that they took all reasonable steps, and exercised all due diligence, to ensure they did comply.

that they complied with this guidance that in the case of the republication of material (see section Sharing and republishing): the material had previously been published it had not been materially altered when it was republished they reasonably believed that the original material required an imprint under section 41 and complied with the requirements of that section

Responsibilities for enforcement of the regime

The Elections Act provides for enforcement of the digital imprints regime by way of an offence under section 48(1) where an imprint is not included when required.. Whether it is the police or the Electoral Commission that is initially responsible depends on the purpose of the material in question, as set out in section 50. Where there is uncertainty in a particular case as to which body is responsible for enforcement, this will be resolved between the enforcement bodies on a case by case basis.

Political material (paid adverts) and election material (organic material)

The police will enforce material which relates to: a particular candidate a particular future candidate a particular elected office-holder

The Electoral Commission will enforce material which relates to: political parties categories of parties, candidates, future candidates and/or elected office-holders including categories based on: their support for or against particular policies their holding particular opinions any other reason

Recall petition material

This will be enforced by the police, both for paid adverts and organic material. Material relating to referendums

Any digital material, both for paid adverts and organic material, will be enforced by the Electoral Commission if it both:

- relates to a referendum held under Part 7 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (is a PPERA referendum)
- is published during the referendum period

Any other material relating to a referendum will be enforced by the police. This material will all be paid adverts, and includes any paid advert which either:

- relates to a referendum which is not a PPERA referendum
- relates to a referendum which is a PPERA referendum, but which is published before the referendum period

Approach to enforcement

The police and the Electoral Commission will seek to enforce the offence under section 48(1) consistently, but the differing nature of roles and powers means that specific actions may vary. Both the police and the Electoral Commission will enforce effectively, proportionately, and fairly. Specifically:

- Consider enforcement action only where there are reasonable grounds to suspect an offence under section 48(1) of the Act
- Take enforcement action only where it is proportionate to do so
- Take the facts of each situation into account
- Enforce only where it is in the public interest to do so in the context of organisational priorities and resources. Whether or not a matter is in the public interest and justifies the use of resources in this way will depend on a number of factors. These factors may be different and/or differently weighted depending on the circumstances. Some of the factors that are likely to be considered, though this is not an exhaustive list, are set out below:

Whether there was intent, rather than inadvertence or oversight Whether the required imprint is partially included or entirely absent The impact of the material -including but not limited to the extent and geographical spread of distribution of the material and how many people potentially may have seen it and been influenced by it Where the Commission opens an investigation, it will normally inform the subject of the investigation as soon as possible after the investigation is opened, unless doing so would frustrate the investigation. The Commission will provide details of the matters under investigation and ensure that the subject has the opportunity to respond to them. The police, in conducting criminal investigations, may proceed in a different way. Both the police and the Commission recognise that it is important to conclude investigations as quickly as possible. This is both in the public interest and in the interests of justice for those involved. However, the first priority is always to conduct a fair and thorough investigation, and this will take priority over speed where the two conflict. Use of powers The Elections Act creates two new powers in relation to enforcement of the regime. Use of powers under Schedule 12 to the Elections Act 2022 – obtaining information The police and the Commission have powers under Schedule 12 to the Act to obtain two different types of information. There is a power to give notice in writing to any person requiring the person to provide information identified in the notice, which is reasonably required for: the purposes of determining whether digital material has been published without an imprint where one was required or to enable the police or the Commission to make contact with the promoter of the material or any other person on behalf of whom the material has been published The police and the Commission also have a power to give notice in writing to any person requiring the person to provide it with electronic material identified in the notice, which is reasonably required for the purposes of determining whether electronic material has been published without an imprint where one was required. In both cases the police may choose to use this power as an alternative to existing powers to obtain information. The Commission may exercise that power where it is proportionate and in the public interest to do so. Neither the police nor the Commission will do so where that information is easily accessible by other means. Any information obtained under such a notice may not then be used as evidence in any enforcement action against the person who provides the information to the Commission. Compliance with notices Where either of these powers are exercised by either the police or the Commission, a deadline for compliance will be set which must be complied with. The deadline will be proportionate, taking account of the facts of the specific situation, including the urgency of obtaining the information. Where such a notice is not complied with, the police or the Commission may seek a court order requiring the information. Use of powers under section 51 of the Elections Act 2022 – taking down material The Commission has a power under section 51 of the Act to require that any material be removed or access to it disabled after the Commission has determined an offence has been committed under section 48(1) in relation to that material and imposed any sanction, or served a Stop Notice, or agreed an Enforcement Undertaking under its powers in Schedule 19C to the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act 2000. In deciding whether to exercise its power under section 51 of the Act, the Commission will consider whether to do so: is proportionate and in the public interest is in accordance with its enforcement objectives will assist in maintaining or improving transparency. It will not generally exercise that power where, for example, the material has already been removed; the material has been amended to make it compliant; or for any other reason it is not proportionate or in the public interest to require it to be removed. A similar power is available to a court under section 49(2) of the Act, following a conviction for an offence under section 48(1). There is no equivalent power available to the police because this power can only be used after an offence has been found, either by a court or the Commission. It is a criminal offence for any person who receives a notice to take down material to fail to comply with it without a reasonable excuse. Advice and guidance An area of difference between the roles and remits of the police and the Electoral Commission is in terms of providing guidance. The police may choose to provide words of advice rather than pursue criminal prosecution in some cases. The Electoral Commission however has a legal duty to take reasonable steps to secure compliance with the law, under which it provides support, advice and guidance. The Commission may use advice and guidance proactively in order to secure compliance and to give those the Commission regulates a clear understanding of their regulatory requirements, as an alternative to enforcement action. Before opening any investigation the Commission will consider whether it is proportionate to do so, and whether the use of advice and guidance is more appropriate. The Commission will consider all of the facts of each individual case, but some examples of relevant factors are: New or inexperienced campaigners who may be unfamiliar with the requirements Where an isolated incident occurs with an otherwise compliant campaigner Where matters were rectified quickly by the campaigner What happens after an investigation The police, where there is evidence of an offence, may refer the matter to the relevant public prosecutor (the Crown Prosecution Service in England and Wales, the Crown Office/Procurator Fiscal in Scotland, and the Public Prosecution Service in Northern Ireland), who will decide whether to launch a criminal prosecution. Where the Electoral Commission is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that an offence has been committed, the Commission may decide to impose a civil sanction using its powers under Schedule 19C to the Political Parties Elections and Referendums Act 2000. The Commission will generally sanction where it considers it appropriate to do so and when it is proportionate and in the public interest. If the Commission seeks to impose a sanction, it will follow the statutory process set out in Schedule 19C to the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. This involves the serving of a notice proposing a sanction, and a period of time for the person who is the subject of the notice to make representations. When making representations, recipients can put forward any information they consider relevant. In particular, if they have not already done so, the recipient may want to put forward any defence to the offence. They may wish to comment on the reasons for the Commission proposing a sanction, including the facts on which the decision is based. Representations may be made on the application of the factors the Commission has taken into account when determining the type and size of a sanction. Finally, the recipient may want to comment on the ability of the person concerned to pay a financial penalty and/or the cost to the person concerned of any non-financial requirement that might be imposed. Where possible, representations or objections should be accompanied by supporting evidence. Any representations or objections will be considered by a senior officer of the Commission who was not involved in the decision to issue the notice proposing a sanction. This includes determining if the Commission remains satisfied that an offence took place and, if so, that the proposed sanction is reasonable and appropriate. If, as a result, the Commission is no longer satisfied that an offence or contravention occurred, the matter will be closed and the outcome notified to the recipient. Otherwise, the senior officer will decide whether to issue a notice imposing a sanction, either reflecting the initial decision or changing it. Where any sanction is imposed, the subject of that sanction has a right of appeal to the county court in England and Wales, a county court in Northern Ireland, or the sheriff in Scotland. Report: Digital campaigning - increasing transparency for voters Introducing digital imprints Claims made in online political ads Overview We want every UK voter to know who is paying to target them online during elections and referendums. The amount of money spent on digital advertising is increasing with every election. But electoral law was written long before campaigning went digital. We're working with the UK's governments, other regulators and social media companies to make sure campaigning online is transparent and truthful. The new requirements for campaigners to include digital imprints on campaign material online is a positive step, but more needs to be done. Changes we want to see Voters need social media companies to have online databases of political ads. These should provide meaningful transparency and should follow the UK's rules for elections and referendums. We want the UK, Scottish and Welsh governments to change the law so that we have: better rules about how spending on digital election ads is reported to us, so that we can make sure campaigners follow the rules bigger fines, if campaigners break the rules stronger powers so we've got the right tools to regulate new ways of campaigning, like on social media channels or using online payment systems for campaign donations What's happening now From November 2023, campaigners will be required to include imprints on their digital political campaign material. This means that many types of digital material such as social media adverts, tweets and posts, will require an imprint. This is the same requirement as for physical campaign material, like leaflets and letters. Digital imprint rules are already in place for some elections and referendums in Scotland.

Learn more about digital imprints Social media companies We meet with social media companies, including Meta, Google, Snap, Twitter and Tik Tok, to discuss how election advertising can be made more transparent on their platforms. We also use the ad libraries made available by some of the companies to monitor who campaigns online during elections. Report: the rise of digital campaigning In 2018, we wrote a report about the rise of digital campaigning in the UK. We made recommendations to government to improve transparency of digital campaigning and are currently reviewing our policies in this area. The Board was advised of the sad news that our colleague Philippa Saray passed away peacefully at the end of last month. Philippa joined the Commission in 2006 when the Regional teams were first created, and was the Regional Manager at that stage for Eastern, South East and London. Despite having a huge area to cover, she quickly established strong relationships with local authority teams across the whole of her patch. Although she didn't have an electoral background, Philippa quickly got to grips with the complexities of electoral law and established herself and her team as a central part of the landscape. Throughout her 15 years with the Commission, Philippa did a fantastic job of supporting and challenging local authorities across the East and South East of England, and was rightly well-respected and liked by people from across the electoral community. Although Philippa had been unwell over the past year, she had continued to work over much of that time, and to be the friendly and warm person that we all knew she was. We will miss her very much, and our thoughts are with her husband, and her family and friends. Declarations of interest Commission Chair John Pullinger declared the following interests: Advisor for Parliament of Ukraine: Westminster Foundation for Democracy (Principal activity is strengthening parliamentary democracy around the world). From July 2022. Role with the Global Partnership for Sustainable Development Data finished in June 2022 Role with the Geospatial Commission finished in May 2022 Commissioner Stephen Gilbert declared the following interests: Member of the following AAPGs: General Aviation LGBT + Rights Hospitality and Events in Wales Singapore Taiwan ITV Channel 4 BBC The Board noted that these declarations would be included in the Commissioners' Register of interests and uploaded onto the Commission's external website in line with

Commissioners' Code of Conduct. Minutes (EC 127/22) The Board agreed as a matter arising from previous minutes, and in light of the recent article by the Chair published in the Daily Telegraph, that the longstanding Commission policy recommendations related to due diligence in reporting donations should be included in the list of Commission policy priorities, which had been considered and agreed at the Board's meeting in February. Resolved: That the minutes of the Board meeting on 22 June 2022 be agreed. Commission Board action tracker (EC 128/22) The Board requested that those actions that are not routinely reported in the minutes and that have subsequently been actioned be kept on record. Resolved: That the Board noted the progress against actions requested by the Board. Forward Plan of Board business 2022/23 (EC 129/22) The Board were updated on the preparations underway for the Belfast Board Day in October. It was noted that further updates would be made available as the programme was developed including confirmation of accommodation and travel. The Board were advised of a possible location and venue to host the February 2023 Board Day in the region but it was dependent on availability. Commissioners would be canvassed on alternative dates for the month of February 2023. Resolved: That the Board discussed and reviewed the Forward Plan of Board business for 2022/23, with pending topical items for scheduling. May 2022 elections (EC 130/22) The Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance introduced the report updating on progress with reporting on the May 2022 elections and setting out the findings of our statutory evaluation of the flexible voting pilots that took place in Wales for the Board's approval. Commissioners discussed the key themes highlighted in the paper, and confirmed the need to appropriately highlight areas of concern such as around the treatment of female candidates standing at the Northern Ireland Assembly elections. The Board agreed that the reports should aim to take a consistent approach across Northern Ireland, Scotland, Wales and England wherever possible. The Board also supported highlighting issues relevant for future resilience of the electoral system, stressing the importance of the "six month rule" for implementation of changes to electoral law and taking opportunities to emphasise areas which are covered by existing Commission policy recommendations. Resolved: The Board thanked the teams who worked on the paper and agreed the conclusions of the Wales flexible voting pilot evaluation, which will be published by the statutory deadline. Resolved: That the Board confirmed that the key themes and areas for recommendations outlined in the report should be reflected in our reports on the May 2022 polls. Public awareness plans for scheduled elections in May 2023 (EC 131/22) The Director, Communications, Policy and Research introduced the report, advising of our responsibility to provide public information ahead of elections across England and Northern Ireland in May 2023, delivering voter registration campaigns, a campaign about understanding online political advertising in Northern Ireland, and voter fraud and other voter information communications. The Board noted that the agreement on the overall strategy and maximum budget for voter registration campaigns is reserved to the Board. The Board discussed ensuring good integration between this campaign and work to raise awareness of the introduction of voter ID in England, which is scheduled to take place at the same set of polls. The Board discussed how we could encompass and reach disenfranchised groups; the balance of spending between nations (including to ensure sufficient attention is given to England); consideration of the impact of the campaigns on outcomes (i.e. levels of participation as well as of registration); and understanding of barriers to registration. The Board noted an appetite to draw benefit from external expertise on behaviour change campaigning to support future discussion of the Commission's public awareness plans. Resolved: The Board welcomed

Modernising voting (EC 132/22) The Director, Electoral Administration and Guidance introduced the report, and was joined by the Head of Policy, Head of Research and members of the team who provided input to the report, on progress with developing the evidence base and proposed next steps for this project. The Board noted that this phase of evidence-gathering had aimed to focus on the views of individuals and organisations across the electoral community, providing a wider perspective on the drivers for and benefits of changes to the system. The Board discussed that the focus should be on improving and securing the electoral system for the future rather than modernising in itself. It was agreed that a key objective should be to mitigate risks to the resilience of the system, in delivery of elections, registration systems and supply chains. It was discussed that transparency should be embedded in all aspects of this work to assure public confidence. The need for comprehensive electoral law reform should also continue to be highlighted. The Board discussed how this work aligns with other planned activity to support resilience in electoral services, such as in relation to coordination structures and the benefits they could bring. It was confirmed that the benefits of changes such as greater use of IT in the electoral system and postal voting should be explored. Experience of innovation in the UK and internationally during the COVID pandemic should also be drawn upon.

Resolved: That the Board considered the findings of the research and engagement and endorsed the proposed next steps for the project, in particular the first phase of further work (covering the next 12 months). A further update to the Board on progress with that work and to seek agreement on the subsequent phases of activity will be brought in January 2023.

Business planning for 2023/24 (EC 133/22) The Chief Executive introduced the report on the strategic approach to budgets for 2023/24. At the September Board meeting, Commissioners will be asked to agree the overall budgets prior to the submission of Estimates to the Scottish Parliament and Senedd at the end of that month. The Board noted that the business plans for 2023-24 would fit within the medium term financial plan agreed with the Speaker's Committee and would ensure alignment with the Corporate Plan objectives. The Board discussed that the business plans and budgets should be developed to meet the requirements of each of the three Parliaments, recognising the implications of recent inflationary pressures, including on pay. The Board further discussed ensuring the right pace and phasing of change, including on the role of digital technologies and allowing for the Elections Act delivery timetable as well as considering post-COVID requirements for office space.

Resolved: That the Board agreed the proposed approach contained within the report.

Elections Act update (Oral) The Board received an oral update on the Elections Act implementation, including the UK Government's planned schedule for the Strategy and Policy Statement consultation. It was noted that we are continuing with internal and external meetings to discuss ongoing delays to seeing secondary legislation and policy decisions impacting the design of the card. The Board noted that we were continuing to discuss our approach to preparing the new code of practice for non-party campaigners, and are having conversations with DLUHC regarding timings for presenting the code in order to finalise our internal working timetable. There was a good level of attendance from a range of parties and campaigners at Regulation roundtables on the new imprint and non-party campaigner rules, which provided us with invaluable insight. We will be meeting with DLUHC and the police to discuss enforcement of the Digital Imprint provisions this week. It was noted that pre-consultation work on the accessibility guidance has been completed, with input sought from a range of disability organisations, and we are now finalising a first draft of the guidance ahead of the statutory consultation period. The Board was impressed with the efforts from the team so far to deliver key activities which will support the effective implementation of the changes in the Act. Resolved: That the Board noted the oral update. Chief Executive's update (Oral) The Board received an oral update on operations and matters arising. The Board noted that we laid our Annual Report and Accounts before the Senedd, the Scottish Parliament, and the UK Parliament, thanking those staff colleagues who had made last minute amendments before sending onto the printer to meet our deadline. It was discussed to also lodge the Annual Report and Accounts in the Northern Ireland Assembly. The Board was advised that the user testing of the new virtual desktop environment commenced this week, following initial testing by the IT Team. This will replace our current virtual desktop system, and once we are satisfied that it is fit for purpose, it will be rolled out to all staff.

The Chief Executive and General Counsel attended the Electoral Lawyers Forum last week outlining our priorities in the Corporate Plan. Resolved: That the Board noted the oral updates. Update from the Remuneration and Human Resources Committee (Oral) The Board received an oral update on the work of the Committee at their meeting earlier in the week. The Board noted activities on the people strategy update, with an accompanying presentation to the report. This also included the work being done on the balance of responsibilities between HR and Managers. Further work included a brief presentation on an update on bullying and harassment, with discussions around our objectives, approach, further development and measuring impact. There was an update on EDI activities and a report on annual recruitment analysis. Resolved: That the Board noted the oral updates. Appointment of the Independent Adviser to the Commission Board on Equality, Diversity and Inclusion (EDI) (Oral) The Board received an oral update following the recruitment campaign for an Independent Advisor to the Commission Board on EDI. The Board noted that the campaign closed with 26 applications received across a range of public and private sector areas. Interviews were held on Monday with 4 candidates. An offer has now been made to a strong candidate. Should the Board agree the appointment then the Commission Chair will have conversations regarding final terms and conditions with the candidate to join the Commission. Resolved: That the Board noted the oral update. Deep dive strategic session: Horizon scanning (EC 134/22) The Director, Communications, Policy and Research introduced the session on horizon scanning, joined by the Head of Policy and the Head of Research, along with an external speaker, Ruth Marshall, Head of Futures Capability at Government Office for Science. Ruth provided a presentation on the role of horizon scanning and futures work within government and gave some reflections on the development of the Commission's work in this area. The Board noted the work to date on identifying long term issues and challenges and undertaking desk research to understand and assess potential change in the external environment beyond the field of elections. Commissioners discussed the future policy and strategy environment, major cyber security threats, approach to electoral registration, levels of public engagement, and engaging with other communities on issues such as equalities. They noted the importance of understanding and considering the assumptions that may be built into specific parts of Futures work. The Board noted that forward thinking on horizon scanning would be focussed on informing the development of the next Corporate Plan 2025/2030, and the Commission's work programme for that period. The Board thanked staff colleagues who provided input into the report and for Ruth's presentation which gave the Board an insight into Futures work. Resolved: That the Board noted the report and presentation.

First published: 21 April 2020 Last updated: 21 April 2020 Overview People were very satisfied with the processes of registering to vote and voting at the 2019 general election. They thought that they had enough information about the election, how to register, and how to cast their vote The number of registration applications made before the deadline was significantly higher than at the 2017 general election. 3.85 million people applied to register to vote. 660,000 applied on the last day to register Data from Electoral Registration Officers (EROs) shows that approximately one in three applications was a duplicate, submitted by someone who was already correctly registered. In some areas the data suggests that the proportion of duplicates was even higher The most frequently mentioned concern in feedback from overseas electors was about not receiving their postal vote in time to complete it and send it back More than a third of s who responded to our survey said that they or their teams were struggling with the demands of the role and the extra workload from unplanned electoral events in 2019 Electoral Registration Officers are under pressure: high volumes of applications at major electoral events Register to vote on a mobile Electoral Registration Officers are under pressure: high volumes of applications at major electoral events Public interest in major electoral events is increasingly driving electoral registration applications just before elections. An accessible online registration process means it is easy for people who want to make sure they can take part to submit an application, and to do so close to the deadline. EROs and their teams were under pressure to process large numbers of registration applications during the period before the deadline in November 2019. The number of applications made before the deadline was significantly higher than at the 2017 election. 2017 2019 2.9 million people applied between the Prime Minister's announcement of the election and the registration deadline 3.85 million people applied between MPs voting to approve the election and the registration deadline 612,000 people applied on deadline day 660,000 people applied on deadline day Duplicate applications A large number of duplicate applications added unnecessary pressure for EROs and their teams. EROs and duplicate applications Data from EROs shows that many applications were submitted by people who were already correctly registered: Approximately one in three applications received before the deadline was a duplicate In some areas the proportion of duplicate applications was even higher Only around half of all applications led to an addition to the register We received feedback from 160 EROs, Returning Officers (ROs) or s from across the UK. Nearly half (46%) of those who responded to our survey said that the volume of duplicate applications received during the election caused strain on resources and staff, who had to work significant additional hours to process them in time, alongside processing applications to vote by post and proxy. Feedback from s "The duplicate process is a nightmare throughout the year but during a high profile election it becomes a huge drain on resources." "Number of duplicate applications is unacceptable and creates additional enormous workload for no benefit to the register." Feedback from s EROS and postal votes Additionally, the electoral registration and postal voting application deadlines fell on the same day in Great Britain, after Parliament changed the law. It passed the Early Parliamentary General Election Act 2019 in November, to make sure the registration deadline was the same across the UK. EROs and electoral administrators told us that they felt additional pressure at this election as they processed both types of application to the same deadline. As a result of these pressures, EROs and their teams found it hard to provide the level of resource needed to process applications. In some cases this meant that voters didn't receive the service they should be able to expect. For example: In Plymouth, the ERO had included 1,451 people in the electoral register who had not completed an individual registration application. They identified and resolved this problem before polling day, but it meant that there was confusion about whether some people were able to vote in the election. There was limited time for the people who were affected then to apply to register correctly before the deadline. The ERO did not fully meet our performance standards In Northern Ireland, the Electoral Office sent letters seeking required additional information from some people who had applied to vote, but some letters included an incorrect deadline for response. The Chief Electoral Officer confirmed that anyone who responded after this point, but before the actual deadline, would have had their registration processed correctly. It was also told us that the large number of registration and absent vote applications had an impact on their capacity to focus on running the election at a critical point. Feedback from an EROs need more support EROs need more support to help them continue to deliver the level of service that people should be able to expect before major electoral events. The UK Government should look at the funding model for future UK Parliamentary elections to ensure EROs can handle large numbers of registration applications. More fundamentally, it should also look at how the online register to vote service and electoral management software systems could be improved to reduce the number and impact of duplicate registration applications. The UK's governments should also explore reforms that would make it easier for people to register or update their details throughout the year, such as integrating applications into other public service contacts, or more automatic forms of registration. This could help reduce the need for people to make new applications immediately before an election. Overseas electors again faced challenges when voting Some British citizens living abroad found it difficult to make sure their votes were able to be counted. Overseas voters found it difficult to vote Votes being counted Overseas voter experience Just over 230,000 people were registered as overseas electors, making up 0.5% of the total UK electorate. Many overseas electors who chose to vote by post had a tight deadline to receive and return their postal ballot papers before polling day: ROs could only begin printing ballot papers after the deadline for nominating candidates on 14 November This left less than four weeks to print and issue postal ballot packs, and for overseas electors to receive, complete and return their ballot papers before polling day People who registered or applied for a postal vote close to the deadline had only two weeks to receive, complete and return their postal vote We received feedback after the election from more than 500 overseas voters. The most frequent problem they mentioned was not receiving their postal vote in time to complete it and send it back. Overseas electors were dependent on the speed of the postal service in the country where they live. Quote from overseas voter "My overseas postal vote arrived the day before the election. This left no time to send it back, and so I was not able to vote despite my desire to." "The ballot arrived Saturday afternoon. I paid $35 for express shipping to get it back to the UK as soon as possible but it was still unlikely to arrive in time (letters normally take around a week). I don't know why it arrived so late." "IT DOES NOT WORK. My post was sent too late to arrive for me to return it, will not reach the UK in time. I have no vote." "My postal vote did not arrive until 5 working days before the election, making it impossible for my vote to be counted." Views from overseas electors Experience of postal and proxy process Some overseas electors also told us that they did not know they could ask someone in the UK to vote on their behalf by post (known as a 'postal proxy'). This could have been more convenient for the proxy voter, rather than having to travel in person to a polling station that could be far from their own home. More than half (53%) of s who responded to our survey said that they had spent significant time dealing with queries from overseas voters who were experiencing issues with postal or proxy votes during the election. We also received large numbers of queries ahead of the election from people living overseas who wanted to know if, and how, they could vote. This was not the first time that we have seen evidence of these problems for overseas electors. We highlighted evidence in our statutory reports on the 2015 and 2017 UK general elections, as well as following the 2016 EU referendum and the 2019 European Parliament election. At the 2019 general election, the Cabinet Office and Royal Mail put in place a system for faster delivery of postal ballot packs to overseas electors. This does appear to have improved the experience for some electors, but there was still not enough time for overseas electors in some countries to return their votes in time for them to be counted. Overseas electors should be able to expect that their vote will be counted. The UK Government should consider innovative new approaches to voting for overseas electors, using evidence from other countries. This could include the ability to download and print postal ballot papers or vote at embassies and consulates. The UK Government plans to increase the number of British citizens living abroad who can register to vote, by removing the current time limit of 15 years since they were last registered to vote in the UK. As more voters will be affected by the issues identified with postal voting, it will be even more important to give overseas electors ways of voting that mean they can be confident their votes will be counted at future UK Parliamentary elections. The timing of the election brought challenges for Returning Officers The timing of the 2019 election was unusual. It was the first general election to be held in December since 1923, and polling day was less than two weeks before Christmas. This brought specific challenges for ROs and their teams. Polling station image Polling station sign Challenges of timing The election process also began while the scheduled annual electoral registration canvass was still being carried out across Great Britain. Electoral administration teams had to complete their legal responsibilities to process canvass forms returned from households and invite new residents to register to vote, at the same time as setting up the administration of the election. Feedback that we received from EROs, ROs or s from across the UK highlighted some common challenges that they faced: Staff working in elections teams faced significant pressure and worked long hours to complete the annual canvass and deliver the election at the same time Some electoral management software systems had problems running election processes alongside the annual canvass ROs found it harder to recruit temporary staff, including polling station and counting staff, for an election held just before Christmas Some venues that ROs normally use for polling stations or for the count were already booked for seasonal events and were not available for this election. Larger volumes of post during the Christmas period saw reported delays in issuing and returning postal votes in some areas. More than a third (38%) of those who responded to our survey said that they or their teams had struggled with the demands of the role and the extra workload from unplanned electoral events in 2019. The early general election in December followed the May 2019 European Parliament elections across the UK which had remained scheduled in law, but had not been expected to take place. Scheduled local government elections also took place in many parts of England and across Northern Ireland in May. Feedback from an electoral administrator The pressure put on electoral administrators is untenable. This was our third all out election in a year, two of which were unscheduled. Our mental health is fragile at best. We are exhausted and completely fed up. Feedback from an Errors We saw evidence of printing errors on poll cards or postal ballot packs that caused confusion for electors in a small number of constituencies. Some ROs explained that they thought that the risk of printing errors was higher at this election because of the tight deadlines for checking proofs, combined with pressure on printer availability and capacity. In Waltham Forest, postal ballot packs were not initially sent to 1,470 postal voters because a data file was not sent to the printers. As soon as the problem was identified the postal votes were issued. Candidates and agents were told about this and information was put on the council's website. However, because some postal voters got their postal vote very close to polling day, they might not have been able to fill it in and send it back in time for it to be counted.

The RO did not fully meet our performance standards. These competing pressures and errors also speak to the challenges of delivering elections within an outdated and increasingly complex electoral law framework. We have already seen similar problems at elections held at other times of the year, particularly when different elections are combined and held on the same day. Feedback from an electoral administrator Very difficult to follow. Disparate and some of later legislation contradicts earlier legislation and not in-keeping with current times and technology. Feedback from an Modernising electoral law The Law Commissions of England, Wales and Scotland have now published the final report of their detailed review of electoral law. They have made recommendations to simplify and modernise the law that would help improve how elections are run. The UK's governments need to commit resources and time to reform electoral law, building on these comprehensive and well-supported recommendations.

Voters continue to have positive views about how the election was run. After each election we carry out research with the public to find out what they thought about taking part in the election. Our voter research Our research found that people were very satisfied with the process of registering to vote and voting at the 2019 UK general election: 78% of people were satisfied with the process of registering to vote. 93% of people who voted at the election were satisfied with the process of voting. More research from voters People also thought they had enough information about the election: 80% of people said that they knew a lot, or a fair amount, about the election. 81% of people said they found it easy to access information on what the election was for. 88% of people said it was easy to get both information on how to register to vote, and how to cast their vote. These are similar to positive levels of satisfaction that we have found at other recent UK-wide elections or referendums.

More than two in three people (69% of voters and non-voters) said they were either very or fairly confident the election was well-run (12% said they didn't know). This was similar to the level we found at the 2010 UK general election, but generally lower compared with other UK-wide elections or referendums in recent years, and ten
